THE GUARDIAN OF BLACKBIRD INN

Saving the inn might mean losing her life.

Sophia Yates travels to Blackbird Inn to help its mysterious owner, Garren Amsel, research its history. The state wants to lay claim to the haunted property, but the historic inn has been in Garren's family for generations.

When Sophia learns the truth behind the inn's biggest mystery, and why Garren stays, she realizes saving the Inn may come at the cost of her life.

How far will she go to protect him?

Chapter 1

“Welcome to Blackbird Inn, Miss...”

Sophia pushed her rain-soaked hair behind her ears and studied the tall man a moment before replying. He stared, probably at the frizz her red hair took on when wet. Either he hadn't been expecting her, or he wasn't used to guests at all. Being that this was a popular tourist inn, she assumed the former. With his good looks, he didn't appear to be the desk clerk type, and he seemed really uncomfortable, picking at pages on the desk and fidgeting as he talked. A chill rolled through her and she stepped up to the small registration desk and stuck her hand out. “Sophia Yates. I'm here to help with the research. Oh, and I have a reservation.”

She licked her lips and pulled her hand from his, certain he'd felt her palms dampen. “And you?” She fidgeted with the handle of her wheeled suitcase, noting the trail of water she'd brought in with her. The storm hadn't let up since her bumpy landing in Philly a few hours ago. Good thing the rental car had fog lights because the remote inn had been difficult to find, even after stopping for directions in the tiny town nearby.

The man behind the desk wasn't answering. He smiled, the sort of crooked smile a man might give you before he tied you up and...

“Garren.” Thunder boomed outside, and the vibration traveled through the inn, rattling the foyer windows. “Garren Amsel. I'm the owner of the inn, but you probably know that by my name.” He paused. “And I'm the desk clerk, occasionally.” He pushed his hair out of his eyes.

You've been reading too many scary stories. She shivered. Driving through a thunderstorm to the rocky inn on the side of a mountain in remote Pennsylvania didn't help. The place looked like something straight out of a horror movie, with its stone façade and overgrown hedges. A movie where the girl dies. “Nice to meet you.” I think.

“Likewise. I hope we can get this issue taken care of quickly.” He shuffled a stack of papers then set them aside. “But I can see you're cold, and probably exhausted from travel. Let me show you to a room. If you want some hot tea, I can have it brought up to you.”

She nodded. Cold and tired explained her nervousness. That, and a day of traveling. Her unease had nothing to do with all the research she’d done about how Blackbird Inn was haunted, or about the disappearance of a young woman almost a hundred years ago. All stories to drive in business to the isolated inn, she was sure of it. She was here now on business, nothing more. Not to solve a mystery or be afraid of a ghost.

It didn’t matter that Halloween was in two days. The only sign of decorating she’d seen was a pumpkin and haystack arrangement on the front lawn. The inn didn’t need anything added to be spooky.

“Arturo Beck will be in tomorrow night.” She gazed around the small foyer, taking in the dark woodwork and high ceiling. “I hope we can find something useful before he gets here.” The inn was over a hundred-fifty years old, but seemed to have been well maintained. Ancient navy blue silk wallpaper lined the foyer, making it appear smaller than it actually was, and an antique clock rested against one wall. In the center of the tall ceiling, a chandelier draped in small crystals dangled on a lone cord. One bulb was out, and dust concealed the refraction of the prisms.

She jerked her gaze back to Garren. “Yes, of course.”

“We can get to work tomorrow. Right now, you need rest.” He filled out notes in a book then pushed it toward her. “Sign your name, please. Here. Mr. Beck is taking care of the bill, but I like to have an accurate ledger of who stays here.”

In case they disappear? Sophia studied the guest register. She wasn’t the only visitor at the inn, but that wasn’t surprising. Late October would see the last of the fall tourists traveling through to catch glimpses of nature’s final show before winter. She signed her name, her hands still a bit shaky. “You still do this by hand?”

“I find it...practical.” He took the book and snapped it closed. “Besides, there’s no Internet here.”

What! She grabbed her phone from her jeans pocket. No service.

Garren set the book aside and leaned on the desk. “That’s right, no cell service, either. You’ll have to go into town if you have to get online.” He smiled. “But every room here has a landline if you need to make a call.”

She slipped her phone into her pocket. Anxiety crept up her spine. How would she function without Internet? Sure, it was only for a couple days, but it’d been a long time since she’d had to do without. She wouldn’t miss emails, but how would she do research? “That wasn’t in the brochure,” she muttered.

He raised his eyebrows. “You read the brochure?”

“Yeah.” She smirked. “Online, ironically. Mr. Beck showed it to me. Beautiful pictures.”

Lightning lit the foyer again, followed almost immediately by another clap of thunder. The desk lamp flickered once but stayed on, casting its yellow pall over the room. The clock ticked heavy beats.

“Then I guess you know.” Garren stepped from behind the desk and took her suitcase handle. “That’s good.”

“Know what?” Sophia reached for her suitcase. “Hey, I can get that.”

“Allow me.” He moved his hand on top of hers, his fingers curling gently over her own. “Hotel policy.”

Shivers skittered up her arm, but not of the scary variety. These were sexy shivers. Garren was even hotter up close. His black hair hung to his shoulders and flipped in disobedient ways. The darkness set off his pale skin, making him almost glow in the half-light.

“Good thing I know what?” She repeated, aware that her voice had just come out a half-octave higher than normal. She sucked in a breath and pulled her hand from under his, immediately sensing the loss of his touch, his warmth.

“You know about the ghosts we have here. I wouldn’t want any surprises.” He clenched the handle and set off toward the long hallway leading from the foyer, the suitcase bumping on the wood floor behind him. “Come. I’ll show you your room.”

Oh, he was good at playing the part of the spooky innkeeper. No wonder tourists flocked to the out of the way inn. Everyone liked a good, safe scare and obviously Garren was used to performing. She stuck her hands in her pockets and followed him down the hall. Well, she was at the inn on business and Garren was going to have to cut the act or they’d never get anything done. Mr. Beck expected things to be mostly in order when he flew in on Friday night, and if they weren’t, she might not get paid. He’d been quite insistent when he’d hired her to research that she get things done promptly. Not getting paid would be unacceptable. She needed the money.

The sound of the rolling suitcase on the heavy wood floor reverberated off the wallpapered hallway. Sconces lit the path, albeit dimly, and they passed door after dark door with large brass numbers.

Seventeen, Eighteen, Nineteen...

At the end of the hall, Garren stopped. “Your room is upstairs.” He motioned to the staircase, enclosed in one of the inn’s two hexagonal towers. The wide steps meandered up in a gentle spiral of stone or maybe marble. What a grand sight the place must have been when it was built. People probably hadn’t seen anything like it unless they were from the city. She gazed up the stairs. Amazing. She tucked her hair behind her ears, prying the damp locks from her neck. A hot shower would feel really good about now.

A column of tall, stained glass windows ran up the height of the tower to the third floor. With pointy arched tops and red glass, they looked more like windows one might find in a cathedral than an inn. She sucked in a breath as lightning lit the staircase and the stairwell glowed bloody red. Why think blood? Why not rose red?

“After you,” he said. “Second floor.”

She ran her hand along the cool handrail and started up the stairs. “How many floors does the inn have?”

Garren lugged the suitcase and, for a moment, Sophia regretted packing so heavily.

“Only two for guests,” he said. “Third floor is my residence, and then there’s the attic.”

She nodded and headed up the steps, careful not to let her wet shoes slide on the slick stone. Heavy rain beat against the red windows like a cat scratching against a fence post. The storm had grown heavier since she’d been inside, and she wondered if it would continue all night.

The inn was exactly the type of place she would’ve loved to explore when she was in college. Historical and full of character, the inn felt alive with its creaks and groans. Dark shadows loomed in every corner and she wondered how much sweeping it took to keep the cobwebs and mustiness at bay.

She pushed open the heavy oak door that opened onto the second floor and Garren moved past her with the suitcase.

“Not much farther.” He struggled with the heavy bag. “You coming?”

Taking one last look down the staircase, she nodded. A bright flash of white caught her eye and she stopped, ice running through her veins. The white, almost translucent blob flew up the staircase, winding toward her. The thing pulsed and gave off iridescence like it was lit from within, and it trailed a shower of tiny sparks.

She opened her mouth to scream, but nothing came out.

Lightning flashed in the stairwell again, and the blob disappeared. Frozen, she craned her neck to see if anything else was coming up the stairs. The stairwell was much cooler than it had been moments ago. Not just cooler. Cold. Her heart hammered and she put her hand over her chest, as if that would calm her. Her breath came out in puffs of condensation, like tiny clouds in the dark.

“Sophia?” A hand clamped down on her shoulder.

She screamed. Not a girly scream, but an all-out scream of terror.

“Sophia!”

Garren.

She scanned the area, and then looked at him. What was going on?

He pulled her close and wrapped his arms around her, his warmth soothing her instantly. And more than it should. “Are you okay?” he asked. “You look like you’ve just seen a ghost.”

Chapter 2

The hallway went on forever; she was sure of it, as she'd been walking for hours or maybe days. Did her bare feet even touch the ground, or was she floating inches above the wooden floor, propelled by the misty fog that consumed the space? And why was it so cold? She gazed at the long white nightgown she wore, fingering the thin, silken fabric. So thin. Then she wrapped her arms around herself to control her shudders. "This isn't mine," she said. Her voice echoed down the hall in a million repeats of "Mine, mine, mine." No one replied. Dust tickled her nose and the odor of decay and death filled her senses.

Would she ever find her way out?

With a piercing shriek, the sconces on the wall began breaking away one by one and slammed to the ground in front of her, creating little puffs of oily smoke as they went dark. Then she was holding a silver candelabra, heavy with five red candles, the flames dancing green and purple. She held the light high, but all she saw in either direction was endless hallway and closed door after closed door.

All locked. She'd tried to open them.

"Sophia?" The voice called to her again. The same voice had lured her from her bed and out into the hallway and now seemed to come from behind every closed door, under every floor plank, and on every wisp of chilled fog.

"Sophia? Come here."

Recognition chilled her veins.

Garren! The voice was his all along. Why hadn't she recognized it before?

He leaned against the wall up ahead, his black hair falling over his eyes, and she ran toward him. If she could reach him before he disappeared, maybe he could help her.

She stopped in front of him, her breathing labored. She tried to speak but no words came from her mouth. "Help!" she called to him in her mind, hoping he could understand her thoughts. Tears streamed down her cheeks and he wiped them away with his finger and gave her a sad smile. His blue eyes glowed golden and he took the candelabra and set it on the narrow hall table that had not been there a moment before.

Garren, she mouthed his name.

He leaned forward until his lips touched hers...

She fell...

Sophia jerked awake and gasped for breath. Darkness surrounded her. Tossing off the heavy covers, she reached to turn on the bedside lamp. The light cast the room in a familiar warm glow and the nightmare raced to the edge of her consciousness. What the hell was that dream? She rubbed her eyes and glanced around the quaint room, decorated in what could only be called inn chic. A cream-colored spread with matching pillow shams turned the iron bed into an inviting cloud, and a multi-colored hooked rug covered most of the bare floor. The walls, paneled in dark wood, closed in the space, but windows covered in pale curtains helped keep the room from feeling like a tomb. An antique oak dresser sat across from the bed and a small chair leaned against the wall just outside the private bath. Her unopened suitcase still sat on the chair.

She barely remembered falling asleep; she'd been so tired.

Garren had walked her to Room 217, given her the key, then left, promising they'd talk first thing in the morning. Still shaken by what she'd thought she saw in the stairwell, she washed her face and tried to calm her nerves. Exhaustion claimed her. She'd kicked off her shoes and crashed in the bed without undressing. All the talk of ghosts had definitely gotten into her psyche, and that combined with a long day of travel had conjured up a vivid nightmare. She tucked her hair behind her ears and moved to sit on the edge of the bed.

Why had she dreamed about kissing Garren? Or had he been suffocating her? I don't remember. She shivered. Her imagination was definitely up to some tricks tonight. She'd just met him and she was having erotic dreams about him. Or horrific dreams, she wasn't entirely sure which. Either way, she'd enjoyed the soft touch of his lips on hers.

Even if he was trying to kill me.

"Stop being ridiculous," she whispered, running her damp palms across the bed covers. Her crazy imagination was one of the things that drove off her last boyfriend, and she'd sworn to try to keep the craziness a little more confined.

The room had a set of double windows, and they creaked in the wind and rain. The storm hadn't died down yet and thunder boomed and rolled. When she'd checked the weather before traveling, rain hadn't even been in the forecast.

"Damn weathermen. They're wrong more often than they're right."

Her stomach rumbled. When had she last eaten? Breakfast.

Garren had told her to head down to the kitchen if she got hungry in the night and right now, that sounded like a great idea, even if she had to fight some ghosts over her food. She smiled. Not funny, Sophia. She wasn't just hungry, she was starving, and that had probably made her nightmare worse.

The tiny alarm clock on the bedside table read 3:33 AM. She'd have time to grab a snack and get more sleep before getting to work in the morning. Ghosts be damned.

She got out of bed and slid on her shoes. Slipping the key in her jeans pocket, she closed the door behind her and headed for the stairwell. The hallway, similar to the one in her dream, was soundless and dim. Her footsteps, muted and heavy, barely broke the silence as she crept toward the stairs. She didn't know how many other guests were at the inn, but three AM wasn't the time to find out.

The sconces, unlike in her dream, remained on the walls and lit her way in a steady golden path. She stopped at the door to the stairs. No ghosts. She took a deep breath, closed her eyes, then opened the door and stepped into the stairwell. After she let the door drag closed behind her, she opened her eyes slowly.

The stairs were empty.

Rain dripped down the outside of the red windows and lightning flashed outside, but no orbs or ghosts lingered in the space. Still, her heart hammered and chills raced up her spine. Every little hair on her arms stood upright and she rubbed them back in place.

Get ahold of yourself. You're being ridiculous.

She walked down the dark stairs to the first floor as quickly as she could, and then headed out into the hallway. No point in lingering. She released a breath she hadn't realized she was holding.

The first floor seemed much brighter even though the hallway had the same sconces as the second floor. She hurried past door after door to the foyer where another hallway spoke toward the kitchen and common areas of the inn. No one was at the reception desk, though the little lamp was still on and a stack of papers riffled in an unfelt breeze. The antique clock ticked time.

She passed a lovely sitting room with a large stone hearth and wall-to-wall bookshelves laden with books of every size. Coals still glowed bright orange in the fireplace and the tang of burning wood seared the air. Two oversized couches with a shared coffee table corralled the fire—a perfect place to have a snack. She'd grab something from the kitchen and bring it back to the sitting room to eat.

She stopped outside what must be the kitchen when she heard voices. Her mouth went dry and she clutched the doorframe, staying out of sight.

Garren.

"Leave her alone," he said.

"But..." another voice replied.

"I need her help."

"If you say so, master."

"Don't call me that. You're no more a servant than I am a free man." Garren's voice rose with the last words.

"Someone's there," the other voice hissed. "Outside the doorway."

Sophia flattened against the wall. Her heart's throbbing would surely give her away. I should run. Her legs wouldn't move. She closed her eyes and waited.

"Who's there?" Garren called. "Come on in."

She let out a breath. Why was she acting like a scared teen in a horror movie? Garren wasn't a serial killer. But what did he mean that he wasn't a free man? That was odd talk, plain and simple.

"It's just me, Sophia." She stepped into the kitchen, her legs weak. She'd always had an imagination, but this was getting ridiculous. She'd never been so jumpy and skittish. Imaginative, yes, but not afraid. What was it about the inn that made her so nervous? Or was it Garren?

He sat at a small round table, hands folded over one other, his button-up shirt from earlier replaced by a simple black vee-neck T-shirt. His hair was pulled back in a messy ponytail. God, the man was gorgeous.

He smiled and stood. "Couldn't sleep?"

She shook her head and scanned the small kitchen. Modernized and functional, it wasn't what she'd expected. Granite countertops shone against the dark wood of the floor. Small appliances of all sorts lined the counter near the door and a row of ragged cookbooks leaned against the wall along the counter in another corner. Double ovens and dishwashers and a huge fridge, all stainless, gave the space a professional flair. A cook's dream kitchen, even if it was small.

And empty except for her and Garren.

She looked back to him. "Who were you talking to just now? Before I came in?" she asked, her voice barely above a whisper. She touched her lips. Had she asked that aloud? Awkward.

He shrugged. "No one here but me." He moved to stand nearer, his shadow casting over her.

"But..."

"Maybe you heard me mumbling," he offered. "I'm anxious about losing the inn and I was sitting here going over things. Stressing."

"But I thought I heard..." She couldn't bring herself to finish the sentence so she leaned against the counter. Had she heard what she thought she heard?

"The property's been in my family since it was built and I don't know what I'd do if something happened to it. I'm concerned. I must've been talking to myself without realizing it."

Okay...that was possible. She nodded. "Well, you can count on Mr. Beck. He's a great lawyer. He'll find a way out from under this mess." And afterward, we can help you find a good shrink.

"I hope he can help." Garren rubbed his face and scowled. "I can't lose Blackbird Inn. It's the only home I've ever known."

"You've lived here all your life?" She swallowed hard. She'd had at least fifteen moves by the time she turned twenty. Living in one place for that long was unfathomable. And unusual.

"Always. I've barely even been anywhere else. But that's okay. I love it here. It's home."

A loud clap of thunder shook the windows and Sophia ducked, covering her ears.

"Just thunder. It won't hurt you." He stepped close and put his hands on her shoulders. "You really need to relax—I don't think I've ever met someone as high-strung as you."

The warmth from his hands soaked through her shirt and she moved away to avoid the tingles he was causing in other areas. The kiss was a dream. It wasn't real.

"I hear that all the time." She fiddled with the long strands of her hair. "I guess I've been under a lot of stress, too, but I think that goes along with being a new attorney. Stress is part of the job description, but I do seem to be more on edge than usual.” She sighed. “I’m not sure why. Heavy workload, maybe.”

“Well, let’s hope saving Blackbird Inn is an easy job with little or no stress.”

“Yes. I hope so.”

“How about a midnight snack?” He looked at his watch. “Well, a three AM snack? Food is good for calming the nerves. Right?”

“That’s why I came down.” She rested her hands on the counter and yawned. “I’m starving. I forgot to eat dinner. I was so tired, I crashed.”

“Well, let me prepare a snack. I know we’ve got some fresh fruit around here. Maybe some cheese.” He raised his eyebrows. “I’ll join you, if you don’t mind. I’m a bit hungry, too.”

“Sure.” What was the worst thing that could happen?

Sophia stared at the fire and sipped her cup of hot tea. The stone around the fireplace radiated the heat out into the room in waves of warm air. Garren had prepared a five-star snack of fruit, cheese, and bread and then stoked the fire to life before joining her on the couch. A beautiful copper teapot sat on the coffee table, filled with the most delightful floral tea she’d ever tasted. She was already on her third cup, and she hadn’t even needed honey to sweeten it.

“Good?” He leaned back on the couch, cup in hand.

The copper kettle reflected the bright fire. The florals in the tea mingled with the woodsy smell of the fire in the perfect combination. Definitely stress relief.

“Mmmhmm.” She peeked. God, the man was attractive. He didn’t look as pale in the orange firelight, but his skin was still offset by his unruly black hair trying to escape from his ponytail. He filled out the T-shirt in exactly the right way—not too many muscles, but not too thin either. She raised the cup again and watched him through the steam as he drank his tea.

“I love tea.” He set his cup down. “And it’s been ages since I’ve had someone here to share it with.”

Blue. His eyes are blue.

“What?” She set her cup on the coffee table, clinking it against the saucer.

He leaned close enough for her to feel the warmth of his body. “I said,” he whispered, “it’s been a long time since I had anyone to share tea with. So, thank you.”

“B-but you have guests all the time.”

He leaned back and laughed. “Yeah, but they don’t sit and spend time with the solitary innkeeper. They’re out exploring the mountains.” He leaned close again. “Or searching the property for ghosts.”

She forced a smile. Ghost stories made the inn money, and she understood why Garren needed to play along, but did he really believe in the supernatural? Then again, the apparition in the stairwell wasn't a floating dust bunny. Something was there, she just couldn't explain what. "Tell me about Blackbird Inn."

He stood and stoked the burning wood, the embers brightening with each thrust of the poker. "Well, we have twenty-eight rooms." After putting another large log on the fire, he replaced the tool then sat down beside her again. "And the property is just shy of a hundred fifty acres. We have our own lake, barn, and cemetery." He poured himself another cup of tea.

"No, I mean tell me about your family. About the history." She crossed her legs and faced him on the couch. Something about Garren compelled her to talk to him, and it wasn't work. She could tell from the way his posture changed when she brought up the inn that it was special. And something about the sitting room, with its piles of books and fiery warmth, told her the place was close to his heart. Framed photos lined the mantel and a heavy mirror hung above the fire. "Tell me why such a large inn was built so far from town. It doesn't make a lot of sense."

He looked down at his hands. "It's not a long story, really, but it's a sad one. Or some say it's sad. I guess you should know since we'll be working together to try to save the place." He took a deep breath and stared into the fire. "But I'm more concerned about the inn's future than its past right now."

"But the history would help. I read what I could online, but we might uncover a nugget that would make the inn too historically important for the state to seize."

"We tried for historical status many years ago and lost." He turned to look at her, his eyes searching hers. For understanding? Compassion? "Even though we housed soldiers returning home after the Civil War, we didn't qualify because we didn't have the necessary documentation, or not enough of it. And just being old isn't enough for status, either. The requirements are strict."

"Yes, they are. Do you have any records detailing past guests? We might be able to use the paperwork to gain status, especially if someone important stayed here." Surely, with the inn being as old as it was, they could find something to keep the state from tearing it down to build a highway. It just didn't seem fair. Maybe an important Union general had stayed there. Maybe even President Lincoln. That would make it easy as long as they had proof.

"Maybe." He sipped his tea. "We'll have to look at the stacks of paperwork stored in the attic. To be honest, I haven't had time to go through that mess."

She shifted. "Not tonight."

"No, not tonight." He set the cup on the table. "But just because we haven't shown it, it doesn't mean the inn doesn't have a historical value."

"True. But who understands what the government does?"

"Yeah."

"Why is Blackbird Inn so remote?" She picked up her cup and sipped on the now-warm tea. "Seems like it would be better to put an inn closer to town. Especially a long time ago when transportation would've involved horses." She shuddered at the thought of riding a horse carriage up the side of the mountain to the inn.

Lightning flashed outside the sitting room window, illuminating the skeletons of spindly trees outside. A low rumble of thunder followed. The storm seemed to be waning, thank goodness.

“It made perfect sense at the time.” Garren rubbed his forehead. “Civilization used to be closer, but the area along the road near us hasn’t been inhabited for nearly a century. And now, the land has reclaimed most of it. No one wants to build out here except the state.”

“Why? What happened?” She set her teacup down and pulled at the heavy blue afghan draped across the arm of the couch. She wrapped it around her up to her neck.

“Are you still cold?”

“A little.”

“I can build the fire up more if you want.”

“No, I’ll be okay.” She pulled the afghan higher. “Tell me what happened to the land near the inn. Did people pick up and move? Abandon their property?”

He nodded. “Pretty much.”

“But why?”

“Well.” He swallowed hard. “Essentially it was because of the missing woman, Alexandra Dumare, who supposedly died here.” He paused. “Or was rumored to have died here. I’ll admit that I don’t know the full story. No body was ever found, and my grandmother wouldn’t talk about it. But I did figure out that around the same time the woman disappeared, things at the inn got shaky. Less people came. We almost lost the property because of taxes.”

“Wow, but that’s been a long time. Almost a hundred years?”

“Yes, and people were a lot more superstitious back then.”

“Demons?”

A whoosh of cold wind swept through the sitting room, and the fire dimmed then flamed high. Sophia’s skin crawled.

“Demons.” Garren stood. “Let’s call it a night. We have a lot to do tomorrow. I’ll take the dishes to the kitchen. I trust you can find your way back to your room?”

“Yes, of course.” She stood, arranging the afghan back into place. Every time she began to relax around Garren, something weird happened. Her teeth chattered as chills broke across her back. Why was it suddenly so cold? “Goodnight.”

“Goodnight, Sophia.”

Fire raged around her feet, flames racing down the hall and up the melting wallpaper, which dripped into pools of silver liquid on the wooden floor. She ran past heavy door after heavy door, her nightgown sticking to her damp skin and her feet blistering from the searing wood. Sulfur pierced through the tang of burning wood and smoke charred her lungs. She opened her mouth to scream, but clouds of red billowed forth, feeding the crackling fire into an inferno of molten flames and laughter.

“Come. Now.”

It wasn’t Garren. This voice was deeper and more rumbling, vibrating her flesh and turning her stomach sour.

Garren was dead.

She didn’t know how she knew, but she knew it as strongly as she knew her own name. Everyone else was dead, too. She’d seen the charred corpses as she ran. She was the only mortal left in Blackbird Inn and she wasn’t getting out alive. The ceiling beams crashed down around her in splintered explosions, knocking into the floor and shaking the foundation of the whole building...

Knocking? Sophia dragged her eyelids open then squinted. Her heart thudded as her mind tried to focus. Where was she? Blackbird Inn. The room, bright with sunlight, seemed much larger than it had the night before. The dream slipped away like silk through her fingers. She blinked at the ceiling’s matrix of cracks spider-webbing across hundred-fifty-year old plaster.

The fire was just a dream. All a dream.

“Sophia? Are you awake?” Garren called from outside the door.

Garren! He’s not dead. “Yes, I’m awake.” She tossed the covers back and hopped out of bed. Pushing her damp hair out of her face and taking a deep breath, she headed for the door. “Just a minute.”

“I was worried,” he returned. “It’s after two. Thought we should get to work soon since Mr. Beck will be here this evening. I’d love to have something useful to show him.”

Shit. “Of course! I’m sorry.” She pulled the covers up on her bed. “I overslept. I’ll grab a shower and be down as quickly as I can.”

“Meet you in the dining room for a late lunch?”

“Be there in thirty.” She yawned.

“See you then.”

She leaned against the door, Garren’s retreating footsteps growing quieter by the moment. Then, angry with herself for sleeping in, she yanked her suitcase off the chair and set it on the bed. Mr. Beck wasn’t going to be happy if he got to the inn and they hadn’t gathered the documents, at least. She’d hoped she would have the research done, and maybe have even found something to help by the time he got there. Now, she only had hours to get the work done.

Maybe she’d get lucky.

She set out her clothes—jeans and a slim-fit lavender T-shirt. No point in business attire if she and Garren were going to be poking around a dusty attic. She tossed her underthings on top and moved the suitcase back to the chair. She’d have to unpack later.

The sunlight streaming through the curtains brightened and she went to the window to check out the view. Below the inn, the mountain fell away at a steep angle filled with rocks and trees. The vista toward town was the better view and she marveled at how precariously the inn perched on the edge of a cliff. The other side of the inn faced a meadow before inclining up higher into the mountains.

Wonder where the barn is? She hadn’t seen any outbuildings when she drove in, but then again, it was storming and nighttime. She’d almost missed the inn entirely, except that its stone façade had uplighting near the door.

The trees in front of her shimmered in a dark cloud, and then a flock of birds alighted and whisked up over the inn and out of sight. Blackbirds. She could barely make out the ring of bright yellow around their eyes. So many birds.

She smiled.

Helping Garren save the inn was not optional.

After a quick lunch of ham sandwiches and chips, Garren led her to his office in the back of the inn. They’d talked through lunch about the inn and the state’s bid to take it over by eminent domain. It didn’t seem fair that property could be seized just because the state wanted it.

She glanced around as they walked, but she didn’t see any other guests. Maybe they’ve gone out sightseeing.

Garren stopped at a heavy oak door and stuck a thin skeleton key into the lock. The door groaned open and he motioned to the small room.

“This is where I keep the current inn records.” He flipped the light on in the tiny office, the single-bulb fixture barely illuminating the space. His blue button-up shirt glowed green in the dim light, but his hair looked as black as coal. A huge oak desk piled with stacks of yellowed papers consumed most of the room, and several old metal filing cabinets took up the rest of the area. The cabinets leaned under the weight of their contents. The musty odor of old papers lingered in the air and the low ceiling made the space feel even smaller. Garren dusted off his blue jeans. “I know it doesn’t look very organized. Truth is, it isn’t. But I can find most things if I have enough time.”

Sophia cringed. Good thing they wouldn’t be working in Garren’s office. Claustrophobia was already setting in and her pulse hammered in her wrists and neck. She backed against a tower of boxes.

“Used to be a side porch till my grandmother had it walled in.” He yanked open the main desk drawer and reached inside. “I try not to spend a lot of time in here other than to store things.”

“Yeah, it’s a little...small. And cramped.”

“We won’t be in here long. My bookkeeper, Henry, works in here sometimes. Like I said, the most recent inn records are here—back until about 1970 or so.”

“You have a bookkeeper?” Odd. Mr. Beck hadn’t mentioned that. “We need to talk to him later. He might be able to help us.”

Garren looked up from his search in the drawer. “Henry is a bit...backward. He’s worked here for many years, but he really doesn’t talk to people he doesn’t know.”

“Oh.”

“If you have any specific questions, of course I can take them to him.” He held up a key ring with half a dozen keys dangling from a leather cord. “Found them! I haven’t been in the attic in a long time. Creepy old place. Of course, some people like that sort of thing.”

Great. She stuck her hands in her pockets. “Guess this will be an adventure.”

He slammed the desk drawer closed. “I loved playing in the attic as a child. There’s so much stuff that’s been piled for storage. I’m not sure I would even begin to know everything that’s there, and most of it’s junk. But, to a child, it was a realm of lost treasures. And a respite from the daily work at the inn.”

“I’ll bet!” She smiled. “Sounds like a lot of fun.” She remembered the days when she and her younger sister visited her own grandmother. They would count and sort buttons in her sewing room and dig through all the cast-off items in the standalone garage out behind the house. They loved trying on old hats and shoes. Having an entire attic to play in as a child must have been amazing. Had Garren been lonely?

“Do you have any siblings?” she asked.

His gaze darkened and she immediately regretted asking the question.

“No, I’m only child.” He looked down. “My parents died in a car crash when I was seven. Maybe that’s why I spent so much time up in the attic. Some people might find that creepy, especially for a child, but all my imaginary friends lived there.”

“I’m sorry.” She wanted to touch him and comfort him, but held back. The pain on his face ran deep—almost fresh. Touching him might set him off, and not in a good way.

“It’s not your fault.” He waved her away. “The attic was too hot in the summer, but fall and spring, it was the perfect place to escape the inn guests. I'd grab a book from the sitting room or the library and sneak up there to read for hours. I could be someone else for at least a little while. Or somewhere else."

"You could read in peace."

"Oh yes."

"But you haven't been to the attic lately?"

"No. No reason to." He glanced at his watch. "But we'd better go if we have any hopes of getting started on those papers. It's already almost four PM. What time did you say Mr. Beck would be here?"

Sophia shrugged. "Last I heard his flight gets in around eight. Then, he has to drive here. So, maybe ten-ish? With no cell service, I don't have any updates."

"We'd better get busy then." He brushed by her. "Let's go. The stairs to the attic are behind the kitchen."

She followed him out into the cramped back hallway back toward the kitchen. As they passed, Bernadette, the cook, waved. Impossibly old, the woman had made lunch with the speed of someone forty years her junior. Her white hair, twisted into a knot on top of her head, gave her the appearance of a troll doll, complete with a twinkle in her eyes. Sophia smiled and waved back.

"How many guests are at the inn right now?" she asked. "I haven't seen many since I arrived."

Garren climbed the narrow stairwell to the attic. "Last ones checked out this morning. So, just you."

"I thought this was a busy time of year?" She held the rickety handrail to balance on the steep stairs. The thought of being the only guest at the rambling old inn gave her the heebie jeebies.

He turned and moved down to meet her on the stairs, leaning toward her until his breath caressed her face. "It usually is a busy time. Very busy." His voice slid over her like soft fingertips and she shivered as the stairwell temperature plummeted. "I didn't want thrill-seekers at the inn this weekend."

"What happens this weekend?" She paused. "Oh, you mean Halloween?"

His lips brushed her ear. "Tomorrow is the hundred-year anniversary of Alexandra's disappearance. Yes, Halloween."

Chapter 4

Sophia set the dusty cardboard box onto the pile. She'd gone through half a dozen boxes full of ancient papers already, with no luck. No evidence that Blackbird Inn had Civil War soldiers as guests, or anyone of note. Garren worked beside her, flipping through ringed ledgers and books and loose papers, looking for any scrap that might save the inn.

She hadn't pressed him about the upcoming anniversary of Alexandra's disappearance, though it seemed odd or perhaps coincidental that she and Mr. Beck were at the inn during such a notorious time. And Halloween, to boot. If this were a movie, people would be saying it's too coincidental to really happen. Garren didn't seem worried about it, so maybe she shouldn't be either.

She stared up into the rafters of the attic where large beams of old-growth wood crisscrossed the space. With the gables and hips of the roof, the attic was less than ideal for storage, other than its overall vast space. Nooks and crannies at every turn, there were enough boxes to keep them busy for much longer than a day, though Garren insisted that all the business papers were in the boxes where they searched.

What could be in all the other boxes and trunks spread around the attic? In the drawers of the cast-off furniture? Maybe Alexandra's bones...

Sophia shook her head to rid herself of the thought. She couldn't start thinking about hidden bones or corpses or she'd completely spook herself out. Still, the dark corners of the attic would be the perfect place to hide something. Something like a body. She shivered.

If the mere thought of Alexandra gave her such a fright, surely many people would clamor to visit the inn at the anniversary. Why hadn't Garren capitalized on the opportunity to celebrate? Most innkeepers would fly the haunted flag proudly. And tourists would pay extra to ghost hunt for Alexandra, a real person who had disappeared. Maybe the pending takeover by the state had kept him from any public display.

The situation was odd.

They'd worked in near silence for over two hours and the last rays of the setting sun streamed in through the attic windows, laying down runways of light across the ancient floorboards. Dust spun and twirled in the beams of sunlight, like tiny fairies suspended in midflight. It'd be dark soon. She peeked at Garren. A fine sheen of sweat covered his pale forearms and his shirt, rolled up at the sleeves, was covered in dust. His ponytail hung low, strands of black hair escaping and sticking to the dampness on his neck.

He looked up and caught her gaze.

“I’m glad you’re here,” he said. “You’re making this go a lot faster.”

She smiled. “I’m glad, too. This inn is so beautiful.” She rubbed her hands on her jeans. “Even the dusty old attic.” And being here with someone as sexy as you helps me keep ghosts off my mind.

She glanced around at the stacks of boxes. They had a lot more to go through before they could call it a day. Good thing they didn’t have to search the entire attic. It would take weeks, perhaps months. Old furniture lined one wall, some covered in sheets and some out in the open.

“I’m glad you like it.”

Had she imagined it, or had Garren’s face warmed under her words?

“I do,” she said. “Very much. It’s peaceful here, though I feel a little off balance. Like I’m always being watched. Like I’m not alone.”

“The inn has a way of making people feel like that. She’s a crotchety old mistress.” He pulled out another book from the box, flipped through to the cover page and then set the book aside. “So, where are your parents? Do you have family?” He paused. “I mean, where do you live? Not around here, obviously.”

Sophia sat back on her heels. “I live in Atlanta. I don’t talk to my parents much. We have differing opinions on how I should live my life.”

“Family is important.” He rubbed his face.

“Yes, but so is personal freedom.” She shoved the next box over toward him. “I am not the person my family wants me to be.”

He glanced over. “I understand.”

And he did. She felt it in her soul. But this job was not a place to be looking for romance. Mr. Beck would be really upset if he arrived and they’d found nothing. She turned away to grab another stack of ledgers. “I’m surprised the inn isn’t celebrating the anniversary of Alexandra’s disappearance. It seems like something a haunted inn would celebrate.”

“Why would we? It’s tragic.”

“But tourists like ghost stories, so I thought—”

He scooted next to her and tipped her face toward his with a finger. He was so close she closed her eyes. He smelled like rain and woodsy wilds. “You thought I’d try to make money off the story,” he whispered.

She nodded, her eyes still closed. The inn held onto its ghost stories so why was Alexandra’s story any different?

He ran his finger along her jawbone to her ear and she shivered under his touch. “I’d never exploit a tragedy.”

She opened her eyes. His face, inches from hers, tensed, and his blue eyes deepened.

"I'm sorry. I shouldn't have assumed."

"It's okay." He smiled and sat back. "You wouldn't believe the number of news people that wanted to come out from Philly to report on the anniversary. I turned them all down. Alexandra's story should stay buried, where it belongs. A hundred years is enough time to be in limbo and I have no intention of dragging up past events or painful memories."

Sophia nodded. Her face still tingled from Garren's touch. For a moment, she'd thought he was going to kiss her. And she was going to let him. What would the harm be? It wasn't like he'd asked her to stay at the inn. She'd see him a few more days, and that would be it.

The pile of papers they needed to go through had gotten smaller, but they weren't close to finishing. The sun had mostly set, and only a faint orange light shone in. Garren had found an old lamp and plugged it into the extension cord running across one side of the attic. The overhead lightbulbs were out, but the lamp would give off enough light for the time being.

"We're almost done." Garren set another stack on the floor beside her. "Just a couple more boxes and we can get out of here."

"Yeah, but we haven't found any evidence yet. Most of the paperwork is inn maintenance and correspondence with town markets and such. No personal letters or anything that might shed some light on what was going on here. I'm sure if someone famous stayed here, there would be some kind of evidence."

"Yeah, the ledgers haven't been helpful. But we still have a few more to look through. Maybe we'll find something. Or maybe there's something in the box of stuff we'll take downstairs."

"I hope so. Mr. Beck won't be happy if we've got nothing to show him."

"I won't be happy either. We need to save Blackbird Inn. I don't know what I will do if I lose it. I'll die without it."

She looked up at him. "It would be bad, but you won't die. But it's not going to happen. We'll save it."

He set his mouth in a firm line. "You have no idea."

She sorted through the stack of papers and pulled out two ledgers, both of them small and dusty, their leather covers cracked from age and the heat of the attic.

"These look old." Changing the subject was a good idea. Things had gotten way too tense. She opened the first ledger, its yellowed pages crisp between her fingers.

"What year?" Garren slid next to her.

She leaned against him, not caring if the move was too brazen. Being with him felt comfortable, at least in the daytime. At night, he was a little spooky. She ran her finger down the page and over to the date column. "Nineteen...something," she said. "I can't make it out completely. The cursive is pretty, but sloppy in places."

"It's just the guest register, but I guess we should hold onto it and look through it later to see if we can find any famous names."

“Yes.” She started to close the book when something fell from the pages. A pressed and yellowed four-leaf clover.

Garren picked it up and twirled it in his fingertips. “Maybe this is the luck we need.”

She held the book open for him to place the clover back inside. She gasped. “Alexandra Dumare’s name is here.”

“What?”

“Yes, it’s her name all right.” She paused and scanned the page. “Oh my God.”

He stared at the page and his eyes widened. “How is that possible?”

“I don’t know, but Arturo Beck has some explaining to do. Why did someone sign his name to a register that’s a hundred years old?”

Chapter 5

What the hell was going on? Sophia held the inn register at arm's length and stared at the names. Printed in block lettering, both Arturo Beck and Alexandra Dumare's names were clear and written by the same hand. No mistaking it, someone with the identical name as her boss had not only stayed in the inn at the same time as the missing or dead Alexandra, but they had checked in at the same time and shared adjoining rooms.

Garren looked on, hands in his pockets. "That makes no sense. No one ever mentioned that Alexandra was staying at the inn with someone. I always assumed she was alone—that's part of what made her disappearance such a mystery."

"And that someone has the exact name of the man who sent me here to research. I can't believe it's a coincidence." She examined the names. "It's the same handwriting, too. The same person signed both of them in." She took a deep breath then let it out slowly. "Didn't the police ask for the ledger when they were investigating? This seems like an important clue."

"We're talking something that happened a hundred years ago. Police work was a lot different back then. No DNA tests or forensics like we have today. Mostly, they relied on interviews and confessions."

"Right, but still..."

"And I don't think they even investigated the disappearance as a crime. At first, the rumor was that Alexandra went missing and I know the townspeople and sheriff put a search party together and searched the woods around here. But when they found nothing, they assumed Alexandra had run off with someone. Those days, it was unusual for an unmarried woman to be traveling alone."

"She obviously wasn't alone."

"Yeah." Garren sighed and took the ledger. He ran his fingers across the names. "It wasn't until a few years later that the rumors began."

"That she'd been murdered?"

"Yes, or worse."

Sophia shuddered. What could be worse? Torture? Rape? She didn't ask. "But what about Mr. Beck? How does he play into this? How could his name be on a hundred-year old list—with the name of the person who disappeared?"

Garren shut the ledger and set it in the box of stuff they were taking back downstairs. “Maybe it’s a coincidence.”

“Or maybe it’s his grandfather or great-grandfather.”

“That’s possible. It’s definitely odd.”

“Something else is going on, I feel it. The Mr. Beck who sent me here must have known that another Arturo Beck had been here with Alexandra. And being here right at the anniversary of Alexandra’s disappearance? Something is definitely going on, and it’s making me nervous.”

“We’ll have to ask him when he gets here.”

“Count on it. I don’t like secrets.”

They worked through the last papers in silence, pulling out anything that might be of interest and setting it in the box to go downstairs.

“Is that it?” Sophia yawned and stretched.

“For these boxes, yes.” Garren stood. “There’s one more place I want to look. He pulled the keys from his pocket and held one up. “I think this is the one I need.”

She scrambled to her feet. “What’s that one for?” She imagined a tiny cage or closet that he could lock her away in. She shivered.

“My grandmother’s trunk. I want to check in there to see if there’s anything else that might help. She kept a lot of mementos in the trunk, but maybe something related to the inn will be there.”

She let out a sigh. “Especially if it was something important. She’d probably keep it separate from the inn’s business.”

“Let’s go.” He headed for the corner. “Over here. Can you bring the lamp? The cord should reach.”

“Sure.” She picked up the lamp and followed, keeping the cord clear of obstacles.

He led her to an area with a lot of furniture. Dressers, chairs, and bedframes stood in rows and leaned against the wall. Even a mattress, covered in a sheet, had been stored in the dusty attic.

The lamp cord tightened. “This is as far as it will go.” She set it on one of the grimy tables.

The antique trunk had a bowed top and hammered iron strappings across the top. In the center, a carving of a bird had been blackened with stain, or dirt.

A blackbird.

“It is beautiful. This trunk has been in my family for generations. Family stories say that it came over when my family emigrated from Germany. The blackbird on top was hand carved by a local witch. So the story says.”

She tapped her finger on her lip. “Why a blackbird? I’ve been wondering why the inn is named after a bird.”

Garren smiled. “Among twenty snowy mountains, the only moving thing was the eye of the

“Huh?”

“Wallace Stevens, from his poem ‘Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird.’”

“Okay, but that doesn’t explain—”

“My family name, Amsel, means blackbird. So the bird has been our spirit animal, well, forever. It’s an important symbol in our heritage.” He stuck the key in the lock. “Let’s see what’s in here. I hope Grandma left us some answers.”

Garren lifted the heavy lid and peered inside.

Sophia watched, trying to see over his shoulder to what was inside the trunk. “That’s interesting. I saw some blackbirds outside earlier.”

“Yes, those are American blackbirds. There are some European ones, actually thrushes, here, too. You can tell by the golden orange ring around their eyes. Very vivid. And those are the ones my family is named for.”

“Thanks for the bird-watching lesson.” Sophia came closer but let him dig through the stuff inside. “I didn’t know there were different kinds of blackbirds.”

“No problem. Oh wow, look at this.” He dug in the chest. “I remember this hat.” He set out a small round woman’s hat with dusty black feathers attached to the side. “She wore it on Sundays when she served brunch. She always said a lady’s head should be covered on the Sabbath. And this black hat was her favorite. I used to think of her as a blackbird when she wore it.” He smiled.

“Your grandmother sounds like an interesting woman.”

He stared at the hat, running his fingers through the feathers. “She was.”

The way he talked so lovingly about his grandmother set her heart pounding. Not only was he sexy, he was sentimental. She let out a sigh.

He turned, his face lit in yellow light from the lamp. “What is it? We’re almost done.”

Her faced burned. “N-nothing.”

He went back to work, pulling all sorts of things from the chest. Bone-colored kidskin gloves, folded linen handkerchiefs in every color, even a set of fat faux pearls. The treasure chest seemed to be more of a lingerie chest.

Garren sat back on his heels. “Look at this!” His eyes shone as he held up a two small books. “I think we found something useful.”

She stepped close. “What are they? Books?”

“My great-grandmother’s journal. Or two of them, at least.” He flipped through the pages. “Looks like she wrote in them often. Maybe she wrote about Alexandra.”

“Why would your grandmother have your great-grandmother’s journals?”

He packed the other things back into the chest. “That’s a very good question. And these are dated right around the time of Alexandra’s disappearance. They must be important, since my grandmother kept them hidden away.” He shut and locked the chest, the hinges groaning as he aligned the lock.

“We’ll have to read through them and see what secrets they hold, if any. Maybe the piece of information we’re looking for is here.”

Sophia nodded. Maybe the journals would be useful to the mystery of Alexandra, but how would they help her save the inn? She hadn’t come to play Nancy Drew. And things were getting more complicated.

“I’ll stick them in the box.” He stood. “I’m ready to go back downstairs, how about you?”

“Definitely.”

“You meet me upstairs and we’ll have dinner and look through these things after we eat? Maybe we’ll still luck out and find something before Mr. Beck gets here.”

“I’ll ask Bernadette to bring up dinner for two. You come on up to the third floor when you’re done. We can work until Mr. Beck gets here.”

“Sounds great.” Sophia shivered as the temperature in the attic dropped by at least fifteen degrees. Across the room, something fell to the floor, bounced, and rolled.

Garren scanned the room. “I think we need to leave the attic to the ghosts.”

Chapter 6

Sophia climbed the last set of stone stairs to Garren's rooms. The shower had certainly helped with her fatigue, but a million questions remained and her mind wouldn't slow down. Did Mr. Beck know about the inn guest that shared his name? Did Garren know more about the disappearance of Alexandra than he was telling? And were there really ghosts at Blackbird Inn?

She sighed. The questions were never-ending and the longer she stayed at the inn, the more questions there were. The mysterious inn held a lot of secrets. She spent more time questioning things than finding answers.

And what had possessed her to wear the white dress? She tugged at the hem. Form-fitting to the waist, with a flared short skirt, she'd tossed it in her suitcase on a whim. When she'd tried it on at the store, the clerk had raved about how great the white cotton looked with her long red hair. She'd bought it knowing the clerk was trying to make a sale, but she'd never worn it. It was the only dressy thing she brought with her to the inn and, for some reason, dinner with Garren had seemed like the place to wear it. Wearing her hair up had been a last-minute choice. Was she trying to impress the handsome innkeeper?

Maybe.

And she knew better than to wear white after Labor Day. This was serious.

"At least my shoes aren't white," she mumbled. She paused and glanced down at the red platforms she'd worn. They'd looked so cute online. Not the smartest shoes for climbing stairs, though, especially stairs where ghosts might be, and she might have to run for her life. She could take the shoes off, but she was almost to the third floor.

"You look stunning."

She looked up to see Garren standing on the landing, a glass of red wine in hand.

Her face warmed. Stop acting so smitten. "Thank you." She looked down so he wouldn't see the blush creeping along her cheeks. Her mouth went dry and she steadied herself on the handrail. Whether she liked it or not, Garren made her girly parts hot.

Who was she kidding? She loved it.

She reached the top stair and stopped in front of him. He'd changed into gray dress slacks and a black button-up, left open at the collar. His hair was pulled into a neat ponytail. Her insecurities vanished and she smiled. Just another dinner. With a sexy man. What was there to fear? Technically, this was work.

Garren smiled in return. “Bernadette brought up our food. Are you hungry?”

Her stomach growled in response and she giggled. “Yes. I am. Quite.”

“Then let’s eat. This way.” He gestured. “I’ve got a small dining table in the parlor where we can have dinner and chat.”

Alone. Her heart thudded. Alone was good.

She followed him into the parlor and then stopped, immediately transfixed by the artwork on the walls. Every wall. Frame against golden frame, large and small paintings lined every inch of wall space in the room. Some paintings were portraits, some still life: all beautiful. Most looked old, the paint hazing and cracking inside their ornate frames, which added to their beauty. “Amazing.” Words couldn’t express the beauty. She covered her mouth with her hand, acutely aware that Garren was staring at her.

He raised an eyebrow. “My great-grandfather was a painter. Mostly oils. I don’t think he threw out anything he painted.” He glanced up at a large painting of a man in a wicker chair. “I didn’t inherit his ability, though. I can’t paint a straight line.”

“He was talented.” She moved to sit in the chair he pulled out for her. “I’m not an artist either, but I can tell that’s first-class work. And each one is so beautiful and full of life.”

Garren moved to the opposite side of the table, set his wine glass down, then sat. “Yes, he was a fantastic artist. But quite eccentric.”

That seems to run in the family. “I see.” She glanced at the largest oil, a portrait of a young woman with dark, maybe black, hair and bright blue eyes. “Wow. Who is that a portrait of?”

He studied the painting for a moment. “My great-grandmother. I think she was about twenty-five when he painted it.”

“She was gorgeous.”

“Yes. They were very much in love, so the story goes.” He paused then chuckled. “And she hated that painting.”

“Why?”

“She said portraits were phony. A snapshot of a moment, an outward glance, with no soul. Two-dimensional.” He looked at the painting then back to Sophia. “But that’s enough of art. I know you’re hungry so let’s eat.”

“Your great-grandmother sounds like an interesting woman.” She picked up the white cloth napkin and set it in her lap. “Everything looks delicious.” Her plate was filled with grilled vegetables and a chicken breast with a golden sauce. The savory smells caused her stomach to grumble again and she held her napkin closer.

“Bernadette is a great cook. She keeps me well fed.” He poured her a glass of wine then refilled his own. “Shall we toast?”

“To what?” She raised her glass.

He raised his. “How about to new friends and old mysteries?”

“And to Blackbird Inn.”

“To Blackbird Inn.”

She clinked her glass to his, and then sipped the wine. If it hadn't been work, she would swear the evening was a date. The way Garren looked at her, his interest in her clear. She set her glass down and dabbed at her mouth with the napkin.

Not a date.

She shook her head and sampled the vegetables. She couldn't remember the last time she'd had a real date. Working all the time left little chance for a pet, much less a romance. Yet here she was in a magnificent old inn with a polite and handsome man, having a secluded dinner on the finest china.

If she let her imagination get away with her, she could picture herself as lady of the inn, a cast of servants waiting on her every whim. And a tall, dark, and handsome husband who protected her from all that went awry, whether it was burned soup or a rogue gunman.

She smiled and stuffed a forkful of food in her mouth. She'd date Garren, odd as he was.

They ate in silence. Once in a while, she'd look up and Garren would be staring at her. He'd smile and she'd look away.

But this is not a date.

She was getting full, her stomach happy but protesting another bite. She sipped her wine, the tartness bursting in flavors of ripe berries in her mouth. She savored the taste then sipped again. Wine wasn't food. It didn't count.

“Can I get you anything else?” Garren asked.

“No, thank you.” She'd set her napkin down, warmth rushing through her body. Maybe she shouldn't have drunk the wine so fast. “That was really good but I'm stuffed.”

“Okay. Me too, actually.” He pushed his plate away and set his napkin on the table. “I'm glad you enjoyed it. Bernadette will come clear the table, so we can go ahead and go to the library.” He paused. “It's the perfect place to talk, if you're still feeling up to it.”

“Oh yes.” She stood. “I want to talk. We have a lot to talk about.”

“Did I hear my name?” Bernadette clambered into the room, a large tray in her arms, her long skirts rustling as she walked.

Why did she wear such historical clothes? Sophia supposed it was something to help the ambiance at the inn. But cooking and cleaning in such clothing wouldn't be easy. She'd have to leave a big tip for Bernadette when she left.

“We've finished eating,” Garren said. He took the tray from her and set it on the table then began stacking the dishes on it. “Everything was delicious, as always. Thank you for bringing it up.”

“I'm so glad you liked the chicken. It's a new recipe.”

“Oh yes,” Sophia said. “It was really good.”

Sophia stood and watched Bernadette clear the table. The cook moved so quickly, it was difficult to believe she was as old as she looked. And she didn't leave room for Sophia to help, either.

"We had a phone call a few minutes ago." Bernadette took the silverware and stuck it on the tray. "It seems that Mr. Arturo Beck won't be coming to the inn till tomorrow. He sent his apologies."

"Why isn't he coming tonight?" Sophia scooted her chair under the table. "Did something happen?"

"He sounded okay." Bernadette shrugged. "All he said was he needed to pick up some things in town and the stores were mostly closed, so he's getting a hotel room and will drive up here tomorrow."

Her eyes are so blue.

"Well, that's not the news we'd expected." Garren shot Sophia a glance. "But it gives us more time to check out the papers we brought down from the attic. So I think it's a good thing."

"Hope you two find what you're looking for." Bernadette picked up the laden tray like it was made of air. "See you in the morning. After I finish the dishes, I'm calling it a night."

"Night," Garren said. "Sleep well."

"Thank you, mast...er, Mister Garren." She headed to the doorway, then stopped and turned. "You remember what tomorrow is, right?" she whispered.

"Samhain."

"And the anniversary—" Her eyes were wide.

"Yes, I'm aware of the anniversary. It's going to be okay. Night, Bernadette."

"I hope you're right. Night." She took a step and then stopped. "I hope there are no shenanigans. We don't need any bad press up here at Blackbird Inn." She spun on her heel as if the heavy tray weighed ounces and headed down the hall.

Sophia turned to Garren. "Does everyone know tomorrow is the anniversary?"

"Bernadette has worked here a long time. Of course she knows." He moved close and put his arm on her shoulder. "Are you getting spooked with all the talk of Alexandra's disappearance? It was a long time ago, you know."

She shook her head, though her body betrayed her. The job was supposed to be straightforward, not full of ghost stories and disappearances and handsome innkeepers with secrets. "No, but I agree. No shenanigans."

"Trust me, any kind of trouble is the last thing I want. And with Mr. Beck here, I'd imagine we'll be working day and night anyway. No time for shenanigans."

"Good." She sighed.

"Follow me, the library is over here." Garren walked toward the other side of the parlor then slid the oak pocket door open. "It's warm inside. I already have a fire going."

She headed to the room. Garren was such a puzzle. He could be mysterious and downright unnerving with his talk of ghosts one second, and sweet and empathetic the next. Who was the real man? The man who hung on her every word and gesture like it was a gift? Or the brooding man who talked to himself when he thought no one was around?

Time would tell. But she only had a couple more days at most.

The library lived up to its name, though it wasn't huge by any standard. Wall-to-wall shelves filled with books and tchotchkes, a round table with two chairs and the box they'd brought from the attic, and a green velvet plush couch. The fireplace was tinier than the one downstairs, but it was perfect for the smaller room, and provided the only light at the moment. Two large windows filled one wall, framed by heavy dark drapes.

"This is a cozy room." She sat on the sofa and straightened her dress. "Lots of books."

He nodded. "I spend a lot of time in here."

"You like to read, still?"

"Yes, very much." He sat beside her. "Don't you?"

"Oh yes."

They sat in silence. Awkward. Her heart thudded. Why was she nervous around him? He'd done nothing to make her anxious. Even all his talk of ghosts hadn't bothered her that much. Maybe it was the way he drank her in when he looked at her. Like she was the only woman he'd ever seen. The only woman he wanted to be with.

But why would he want me?

No denying it, she felt special when she was around him. Rarely did a man give her his undivided attention.

"Sophia?" He scooted closer to her.

"Yeah?" She gulped at the softness in his voice.

"Can I ask you something?"

Her heart raced. "Of...course. Ask me anything." Had she really said that? She crossed her hands in her lap. This wasn't Truth or Dare. How complicated a question could it be?

He fiddled with the green piping on the couch cushion for a few moments then looked at her. She met his gaze and stared. His pupils dilated and he leaned in.

"I hope this doesn't sound too weird."

Too late. "Go ahead. Ask me anything." Her voice wavered as she spoke.

He took a deep breath. "Okay, here goes." Another deep breath. "Do you feel a kind of...bond? Between us?" He put his palm on her cheek and turned her head. "Do you?"

She looked into his eyes, deep blue in the mostly dark room. She swallowed hard. Did she feel a bond? Is that why she dreamt about him soon after she met him? Yes. She nodded. She felt something. Maybe it was just lust, but whatever it was she liked it.

"I do, too. I've felt it since you got to the inn. I'm not sure why, but I feel like you've brought a light to this dreary place. You've made it alive again. Made me feel."

She ducked her head as her cheeks heated.

“Don’t be shy,” he whispered. “I know it seems sudden, and we haven’t known each other long, but I really do feel like you belong here. Even if it’s only for a weekend, I want you to know that you’ve brightened my life with your smile.”

She fidgeted. “Thank you.” It’s all she could figure to say. She knew he was a little backward with the social graces, but she had no doubt he meant what he said.

Every word of it.

And that confused her.

He smiled and leaned toward her, his lips brushing hers like a spark of electricity that lit her from within. A shiver rippled down her spine. Did she want this? Did she want Garren? More than anything at the moment. Mr. Beck wasn’t arriving till morning and she and Garren had all night to go over the papers. What was the harm in seeing where things would go?

She put her arms around his neck and he reached for her, tugging her close and pressing his mouth to hers. She let her lips part and welcomed his tongue. Her body responded with a flush. He kissed with strong, firm strokes and her mind went blank except for the desire to feel his touch.

Everywhere.

He sat back and looked at her, his eyes heavy with desire. “Will you do me a favor?”

“If I can.”

He smiled. “Please take your hair down. It’s so sexy when it frames your beautiful face.”

“I can do that,” she whispered. She unclipped the barrette holding her hair in place and shook her head to release the long red strands, wavy from being up in a knot. She’d barely done so when Garren pulled her to him.

“You’re so lovely. I can’t tell you how long I’ve waited to hold you—it’s like you fit a missing piece inside me that I didn’t even know I had.” His eyes sparkled. “Do I sound stupid? I feel so... awkward, yet I need to tell you.”

She shook her head and ran her thumb over his clean-shaven cheek. “Not stupid at all.”

He kissed her again, with so much passion she couldn’t respond quickly enough. She wanted him, all of him. Her panties dampened as he ran his hand over her back. He wasn’t shy. He found the dress zipper and tugged it down, then slipped his hand inside. When he rubbed the bare skin of her back, every nerve ending stood at alert, tingling under his light touch.

Screaming for more.

She moaned and kissed him harder, using her tongue to convey how much she wanted him. When was the last time she’d felt such blazing desire? She couldn’t remember.

She was ready to lose herself in him.

He nipped at her jawbone, then kissed her neck from her ear to her collarbone. She laid her head back and lost herself in the dizzying sensation. When he moved to kiss the hollow of her neck, she squirmed. “Oh, that...feels...good.”

He pulled back. “Let’s go to my bedroom so I can treat you like the queen you are.”

Unable to open her eyes to respond, she nodded.

Garren's bedroom was more luxurious than any room she'd seen in the inn. Two floor-to-ceiling windows framed with long white drapes on one wall and massive dark wood furniture around the perimeter. In the center of the room stood a large ornately carved bed with posts that reached almost to the baroque plastered ceiling, where a crystal chandelier hung. The room looked like something out of an old Hollywood movie.

The bed was covered in soft pillows—all white—and a matching duvet with gold flowers embroidered in swirling patterns. With the contrast to the dark wood, the bed looked like a spotlighted stage.

He shut the door and turned to her. She trembled as his thumbs glided under the fabric at her shoulders and slid the dress off into a puddle on the floor. She stepped out of the dress, then bent to remove her platform shoes. Garren picked up her dress and set it on the chair.

A cool breeze circled the room and she held herself and shivered as she watched Garren kick off his shoes and begin unbuttoning his shirt.

"Are you sure this is what you want?" He unbuttoned the last button then paused. "I have to know for sure."

"Yes-s." She shuddered. "I'm s-sure."

"You're cold again." He drew her into his arms and the touch of his body against her bare skin made her jump like she'd been jolted with an electric shock.

She squeezed him and he rubbed her back, flicking her bra clasp with one hand then pulling her bra away and tossing it onto one of the plush chairs. She whimpered as his mouth found her nipples. First one, then the other, sucking and squeezing until she forgot she was cold. Her chest tingled and she arched her back so he would have better access.

He kissed each nipple again then looked at her. "You are so beautiful, Sophia." He picked her up and carried her to the bed. "I've wanted you since the moment I saw you standing in the inn's foyer. I can't believe you want me."

"Please. Hurry." She laid back and waited.

"You don't have to ask twice." He dropped his shirt onto the chair then unclasped his pants. Breath caught in her throat as he took his pants off, and then his underwear. It was dim in the room but she could still see how much he wanted her. She closed her eyes.

Yes, oh yes, she wanted this. Why had it taken her so long to admit it?

He was on her in a second, his mouth everywhere. Her neck, her chest—his hands following along, rubbing and kneading her flesh till it was pliant and warm. He lay beside her and ran his fingers down her abdomen and chills raced over her skin. When he slid his fingers into her panties, she gasped.

“You’re so wet.” He stroked her, slipping two fingers inside.

“I want you, Garren,” she panted. “Now.”

He pulled his fingers out. “Take off your panties. I’ll be right back.”

A rip of foil and she knew. Condom.

Smart man.

He slid into the bed and moved over her, holding himself up on his arms. “I’ll give you what you want, quick this time. But tonight after we look over the paperwork, I’m going to fuck you like you deserve.”

She panted and nodded. If he kept talking to her like that, there’d be no reason to touch her.

Positioning himself at her entrance, he pushed in. Sophia moaned as he filled and stretched her. She tugged him closer. Pleasure spiraled between her legs and she let go.

Feels so good.

He grunted as he moved in and out of her. She spread her legs and begged him to go deeper, harder.

“I want to possess every bit of you.” He held himself up on his arms and looked at her. “I can’t believe this is happening.” She yanked him down again and thrust her hips to meet his advances.

“So good,” she sighed. So good.

He continued to thrust and she felt him stiffen even more as his cock slid into her faster.

“Come for me.” He grasped her hair and held on as he pushed into her.

Vibrations tore through her and she fell into pleasure, her muscles contracting as she saw stars. Oh God. Oh God.

Garren doubled his efforts, holding her hair as he moved. She held his ass and yanked him toward her. Hard. He stopped and threw his head back as he came. She held on, wishing she could capture the groans and the moment forever.

Sophia read one journal while Garren read the other. He’d given her a black T-shirt to wear—her dress was still crumpled on the chair in his bedroom. Too bad they had to finish up the research, or they’d be in bed enjoying each other some more. She smiled.

I can't focus. She sighed. Garren was a perfect lover. Even after one time, she knew. So attentive. Like he was made to please her and her alone. Reading the papers and journals was the last thing she wanted to be doing. And what would Mr. Beck do if he found out she was having sex with a client?

Garren is worth losing my job over.

He leaned against her shoulder. "Find anything yet?"

"No, but I'm still reading." She stroked his hair, loose from its ponytail. In a way, she didn't want to find the answers. Finding the answers meant her job at Blackbird Inn was done. She'd have to leave.

"We've got to find something." He stared at the page. "And soon."

"We will. I feel it. There has to be something to help us."

"I hope you're right." Garren flipped the page and tensed.

"Me too." She sat up. "What is it? Did you find something?"

"Listen to this," he said. "'The demon has gone. His mistress is trapped in the well. From now till eternity, the family must guard against her escape.'"

The only sound in the room was the crackling fire and the thrumming of her heart.

"What does that mean?" Every hair on her arm stood. "What is your great-grandmother talking about?"

"I'm not sure, but my grandmother always told me I would be the inn's guardian. But surely, this isn't what she meant." He flipped the page. "Wait, there's more. This is written right after Alexandra's disappearance." He traced the words with his finger as he read, "'Take heed on Samhain that the demon isn't near. He will stop at nothing to free his mate.'"

A cold chill raced through the room and the fire dimmed but didn't go out.

Sophia shuddered. "I don't like all the talk about demons. Do you think she is referring to Alexandra as the demon's mistress? Maybe all of this is talking in code so the police wouldn't be able to relate what happened."

"I don't know." Garren stood and paced. "I've never heard any of this before. Like I told you, my grandmother didn't ever want to talk about Alexandra."

"Do you think Alexandra fell into the well and your great-grandmother knew about it but covered it up to protect the inn?" She set the journal down. "And maybe your grandmother hid the information, too. And they left the journals for you to find."

"I wish I knew." He scowled. "'He will send someone to take her place. Beware of witches. They will help him unknowingly.'" He paused. "'If the gate is opened again, someone must enter or Blackbird Inn will exist no more. Take heed on Samhain.'"

"I really don't like the sound of all this." Sophia stood and walked to the fireplace. Why did everything have to be so cryptic? The orange flames danced and licked at the logs and provided steady warmth. She rubbed her arms.

"Maybe we shouldn't have scheduled our meeting this week." He stood behind her and put his hands on her shoulders and massaged her. “It could’ve waited another few days.”

The warmth from his fingers relaxed her and she leaned back on him. All the talk of demons had set her on edge, but Garren knew how to calm her. He massaged the demons away. She closed her eyes. “We had to do it now. Can’t wait till another time. The state—”

“The state can wait. This wasn’t a good idea.”

His hands turned cold and he moved away. Sophia turned as Garren opened the heavy drapes and peered outside.

“What are you doing?” she asked.

“There aren’t really any demons, are there?”

“Not here. Not yet.” He placed his hand on the windowpane. “But I’ve got a feeling that’s going to change really soon.”

A gust of frigid air filled the room and Sophia coughed. The fire went out. Not slowly, but like a switch had been flipped.

“Garren!” Adrenaline pumped through her.

His back was to her—she could see his silhouette against the window. The sky beyond was dusky blue, the clouds racing by at supernatural speed. The moon unveiled, near full, its white light casting a spotlight onto Garren.

Gold chains, attached to his feet and hands, materialized as the moonlight touched him. The chains made no sound as he moved. He turned, and his irises glowed golden.

Sophia screamed and backed away, her hands to her mouth.

“What is it?” Garren moved toward her. “What’s wrong?”

She kept backing until she hit the wall, Garren in pursuit. How could this be? The gold chains traveled along the floor and out of the room, the cuffs around his wrists and ankles.

She pointed and Garren followed her gaze.

“I should have told you,” he said, arms outstretched. “But I didn’t think you’d be able to see them.”

“You knew?”

“I’m the guardian of Blackbird Inn. I see the chains in the moonlight, yes. This is why I can only leave for a few days at a time. I’m destined to stay here, or some might call it cursed to stay. When the blackbird flew out of sight, it marked the edge of one of many circles.”

“I don’t understand.”

“Yes, more Wallace Stevens. His poetry means a lot to me. I don’t mind being bound here, even if I am trapped for my whole life. I belong here.”

“But this can’t be real.” She covered her mouth with her hands. “Those chains can’t be real.”

“Oh, they’re real. And the fact that you can see the chains means you’ve got power, too.” He stepped closer. “You must have witch’s blood.”

Sophia cringed. She'd heard the stories her great-aunt told. She'd never believed her. But how to explain...this? "I don't know..."

"You're part something. At least now I know why I can't leave, thanks to my great-grandmother's journal. I've got to make sure Alexandra stays where she belongs and that no demon frees her." He sighed and his eyes turned back to blue as the moon went behind a cloud. "Looks like I'll be busy tomorrow night. And I've got to make sure you don't help the demon..."

The fire roared back to life, spitting and crackling.

Sophia ran.

*S*ophia ran, her bare feet stinging from the bleeding cuts from the pointed rocks and sticks in the yard. Her white nightgown's hem was stained with mud and damp from the mist that rose from the ground. She stopped at the cemetery gate, her heart thudding in her throat.

"Garren?" she called.

The cemetery lay still and silent. Not even an insect made a sound.

The moon illuminated the tombstones and cast long shadows across the tall grass. Sophia opened the iron gate and it creaked as rusty hinges groaned under the effort. She stepped inside, letting the gate fall open.

"Garren, where are you?"

She slipped between rows of curved stones and shattered crosses. Two large mausoleums occupied the center of the small cemetery and she moved closer. Garren's family name was carved into the lintel, moss-covered and dirty, it was barely legible. AMSEL.

A loud shriek sounded and Sophia turned.

In front of her, a large creature paced, flames shooting from its nostrils on each breath. Silver blue scales lined its back and a lengthy, barbed tail trailed behind it. The creature faced her, its eyes large and red, its mouth dripping blood.

It roared to the moon then crouched as the ground split open and bright light fractured the dark sky.

Sophia tried to run, but she couldn't move. She tried to scream, but no sound came from her mouth. In the distance, the inn raged a fiery death, lighting the sky in pink-orange.

The creature pounced and Sophia fell as darkness washed over her soul...

She sat up in bed, shaking and damp with perspiration. When had she fallen asleep? And why so many nightmares at the inn? She looked at the clock. It was after four AM. She hadn't slept for long. She tugged the covers up. Once again, she'd fallen asleep in her clothes—well, in Garren's T-shirt. Her suitcase, half-packed, was back on the chair.

I've got to get out of this crazy place.

She rubbed her eyes and lay back on the pillow. So many things happening, and none of them made sense. Only her time with Garren felt right. She could almost feel his touch now. But all the wild stuff had to go.

And all this talk of demons and witches and curses...was it all an elaborate Halloween prank?

I saw Garren's chains. They were real.

She should pack her bag and get the heck away from Blackbird Inn. Who cared if Mr. Beck paid her or not? She hadn't found anything to help save the inn and there was enough crazy going around to last her the rest of her life.

It's just a job.

But running away would mean leaving Garren. Yes, he was odd and mysterious, but somehow, being with him felt right. Being around him made her feel comfortable—like she belonged somewhere for the first time in her life.

If I run, I'm running from Garren, too.

A soft white orb materialized over her and she studied it. No sense of fear overwhelmed her this time, but a strong feeling of warmth and comfort came over her. She sat up in bed to watch the hovering light as it moved closer.

"What do you want?" she asked. "Why are you here?"

The orb glimmered and moved to the edge of the bed where it pulsed and flickered. Then, the light began to morph and grow larger, brighter than any light except the sun. Sophia shielded her eyes with her arm. The air heated and a low hum filled the room.

She repeated, "What do you want?"

The orb shifted into a person-shaped mass and gradually solidified, the light growing dimmer by the moment. Sophia peeked, then stared, still unafraid. It was like the orb was giving off peaceful vibes.

The light went out and Sophia turned on the bedside lamp. Where the orb had been now sat Bernadette, smiling. She wasn't dressed to be working in the kitchen, but wore a long dress reminiscent of times gone by, a calico pattern with a white petticoat peeking from underneath.

"W-what?" Sophia wondered if Garren had slipped her a hallucinogenic compound. Things had gone from weird to crazy really fast. Why was the cook here, and how?

"My child, don't be afraid." Bernadette placed her hand over Sophia's. "Everything's going to be okay. I promise."

The touch tingled but had no pressure. It was like Bernadette was weightless.

"What do you want from me?" Sophia whispered.

Bernadette pulled her hand back and stared at the floor. After a few seconds, she met Sophia's gaze, her own filling with tears. "I need your help saving Blackbird Inn."

"That's why I'm here."

"No, I need your help fighting the demon and keeping the portal closed. He will be strong, but you have magic that can help."

"I don't have magic." Sophia recoiled. Was everyone in the inn crazy?

“You do. I sensed it the first time I encountered you, on the stairs when Garren brought you to your room. You have a deep soul magic that only the oldest witch families possess. I didn’t mention it to Garren at the time because I wanted to get to know you a little better.” Bernadette crossed her hands in her lap. “And I’m afraid that your presence here is no coincidence.”

Bernadette was the ghost orb she’d seen in the stairwell. Realization stuck Sophia like a truck in the pit of her stomach. How many ghosts were at the inn? Did they live here, or just visit? “I’ve heard stories that there were witches in my family, but I’m not one. I’ve never even met one.” Sophia pushed her hair back. “And what do you mean, not a coincidence? I was sent her by Arturo Beck to help Garren.”

“Do you really think Arturo needs you?”

“I thought so...”

“No.” Bernadette shook her head as sadness filled her face. “He plans to use you. I’ve only just put all the pieces together. He needs you somehow when the portal opens tomorrow night. For what, I’m not sure. But he needs you here.”

Sheer terror flashed through Sophia. “Are you saying Arturo is...a demon?”

The room grew frigid and she pulled the covers up higher.

“Yes. He stayed here with Alexandra back when I was guardian of the inn. He’s coming to reclaim her and he needs a witch to help him.”

“I’d never help him! Not with something that would hurt Garren.” She tucked her hair behind her ears. “I should leave. Now.”

“No!” Bernadette barked. “We need you and we will protect you. Otherwise, Garren is going to be pushed into the portal and locked there for eternity. I can’t let that happen and I don’t think you can, either.”

“Who are you? How do you know so much about the portal and Garren and Blackbird Inn?” Sophia rocked, her legs like jelly. Maybe she was still dreaming. She might wake up any second. Things were so messed up...but she’d seen the ghosts and the golden chains. Could demons be any different?

Bernadette smiled. “You haven’t put it together yet?”

Sophia shook her head. “Put what together?”

“I’m Bernadette, Garren’s great-grandmother. I help him protect the inn.”

Sophia gulped. “But that’s not possible.”

“Yes, it is.” Bernadette smiled. “I’m a ghost, so I’m not able to help much, but I try. And tonight, Garren is going to need all the help he can get. Once Arturo arrives, things are going to go downhill quickly.”

“I don’t...know. This is all so—”

“Overwhelming?” Bernadette stood. “Yes. But you’ve seen enough with your eyes. Use your heart to look. I think you’ll see that you need to stay here and help Garren.”

Bernadette's form began to shimmer and then she popped out of sight.

"What the hell is going on around here?" Sophia asked. She flopped back into bed, intent that she would figure everything out by morning. She could still pack and run if she chose to do so. Arturo a demon? That seemed even more far-fetched than seeing ghosts.

When Sophia entered the sitting room, Garren looked up and smiled. Early afternoon sunlight streamed through the dusty windows, casting a filtered haze over the room.

“Get a good night’s rest?” He stood and kissed her on the cheek, his hand lingering on the small of her back.

She hugged him, her heart flip-flopping with a mix of relief and anxiety. Maybe she was making a big deal out of nothing. Maybe this was all a giant Halloween trick with treats to come later. “Tell me the demon thing is all a nightmare. Tell me we don’t have to fight it.”

“I wish I could.” He pulled her close and stroked her hair. “I’m sorry you got pulled into this. But then again, if you hadn’t, we might never have met.”

She smiled, melting under his ministrations. She should’ve stayed in his room overnight, not run away like a scared child. She took a deep breath. “Bernadette came to talk to me.”

He hugged her. “And?”

“And she told me everything she knows about the situation. Part of me still has a hard time believing it. Ghosts and demons and portals. It’s a lot to take in.”

“I’m sure. The whole thing is crazy.” He sighed. “I grew up knowing ghosts were real, and knowing I needed to stay close to the inn. But I never knew there was a veil portal on the property. I thought they were in sacred locations or caves or something. Not here in New England.”

He kissed her on the forehead, his lips lingering a moment before he stepped back. “I’m sorry. I should’ve told you about the ghosts and the chains.”

The chains. She’d forgotten about them. She stepped back. “Yes, you should have, but I wouldn’t have believed you. Who would, without seeing them? Truth is, I don’t know what to believe anymore.” She turned her back to him. How could she accept all this? So many odd things, and yet she’d seen many with her own eyes. Realization and acceptance washed over her. She needed to follow her heart, not her mind.

“Please, sit down.” Garren put his hand on her shoulder. “Let’s talk through this. We’ve got to have a plan. Once Arturo gets here our time will be limited.”

She faced him. “He isn’t here? Maybe he changed his mind about making the trip up.”

“Unlikely. He’s been planning this for a hundred years. Come, sit.” He gestured to the couch and Sophia dropped into it. He joined her. “He’s not going to give up easily. Not with Alexandra trapped behind the veil. He’s planned this out carefully. Waiting till the veil is at its thinnest. No, he’s not going to give up.”

She laid her head on his shoulder. “What can we do? It’s not like we have a demon gun or something.”

He chuckled. “I wish there were such a thing. But that’s only in stories. No, we’re going to have to handle this with human ingenuity. And hope for a bit of luck.”

She ran her hand over his chest. “Bernadette said I was part of his plan. What does that mean? I don’t know anything about demons or portals. How would I help him?”

“I wish I knew for sure. I think having a witch nearby unlocks some of the magic around the objects, or in this case, the portal. Or maybe he intends to draw from your power to force the portal open. He may plan for you to be the sacrificial lamb.”

She sat up. “That’s not happening. And I don’t have any power he can take. He’s made a major mistake in choosing me.”

“You can see the chains binding me. You have power. Maybe you don’t know how to use it, but it is there, and it’s strong.” Garren hugged her tight. “After tonight, we’ll be free to live again.”

“I’m scared.”

“Me too, a little. But together, we can handle Mr. Beck and whatever he brings.”

Not if he’s like the creature in my dreams. She snuggled onto Garren’s shoulder and he stroked her head.

“That feels good.” She pressed her lips against his neck, his hair tickling her lips. “I want this to all be over, Garren.”

“One way or another, this will be over tonight. We’ll either save Blackbird Inn, or we won’t.”

She sat up. “Do you think the state is really trying to take the inn? Or is it a cover story?”

“I’m not sure, but I’m betting it’s something Mr. Beck set up.” He rubbed his eye. “I should’ve called and double-checked as soon as I got the letter, but why would I doubt it? It looked so official.”

“Yeah. No reason to doubt a letter from the state of Pennsylvania.”

“I’ve been so slack and trusting. I’ve got to learn to handle people better. Try to read them before I trust.”

Garren turned. “Ah, another guardian. One of my blackbirds.”

The bird perched on the sill, its black plumage iridescent in the sunlight.

“You have birds? Don’t tell me they talk, too.”

He laughed. “No, I don’t talk to the birds. But there is a flock of blackbirds that hangs around the inn. I jokingly call them guardians, too, though I doubt they know the inn is their namesake.”

The bird tapped on the window again then flapped its wings furiously.

Sophia rubbed her hands on her jeans. “Why is it doing that?”

The bird pecked a rhythm on the glass then flew off.

“That was odd.” She tucked her hair behind her ear. “It’s almost like it was alerting you, or warning you.”

“Blackbird Inn is odd.” Garren nodded. “And maybe he was warning me. A good omen, I hope.”

“I’ll say.” She put her hand on Garren’s knee. Somehow, just touching him relaxed her. “So, what about Henry? How does he fit into the inn’s oddness? Will he help us tonight?”

Garren leaned back. “Well, it’s a long story. Henry is a ghost, like my great-grandmother, Bernadette. A great-great uncle, born well before the time you and I were. He helps guard the inn.”

“Is he trapped, too?”

“No.” He shook his head. “But he chose to stay and help. There are others, but they mostly stay hidden from humans, unless they are playing pranks. My family is pretty attached to the inn.”

Sophia scanned the room. No sign of demon portals. The room looked quite ordinary. Nothing out of place. “What about your grandmother? And your parents? Are they here, too?”

He cast his gaze down. “No, my parents never came back. Nor my grandmother. I don’t know how the whole ghost thing works. They don’t, either. For whatever reason, I have six family ghosts here helping out. A distant cousin ghost disappeared last year, without warning. So I suspect these ghosts have unfinished business, and when it’s over, they will also disappear.”

“This is all so unbelievable.”

She bit her lip. “Yes, yes I do. I don’t understand why they never told you about the portal till now. If they wanted you to truly guard the inn, they should’ve told you about it.”

“Bernadette said she was prepared to tell me when it was time to know. Even if we hadn’t found the journals, which I assume she placed for us to find, she would have told me before tonight. I guess they didn’t want to worry me.”

“Still, it would’ve been nice to have some time to prepare.” Sophia shuddered as a gust of frigid air swept through the room, ruffling the curtains and rattling the windowpanes.

Bernadette stood at the door. “Arturo Beck has arrived.”

Garren leapt to his feet. “Where is he?”

“Parking.” Bernadette’s eyes widened. “Remember, don’t let him know that you’re aware of what is going on. You’ll lose your advantage.”

He nodded and turned to Sophia. “We don’t have a plan yet.”

Arturo Beck was perhaps the prettiest man Sophia had ever seen. She tried not to stare at him while they sat at the kitchen table having tea with Garren. Blond curls framed a tan face, inset with melted chocolate eyes. He was perfectly proportioned, wide shoulders and narrow hips, and the slim-fit gray suit he wore showed off his assets. She set her teacup down.

Garren had a different kind of good looks, and his ran deep. He was a good man.

“I wanted to thank you for coming out ahead of me to start the research,” Arturo said. “I’m sure you’ve saved us some billable time. Did you get a lot done? Find anything interesting?”

Garren slurped his tea and she shot him a look.

“You’re welcome, Mr. Beck. I wish we had more information to give you.” She added, “But we’re trying. We looked through a ton of inn receipts and ledgers yesterday.”

“Please, call me Arturo.”

She nodded. “Okay. Sorry.”

Bernadette set another steaming pot of tea on the table and removed the old pot.

Garren cleared his throat. “What do we do next? You both know I can’t lose the inn. I have to keep it in the family.”

Sophia caught the forced nonchalance in his voice. “I guess we’re going to have to draw up papers to fight the state.” She refilled her teacup. “We didn’t find anything yet, but I suggest we go to the courthouse and look in the public land records next week.”

“Monday, you can do that.” Arturo straightened his tie. “I’ll work with Garren to come up with a strategy and a plan B. It’s very difficult to win an eminent domain case.”

“So what are we doing today?” Sophia tried to keep her voice even. If Arturo was a demon, wouldn’t he be able to sense her fear? Feed off of it? Or was that just the way it worked on television? Her hand shook as she picked up her teacup and sipped.

“I need to go over some legal documents with Garren.” Arturo yawned. “I’m exhausted from travel, though. I think I’ll take a quick nap and refresh. Would you mind if we picked up on business in a few hours?”

Garren’s mouth set in a firm line. “That’s fine. Shall we meet in the sitting room?”

“Yes. Say seven o’clock? Sophia, if you’re available, will you join us?”

“Of course.” Anxiety pooled in her stomach. Wouldn’t the portal be opened at midnight or was that a ghost story, too? She shuddered. “I’ll be there.”

Arturo smiled and stood. “I’ll retire to my room now. See you both at seven.”

Garren nodded.

They sat in silence until Arturo’s footsteps faded.

“Now what?” Sophia whispered. She set her cup on the table.

“Now, we wait.”

Sophia swore that time had slowed down. She’d talked to Garren, taken a shower, and changed into a white blouse and clean jeans. The good guys wear white, right? The clock had moved so slow, she wondered if it really had stopped for a while. Finally, it was ten till seven. Garren was probably already waiting in the sitting room.

She pulled her room door closed behind her. The hallway seemed longer and darker than usual, like a tunnel. She gulped down her fear and headed for the stairs.

Sunset filtered through the windows of the tower stairs, bathing everything in shades of red. Sophia took a deep breath and headed downstairs. Halfway down, she stopped. A whole gaggle of orbs floated around her.

“Save us.”

She scrambled down the remaining stairs. She would never get used to having ghosts around.

The inn lay wrapped in silence so loud, she felt pressure in her ears. Shadows ran in long lines down the wooden floor, the sconces dimming as she walked through the first floor hallway to the reception desk.

The antique clock chimed, breaking the thick silence, each note deeper than the last and the echo barely fading before the next strike. The notes reverberated in her gut.

Seven o’clock.

The door to freedom beckoned. She could leave now and be far from the inn by the time anyone realized it. Hop in the car and be far away by the time the portal opened. She paused.

No, I can’t do that to Garren. I promised I would help.

After a deep breath, and a moment to steady her shaking hands, she headed toward the sitting room.

He needs me. Blackbird Inn needs me.

She heard the men before she saw them. They were talking as if nothing was about to happen. No portal, no demons. No Alexandra. How could they both be so calm? A small fire burned in the fireplace, warming the room and casting it in oranges and yellows.

“Sophia,” Arturo smiled.

Shivers raced up her spine as cold slid around her, enveloping her. In another setting, she’d be drooling over the man. He had a presence about him that exuded confidence and sexiness, a charisma that charmed most anyone around him.

She looked at Garren and her heart warmed. A different kind of handsome, and her body betrayed her preference. He’d made her feel special in bed and out—and she bet Arturo just took what he wanted. No comparison. Garren’s hair, pulled into his trademark ponytail, shone in the light and his eyes twinkled as he watched her. He was a man that she could spend a lot more time with. I hope we get the chance.

“Join us!” Arturo pointed to a spot beside him on the couch.

Though she’d rather sit near Garren, she couldn’t call attention to their new relationship, or tip off Arturo in any way. She joined Arturo on the couch, sitting as far from him as she could without being rude.

“We were talking legal strategies.” Garren leaned forward. “Arturo thinks we have a solid case. The state has no good reason to seize this land. It isn’t like they are putting a road directly through the mountain.”

“I hope we can win. It’s always scary fighting the government.” Sophia fiddled with the ends of her hair. She didn’t know how long she could keep up the ruse, but Arturo didn’t seem to smell her underlying fear. Either that or he hid it well.

The thought chilled her.

“We’ll win.” Arturo said. “I’m confident. But we need to prepare.”

“Whatever I can do to help,” Sophia said. “That’s why I’m here.” She forced a smile.

Garren cleared his throat. “Blackbird Inn’s resources are at your disposal. Just tell me what you need and I will make it happen.”

The dimming flames popped and crackled. Having a fire was so nice in the late fall when the nights grew cold. Light and warmth and a hot man. What more could she want?

No demons. No ghosts. No portals.

Arturo stood and moved to stand in front of the fire, his form silhouetted by the flames. “I think the first thing that would help is a tour of the property. I can get a better idea of what’s here, and why the state wants to seize it.”

His eyes held rings of glowing red. Sophia blinked and his eyes were brown again.

“Sure, that’s fine.” Garren stood. “When would you want to do that?”

He glanced back at the fire again then turned to them. “No time like the present.”

Chapter 11

Sophia clutched her sweater, thankful she'd retrieved it from her room before they went outside. She held the flashlight in front of her, sweeping the ground with its yellow beam as she followed Garren and Arturo around the property. The fall night held a chill and when the breeze blew, it was downright cold. They'd walked a good bit of the grounds, seeing the barn and fields. Arturo had pretended to be interested, but she knew what was coming. He was biding time.

"And this is the cemetery." Garren stopped at the tall, iron gate. "It's small. Most of my family is buried here."

"Let's go in." Arturo lifted the latch and swung the creaking gate open.

Shit's about to get real. Sophia stuck her hands in her pockets. Shouldn't they have brought a weapon of some sort? How would she and Garren defend themselves against a demon? Garren had said mortal weapons would be useless, but she would feel a lot better knowing she had a knife or something. Or even pepper spray. Her heart thumped.

"Okay, but there's nothing to really see here." Garren followed Arturo inside.

Sophia took a deep breath. The portal wasn't in the cemetery, but it still felt creepy to be poking around a dark graveyard on Halloween night.

An owl hooted in the distance, followed by the howl of some kind of wolf or dog. The breeze picked up, sending leaves scattering and rustling across her path. The tombstones rose in the darkness, almost appearing to float in the mist that hovered just over the ground.

She wanted to be next to Garren, close to his warmth, but Arturo couldn't be tipped off to their relationship. He had to think she was there to help him, and him only. But what would he want from her? How would he draw power?

She shuddered.

"These are all your family?" Arturo waved his hand in an arc.

Garren shone his light over the tombstones. "Yes, mostly. My family has owned this land for over two hundred years."

All the flashlights shut off and darkness closed in.

"What the..." Garren mumbled.

The moon, now full and bright, came into view as the clouds parted, its almost silvery disc looming over the cemetery like a watchdog. Garren looked up at the sky, his golden chains trailing across the cemetery and back toward the house.

Sophia covered her mouth with her hand. Did Arturo know she could see the chains? After all, he apparently knew she was a descendant of witches. She looked away before he could notice.

She shook her flashlight and the beam flickered then came back on, followed by Garren and Arturo's lights.

I hope they stay on.

"Thank goodness," Garren said. "Have you seen enough here?"

"Yes," Arturo gazed around. "I think so."

"We've about seen all there is to see, or all that we can in the dark. Are you ready to go back to the inn?"

The owl hooted in the distance again, its cry echoing off the stone face of the inn. Sophia wanted nothing more than to get inside, but she knew that wasn't happening yet. Until Arturo was down, they'd be outside.

"We passed an old well between the barn and the cemetery." Arturo set off walking. "I'd like to get a closer look before we go back."

"Okay. Why?"

"It looks really old. Maybe there's a marker or something that dates it." Arturo stuck his hands in his pockets. "Besides, it looks interesting."

Garren followed Arturo. "Come on, Sophia."

"Coming." She kicked at the pebbles on the ground and watched the two men head for the gate. Was she ready for the showdown? Did she have a choice?

Then she noticed them. Silvery orbs rose through the fog, winking dimly. One from each grave. They hovered close to the ground, partly covered by mist, like a bubble bath on the cemetery ground. Sophia relaxed, her shoulders easing. Arturo didn't see them, but the ghosts were there.

She and Garren weren't going to have to fight the demon alone.

Aboveground, the well was nothing more than a circle of stone about three feet high. Moss covered the ancient structure, and the grass around it grew nearly as high as the well itself. The wind whipped her hair into her face and Sophia shivered. The area around the well was not only cold it was frigid. Her teeth chattered and she tugged her sweater close.

When all this was over, she'd curl up in Garren's arms and stay warm.

Arturo approached the well with sure steps. Sophia backed away, her heart throbbing in her throat. A cold sweat broke out on her palms and she slid her hands down her jeans.

"What are you doing?" Garren stepped close to Arturo, the golden chains moving like silk across the ground. “It’s getting colder. We should go inside.”

A rumbling began, low at first but growing louder, coming from deep underground. Sophia’s breath hitched and she backed up.

What the hell was going on?

Arturo roared and turned, his eyes orange with flame. The ground trembled and shook. He grew taller, more muscular and he began to chant an indecipherable spew of words, guttural and deep. As he spoke, the boards covering the well began to loosen, creaking as they flew away.

The wind picked up, roaring like a near-hurricane, and the ground quivered.

Sophia screamed, “What are you doing?”

Arturo turned to face her, spoke a few indecipherable words, then raised his hands into the air. Leaves and twigs swirled around him creating a vortex that centered over the now-open well. Garren backed away to stand by Sophia.

“What can we do?” She raised her voice against the maelstrom.

“Wait!” Garren took her by the hand and squeezed.

The moonlight disappeared and the flashlights went out again. Sophia dropped hers and held onto Garren. Arturo was too busy orchestrating the opening of the portal to pay any attention to them. He danced and chanted in the dark and then the wind stopped.

Instantly.

The night filled with silence. Not even an insect or night creature sounded.

Was it over? Sophia was sure he could hear the thudding of her heart. What the hell had she and Garren been thinking? They couldn’t fight a demon. They needed to run.

Now!

Whoosh! A beam of bright red light shot up from the well, slowly transitioning to pure white as it leapt into the sky. Sophia shielded her eyes. Arturo continued to chant and the beam of light strengthened until it was as bright as day outside.

He screeched, a piercing sound that struck straight through her, and she covered her ears. Garren held his head and tried to back away.

Arturo grabbed Sophia, yanking her to him, then grinned, his teeth now sharp and pointy and much larger. He raked his fingernail across her cheek, leaving it burning. She touched her cheek and looked at the fresh blood.

Quiet settled over the area again and the ground stilled.

Sophia shrieked and Garren lunged at Arturo. With ease, Arturo knocked Garren into the air, sailing. He crumpled to the ground motionless.

“Garren!” Sophia tried to wrench herself away from Arturo but he held her tight.

“You will help me.” Arturo laughed and swiped a finger of blood from Sophia’s cheek. The cut burned and throbbed and she winced as he wiped the blood off again.

He drew a symbol, somewhat like a triangle inside a circle, on the stone well wall and the ground began to tremble again. Sophia dropped beside Garren. He wasn't moving.

Oh, God, is he dead?

She screamed, her anger piercing through the night, her heart heavy with the possibility of Garren's death. The air filled with orbs of all sizes, floating and bobbing in the air. One by one, they swooped toward Arturo and he pawed at the air to get them to go away but his hands passed through them without touching them at all.

Family!

Sophia stood, hoping to be undetected. Arturo was not getting away with releasing Alexandra. Over my dead body. She clenched her fists.

A female voice pierced the air.

Alexandra.

She was coming! The ground rumbled and shook as the orbs continued to strafe Arturo. He swatted at them, and then climbed up onto the well wall to reach the higher ones. His face contorted and he spit, trying anything to get the ghosts to leave him alone.

This is my chance.

Sophia lunged, arms out, and hit Arturo with as much force as she could. He stumbled and fell backward into the well, his body thudding as it hit the walls on the way down.

Adrenaline rushed through her and she steadied herself with a hand on the well. The orbs alighted around her, forming transparent human shapes, then people. Bernadette came forward, reaching for Sophia.

The light from the well flickered. Would Arturo be able to escape? The portal hadn't closed.

"Sophia," Bernadette called. "Repeat after me and spread your blood on the stones as you do."

Sophia nodded, her mouth parched.

"Gates of hell you hold within, close ye now, again."

Sophia drew an "x" with her finger across the bloodied symbol Arturo had drawn. The light grew red and shrank and lamentation and screams came from the well. The ground shook once, then stopped. The light from the well turned golden. She backed away, shaking, and right into Garren. He pulled her close.

"You did it," he said.

"You're alive!"

"Yes." He kissed her forehead.

"Not yet!" Bernadette and the other ghosts formed a circle around the well and began chanting. "We've got to seal the portal gate."

Hundreds of blackbirds swarmed in from the sky, each dropping a small pebble into the well. The hundreds of birds became thousands and the pebbles rained into the well until the last of the golden light blinked out.

Wings fluttering in every direction, the birds dropped more shiny pebbles till they filled the well to the top. Sophia watched, her mouth agape, as the birds finished the job then flew away, leaving one bird to dance along the top of the stones.

He squawked and flapped his wings as he hopped about the top of the pebbles.

“Thank you.” Garren saluted the bird.

The blackbird tipped its head in a bow then flew away.

Silence once again filled the air.

Sophia clung to Garren, her head on his chest listening to the very real beating of his heart. If anything had happened to him, she would’ve been crushed. The ghosts began popping back to orbs, murmuring “thank you” and floating away on the night like bubbles.

Bernadette approached them, touching Sophia softly on the shoulder.

“I knew you could do it,” the ghost whispered. “I knew you would save Blackbird Inn.”

Garren hugged Sophia. “I knew you would, too.”

Sophia smiled. Good thing they had faith in her because she certainly hadn’t felt like much of a savior. “I can’t believe it’s over.”

“Let’s go back to the inn and get some tea.” Garren kissed her on the forehead. “I’m sure Bernadette will be happy to make us a pot.”

“Sorry.” Bernadette cast her eyes to the ground. “I can’t do that.”

“Why not?” Garren asked. “Are you hurt?”

She shook her head. “Because it’s time for me to move on.”

“No!” Garren reached for her.

Sophia’s eyes filled with tears. She’d barely gotten to know Garren’s great-grandmother but she felt a kinship deeper than family with her. “You can’t leave.”

“I have to. My job here is done. Blackbird Inn is safe for now.” Bernadette began to fade. “I’m no longer needed here.”

“But what about Arturo and Alexandra?” Garren reached for Bernadette but she continued to disappear. “Won’t the portal always be at risk? What if they come back?”

“Until another demon comes for them, they are stuck. Guard the portal. Be especially wary of Samhain...” She began shrinking, light coming from her eyes and ears and mouth in spokes of white.

“Sophia will help you.” The last words faded and Bernadette’s orb popped out of existence. “She is a guardian of Blackbird Inn...”

Garren heaved, tears streaming down his face. His sobs filled the night air. Sophia reached to dry his tears, her heart aching that he was hurting. He looked like someone who’d been abandoned.

“She had to go, Garren.” She rubbed his cheek. “You know that. She stayed to help you guard the inn but now she has to move on. She’s going to better things.”

“I know.” He nodded. “I just wish we’d had more time. I wish I’d known she was going to leave.”

Sophia clasped his hand. “It’s going to be okay. I promise. She even told you that.”

“I’m going to miss her.”

“I know you will.” She sighed.

Another owl hooting broke the stillness of the night. A breeze lilted by, warm like a summer’s afternoon or a toasty fire.

No more cold.

“Sophia?” Garren cleared his throat.

She turned to him and smiled. “Yes, Garren?”

“Will you stay with me?” His eyes searched hers. The moonlight broke through again and golden circles filled his irises. “Here at Blackbird Inn? I feel like you belong here. Belong with me.”

Sophia laughed and pointed to the ground. “This should answer your question.” Golden chains shimmered in the moonlight, attached to her ankles and wrists, but she didn’t feel she was wearing them at all. They crisscrossed Garren’s chains as they ran along the ground to the inn. “Does it look like I’m going anywhere?”

Garren laughed and took her into his arms. When his lips met hers, she knew that everything was going to be okay. They’d guard Blackbird Inn for as long as they lived.

EPILOGUE

Sophia watched the dust swirling in the stripes of sunlight that cut through the room. Garren snored lightly beside her. She smiled and peeked into the bassinette beside her bed. Their baby girl lay sleeping, a tiny smile twitching on her face as she dreamed baby dreams, thumb in mouth.

“Good morning, Bernadette,” Sophia whispered. “Today is going to be a beautiful day.”

A blackbird pecked its good morning at the window and Sophia smiled.

HEART OF FIRE

The old eddas speak of dreki—fabled creatures who haunt the depths of Iceland’s volcanoes, and steal away fair maidens.

Freyja wants none of such myths. Dreki seducing young ladies? Ha. They probably eat such foolish girls. But when the local dreki steals her last ram—costing her any chance of feeding her ill father through the winter—Freyja intends to confront the fearsome myth.

Sentenced to a life of exile from his clan, Rurik is fascinated by the furious woman who comes to claim her ram. She reeks of mysterious magic, and challenges him at every step. He intends to claim the passionate firebrand, but to do so he must take mortal form.

It’s the only time the dreki are vulnerable, and with a dragon hunter arriving on the shores of Iceland, he can barely afford the risk—but lonely Freyja, with her elf-cursed eyes and pragmatic soul, tempts him in ways he’s never felt before. Is she the key to reclaiming his heritage? Or will she be his downfall?

Iceland, 1880

“Here, father,” Freyja murmured, tilting the steaming cup of broth to his lips. “Perhaps this will take away the chill?”

Her father slurped at the watery soup, his eyes blue and vacant as his trembling hands tried to cup hers. “It’s delicious, Freyja. One of your best.”

Freyja pasted a smile on her face, even though he couldn’t see it. Bitterness burned in her throat. “Yes, Papa. It is, isn’t it?”

There were more vegetables than lamb in the broth, and more water than both, but the fact he sought to spare her feelings made her shoulders hunch. It had been such a long winter, with little food or respite from the storms. The few coins they had left were drying up and her small herd of ewes was dwindling. She couldn’t justify slaughtering another just to add more flavor to their soup.

Her father coughed, that same dry, hacking cough that had haunted him all winter. Freyja grabbed a rag and helped to dry his cheeks with it. Sometimes she wondered if he would survive to see another winter.

A fluttery feeling rose up to choke her, and she forced it down ruthlessly. No point in being maudlin. He was here and this was now. The future could wait.

“How was the village this afternoon?” her father asked. “You didn’t see Ingmar’s boy, did you?”

If she had, then Benedikt would have no interest in her. Not a respectful interest anyway. He had already hinted he might have means to offer her coin to keep her larder stocked through the spring. Telling her father that, however, might send him to an early grave. He had such hopes. Freyja intended never to enlighten him; with his poor health, their dwindling resources, and her eyes, she was unlikely to make any sort of respectable match.

“He must have been busy, I’m sure,” she replied, squeezing his hand, then levering to her feet. Gathering the ceramic bowls together, she crossed to the kitchen. “He has all that land to tend, after all.”

Some of it theirs—or what she’d been forced to sell after her father’s eyes faded and he could no longer work the land. She'd done what she could, but tending to him took a lot of her time.

The shutters banged on the windows as the winds lifted. Freyja glanced through the glass toward the enormous storm clouds boiling on the horizon. A storm from the north then, and bound to be bitter with the kiss of Arctic winds on its breath. She could feel it in her bones, tingling beneath her skin as if she herself were tied to the storm. It would blow a mighty gale, tearing its way through the mountains that shielded their little homestead, then blow out by morning. She knew it, with some inexplicable sixth sense.

Most of Iceland suffered from bitter chill at this time of year, but the area surrounding Akureyri was somewhat warmer thanks to a trick of the coastline, of cliffs and mountains. Of course, out here they were virtually alone. It was a day's sail to Reykjavik and longer overland, if one even dared.

"I have to fetch the sheep in," she called, watching the dull gray edge of the clouds roiling. Lightning flickered in the distance. "We're in for a storm."

"Be careful," her father called, sinking into his shawl and coughing again. "Don't be too long."

"I won't, Papa."

"And take Loki."

She rolled her eyes at the small bundle of white fur that nestled by her father's feet. "Come."

The little arctic fox yawned at her, seemingly content to stay where he was. Another mouth to feed when she truly couldn't, but then a part of her couldn't throw him out the door. He'd been with them since he was a pup.

Freyja frowned, reaching out with the inner part of herself that had some sense of connection to the creature. Come.

Loki rolled to his feet and shook himself, discarding strands of long white hair. Underneath, his summer coat grew darker. Another week or two and he'd lose the rest of his winter coat. He leaped with agile quickness to dart beneath her skirts, and threatened to trip her.

"You will make me a nice fur muff one day," she threatened, though he ignored her and scratched at the door, knowing full well the threat was harmless.

Skirts wrapping haphazardly around her legs, Freyja fought her way across the yard. It was almost five in the afternoon and evening was falling. In the village, most of the men would be retiring to the tavern to talk and laugh beneath the smoky eaves, whilst the goodwives tended their children and tucked them in for the night.

Not so out here. Freyja had been raised on these rugged slopes, beneath the looming volcanic mountain of Krafla. In the distance its constant plume of smoke seemed almost invisible against the gray clouds.

Still, its presence was more than felt. Freyja crossed herself. "Blessed Father, watch over us," she murmured, glaring at the mountain. "Let dreki sleep another night."

The small flock of ewes must have sensed the ominous press of the storm, for they were at the woven stick fence, bleating to be let into the small barn. Two snowy white lambs with black markings peered at her from beneath one old ewe. Despite her mood, Freyja couldn't help a smile.

Loki watched them with avid interest, licking at his cheeks with his long pink tongue.

Don't you dare. She snapped the thought at him and he sat down obediently, giving her a sly, long-suffering look.

It took little effort to draw the small herd into the barn, coaxing them into the separate stalls. Her boots shuffled over the thin straw, the air still and musty here. One pen remained empty and she hurried back outside to fetch the battered old ram from his own paddock.

Loki yipped as she stumbled. The skies were darkening swiftly now, large fat drops of rain spattering down. One struck her cheek like an icy bullet, wind whipping her skirts and shawl. Her long blonde plait slapped her in the face. The whisper of the storm drove through her, setting her alight with a feverish excitement, her heart quickening. This was the time she felt most alive.

"Henrik!" she called, her voice stolen from her lips by another gust. The pen was empty; or no, not quite. The ram cowered against the wall, head bowed as if to fight the force of the wind.

"You stupid beast," she muttered, grabbing her skirts and straddling the fence. Loki darted in and snatched a mouthful of skirt, almost hauling her back onto his side.

"Curse you," Freyja cried, trying to shake him free. A sudden sharp spatter of rain made her gasp. "Do you wish me to be soaked? Then I shall catch a chill and you must find your own dinner!"

The little fox worried at her skirts, his ears flat to his head. Freyja scraped the wet strands of hair off her face and tugged the material, her curses lost in another hammering echo of thunder.

Let go!

But the little fox would not.

Henrik bleated suddenly, turning in circles as if he didn't know where to go. Freyja shot him a frustrated look, then reached down and grabbed Loki's ruff. A blast of wind knocked her into the ram's pen. She landed flat on her back in the mud, breathless and cursing—

A sudden roar echoed through the air, cutting through the thunder as if it were nothing.

The scream of it beat against her skin, pulsing in her ears until she was forced to clap her hands over them. The primal shiver of it seemed to be inside her, in her head, in her pounding heartbeat—everywhere. It was the type of sound that echoed down through ages past, and sent both man and animal fleeing in mindless fear.

It cut off and Freyja choked in her first gasp, lifting her head in disbelief as a sinuous tail flew directly over her.

"Wurm," she whispered, the heat draining out of her face.

Not just a wurm, but the Great One. He who haunted Krafla's depths, slithering out to stalk the night and hunt his prey.

She'd never seen him this close before. Golden scales gleamed even in the stormy darkness, each wing sweeping out an impossible forty feet wide. She shouldn't be scared; the village paid its tithe and had for decades in exchange for being left alone. But there was something distinctly primeval about the sight of it directly above her. Some ancestral fear that made her feel like prey.

Then its forelegs curled up, claws plucking delicately at its victim. Henrik bleated one last time, and she could sense his fear as the wyrm thrust its wings downward again, launching itself into the air.

With her ram in its talons.

“No!” Freyja pushed herself upright in disbelief, mud squelching through her fingers. Without the ram she couldn’t breed. It wouldn’t matter this spring, but next year.... “No!”

Leaping to her feet, she chased after it. Curse you! We pay the tithe! Each week a lamb or goat was tethered out on the hilltop as sacrifice, though eddas told of a time when the sacrifice had been virgin flesh. Her father’s face flashed into her mind, thin with lack of nourishment and color fleeing his cheeks as he coughed.

“Come back!” She snatched up a stone and hurled it skyward.

A pitiful effort, for the wyrm sailed high, soaring beneath gray clouds with mocking disdain, both for her and the weather.

Freyja sank to her knees in the mud, the fist in her chest tightening. What was she going to do? Hope and pray one of the undropped lambs was a male? There were only two ewes still due to deliver, and even if the lambs were male it would be years before she could breed them.

She and her father didn’t have that time.

Something broke inside her. Tears she hadn’t shed even when her mother passed away three years ago, finally tore free. Since then she’d been holding on, trying to keep it all from washing over her as she looked after her increasingly frail father. Slamming her fists into the dirt, Freyja heard the lash of lightning strike the hill nearby. Again. And again. Lightning crashing down in answer to her fury. She would not accept this. She would not fail.

Not even if she had to take her ram back.

The cold rain washed away her hot tears as she looked up. Loki slithered through the wickerwork of the pen and licked at her hand tentatively as if to appease her, but Freyja shook him off.

“I’m going after him,” she told the fox. Dragging her shawl tight, she lurched to her feet, wet through, her skirts caked in mud.

The creature had terrorized her village long enough.

And Freyja was not without her defenses.

Freyja waited until her father was tucked in bed and snoring before she began ruthlessly stripping off her mud-encrusted clothes. Cold was a constant enemy out here.

Slipping into a pair of her father's old trousers, she belted them tight and dragged her boots on. An oiled sealskin coat went over her shirt to keep the rain off, and she dragged her father's bow out of the chest by his bed.

The storm was blowing itself out by the time she ventured forth. Loki scrabbled at the door behind her, yipping to be let out, but Freyja ignored him.

She strode with cold purpose across the plains behind her house, feet sure on the mud-slicked sides of the hill. Her anger boiled beneath her skin like a storm of her own, frequently sending belated strikes of lightning down nearby. A crater still smoked as she passed by it.

The terrain grew rocky, and soon she was striding past the enormous standing tors no farmer dared remove. Goodwives whispered that trolls lived there, lurking beneath their rocky bases. Freyja had never seen one, but the hairs on the back of her neck tingled as if something was watching her. Glancing around, she loosened her grip on the bow.

Come on, she thought. If you dare. For anger was her ally tonight, and though the storm was abating, she could summon its fierceness to life again if she wished.

But nothing confronted her. She was almost disappointed as she set her body against the long climb ahead of her.

Stubby grass soon gave way to rock, and then ice. No matter how much she wanted to hold on to it, her anger waned as exhaustion began to tax her heavy limbs. Her father wasn't the only one dining on broth these days.

Lightning flickered in the distance, highlighting the smoking caldera of the volcano. Steam billowed from fumaroles as though hell itself rested beneath the mountain. Though she ached to rest, the sight urged her on. She had to hurry, or it would be too late; perhaps it already was, but somehow her mind was set on saving her ram. It couldn't be too late. It simply couldn't. She wouldn't believe it.

The Great Wurm had haunted the depths of Krafla for over three decades, plundering what it wanted until the villagers agreed to pay it the tithe. Nobody knew where it had come from, though rumor whispered there were more throughout the center of Iceland and the southern coast, following the volcano trail, for that was where they lived.

Cold-blooded creatures they were, difficult to kill, and incredibly dangerous. She could remember the tales her mother used to tell of them. The fabled dreki. Constantly hungering for heat and slumbering close to the volcano's depths.

Freyja's favorite tale had been that of Marya, the virgin shepherdess who had been staked out for the tithe of the mighty Beirammon, back when wyrms still thirsted for human flesh. Instead, a young soldier named Alvar hunted the wyrm and his prey back to the volcano, and killed it in a dangerous duel.

Her mother had rolled her eyes as Freyja tried to enact the sword blow that lopped the mighty wyrm's head off. Helga much preferred the story of Anika, who had enticed the local dreki into mortal flesh and become his lover until the village had turned against them, and she'd flown off on his back, never to be seen again.

"He probably ate her," Freyja had said, practically ruthless even at the age of twelve.

"No. No, I don't think he ate her, my little one." And then her mother had laughed, as if she knew something Freyja didn't.

Thunder rumbled around the peak of the mountain as she climbed, her thigh muscles aching. Slipping on moss, Freyja scrambled up over the last rocky hill and stared for a moment at the gaping caldera. Sulfurous fumes leaked from crevices, and bubbling mud pools threatened to drag in the unwary traveler. Freyja avoided them as easily as if she had been this way before, listening to the earth's trembling beneath her feet, the aching groan of its bowels and the blistering hiss of its exhale.

Any local knew where the opening to the dreki's lair was. As lightning flickered, Freyja stubbornly dragged herself up over the ice-crusting rocks. There was no trail, for the wyrm had no need of it. As she climbed, the smoldering coal of anger burned to life in her chest again. She almost fancied she could hear something bleating, but then thunder rumbled, low and ominous.

Her very own battle cry.

Finally, she dragged herself onto the ledge that opened into a fissure into the volcano. It was warmer here, though not unbearably so. Krafla had not erupted for many years, and no doubt the wyrm would not have returned if it were going to do so in the near future. Dreki had ways of listening to the earth's rumblings; the same sense Freyja herself had.

Right now the earth beneath her creaked, but it was not angry. No, that was all her.

Leaning under the overhang of the cave mouth, Freyja knelt and untied the small lantern from her belt. She dragged her gloves off and cupped her hands around the wick. Come. Dance for me. Her breath stirred the small wick and then a tiny flame sputtered to life, flaring up and almost singeing her hands.

Something shifted in the darkness; a sense of the mountain listening, as if it felt her small magic. Freyja placed a hand on the barren ground. Easy. She soothed it, stroking it with the awareness within her, feeling it tremble beneath her touch.

An alien presence brushed against her mind and Freyja froze, sucking in a sharp breath. The pressure was almost overwhelming, a mountain leaning down upon her. Then suddenly it was gone.

Freyja closed the small glass door on the lantern, and stared into the darkness of the lava tube. “That is right,” she whispered in Norse. “You know I am here.”

The lantern guided her into the heart of the mountain. The air reeked of sulfur and burned cinnamon, smoky spices. A scent that was incredibly appealing. She breathed it in, feeling it sweep through her, warming her from within. Somehow she knew it, though she had never breathed its like before.

The scent drugged her, luring her ever deeper. Ice gleamed in a thin sheen over the entrance floor, melting with each passing step as the air warmed. The walls were smooth, with rough bands at interval heights where lava had flowed, like the tidemark on the caves by the sea.

As she turned a corner, taking careful, stalking steps, something gleamed white and stark at the corner of her vision.

Freyja spun, holding the lantern high. A leering skull stared back at her, the owner slumped forever against the wall, his pitted armor tarnished and rusted. A sword hung clasped in bony fingers. Swallowing hard, Freyja crouched beside it, and tugged the skeletal fingers away from the hilt as she exchanged it for the bow.

She could feel that other awareness watching her, listening as if it could hear her.

You won't frighten me. You won't.

The tunnel opened into a larger cavern, enormous stalactites stabbing sharp fingers down from the roof, some touching the floors in dripping columns much like melted candlewax. Piles of gold coins glittered in the darkness, heaped at the sides of the cavern as if the press of the enormous wyrm's body forced them there. Winking gemstones. A dozen rubies at least. For a moment Freyja couldn't think. She could only stare at the veritable hoard in front of her. Wyrms were said to be voracious for treasure, guarding it with their fierce tempers, but here was coin enough to see her father fed forever. The entire village. Perhaps even all of Iceland.

Her fingers itched to take just enough to buy a dozen ewes and several rams to replace what had been stolen. The gold meant little to her, but the concept of what she could buy with it was incredibly tempting.

She could buy a future for her and her father.

As if sensing her thoughts, a warning rumble smoked its way through the tunnel. Freyja tore her gaze from the glittering piles. The dreki were possessive of their treasures, it was said. To even think of taking but one coin was to bring her own death down upon her.

It was warmer here; sweat trickled down the back of her neck and between her bound breasts. Freyja held the sword in front of her, sweeping the darkness with the lantern. He was here. Somewhere. She could feel the dark energy of his power, dwelling in the shadows like some enormous smoldering volcano.

“So now they send my tithe to me?”

The thought-whisper almost crushed her, and her fingers clenched around the sword hilt as she ground her teeth together. Pressure built behind Freyja’s left eye; a stabbing ache that promised to make her head throb for days. She drew her focus in on herself, creating a shield against the immense presence. The pressure eased.

“I’m not your tithe,” she called back. “The village pays you its tithe! And you have stolen my ram!”

A husky chuckle rumbled in the darkness, like a cat purring. Movement shifted, diamond-hard scales rasping over the polished stone floors. Freyja took a step back, her breath catching as she raked the darkness for signs of the wyrm.

Don’t be afraid. He can’t kill you. We pay the tithe, she told herself. Still the sensation of the dreki watching her made her nerves thrum with anticipation. She held the sword low, sweeping it in front of her.

“Tithe?” the dragon whispered. “Your village has not paid its tithe in three moons. So, I will take what is owed. Your ram was... delicious.”

Freyja’s lips pressed tightly together. Too late to save Henrik. Something hot and impotent burned at the back of her eyes.

Then she realized what he had said.

The tithe hadn’t been paid.

The dragon was no longer bound by his word not to harm her.

Freyja placed the lantern on the ground and crept behind a stalactite, sword held at the ready, her heart thumping in her ears, drowning out all other sound. What had she done? Trapped herself in here with a creature that might just eat her? A creature that was near invincible with its plated scales and impenetrable skin.

The only place that showed any vulnerability was the smooth skin under its jaw or behind its forearm, where a sword just might pierce it, if she believed the eddas.

Shadows of a long sinuous neck and the devilishly shaped head shifted on the wall. Freyja spun back around her stalactite, breathing hard. She darted a look to the left, and then ran, her boots silent on the stone floor. The shadowy head whipped around and Freyja threw herself onto her knees in a slide, spinning behind a larger stalactite, and pressing her back to it.

“Do you know how many have ever dared enter here?” A whisper slid hot along her nerves. He was hunting for her, his mind darting over hers.

Freyja pulled her senses in small, trying to hide, limning herself in shadows, and wrapping them around her. Pressure washed over her, as thunderous as the storm outside, but her small shadow-shield protected her from the worst of it and the storm rolled over her, searching elsewhere.

“Do you think you can hide?” Another rustle in the darkness. “I can scent your skin, your hair... the soap in your clothes. Did you think to come here to steal from me?”

“To steal—? The only thief here is you! I came to take back that which was mine!” The thought flew from her before she could stop it. Freyja’s grip tightened on the sword hilt. What a fool she was. Always her temper got the better of her.

She’d expected the wyrm to lunge for her, but only silence greeted her. Silence in which she sat with breath held, desperate to track him through the cave.

“To take back your tithe?”

She wouldn’t be drawn. Not this time. Freyja glanced toward the opening, and froze as she saw the liquid shadow of a tail lash against the cave wall.

Curse him. He was waiting by the entrance for her. She looked to the right, deeper into his lair. But perhaps there would be more tunnels there? A way to escape that he would not expect? Levering to her feet, she glanced around the rock, and slowly stepped toward the next one.

“Come out, little mouse. I will not hurt you.”

The same tone she cajoled her ewes with when she led them for slaughter. She had to get out of here.

“Even if you do escape, do you think I will not know where to find you?”

Freyja froze.

Scales rasped against the walls. That alluring scent of cinnamon-spice flushed through her as he came closer. Freyja’s head swam, her body shifting toward it. That scent. Calling her. Filling her with a liquid heat that pooled low in her abdomen. She shook her head to clear it, forcing herself to breathe through her mouth until she could think again.

“You smell... delicious. Like something I used to know of.” A pregnant pause. “What are you?”

“The woman whose ram you stole—” She stopped the thought there, but he caught some of it because that purring rasp sounded again, as if he were laughing at her.

Freyja looked up. Sharp, dagger-shaped rocks clung to the roof far above. Did she dare?

Shadows rippled over the wall. Stalking her. Coming closer. Swallowing hard, she pressed her hand to the rock and closed her eyes, reaching out.

The cavern trembled, just enough for a few tiny pebbles to rain down. Freyja stretched her senses out, reaching further, trying to meld the earth to her touch. One of the enormous jutting stalactites shuddered above the dreki, and then she felt the tiny crack snake through it, breaking off the end.

Gasping at the sudden exertion, she snatched a breath as rock rained down from the ceiling, directly where she thought the wyrm to be. A rumble of surprise greeted her, and Freyja took her chances. Sword in hand, she darted back toward the entrance she’d come through.

Something lashed toward her feet.

She saw the whip of his tail too late, and screamed as her feet went out from under her. The sword skittered across the floor as she fell, staggering into a pile of golden krone and silver rigsdaler coins that cut her hands. They scattered everywhere, one of them rolling with mocking slowness toward the feet of the great beast behind her.

Freyja scrambled onto her bottom and hands, shoving backward with her feet toward the sword. Her breath caught as the dragon loomed over her, faint light playing over the iridescence of his scales.

Freyja froze.

She didn't dare take her gaze off him. He'd tricked her with his shadow, making her believe he'd been far closer to her than he was, and now he loomed over her, golden wings stretching out as if to intimidate, the enormous head stretched forward with eyes narrowed and dagger-teeth bared.

Beautiful and horrific and terrifying. She couldn't take her eyes off him, could barely breathe at the sight of such lithe magnificence, dancing around the cave on surprisingly quick feet. Savage death dwelled in his amber eyes. What a beautiful fury he was, like the storm outside. If she had to die, then she could almost think of no better beast to fell her.

But dying had never been her plan.

Freyja's hand closed over the sword and she wrenched it forward, pointing it at him pathetically. One last defiant act as she lay tumbled on her sealskin on one of his piles of gold.

"You think me beautiful?" His head lowered, resting on his forelegs, those razor-sharp claws flexing. "You are fierce."

Freyja's arm grew heavy as a low rumbling purr filled the cavern. Her eyes narrowed and she slowly let the sword fall to her lap, suspicion creeping through her. She was right! He was laughing at her.

Without taking her eyes off him, she climbed to her feet, dragging the sword with her. The futility of it struck her. She could see from the polished gleam of those scales she would never have been able to pierce it. Still, it gave her something to lean on as she stared at the mighty wyrm.

"What do you intend to do with me?" Freyja asked defiantly, her nerves itching. Why was he just waiting?

The pupils of his eyes were slit like a cat's. The eyelids lowered a fraction, an almost smug gesture that wasn't lost on her. "What do you think the penalty should be for stealing into my lair?"

He wasn't going to kill her? Freyja's shoulders slumped. Suddenly she wanted to cry. As if the thought spurred them on, hot tears flooded her eyes. "I don't care," she said. Her voice lost its edge. "Do what you will and be done with it. I'm too exhausted to waste words with you."

The wyrm rumbled deep in his chest. 'Words are all you have.'

"I have cold steel too," she muttered.

"And it provided such wondrous protection for its previous owner."

Freyja stared at the wyrm mulishly. Not only did he laugh at her, but that was definitely sarcasm. She tossed the sword aside and crossed her arms, blinking away her tears.

“Better.” He settled again, entire body relaxing into a lazy sprawl on the floor. “I do not like it when humans try to stick sharp things in me.”

“I don’t like it when wyrms steal my sheep.”

The wyrm yawned, exhibiting an array of wicked-sharp white teeth. “Make more of them.”

Freyja actually took a step of startled anger toward it. “I would, but that was my last ram. I don’t have another, hence I cannot breed more. I hope your belly’s full, for you shall be getting no more lambs from me!” Again the tears threatened. “And neither shall I. My father and I shall starve for your greed!”

Those eyes narrowed. “It was you humans who broke the tithe first. I only took what was promised.”

“From one who had not promised it,” she retorted. “Each family knows the roster, and who must make the sacrifice. I paid mine months back!”

The dragon suddenly launched itself to its feet, and Freyja stumbled back in fright, tripping on a pile of kroner.

“It would not do,” he said at last, “to see such a fierce little mouse starve.”

Freyja’s fists clenched. “I am not a mouse.”

“No?” Again the satisfied rumble. “No, you are not. What are you? You smell so familiar.”

What are you? Words she had been taunted with all of her life, for the oddness of her eyes and the strange intuition she had always suffered. “Don’t let anyone ever know what you can do,” her mother had whispered. “Not even your father. You are special, Freyja. Like me....”

“Am I a changeling?” she’d asked.

Her mother had smiled and leaned down to kiss her forehead. “Ignorance is your best weapon, my love. You are special, that is all you need know.”

Freyja stared up at the mighty wyrm. “I am a woman,” she said carefully, for he would taste on her breath any lie she spoke. “I am human.”

“You are a mystery,” the dreki murmured. “And there is nothing I like more than mystery.”

“What do you mean?”

A claw lashed out and swiped through one of the glittering piles. Gold coins scattered toward her, tumbling over her boots and brushing against her trousers. “Take as much as your cupped hands can hold as payment for the ram. It would not do to see you starve now I have found you.”

Now I have found you.... Freyja didn’t move.

“Each new moon, you shall come and visit. I find myself curious about you. That is the punishment for daring to enter my lair, and price for your continued existence.”

She was right; he did have some plan for her, some perverse desire to... to.... She didn’t know. Couldn’t even comprehend why he would ask this of her.

“Next time I would suggest you do not bring the sword.” The wyrm glanced at her, its lips curling in an odd way one would almost think a smile.

Freyja knelt down and dug her hands into the gold. The price was more than she wished to pay, but she was pragmatic. Refusing his gifts would see both her father and herself starve, and some part of her doubted she would be allowed to refuse. She had been granted a reprieve. For whatever reason he granted it—wyrms were not human after all, and bound by their own whims—the truth was the same.

She had survived.

She had actually challenged the mighty wyrm, and won.

Still, Freyja did not feel as though she had won as she stood and pocketed the veritable fortune. Staring into those amber, cat-slit eyes felt as though she stared into the burning furnace of the sun. He was not finished with her, not yet.

“Now go.” A whisper across her senses, one that sounded eminently satisfied with itself. “You look weary and should sleep.”

Freyja took a step back toward the entrance, not daring to turn her back on him at all.

“I shall see you soon, little mouse.”

After she left, Rurik exploded into the storm-lashed sky with heavy thrusts from his magnificent wings, barely feeling the faint sting of rain.

Exhilaration danced through him, sending lightning crashing down again and again, dancing in tune to his desire. He pinwheeled through the sky above a ridge, gliding in and out of the flickering stabs of lightning, whipping it to a greater frenzy.

Fierce joy rode him, and a hunger he had not felt in many years. He felt as if the cobwebs had swept from his drowsing mind, as if a dash of icy water had splashed over him whilst he lazed on the heat-baked stones of his tunnels. A shock of life, returning.

Who is she?

Rurik circled high, his eagle gaze lighting on the tiny, bedraggled figure far below, fighting her way across the bleak landscape. She would not see him, but he watched over her. The dreki loved puzzles, and she was a curiosity wrapped up in a mystery.

Fierce.

His female. Appearing in the heart of the storm to challenge him in his own lair. Of course he could not resist her.

And then there was the mystery of her power. He could remember the taste of it in the air between them, crackling like lightning. It reminded him of something, though he could not bring the thought to mind.

What is she?

For the first time in decades his interest, long dormant, stirred. The male in him had looked and seen a creature of flame and shadow, of mighty power, utterly bedazzling. A treasure beyond any he owned. He wanted her. Therefore he would have her, and together they would burn the world until he tired of her.

Rurik dipped his wings, feeling the lash of the winds. It turned him into a free fall, wind whipping past him with dizzying intensity until he banked at the last moment, sweeping over the moors and alighting on a crag. A shudder swept through him, an electric tingle lighting across his skin.

It had been a long time since he walked as a man. A long time since he had desired it, indeed desired anything. Lightning flickered in the distance and in front of him his shadow quivered, then shrunk, wings disappearing, and his serpentine neck folding in on itself. Rurik fell to his hands and knees, feeling the power of the land roil beneath his touch. Rain stung his skin, a whiplash of sensuous pleasure as he bowed his head and waited for the shock of his transition to fade.

Nude. Glorious. Full of immense power that boiled beneath the heavy muscle of his skin. Rurik lifted his head as water sluiced down over his naked skin and smiled fiercely, his teeth bared.

Time to go hunting.

Chapter 3

The problem with gold was that nobody in her village or the neighboring farms would be able to trade for it, nor was it wise to show too much of it, in case someone decided to see if she had more.

Freyja spent three days debating the problem, then finally harnessed their small Icelandic pony, Hanna, to the cart. Telling her father she intended to buy a new ram in Akureyri—without revealing the precise details of the demise of their previous one—she set out toward the trading town. The cart was stocked full of wool and eiderdown, for trips to the trading town were rare and she was practical enough to take this opportunity to sell what she had stored.

One day to travel, one to trade, and one to get home. He'd be fine. He'd lived in their little house his entire life. He wouldn't need his eyes to get around, and their distant neighbor had promised to keep an eye on him.

Sunshine washed down over her as she guided Hanna along the marshy plain toward Akureyri. The thin track was barely marked by passing traffic, as the last thaw had obliterated it. Only several kerlingar—small pyramids of stone shaped much like old women—marked the way.

“Easy now,” Freyja murmured, as Hanna crested the rise and Akureyri revealed itself below.

The trading town was nestled in the heart of a fjord, with a natural harbor and warmer waters that kept the bay ice-free. Red houses lined the bay and several Danish merchant ships lingered in the harbor. Sometimes the English came to trade for fish, but it was done under a cover of secrecy, for the Danish held the trade monopoly. One could often see them swaggering about the town, turning their noses up at the natives.

For a woman travelling alone, it wasn't wise to venture too close to the docks, but Freyja had been born with one mostly green eye, and one brown. Witch-born or elf-cursed, depending on which religion or superstition you believed in. People still crossed themselves when they saw her, and few would dare accost her.

She hoped.

Finding a room and board at a small inn, Freyja hastily brushed Hanna down, the gold in the pouch at her neck seeming to weigh her down. She felt as though eyes lingered on her as she left the stables, though that was ridiculous. Nobody knew what she had on her person.

“Hey now! Be careful with that!” someone bellowed as she hurried to the inn.

A large merchant ship had docked close to shore, and men were hastily trying to rig up some sort of contraption to swing what looked like an enormous crossbow on wheels from the ship deck to the dock.

Freyja tucked her bright red shawl around her shoulders as she sidestepped through the growing crowd. “What is it?” she asked no one in particular.

A young lad in a dark blue seafaring coat with brass buttons up the sides of it glanced at her, his hair covered in a knitted woolen cap. “It’s the dragon hunter, miss. From Norway.”

All about her people were lured out of their homes. Freyja stood on her toes to see. Dragon hunter. Chills of premonition edged down her spine. “The only dreki in these parts is the one beneath Krafla.”

“Aye,” the lad replied. “Some of the local villages have put together a fund for the dragon hunter’s reward. They want no more of this tithe, or this wurm’s demands. Iceland should have no master anymore.”

It would take more than a group of villagers to pay for the dragon hunter. It had to be Benedikt. He and his father made their fortune mining sulfur, and then buying up as much land as they could. He’d long been vocal about his hatred for the tithe and the demand it placed on the villagers. Not that she thought his desire to rid himself of the wurm was truly guided by his concern for others. Benedikt’s pride was enough to resent any overlord, no matter how little the wurm stirred their affairs.

“Where is the dragon hunter?” she asked, stumbling over the words.

The lad pointed. “There!”

Freyja’s breath caught as an enormous man strode into view, yelling harshly at the engineers as the ballista was levered off the ship. It dangled over the gulf between water and wharf, swinging precariously.

He was a tall man, wearing archaic chain mail and a long fur cloak. His hair shone moonlight-silver in the dying light, and even from this distance she could see he was handsome. Around her, several whispered murmurs assured her she was not the only one to believe so.

Freyja couldn’t tear her gaze away as the ballista swung toward the wharf. Unease twisted in her gut as she tucked her hands into the narrow crevices of her elbows. The gold seemed to burn in the pouch around her neck.

“Has he hunted many dreki?” she asked. “I did not believe them so easy to fell.”

“He has ways,” the lad assured her. “They say he’s hunted three of them in Norway.”

Three. A man who knew how to kill them then. Freyja shivered. In hindsight, the wurm seemed curious more than anything else. With time to think over the incident in the cave, she was swiftly realizing he never meant to kill her.

If he’d wished such a thing, he could have done so immediately.

An odd knot of guilt warmed in her chest. She shouldn’t get involved. After all, what could she do? Warn the beast?

The dragon hunter stepped to the edge of the wharf, lifting his hands for silence. “My name,” he called in a strong accent, “is Haakon Haraldsson. I am here to rid you of the foul beast that lurks beneath Krafla.”

Clapping sprang up, women cheering for him and waving handkerchiefs. One would think him a feudal king for the way he carried himself.

A slight smile curled over Haakon’s mouth, though his eyes remained as cold as the glaciers further south. The precise same color too, she noted, as his gaze locked on her. “My team have destroyed three of the foul beasts, and sent them back to the hell they came from.” At this he crossed himself, and half the crowd echoed him. “They tell me Iceland is burdened by such creatures. And I say, no more!” He roared the last words.

Excitement ran through the crowd, trailing over her skin. Freyja was the only one not clapping, and he saw it, his eyes meeting hers with a challenge.

“I hear many words,” another voice called out in a low baritone. “But I do not hear how you will perform this”—the voice dropped to a mocking drawl—“miraculous feat.”

All eyes swung toward the back of the crowd. Gasps rang out as people stepped aside to reveal another man, sunlight gleaming off the golden thread of his embroidered waistcoat.

He did not move, gaze locked on the dragon slayers, and his arms crossed over his firm chest. Both men were of a height, though the newcomer’s shoulders were broader, and he held himself as though he were the tallest man in the crowd.

He was the sun to Haakon’s moonlit coloring. Silky golden hair raked back from his brow, his watchful eyes the color of amber. Someone long ago had broken his nose, and the imperfection only heightened the severely handsome cut of his features. He was breathtaking. The kind of man she’d pictured as the prince of all the stories her mother told her, though the predatory nature of his gaze told her he might not be quite as noble as she anticipated.

Definitely a stranger. Powerful and at ease with himself, as though he knew his worth. Freyja couldn’t stop her gaze from dropping to those muscular thighs, encased in superfine buff breeches. His coat was dark bronze wool, and a spill of snowy white lace at his throat highlighted the golden hue of his skin. She’d never seen the like in her life.

“And who are you?” Haakon called.

“You may refer to me as Rurik,” the stranger replied, with a slight accent. His voice was smooth, yet everybody strained to hear it. “And I study myths. Including this dreki you speak of killing.”

“A scholar.” The way Haakon pronounced the word spoke volumes. He smiled. “Perhaps you should leave the talk of killing dragons to those better suited for it.”

Laughter spilled around them.

“Knowledge is its own weapon,” Rurik countered, an amused gleam warming his eyes. There was a challenge there.

Haakon turned and gestured toward the ballista. “This shoots solid steel bolts at a hundred yards a second. It’s strong enough to pierce even a dragon’s hide.”

“He must stay very still for you then.”

Haakon tilted his head slightly to the side. “There are ways,” he said, with a chilling little smile.

"And the chainmail? Do you think yourself a knight of old?"

Haakon trailed his knuckles over the smooth rings. "This saved my life three months ago. A dragon has sharp teeth. This stops them."

A whip crack of sound drew everyone’s attention, including Haakon’s. Freyja’s gaze jerked to the far rope holding the heavy machine in place. As she watched, one strand of the hemp unraveled with devastating swiftness. The other held for a second before the pressure snapped it in half too.

“Secure that bloody thing!” Haakon roared as the ballista tumbled onto its side, dangling by two precarious ropes.

Another broke, and the ballista jerked closer to the water below before the final rope lost its fight, and snapped with a mighty crack.

“No!” Haakon raced forward as the ballista tumbled into the water below with a chilly splash. It sank without further aplomb and he cursed at the engineers who had rigged the harness, barking orders in a brutally authoritative tone.

“A pity,” a voice, darkly amused, murmured by her ear. “Now he shall find it most difficult to hunt dreki.”

The words whispered over the smooth skin behind her ear. Freyja shivered, and spun on her heel to face the man. Rurik stood closer than he ought to, his body cutting the cool slipstream of the wind so she instantly warmed. Or perhaps that was the heat that lingered in the air between them.

She hadn’t even heard him moving. Tugging her shawl tight around her shoulders, Freyja glanced up at him as if daring him to stare at her eyes.

And he did.

But not the way most men usually did, recoiling in horror. Instead he leaned closer, seeming to stare right through her as if he could see something no one else could. As if somehow he stripped her naked—not of her clothes, but of every pretense and inhibition she’d ever owned, every lie she’d ever told, every little smile she’d used to mask her hurt.

And it burned. The connection between them was irrevocable. Freyja was lost, unable to look away, drawn like a lodestone to iron filings, lured by the smoky amber of his gaze. Her breath trapped itself in her lungs, as though she wore a steel corset.

“You have beautiful eyes,” he finally murmured, and the spell was broken.

“Beautif—” she blurted, then stopped herself. Nobody had ever called them beautiful before, and this conversation was incredibly daring for a man who had not even asked her name.

Small lines creased in the corners of his eyes, as though he smiled without moving his lips. “You doubt me? Do you not own a mirror?”

“This is most unseemly,” she murmured, dropping her head so as to draw as little attention as possible.

“I did not take you for a seemly woman at all.”

Freyja looked up with a steely glare. “Sir, you have spoken out of turn. I will thank you to move out of my way.”

Those amber eyes sharpened, as though he had unearthed precisely what he wished to find. “My apologies. I did not mean to offend. I merely meant to point out you are a rare blossom in a garden of”—his gaze raked the crowd—“ordinary blooms. You’re not the type to conform. I find the effect stimulating.”

And then he hit her with the full power of his smile.

Freyja stepped back, tucking her shawl tighter as though it could somehow protect her or help sort her whirlpool of sudden emotion. “You offer compliments with a practiced ease.”

“I speak the truth and always have.” He offered her his hand as if to bring her fingers to his lips. “My name is Rurik.”

“So I believe you said.” His fingers were long and elegant. She eyed them as one would eye a toad. She didn’t want to touch him. Instinct had never let her down in the past and it was screaming at her now. Touch him and she would be lost. Touch him and all manner of dangerous, life-changing moments existed in her future. “And if honeyed words are the only weapons in your arsenal, then I fear you shall have a fruitless hunt.”

“Are you challenging me to prove my intentions?”

“All I am saying,” she stared at him defiantly, “is that I will not succumb to flattery.”

His eyelashes lowered as he realized she had no intention of taking his hand. “I don’t believe I caught your name.”

“I never offered it,” she replied, and gathering her skirts, moved to step around him. “Good day, sir.”

Freyja could feel eyes on her as she hurried toward the inn. Watching her. Smoldering. And then she realized Rurik wasn’t the only person watching her.

The dragon slayer glared at her, his arms folded across his chest and his face expressionless. Behind him, his men dove into the waters of the bay, to attach cables to the ballista, but he paid them no mind. No, his attention was all for her.

Freyja faltered. Her ears began catching hints of the murmurs that surrounded her. The flickering glances of the crowd.

“...curious how it fell like that? All at once, as if the ropes were cut...”

“Cut by what?”

Silence greeted the question. Nobody quite looked at her, but she saw an older lady cross herself.

Somehow Freyja forced herself to take another step. Then another. Moving stiffly, though she tried not to. Her pulse started to race. They did not burn witches anymore, but she was suddenly aware of her vulnerability so far from home. There were none here to protect her or protest her innocence. No one who knew her.

It was not so bad out in the countryside where the goodwives told their tales, and everyone knew it was wise not to disturb the tors for fear of earning the wrath of trolls. Changeling, the local bonders whispered behind her back, but they did little more than whisper. Here in the town, religion had a stronger hold.

Freyja tried to ignore the dragon slayer's stare as she reached the inn door. The crowd was not where the danger lay.

"Here."

Rurik frowned down at her, offering his arm. He too understood the whispering vibe of the crowd. Somehow he looked different, as if the lazy, handsome wastrel had washed from his countenance, to be replaced by something infinitely feral. Meaner. His cheekbones seemed harshly cut, and his eyes glittered like a smoldering furnace. He placed his body between her and the crowd; cutting off the dagger-glance the dragon slayer gave her.

She shouldn't trust him.

"Take my arm," he said. "Dine with me."

Freyja slid her hand through the crook of his arm, swallowing hard. The press of his body against hers filled her with heat and an odd longing. Dare she trust it? Him?

"I won't let them hurt you. Come." He pushed through the inn door, holding it open for her. A slow smile curled over his mouth. "Be brave, my lady. I did not think you the type to retreat from anything."

Freyja sucked in a breath. He was right. If she could face down the mighty wyrm by herself, then she could certainly handle a crowd of superstitious, narrow-minded gossips.

The thought brought an ill-timed smile to her lips, and Rurik's gaze sharpened on them. "You are amused?"

"I have an odd sense of what to be frightened of. If you knew what I have faced... and yet I quail at this." She laughed softly. "Foolishness."

Rurik guided her through the door with his hand in the small of her back. The low-beamed ceiling was stained with peat smoke and several locals leaned on the bar, smoking their pipes. Mostly men, for women rarely frequented a place like this, only those like herself who were forced to trade for lack of menfolk in their lives.

"People are frightened of what they do not understand," Rurik murmured, the pressure of his hand warming the small of her back. For a moment she caught a hint of his cologne, and turned her face unconsciously toward his chest to breathe it in. Spicy. Smoky-hot. Delicious.

Their eyes met. Something about his gaze frightened her. Darkly knowledgeable. Patient. As if he knew precisely what sort of reaction she was having, and simply waited for her to succumb.

"Perhaps they have cause to be frightened," she murmured.

"And are we speaking of you or me here?"

His gaze raked over the plain black cloth of her skautbúningur. It was her best gown, with gold leaf embroidered around the neckline and skirts, and a spill of white lace at her throat. It covered her from throat to toe, but for a moment she felt dangerously unclothed.

Both of them. For he had a certain power too.

“Thank you,” she murmured, drawing away from him and ignoring his implication. “But I do believe—”

“You are not walking away from me again, are you? And here I thought the North was known for its hospitality.”

Freyja’s words died in her mouth. With such a distance between farmsteads, and the harsh climes, to turn a man or woman from your door was unthinkable. To suggest she lacked in hospitality was an insult, and he knew it, from the amused twinkle that lit his amber gaze.

“This is not my home,” she said, using precise, clipped words. “You may come or go as you please.”

“Then I shall stay to dine.” He stepped past in a swish of scent that left her breathless. Freyja’s hands curled into fists, but Rurik seemed not to see. A smile curled over his sensual mouth as he glanced behind him. “And look. There is one table left. If you ask me nicely, I shall share it with you.”

Arrogant devil. She did not wish to dine with him, but her stomach clenched as if reminding her of how long it had been since breakfast. And glutton that she was, she had been dreaming of baked kipper pie or roasted salmon for the entire journey to town. A rare treat, and now she had coin she could indulge herself.

But he was dangerous.

For she’d never felt like this before: as if she had a secret he somehow knew. A secret carnal craving that had never flared ’til now, as if her body knew things she herself didn’t. Perhaps having men shy away from her eyes had been a hidden boon in the past. Rurik’s frank interest in her unnerved her in so many ways.

“I wish to know more about the dreki beneath Krafla,” he said, starting toward the table as if she’d given her assent. “To further my studies. I would be most appreciative if you would join me.”

Curse him.

What could it hurt? She did not have to speak overmuch. And his insinuation of her inhospitality irked her. Her mother would have been shamed, and Freyja herself... Had she changed so much in recent years? For a moment she remembered the joy of being a child, when she had been sheltered and protected out there on the plains, not understanding quite why they had so few visitors, or why she was often sent to bed early when there were. She’d been hungry for human company once, before she’d learned what the world was truly like.

His manner had been uncondemning. Freyja’s heart gave a small twist in her chest. More than anything, she longed for that.

Rurik glanced over his shoulder as he wove his way through the crowded seats. Eyes watched him as he went, conversation dropping to a murmur. An outsider. Like her.

Freyja didn't realize she'd taken a step toward him until the hardness leached out of his eyes.

"My lady," he almost purred, holding a chair out for her.

She sat and let him push her chair in, his knuckles brushing against her shoulders. A spark of heat went all the way through her at the touch. Freyja half glanced over her shoulder, but he was moving, circling the table with fluid grace and sinking into the chair opposite her.

"Now come, my lady." He leaned back in his chair. "Tell me about yourself."

Chapter 4

“Were we not speaking of you, and your fascination for dreki, my lord?” His little mouse countered.

She smelled like wildflowers and a spring morning, of dew wet on the grass, or the breeze that cut the mountain passes. Wild and free. Untamable.

The look on her face, however, was almost frigid; a cool, biting wind from the south, coming straight off the glaciers. Rurik leaned back in the seat, perusing her with lazy fascination.

Her manner ought to have left him cold, but he found himself only curious. She had not been so wary of him when she faced him in his lair. Only now, as a man before her, did he make her nervous, and he knew precisely why.

“I am not a very interesting man.”

She arched a brow. “I beg to differ. After all, you didn’t deny the courtesy title I just bestowed upon you.”

Clever mouse. He gestured to the serving maid to bring them wine. “You demand all of my secrets, and here I have not even your name...”

That made her pretty mouth purse. “Freyja. Freyja Helgasdottir.”

Freyja. Of course. “Goddess of love and war, beauty and death. It’s a lovely name.”

“I am no goddess.”

“That depends upon whose eyes you look through.”

Pink darkened her cheeks. “I have no wish to offend the gods.”

“So, you still believe in the old gods?”

Freyja hesitated. “I have been baptized, but I believe there are some things in this world that defy explanation.” Those mismatched eyes locked on him. “And you are doing an excellent job of not answering my original question, I notice.”

“I am not a noble man, by the very definition of the word,” he said carefully. “I own no lands,”—technically true—“I have no specific title, and I claim no king.”

“Do you mean you do not recognize the Danish king? Iceland has a limited constitution now, and some autonomy. Were you a follower of Jón Sigurðsson? My father had older copies of his annual magazine, and I have read his thoughts on democracy.”

This was where she came alive. Each flicker of her eyes toward him—those beautiful, unique eyes—made his body harden.

So she was curious about his thoughts, but immune to his flattery. How intriguing.

“No. I have not heard of this Sigurðsson—I’ve been absorbed in other matters of interest—but I do believe no... no man rules the earth beneath him. Not here.” He examined the bottle of wine the serving maid brought him, then nodded. “This will do.”

Freyja’s cheeks colored. “I do not drink wine.”

“Have you ever tried it?” He remembered delicious vintages from his youth, when he’d drifted through Renaissance Italy and France, curious about these mortals around him.

“No.”

“Do you wish to?” he asked, ordering his meal.

Freyja hesitated, but there was a ruthlessly mercenary look in her eye. “I shall make do with ale.” She looked to the serving maid. “And I should like the ptarmigan stew with sliced rúgbrauð bread.”

He kept catching hints of her thoughts, thrown into the world about her with careless abandon. And right now, she was thinking of gold coins. As much as he liked gold, he couldn’t quite imagine what it had to do with wine and ale. “I never make do.”

She eyed the cut of his magnificent coat. “Of that, I have no doubt.”

Hmmm. “Bring two glasses just in case,” he instructed the serving maid, “and my lady will have ale on the side.”

Images of his hands hit him as he stroked over the table, and the way his collar tugged open when he shifted, baring the tanned, smooth skin of his throat. Freyja liked the look of him, and Rurik fought a predatory smile as she threw the thought around her.

A curious thing, to see himself through another’s eyes. Dreki were strictly forbidden to enter another’s thoughts and pillage them, though anything she projected was fair game. And her thoughts danced over his skin like rainbows, so vivid and colorful he almost tried to reach out and catch them.

A bad idea. The stiff slant of her shoulders alone told him that. If she felt his psychic touch... if she knew precisely what was sitting at her table, then he would lose all chance at seducing her.

Not yet. She was too wary. More timid than he would have ever believed of his fierce mouse. His brows drew together momentarily. What had made her like that? The idea twisted inside him like something with claws.

“So,” she murmured, “where do you hail from?” For a moment her eyes lingered on the fine cut of his coat.

Tailor-made, all the way from London. He’d paid a small fortune for the extravagance of having it and others so swiftly finished, before he returned to pursue her. But he was dreki. He would no more clothe himself in peasants’ garb than wallow in a piggery.

“I come from the south,” he murmured, eyeing her strictly cut black dress. Freyja ought to be in silk, or better yet, naked, lying on silken sheets. She deserved finer things, and he would see she had them before he was through with her.

“And you come here to seek tales of dreki? Of local superstition?”

Careful here. He could not utter a lie; the dreki were bound and honored by their word. “I am curious of what you think of such creatures,” he replied, as the wine, ale, and their dinner arrived. “Many don’t believe their existence. Mostly those in the cities, or on the Continent.”

“I have seen... proof of their existence.” Freyja frowned into her ale. “The cursed creature ate my ram.”

“Your ram?” Always that bloody sheep. Would she never forgive him for it? It had been delicious and it had brought her into his lair, when he might never have seen her.

“My village pays a tithe,” she explained. “For thirty years we have been bound to sacrifice one of our livestock each week to the wurm, so he might leave us alone. My father tells me he and the rest of the local farmers gathered together many years ago, and struck a bargain with the beast.”

Beast? “They were either very courageous, or foolish to brave such a fierce creature.”

Freyja shrugged. “Perhaps they knew their offer would be accepted? Wyrms are lazy. Why hunt when a lamb shall be tethered out for you once a week? He used to hunt more frequently, my father claims, but now he spends most of his time lazing in his mountain, soaking up the heat of the volcano.”

“I thought wyrms to be fierce, powerful predators.”

“When they wish to be. Most of the time he leaves us alone. He is bound by his word not to harm us....” A frown tightened her brow. “Though now it seems some of the local bonders have broken their word, and hired a hunter.”

“I would not think this would trouble you.”

“It doesn’t.” Yet the worry etched on her expression didn’t fade. She sighed. “If they’ve broken their oath, then the wurm is no longer bound by his. They are vengeful creatures, according to legend. I don’t particularly wish to incur his wrath. I can’t afford to lose any more livestock.”

And she wouldn’t. Her fierce desperation in his cave scoured him. My father and I shall starve....

“Perhaps other tithes might appease him?”

At that her mismatched eyes locked on his, a flare of her temper lighting the beautiful green and brown of them. “A virgin sacrifice, you mean? We do not take part in such barbaric practices anymore.”

“They are rare,” he admitted. “A pity.”

“Virgins? Or the act of sacrificing one?” she countered.

Rurik allowed himself a smile—and didn’t answer. “You speak as though it is a crime.”

“No woman should be forced to such depths.”

She was definitely angry now. Her eyes blazed. And Rurik caught the edge of her thoughts. There were few virgins around her farmstead. Most of the young women were either married, or still children.

Except for her.

“In olden times, women offered to be made sacrifice,” he said, sipping his wine, and watching her eyes spit sparks. Beautiful. “It was an honor.”

“To be eaten?”

So innocent.... “Oh yes. To be devoured.”

Freyja’s lashes fluttered against her cheeks, which were filling with heat. Yet she did not respond to his playful innuendo, deliberately it seemed, for she certainly understood it. “You are speaking of those foolish eddas, where the dreki walk among us.”

“Do you doubt such a thing could be possible?”

“Why would they wish to? My mother said it is the only time they are mortal and vulnerable to injury. So why would one of the dreki risk such a thing?”

“Perhaps he is lonely.”

“You are ascribing human attributes to an inhuman creature.”

Rurik’s fingers stilled on the edge of his glass. “Not all of the dreki welcome others. Nor are all of them welcomed. If one of their laws are broken, sometimes they cast a dreki from their ranks, exiling him to years of loneliness.”

Freyja lifted her gaze at the coolness of his tone, as if she sensed something underlying the words. “How do you know so much?”

“I have eyes. And ears.”

“You sound like my father,” she growled under her breath. “You speak, but say nothing.”

“I am curious as to how a man would allow his unmarried daughter to travel by herself?”

Rurik reached out, and captured the wine bottle, leaning forward to fill her glass. She sat so still, yet tension vibrated through her body. Captured lightning. Just daring him to reach out and touch it.

“My father is blind and ill, so he cannot travel with me.” Those glorious eyes narrowed, and a chilling little smile tightened her soft lips. “However, I am not without protection.”

As well he should know. His little mouse had claws and teeth, though neither would be truly effective against him. Still... he liked it. Liked that snap to her tone, and the way her pretty eyes narrowed as she examined him.

A challenge.

Rurik handed her the glass, their fingers brushing against each other’s as she took it. The touch of her skin sent lightning dancing through him. Like to like. What in the Dark Goddess Hel was she?

Freyja’s eyes widened slightly as if she felt it too, and then she jerked the glass close to her mouth. “Thank you.”

He watched the wine wet her lips, and leave them reddened. Plush, glistening lips he ached to trace, to caress.

Then her eyes widened and she peered into her glass. “This is delicious.”

“I know.” He wasn’t to be distracted. “You do realize you have nothing to protect yourself against when you are with me? I have no intention of hurting you.”

“Who says I am frightened of you?”

“Your manner.”

You couldn’t hurt me if you tried.... Freyja arched a sleek, honey-blond brow, as if she hadn’t just thrown the thought at him. “Then what precisely are your intentions?”

“You intrigue me,” he admitted, watching her lick a trace of wine from her lips. Gods, how he wanted her. “It has been a very long time since such a thing has happened. Perhaps not ever.”

“Do they believe such honeyed words in the cities?”

Rurik smiled, and turned her words back upon her. “You do not like to be complimented. How curious. Is it because you believe yourself unworthy of such words?”

“I am unworthy of nothing,” she snapped.

“Then you admit you are intriguing? That I might see you as such?”

Her mouth opened... and nothing came out of it. Then she pressed those lips firmly together. “I know what you intend when you look at me.”

“Do tell.”

“I am not that kind of woman,” she replied haughtily. “Your empty compliments and blatant desires shall earn you nothing more than this meal shared.”

“That still tells me nothing of my supposed desires.”

Freyja glared at him. “You wish for carnal relations.”

Rurik leaned closer, careful not to let the predatory heat of his desire leech out. Best not to frighten her. Not yet. “I intend to have you in every way possible, Freyja. I intend to discover every last little secret you own, to know you... in every manner. This is a game of seduction, and I will not harm you nor make your choices for you. I speak of courtship only. But I think you would enjoy what I intend, very much so.” At her swift intake of breath, he leaned back. “And I am not ashamed to admit I intend to chase you. Fair warning, fair maid. You will be mine.”

Freyja tilted the wine glass to her mouth. “Fair warning, handsome stranger... you’re wasting your breath.”

How delightful she was. At least she’d relaxed at his stated intentions, as if she were so set on denial the thought he’d win her over couldn’t possibly prevail. “I like a good chase, Freyja.”

“I hope you like a long and fruitless one then. Especially if the choice of consummation is in my hands.”

“Are you not curious?” He reached out and stroked her hand suddenly.

There was that flash fire of connection between them, and her gaze jerked to his. “No,” she said as she withdrew her hand, but she'd hesitated.

"Do you know what I find so fascinating about you?"

A faint hint of pride and scorn mingled on her face as she swiftly restored herself. "My lips? My hair? My eyes?" The dancing flames of the fireplace lit her cheeks and skin with gold, until it seemed as though he stared into the face of a creature made of fire itself.

"Your fierce temper," he whispered. "And that dare you throw at me every time you look at me. It tells me I cannot have you, that you shall not succumb... even as your body reveals it for a lie."

Heat colored her cheeks. "You won't have me."

"You want me to have you," he murmured. "Don't lie to me."

"Your compliments are empty, and your declarations even more so." Standing, she glanced at the empty carafe of wine. "Do you care for more?"

Rurik glanced up from beneath his lashes. "Run, Freyja." He smiled dangerously. "And yes, I would enjoy more wine."

"I shall fetch it then."

Wending between the tables, she made her way to the bar. Eyes watched her back, lingering on her. Not all of them in suspicion or distrust. The very set of her shoulders defined her untouchability, and with it, part of her allure. He was clearly not the only one affected, and she could not see it, mired in distrust, and ingrained with suspicion. Rurik scowled, his lashes lowering as he leaned back in the chair and surveyed the room. With one lash of his temper he could destroy this room and all of the men in it. Men who hungered for her.

A dangerous hunger, marred as it was by their beliefs, for there were ways to force such a woman as she to heel, and such was anathema to his dreki nature. Women should never be coerced. But a whisper in the right ear and she could be accused of things she had no control over.... Thunder rumbled outside in the clear sky at the vile thought. He watched eyes glance toward windows and smiled, more a hint of his teeth than any sign of humor.

He would protect her. Whether she thought she needed it or not.

An odd tension filled him, and his gaze went to the entrance.

It opened, wind sending a man staggering through the light-filled doorway. The sharp scent of tar, fur, and the sea filled Rurik's nostrils as the dragon hunter stepped through the door, tugging his wolf fur close around his shoulders as he surveyed the room. His tangled blond hair whipped into chilling blue-gray eyes, and their gazes locked.

Rurik inclined his head slightly. A dangerous man, and one he would not underestimate, for the man spoke the truth on the docks as he spoke of killing three dragons. His lesser cousins were no match for dreki, but still monstrous creatures. It was a remarkable feat for a single man to have engineered.

"Would you care for company?" Haakon asked, as Freyja returned with the wine.

Rurik lifted his foot and slid the other chair back with a beckoning gesture and a hint of a wolfish smile. "Please." The last thing he would ever do was fear a puny human.

And perhaps it would be fun.

Dragging off his gloves, the heavily muscled man took the seat and offered thanks to Freyja as she returned to the counter to fetch another glass.

"How go your recovery efforts?" Rurik asked, faintly amused.

"Badly. The tide is coming in, and the dockhands seem to think it madness to attempt to retrieve my ballista now."

"A pity."

Haakon shrugged, icy blue eyes watchful. "A brief setback. I'm a patient man."

So was he. "The mark of a true hunter."

A dangerous smile curved the hunter's lips as Freyja settled again at the table. "What would a scholar know of such things?"

"I know many things," Rurik countered. "Wine?" At the other man's nod, Rurik took the carafe and poured before Freyja could. He had no intention of seeing her serve another man. Not when she was his.

"Mistress Helgasdottir." Haakon nodded politely.

"I see you've been enquiring about me," she replied.

Enough to learn her name, and no doubt more. The amount of information the locals owned about the unusual young woman was immense, and offered generously. A growl curdled in Rurik's throat. For what he could learn, so too could others.

"What man does not enquire about such a striking young woman?" Haakon asked.

This time the compliment brought no heat to her cheeks. She remained cool, and on her guard. "You are not the only one who can learn about another. You come to hunt the dreki," she replied, sipping her wine. "To kill him."

"I make no lie of my intentions," Haakon replied. "Word reached my ears of this particular beast, and so I have come to try my hand at him."

"Word of the beast? Or word of the reward?" she asked.

"A significant sum." Haakon leaned back in his chair. "But no, it's the beast I'm most interested in. I am told you come from the village at the base of its lair. That you know of the creature."

Freyja's lips thinned. "I know the creature. It stole my ram, and so I was forced to enter its lair to try and save him."

Haakon's eyes sharpened.

"Without luck, I assure you," she replied primly.

"All here know of the mighty creature," Rurik murmured. "You should be warned: this is no lesser dragon you hunt. This is one of the mighty dreki."

"There is a difference between dragon and dreki?" Freyja interrupted. "I thought 'dragon' was simply another term used in different countries?"

“No. They are cousins, but far different creatures. Many, many years ago, the dreki were born to this land. Spirits of earth, air, and fire, created by a goddess into a single creature with the powers of all three of the elements.”

“But the dreki... they were different. They say when the great goddess used her powers to turn herself into an enormous serpent in the sea to fight her husband’s killers, she was slain by the storm-god Marduk. He scattered her body across the world, but her soul remained, formless yet still powerful. The sea and her waters had failed her, and when the north wind blew her soul around the globe, her soul sought solace in the warm, dark earth, where fire brewed.”

Both of them were focused intently upon him. Rurik continued, “Long did her soul brew in the heart of the volcano, Hekla, and her spirit strengthened with the force of the element of fire. She sought life again, but to form a fleshly body was beyond her. Her only hope lay in creating more children, ones that spun to life from the earth, were gilded with the power of fire, and ruled the air. Using her waning powers in one last act of Creation, the volcano exploded and with each gout of fire, the goddess created her new children. The goddess tore her soul apart, pieces of her power imbuing each spirit with strength. These were the dreki, and they carry a part of the goddess within them. Powerful spirits who ruled the elements and could tame the sky itself; those with the goddess’s own ability to shapeshift.

“The wyrms, leviathan, and serpents were slowly hunted by men, the last of them dying out centuries ago in the Persian Gulf. But dragons remain, and some say they haunt volcanoes, seeking to steal the gift of fire that eludes them.” He tilted his head toward Haakon, “These are the creatures you have faced. Fierce beasts with poisonous blood, but no breath of fire, nor mastery of the elements. Jealous creatures who yearn for more.”

“Some do,” he replied. “You have to understand there have been many generations of dreki born. They are not immortal, though they have long lives. Now, only the purest of bloodlines have the gift of fire.”

“Hekla,” Freyja murmured, “the gateway to hell.”

“So say many who believe in such a place,” Rurik agreed. Now it was the home of the dreki court, though he would not breathe word of it here.

“I have never heard such a story told,” Haakon said. “Where did you come by such information?”

Rurik shrugged and drained his wine. “Years of listening, perhaps. There are many who will exchange an old tale by a hearth on a cold night. And perhaps you were not asking the right questions?” Setting the empty cup on the table, he leaned forward, “Such as why a man sets himself on such a dangerous pursuit as hunting dragons or even dreki? Especially when he does not know the difference between them?”

Haakon’s expression tightened. “One of them stole my wife six years ago.”

“Stole?” he asked thoughtfully. “You come from Norway, yes?”

“Yes.”

“There are no dreki on the mainland in Norway,” Rurik mused. “Which means one travelled far to take her, and I assure you dreki do not take that which is not given freely.”

“Are you calling me a liar?” Haakon’s face darkened.

“I am wondering how you were so certain your wife was taken by such?”

Haakon pushed his chair aside with a scrape, leaning his knuckles on the table as he growled, “Because I saw her enter the grove, and I saw the beast launch itself into the air directly after she screamed. By the time I got there, all that was left was her basket, and scattered bread loaves she’d been taking to my sister. I have not seen her since and I have spent many a long night searching.” Haakon closed his eyes briefly, his voice becoming raw. “The last thing I remember is the sight of her face as she glanced one last time at me, and the look in her amber eyes....”

“Amber eyes?” A curious tale. Rurik frowned. “Describe the dreki, please.”

“What?”

“Describe him,” Rurik repeated. “What size? What shape? What color—”

“Gold,” Haakon spat. “The beast shone like newly minted coins, which is why I’m here. I’ve heard Krafla’s beast is the same color.”

Gold. Rurik sat back in surprise. Dragons could not change shape into mortal form. But dreki could. And there was only one golden dreki he knew of, beside himself.

Oh, Hel.

“Árdís, what were you thinking?” He threw the thought out into the world, and felt someone far away turn toward him as she heard it.

After a rather tense supper, Freyja escaped to check on Hanna before she returned to the inn. The wine had gone to her head, and though dinner was delicious, it left her feeling a little unsettled.

Haakon had stormed out in a huff after the confrontation over his wife, and even Rurik gave up any pretense at trying to charm her, dwelling on his wine with a frown. The story of Haakon’s missing wife bothered him more than he’d like to admit.

A storm rumbled overhead as she found herself in the courtyard behind the inn. Freyja looked up with a harsh intake of breath. Lightning lashed the mountains that surrounded the town. The houses were spread far enough apart that there was little protection from the wind.

“What is going on?” she whispered. This mood; this itch. It didn’t feel entirely natural. Reaching out, she felt the rage of the storm slip through her fingers as though it were a herd of savage horses, whipped to fury by masters she couldn’t see.

“Come.” A warm hand slid into hers, and Freyja looked down in shock as Rurik took her hand. She hadn’t realized he’d followed her out of the inn. His gloves were warm and he was the kind of hot-blooded man a woman would want in her bed on a cold night.

He wasn’t looking at her. Instead he stared toward the west, toward the origin of the storm, and that intense expression on his face deepened. His fingers slid between hers, locking their palms together.

“They say dreki ride the wings of such storms,” he finally murmured. “It would not do for either of us to be caught out this night.”

“I have to check on Hanna.”

Rurik stared at her for a long moment. “Follow me.”

Then he hurried her into the shadows of the stables. And madness of madness, she let him.

Chapter 5

The horses were restless. Freyja moved among them with a quiet murmur, soothing where she could and darting glances over her shoulder at the man by the doors.

Rurik peered through the slightly ajar door, lightning flickering over his masculine features and carving shadows across his stark cheekbones. He didn't move, but his eyes darted, searching the skies above as if he truly expected to see something there.

"This is ridiculous," Freyja murmured. "The wyrm will not be out this night. He will be sleeping in his lair, purring like a kitten."

"Dreki. Not wyrm." A flash of irritation crossed his face, then his eyes turned cunning. "You have seen him, you claimed."

Her hand slid to a halt against Hanna's neck.

"For few would describe it quite like that," he continued, lightning turning his face stark for a moment, his eyes as intense as the storm as they locked on her. "You have seen the dreki."

Freyja turned her face away, stroking Hanna's velvety muzzle. "I just wanted my ram back. I paid little attention to the dreki."

"Liar."

Freyja's head jerked up. Rurik eased the door shut and turned to her with a smile in the near-darkness.

Moving toward her on graceful feet, he reached out and held his fingers for Hanna to sniff. The mare snorted and backed away, but Rurik never took his gaze off Freyja.

"Where did you see him, Freyja?" Soft words, barely a whisper, but oh, it set her body on fire.

And that was foolish, for she had never felt this way for a man.

She moved to step around him, but he reached out and shoved a palm flat against the partition between each stall. Freyja's breath caught as Rurik pressed close, heat swimming in the air between them. She couldn't stop a gasp from escaping; her hands came up between them as if to shove him away. Or perhaps not. She wasn't certain. What did she know of him truly? Dark stables, no one else in the vicinity. Freyja's eyes narrowed. If his intentions were less than noble, then he was about to get the shock of his life.

Reaching out, she tasted the storm, feeling the coiling power within it. Come then, she dared him as she stared into those gleaming eyes.

“I would not hurt you,” he replied slowly. “You have nothing to fear, not that way. I told you this would be your choice.”

That voice. She shivered, her clenched knuckles brushing against the edges of his coat. Soft wool. So warm from the heat of his body. The desire to reach out and touch him was staggering.

I have everything to fear.

Rurik’s face darkened as he watched her. “You are so wary. Has a man ever tried to... to hurt you?”

Benedikt. She shoved the thought away. It didn’t matter, and she’d proven she was hardly defenseless. Benedikt had stopped trying to force kisses on her years ago, and had begun to threaten instead. “You should be kind to me, Freyja. Your father is frail—who shall you turn to when he is gone?” Leaning close, hissing in her ear, “Perhaps I should tell him what his daughter has been up to? What man would want to defend her if I name her witch?”

Rurik saw the truth in her face. His eyelashes fluttered down, obscuring those magnificent eyes, but for a second she thought she saw rage there.

Outside, the storm suddenly broke over the town, wind screaming through the streets and tearing the shutters from their moorings. The horses spooked, even as a lash of sudden power swept through the air. A fierceness. A fury. For a second, she could almost believe his talk of dreki that rode the storm with their anger, whipping it along.

His face lowered, cheek pressed almost to hers, his lips not quite brushing her ear. “Tell me his name.”

“He is nothing,” she replied, feeling strangely protected. The cage of Rurik’s arms, his body, sheltered her from the chill, and some part of her felt safe for the first time in years. It was insane. She barely knew this man.

Hot breath against her skin made her shiver. “Tell. Me. His. Name.”

“He is a local landowner near my village,” she blurted. “What does it matter? You will never know him. You are a traveler and shall move on soon, and I—”

“Freyja.”

“His name is Benedikt!” she snapped, her chest heaving. “For all the good it shall do you. You’ll be gone in days, collecting your stories, your eddas. Seeking your dragons!”

“Dreki,” he corrected again, thumb stroking her trembling lower lip. “They are dreki. Ancient spirits. Ancient power. And what makes you think I am going anywhere?”

She could barely see, but knew he turned to look at her, for she felt the stir of his breath move across her heated skin. Her heart hammered in her chest. “Don’t pretend otherwise. I know men like you.”

“Oh, Freyja... you know no one like me. That I promise you.” Fingertips brushed against her other cheek. “Why do you always defy me?”

“You have not seen defiance yet. I barely know you.”

“You know me,” he replied. Fingertips brushed over her dress, between her breasts, the backs of his knuckles pressing against the racing thud of her heartbeat. “You know me here.”

She had set him a challenge in the inn, to prove his empty compliments were not the only arsenal he had. And he had accepted it, for the words, his touch, burned through her until she could scarcely breathe.

“I wish I’d never dared you,” Freyja whispered. A single beam of light from a hole in the roof cut across his face as it lowered to hers. Her heart erupted in a flight of dragon wings. She could have said no. She knew his intentions.

But though the words hovered behind her lips, they didn’t cross them.

What would it feel like, just once, to let a man kiss her?

For a second that lonely urge pushed aside the ruthlessly practical voice in her head that told her she was being a fool.

“Curious female.” His soft laughter caressed her lips. “Did you think I only decided you were mine when you dared me? You were mine the moment I laid eyes on you.”

The brush of his mouth against hers tore her apart. Somehow her hands caught his upper arms. To push him away or to draw him closer? She didn’t know.

A hail of rain drummed on the roof above her as Rurik tasted her breath. The brush of his mouth whispered against hers, back and forth. Drawing her in. Luring her. Tongue darting out to wet her lips. His assault was so tender Freyja’s shoulders relaxed, her fingers no longer digging into his arms. She couldn’t fight this slow seduction.

She didn’t want to.

Heat speared lower, in her abdomen. Freyja moaned as Rurik stepped closer, his hard body pressing hers against the stable door and trapping her there. “Kiss me, Freyja. Kiss me, sarratum zamani.”

She didn’t understand the words, the way he rolled over them with his tongue, but she felt it shiver through her. His mouth opened over hers.

Rurik had power of his own. Power to shatter her defenses and leave her gasping. Freyja kissed him eagerly, hands sliding up his chest where she could feel the steady thud of his heart beneath her palms. Her first kiss, and it was divine. He tasted divine, the scorching heat of his skin warming her all the way through. Suddenly she couldn’t get enough.

She wanted him all over her, inside her. Penetrating her. The sharp stab of the storm lashed over her skin, and Freyja opened herself to it, power crackling through her.

The tips of her hair flickered with static. As if he felt the change in her, Rurik thrust his hips against her, hands shackling her wrists as he pinned them above her head. Hard lips captured hers, brutal and ravenous. No kiss to steal her breath, not this time. This was meant to own, to possess her.

And it did.

Freyja threw her head back, breathless with need. Thunder rumbled through the building, the storm lancing the air outside. She felt it within her, lightning flickering along her nerves as Rurik's roughened cheek rasped against her throat. Her heart pounded like a drum as his arms slid around her, bringing her into his powerful embrace. Hands slid up her back, locking her in place as his tongue darted down to the crevice between her breasts. The sharp nip of teeth stung against her tender skin, marking her. Freyja dug her fingers into his scalp, helpless to resist.

What was she doing? With a stranger, no less?

But then his hand slid over the black wool of her dress, cupping the unbound weight of her breast in his palm, and Freyja's protest died on her lips.

For she was curious, despite knowing the danger to her reputation, her heart, her body, despite everything.... Not once had she ever felt such desire for a man. Just a little taste, she told herself. To see what he would do, how it would feel.

Thunder cracked, rattling the iron sheeting on the roof. A drop of icy rain splashed across her face, shocking her. Then Rurik brushed aside the neckline of her dress, his hot mouth capturing her nipple.

There was no more thought of protest. Freyja gasped in shock, throwing her head back as his tongue traced torturous circles around the aching bud. Then his hands were beneath her bottom, hauling her up, moving her legs around his hips. His body nestled between her thighs, the hot surge of his erection brushing against her hip.

Yes. Yes. More.

"Curse you," Rurik breathed, drawing back just a little. One hand thrust against the stable wall behind her for stability, the muscles in his forearm tightening. "I'm trying to go slowly." He laughed, breathless as he nipped at her jaw. "You taste delicious."

Don't stop. Freyja dug her nails into the hard muscle of his shoulders.

"I won't." The rumble came deep from his throat, the sound trailing over her skin. Then his mouth captured hers again and though her mind fought to latch on to something, she couldn't chase the thought down.

Not with his hips thrusting against hers, the rasp of his buttons riding over the sensitive skin of her inner thighs. Not with his tongue pressing into her mouth, practically daring her to meet him back. Not with his hand sliding over the small of her back, and pressing her harder against him.

His erection brushed between her thighs, thick and heavy, and Freyja's eyes shot wide open at the sudden shock of sensation that streaked through her. Outside, lightning flashed, the light searing her eyes as it flickered between the gaps in the timber door. All she could see were bands of light as she shut her eyes, her moan fading against the thunderous wind as Rurik's body rode over hers, again and again, taking her closer to an edge she wanted to throw herself off—

A primal scream filled the air, echoing across her skin and rattling the roof of the stable.

Freyja felt Rurik freeze, his face lifting from hers and his hard body pinning her to the wall. Her heart thundered a ragged vibration in her ears.

“What is it?” she whispered, her hands still clasping his shirt.

He looked at her, eyes drugged and dazed in the low light, his body easing away from her. Wind battered the stables, another piercing war cry shattering the fury of the storm. It reverberated through the village like the call of an enormous horn.

A chill spiraled all the way through her.

She knew that cry.

She could feel the might of the great beast soaring past, its wings thrusting a downwash of wind over the tiny buildings and his power pulling at her.

Rurik shoved away from her, striding toward the door. He cracked it open, rain whipping over his hardened frame and wetting him instantly. Lightning flickered in the streets, too often for it to be natural. It stabbed the ground again and again, as if driven by something beyond the whim of earthly law.

“The dreki,” she whispered, and hurried after him.

Rurik’s body spilled heat through her as he glanced down, lashes wet with rain. “Stay here.”

Her thighs were wet with need, her body still trembling. One kiss, one touch, had shattered her resolve. How lucky for her the dreki had broken the moment, for she had little doubt she would otherwise be lying on her back in one of the stalls right now, with her skirts around her hips and a “Yes” on her lips.

Freyja didn’t know what was more dangerous. The wyrm outside? Or the man watching her with hot need still burning in his golden eyes?

“He won’t hurt me,” she whispered, pressing between him and the door to see. Rain stung her flushed lips, little razors of sensation against her cheeks.

The lightning lit the sky again, revealing the flash of wings over the rooftops. Light gleamed silver over scales. Beautiful. Dangerous. And so compelling she almost stepped out into the rain to see more of him.

Rurik hauled her back against his chest with a hiss, his arms locking over her breasts. “Do you have no sense, woman?”

He muscled her inside with appalling ease, slamming the door shut behind them and leaving her light blind in the darkness. Another primitive scream cut the air above them, and she looked up. Something whipped against the roof and Freyja screamed as Rurik drove her down into the straw, his heated body covering hers. Shards of timber lashed them both, an enormous sheet of iron tumbling where they’d just been standing. The noise ricocheted around the stables. Hanna squealed, and another horse snorted.

Then it finally fell silent.

Freyja trembled, feeling the press of Rurik’s hips against her bottom. His weight shifted as rain drove inside the hole in the roof, and he let her lift her head.

“You’re not hurt?” he asked.

“There... there are two of them,” she whispered.

“Aye.” A grim tone. “Foolish Freyja. Did you not see?”

“See what?”

“You spoke of the golden wyrm beneath Krafla,” he said, looking up with a hard expression darkening his face. “And the one outside was silver.”

Not her dreki. As if he read her face, Rurik’s gaze softened. “Not yours, no.” He levered himself to his feet. “Stay here. And do not come out until I come for you.”

“Where are you going?”

“To see who dares to enter the golden wyrm’s domain,” he replied, in a hard-edged voice.

Chapter 6

Rurik strode through the storm, the rain plastering his shirt to his chest. Spreading his arms wide, he summoned the power to transform, a surge of fury igniting in his chest. How dare these interlopers intrude in his lands? When he'd been banished from the court at Hekla, he'd claimed the north of Iceland, and none dared trespass. The dreki queen insisted Rurik was not to be roused; both out of a sense of wariness for his might, and simply because she knew how much the isolation would cut at him.

Amadea was more serpent than dreki, in some ways.

And this could not be tolerated. He felt his arms lengthen and—

“Where did it go?” a man bellowed.

Rurik froze, power whispering through his veins. He stood on the knife-edge of the shift, the dreki punching inside his ribs as it waited for him to free it.

A hand caught his arm and Rurik suppressed the change as he whirled, his head swaying for a second at the sudden loss of momentum.

“Which way?” Haakon demanded, searching the skies. Raindrops clung to his blond eyelashes, highlighting the arctic blue of his eyes. In them, Rurik could just make out the faint madness of obsession.

A good thing Haakon looked away, for Rurik's face tingled just enough to know he'd not been quite human in that moment.

“There are two of them,” Rurik said, gesturing to the south. “They went that way.”

Toward his home.

Fury caused the vein in his temple to throb. His gold, his lands, his volcano. If they thought for one second he'd tolerate—

“Two?” Haakon met his gaze. “Mother of God.” He crossed himself, then turned for the stables. “I need to get the horses.”

Rurik was seconds away from tearing the dragon hunter's throat out and simply erupting into flight when he caught sight of Freyja, peering through the stable door.

It swayed his intentions as nothing else would.

This was not done between them.

She'd surrendered to his touch, moaning beneath his kiss in a way that made his blood run hotter than lava.

But the second he revealed his hand, her wariness would return and he would lose all chance at claiming her.

Rurik let his power ebb until he could feel the rain stinging his skin once again.

"Have care, Haakon," he said quietly. "You know not what you face."

A twisted plot that threatened to sweep innocents into its midst, for the arrival of two dreki could mean nothing more than war, and he was certain he knew who sent them. Amadea wouldn't care if humans were killed. But he did. There were rules—dreki laws—he abided by, and they were innate to his nature. The queen and her brother cared little for moral restraint, but there were enough dreki still at court who did.

Honor and honesty were vital to dreki nature.

"Perhaps it is the wyrms who don't know what is coming," Haakon growled, swinging up onto his black Friesian when his man brought it out for him. Haakon reined the beast into a tight circle, shooting a look at his men.

Rurik caught the reins. "I doubt that."

The two men stared at each other.

"This is not your fight, scholar," Haakon spat. Tension knotted in his clenched knuckles. "And I will not yield to pleas nor empathy."

"Nor sense, so it seems."

Haakon's lips thinned. "The last time I saw a storm like this was the day I first laid eyes upon my wife. She was lost in the forest, and the clouds brewed like this above me. I swore then I would have her, and I would protect her forever." He tugged the reins free of Rurik's hold. "And I failed her. If the dreki has her, then I will take her back. If he has killed her, then I will have vengeance, pure and bloody. And nothing you say can sway me."

There was one thing Rurik could say, but he did not know enough of the story to speak of what he knew. This was Árdís's secret. Wasn't it?

"Gunnar, get the men ready! We'll lose them if we wait too long!" Haakon yelled over his shoulder.

"What about the ballista?" called the man he'd addressed as Gunnar.

"Leave it." Haakon whirled his horse, but it balked as Rurik's grip tightened on the bridle. "Here, now!"

"You're a fool to leave your machine here," Rurik told him, with strangely glittering eyes. "You face two dreki, and you have not the ability to defend yourself without it. Don't let vengeance blind you. Or all you shall do is see your men dead, and your bones blistered with dreki fire."

Haakon bared his teeth. "Let go of my horse, scholar."

Rurik considered him for a long moment. He let go of the reins, stepping out of Haakon's way.

“Let their deaths be on your head then.”

“Bring the ballista, Gunnar! You can join me at Krafla,” Haakon snapped, and drove his horse into the dying beats of the storm. But he glanced over his shoulder toward his men as he went. “Hyaah!”

“So be it,” Rurik whispered, still full of doubt about whether he had done the right thing. He believed in fate, and no dreki should pit his will against that capricious entity. He had done his best to sway the man.

Let Haakon ride into his destiny. Rurik had other matters to resolve.

These newcomers, these challengers, would find no entry to his lair. He’d sealed it with his power when he left, and there were few still left on this earth who could cut through his magic.

They would know that, which made him wonder just why they were here.

What mad scheme did Amadea plot now?

“You think he won’t return,” Freyja said, as Rurik stared after Haakon. She’d heard their argument, and a part of her knew Rurik’s focus on her had shifted.

Lanterns filled the night, and Haakon’s men tried to hitch his supply wagon to the horses. They’d thrown a tarpaulin over the ballista, but the rain was coming down in steady sheets now.

“Fool.” Or at least that was what she thought Rurik murmured. The wind snatched the word from his mouth as he turned back toward her.

“Why did you warn him?” Freyja asked, wiping the hair from her damp cheeks. She didn’t wish to see that ballista make its way inland. “He’ll kill one of them with that ballista, and I thought you were on the dreki’s side?”

Rurik glanced toward the south darkly. “I have no wish to see that machine pierce any dreki’s hide. But I think without it Haakon will be little more than a delicious morsel to those dreki, and that I do not wish for. There is a debt to be repaid there, and his golden dreki will pay it when he finds her.”

“Her?”

Rurik looked at her sharply. “Krafla’s dreki did not take his wife. There is only one other who wears golden scales, and I think Haakon’s fate leads him toward her.” He shrugged, and she couldn’t help noticing the way his shirt clung wetly to him. “I believe they are... destined to meet again.”

Freyja watched Haakon as he vanished at the edge of the town. “So, you save his death for another?”

“What makes you think death is his fate?”

Freyja frowned. “You’re playing word games with me.”

“Perhaps. You seem awfully insistent upon the fact dreki eat humans.”

“No?” A faint smile touched his lips. “Did your dreki eat you all up, Freyja? Or did it leave you alone? You still haven’t told me the story of your meeting.”

Freyja frowned, and wrapped her arms around her. “It ate my ram. Perhaps its belly was full when I saw it?”

She almost imagined Rurik growled under his breath. “You eat lamb, do you not? Perhaps the dreki likes lamb too? That does not mean it eats people. There are treaties in place to help promote peace between both species. I think the last thing it would do is break the treaty. Besides,” he looked thoughtful, “those foolish, romantic stories had to come from somewhere.”

She threw her hands up in disgust. Virgin tributes, and happily-ever-afters.... They belonged in fairy tales, and nothing else. “You’re as bad as my mother. She too dreamed of forbidden romances. Of dreki walking among us in human form, and seducing stupid girls.”

That faint smile deepened. “Who says they do not?”

“Have you seen one? Has anyone? Not in recent times, if ever. Even though they can change shape, there is always a touch of the dreki still in them. They say their eyes remain lizard-like in appearance, and the sight of the holy cross reveals their true form.”

“And when they say this, are they speaking of dreki or of your devil?” he mused. “It sounds like someone shaped those particular stories.”

Of all the.... “You are a very frustrating man.”

“I would like to believe. That is all. One day I think you will meet a dreki in mortal flesh, and then you will believe too. We all need a little bit of romance in our lives. A little bit of magic. You shouldn’t trust all of the stories, but you should believe some, Freyja. After all, you’ve met Krafla’s dreki. And he is clearly interested in you, if nothing else, from the sounds of your story.”

Freyja snorted, and gathered a handful of her skirts as she headed for the inn. “You’re as big a fool as Haakon is. And I’m going in to bed. This is quite too much excitement for me for one night. Goodnight.”

“Freyja—”

She turned, wind whipping her skirts past her and blowing his hair back off that clean, masculine face. For a second she thought he was about to plunge them straight back into that reckless, passionate moment they’d shared in the stables. A moment when something inside her—something she’d never even encountered before—overruled logic and sense, letting the storm erupt within. Freyja’s heart skipped a beat.

“Would you like to break your fast with me?” he asked, instead.

Freyja hesitated. A part of her still felt that foolish, breathless moment in the stables, and the roughness of his hands on her skin. Heat flooded her cheeks. This man was dangerous. “I’m sorry, but I intend an early start. I need to get home and see to my father.”

Thought raced through his amber eyes, but then he merely smiled and slid his hands into his pockets. “I will bid you adieu then. Until we meet again.”

“I doubt that,” she whispered.

Somehow he heard her. “You should not doubt fate, Freyja. That is like spitting in her eye.”

Freyja shivered, one hand on the inn’s doorknob. She could not escape this mysterious man fast enough. “I don’t believe in fate. I don’t believe in anything I cannot touch with my own hands, or see with my eyes.”

Rurik turned to eye the storm. “Why does that not surprise me?” His smile widened, or the half of it she could see did. “Run, Freyja. You might not believe in fate, but I do. We will meet again. I am certain of it. And when we do....”

He looked back toward her, amber eyes ablaze in the darkness of the storm, and Freyja jerked the door open. That look in his eyes spoke of inevitability, and she had the breathtaking feeling she wanted to run toward it, throw herself off that cliff.

She no longer knew whether she could trust herself. Not when Rurik was involved. For she wanted something only he could give her, and while a part of her yearned, just once, to touch the sun, another part of her remained wary. Perhaps he could teach her what passion felt like, what love felt like, but there was always the risk he might shatter her well-protected heart instead.

And she’d long known what it felt like to have your feet swept out from under her, time and time again.

Freyja ducked inside the inn, shutting the door and pressing her back against it. A rush of exhilaration swept through her veins, and she couldn’t, for the life of her, understand why.

Fate, indeed.

Chapter 7

The small village near Freyja's house bustled with excitement as she drove Hanna past. Dozens of nearby farmers strode about the village green, and the enormous wagon that housed the dragon hunter's ballista loomed nearby. It had beaten her here, and so too had most of Haakon's men. Sweat foamed on their horses' flanks, and she saw one man leading his bay and patting its velvety nostrils as its head hung in exhaustion.

"Shame on you," she muttered. Pushing horses like that so hard on this treacherous terrain would only end in tragedy at some stage. It wasn't as though Haakon could mount an assault on Krafla immediately, so it made little sense to her.

The dragon hunters were clearly distinguishable from the locals; hard men, wearing furs draped across their shoulders and chain mail beneath. Clearly mercenaries Haakon had scraped together, and she had to wonder where, precisely, he'd found them. Especially when one of them shot her a dark leer.

"Mistress Helgasdottir," someone called.

It was tempting to pretend she hadn't heard. She kept her gaze straight ahead, wishing Hanna would move a little faster as a blur of movement shifted in the corner of her vision.

"Freyja!" the voice bellowed.

Curse him. Freyja reluctantly eased Hanna to a halt, just as Benedikt caught hold of her bridle. The young ram in the cage on the back of the wagon bleated in shock.

He wore his finest coat, but after seeing Rurik in all of his glory, it looked a pale imitation. Benedikt was tall, his muscle soft and his face pale and pampered, with round cheeks and a boyish look that did not fade with age. He often reminded her of a petulant child deprived of some toy. The problem was he and his father considered the village and its people to be that toy.

Particularly her.

"What do you think of the news?" Benedikt demanded, his eyes alight. He continued before she had a chance to reply, as usual. "We're going to take back our lands, Freyja. Father and I intend to drive the creature from Krafla. Or kill it."

"Let us be honest," she interrupted, before he could descend into one of his infernal monologues. "You've hired a man to attempt to kill the dreki. I'm not entirely certain whether the cursed dreki will think those dragon hunters a nice little gift to assuage his temper, considering you've been breaking the tithe and owe him several months' work of meat, or whether he will take serious affront at this notion, and burn our village to the ground. There's a reason we bargained with him in the first place."

Benedikt's fleshy lips pursed. He might have been handsome, in a sulky way, if the interior of the man weren't quite so repulsive. "You always see the worst outcome. At least my father and I are doing something about this menace. And I have faith in Haakon and his men." His lip curled in a sneer. "You would too, if you knew what faith meant."

A vague threat. Hanna jerked in her traces, and Freyja took the moment to settle the flighty mare—and her own temper. One of these days....

"Your father thinks it's a good idea," Benedikt continued. "I spoke to him yesterday."

That ignited her temper. She didn't want Benedikt anywhere near her father, where he sought to please with a honeyed tongue and silver lies. Sometimes he laughed at her, knowing her father couldn't see her frustration when Benedikt was playing the charming local son.

"Leave my father out of this. He is not well."

"You coddle him. He's a man, Freyja. Not an invalid for you to siphon away his will."

"The only leech here is the one I'm looking at," Freyja seethed.

"Ah, Mistress Helgasdottir," Haakon called, distracting both of them. He strode across the green. "Have you reconsidered? Are you here to inform us of the layout of the wyrm's lair?"

Benedikt's hand curled around Hanna's bridle, and Hanna winced at the restriction. "You have met my Freyja?" he asked Haakon. "But I assure you she is of little assistance. Nobody enters Krafla and returns unscathed."

"I am not your Freyja," she muttered.

"That's not precisely my understanding," Haakon countered, ignoring her words, and Freyja suddenly found herself the recipient of a pair of stares—one cool and considering, and one dark with thwarted rage. "I met Mistress Helgasdottir in Akureyri, where she was concluding some business. She claimed to have entered the dragon's lair."

Benedikt shot her a shocked look. "You entered Krafla?"

Freyja rolled her eyes. "Let go of the harness. And yes, I entered the dreki's lair. He stole my ram and ate it, thanks to your cursed meddling."

"Why did you not tell me?"

Hanna jerked her harness out of his grip, startled by Benedikt's tone, and Freyja collected her calmly. "Because it had little to do with you."

"Everything around here has to do with me," he snapped. "Or my father."

"So some would think."

They glared at each other. Benedikt cursed under his breath, and backed away. "One day you're going to regret the way you speak to me."

As he turned and stalked across the grass, she pursed her lips. One day she was going to spear him with a stab of lightning and watch his boots smolder, and feel nothing but satisfaction.

As if the sky heard her, a distant rumble of thunder shook the horizon.

Haakon patted Hanna's flank, his lips quirking in an almost smile. "I see your winning touch extends to the gentlemen of your village, mistress."

"I see no gentlemen here."

"Touché." He didn't bother to plead his innocence. "There's been no sign of the two dragons."

"Dreki," she corrected, almost absently, and for a second she heard Rurik's voice in her mind.

"Perhaps they flew south, over the glaciers? There's nothing for them here."

"Nothing but death and carnage."

She didn't like the way that sounded. "The dreki is dangerous and powerful, but he causes us little grief, Haakon. If you do this, you might only stir his rage. There are people here who cannot fight against that."

"I don't intend to fail," he replied. "And you seem rather sympathetic toward a monster."

"Maybe I know what is like to be an outcast," she murmured. "All he wants is something to eat once a week. He's never caused us any other trouble. I see no monster there."

"Not everyone feels that way. Tell me, what was it like?"

"He was curious, more than anything. And he laughed at me, as though he considered me little threat. I don't think he ever intended to truly hurt me. But he could if he so chose." Freyja shivered, recalling the enormous teeth and the impenetrable scales. "He looked like he was covered in gilded armor, and the weight of his power nearly crushed my lungs...."

"I have iron and steel, Freyja. I will pierce his hide."

She shivered at the tone of inevitability in his voice. "Then we are done here. I will not help you, nor will I accept any blame for your deaths because I refuse to aid you. You've been warned, and you will not accept that." She gathered up Hanna's reins, easing the mare away from him. "I hope it is worth it, when the dreki is picking his teeth with your bones. Come, Hanna." She cracked the reins on the mare's shaggy hide.

Hanna leapt forward, and Haakon stepped out of the way.

"Be careful, Mistress Helgasdottir," Haakon called, patting Hanna's shaggy flank with a parting pat. "One might suspect your sympathies lie with the wrong party here."

A shiver ran down her spine. She didn't think Haakon would hurt her, but then she'd thought the same about Benedikt when they were younger and he'd first set his sights on her. It was only once she'd said no the ugly side of his nature emerged.

I am not without my defenses, she told herself again as she drove off.

Even if her powers set her apart and left her standing in a world alone, at least she could never be forced into something she didn't want.

The first sign something was not right at her home started when she saw all of the ewes huddled in their stone pen together, big eyes wide with fright. The bleating set her nerves on edge, but she couldn't see anything to cause such distress.

Leading Hanna up the lane, Freyja frowned. "What has my ladies in such a dither?" She couldn't resist scanning the skies. Evening fell like a curtain of inky shadows from the east, with paler golden tones lingering in the west where the sun took its time to descend. A few stars sparkled in the night sky.

But no dreki.

A shiver ran through her as she put her new ram and Hanna away, tending the sweet mare and slipping her a slice of dried apple she carried in her pocket. She had the same feeling in her stomach that she'd felt in Akureyri when she bid adieu to Rurik.

Fate, he whispered in her memories.

"Foolishness," Freyja muttered, and shut the stable door behind Hanna.

Wrapping her shawl around her shoulders, she scurried toward her father's house with her basket of goods. Night had finally vanquished day, but light glared from the kitchen window and the small sitting room next to it. What was her father thinking? They barely had enough kerosene to spare, and she hoarded it like the dreki in Krafla protected his gold.

"Father?" she called, pulling the door shut behind her and dragging her shawl off her shoulders. The heat inside the house enveloped her like a warm cloud. Good grief, he had the fire blazing as well. The dwindling woodpile in the corner of the kitchen looked alarmingly low. "Father, where are you?"

"Through here, Freyja," he called from the sitting room, and her heart skittered a beat at how well he sounded.

Thank goodness. Freyja squeezed her eyes shut, then let out the breath she'd been holding. Leaving him alone for a time was always a worry.

"Have you had dinner?" She could smell the lamb stew she'd left in the cool room simmering in a pot on the stove. "I've bought fresh bread all the way from Akureyri, and a wheel of cheese."

"Ah, leave all that!" her father called, "and come in here. I have a guest who is waiting to meet you."

Freyja set her basket of produce on the table, and crept toward the sitting room. Who would be visiting them out here? Benedikt and his father were in the village, as well as Haakon and his men. There were few others who would willingly step foot in her household, even with the iron horseshoe nailed upside down over the lintel.

"A guest?"

The chair creaked as her father levered out of it, and she caught sight of his shadow on the wall. Another shape shifted beside it, a tall man sitting in the armchair by the window, by the look of it.

Freyja stopped dead as she entered the room. "Rurik?"

What was he doing here?

Rurik sprawled in her father's second-favorite armchair, balancing an old chipped teacup in his hands with feigned nonchalance. Everything about his posture screamed he intended to pose no threat, but his eyes flared amber the second he saw her, and everything in her body screamed at her to run.

"Mistress Freyja," he purred. "I was just telling your father here about our meeting in Akureyri. He has some interesting stories about dreki, which I am collecting for my book, if you remember?"

Book? He hadn't said a blasted thing about a book.

"What are you really doing here?" she mouthed.

"Freyja!" Her father looked up from the small platter of honey cakes he'd been destroying. Those filmy eyes turned vaguely in her direction, and he smiled.

He looked well.

Freyja scurried to his side, pressing a kiss to his brow in a surreptitious way to measure his temperature. "Where did you get the cake from?"

"Master Rurik bought it in the village as a gift." Her father hugged her. "He intends to do some research in this area, and someone directed him to my door." Pride swelled his chest. "He wants to learn about the local dreki, and I know all of your mother's stories. I offered her books to him, and offered him board for a few weeks."

Weeks?

"You shouldn't have," she murmured to Rurik, embarrassed he'd noticed their poor plight enough to bring a gift of food with him. The little house no doubt looked like a hovel in his eyes, with its thatch of grassed roof, and the bare necessities were all that remained of their furniture. The house was spotless, and the furniture gleamed with beeswax she'd lovingly rubbed into it, but she'd been forced to sell pieces of it over the years, and empty spaces gaped where stuffed chairs had once stood. Even her mother's precious books had thinned out over the years as one catastrophe after another—their crops failing, or the fence breaking and precious lambs going missing—had struck their little farmstead. She'd never even told her father she'd sold some of them, and he'd clearly not noticed.

It would have broken his heart.

"We don't have a spare room," she told him bluntly.

Her father sucked in a sharp breath. "Freyja—"

"That's quite all right," Rurik replied, lazy-lidded in front of the fireplace. He looked like he was soaking up the heat of the flames. "It wouldn't be right for me to share a roof with a young unmarried woman anyway. So I bargained with your father for room in your stables. I can pay good coin."

In the stables.... For a moment she almost felt guilty. But then he gave her that faint smile that rubbed all her hairs the wrong way, and guilt evaporated.

"Freyja will see you to the stables," her father agreed amiably, leaving her with little recourse. "Won't you, Freyja?"

She'd see him to the door, in any case. Freyja jerked her head at Rurik as he stood, and then tried to paste a smile on her face for her father. "I certainly shall."

After all, she couldn't say what she really wanted to say with her father in the room, could she?

"What are you doing here?" Freyja whispered harshly, the second they were inside in the barn. "And don't feed me that lie about a book."

"Who says it was a lie? I am considering writing a book. There are too many wrong stories about dreki in circulation."

She ground her teeth together. "I'm not an idiot. And I detest it when men think they are smarter than I am, and try to smugly protest otherwise. If you continue to pretend you have not a single ulterior motive in being here, at my home, when last I saw you was many miles to the north, then I will be done with you."

Rurik paused, assessing her face.

"Why are you here?" she demanded. "Truly?"

"You're right. I didn't come here for a book. I came here for you. Fate, Freyja." He stepped forward, touching her cheek. "That's why I'm here." His breath warmed her lips as he loomed closer, and her heart gave a kick behind her ribs as he smiled at her. "Our destiny is incomplete."

Rurik's fingers tucked a strand of hair behind her ear. Freyja froze. She'd thought what happened between them at Akureyri was simply a result of the storm pounding through her veins, igniting the passionate fury in her blood. But the second his touch landed on her skin, her blood seemed to fire again, and a shiver ran through her. A distant storm, but one that could be stoked with but a few simple touches.

"Oh no, you don't," she muttered, ducking beneath his arm and whirling in a storm of skirts.

The damned man simply stood there with a smile, crossing his arms over his chest.

His rather impressive chest.

Freyja growled under her breath, pressing her fingers to her temples. She didn't want to examine her anger too closely, just in case it wasn't entirely anger. Fluster might come closer. "You have your head in the clouds. Fate and destiny... what a jest. You're no better than any skirt-chasing scoundrel, though your words might be prettier. My mother would have liked you."

"You like me," he pointed out. "Or else you would have thrown me out the second you saw me inside."

"I didn't wish to cause a scene in front of my father," she retorted. "That's the only reason you're still here. He believes in guest right still, and expects me to uphold it."

Rurik's biceps flexed. "You are a most vexatious female. Why can you not admit you want me here?"

She refused to look at his bulging biceps. Simply refused. “My mother taught me never to utter a lie.”

Slowly he prowled around her. “You liked my kiss. You begged me for more, and curled your fists in my hair. I do not understand what you find so distasteful about the idea. You wanted me. You still want me.”

Every word drove straight through her abdomen, bringing little hammer-flashes of memory with it; the dance of raindrops on the roof; the feel of that hard body driving her into the wall; the lush stroke of his tongue against hers. “I often want things that are bad for me—ginger cakes, ale, books I cannot afford.... It doesn’t mean I give in to the feeling.”

He took a step toward her.

She took one back.

Rurik froze.

“Perhaps I enjoyed your kiss, but that doesn’t mean I will lie with you.” She could see from his expression he did not understand. But then, he wasn’t the one who might risk being left behind with a bastard child and a ruined reputation—what little there was left of it. “You’re persistent, I shall give you that, but all men want the same thing.”

“Your heart?” he challenged.

“A swift tumble in the hay.”

“I am not all men,” he replied. The shadows around him seemed to lengthen. “And you know little of what I want, Freyja. The second I saw you, I wanted to possess you—body and soul.”

“You’re being ridiculous. All these words—”

“I am bound by every word I utter,” he told her, and this time when he stepped toward her, she let him.

Treacherous heart, beating swiftly in her chest. Unfaithful body, wet with anticipation, and trembling with desire. Freyja swallowed hard and shut her eyes. All she had was her faltering will. Her steadfast nature.

“When have I ever lied to you?” Rurik whispered, as though sensing her hesitation. His fingertips skated over her cheeks again.

This time she let him.

This time her shoulders sank and she finally lifted her eyelashes to look him in the face. Some part of her wanted to believe him, to lift her mouth to his and offer herself up to him. But the warier part of her, the part that remembered Benedikt’s subtle viciousness, stayed her hand. “Why me?”

“Oh, precious Freyja.” His breath shivered over her skin. Rurik cupped her face, callused thumbs stroking gently against her cheeks. “You are a fascinating contradiction. Barely afraid of me when you should be, but frightened of me when I am at my least dangerous. Every second I see that flash of fire in your eyes ignites something within me I have not felt for a long, long time. Your very contrariness captures me, your intelligence, your fierceness... and the gentle nature that hides within. Shall I go on?”

“You see this as a challenge.” And she knew men played to win. “That is all.”

“The fact you challenge me is part of the attraction,” he breathed. “I’ll concede that point. What man or woman does not care to be challenged within a relationship? If you agreed with me all the time or kissed my shoes, then you would be quite uninteresting.”

“I will never kiss your shoes.” The very idea offended her.

A slow smile spread over his lips. “I know.”

“I will rarely agree with you.”

“Even better.”

“I am stubborn, and angry, and not very good at conversation,” she said, giving in to exasperation. “I am not beautiful—”

“There you are wrong.” He cupped her cheeks in both hands and tilted her face to his. “Every inch of your skin pleases me. Every time our eyes meet, I want to consume you. You have lightning in your veins, precious Freyja. And when you kiss me it feels as though I can taste that lightning too. There is something between us that cannot be denied.”

“Fate,” Freyja whispered. She still didn’t believe in the word, but there was... something there. In that he spoke the truth.

Her heart kicked a little faster behind her ribs, the treacherous organ. There was a part of her that knew he was going to kiss her again, and this time she didn’t think she’d push him away. Even just the rasp of his thumb against her jaw felt so good, a renegade pleasure she could barely admit to.

Just who was she lying to? Him? Or herself?

“I don’t know if I believe you,” she admitted.

“Then set me a challenge. How shall I prove my intentions are true? How shall I win the heart of fair maiden?”

He was mocking her.

“Give me my heart’s greatest desire,” she shot back, dashing his hands from her face and darting for the door, “and I shall give you my heart.”

Rurik stilled. It felt almost as if an enormous tail lashed behind him suddenly, like a cat about to pounce, and then he smiled. “So be it.”

Chapter 8

Discovering her heart's greatest desire was proving to be more vexatious than Rurik had thought.

The next two days passed with little sight of her. Freyja was adept at maneuvering on silent feet, and spent countless hours tending to her home, or to the flock of animals that relied upon her. Every time he found her he was either handed a broom or a shovel and told to earn his keep, or several dozen bleating sheep rousing into a sudden panic sent him fleeing before Freyja could question their terror. Rurik himself was forced to keep an eye on the skies. There'd been no sign of the other dreki in the area when he arrived, but he knew they were out there somewhere. He strengthened the wards on his lair, watched curiously as Haakon led fruitless expeditions around the volcano, then subsided at Freyja's to wait the other dreki out.

Two could play at this game.

And he was patient, for a dreki.

Or at least, he thought he was, until he encountered the might of Freyja's will.

It didn't help matters her father, Einar, insisted on sitting with him for hours, inadvertently playing the part of chaperone.

"You're distracted," her father said one afternoon, as they sat over the small chessboard he'd dusted off and brought out. The little fox that lived with them sat on the side of the armchair, his dark amber eyes unblinking. Loki knew what he was, and when he realized Rurik watched him, he bared his teeth in a faint growl.

Fair enough. The little beast was only trying to protect his household. At least he didn't run and bleat like Freyja's sheep did whenever they saw him.

Rurik eyed the spread of ivory pieces. He enjoyed this game, and the old man had clever wits, despite his blindness. "I was thinking of the dragon hunters in the village. They seem to be making little progress."

"Is that why you watch the window so often?"

Caught. "No. I'm watching for your daughter. She is doing her best to avoid me." He didn't ask how the man had known. Einar seemed attuned to each rustle of cloth, and all of his other senses were exceptionally good.

“Ah.” Einar coughed faintly into the stained handkerchief in his fist, then reached for his knight. His hand quivered. “You have an interest in Freyja.”

The stale scent of encroaching death emanated from the old man. Rurik stilled. “She is intriguing,” he admitted. “She is beautiful, and clever, and stubborn, and utterly relentless.”

“I need not remind you your intentions had best be pure? I might be old and blind, but I can still be a force to be reckoned with when it comes to the daughter I love.”

Rurik respected the old man’s position, though he could swat him like a fly if he wished. “You can remind me, but Freyja has already lain down her rules. You might be a force to be reckoned with, but she is a force of nature.”

The old man chuckled, a sound that slowed, then died with a faint hush. “Aye, she’s proud and wary.” He scratched at his jaw, clearly upset by some thought. “It bothers me to see her so long unmarried. My health fades with each winter. I... I worry....”

Rurik surveyed the board, then moved his bishop and told the man what he’d done. “Freyja can survive without you, I assure you of that. She is independent and strong enough to rule her own life.”

“I know,” Einar replied. “But she has always been so isolated. You’ve seen her eyes?”

“They are beautiful eyes.”

“Some claim they are sure sign of a witch.”

“Unfortunately, others don’t share your lack of qualms.” Einar looked troubled. “I always sought to spare her from their censure, and so Helga and I kept her close, and rarely invited strangers to the house. Or even guests. Maybe that was a m-mistake—” He broke into another hacking fit of coughs.

Rurik fetched the old man a glass of water. “Here,” he offered, sending a thin tendril of his power through his fingertips to energize the old man.

“My thanks.” Einar slurped the water down, and settled back in his chair, but at least his skin bore some faint signs of color now.

“Has she never had a suitor before?” he asked, as he waited for the old man to recover.

“I keep pushing her toward that Benedikt boy,” Einar admitted, “but she will have none of him.”

Every hint of the predator within him arose at the name. Benedikt. He was the man who threatened Freyja. Rurik’s voice turned silky. “He is local?”

“His father owns half the village.” Einar coughed again. “He’s not the sort of lad I’d normally choose for Freyja, but....”

He was the only man who showed interest in her. If only Einar understood what sort of interest Benedikt showed....

Not for him to mention. No. Rurik had other ways of confronting his rival. Still, he couldn’t say nothing, “Sometimes it is better to live alone, than to wed someone unsuitable.”

“Unless someone else who is suitable comes along?” Einar suggested unsubtly, his hand hovering over his rook. He moved it. “I believe that is check.”

So it was. Rurik frowned. It was the first time the other man had beat him.

“Your attention has been elsewhere,” Einar mused, even as the door to the kitchen creaked faintly.

Rurik was suddenly all senses. There was a light footstep in the kitchen. Then another.

“And now you are distracted again.” Einar chuckled, clearly hearing Freyja’s entrance too. “Go,” he said, waving toward the kitchen. “You have my best wishes. I can tell she likes you.”

“I am not so certain of that. But we’ll continue our game later,” Rurik replied, pushing to his feet and moving after his fascinating adversary.

He had to move quickly. He could hear Freyja heading for the door again. The swing of her golden plait came into view, and Freyja snagged her shawl, reaching for the door handle with one guilty glance cast over her shoulder—

“Where are you going?” he demanded.

Freyja paused in the shadows of the kitchen doorway, her shawl in her hand. “For a walk.”

Lie. It ignited every single one of his senses. “May I come with you?”

“It is rather boring,” she said quickly, and he knew she was up to something. “You will not enjoy it. Muddy, smelly... I daresay it will ruin your boots.”

He was inclined to argue, but merely smiled. “Not my boots. Whatever would I do?”

Freyja shot him a narrow-eyed look, as if she couldn’t quite work out whether he was being sarcastic or not. She tucked the shawl over her honey-colored hair, then headed for the door. “I shall be back later.”

“I can hardly wait.”

That earned him one last twitch of the brow, before she vanished.

Troublesome female. If he were in his dreki form right now, his tail would be lashing. But then, if she thought to dissuade him from the chase, she thought wrong. Nothing stirred his interest more than a woman who refused to fall at his feet. And there was no reason for her to lie to him about where she was going, unless....

Rurik waited for all of two minutes, realizing Loki had followed him and watched from the corner of the cupboard, like some small chaperone.

“I am not going to hurt her, little brother,” he told the fox.

Those amber eyes narrowed.

Rurik reined in his predatory impulses, and headed out into the yard to see if his suspicions were correct.

That small light-footed figure headed out across the moors, her green shawl wrapped around her shoulders as she made her way directly toward the smoking volcano in the distance.

Easy enough to guess where she was going. What he didn’t know was why, or what she was up to.

His blood was up. Perhaps she was wary of Rurik the man, but she seemed to have reached a truce in her mind with the dreki.

It seemed she would be meeting him sooner, rather than later.

Rurik paced along the stone fence that housed her sheep. They bleated and scurried out of his path, pressing in a frightened huddle against the far wall. Freyja might not recognize him in this form, but all of her animals did.

He sighed. “I’m not going to eat any of you,” he pointed out. “She’s barely forgiven me for the ram.”

He’d never live it down if he sampled another of her delicious morsels.

His stomach chose that moment to growl. The bleating grew louder. Rurik bared his teeth at them, and then stomped around the corner of the stables. Idiot sheep. And frustrating shepherdess.

He’d given her more than enough time for a decent head start.

And the dreki itched within him, wanting to taste the wind on its face.

Plus there were his boots to think of...

Rurik glided across the skies, his shadow rippling over the tiny figure far below that trudged determinedly across the glacial moors. He felt utterly relaxed in his natural form, as though he’d been contained in a form far too small for him for too long.

Wind whipped beneath his wings and he soared on the thermals, delighting in the warmth of the sunlight on his scales.

Not a sign of another dreki anywhere. He’d made careful forays over the past few nights, but there’d been no hint of them. Which suggested they’d taken to ground....

Where though? What was their game?

And who had his mother sent to challenge him?

Silver scales. That bothered him, because while the color was popular among his clan, there was one particular dreki who gleamed silver, and his mother knew Andri would be a weakness of his. A part of him hoped she hadn’t sent his younger cousin on this mission, even as he knew better. Of course Amadea would exploit any weakness.

As for the bigger dreki, he hadn’t gotten a good look, but thought he’d caught a glimpse of a dark shape. Darker dreki were more common than the lighter or jewel-tinted shades, and the bigger dreki could have been any one of his uncle’s warriors.

He couldn’t scent them around his territory. No, they’d glided on elsewhere, though he knew the foray into his domain could not been accidental. Every dreki male at court knew the territory lines. When a simple incursion might mean war and a battle to the death, it wasn’t the sort of thing dreki were careless with. Which meant they’d been looking for something—some mischief—and it bothered him he could not figure it out.

was a terrible time to be seducing an obstinate woman, but he couldn't deny that he was enjoying the pursuit more than he'd imagined. Rurik banked with care, and alighted on the ledge outside the entrance to his cave.

Just what, precisely, did Freyja value most? Freedom? Gold? A crown, perhaps? A rich manor where she did not have to work all day merely to put food on the table? No. He didn't think so. She seemed to enjoy the work, speaking with fondness to the creatures that inhabited her small farmstead. It was only when he was around that her tone became more careful.

Rurik tapped his claws on the stone, one after the other, as he sunned himself. Her challenge presented an intriguing mystery.

"You are early." He sent the thought to her just as she locked eyes with him. "You are not due for another three weeks."

Freyja hauled herself up the last stone climb, her dark blonde hair glowing like spun gold in the sunlight. "I know."

"Why are you here then?" He stretched, and decided to tease her a little. "Have you bought me dinner?"

A scowl met the words. "You're big enough and scary enough to fetch your own dinner."

"Yes. But they frown upon that here. Something about rams and ownership, and tithes and not taking what is due to a creature of my magnificence...."

Definitely a scowl. "You think you are amusing."

"I think you are up to something. Why else would you be here, hmm?"

Freyja looked away, the wind snagging strands of her blonde hair and tugging it free from her tight braid. He'd love to see all of that hair unbound. It was her true wealth. She stared over the valley below them, and he realized she was focusing on her village.

"I came to warn you," she said at last. "Some of the villagers have pooled their money and hired a dragon hunter to rid themselves of you. Others don't wish such a thing."

He rested his chin on his claws, watching her sleepily. "I know."

Those mismatched eyes widened. "What? How?"

"I am not stupid, little mouse." Rurik snorted. "What sort of dreki would I be, if I let your puny villagers thwart me?"

Freyja's lips thinned. "They will not seem so puny and insignificant when they bring that ballista up here and spear you with it."

"I should like to see them haul their machines up through the boggy moors and along the cliff path. It should prove amusing. I might even drop a rock on it. Or perhaps I will merely pinwheel through the sky above them? I've seen the aim on that thing. The dragons they've hunted must stand very still for them." Rurik spread his wings with a flap, enjoying the warmth on them. Freyja gasped and staggered, her back plastered to the sheer cliff face. He paused, realizing he'd startled her, and slowly curled his wings up against his sides. "You won't fall."

Freyja eyed the drop carefully. "You're not the one who was nearly blown off this ledge."

"And if you did lose your footing, I would catch you," he continued. "I am not done with you yet."

This statement earned him a narrow glare. "Saying such things does not ease my nerves one whit. What do you intend to do with me?"

"I intend to hear your words," he replied. "I am interested in conversation. One rarely finds humans brave enough to come into my den, especially those who have no designs for my gold."

"A dreki who wants only to talk?" she countered. "I've never heard of such a thing."

"Surely you have heard the old tales?"

A snort. "Yes, I've heard the old tales. All of them. Including the ones where a capricious traveler ended up in a dreki's belly."

"I have no intentions of causing you harm," he replied. "Dreki's oath on that. I am merely curious about you. Most of your neighbors are fools. How did such a curious female come about, when most of the village flees at the sight of my shadow?"

Freyja eyed him. There was wariness there still, but also a certain sort of interest. As if, so starved for company and derided by humans, she could overlook the fact he was dreki.

"Stay," he cajoled. "Talk with me."

"Talk of what?" Freyja demanded, but the light in her eyes was back, her fear fading. Indeed, her tone had changed and she sounded more certain of herself when he was in this form.

Because you're no longer a threat to her as a dreki. Only as a man.

Which meant someone else had been that threat.

The thought made all sorts of possessive, violent male impulses whirl within him. Rurik contained it. He already knew he felt protective toward her, but the idea someone else had hurt her stirred the heart of the dreki spirit within him.

"Yourself. Tell me why Freyja Helgasdottir is no fool."

Freyja gathered her skirts primly, and settled on a jutting rock. The look she gave him was faintly cunning. "And what will you give me if I do?"

Oho. Delight ran rampant through his veins. "For all your talk, you have heard stories of dreki."

"Bargain with them at your own risk," Freyja replied. "Keep your wits at all moments. And never, ever offer a truth for free, for they are curious creatures and cannot deny their interest. Next to their mortal form, their curiosity is their second major weakness. My mother told me many stories."

All of it was true. "Did she also tell you a dreki's second greatest strength is their patience?"

"No." Freyja looked interested. "What is their greatest strength?"

"Now that is a secret."

"And if I'm counting correctly, you owe me one." Was that a smile that played around her stubborn lips?

"Perhaps. What do you want in exchange for your story? More gold?" He didn't know how he felt about that. His gold was his gold. But would it be worth it, to learn the heart of Freyja?

Yes. And not simply because he was failing in his efforts of seduction.

He wanted to know her. She would be his lover—that was a foregone conclusion in his mind—but the fascination for him extended beyond the physical.

“A truth for a truth,” she told him.

Which was potentially dangerous. His eyes narrowed. Denial here could cost him any chance at bridging the chasm she’d set between them. “A truth for a truth. So be it.”

Freyja held up a finger. “And not a random truth, but you must answer a question I propose.”

“What if I do not care to answer it?”

“Then I may feel free to ask another question,” she countered. “Out of three questions, you must answer one.”

Trouble. But damned if he did not wish to play this game with her. His dreki nature loved the challenge. “Agreed. Now answer my question. Why is Freyja not afraid of me? Why did she dare confront me in my lair, when others would quail?”

“You can see my eyes, no?”

“Such wondrous eyes.”

Her smile stilled, but didn’t entirely die as she gazed at her lap. “They call me elf-cursed,” she admitted slowly, as if the weight of this secret weighed upon her somehow. “Or think I make deals with the devil. When I was a little girl, a priest came to our village, where my father was selling geese in the marketplace. I was playing and happened to look up, and the priest reared away from me and made a sign of the cross. He was horrified, and it scared me. It was the first time I ever realized I was different.

“I don’t fit in to my world, not very well. So perhaps that is the reason I am not scared of you, nor believe in provoking you. Because you are different and so am I, and maybe I understand what that feels like.”

“You make no mention of magic.”

Another of those slow, careful glances she was known for. “Is that another question?”

“Perhaps it is merely a challenge. For you gave half an answer. You know you have power, and that made you fearless when you came to confront me.”

“I was scared,” she admitted.

“Mostly I was angry. And hopeless.” She threw the smooth rock she’d been toying with. “There is a point one sometimes reaches that is beyond endurance, and I reached it the night you stole my ram. You are big and scary, and could have killed me. But a part of me simply didn’t care.”

He fell into those eyes. Freyja had such depths to her he wondered if he’d ever see the entirety of them. “Now that tastes more like truth. A full truth.”

Freyja sucked in a sharp breath, as if uncomfortable. “Which means it is time for my question.”

“Proceed.”

She frowned. “I intend to, but first I have to think of... the question that makes me most curious. I don’t want to waste my chance.”

Rurik laughed, a rumbling purr deep in his throat. “So very female. Rest assured I have more questions for you. This doesn’t end with one.”

“Oh.” That little knot between her brows furrowed and she dragged her knees up to her chest, her skirts falling around her ankles. “Can you change shape?”

The one question he’d been dreading. “What is wrong with this shape?”

“Nothing.”

“Yes,” he conceded, scratching his head against a rock. “I can change forms. It is part of the goddess’s gift to us. But why would I? Humans are fools. They smell. And most of them are like brainless sheep. Then there are men here who wish to kill me, and I am slightly more vulnerable in human form—”

“More vulnerable?” she broke in. “I thought it was one of a dreki’s greatest weaknesses—the only time you can be easily killed.”

“Easily is a matter of opinion,” he growled. “I am powerful beyond your comprehension, and my magic is available no matter what form I wear.”

“How often have you changed forms?”

He dipped a wing—the human equivalent of a shrug. “That is like asking me, how many times have I eaten? I do not count such things. Often enough when I was younger, because I was curious, but not very often since. There is little reason to do so.”

“Have you ever seduced a human woman?”

“No.” Not yet, anyway. “And,” he forestalled her, “you now owe me three answers, for you asked four questions and I answered all of them.”

Freyja frowned. “You answered with some questions.”

“But they were rhetorical, were they not?”

If he could smile, he would have, for she looked utterly captivating with frustration written all across her face. “I do not think that is entirely fair, but I’ll allow it.”

“How kind of you.” Turnabout was fair play. His eyes narrowed. “What type of creature are you? For it is clear you are not human.”

“Of course I am human,” she shot back, opening her arms wide. “Do I not look human?”

“You look human,” he admitted. “You smell human, though you smell better than most of them. But you are not human. They have no powers, nor magic, unless it is god-given, and you do not bear the stamp of any gods.”

“You can sense that?”

“I once met a man in Norway,” he admitted. “He used to chew berries and send himself into a trance, where he could communicate with his god. The strain showed on his aura, and I was... wary of crossing him. He smelled wrong.”

“That is a very old practice.”

“It is. But then, I encountered it when I was in my youth.”

“How old are you?”

“Hundreds of years,” he replied, with a faint shrug of his wing. “Dreki think in terms of cycles, not years, so I am not entirely certain. I am in my tenth cycle, however. How old are you?”

“Four-and-twenty.”

“Where does your power come from?”

She paused.

“Did you think I had forgotten?”

“No.” Freyja’s lips twisted. “It’s just... I don’t know where it comes from.”

Lie. It seared along his magic nerves, making him hiss.

“That’s not the truth—”

But Freyja wasn’t looking at him. Her gaze settled on a point behind him, her lips parting with a faint O.

Rurik craned his neck. And there, pinwheeling above the glaciers to the south, was the smaller silver dragon he’d sighted that night in Akureyri.

On the edges of his territory, practically daring him to retaliate.

“Go home,” he growled to her, his claws digging into the rocks as he drew himself to his full height.

“Wait!” Freyja called.

But Rurik wasn’t listening. Instead, he danced along the edge of the path, careful of her frail mortal body, and launched himself into the air with a powerful thrust of his wings.

“Go home, little mouse, while I take care of this visitor.”

“Be careful!” she called.

“Always,” he sent back. “After all, you still owe me the answer to that question.”

It had to be a trap.

He knew this, and yet he went anyway, because to ignore intruders in his territory went against dreki nature. His. This land was his. Bought and bargained for with blood and death, and he could no sooner allow this transgression than he could roll over and submit.

Screeching a battle cry, Rurik roared through the skies. The power of the land shivered through him, until it felt like he’d captured the power of a storm, bottled lightning in his belly.

Ahead of him, the silver dreki spun, his wings stiff as he banked. There was the flash of a paler belly, and claw marks across the dreki’s cheek, and then he withdrew in a dive that sent him fleeing.

All of his earlier suspicions bore fruit. Of course his mother and uncle would send the kit he’d once considered a younger brother.

Rurik beat his wings as he dove after his younger cousin. Andri had been on the verge of adulthood, almost two cycles old, when Rurik left in exile. Now he was a dreki grown, though not quite as large as he himself was. A young warrior who would bear the mark of his father’s temper on his face forever.

“Go home,” he told his smaller cousin. “And I shall forget this trespass.”

Andri hissed at him as Rurik fell in beside him. The smaller dreki was fast, but Rurik’s strength and skill meant Andri would never lose him. “My father sends his regards.”

“His regards? Or his son as a sacrifice?” Rurik spiraled in a slow circle around the other dreki. Together they began a dangerous dance. Airborne battles were brutal, and a fall could shatter wings and bones, but he’d been primed for this fight since the day he was born. “Is Stellan so careless with his sons he would send one into a fight that is not his own?”

Andri refused to comment. And Rurik began to grow suspicious. Was Andri here on his father’s terms—or did some part of the youth want to reach out to one he’d once trusted?

“I won’t kill you,” Rurik told his former squire, making a decision. “Unlike others, I made an oath to protect you and I intend to keep it. You shouldn’t be here. This is not your fight.”

“I have a duty to fulfill,” his cousin replied.

“If you come against me and I am forced to protect myself, I’ll knock you from the skies, but I won’t kill you,” Rurik warned.

Andri soared high over Krafla. “You’re a fool then. You’re my clan’s enemy.”

“You’re my cousin,” he shot back, “And you were always mine, more than you were ever Stellan’s. You’re the one good thing he ever created, and you have more honor in you than any of your nestlings.”

Andri broke the thought-thread between them, veering away. Rurik ignored his distress and went after him. There were only two reasons Andri could have sought him out today. Either the youth meant to lure him into a trap, or his guilt had driven him to make contact.

“And where’s the other dreki?” Rurik caught up to his squire swiftly. “Who did your father send? Vargur? Grimold? Magnus? T—”

A shock of connection betrayed Andri’s thoughts, and made Rurik’s heart thud in his chest. “Magnus,” he repeated. “Of course he sent his heir.”

He and Magnus were of an age. Kits raised together, but never friends. Never allies.

Magnus was everything Stellan hoped to produce. A dreki with a heart as black as his hide. When Stellan and Amadea married into Iceland’s Zini clan, they’d brought all of their Norwegian clan’s prejudices with them. The intermarriage was meant to be a treaty between the Zini and Zilittu clans to broker peace, but all of Stellan’s sons—bar Andri—thought of themselves more as Zilittu than Zini.

And with Amadea sitting on the throne her husband, Reynar, once owned, it seemed the treaty had been more of a long-seeded plot than an honest reconciliation.

As Amadea and Reynar's eldest son, Rurik was the only dreki who could thwart their ambitions to rule both clans. His brother, Marduk, was too young to be a threat, and though Marduk was considered an adult, he wouldn't have the strength to combat Magnus. Would he?

"Tell your brother I accept his challenge," Rurik said slowly, thinking of his brother. Magnus would want his path to the throne to be unhindered, regardless of whether or not Marduk could ever actually beat him. Then there was Andri... "We can settle this between us. You don't have to be involved."

"He's not offering challenge."

Of course not. Magnus would consider himself the strongest male now, and hence the rightful heir, which meant Rurik was the one who had to offer. And he would let his cold dead body sink into the seas before he ever condescended to those who'd plotted against his father, then blamed Rurik for the king's death.

"Even if you offered, he would not accept it," Andri said quickly.

So this was not to be an honorable duel. "Why are you here then? Does your brother know where you are?"

"I wanted to warn you," Andri said, after a long hesitation. "And no, he doesn't."

There was the hint of his old squire: Andri, whose sense of honor would forbid an ambush.

"I knew you were here," he replied. "But thank you. I had hoped they hadn't corrupted you completely."

The skies gleamed blue around them as Andri broke the mental connection between them. Even so, Rurik caught the faint mournful taint of the younger dreki's emotions. This could not be easy for the youth. He'd followed Rurik around the court as a kit, like an enamored lass. The day Rurik took Andri as his squire had been the most joyful either of them shared.

The day his young squire lied and said he'd seen his prince in the king's quarters the night the king was murdered, had been the worst.

"I don't hold you responsible for my exile," Rurik sent, in a thought-thread. He could almost feel Andri's guilt through the thread. "You were never the sort to fall in line with your father's plots, nor were you ever interested in his bribes. I know he must have threatened you with something in order for you to betray my trust." Andri tried to shy away, but Rurik wouldn't let him break the thread. "I forgive you," he told the youth. "But you should have come to me the moment Stellan made his threat. I would have protected you."

"You couldn't have," Andri whispered.

"I would have tried."

"I know."

The smaller dreki broke away, and this time Rurik let him go, hoping the words had been enough to sway Andri from this fight.

Because if Magnus was involved, then this only ended one way... with someone dying.

Chapter 9

By the time Freyja returned home, Rurik was lying on a rug in the sun, reading a book. His shirtsleeves were rolled up to his elbows, revealing tanned forearms, and he clasped one hand behind his head, muscles shifting in his abdomen as he craned his neck to watch her walk into the yard.

It wasn't as though she'd suspected he was anything other than what he claimed, but a part of her had wondered.

He knew so much about dreki, after all.

But her dreki had thundered into the south, and that was the last she'd seen of him. He couldn't have beaten her back here, then changed form and waited for her, could he?

No. Not without Freyja seeing him in the skies.

She laid that faint suspicion to rest. She'd clearly listened to her mother's eddas too often as a girl. After all, what would a powerful creature ever want with the likes of her?

"Did you enjoy your walk?" Rurik graced her with a faint smile, taking in the state of her skirts. "Tsk. You've ruined your boots."

"Better mine than yours," she pointed out.

"True." Rurik rolled to his feet with fluid grace, setting the book upside down. "Where are you going?"

"Some of us do not have time to laze in the sun," Freyja shot over her shoulder as she headed to the barn. Thanks to her journey to warn the dreki, she was already behind in her day's work, and needed to see to dinner soon, if they were to dine at all.

Scrambling up the ladder into the loft, she glanced around, noting how much hay she needed to shift. Rurik's blankets lingered by the slatted window at the front of the barn, slashes of sunlight spilling over his makeshift bed. But she was not going to think of that.

"You look like you would enjoy an afternoon spent lazing in the sun." Rurik followed her up the ladder, looking far too male—a healthy one at that—as he hauled himself into the loft. There was a strength in his muscular frame she could not match. "Maybe you should join me?"

"If you're only here to flirt with me, then I might as well put you to good use." She picked up the pitchfork and thrust it into his hands. "Here." She pointed to the pile of hay. "I need to shift that over there, so I can drop it down into the stalls when I need to feed my animals. If you want to impress me, then you can help. I will be back to check on your work within the hour.”

Rurik shot her a narrow-slitted gaze, then glanced at the pitchfork as if it was the first time he’d ever seen one.

“If the work is good enough for me,” she pointed out, “then it is good enough for you, my lord.”

And without waiting for a protest, she scurried down the ladder, and toward the door. She needed to fetch her small flock in, then set her stew on the stove. The clouds were brewing with all their spring glory, indicating a storm later that night.

It took longer than she’d expected—her small flock didn’t want to go anywhere near the barn, the stupid beasts—but she finally managed to hunt them all inside their stalls, and swung the iron pot she’d prepared earlier over the stove, before she returned to the loft.

Climbing the ladder revealed no sign of Rurik.

Nor were there any sounds of labor in process. Typical. She was just about bristling by the time she reached the top of the ladder and——found herself staring at a pile of hay near the top.

“What? How—?” Freyja looked around her.

All the hay had been moved. The pitchfork rested against the nearest beam, and Rurik was stretched out upon his blankets in the corner, with his coat folded neatly beside him.

Rearing up onto his elbows, he sent her a heated smile. “You’re back.”

“You... finished.” It usually took her at least an hour to do the same amount of work. Rurik didn’t even seem to have raised a sweat, though his collar was undone now, revealing a healthy slice of chest.

“Would I have dared otherwise?” Slowly, he rolled to his feet.

She examined the hayloft. “There’s no way you could have shifted so much hay in such a short time.” The bare timber floorboards where the previous pile had rested were a mockery. Not even a single loose straw lay there.

“Do your eyes deceive you?”

“You cheated. Somehow.” She simply couldn’t accept he could work swifter than she could.

“Aye.” Rurik slowly crossed his arms, his eyelids heavy and his smile smug. “I called upon the nisse to help me impress you, and they answered my prayer.”

Freyja set her hands on her hips. “Nisse are a fairy tale.” The small wights were said to help take care of the house or the barn, but only when the farmer lay asleep, and only in exchange for milk.

“Do you believe in dreki?”

That was different. “I have seen dreki with my own eyes.”

Freyja strode around him, trying to find some means for the almost miraculous feat. His shirt wasn’t even damp with sweat. Rurik glanced behind as she circled him, and the muscles in his thighs and ass tightened behind his trousers.

“You won’t find nisse there,” he pointed out, and she realized he’d caught the direction of her gaze.

Insufferable, smug bastard. She was tired, frustrated, and struggling to resist him, and that did it. The impulse to tackle him to the ground suddenly hit her, but something told her he’d win any fight she started. After all, he dwarfed her by a good six or seven inches.

Grabbing a handful of hay, Freyja stuffed it down the back of his shirt then began to run.

She made it two steps before his strong arms caught her up. Her feet left the ground, and her back hit his chest. “Where do you think you’re going? You owe me a debt now.”

Freyja wriggled, but there was no denying him. He was simply too strong for her. Muscle-bound arms trapped her like a cage, and she felt like she wrestled a wall. “I don’t owe you anything.”

Rurik dumped her on the pile of blankets he was sleeping upon, and Freyja rolled onto her back breathlessly. Ripping his shirt from the waistband of his trousers, he shook himself with a growl. “This itches!”

“Perhaps nisse can help clean all the hay from your shirt?” she told him, innocently enough.

Oh, yes. That was definitely one irritated male shooting her a baleful look. Freyja couldn’t stop herself from laughing. He looked like he couldn’t believe she’d done it.

And then that devil’s smile crept over his face. “Perhaps I won’t need them. Perhaps you could assist?”

Reaching over his shoulder, Rurik grabbed the collar of his shirt and hauled it over his head. Pieces of hay dropped from his skin and shirt, leaving him bare chested above her. Freyja’s mouth gaped. This was not what she’d planned. Not at all.

In the flesh, Rurik was breathtaking. Every inch of his skin was that sun-kissed color, and a taunting trail of golden hair edged all the way from his navel to where it disappeared into the waistband of his trousers. His chest seemed carved of heavy slabs of muscle, and he towered over her, perhaps six and a half feet tall of frustrated, dominant male.

He’d allowed her to set the pace in all of their previous encounters. For the first time, Freyja felt like she might have stirred him too far, and unleashed the predator within.

And, startlingly enough, she wasn’t frightened of him.

Perhaps it was the smile, the one that said he knew just how much he affected her.

Or perhaps it was the fact Rurik had never once taken what he’d wanted from her. Instead he’d allowed her to set the boundaries and he’d respected them, even as he flirted and teased her to the point where she wanted to growl in frustration.

She was the one who’d shoved a fistful of straw down his shirt.

Uh-oh.

No, no, no.

She might have started this game, but she had the bad feeling he was going to come out the winner. Freyja scrambled to escape, but Rurik was simply too big, too strong, and too fast. He covered her with ease, caging her from behind, so that his masculine scent enveloped her. Freyja locked an ankle around his leg and threw his weight over her shoulder, and somehow they went down in a sprawl. His skin was deliciously hot, and she didn't think she was fighting as hard as she could be.

When her back hit the blankets, he slammed his body over hers, one knee pinning her skirts between her legs. Freyja ceased trying to free herself, and slumped beneath him. She wasn't going to win her way free. And if she were being honest, she wasn't certain she wanted to.

"Just what do you think the penalty should be for such an infraction?" he asked her, pinning her wrists above her head and breathing hard.

Freyja gave an involuntary shiver. All of that hard, male body was pressed above her, though he didn't make contact. Not fully. There was just enough space between them for her to catch her breath. "What do you think I would be willing to pay?"

Those amber eyes flared with heat as they both realized she was flirting back. Oh, God. What was she doing?

Enjoying the moment, curse her. Both body and heart wanted to see where he'd take this, and her curious mind wasn't far behind.

"I will accept favors," Rurik replied softly, "as I don't think you want me trying to return the gesture."

It wasn't the lay down her dress that bothered her, more the thought of him getting his hands on her bare skin. Freyja wasn't certain she'd have the sense to stop him, if he did so.

"What type of favors?" she whispered back.

Rurik's face lowered, and she found herself tensing in anticipation, and—

Nothing.

Freyja glanced up beneath her lashes, only to find him staring down at her, an inch between their faces. She let out the breath she'd been holding, her chest heaving against his. What was he waiting for?

"If you think I am going to steal a kiss," Rurik said, in a voice turned molten with heat, "then you should think again."

Freyja wiggled a little beneath him, her body tight with thwarted anticipation. She ached, and it was a deliciously horrible feeling. "What do you mean? You didn't just wrestle me down onto your blankets for the sheer enjoyment of it?"

"You don't know that. I was planning on tickling you into submission. Kissing you was not my intention," he admitted, rolling slightly to the side, so he rested on one elbow. His right hand came up, brushing a strand of hair off her face in a gentle touch, and Freyja realized he wasn't actually going to kiss her. "Though I might have thought about it, now we're here."

Soft fingers trailed down the sensitive skin of her throat.

Freyja sucked in a sharp breath, and became very still. Those fingers trailed lower, lower, then his knuckles brushed against the soft wool of her dress. Again she writhed, but it was a different feeling to when she'd wanted to escape. This felt like a silent demand, like her entire body wanted something her mouth couldn't articulate....

And he knew it, curse him.

"If you want a kiss, Freyja"—that smile turned utterly devilish—"then all you have to do is ask."

What? She froze. Her treacherous body was in utter rebellion against her common sense. Her body knew what it wanted. And she had to admit her own desires were somewhat thwarted. She'd expected him to kiss her, damn him. Then she wouldn't have to admit to herself she wanted him to.

"I thought you were here to seduce me," she said.

"I am."

"Then you're doing a rather poor job of it if you expect me to kiss you." She took an unsteady breath.

"Am I?" There was that smile again. Rurik's thumb caressed her cheek, and his eyes grew heavy-lidded. "You want me to steal a kiss—"

"I don't want you to do anything of the sort."

"Then you expect it," he countered, his breath whispering over her skin. "Most likely so you can push me away and tell me your hell hasn't frozen over yet."

Freyja swallowed. Maybe.

"I now realize," he continued, in that same silky-soft voice, "the men you have known have not been the sort to take 'no' for an answer. You know nothing of seduction, sarratum zamani; and you fear a single kiss will not end there."

"You've called me that before," she whispered.

"You're stalling," he replied, and tugged her braid over her shoulder. Rurik bought the end of her plait to his nose, and inhaled the scent of it, then those amber eyes locked on her again as the ends of her hair tickled across his lips. "Your choice, Freyja. All you have to do to receive a kiss is ask for one. If you want more, then you may take more. And if you want me to stop, then all you have to do is say so."

Her choice. Freyja turned the thought over in her head. It felt strange to consider such a thing, but... she was tempted. What would it feel like to have the reins in her hands? To be able to explore without fear he would push her further than she was ready? "I'm not going to lie with you, so... if we start, then it will end with a kiss."

"Is that a yes?" he purred, and his thigh nudged between hers.

A thrill shot through her as his weight shifted over her again. She could control this. Her hands curled around his upper arms as he rested his forearms beside her head. Freyja slid a hand up his bare chest. The heat of his skin felt like some inner furnace burned within. "What did you mean by more?" she whispered.

Rurik lowered his mouth to hers, hovering there. "I could show you so much, Freyja. If you trusted me."

If she trusted him....

It was her choice to brush her mouth against his quivering lips. Hordes of butterflies took flight in her stomach. She didn't know how he did this to her. What was this odd connection between them? "Maybe a little more," she whispered, as she opened her mouth to his.

Rurik licked her tongue, his hips pressing flush against hers, and the hard length of his erection rubbing against her lower stomach. Each stroke of his mouth was an enticement, rather than a claim. Daring her to kiss him back, and letting her set the pace. Freyja's hands curled around his biceps, and she stroked his arms, her hands sliding up over his shoulders. All of that hot skin.... More. She wanted more. But Rurik held himself curiously apart from her, matching her kiss for kiss, and nothing else. Every time she touched him, he reciprocated. Every time her nails dug into his back, he grew a little more insistent, pressing his hips between her thighs and rubbing that heavy cock against her.

Her entire body ached, wetness dampening the skin between her thighs. An image of his hot mouth closing over her breast in Akureyri assaulted her, and Freyja moaned as she arched her back beneath him. She could almost feel his lips on her nipple, but the memory felt hollow, not quite substantial enough to satisfy her.

She didn't know how to ask for what she wanted.

Freyja curled her fists in his hair, and tugged. Hard lips captured hers, as if to encourage her. Not a sweet kiss now. This was messy. Pent-up frustration poured from him as his tongue tangled with hers, and his erection ground against the wet ache between her thighs.

More. Definitely more. That sweet friction made her body want to curl up on itself. She writhed against him, and her skirts rode up between them, leaving her legs bare. Then her greedy hands slid over his shoulders, exploring all of that smooth skin. She wanted to lick it and so she did, nipping at the muscle in his throat.

"Freyja." He sucked in a sharp breath as he turned his face to the side, muttering an unsteady curse under his breath. Hands trapped her wrists, and then Rurik pinned her hands above her head, leaving her utterly helpless beneath him. Those golden eyes locked on hers, and he shuddered, his voice turning all growly. "If you don't stop doing that, then this isn't going to end here."

"Doing what?" she whispered, cupping his hips with her thighs and rocking against him experimentally.

Rurik's lips parted, and his gaze became distant. It felt so, so good. But there was something else that beckoned and she couldn't quite understand what it was, or how to get there.

"You told me you didn't intend to lie with me," he growled, his lips curling back off his teeth. Utterly primitive expressions crossed his face. "Have you changed your mind? Or do you just want a little more?"

“I want...” She stalled there. And his body hovered over hers, his cock pressing with heated possession against her.

But he didn’t make a single move, and it hurt to deny herself, and oh, God....

Those golden eyes darkened as if he understood what she wanted when she herself didn’t. “Do you trust me?”

That was a dangerous question. Freyja’s mind raced. “Yes.” Barely a whisper.

“Good.” He claimed her mouth in another heated kiss, even as his hands slid down her arms, setting her free.

Freyja’s hands tangled in his golden hair. His found the laces on her dress. Suddenly she knew what he intended, and her eyes shot wide, even as his lips traced their way down her throat.

“Let me please you,” he whispered, nuzzling aside her neckline. Sharp teeth nipped at the curve of her breast, and then he traced the sensitive area with his tongue.

Pleasure threatened to claim her. Freyja rolled her head to the side. Yes. Yes. “More,” she breathed.

The rasp of his stubble grazed her sensitive breasts as Rurik rocked his hips against her. Somehow the steely length of his erection met the seat of her pleasure, and he rode over that delicate part of her, nearly sending her wild with need. Tugging her neckline open, he claimed her aching nipple with his hot mouth, and it was all she could do to stifle the cry that sprang from her lips.

“That’s it, ati me peta libbu,” he whispered. Teeth scraped her nipple, and then he was licking her there, that talented tongue driving every last thought out of her head.

All that remained was a creature of pleasure. She could feel the storm building within her, whipped to greater heights by that teasing tongue and the mocking rock of his hips.

Clasping her hips, Rurik slid his hand under the lengths of her skirt. The material rode up her thighs, leaving her in her drawers and stockings. Freyja wrapped her legs around his hips, even as his questing hand trailed between her thighs. Gentle fingers stroked her damp drawers, and a shudder went through her. Nobody had ever touched her there. Only herself, and she’d shied away from exploring too far.

This... this was like lightning coiling all the way through her.

Freyja cupped his face. Rurik stared down at her, lazy-lidded and curious, as if he wanted to see every single expression that crossed her face.

“Do you like that?” he whispered, as if his fingers hadn’t just worked between the slit in her drawers and finally found her, damp and trembling.

“Oh.” Her mouth fell open on a gasp as one finger stroked her in her most private place. Rurik traced tiny little circles there, seeming to find the secret heart of her, the place that seemed most sensitive.

“What are you doing?” she blurted.

“Want to ride the storm, Freyja?” He kissed the side of her jaw, his face nuzzling against hers, even as his fingers worked her with slow and patient circles.

Almost there. Freyja's eyes shot wide, and her fingernails turned into claws in the soft skin of his shoulders. There. Yes. Almost. Almost.

She shattered.

Her entire body clenched on a wave of pleasure, and somehow she threw her head back, crying out in soft abandon as Rurik pushed her over the edge. This time the lightning wasn't in the sky. She felt like a bolt of it struck her, and flash-burned all her nerves. Exquisite. Breathless. The fiercest ache she'd ever felt....

Then it was over, and she was collapsing into a gasping mess in his arms, her heart thundering in her chest.

"That's it," Rurik whispered, still tracing his fingers through the slick folds between her thighs. "That's it, my fierce, precious Freyja."

Somehow her mind caught up with what he was doing. She buried her burning face in his throat, her body quivering with aftershock. She couldn't take any more. Freyja shook her head and grabbed his wrist, pulling his hand away from her. Another shiver worked its way through her. So intense. She felt like the earth itself when something monumental shifted beneath the ground.

And maybe something monumental had shifted....

Rurik kissed her temples, then her closed eyes, then her nose. Somehow he found her mouth, and this kiss was another gentle one, as if he tried to calm her flighty heart.

Too late. She would never be the same again.

"More," Freyja whispered, tilting her face to present her throat to him.

Rurik stilled, and then something hard and predatory slid over his face. Something she didn't quite recognize. Then he shook his head, his expression tinged with regret. "As much as I would like to comply, you're not ready yet. And I have no wish to rush you."

"Am I not the judge of that?" Freyja clapped a hand over his, then urged it back beneath her skirts—

"Freyja!" Her father's voice cut through their reverie.

Freyja froze, her hand on Rurik's, even as her pulse beat out of control. Their eyes met, his dark and predatory.

"Looks like we have little choice," Rurik rasped, his head twisting toward the window. The sun was beginning to set. "Damn it."

"Freyja?" her father called again.

Freyja shoved Rurik off her and rolled out from beneath him, her cheeks so hot she could rival a sunset, she imagined. Oh, my goodness. What had she been about to do? Lose her virginity in the barn? She tugged hay from her hair and out of her dress, yanked her laces tight, then pulled the material over her bare breasts. Everything in her body trembled, including her knees.

What would her father think?

What had she been thinking?

Clearly, she had not been.

“Don’t give me that look,” Rurik growled, under his breath. He groaned, and then slumped back onto the blankets, rearranging the fierce erection in his trousers. “What we just shared was not wrong.”

“Be silent!” she hissed, scurrying to the ladder. “He’ll hear you.”

“Freyja.”

She paused at the top of the ladder, her knees still unsteady.

“Oh, yes it is!” she shot back, and fled down the ladder.

Chapter 10

Rurik clasped his hands under his head and stared at the shadows of the barn roof as night settled in. He'd dined with Freyja and her father, though Freyja barely looked at him. Every time she did, he could see thoughts racing through her eyes.

She'd let him touch her, please her... and now she was curious.

But the stubborn part of her nature had reared its head also. Freyja was not the sort to accept such a vital turning point in her seduction so sanguinely. She would turn herself in knots, no doubt all night, and in the morning their dance would begin again.

He could hardly wait.

Rurik could be patient, even as his body ached with the lack of release. Freyja was worth it, and today had been a concession he hadn't expected her to make just yet.

Closing his eyes slowly, he let his spirit hover just inside his body. Tonight he had another debt to repay, and if he felt perhaps a little frustration, then this would assuage the hunter within him.

A long time since he'd walked the dreams of man. A long time since he'd wanted to.

Rurik let his spirit separate from his mortal flesh, and rose high above the world. The little barn lay beneath him, and lights flickered merrily from the main house. He drifted above its grassed roof, and then turned his sight upon the nearby village.

One thought and he was there, the world rushing past him. Dozens of spirits flickered below him as men and women moved through the village, banking the fires for the night.

Rurik sorted through them, his predatory senses touching and discarding several souls before finally alighting on the one he sought. He circled the fine manor house, sensing the snoring pig that awaited him.

"Benedikt," Rurik whispered, feeling the other soul waken to his call, the man turning fitfully toward him in bed.

Not quite all the way awake, but not lost in sleep either.

Rurik formed within the room, staring balefully at his nemesis.

This man had hurt Freyja. Not physically, for she had her own defenses, but he'd struck at her where she was most vulnerable. Little whispers in the right ear, setting superstition against her, and threats to those villagers who might have helped her and bought her produce. Oh, yes. Rurik had offered good coin for that information, as he waited for Freyja to make her way home from Akureyri.

Benedikt wanted her weak, alienated and powerless. His intentions had never been about seduction, but ownership. He'd wanted her begging and on her knees, rather than meeting her on equal footing.

No man of honor would ever pursue such a course of action.

Crossing to the bed, Rurik looked down on his prey. Every inch of him wanted to spill blood, but that went against the code he lived by. No true dreki could ever commit murder, no matter the offence. You did not take human lives, unless they attacked you first. It was a treaty that went back hundreds of years to when the human Althing met with the dreki court and demanded a cease to hostilities between human and dreki.

He had never before felt the need to break one the dreki's greatest laws, but he came close now.

Killing this coward, however, would be too easy.

Rurik reached out with his spirit hand and clasped Benedikt's shoulder, plunging them both straight into the dream world.

Rurik manipulated the dream, twisting it to his liking. Taking his immortal form, he flapped high above the moors, where he set Benedikt to running. The man staggered and babbled with fright, finding himself in unfamiliar terrain. When Rurik's shadow rippled over him, Benedikt looked up, his face whitening with fear.

"Run," Rurik whispered.

Mist surrounded them, hot fumes bubbling from small crevices in the ground. Enjoying the mortal's staggering plight, Rurik flapped lazily above him, then suddenly cut his wings flat against his sides and plunged into a dive.

Benedikt bleated in fear, and splashed through a hot spring, his voice turning to a scream as the acid water burned him.

Swooping just short of him, Rurik climbed again as the man scrambled across moss-slick rocks.

"It is not fun to be prey, is it?" he taunted, diving again.

A wave of incoherent fear swept from the man. He pissed himself, and Rurik chose that moment to lash out with his claws, catching the man by the shirt. He hauled him into the air, wings beating as he climbed. The shirt ripped, jerking Benedikt in his grasp, and Rurik shook him a little, just to frighten him.

"Please!" Benedikt screamed, as the tear in his shirt began to jerk wider. "Please! I have gold—"

The shirt finally gave and Benedikt tumbled end over end with a high-pitched squeal as he plummeted through the air. Rurik waited until the last moment before he caught his blubbering prey. His claw locked around the man's ankle.

Now he had the peasant's attention.

"I don't want your gold. Nothing you say can or will sway me. This is a warning."

Turning toward his dream-rendition of Krafla, he flapped lazily as Benedikt cried in his grasp.

“You have turned your village against Freyja Helgasdottir. You have threatened her, and threatened others so they may not provide her aide or trade coin with her. You’re not a man. You’re a sniveling coward, and you know not who you provoke.”

Circling the tip of the volcano, he pictured lava bubbling within the hollow of the caldera, flames licking up the sides as if they wanted to eat Benedikt alive.

“That bitch is lying! I never touched her. I never threatened her—”

“If you die here, then you’ll never wake.” Rurik bared his teeth as he circled above the volcano. “If you so much as look in her direction ever again, I shall roast you alive,” he snapped, and then finally let go. “I know who the liar is.”

Benedikt slammed his hands out in front of him as the lava rushed up to meet him, only to realize there was something wrong, something.... He jerked awake from the dream and plunged upright in his bed, his skin clammy with sweat as his familiar room formed around him. The fire in the grate had died down, but lit enough of the furniture for him to grasp hold of his sheets in relief.

Not real. Just a nightmare. His lungs sucked in air and his heart raced as he groaned and sank his head into his hands. His nightshirt was wet with piss. The image of the caldera rushing up to meet him sprang sharply to mind, then he was crying and snot was bubbling out of his nose, and damn him, he was a man, not a child. Benedikt wiped the tears from his eyes furiously, sucking in enough oxygen to stem the flow of tears.

“Just a dream,” he told himself hoarsely, even though it felt real.

Pain speared through his ankle as he twisted to right his sheets, and he dragged them up to see what the problem was—

There, against his skin, were the reddened claw marks of the dragon.

“Not a dream,” something whispered in his head.

Benedikt’s back hit the headboard as he scrambled up the bed, staring at his reddened skin. “Blessed father, watch over me,” he whispered, his heart thumping like a rabbit’s.

He scrambled for the chamber pot as his stomach suddenly heaved, too overwhelmed by the thought of what had happened. Real. Far too real. Benedikt vomited into the pot, piss splashing against his face. He was held captive by his stomach, however, until the wave of fear wrung everything from him.

Ripping his nightshirt off, he wiped his face and collapsed in a heap against the wall, shivering.

That bitch must have set the dragon upon him.

There was more than one way to answer that insult. He shoved to his feet, and reached for his clothes. He was halfway into them when the dream returned.

“If you so much as look in her direction, I shall roast you alive,” the dragon had hissed.

Benedikt swallowed, then he slowly dragged his trousers up his legs. It wasn't as though he was going to do anything. Not overtly. That was what he was paying others for.

He considered the thought for a long moment, turning it over in his mind to find the flaw in his argument.

There was none. He couldn't just accept this threat.

And he had a dragon hunter up his sleeve.

The dragon had to be dealt with. And Benedikt knew just the way to do it.

The fire crackled as Haakon nursed his horn of ale in the village taproom. Another long, seemingly pointless day stretched behind him. The frustration ached, but he knew to be patient. Today they'd mapped Krafla, finding no sign of the dreki itself, but plotting where the best place to set the ballista lay.

Turning the silver pendant his wife had given him over in his fingers, Haakon rubbed the embossed metal. A hawk in full flight gleamed, its wings flared and its eyes seeming to stare right through him.

"A hawk for a hunter," Arja had teased as she lay beneath him the night of their wedding, and looped the chain around his neck.

He hated the fact the memory had grown ragged around the edges. He knew her face, but when he pictured her, somehow the image wasn't quite fully formed, as if he was forgetting parts of her. Hair the color of spun gold crowned her face, and eyes like polished amber stared up at him.

Six years of misery. Six years since the dreki stole her from him.

Haakon's fist closed over the pendant. He could wait another night or two, so long as his patience gained him what he desired.

"Who are you looking at?" Rollo demanded with sneer, his loud voice cutting through the taproom laughter. "Don't think I won't ruin that pretty face of yours!"

The enormous man shoved to his feet, fist drawn back as he launched himself toward the youngest of their company, but before Haakon could move to restrain him, another was there.

One of his newest recruits, Magnus, caught the man's wrist and shoved Rollo against the wall as if he didn't weigh the same as a bear. His lips curled back from his teeth as Rollo's attention turned from the young hunter to this newest threat.

"Keep your hands off my brother," Magnus warned, and that voice sent a chill through Haakon.

He pushed to his feet, recognizing the danger signs. His men were hungry for a kill, and the careful planning and days of unsuccessful hunting were wearing at them all. If he didn't stop them, blood would be spilled. "That's enough."

Both Magnus and Rollo looked at him, though Magnus's expression didn't change. He and his brother, Andri, had joined Haakon's party in Akureyri, lured by the sound of plentiful coin. Though he had enough men, he'd taken one look at their hardened eyes and battle-ready frames and known warriors when he saw them.

Which was precisely what he'd need, where he was going.

"Focus on the dreki," he told the room of watchful men. "You'll get your blood soon enough."

"When?" Gunnar demanded.

"Aye," Jon snarled. "When do we take the dragon's lair?"

The rest of the men echoed him, thumping fists on table, and clapping their tankards on the trestle tables. Haakon held his hands up, the pendant chain curled around two fingers. "Tomorrow!"

A chorus of cheers went up.

But Haakon felt eyes on him, and noticed Andri was staring at the pendant in his hand. Slowly the boy's eyes locked on his, a shock of black hair falling over the youth's forehead and highlighting those dangerous blue eyes.

Just a lad, barely past the threshold of youth. But Haakon felt something shift inside him as their eyes met.

Even a boy could be dangerous, and he almost wanted to demand to know what put that look in Andri's eyes—as if the sight of the pendant stirred something heated in the lad's chest.

A foolish thought, for the boy had no connection to Arja. He would have been in short pants when she first swept into Haakon's life and turned his world upside down.

"Tomorrow," Magnus echoed, slowly sinking onto the bench beside his brother, his hawk-like features sharp with some unfettered bloodlust. He had no love of dragons, or dreki, or whatever they bloody well were.

"I want to mount that dreki's head on a spike," the man had said the first time they met.

Andri's lips thinned, and then the boy looked away from the pendant that had held him captive for long moments.

Haakon curled his fist shut over it and sank onto his chair, just as the boy's head tilted toward the door. Sliding the pendant into his pocket, he picked up the sword he'd been polishing earlier.

The door to the tavern banged open and Benedikt appeared in the doorway, his plump cheeks full and his mouth turned upside down. He spilled inside from the night, as if Hel's three-legged horse, Helhest, were on his trail.

Something had upset the little farmer, Haakon thought, sliding an oiled rag along the length of his sword.

Conversations lagged as the mercenaries all noticed the pampered brat. Gunnar locked eyes with Haakon, and then spat in the reeds. He'd already voiced his thoughts on their benefactor and the way Benedikt seemed to think he'd bought them.

"I don't care what the little lordling thinks," Haakon had replied coldly. "He's paying for the men and the ballista, and I need them to get my wife back."

Looking the worse for wear, Benedikt slammed a pouchful of coin on the table in front of him. Haakon's gaze locked on it, then slowly lifted to the would-be lordling.

"I'm not paying you to sit on your ass and polish your sword," Benedikt snapped. "You've been here four days, and you've barely done a thing."

Gunnar lowered his tankard as Haakon shifted forward in his seat, putting both feet on the ground. Standing up, he loomed over the petulant man-child, then slid his sword into its sheath at his hip with a steely rasp. Conversation died. His men shifted in their chairs as they craned their necks to watch.

They weren't the only ones who were hungry for blood.

And Benedikt might be paying them, but there were certain insolences Haakon wouldn't tolerate.

Haakon rested his knuckles on the table and loomed forward, so they were of a height. "You know nothing of hunting dragons," he said quietly. "And this is no ordinary dragon."

He'd seen it circling Krafla two days ago, sunlight gilding its golden hide.

His heart had caught in his throat at the sight, and every instinct within him urged him to scale the mount and launch a full-scale assault upon the dreki's lair. He'd thought of Arja in that moment, begging any god who listened for her to still be alive.

"The volcano seems empty and the entrance is barricaded by an invisible door, or perhaps magic," Haakon continued. "To scale the mountain, we must take a narrow route, which leaves us vulnerable. I'm not throwing men at the dreki needlessly until I can figure out how to get it to meet me on my terms."

"You want the dragon?" Benedikt snapped. "I know how you can lure it out."

Stillness slid through him, and his knuckles ached as he clenched his fist. "How?"

Benedikt stomped his boot on the trestle seat, then reached down to peel up his trousers. "It visited me in a dream." There, around his leg, were the unmistakable red marks of a set of claws.

No wonder the little bitch was bleating so hard.

"What did it want?" Haakon demanded. Here was his chance, he just knew it. He'd stared past that invisible barrier to the dreki's lair and called his wife's name in desperation, hoping she was inside.

If he could just break the spell on the door, or bring the dreki to him... Maybe it was madness, but he needed to discover if Krafla's wyrm had stolen his wife. Being here, so close to the shadow of the mountain was sending him mad with pure want. Arja haunted his dreams all night, pleading for him to rescue her, until he didn't dare sleep.

Patience be damned, there was a feeling tingling through his veins as if fate rushed to meet him. This was it. This was the dragon who'd taken her. He knew it.

"It wanted to warn me," Benedikt said, smiling a little, as if he could see Haakon's need on his face. "It wanted me to stay away from Freyja Helgasdottir, or it would kill me."

The blood rushed from Haakon's face, leaving his cheeks cold. "Then Freyja is the key to luring it out."

Chapter 11

The next day, Rurik went in search of Freyja, feeling oddly restless. He'd taken care of the threat against her, now he just needed to charm the stubborn woman. At least he had yesterday's success still brewing in his mind.

And in his body.

He knew why he felt restless. Denying himself release yesterday during his encounter with Freyja had been sensible, as she wasn't quite ready for that. But it still ached.

And he was fairly certain yesterday's events would be lingering in her mind too. Which meant one step forward, no doubt two steps back. The bloody woman could give a rock lessons in stubbornness.

The faint scent of her captured his attention, and Rurik tilted his head toward the back of the house. There.

She was just lowering a wooden box into the dirt near the hot spring behind the house. Baking more of that bread he liked so much, by the look of it. Taking her pitchfork, she swept the heated earth back over the top of the cask, then brushed strands of damp hair from her forehead.

"Good morning," he called, striding down the slope toward her.

Freyja's shoulders stiffened faintly, but she nodded to him. "Morning? I've been up for almost six hours."

"So have I," he told her.

Freyja shot him a doubtful look. "Doing what?"

Flying halfway across Iceland, and paying a small fortune for things he thought she would like. "Preparing a surprise for you."

"A surprise? For me?"

"It's the sort of thing one does when one is wooing a young lady." Rurik crossed his arms over his chest, hoping her curiosity was stronger than her wariness. "Or so I am told."

"I don't have time for surprises," she said, and he admitted she did look tired. But Freyja also hesitated, and glanced at him from beneath those thick dark lashes.

Curiosity engaged. He smiled. "Give me an hour, and I will give you my afternoon's labor. After all, you do not know what I have in mind...."

"As long as it doesn't involve hay," she said.

“Nor stuffing it down someone’s shirt.”

Freyja tried to fight a smile, but couldn’t seem to help herself. “Do you never cease? You’re incorrigible and relentless and—”

“An excellent lover.”

She shot him a swift glare. “What happened yesterday will not happen again.”

Rurik brushed his hand against her hip as he moved past her; the lightest of caresses, as he murmured in her ear, “You shouldn’t make promises you might not be able to keep.”

“Do you think you’re the first man who has set his sights on me?” Freyja looked dangerous as she turned to follow him, pitchfork in hand. “Yes, you might own a silver tongue, and I’ll admit you intrigue me, but no man has won my heart before and I doubt one ever will.”

“Perhaps. But then, you have never been wooed by one such as I.”

A frustrated sound echoed in the back of her throat. Freyja stabbed the pitchfork into the ground.

“Spare me an hour, and I’ll leave you alone,” he said, taking pity on her and capturing her fingers. “One hour, Freyja. Do you not want to know what surprise I have in store for you?”

She was wavering. He saw it in her eyes. “One hour,” she finally said, sighing. “It had better be worth it.”

“Oh, it will be.” Tucking her hand in the crook of his elbow, Rurik led her around the house, into the sunshine.

He’d spread the blanket within a circle of birches that guarded the hilltop overlooking Freyja’s farm. The birches stood in a perfect circle around them, and though he remained wary about entering such a circle, he couldn’t sense any magic within it. Freyja’s interest was piqued when she saw the blanket and the basket he’d set out.

“A picnic,” she exclaimed.

“You work too much,” he replied. “You deserve a treat.”

“Someone must,” she replied, and folded her skirts neatly around her as she settled on the blanket. “Unlike others, I cannot rely on nisse.”

“No one can,” he replied, stretching out beside her. “They are unreliable little beasts, and if you don’t leave enough milk out for them, they’re liable to turn upon you.”

A smile softened her face. “Do you know, sometimes I almost believe you when you speak of myths and fairy tales.”

There was a hint of sadness around her eyes.

“Why would you not?” He stroked the edge of her skirts, fingers rubbing the soft wool between them.

“Because I know what hand of fate life deals,” she admitted, opening the picnic basket. “Nisse and huldufólk and trolls are all well and good, but they are stories for children.”

“You believed then, once upon a time.”

She set out the breads and meats he’d brought them, her face strangely devoid of any expression.

“My mother believed. It was she who spoke of dreki and huldufólk.”

He hesitated. “What happened to her?”

“Five years ago, she disappeared for several days. When we found her in the stone ring up near Krafla, she looked like she had aged a decade, and nothing seemed to satisfy her. She wouldn’t say where she’d been, or what had happened, but she began to waste away,” Freyja said gently. “She didn’t want to eat our foods, nor drink, but she consumed just enough to live. Yet it was as though someone took the light from her life. It took her two years to die, and no one knew what was wrong with her. My father has not been the same ever since.” Freyja sliced some of the soft cheese onto a piece of bread, and handed it to him.

“I’m sorry,” he said, placing his hand over hers.

Freyja looked at him very steadily. “You remind me of her sometimes.” She turned her hand beneath his, her fingers lacing through two of his. “She was a dreamer too, but... I don’t think I have enough left within me to dream.”

Dreams could be dangerous. He understood that. He’d spent thirty years hibernating within Krafla, trying not to think of the past, allowing the locals to bring him food so he did not even have to hunt. Merely drifting with his mind entwined with the volcano beneath him, feeling the earth crack and groan as he tried not to think of all that he’d lost.

Rurik’s thumb caressed the smooth skin of her hand. “I think... I had stopped dreaming too,” he admitted. “Until I met you.”

That brought a blush to her cheeks. Freyja rolled her eyes. “Of course.”

But she didn’t understand. He watched as she devoured the small spread of cured meat and cheeses, mixed with fresh strawberry jam and white fluffy bread, the kind Freyja had never eaten before.

The night he’d taken her ram, his entire life changed. Driven from Krafla by hunger, he’d thought little of the hunt behind the desire to fill his belly, but it had brought so much more into his life.

It had brought her.

He could still recall Freyja brandishing that sword at him, her face full of determination and weariness. Years of sleepy dullness sloughed away from him in that instant. He’d stepped aside from the world, turning his attention to the earth and fire beneath him, but she brought him back in a single moment, slamming into his life like a thunderstorm of epic proportions.

He felt alive, for the first time in years.

And he was starting to think of the future, of what part she would play in it. For he couldn’t let her go, not now. Not when she was the catalyst for this new awakening within his heart.

“What are you thinking?” she asked, nibbling on one of the fat strawberries he’d hunted high and low for.

“I am wondering: what is your greatest desire?”

“To finish my work swiftly, so I may have an hour or two to myself tonight,” she replied, red juice staining her lips.

He wanted to lick the taste of it from them. “That seems a small dream.”

“You would say that, but just because it is a small dream, does not mean it is not a joy to me.” Freyja slowly rolled onto her back, resting on one elbow. Her braid slung over her shoulder, and she took her time with the last mouthful of strawberry, entirely innocent of what the sight of her eating it did to him.

“If you were not bound by time, nor money, nor any other mortal constraint, what do you wish you could do?”

Freyja gave him that serious look again. Rurik caught the end of her braid, toying with the ribbon that bound it. Her breath caught, and she tossed the stalk of the strawberry away.

Come on. Give me your heart. Tell me how to win it.

“Travel,” she whispered, as he tugged the ribbon loose. “See these great cities my books speak of. See this world.”

There it was. He smiled and began to unravel the bottom of her braid. Silky hair curled around his fingers. He’d dreamed of it spread over his sheets, dreamed of running his hands through it. “You like my stories, because you dream of adventure.”

“I like any story.” She watched what he was doing. Not with trepidation, but almost as if she wondered what he intended. “It reminds me there is something more out there, something beyond my day’s worth of chores.”

“And is this your greatest desire?”

“Why are you so insistent upon dreams?” she growled under her breath, capturing a handful of her unraveling braid. “They’re little more than wistful thinking. Wonderful in the moment, but rather insubstantial, because nothing will come of it.”

“To dream of something more is the greatest gift one owns. Without them, there is nothing to strive for. No reason to continue breathing. We might as well become the rock and stone beneath our feet.” Rurik brushed her hand aside and spread thick waves of golden hair across the picnic blanket, even as Freyja shifted as though she wasn’t certain she should allow him to continue. “And because you have set me a challenge: to give you your greatest desire, in exchange for your heart.”

Her heart began to beat a little quicker. He heard it. “That is not my heart’s greatest desire.”

“Then what is?”

Freyja suddenly smiled. “I’m not telling you. If you were paying attention, you should be able to work it out.”

“Vexing woman.” Rurik grabbed a fistful of her hair and tugged gently until she rolled onto her back. He came over her, shaking the last of her braid free. Thick strands of molten gold spread across the dark blanket, crinkled into loose waves. “I think you like being pursued.”

“You’re the mighty hunter,” she teased. “You wouldn’t enjoy the chase if it were too easy.”

“True. But then I know what comes at the culmination of the chase,” he replied, heat in his eyes.

“And I enjoy that far more than chasing.”

Bringing a handful of her hair up to his face, he rubbed it across his cheeks. She smelled like a summer breeze, like a wild storm. And her mismatched eyes watched his expression as though she saw something there she didn't know how to interpret. “What are you doing?” Freyja whispered.

“I have dreamed of running my fingers through your hair like this.” He rubbed a strand of it between forefinger and thumb, his eyelids lowering lazily. “You have beautiful hair and I want to see it down.”

Those perfect lips were so close to his, still stained pink from strawberries. Sweet, and lush, and practically begging for his caress.

Rurik lowered his face to hers, his fists curling in handfuls of her hair. One taste and he was lost. He licked her slowly, teasing his way into her mouth as Freyja opened up to him, slowly, softly, as if she were testing the waters.

The thought of yesterday consumed him, setting him on fire. Or maybe that was Freyja. She was light, and brightness, a catalyst of pure fire that awoke every single one of his senses. Something was happening to him, and he didn't quite know what it was, nor what it meant. But she was the key to it.

Freyja put a firm hand against his chest. Not so much pushing him away, but asking for space, and perhaps time to gather her thoughts. Both of them were breathing hard.

“You make me feel alive,” he whispered, somehow perplexed by the complex emotions swelling within him.

“You make me want things I shouldn't want,” she whispered back, as if it were some secret confession.

Not ready. Not yet. For though she craved him, something still held her back. Shifting to the side of her, he rearranged the painful press of his erection, and then stroked the soft river of her hair.

“What do you dream of?” she suddenly asked, glancing up from beneath those thick golden lashes. Me? He froze. Nobody had ever asked him that. Nor had he dwelled on the matter.

“I long for... home,” he replied slowly, startled to realize it was true. A sudden yearning filled him: the urge to drag his sister into his arms one more time, and to see his younger brother's smile. Just one more day at Hekla, where his people lived, and he could belong. Home. A sense of belonging, his father's voice echoing through the halls—

A dream dashed. There was no home for him there. Nothing more than memories of a time thirty years in the past, before he'd chosen exile. His father was long gone.

For all his power, he could never, ever relive that time again.

“What stops you from returning?” Freyja stroked his cheek, fingertips trailing over the roughened hairs that marked his jaw.

Restlessness edged through him, despite the tender touch. “Freyja, I can never go home.”

Pushing away from her, he drew one knee up in front of him, his heart heavy. His erection was gone, thoughts of seduction fading away. Freyja dragged herself into a seated position, a thousand questions dancing in her eyes. “Do you wish to talk of it?”

“No.”

She accepted that. Simply began to pack away the remains of their picnic. This wasn't what he'd intended when he set it out, the afternoon suddenly souring. And yet, he almost felt as though this was what he needed to broach the walls that guarded her heart.

“I am exiled from my clan,” he admitted gently. “If I returned, my uncle would try to kill me.”

Those witchy eyes locked on him with a dangerous intensity. “Why would he want you dead?”

Old wounds ached in his heart. “Stellan is my mother's brother. When my father died, Stellan took his place as...” How to say this? “...head of the clan. I believe... I believe he had something to do with my father's death, with my mother's help.”

“You didn't fight him?”

Rurik felt his face shutter. “I was exiled, instead. Blamed for the murder of my father.”

Freyja's mouth fell open. “But—”

“I didn't do it, Freyja. I loved my father. But I was the first on the scene, I found his heart pierced with a blade of pure iron. There was blood on my hands. And... a witness who claimed I did it. A witness whom no one disputed.”

“Who?”

His heart sank like a stone in water. That betrayal was one he could never forgive. “My mother.”

She reached out to stroke his face. “Why would she do that to her own son?”

Rurik pressed into the touch, capturing her hand in his and holding it there. The fury of the dreki within him melted at her touch. Only she could tame it. “She wanted power, most likely. She controls Stellan, and he comes from the same clan she did. She has never controlled me. You cannot think of her as you think of your own mother. She birthed the three of us into the world; Árdís, Marduk, and me. But she had not the raising of us. We were marks on a contract to her. A fulfillment of the oath she gave my father and his clan when she married him. A duty. It was my father who loved us and reared us.”

And his heart ached in his chest at the mere thought his own people could consider him the hand that murdered his father.

“I'm sorry,” Freyja whispered on a thought-thread she didn't even know she sent.

And he could not link back with her, not when she thought he was merely human.

Rurik looked down, into her eyes. “I accepted the exile so my brother and sister would not be drawn into a war. They weren't ready. Neither was I, to speak the truth. But this is not the first time my mother and uncle have tried to see me dead.” He squeezed her hand. “It is the first time, however, that I have something more to lose than merely my life. My family are... a proud people. They would not accept you, nor any consummation between us.”

Freyja drew her knees up to her chest, resting her chin upon them. “You miss your brother and sister?”

“Fiercely.”

“Not so small a dream,” Freyja whispered, as if cognizant of the turmoil within him.

“No.” He met those beautiful eyes, aware the ground beneath them both had shifted, and he suddenly understood her own quiet yearning. “Not so small a dream.”

There was a long moment of silence, each of them lost in their own thoughts. He ached to know hers. Instead, he lifted a hand and brushed the backs of his fingers down her pale cheek.

Freyja tilted into the touch, her lashes shuttering her eyes, and her lips slightly parted. In this moment she was without fear or thought, existing only to feel.

And he thought he should kiss her again. The sudden urge to do so left him floundering as he realized this urge had little to do with pressing her against the ground and plundering her sweet mouth, or even body. It wanted nothing more than to taste her mouth, to share in her moment of peace, of acceptance. He wanted to kiss her for the sake of the kiss itself, and because she... she meant something to him.

Rurik drew back. What was this? He didn’t know what precisely he felt, but he knew it was different.

There was no endless curiosity in this feeling. No desire to claim, or plunder. Merely... tenderness?

Freyja looked up. And the moment passed, and suddenly he became aware he was staring at her as if she’d stolen his heart from his chest when he wasn’t looking, and he didn’t quite know what to do with that fact.

“The day is wasting,” he said abruptly, drawing away from her. “If you want some time to yourself, then now is the time to steal it. I have promised you an afternoon’s labor, so use my time wisely. We’re done here.”

We’re done here.

The thought plagued her as she tried to read.

She’d purchased a new book in Akureyri, and normally such a thing as Gulliver’s Travels would cause the room to vanish around her as she lost herself in the world within the covers.

Time to herself... It seemed a dream, until one lived in the moment and realized all she had was time to herself.

Freyja closed the book with a slap.

“What’s wrong?” her father asked.

“Nothing.” And everything. Freyja found her feet. “I just feel restless, that’s all. I’m going out to check the fences.”

“Restless, hmm?” Her father closed his eyes, drowsing in the sunlight that spilled through the window. “Wouldn’t have anything to do with Master Rurik, would it?”

Freyja went still. “Why would you say that?”

“Because he is clearly interested in courting you, and you’ve been distracted ever since he arrived.”

Freyja toyed with the edge of her skirt. “Don’t get your hopes up,” she said quietly, though she wasn’t certain whether she was speaking to her father—or herself. “There is no future between Rurik and I.” Snapping her fingers, she headed for the door. “Come, Loki.”

The little fox sprang to her side, licking his lips, as they exited the small house. Freyja tidied her braid as she strode for the barn. Memories of his hands coursing through the silken waves of her hair heated her body. She had no intention of ensuring the fences were tidy. No. What she wanted was to find him. The earlier dismissal vexed her.

Rurik was the one who’d decided to chase her, wasn’t he?

And now, “we’re done here....” Just when she was starting to feel something for him. Just when she’d allowed him to take certain liberties.

Freyja knew she was being unfair. She’d kept him at arm’s length, and insisted nothing was going to happen between them, so why should she be so upset when he turned the tables on her?

Because he’d let her into his life a little, with the talk of his exile and his home. For a second, she’d felt as though she knew him intimately.

Because I’m lonely too.

The small herd of ewes hovered against the stone fence outside the barn, eyeing her with wild eyes. Ever since that blasted dreki stole her ram, they’d been riding on the edge of their nerves. It was a wonder her goat was still producing any milk.

The barn lay empty, though Hanna snorted when she saw her, as if asking for reassurance. All the jobs she’d given Rurik were completed, thought there was no sign of the man himself.

“Not you too,” Freyja grumbled to Hanna as the mare whickered with nervousness. Sunlight spilled between cracks in the loft floorboards, and dust spiraled through each shaft.

Loki bumped into her ankles, almost tripping her.

“Rurik?” she called up into the loft.

A shadow moved up there. She hadn’t seen him since they’d spoken of dreams, and a part of her felt sympathy for what he’d shared of his past. Enough sympathy that she’d brought out the hangikjöt and carved it, broiled some potatoes and set a loaf of rúgbrauð baking in the warm spring behind the house. It was the type of meal she might serve at Christmas, and the scent of smoked lamb already filled her small kitchen. The bread would almost be ready.

“I wanted to invite you in for dinner,” she called, craning her neck. Floorboards in the loft creaked, but why hadn’t he replied? “I made something special.” Freyja hesitated. “To remind you of home, perhaps.”

Still no answer.

All the hairs on the back of Freyja's neck rose. "Rurik?" she called, crossing toward the ladder to the loft.

Loki barked, and Freyja tried to hush him. Then he darted into the shadows, growling deep in his throat in a sound she'd never heard from him before.

"What is it?" she asked, taking a step back. There was something about the sullen silence in the barn that bothered her. Someone was there. And she didn't think it was Rurik.

A man cursed under his breath, and then Loki yelped and fled. "Little bastard."

"Who's there?" she demanded, peering into the shadows of the stall. "Loki?"

Noise whispered behind her. Freyja whirled, and another man stepped out of the shadows. Darting toward her pitchfork, she turned and almost ran him through, baring her teeth at him. "Rurik!"

"He's not here," someone said behind her. "Seems you ran him off."

Rurik was gone? The warmth drained out of her. What had she done or said to him? She didn't understand. He'd said he... cared for her. Was it all just a jest? Or had Rurik merely been interested in bedding her, and given up?

That didn't make any sense. He could have had her yesterday afternoon if all he'd wanted was to bed her. If she were being honest with herself, she wasn't certain she would have said no.

Laughter spilled out of the shadows as another man appeared. "Can you blame him? Look at those eyes."

Three men circled her. The words shouldn't have hurt, but they did. The speaker made a vague sign of the cross.

"You," she said, recognizing one of them as Haakon's man, Gunnar. "Get off my property."

"Haakon wants a word with you," the man replied, holding his hands up in a placating manner. "We're not here to hurt you."

"If Haakon wants a word, then perhaps he should have asked nicely." Freyja made a feint toward the man on her right as he took a step toward her—the one who'd made comment on her eyes. Fear filled her chest, tightening her ribs around her lungs. What did they want of her? She'd thought Haakon was a man driven mad by loss, but he'd seemed to hold some common decency. Had she been wrong?

"Just grab her," the third man ordered. She still hadn't gotten a good look at his face, though he was taller than the others and something about his presence made her uncomfortable.

"Make one more move," Freyja told them, knowing she couldn't hold all three off with her pitchfork, "and I'll set my magic loose."

Silence fell. All three men froze. The only noise was Loki yipping and barking madly from where he seemed to be locked within a stall.

"You like my eyes?" she told the man who'd sneered at her and made a sign of the cross. "One of the huldufólk gave them to me, along with the gift of magic. I can manipulate storms, and throw lightning from my fingertips."

Two of the men exchanged a look.

“She’s lying,” said the taller one, the one who scared her a little. He snorted. “Why would one of the álfar gift her with magic?”

“Don’t call them that,” Freyja murmured. “They don’t like that name.”

Gunnar muttered something about “there are no hidden folk” under his breath, but it seemed her ruse had worked. He wasn’t going to grab her.

Crossing to the stall, the sinister man reached down and hauled Loki up by the scruff of his neck. “I am done with talking.” He reached for his knife—

Loki! “No!” The power seemed to flood up from somewhere within her, sending a whirlwind through the barn. Stalks of hay flew through the air, and both Gunnar and the superstitious man backed away from her, faces pale.

Freyja summoned heat into her hands, and turned on the man who’d grabbed Loki—

He hauled Loki against his chest, putting a razor-sharp blade to the little fox’s neck. “Use your magic against me, and I’ll cut his throat.”

Freyja let the power spill through her fingers, her heart thumping wildly in her chest. She could feel Loki’s terror and protective urges pushing against her mind. He wanted to rescue her, though he was frightened of whatever the tall man smelled like....

“Let him go,” she whispered, swallowing hard.

“Easy, Magnus,” the man with the enormous beard said. “We’re not here to spill blood.”

“We’re getting nowhere without it,” Magnus replied, and his eyes burned as they locked on her. “Release your power.”

There was no choice. Her gaze met Loki’s frightened amber eyes. Freyja let the wind and fire fade, the barn falling into silence. “If you hurt him,” she said coldly, “then I will not rest until you are naught but ashes.”

Gunnar and the other man grabbed her by the arms. Gunnar’s grip was at least gentle. “You won’t be hurt, I promise. Haakon just needs you for bait.”

Bait? For what?

The other man plunged a hood over her head, and the world faded, her breath refracting back from the black wool and making her feel slightly claustrophobic. Tears pricked her eyes.

“Keep her eyes covered!” Magnus ordered. “If she cannot see, then she cannot work her magic.”

And Freyja shivered, because how had he known that?

Rurik soared back to earth behind Freyja’s barn, his form shrinking and power rushing through his veins as he made the change. A dreki’s bugle to the south had sent him hunting, circling Krafla and looking for the challenger, only to find nothing.

Or maybe that was an excuse. He was still haunted by that moment during their picnic, when something monumental seemed to shift inside him.

Freyja.

Sighing, he found his clothes where he'd left them, and was about to pull on his trousers when Loki's terrified barking caught his ears. Rurik froze. It seemed to be coming from within the barn.

"Little brother?" he asked, his thought-thread tangling with the fox's.

—angry, snapping at air, took the mistress, hurt her, hurt her, let me out—

Rurik tried to sort his way through the terror and fury. "Freyja? Someone took Freyja? Who?"

Images assaulted him: the bearded giant who rode at Haakon's side, and a stranger he didn't recognize.

But it was the image of the third man that made him suck in a sharp breath. A man with sharp, predatory features, amber eyes, and raven-dark hair. A man who held a knife to the little fox's throat and used the threat to force Freyja to submit.

"Magnus," he whispered, turning his face toward the village.

His cousin had Freyja.

Chapter 12

They tied her to the village green, both of her hands bound and tethered by pegs they drove into the hard earth. A rough strip of black linen covered her eyes, leaving her blind to the nightmare about to befall her.

“Please,” Freyja begged, but without her sight there was nothing for her to work with. She was blind to the world around her, and the ropes they used to tether her had been drenched in blessed water. It itched against her skin, resisting all her attempts to free herself.

The truth of it stung. They had planned this—no, Benedikt had planned it. He alone knew of the strength of her unnaturalness, and had worked to counter her.

Her heart thundered raggedly in her ears as the crowd fell silent. She could hear the harsh rasp of Benedikt’s breath behind her. Excited. Enjoying her discomposure. Be careful of a man’s pride, my love, her mother had whispered when they’d both noticed the way Benedikt began to watch her. It is a dangerous thing, and unpredictable if rebuffed.

“Blow the horn,” he instructed.

The enormous bellow of the troll horn cut through the silence, rumbling across her skin and vibrating in her ears. Freyja flinched. She had never felt so helpless in her life. This was what her mother had warned her of. Choose your battles wisely, Freyja... for you are not invulnerable. Every creature of power had a weakness, even the mighty dreki they were summoning to claim her.

Where was Rurik? She didn’t believe he’d left her. She couldn’t believe. But if he hadn’t gone, then he would have heard the villagers take her. He wouldn’t just let them do this to her. Would he?

The thought made her breath catch.

Unless he truly had gone. She shivered as her memory of their words that morning washed over her. “We’re done here,” he had said, a death knell of finality underscoring the statement. Stepping back, bowing his head politely to her.

Rurik! She threw the thought out into the world on an ache of despair. I’m sorry!

There was no answer but the wind swirling through her skirts. Then the thundering bellow of the troll horn again. The last time a man had blown that horn had been thirty years ago, when her father and the other villagers called the dreki forth to forge the treaty.

“Here he comes,” Benedikt murmured with satisfaction. His voice dropped even lower as he stepped closer. “I’ll see you when you return, my sweet.”

No mistaking the dark intent behind those words. If he couldn’t have her now, then he would take the scraps that were left once the dreki had finished with her.

Freyja strained at the ropes to no avail. Her shoulders sagged as she heard the villagers moving back, scurrying for the safety of their homes to watch.

She couldn’t see. Yet she felt, more than anything, the mighty thrust of wings through an icy sky; the sudden ache of the pressure his immense presence wrought.

Wind beat down upon her as the dreki wheeled overhead. Freyja went to her knees, but there was no escape. She was almost flattened by the wind his mighty wings stirred, as the tether binding her left arm was tugged, then fell away.

The right snatched loose, the rope nearly jerking her arm from its socket. Free? She froze for one tremulous second, gathering her feet beneath her.

“Not free,” the dreki whispered in her mind. “Mine.”

Then its massive claws curled around her shoulders with a delicate gentleness, and with a mighty surge, he thrust into the sky.

She screamed and wrapped her arms around the scaled claws; terrified the dreki would drop her.

“Release!” That was Haakon’s voice.

The world turned upside down as the dreki’s war cry pierced the air and it threw itself into a tumble. Over and over and over, her body jerked around like a rag doll. Something screamed through the air as it tore past them, and Freyja suddenly realized what had happened.

They’d used her as bait. Something to lure the dreki from his lair so they could kill him.

She ripped the blindfold from her eyes as the dreki righted himself, catching a glimpse of the tableau beneath them. Wind whipped at her skirts as little figures ran and screamed, pointing at the sky above them.

Haakon was clearly visible, the muscles in his biceps straining as he loaded the ballista and cranked the shaft back. The heavy steel cable tautened, the deadly sharp spear gleaming in the sunlight.

And Freyja felt a rage she’d rarely felt before.

Not powerless now. Not blinded, her magic muted within. She lashed out, her temper a whip she wielded with ruthless efficiency. She couldn’t touch the iron cable—iron was one of the few things that refused her power—but the heavy wooden wheels of the ballista were made of the earth. As Haakon reached for the release, she smashed each wheel.

The ballista angled forward, its sharp steel point dropping as the handle tore through Haakon’s grip. The cable let go, steel snapping with an audible twang as the javelin cut straight through cloth and flesh and buried itself in the stone wall of one of the houses, with Benedikt dangling from the end of it.

He squealed like a stuck pig as the dreki wheeled around curiously to watch.

“Remind me never to allow you near that thing,” the dreki whispered in her mind with a laugh.

Then he angled sharply, his fluid shape cutting through the wind as he soared toward Krafla.

“What makes you think I need a ballista?” she replied.

The flight was barely ten minutes, but even Freyja was starting to shiver with cold by the time Krafla loomed in front of them. The sparse, barren fields that surrounded the volcano smoked and bubbled, but she could see the glittering white of the glacial fields further south, and her breath caught, even as the wind stole it from her.

She could scarce believe the sight before her. The entire world stretched out in miniature, like a map come to life.

The dreki touched her mind, as if wondering what had caught her attention so. A light caress against her senses, a sudden connection where she sensed his curiosity.

“You wish to see the glaciers? I will take you one day....”

And just like that her sense of wonder died, protective walls sliding into place between her mind and his. “Put me down.” She eyed the sheer rock walls of the volcano’s side. “Gently, please.”

They wheeled lower, the sudden downthrust of his wings halting them mere feet above the ledge that led to the caves. His claws released her, and Freyja dropped. She landed on the ledge, her ankle giving way beneath her as she fell. Though his touch had been gentle, her shoulders ached from his grip, and for a moment she simply lay there, trying not to hurt.

The sinuous head was suddenly directly in her field of vision, and Freyja screamed despite herself, scrambling onto her back and away. The dreki froze, his golden eyes gleaming.

“Are you hurt?”

Freyja stared at him with the rock walls against her back, her breath coming hard and her skirts tumbled around her knees. “Am I hurt?” she gasped weakly, hot and sharp emotion dampening her eyes. She could barely hold it in anymore. The only creature that gave a damn about her was the dreki, and even he had ulterior motives, though what they were she couldn’t even begin to guess.

“I have been kidnapped, tied down, and offered as sacrifice to... to you. Then dragged through the air, dropped, and—” She couldn’t hold it in anymore. Rurik, damn you. “Nobody came to save me! They all just watched! My father will be beside himself with worry! Who will care for him? What do you want with me? Damn you, what?”

She exploded into tears, angry, damning tears that blinded her to the world around her. The last thing she thought she saw was an expression on the dreki’s face that could only be described as perplexed. And that set her off, laughing, crying, and hiccupping all at the same time.

“Why am I even telling you?” she whispered, scrubbing at her hot eyes. “You would not even begin to understand what is wrong with me. With the world.”

“There are many things wrong with the world. These puny humans insist on marking it as theirs, even though it belongs to no one.”

“Not even you?”

His glorious eyes narrowed. “Only a fool thinks he owns such power. I may wield it, but I do not own it. And why would I wish to?” Even she heard the hesitation. “I admit I am not certain what is wrong with you, however. It is difficult to understand in this form. Where is your blindfold?”

“M-my blindfold?” she stammered. “I tore it free.”

“Make another.”

Freyja’s jaw dropped. “What for?”

“So you cannot see.”

And blinded, she would be powerless again. “No.”

“I will not hurt you, Freyja. I swear it.”

As binding as a dreki’s oath, the goodwives often said, to indicate manners of legal standing. No dreki would willingly break his word.

She'd felt powerless when Benedikt jerked her out to the green, hooded and vulnerable. Powerless when she cowered beneath the unknown, wondering when the dreki would strike. She hated that feeling.

Yet her hands tugged at her hem, taking the small knife she wore secreted in her boot and slicing a strip of the black wool free. Shaking slightly, Freyja bound it over her eyes, the wool irritating her reddened skin. He was not taking her power away. He had asked, and she had complied. That gave her some illusion of control.

Power washed over her, hot and liquid, an enormous cascade of it. Every inch of her skin tingled, her stomach pooling with heat. Tidal waves of molten power. She wanted to reach out and drag her hands through it, but something warned her not to.

“Because I do not wish you to see me,” a man’s deep baritone voice said.

Freyja’s jaw dropped open, her hands rising automatically to her blindfold.

“Don’t,” he warned.

Somehow she stopped herself, though she couldn’t contain the shock. He’d said there was little reason to shift shape. And with that thought came another, unbidden. Why do the dreki hunger for virgin flesh, Freyja? Not to eat, for a certainty. Which means....

“Because we are jealous creatures,” the dreki replied, his bare feet rasping over the stone as he stepped closer. She heard skin shivering over muscle as he knelt in front of her. “We do not like it when someone has touched what is ours.”

Fingers came out of nowhere and stroked her cheek. Freyja jerked, her heart racing, but his touch was soft. Gentle. Like a man soothing a startled filly. Insanely hot, as though the volcano’s fire burned beneath his skin.

And suddenly suspicion burned within her.

This wasn't the first time a man's skin burned with an unnatural heat. No. It couldn't be. Could it?

"What do you want of me?" she whispered. But she knew. Oh God, she knew. And even as she thought it, she suddenly started putting together the little puzzle pieces in her mind.

He hesitated, but not, she thought, for lack of courage. Gauging her reaction, most likely. "It is time, Freyja."

His warm hand cupped her cheek and she softened, leaning into it. Hungering for... something. Not want, not need. So desperately did she want to be touched as if someone cared.

And this fearsome creature had never hurt her, nor betrayed her.

But had he misled her? She didn't know the answer to that.

"Yes," she whispered, leaning into the dreki's touch. There was only one sure way to find out if her suspicions were true.

Let me burn my fingers, just once....

His hand caught hers, drawing her fingers to his scalding lips. "You will not be burnt, Freyja, but you will burn, this I promise."

And a dreki never lied.

Chapter 13

Arms swung beneath her and lifted her with appalling ease, swinging her against a chest that was chiseled with muscle and entirely hairless. Freyja pressed a palm over his heart, feeling the erratic thump of it deep within him. An almost purring sound echoed in his throat. Pleasure. As he swept her under the overhang of the cave into a blackness that she noticed even with her eyes bound, she slowly rested her head against his shoulder.

No sight. But she could smell him, that sweet cinnamon smell that seemed almost familiar, and she could hear the rapid thump of his heartbeat beneath the curl of her palm. Her fingers flexed, exploring the feel of him. She quite suspected he was completely naked, and despite everything that had happened to her today, she couldn't help feeling curious about this fact.

The only man she had ever come into such close contact with was Rurik, that night in Akureyri and again in the barn. Her cheeks flamed as a flash of memory struck her: gasping beneath his kiss, grinding her hips against the hard bulge of his erection, begging, her nails digging into the hard slab of his shoulders....

And again suspicion danced within her.

Perhaps it was the dreki she curled against. His voice was deeper than Rurik's, but something in the timbre of it reminded her of the man, and they were much of a build perhaps. Strong, sleek muscle slid beneath her fingers. She flexed again, tracing the harsh edge of his clavicle, dancing her fingers up the thick column of his throat as she explored. She couldn't deny how similar they seemed....

"If you keep petting me like that I shall not make the bed," he purred in her mind.

Instantly Freyja's curious touch froze. "The bed? You have a bed?"

What would he need such a thing for? Then her cheeks heated again. There was only one purpose she could think of....

"I created it for you, Freyja. The night you came here, hunting for your ram." His mind brushed against hers, a dark caress that made her gasp. A feeling of overwhelming satisfaction flooded through the link between them. "Dreki can manipulate raw matter if they will it, and create small pockets of existence out of Chaos magic. The dreki court is one such place. A... sidestep into another world, if you will. Or a small pocket of existence within a bubble of Chaos. It's how Tiamat first created the universe, except her bubble expanded until it contained the entire world, and many others. You're about to enter one, so it may feel strange at first."

"Why would you create it for me?" she whispered, though her heart ticked loudly in her chest.

"Would you prefer that we do this on the floor of the cave?"

This? Freyja swallowed.

"Because I want you," the dreki added in a quieter thought-thread. "There have been no other women for me. Not for a long time. You are important to me, and I wanted us to have time alone, where we will not be interrupted."

"Why me?" She turned her face in the dark, feeling her breath refract off the skin of his throat.

Another low growl sounded deep in his chest. "Vixen." Then he laughed. "Because nobody has ever challenged me the way you did." And he sounded incredibly pleased with this fact. His arms tightened, possessive and strong. "Fierce," he whispered in her mind.

And Freyja stilled.

Fierce. A word that another man had used for her. A man who hadn't been there today to rescue her.

She felt that soft brush against her senses and pulled everything about herself in tight, thrusting up her mental shields as she sorted through the sudden cacophony of thought. All her suspicions seemed to form into one loud voice.

Memories flooded through her:

Rurik suddenly turning up in Akureyri, a stranger she likes that even the local port town had never seen.

Rurik, with his deep knowledge of dreki culture, and the way he'd challenged Haakon about killing the dreki.

Rurik, kissing her in the barn, his touch setting her alight even as he proclaimed fate had thrown her into his path.

Suddenly it all made a horrid kind of sense, like a dozen misshapen puzzle pieces abruptly fitting into place. And she didn't know how she felt about that. Angry that he'd lied to her. Relieved, that all the little things that hadn't quite added up finally made sense. And also a vague, choking sense of loss.

Because some part of her had begun to look at Rurik in a way that saw him in her life forever, and now there was no chance of that.

"I do not like it when you close yourself off," he growled.

"You may have my body, my lord," she responded tartly, even as she worked her way through her confusion, "but you do not have the right to all of me."

Tension radiated through his menacing build. Oh no, he did not like that at all, and now she had a powerful, irritated dreki to handle.

Strange, how fear was the last thing she felt. She knew this man—or creature. He wouldn't hurt her, of that she was certain.

No, not physically.

Freyja slid a hand down his chest, enjoying the soft feel of his skin and the power that she suddenly felt. He had the ability to take her mind, rip it apart, and steal any of her thoughts. But he wouldn't. She knew so little about this curious beast, but that was one truth. There was more honor in a single eyelash of this inhuman creature than in Benedikt's entire being.

"You think to taunt me?" He didn't sound irritated anymore. Intrigued, perhaps. "You throw such challenges in my face without thought to consequences."

"Consequences?"

"Yes," he hissed. "You'll let me in by the end of this night, Freyja. I swear you shall."

The dreki turned her sideways and Freyja clung to him, sliding her arms around his neck. A cool wash of power whispered over her skin like static, as though she'd stepped inside the heart of a storm itself. "What is that?"

"It's a portal to my Chaos bubble."

The static shot straight through her, current consuming her until she gasped. Whatever they stepped into, she could feel the immensity of his power riding through the walls and humming through the floors. The air was cooler here too, and something sweet lingered in the room like a scented oil. It wasn't painful, but she couldn't escape it.

"Here we are, Freyja." He let her slide slowly down his body, each glorious inch of him pressing against her. Freyja's feet landed on the floor with a small jolt, and she leaned against his chest to catch her balance.

Her hands fought to make sense of what her eyes could not tell her. Bare skin met her touch everywhere, and she could feel the heavy thrust of his cock against her stomach. Her first instinct was to step back, but as her fingernails raked over his abdomen, she found herself hovering in indecision.

And then an evil thought brewed.

It would serve him right for deceiving her. "I want you," Freyja whispered. "I've never before wanted a man like I want you."

Hands softened on her hips. "Never?"

"Never."

The dreki stilled. "Surely there has been one...."

"Not a single one." Let him chew on that.

A faint growl sounded in his throat. Then he moved past her, the brush of his skin against her sleeve turning her head. Fingers trailed over her hip. "Let me close the portal so we won't be disturbed."

Behind her she heard the soft swish of a rug—or carpets—parting beneath his heavy tread. Freyja's heart jumped into her throat as she lifted her hands. Dare she? A wave of resolve swept over her. Pandora... Psyche... she knew their weaknesses well. And the growing certainty in her heart made her fingers jerk to the blindfold and tug it free.

Freyja blinked as the room swam into view, the haze of candlelight melting over an enormous bed covered in decadent red sheets of some material she'd never seen before. Cushions spilled over the surface, white and gold and red. Her eyes couldn't quite take in all of the gilt. Mirrors clung to walls everywhere, sconces gleaming with candlelight. And small lashes of static lightning seemed to arc through the walls, as if they weren't quite solid.

Her eyes lifted to the arched stone ceilings far above. Columns of heavy rock supported the roof, craggy and unfinished, as though he'd hewn this bubble out of the heart of the volcano itself. The mixture of savage nature and human decadence suited him.

Freyja's breath caught as she took a step forward, toward the bed. A room fit for a prince.

The sudden loss of static alerted her to the fact that the bubble was now closed. She spun on her heel, the strip of black wool hanging from her fingertips as her gaze raked over him. One hand splayed against a stone circle in the wall as he whispered ancient words to the stone.

Golden windswept hair brushed against his nape, smooth amber skin sweeping all the way down.... Her ruthless gaze raked over the heavy muscle in his back and the taut globes of his buttocks. Her mouth dropped open, but it was too late. Something told him she was watching him.

Rurik turned around sharply.

Amber eyes narrowed over that once-broken nose as he saw her glaring at him. Silence fell, and Rurik tilted his head curiously. "You don't seem surprised."

"I only just figured it out," Freyja snapped. "Fierce? That's a word you use to describe me, in both forms."

"I see. You're angry."

Freyja set her hands on her hips. "I was starting to care for you. I trusted you, and you don't know how rare that is for me." There was a lump forming in her throat. "You told me 'we were done here.' And I felt bad about your history and what your family did to you. I even tried to cook something nice for you...."

Those eyes turned considering. "You thought I had said we were done?"

Freyja stilled. "That's what you said."

There was a dangerous look in his eyes. "It was an uncomfortable conversation for me, one that brought up many old memories. I didn't mean...." He cursed. "And you: 'Not a single man has ever tempted me'?" he paraphrased her, crossing his arms over his broad chest, a move that highlighted everything else.

Do not look down. Too late. She could feel heat spilling into her cheeks. "You deserved that. You lied to me!"

"I never lied," he growled, taking a step toward her. The hard planes of his stomach were dusted with golden hair, and his cock bobbed against—

She jerked her gaze to his face, with its sensual mouth and cat-slit eyes. The dreki swelled within him. Not quite human, not quite her Rurik. But still there. "Not directly," she replied, recalling a half-dozen statements that, in hindsight, had revealed all. "That must have required some very careful wording.”

“Oh, it did.”

Anger swelled. “The whole time I was tied to that stake, I waited for you to come for me, but you—”

“I did come for you.”

“For me?” she demanded. “Or to flaunt your might in front of Haakon and his men?”

“For you.” Rurik’s eyes shuttered, and he stepped toward her with dangerous allure. “Everything’s been for you. Do you think I would take human form for the sheer enjoyment of it? I told you this was fate, Freyja. The night you dared come into my lair was the moment I knew you were the one. How could you doubt I would come for you? You’re mine, Freyja.”

“Don’t say that.”

“Why?” he asked. “You know I cannot lie.”

“I challenged you,” she pointed out. “That’s why you did this. And you might not lie, but your wording—”

“You’re mine,” he growled out, and there was nothing to say to that, no means with which to misunderstand him.

Freyja tilted her chin up stubbornly, aware the ground was shifting beneath her.

“Of course it’s because you challenged me.” His voice turned gravelly. “You’re beautiful, but I have seen beautiful women before. No, what captured my attention was your fierce pride and stubbornness. Your determination. The storm brought me a warrior in female flesh, and I knew then that I wanted you. You were utterly glorious that night. Because you challenged me. Because, in all my long years in exile, I have never met a woman who dared.”

Freyja’s gaze dropped, then she jerked her head away, the image of his nude body burned into her retinas. He was taller now than he’d ever been as Rurik, bristling with heavy muscle, the ripple of his abdomen giving way to the proud jut of his cock. A creature that sauntered toward her with unearthly grace, knowing that it alone was the ultimate predator.

She swallowed, her voice suddenly very small. “And what happens when you’ve conquered me?”

“How does one conquer a storm?”

That was not an answer. How typically dreki of him.

Freyja took a step back as he took one toward her. She had refused to allow Rurik to court her, knowing she risked her heart. Yet a small part of her had begun to think perhaps he might own some genuine feelings toward her. She liked his flirting. She liked having him chase her. She’d even begun to think of him as something more: a potential husband, a lover, a friend. A whisper of a dream she’d not even thought existed in her heart. And this time, it was no small dream.

An impossible one now.

The dreki did not fit into her future. Rurik had, but he did not.

“You do not seem pleased.”

“You’re not who I thought you were.” None of this had turned out to be what she had thought it was, and a little part of her ached at the loss.

“You made your own assumptions and I didn’t bother to correct them.”

“Because it served your purpose!”

He took a dangerous step toward her. “And what do you think my purpose is?”

Freyja didn’t look behind her, but she could almost feel the heavy presence of the bed at her back. Her fists clenched and she tipped her chin up, the scrap of wool still in her fingers. It was very clear what he had wanted of her now.

“If that was all I wanted, Freyja,” he purred, “then I would have had you last night.”

A smile curled over his made-for-kissing mouth. Dangerous. Despite everything, her heart started thumping faster, excitement flooding through her veins, as her body recognized that look.

“You’ve cornered the dreki in his den,” Rurik whispered in her mind, the touch of it trailing over her heated skin. “Now what do you think I should do to you for disobeying me?”

“I didn’t disobey you.” Another step back. Then another. She dropped the blindfold, her chin tilting with the same stubborn arrogance he owned himself. “You told me to put the blindfold on, and I did. You never said I mustn’t take it off.”

“You argue like dreki.” His hand reached out toward her, and Freyja’s breath caught in her throat. “Or a solicitor.”

“Considering the fact you willfully deceived me, you have little ground to stand upon,” she shot back.

“True. But now we’re here, and you know the truth. What are you going to do now?” His burning gaze lit her blood on fire. “Always stubborn, my Freyja. I think that is what I like about you most. That you never fear what you probably should.”

“Why should I fear you?” She took another step back, the backs of her knees hitting the bed. “After all, you’re the one who warned me you don’t intend to harm me. No, what was it? You planned to eat me all up.”

That smile turned dangerous. There was nowhere to go. “Perhaps I still plan to eat you all up.”

Rurik took that last step between them and then she was tumbling onto a mattress so soft and fine that for a moment, she could only stroke the deliciously soft material that covered it.

“Silk,” he murmured with amusement. That devilish light still lit his eyes. “Especially for you, Freyja. I have dreamed of you on my silk sheets. Dreamed of what I would do to you.” That hot gaze scored her body. “Wondered how soft your skin would feel against the silk.” He held his arms out, the thick muscle in them flexing as he gestured to the room. “All of this was for you, and you say all I want from you is one night?”

Freyja swallowed hard. He didn’t know what he did to her with those words, or how long she’d dreamed of someone saying them to her. Foolishness. She knew it, and still she’d dreamed about it.

“I do know.” His eyelids hooded over dangerous eyes. “I want to say them all to you —and more.”

Freyja slammed her shields back into place. He wanted her in his bed. He’d pursued her, tricked her, and finally resorted to taking what he wanted. Well, she would let him. He would have her body; he would never have her heart.

Rurik bared his teeth at her, swooping down to pick up the blindfold. Freyja scrambled back, her skirts slipping on the cursed sheets. Then his hand locked around her ankle, burning hot and immovable. She squealed as he hauled her back toward him.

A hand slid behind the back of her knee, his callused flesh meeting hers as her skirts curled around her waist. The feel of his touch so intimately against her made a shiver run over her sensitive skin. Images from the night before drove into her brain, and she remembered everything.

“I want all of you, Freyja. Not just the parts you choose to share with me,” he told her, the other hand capturing the back of her other thigh. He parted her legs as he stepped between them, and yanked her closer to the edge of the mattress.

The position put her aggressively in front of him. Freyja’s hands pressed against his thighs as if to halt him, her fingers digging into the bare skin there. Deliciously soft skin rode over hard muscle. She looked down, unable to stop herself. A surge of something went through her at the sight of his arousal, leaving her frantically sucking in breath, her fingernails making small half-moon marks in his tanned flesh. She didn’t understand any of this. How could she ache so at the sight of his desire for her? The sensitive skin between her thighs throbbed with it, even as fear circled through her.

He asked too much of her. For he asked not just for sex, or to take what he wanted from her, but to own her. To possess her heart entirely, and make her his.

And that terrified her.

“Well, you don’t get to choose how much of me you get,” she shot back.

“Don’t tempt the dreki,” he said. His hand caught her chin and lifted it, one of his knees pressing into the mattress between her spread legs as he leaned over her. “Or there will be hell to pay.”

Freyja’s fingers flexed against his chest. Heavens, but every inch of him was hard. “You don’t scare me.”

“Really? Then why is your heart beating so hard?”

“Because I’m arguing,” she pointed out.

Rurik gave her a slow, hot smile, amber eyes flaring with golden heat. “You’re always arguing.”

“I wouldn’t have to if you didn’t think you ruled this part of the world... and me.”

“You would argue until your face turned blue.” He leaned over her, one hand beside her hip. “You would argue until the world turned to dust. It wouldn’t matter what I said.”

“Then why bother with me?”

“Maybe I like arguing with you.” His cheek brushed against hers, his lips nuzzling her ear. “It gets me all hot under my skin. Makes me think of ways I could win the argument.”

Heat crept up her throat. She felt like she was in his claws again, flying through the air with the wind whipping past her. Any moment he could drop her, and then she'd be freefalling through the air, and damn her beating heart, but the thought almost excited her. "Rurik."

"Like this...." His mouth trailed across her jawline.

Freyja's breath caught. His knee came down on the bed between her thighs, pressing her skirts beneath it. She was trapped. And all of this... predatory male heat was spilling over her.

"And this." Another kiss skated over her cheek, then her mouth. He nibbled at her lips, his tongue darting out to taste her.

Freyja tumbled onto her back as he followed her down, leaning on his elbows above her. That enormous weight came down upon her, pressing her hips into the mattress, and... oh, lord. Freyja's eyes shot wide, even as he claimed her mouth.

There was no denying him, nor herself. She didn't want to. She wanted to drink down this memory, to give herself something to sustain her in future days. One night with the man who made her heart leap in her chest.

"Am I winning the argument, Freyja?" he whisper-laughed against her lips.

Damn him. She curled her nails in his shoulder, and a soft groan escaped him. Freyja's fingers flexed as thought raced. Maybe there was more than one way to best him?

"I offer you this one night," she managed to say as his mouth brushed hers again.

Rurik's lips stilled, tension coiling through his shoulders. "I want all of them."

"We don't always get what we want." Some lick of anger stirred in her, and he drew back, hands fisted in the sheets beside her head, his eyes glowing with that strange light.

Freyja waited for him to deny her or demand more. Instead, a slow, wicked smile curled over his lips.

"Stubborn," he whispered, dropping his head to kiss her throat. His lips burned and Freyja writhed helplessly, a shiver running across her skin. "You throw challenges at me as if they were curses. Haven't you learned? There is no better way to capture my interest than to challenge me."

"I wasn't challenging you. I was setting the rules." She gasped as his wet tongue dipped into the hollow of her clavicle.

"I don't like your rules." As if to prove the point, his teeth dug into the tender skin of her shoulder. Shifting his weight to one side, he slid his roughened hand over the soft wool of her dress. Tracing her hips, her bottom. He thrust into the vee of her thighs, his cock riding over the wool. "There are no rules, Freyja. Not in this. You are mine. I'm not letting you go now."

She caught his shoulder, her breath catching as he rubbed against her. "You don't have a choice."

"No?" Rurik's lip curled back in a hiss as he lifted his head. "We'll see. Now you have the dreki to pay, my love. And he is much more dangerous than your devil."

Another kiss captured the protest on her lips. A kiss full of possession and ruthlessness, a kiss to drown in. It told her more than words precisely what was going through his mind. He staked his claim on her mouth, his tongue thrusting past her lips even as his hips slid against hers again. Somehow his hand slid down her leg, drawing her knee up so that he settled deep between her thighs. The position made her gasp, but there was no escaping him.

Even if she'd wanted to.

Freyja's fingers curled in the heated skin of his shoulders, her nails flexing against the heavy slabs of muscle. One night she would give him, and she would take everything he had to offer her. She began to kiss him back. Sweet goddess, why had she ever resisted?

"That's it," he whispered, locking her ankles behind his bottom. Her skirts bunched between them, and she could feel the rasp of the fine hairs on his legs against her inner thighs. "Kiss me, Freyja." His voice dropped into a series of words she didn't understand, yet somehow her body did. The whisper curled in her abdomen, pulling at her, wetting her, making her ache.

She rocked against him, hands sliding up his nape and locking in his hair. This time her mouth met his, cutting off those foreign words. Her tongue darted against his. The taste of him was as smoky as his scent. And by the gods, it felt good. So, so good.

Rurik growled deep in his throat as he caught her wrists and pinned her to the bed. He nipped at her lip. "You steal my intent," he rasped, "and make me forget to take this slowly."

"I don't want slow." A gasp stole from her lips. His erection slid against her inner thigh. "I want you to make me feel...."

She needed to surrender to the storm building between them. Every inch of her body ached in unfulfillment.

Rurik's gaze half shuttered. He lowered his head and bit the fleshy lobe of her ear. "But you forget," his whisper trailed down her throat, "that you are not in control here."

Pinned beneath him, her body spread in surrender, Freyja narrowed her eyes. "I could be." She slid the soles of her feet down the backs of his thighs, rubbing her hips against him right where it ached the fiercest.

And she felt the response shudder through him, his gasp wetting her skin. "Vixen." Rurik bit her chin, her lower lip, lifting his hips away from her. "It appears I shall have to take a firmer hand with you."

Freyja's nipples hardened. "What does that mean?"

Rurik dragged the woolen blindfold up and tossed it on the bed beside her. Kneeling over her, he smiled darkly. "You're wearing far too many clothes."

Freyja rocked onto her elbows, eyeing the blindfold. "What did you mean?"

But Rurik urged her over onto her hands and knees, kissing the back of her neck and trailing his lips over the sensitive skin there as she straightened. A shiver of pure need lanced through her. He tugged at the buttons that ran down between her breasts, popping each free of its loop. The black wool sagged over her shoulders and he tugged it down to her hips, teeth sinking into the soft flesh of her shoulder.

Freyja lost herself in the sensation of his mouth. Rurik yanked the dress over her bottom and out from under her knees. Freyja shivered, practically naked. Suddenly a sense of shyness swept over her.

“And this,” he murmured, starting to slide her chemise up.

Freyja flinched as the worn fabric slid over bare bottom, her cheeks heating. “Rurik—”

“Now this,” he purred, “is better.”

Lips traced the skin of her hip as he slid her chemise up her back. Freyja yelped as his teeth left a mark on the fleshy bottom. Then he was pushing the chemise over her head, tongue trailing up the indentation of her spine.

Blinded by the fabric, Freyja tried to fight her way free. His hair-roughened thighs pressed against hers, his cock dipping between her legs in a teasing movement that had her heart racing. Then she was free, and he was rolling her onto her back, one hand sliding up her throat to capture her jaw as he took her mouth fiercely.

Couldn’t think with him kissing her like that, thrusting against her, dragging her hands up above her head. Stealing her breath until her head spun and she was pinned beneath him, something tightening around one wrist... then the other.

Rurik levered off her just enough for Freyja to catch her breath, and then she realized she still couldn’t move. She tugged at her bound wrists, craning her head back to make sure that, yes, he had tied her to the bed, and now she was naked and lushly spread before him like his own personal banquet. “What are you doing?”

“Taking my time.” That wicked, self-satisfied look was back. Then his gaze locked on her body, and Freyja went still at the hungry look in his eyes. “You are so perfect.” His hand skittered over her ribs as he knelt between her thighs.

Freyja squirmed as his gaze dropped to the thatch of blonde hair between her legs. No man had ever seen her like this.

“I could just eat you all up,” he purred, leaning over her, kissing her breasts, his teeth rasping over her nipples. “After all, is that not what you claimed that dreki do? Devour innocent young maidens....” His breath stirred against her skin.

Suddenly it was all Freyja could do to stay still. “Please—oh, gods, oh!” How could a woman think like this? With his hands and mouth all over her, stroking her ribs, up under her breasts, plumping them up for the heat of his mouth. His tongue swirled teasing circles around each nipple, suckling them, making the ache fiercer.

The pressure in her body almost hurt. She could feel it building, a storm within. One of his palms pressed against her lower abdomen, as if sensing the power there.

“Yes,” he whispered, and heat slid from his hand, sinking down into the molten core of her.

Then those lips were trailing lower, his tongue darting into her navel. Freyja’s eyes went wide. He wasn’t—? Another kiss lower, as he nuzzled into the blonde hair between her thighs, sent a thrill of shock through her. He was. Suddenly she understood all the “devouring her” references.

“Rurik!” His name stole from her lips in a gasp as those broad shoulders nudged her thighs wider. Freyja craned her neck, unable to look away. His honey-gold hair fell across her pale stomach, and then he glanced up with one last smoldering smile, before he lowered his face and licked her.

There.

Volcanic heat sent a rush of power flooding through her body. Freyja’s spine arched at the lance of sensation, her feet digging into the bed. She couldn’t think. Could barely breathe. Sweet goddess, but what was he doing to her? “Oh, my God!”

The wet lash of his tongue left her with nowhere to hide. He nuzzled her, suckling the small bud between her thighs gently, until she could do little more than pant helplessly, straining at the woolen tie around her wrists.

“Am I winning the argument now, Freyja?” he purred.

“What... argument...?”

A laugh, and then Rurik tongued her deeply.

Suddenly it became too much for her. She felt like she stood in the heart of a maelstrom, or as if her own lightning had struck her body. Freyja screamed, hips jerking beneath his tender ministrations as Rurik licked her with slow, purposeful intent, absorbing each and every aftershock until she felt wrung dry.

She didn’t know if she could stand it any longer. Freyja gasped. “Please. Please... I can’t...”

Then he was kissing his way up her smooth abdomen, while she shivered, her inner muscles clenching. Freyja realized the room around her trembled, and Rurik glanced up, then looked at her with a slight frown.

She could barely think, but something about his expression managed to penetrate the fogged state of bliss she existed in. “What’s wrong?”

“You shouldn’t be able to affect this place.” Capturing her face in both hands, he rested between her thighs, the heaviness of his body so abruptly intimate that she sucked in a sharp breath. “What are you?” he whispered, and not for the first time.

“I don’t know.”

“I will find out.”

“Good. Then maybe you can tell me?”

Freyja swallowed, glancing down between them. His skin rubbed against hers, hairs rasping between her slick thighs. She couldn’t even contemplate what he’d just done to her. It seemed... indecent. Shocking. Wonderfully wicked. And she wanted more.

“I would love to know what you’re thinking right now.”

Not quite a question from her mighty dreki, yet nor was it a command. Freyja kissed his mouth gently. “Untie me. Please.”

He smiled, and nuzzled her lips. She could taste the musk of her own body there. “Why should I? I like you like this. Splayed out like some treasure I’m about to plunder.” The smooth rock of his hips showed her exactly what he meant by the word plunder. The heavy length of his cock slid slickly against her, riding over exactly the same spot he'd recently devoured.

"Because I want to touch you," she cried.

Those amber eyes shuttered. "Hmm," he said. But he reached up and tugged her wrists free.

Freyja slid her hands over his shoulders. She felt freedom in this moment, unfettered by so many of the unspoken rules that had governed her life. And she wanted to take, just as much as she wanted to be taken.

"Touch me then," Rurik whispered, and Freyja slid her hands down his chest, over the rock-hard ripple of his abdomen. Her finger tangled in the trail of blond hair that grazed his navel, then hovered there.

"You're not stopping there, are you?" purred her golden dreki. He clasped her hand, and drew it lower. "Not you, my ever-curious Freyja."

Curious, indeed.

Freyja locked eyes with him as he pressed her hungry touch over the heated steel of his erection. Time to throw caution to the wind. He felt enormous in her palm, and Freyja could barely wrap her fingers around him. Rurik shuddered, his lips parting as he curled her hand around the engorged width of him. "That's it," he whispered, eyelids lowering in sleepy abandon. The tip of his erection darted along the slit between her thighs. Freyja froze at the lash of sensation, then cupped him again, learning his most intimate secrets.

Rurik stole her mouth again, and something began to stretch her. She dragged her hand over his hip, curling her fingers in the flesh of his ass, not quite certain whether she could handle this.

"Fate, Freyja," Rurik breathed, and finally pushed inside her.

It was too much. And not enough. She wasn't sure what she wanted, but as he thrust inside her, she could feel that tremor building again. Her body pulsed at the ache of the invasion, even as it accommodated him.

Rurik groaned, his mouth slightly parted and his cock plunging within her. Freyja found herself lost to the storm building on the horizon. All she could feel was him. All she could breathe was him.

"More," he growled, and then he was rolling her over, shoving her onto her hands and knees. She'd barely had a chance to settle herself, when his thighs settled between hers and he was parting her once more, this time from behind.

Freyja cried out as Rurik buried himself to the hilt inside her. He felt deeper this way, and she didn't know how much of this she could stand, but she was more than willing to try. Power swept through her, threatening to consume her. How she had never tried this, she did not know. It felt utterly pagan, utterly sensual, and right in a way she did not understand.

"Because you were waiting for me," Rurik growled, and he must have caught the edge of her thoughts. His hands clasped her hips, and he slammed into her again. "Mine, Freyja. Only mine."

Only yours. She arched her back as his hand slid along her spine, curling in her hair. Each thrust took her right to the edge again as he brushed over something deep inside her. That pressure was back, threatening to erupt through her skin. Please. Yes. And more.

Then it was shivering through her. Freyja screamed. This time she wasn't alone. Rurik growled, spilling words in that language he sometimes spoke, his thrusts coming faster and faster, his body plunging within hers—

He shuddered, body rocking with fainter motions, holding her tight, one fist closing in her hair, the other leaving marks on her hip. “You belong to me,” he growled in her mind, as their thoughts fused together, and then she was utterly shattered as he spilled his hot seed within her.

Together they collapsed, Freyja's entire body aching with the force of his claiming. The sweetest ache she'd ever felt.

Freyja lay panting on her stomach, Rurik's enormous body covering hers, and his seed wetting her thighs. This moment was a peaceful one, drifting on a wave of post-coital bliss.

One night. She didn't know how she'd survive it.

Her dreki curled around her, his long, lean body pressed against hers from behind. He stroked her hair across her shoulder, and Freyja glanced up at him as he nuzzled her neck, scattering dozens of little kisses there. She felt utterly lost in that moment. Gone was her Rurik. In his place was a rather satisfied-with-himself dreki. The two seemed to combine, and she realized she'd only ever known half of their respective selves. This creature before her was a combination; the teasing man she'd kissed in the barn, and the powerful creature she'd met in a dark cave. A force of nature when he wanted to be, and a man who could be both warrior and scholar. His pupils seemed almost cat-slit, and golden light gleamed in his irises. Not human. Not now. If ever. And yet there was a sudden deep yearning in her heart, as they lay fused together, for she felt like she understood this creature in a way she'd never felt before. Lonely, he'd called himself once. Curious, somehow separated from the world, and hungry to reach out toward her. She could have been describing herself. Freyja stroked his hand where it rested on her shoulder. If only she could stay here forever, safe and secure, and utterly devastated with pleasure....

Rurik rubbed his cheek against her like a cat, his psychic touch brushing against her. “I have never in my life wanted anything more than I want you, Freyja.”

She reached back to him: “Neither have I.”

Her fingers paused on his hand, as she withdrew from the mental thread. She had promised herself one night. Nothing more. She didn't know if she dared accept anything else, for it was clear it would be far too easy for Rurik to steal her heart.

Nobody had ever come close to scaling the walls she shielded herself with. He could destroy her, if she let him. There was no future here for them.

Freyja rolled onto her back, staring up at the rock ceiling. Then she reached up and kissed him, cupping the back of his neck and dragging him atop her again.

One night.

And only one night.

Best not to waste a single second of it on doubt.

She was gone.

Rurik raged as morning revealed an empty bed, tearing at the walls with his claws and scattering the piles of gold with the lash of his tail. It spilled everywhere, sparkling in the light reflecting off his scales, but for the first time in his life it failed to soothe him.

Like most dreki, he loved gold, loved its shiny allure and glittering beauty, craving its presence in an almost obsessive way; but it was cold and it had no light of its own and it could not give him what he wanted.

He screamed his rage into the skies, feeling the walls of the tunnels shake and tremble around him. Beneath him the volcano stirred, hot molten lava licking at the crust that covered it, and bubbling below. He felt its heat seep through his mind, answering the frustration in his roar.

To unleash its lava would sate him. To let it burn and explode into the air, like a dreki's rage, the earth's furious answer to a storm above.

But there was a little cottage out there on the moors, its lights flickering cheerfully in the night. To unleash the mighty fury of Krafla would bury that cottage in ash or lava, sweeping away the one thing he wanted most.

Rurik let his head fall, his wings trembling with suppressed rage and pain. How could he win her back? Why would she not succumb to him? Why hold herself back?

And how had she stepped from this world, back into her own?

He had never felt this way before. The wurm's form separated him from the emotion he felt in his human form, yet even now he felt thwarted. He ached, and it wasn't a pleasant ache.

He had to win her back.

Somehow.

Chapter 14

Freyja grabbed the milking bucket as she opened the front door, and nearly went head over heels. Dawn light silvered the sky in the east, gleaming on the thing at her feet.

An ancient Viking helmet sat on the stone step, the burnished brass filled to the brim with gold and gemstones. Freyja's heart dropped to her stomach and she stepped over it, staring around. A single day had passed without a sign of her lover. She'd spent most of it tending to the jobs at the farm, but she couldn't deny that every whisper of wind made her heart race a little faster, and every shadow that flitted over her made her shoulders slump when she looked up and found only clouds.

He hadn't pursued her.

He hadn't even reached out to her.

Until now.

And she didn't know how she felt about that.

The world was quiet. Freyja's gaze took to the skies, but there was no sign of him there either, curse him. "You cannot buy me," she whispered, glaring down at the treasure.

She stared so long at its gleam that the sun began to warm the back of her neck, the single milking goat they owned bleating at the fence. Freyja sighed. Would one of the dreki even think this was mercenary, or would he consider this a courting gift? She had no way of knowing. Not without confronting him in his lair, which she was loath to do.

But if she accepted the treasure—even for one day—then he would think he had won. Freyja grumbled under her breath, despite the way her body heated. Every moment she'd spent in his arms was imprinted on her skin like a sensory burn. "Cursed wyrm."

A part of her wanted to go back there.

A part of her didn't dare.

The jingle of tack caught her ear, and Freyja realized what she'd been hearing, but not acknowledging, for several minutes: the soft thud of hoof beats on the marshy ground. The blood drained out of her face and she swung her milking bucket over the helmet to cover it, turning just in time to see a threesome of riders trot around the end of her barn.

Freyja hurried forward, trying to draw their attention away from the house and what rested on the doorstep, tucking her hands in her apron.

“Good morning,” she called in a barely civil tone, as Haakon rode into view through the morning mists.

He had some nerve in coming here.

His fur bristled over his shoulders, rimed with the morning’s frost, and the rasp of stubble darkened his cheeks. Those cold blue eyes locked on her through thick dark lashes. “Good morn.” He gave her a clipped nod, his gaze searching the yard as if looking for something.

Freyja’s gaze slid past him to the two riders that followed silently at his heels. A chill ran through her, though she didn’t know why. Magnus and another man, one she didn’t recognize. Both were dressed in menacing black leathers, with a crossbow strapped to each of their backs.

Magnus and Haakon had been involved in her kidnapping. And if they’d returned to further their mischief, then she was going to unleash all of the rage and frustration she felt.

Magnus caught her eye and bared his teeth in a smile. She swallowed hard against the instinct to step back, toward the safety of her home. Something about him set her on edge. Bristling with weapons, he turned his huge black stallion in a circle, ignoring the creature’s uncertain snort as he urged the beast closer to the barn. Steel spurs gleamed against the unrelieved black of Magnus’s boots, and his fingers were bare as he gripped the reins negligently in one hand. The other hand rested on the powerful muscle of his thigh, a garnet ring winking on his finger in the soft light.

“What do you want?” Freyja asked coolly. “For I warn you I am almost done with the three of you. If you have something further in mind than kidnapping, then we are going to have a serious disagreement.”

No ambush this time. She was ready to make her point, as the thunder that suddenly rumbled on the horizon proved.

“You seem none the worse for wear,” Magnus pointed out, and in that moment she hated him, he who had threatened her Loki.

“That’s enough,” Haakon warned him, and shot her an almost apologetic look. “We are not here to cause you further grief.”

Civility held. One didn’t speak of what happened when a dreki carried off a helpless young woman, though word of it was certain to be spreading around her small village.

None of her neighbors would ever receive her again. It was a curiously freeing realization.

The younger man swung down from his horse in a fluid movement, his raven-dark hair tumbling over his forehead. Those stunning blue eyes met hers and he smiled, white teeth dazzling. He’d not been involved in the kidnapping, and she hadn’t seen him on the village green. “Mistress Helgasdottir. You might consider this early morning visit my fault.” With a rueful smile, he slung his horse’s reins over its glossy bay head and patted it absently. The gelding’s nostrils flared, but he did not seem as unsettled as Magnus’s black.

“Andri’s horse threw a shoe some miles back,” Haakon said. “He’s beginning to favor his leg.”

“I’m not surprised.” Freyja reached out, offering her fingers to the bay to sniff. He snorted and danced at the end of the reins, not quite certain about her. Freyja stroked his velvety muzzle. “Hush, sweet boy,” she whispered, reaching out to brush her senses against his, a touch full of warmth and gentleness. She’d always had more affinity for animals than she had for people. “I won’t hurt you.”

Pure foolishness to bring a horse like this out through the marshy terrain around Lake Mývatn. The lichen and moss concealed all manner of rocks and uncertain footing. A horse’s leg could twist before the rider knew it.

It was one of the reasons she preferred the stocky ponies that seemed to thrive in Iceland’s conditions. Poor Hanna might not be half as beautiful as these three beasts, but she would outlast them by miles.

Leaning down, Freyja ran her hand down the horse’s foreleg, feeling the heat in the muscle. She tugged at his fetlock, and he lifted his hoof obediently as she examined the spongy sole, fishing out muck and stones from the arrow-shaped frog. One of the nails still clung to the walls of his hoof.

“You need to get that out,” she pointed. “Why in heaven’s name you would need to shoe a horse here is beyond me.” There were barely any roads, and fewer tracks to follow.

Cornflower blue eyes danced into view, a crooked smile twitching over that devilish face. “Yes, mistress,” Andri said.

And she realized she was berating three powerful warriors.

Freyja let the hoof down and stepped back, brushing her hands against her hips. “Take him back to the village. Old Tóki will remove the nail, and then I suggest resting him. There’s heat in the muscle. Is that all?”

Andri raked the yard with a hard glance, though his manner seemed apologetic. “We came to speak to the scholar.” Those eyes locked on her with an intensity that made her shiver. “Master... what was his name again?”

“Rurik.”

“Rurik,” Andri repeated, as if it held some meaning to him.

Magnus shot them both a sharp look.

“I’m afraid you’re too late. He’s no longer plaguing my household.” Only my heart. Freyja crossed her arms over her chest, a cold sweat springing up against her forehead. “I believe he took himself off that way.” She pointed vaguely to the south, and the west. “Wants to see if the rumors of trolls are true.”

Haakon dragged his gloves off reluctantly. “Mistress Helgasdottir. It pains me to mention what happened in the village—”

“You dare bring that up?” Rage erupted inside her, though she was doing her best to maintain her temper. “How is Benedikt faring this morning?” The last she’d seen of him, he’d been pinned to the wall and squealing.

“Better than my ballista,” Haakon countered coolly.

Freyja crossed her arms. “A true shame.”

“It was never my intention to lower myself to such a ploy,” he replied, his gaze dropping and heat flushing against his sharp cheekbones. “I allowed the heat of the moment to sweep away my sense of decency.” His lips thinned. “I will never forget my shame, and I apologize for the part I played, but I must ask... would you speak to us of the layout of the dragon’s lair?”

Of all the nerve! “Get off my farmstead.”

“It is not yours, is it?” Magnus spoke up, his horse dancing in slow circles. “But your father’s. Perhaps we should take matters up with him?”

If her father heard of what had happened.... She couldn’t imagine the shame on his face. Many years ago there had been no censure in being staked out for the dreki, but with even the crofters out here succumbing to religion... And her father believed. Truly believed. Freyja stepped toward him, her fists clenched. “If you dare disturb my father—”

“You’ll what? I would not be making threats if I were you, mistress.” Magnus’s gaze slid sinuously over her breasts, seeming to strip off each layer of clothing.

Magnus wasn’t the first man to make her feel like this, and he wouldn’t be the last. But she was so tired of being made to feel like an outsider, or a piece of cattle to be traded. If he weren’t sitting on that horse, she might have lashed out with her power, but the poor creature snorted, as if sensing the slight shiver of her gifts across its skin.

Magnus’s gaze sharpened and he urged the stallion closer, forcing her backward. “You—”

“That’s enough!” Haakon snapped, grabbing his stirrup and yanking at it.

The two men locked gazes, something seeming to pass in the air between them.

“You’re here at my discretion,” Haakon challenged him. “Not yours.”

“Magnus,” Andri pleaded.

Magnus finally smiled, a chilling sight indeed. He bowed his head, though the gesture was barely a sign of submission, and more an indication that he would take up this fight at a later date. “As you wish.”

Haakon let go of the stirrup and stepped back, turning on her with almost vicious intensity. Freyja drew back and he noticed it, his gaze flickering to hers. For the first time she saw the coldness in his expression melt, a sense of true shame creeping over his hard mouth.

“My apologies.” He nodded to her, deeply. “We mean you no harm, you have my word.”

Magnus glanced at her over Haakon’s shoulder. Haakon might actually be speaking the truth, but the other mercenary had given no oath.

“Get off my land,” she repeated quietly. “And don’t ever come back. You’ve done enough.”

Haakon opened his mouth as if to speak, then hesitated. He swung up onto his gray gelding and gathered the reins.

Andri swung the reins over his horse’s head. Freyja licked her lips. He’d not done anything to her. “We use moss out here to make a poultice. He’s strained the muscle in his foreleg, and you’ll get few miles out of him today, if any. You’d be best to walk often, or you’ll lose the use of him for several

Magnus snorted under his breath and kicked his black into a canter. Clods of dirt flew up as he rode directly past her. Good riddance.

“Thank you.” Andri watched the bigger man go, then gave her a troubled look. “I won’t let him trouble you again, mistress. My word on it.”

“As much as your word is worth,” she said pointedly.

He actually colored.

Haakon and Andri she could manage, for they were bound by some sense of common decency at least. But the look in Magnus’s eyes left her cold, for he had seen her as nothing more than a common whore, a worm beneath his heel. Something to be used and discarded.

All of a sudden, she couldn’t help the rise of shame that filled her. All three men knew what had happened to her in the dreki’s lair. She had not felt shame until then. What had happened between her and Rurik had been both wondrous and private; a memory to last a lifetime and to warm her on cold, lonely nights.

For she knew now she would never make such a choice again.

Freyja woke the next morning to a rose on her pillow.

At midafternoon, she found a book on her windowsill, covered in red leather with gold embossed writing on the spine. It contained Scandinavian fairy tales, and reminded her of her mother. Freyja shut it with a snap and put it in the pile of gifts she was determined to return to her dreki, even as her heart gave an unexpected twinge. She'd been forced to sell most of her mother's books, and it had been years since she'd had the pleasure—or time—to read.

A bottle of wine greeted her at dinner. There was an extravagant ham waiting for her on the table for breakfast the next day. Freyja stared at it for a good ten minutes before deciding there was no point in wasting it. Both she and her father were hungry. The ham would spoil if she took it back to Rurik, and she couldn't in good conscience allow a pig to die for nothing. So she made a thick and hearty soup with it, cursing him with every breath, even as she stirred the pot.

What did he want from her?

Forever, whispered his voice in her memories.

"Goodness, Freyja," her father exclaimed when he took his first taste. "This is absolutely delicious. Is that ham? I haven't tasted ham in years."

Freyja's eyes stung with tears as she watched him devour the bowl. Then another. How could she harden her heart to this? She wanted to thank Rurik for this gift, even as she knew it took her down a dark road where she would only end with her heart broken.

Rurik had made it clear he saw her as a conquest. He was dreki, and she was human. He wouldn't want her when she was old and gray, and she could not live in his world. There was no future for them. None. So she dried her tears, savored the soup, and then brushed off her apron to complete her afternoon's chores.

Only to find the bloody stables were swept clean, her lambs were feasting on hay she hadn't provided, and there was an enormous ram bleating in the spare pen, his horns magnificent and his wary eyes rolling as though he'd just had the shock of his life. He probably had. She could only imagine that flight. Freyja stood stock-still in shock. A ram. A cursed ram. She was right back where all of this mess had started.

If only I didn't go after my ram that night....

And the dratted man—dreki—was nowhere to be seen. She never heard him in the house, nor did she ever see him.

“Stop it!” she called, turning in circles in her empty barn after she found a necklace of extravagant emeralds she barely dared touch. “I promised you one night. Nothing more!”

Silence remained her only answer.

Freyja snatched up the necklace and shook it, suddenly furious. “You will not charm me, you arrogant beast! There is nothing more I can offer you! Stop this foolish game!”

“They were your rules, dearest Freyja.”

She spun in circles. Not a hint of him. “My rules? I promised you one night, nothing else.”

“You promised me your heart, if I could give you your most secret desire.”

Everything stilled within her. “I didn’t mean it.”

“Are you saying you lied to me?”

“No!” She bit her lip. All she’d meant was to put him off and grant herself space. “I just.... It was a jest, nothing else.”

“I am dreki, Freyja. Our word means everything, or else we’d have brought war to this world long ago. It is all that keeps us from chaos and we must abide by our promises.”

She turned. “Where are you? Show yourself.”

A caress stroked her back. Freyja spun, but she was all alone in the barn. “Why should I? Unless you plan to thank me properly for my gifts.”

“Thank you?” she growled. “I want to give them back. I’m not keeping them.”

“I’m not accepting them back.”

“Damn you—”

“Throw them in the bog for all I care. They were gifts, Freyja. Courting gifts. You may do with them as you like. I daresay your father is enjoying his new boots, however.”

Her heart plummeted through her stomach. “You leave my father out of this.”

“Very well.”

“And you are not courting me. Stop this madness. I won’t abide by it. There is no future between us. Nothing but misery. You got what you wanted, so let me be.”

Another gentle caress cupped her face. “Stubborn, Freyja. I have barely begun, and you know nothing of what I want from you.”

“That’s not fair. I don’t want this.”

Silence.

She turned, feeling utterly wretched for the words that spilled from her lips.

“You wanted me the other night,” he finally replied, and she had the feeling that she’d almost hurt him. He, with his unshakeable sense of pride and place in the world.

“That’s not—” She broke off with a curse. “Yes, I wanted it. Once. Something to remember you by. But we have no future, Rurik, and I am sensible enough to admit it. This might be a game to you, but it is very real to me. You will ruin me, if you haven't already. And... I might have given up on the idea of marriage and children, but I should still like to hold my head up high when I walk into town. You don't understand what you cost me.

"Besides"—her voice quavered—"I'm not the only one who might lose something here. You have dragon hunters searching for you. They know you took me. Haakon and his friends, Magnus and Andri, visited yesterday. They'll be keeping watch for—"

"Friends?" A dark shiver rolled through her at the sudden pressure that pushed at her mental shields.

Freyja clutched her temples. "You're hurting me."

Instantly the pressure was gone. "I'm sorry. But I know those names, Freyja. And they want me to know them. They're not dragon hunters. They're dreki, in mortal form."

"Dreki?" She knew she'd sensed something strange from Magnus, a predatory intensity that made her feel uneasy.

"Don't go near them," he suddenly warned, and all of his courtly charm evaporated. "Don't welcome them into your house, nor challenge them. They're not like me. Or Magnus certainly isn't, and if he thinks you have my interest he'll hurt you to get at me."

"I have no intention of drawing his ire. What are you going to do?"

Silence.

"Rurik!" She took a step toward the barn doors. "Rurik, you're not going after them, are you?"

It was a long time before he answered, and she felt the distance between them, as though he was flying away from her. "Would you care if I did?"

She knew what the sensible answer ought to be. But she couldn't for the life of her utter it. "Yes!" Freyja threw the thought back at him. "Please be careful. I don't want to see you hurt, even though I cannot allow this to continue between us."

There was only a grim sense of acceptance in the link between them. "I'll be careful. After all, I am not finished with you yet. I will see you later. You can thank me for my gifts then."

And then he cut the connection and she found herself alone in the barn, her heart thundering in her chest as she wondered what he was doing now.

Courting aside, nothing could chill her more than the thought of Rurik in danger.

Rurik melted into mortal form in the small village near Freyja's homestead. Picking up the bag he'd dropped, he shook out his clothes and put them on, and then he went hunting.

A forlorn shape sat in the taproom, holding his head in his hands. From the smell of him, Haakon had finished several ales, and possibly more.

Rage smoldered in his heart, rage at all Freyja had endured. Rurik let the door shut behind him with an audible click, grateful the dragon hunter was alone.

Haakon's head jerked up, and weary blue eyes met his, devoid of emotion. Shadows bruised the man's eyes, and his face looked gaunt, as though something had stripped him of the vitality he'd worn on the docks in Akureyri.

"You," Haakon said in a toneless voice. "I thought you'd headed south."

"I heard what happened," he growled. "I know what you did to her. What type of man can you call yourself?"

He stalked the man through the warm shadows. Haakon's breath caught as Rurik prowled closer, but he moved before the man could even blink.

Shoving Haakon against the wall as he tried to stand, Rurik pinned him there, one hand around the man's throat. Haakon tried to break his hold, but Rurik simply lifted him higher, until the man's boots dangled off the ground. Haakon gasped.

"I can abide challenges to my territory," Rurik admitted, feeling heat fill his eyes as he let the dreki slip its skin, just for a moment. Haakon kicked dramatically as he no doubt saw the cat-slit pupils and the golden haze of the dreki in Rurik's irises. "I even find myself feeling sympathetic for your foolish quest to hunt and kill me. But still, that does not give me an excuse to swat you like the fly you are...." His grip tightened until Haakon's face began to mottle. Rurik leaned closer, until their noses almost touched. "But if you ever go near Freyja again, or threaten her, or let her be tied to a fucking stake like you did, then I will make your death a slow one, do you understand me?"

Releasing the man, he stepped back as Haakon sagged against the wall, clutching at his throat and coughing air back into his lungs. Haakon's eyes were wide with fright. "You," he sputtered, finally understanding what he faced.

"Yes, me," Rurik replied, stepping back out of reach before the hunter did something stupid, like reach for his knife.

Haakon lurched to his feet, and then stayed there, shaking against the wall. "You were there all along," he rasped. "Right under my nose."

"For a man who hunts dreki, you are quite terrible at spotting them."

Haakon threw himself at Rurik, his fist swinging. Rurik sidestepped, and then flipped the hunter onto the table, slamming him flat on his back on the timber. The breath whooshed out of Haakon, and Rurik stepped away, the muscle in his jaw ticking. "Don't make me kill you."

Haakon rolled upright, his eyes bloodshot and swollen. "Why don't you?"

He came again, and again Rurik drove him down, hammering an elbow between his shoulder blades. Haakon grunted on the floor, trying to rise, but his arms gave out, and he slowly rolled onto his back. A bitter laugh exploded from his lungs. It sounded like it came from a man who'd lost all trace of himself, and it stopped Rurik from making another move.

"I won't kill you," he said slowly. "I think you're punishing yourself enough. Killing you would be too easy."

“Did you know I see her every night in my dreams?” Haakon whispered, hauling himself slowly into a sitting position. “Every night since I’ve been here. Begging me to rescue her. And these cursed storms don’t help. They only serve to remind me of the night I first met her, when she was lost in the rain outside my village.”

“I never had her,” Rurik pointed out, squatting in front of the man. They stared at each other, and he realized what he hadn’t seen before. This man was broken. And all it would take to drive him off the edge of the cliff would be a slight nudge.

After all, he wasn’t the only one who could enter dreams.

“The dreams started the night Magnus joined your party, didn’t they?” he mused.

Haakon flinched, then frowned. “Yes.”

Rurik reached out a hand and hauled the dragon hunter to his feet. “Your friends are not human, Haakon. Nor are they your friends. Magnus and Andri belong to the dreki court, and they’re here to kill me on their queen’s whim. You’re a tool to them, nothing else, and if you aren’t careful, then you’ll end up buried six feet under. Magnus is not the type of dreki to care for human foibles, nor share any hint of sentiment, not like I do. I’m sure you’ve had doubts. I’m sure you tried to test them the same way you did me that night we dined, but flinching at the feel of iron is an old wives’ tale, nothing more. Magnus has been sending you the dreams.”

A new fury roused in Haakon’s eyes. “Why?”

“Because he wants me dead,” Rurik replied, turning for the door. “But he won’t confront me directly, not until he’s certain he can beat me. No doubt you’re a distraction, one meant to wear me down.”

Haakon followed him out onto the village green. “Then this was all a wild goose chase.”

Sympathy stirred through him. Don’t meddle.... “Maybe. Maybe not. You saw a golden dreki steal your wife—or thought you did—and I am quite clearly a golden dreki, though I had nothing to do with what happened to your wife.” He paused. Árdís must have had her reasons. “But there is one truth I know, that you do not. Your wife is still alive.”

“You said you didn’t take her.” Haakon’s face paled. “How do you know that?”

“I am dreki. You know I cannot lie.”

“Where is she?”

Rurik paused. He had little reason to give this man any hope, beyond a vague shared sentiment. He knew little of human emotion, but if that were Freyja.... There was nowhere on this earth she could be taken where he would not hunt for her.

Fool of a dreki. He closed his eyes. He finally understood what was happening to him, and why he could not simply leave this quest to win her heart alone. Perhaps he and Haakon shared more than they knew?

“I don’t think you’re ready to know the truth,” he said slowly, trying to sort through his thoughts of Freyja. “But you will be. Soon. And when you are,” he smiled, “come and find me.”

Spreading his arms, he felt them lengthen into wings as the dreki took shape with a burst of volcanic heat. Haakon stumbled back, shielding his eyes and face from the wash of power that erupted.

When it was done, Rurik smiled a particularly dreki smile. “Let us hope I am still alive to tell you the tale of your missing wife.”

Then he launched himself into the skies.

Chapter 16

Rurik returned to the house. There was no sign of Freyja, though her scent lingered all over the place, ingrained in the homestead. A scent that filled his heart with joy.

There was an old dreki tale that spoke of kataru libbu, an alliance of the heart. Dreki were the half-souled, and he'd always felt somehow incomplete. When the great goddess tore her soul to pieces to share it with her new dreki offspring, she had left them vulnerable, always hungering for the other half of their soul.

A myth of the dreki court. Some dreki found their other halves, the twin flame to their soul. Some did not. But all hungered for them. It was a concept beyond that of the mates they took, the lovers they consumed.

The second he saw Freyja, he'd known there was something different about her. He'd been unable to deny his yearning for her, and even now her distance from his side ached within him.

Was she the other half of him?

Was that why he was so helpless to walk away from her, so determined to claim her?

Some instinct stirred in his chest. He could not walk away from her. It would be like cutting out his heart. Freyja. Fierce, stubborn Freyja, who had brought him out into the light, brought him back to life. Without her, all he faced was an eternity of hibernation.

A dreki bugled, somewhere far to the south of him, reminding him this was not the time for such speculation. His enemy was still out there, somewhere.

Rurik turned to face the brewing storm on the horizon, looking for Magnus.

The bastard had used Haakon and his men to test Rurik, but why? Why not face him? He remembered battles between them as youths, where they'd tested their strengths against each other. Battles he'd won every single time.

There was a reason he'd been his father's heir. A reason his uncle and mother plotted for his exile, rather than outright killing him. If Stellan or any of his sons had challenged Rurik, then there was a possibility he would have defeated them.

"Are you frightened to confront me?" he whispered, sending the thought-thread lancing through the skies as he searched for his cousin.

Magnus's awareness linked with his, the other dreki's fury searing his mind. "Frightened?"

Magnus spat. “How dare you?”

“What else am I to think, when you hide behind the plots of puny humans?”

Days ago, he'd refused to offer challenge to Magnus, his pride standing between him and the thought of openly acknowledging Magnus was ranked above him. But that was before he'd come to realize what Freyja meant to him. There was no moving forward until he defeated this threat.

“I offer challenge,” he called, feeling the heat of his cousin's surprise. “You and me. No mercy. Let us settle this once and for all.”

Magnus could choose not to accept.

“Unless you are wary of battling me?” Rurik added. “I always won, did I not?”

There was a long moment of silence. He almost didn't think his cousin would accept.

“That was a long time ago. Come and fight, you filthy cur. I am not frightened of you.” Magnus's thought-thread linked with his, and for a second Rurik saw more than Magnus expected him to. Always a problem when two dreki linked. Magnus swiftly hid his thoughts, but there was enough there to cause Rurik to falter.

Magnus did not intend for this to be a fair fight.

“One hour,” Rurik whispered, knowing he would be facing two dreki, and not one. Sympathy for Andri's dilemma stirred through him, even as a hint of doubt assailed him.

Could he defeat both of them? Knowing he would not—could not—harm the cousin he loved?

Magnus faded from his consciousness. And Rurik was left standing there, gripped by indecision.

What if he did not win? He was relying on Andri's honor to stay out of this, even though he knew some hidden pressure forced the youth to join Magnus in this plot.

If he didn't win, then what did that mean for Freyja?

She had not accepted him, not completely.

And he wanted so much more from her than merely a conquest, but how could he tell her that? He did not have the time.

Except... there was one last gift he could give her.

One last way to prove his intentions toward her were serious, and one way he could offer her protection, if Magnus defeated him.

Rurik slowly turned and looked at the house.

“You... you get out of here!” Freyja's father snapped as Rurik entered, maneuvering with wicked speed around the dining table. “Benedikt told me what you are, and what you intend with my daughter! You leave her alone, you foul beast!” He snatched up a cross and started praying in Latin. “Our father who art in Heaven....”

Rurik's temper flared. He had no time for this. “Did Benedikt also mention precisely what he's threatened her with over the past few years? The coin he's offered for her if she allowed herself to become his mistress? Or the threats he made when she would not?"

The prayer faded as Einar gasped. "What?"

It dampened Rurik's temper to a smoldering coal, but the heat remained. Freyja had refused to allow her father to share her burden out of some misguided attempt to protect him, but in doing so, she'd not allowed him to protect his daughter. "Your precious Benedikt threatened to name her a witch if she'd not lie with him. Who do you think tied your daughter to a stake and offered her up to me? Who do you think has been stealing your sheep over the years, and whispering in local villagers' ears so they would not buy your daughter's barley when she tried to trade it? I have been talking to many of the locals. Some spit on your daughter's name for dealing with the devil—which you and I both know she has not done—but others admit they were afraid Benedikt would turn his wrath on them if they traded with Freyja, or tried to help her. She's slowly starving because of Benedikt, and you cannot see it. He wanted to cut off all of her resources so the only person she could turn to was him, when she was finally desperate enough. That is the snake whose words you listen to."

His words took all the wind out of Einar's sails. The old man slumped against the table, his mouth agape in shock. "She never said a word."

"Knowing Freyja as you do, did you think that she would?"

"But he... he said you had taken her."

"And so I did," Rurik replied. His temper got the best of him. "They'd tied her to a stake in the village green, and threw rotten food at her. What would you have me do? Leave her there?"

"Did you..."

He grasped what the old man wanted to know. "What happened between us is a matter purely for us."

The old man was gasping quite hard now. "No. No." He shook his head. "She is a good girl." His gnarled hands curled into fists. "Both Benedikt and you have ruined her!"

Rurik knelt in front of him. "You know dreki cannot lie. You said so yourself. So, know this... I love your daughter and I wish, in another world, she could be mine. I would not abandon her, not willingly, not if I had a choice. And I will never harm her, or place her in danger, which is why I cannot marry her. If I could—" His voice broke a little. "If Freyja would accept such a thing... then I would do so in a heartbeat. But to mate with Freyja is to place her in danger. I finally understand that. I cannot have her, not without bringing darkness into her life, no matter how much I wish to. But I also cannot leave her defenseless, and as much as she could bring this small village to its knees if she wished to, she is also remarkably vulnerable against those threats she has no power to control."

Rurik captured Einar's face in between his hands. "She needs you to protect her. And she needs you to be well, because she loves you. She will accept no other gift from me, but perhaps she will accept this..."

Power welled within him. Einar gasped as that honey-trickle of it slid through his skin.

“My cousin Magnus has accepted my challenge. I go now to face him.” He let his power threaten to brim over, finding the shadow in the old man’s chest, the one that was slowly killing him. “Think of me as the devil, or think of me as a monster, but the truth remains I might not vanquish two dreki. I would not leave your daughter unprotected in the wake of my death.”

Healing was not his greatest strength, but he knew well how to manipulate flesh and bone, and shift the core of the body. The shadow sat there, resisting him, a cancerous growth within the old man’s lungs. Rurik poured more power into the working, using lashes of fire to burn away the shadow, then sweeping the cobwebs from the old man’s vision, until Einar gasped, slumping against the table as though he breathed hot ash.

“Done,” Rurik gasped, and took a shuddering step sideways.

Something was wrong. He felt hollow and empty; his bones curiously light, as though he’d expended too much raw power.

Einar clapped a hand to his chest, his skin glowing with health and vitality. “You... healed me.”

Rurik could barely acknowledge him. “For Freyja,” he said, then staggered outside.

The storm battered at him. He’d cost himself a great deal of power in healing Freyja’s father, but it was worth it if by doing so, he could protect her. Rurik spread his arms wide, fanning the kernel of golden heat deep within him to flames. The change lashed through him, shockingly slow. By the time his wings unfurled, he felt almost breathless and a faint hint of nervousness lit his stomach.

Had he expended too much energy in healing Freyja’s father?

No. Of course not. He was a prince of his people, not a weakling. Magnus had dared to challenge his territorial claim, and such needed to be answered. He’d beaten his cousin before. He would not fail this time.

But as he launched himself into the air, wings thrusting down in furious beats, he couldn’t hide the hint of doubt in his heart.

Chapter 17

*H*oof beats drummed across the rocky soil. Freyja drew to a halt, tugging her shawl tight around her shoulders and sucking in a shattered breath. Loki caught up to her, circling her skirts with a desperate yip.

Not now, she told him, brushing the hair from her eyes as Haakon reined in his enormous stallion. She'd been trying to take a walk to clear her mind, dwelling on Rurik. She couldn't escape the memories of their night together, and he'd come for her, courting her with gifts she could not avoid. This was not done between them, no matter how many times she told herself it was, but she couldn't quite work out what the decision meant. She wanted a future with him. She wanted him. If she swept aside all her doubts and misgivings, that was the one fact she kept returning to.

But did she have a place in his future?

"Mistress Helgasdottir." Haakon seemed just as surprised to see her as she was to see him. The stallion beneath him sawed at the reins, sweat darkening its flanks as it danced in small impatient circles. Bruises darkened his skin, and blood had dried on his eyebrow.

"What do you want now?" she demanded, though his injuries bothered her.

"I came to find you, actually."

"Oh?" Thunder echoed in the distance.

The stallion's eyes rolled, and Haakon brought him back under control. "I came to apologize, and to warn you—"

"Apologize? For what?" Lightning split the skies, far too swiftly on the heels of Thor's thunder to be entirely natural. Freyja could feel her fury spitting beneath her skin, and curled her fingers into fists. She was so angry, and she didn't know if it was at Haakon, the world—or herself. She took a step closer to him. "For bringing your hatred to my village? For destroying the village's treaty with the dreki, the consequences of which could rain down upon innocent people? For tying me to a stake and using me as bait? For ruining any reputation I ever had, and stealing away any chance I might ever make a good match?"

She saw her words strike him. He flinched, but Freyja was merciless. "I know what you lost was not insignificant. I know you can never get your wife back. But did you ever once consider what you were doing to the people around you? What do your family think? How many other villages have you brought your hatred to?" She paused. "How many innocent dragons did you kill, who had no hand in what was done to you?"

"Freyja." His voice came hoarsely. "You don't—"

"Perhaps the dreki stole your wife, but you are your own worst consequence. All you are is hatred and ruin, and while I might pity you for what happened, I cannot forgive you for allowing your hatred to consume you. What would your wife think of you now, if she could see you?"

"What would you not do to bring your lover back to you, Freyja, if the shoe were on the other foot? What would you do if it were your fault she'd been taken?" His eyes begged her for understanding.

"I would do anything that would not harm another person," she admitted.

"Pray you don't have to find out just where that line stands...." And she saw that guilt and loss had flayed the humanity from him, pushed him into making decisions he might never come back from.

Just as she might never come back from the harsh words she'd offered to the dreki who challenged her. Her shawl flapped in the wind and Freyja caught it, but she shot Haakon a fierce look. What would she not do if there was a threat against the man—or dreki—she loved?

Another shock of thunder rumbled across the horizon, and it felt almost as if it shook the earth itself. The clouds boiled now, seething masses of stormy white that threatened a dangerous storm.

"Another of those unnatural bloody storms," Haakon swore under his breath, circling his horse.

She'd thought it an extension of her own fury, but as she looked up she realized she felt vaguely hollow and disconnected from the storm. This was not of her making.

The blood ran from her face.

"It's a dreki storm," she breathed, feeling the wash of power through her veins, but knowing she was not the cause of it. No. She was merely a bystander, swept along in the current of its power.

But what was causing it? A glance back at the valley showed the lights gleaming in her father's homestead. As she watched, a dark shape came to the door and stared into the skies. Even from this distance she saw his golden hair, and felt that same twist around her heart.

She needed to tell him the truth about how she felt—and to apologize. Fear had driven her. Fear of the future, fear of handing him her heart on a platter and having him shred it—even fear of finally, irrevocably being cast from her community. Every time she'd been frightened of his intentions, he'd let her make her own choices. How could she refuse to allow him the same courtesy?

Fear had been her cage, and it was time to set it aside. Time to shed her skin and bloom into the creature she'd always been meant to be. One that accepted her dangerous powers. One that knew she was different from the mortal world, and could never fit in. One that was not frightened of love, or rejection.

Daughter of the Storm, her mother had called her once, and it was time for her to accept her true self, and cast aside everything that held her back.

But even as she took a step toward Rurik, he spread his arms and began to shift. Wings formed, long and elegant. Golden scales erupted with slow grace, and then he took a belabored lunge into the sky that was less graceful than any she'd ever seen from him.

Something was wrong with him.

"Rurik," she whispered, her heart thudding dully in her chest.

He wrenched himself into the sky, and she had this horrible, impending sense of doom as she took a step toward him.

Too late.

The heat drained from her face. "Rurik!" she yelled, running toward him and waving her arms.

"Rurik!"

"Freyja!" Haakon cut in front of her, his stallion's hooves churning up the sod. He thrust a hand in her direction.

"Get out my way." She couldn't see Rurik anymore, but she knew she had to get to him.

Something bad is coming, whispered the earth beneath her feet, and the sky around her.

And all she could hear were her parting words as she denied Rurik. You don't understand what you cost me.

Fate, Rurik had once told her. But she had spat in fate's face, and now... now that miserable wretch seemed to be warning her once again, something was afoot.

"Freyja, here." Haakon offered her his arm as icy raindrops stung her face, and she realized he meant to sit her behind him.

Freyja drew her hand back.

Haakon's face twisted. "I know what I have done, Freyja. I know the damage I have caused, but you didn't let me finish. I came here to warn you. Magnus and Andri are not what they seem."

"What do you mean?"

"They're both dreki," he told her. "Rurik warned me about them an hour ago. I confronted Magnus and we fought. He couldn't entirely control himself." Haakon shook his head, horror lighting his expression. "I saw it in his face. For a second his eyes were gold and reptilian, and his skin seemed almost covered in scales. That was when I knew." His shoulders slumped. "They were using me to get to Krafla's dreki. Andri wouldn't let Magnus kill me, said it went against their oath—whatever that means—but I overheard them after they threw me in the cellar of the house I was leasing. They're here for Krafla's dreki, and they mean to kill him. They were using me to distract him and draw him out."

She gasped, but he wasn't finished.

"Freyja, this was all planned, and not by Benedikt. After I broke out of the cellar and found them gone, I went to him and demanded some answers. He didn't even know what he was dealing with, and had never seen Magnus nor Andri before in his life... but someone met him in Akureryi six months ago when he was trading, and offered him enough gold to sink a ship if he used half of it to offer a warrant for Krafla's dreki."

“Rurik,” she whispered in horror, before realizing what she revealed.

“Rurik,” Haakon confirmed, a knowing look on his face.

Freyja held herself between him and the house. “He’s not the golden dreki who stole your wife. I know he’s not!”

“I know.” Haakon’s stallion pawed the ground. He looked faintly disgusted with himself. “But he knows who did. Freyja, get out of the way—”

“I won’t let you hurt him,” she held her arms wide, and a tremor leapt from the ground at her feet, sending the stallion into a screaming whirl of fear.

Control it. Freyja grit her teeth and reined her temper in. She couldn’t afford to give in to the power trickling through her veins. The storm pushed her in its wake, filling her with power she’d never felt before.

It had never been this difficult to control herself before. Nor had she ever slid so fully into that golden pool of molten power deep within her. Freyja saw the world through a haze of amber, before her vision suddenly cleared and the earth stilled.

Haakon stared at her, white-faced. Froth foamed at the stallion’s mouth and its eyes rolled, but it was obeying him. Barely.

“I’m sorry,” she whispered.

“The rumors are true then.” It was not a question.

“That depends upon which rumor you listen to,” she shot back.

“I don’t intend to hurt him.” Haakon hesitated. “It is clear Magnus and Andri were using me for their own purposes, and I now know what that purpose is. They mean to challenge him and kill him. It’s a trap, Freyja. But if we get to him first, perhaps we could warn him? Or help him?”

Her eyebrows shot up. “And why would you help him?”

“To make amends.” He clearly saw her disbelief. “And because he has the information I need to find the dreki who took my wife.”

They stared at each other for a long moment.

“You’ll get there quicker.” Haakon’s eyes seemed to soften, turning very blue. “You were right, Freyja. All I’ve done is cause harm here. Let me help. Please. Let me try and find my way back to the man I once was.”

Logic dictated she accept his hand. He was right. Speed was of the essence right now. Freyja jammed her foot into the stirrup he’d slid his boot from, and used his hand to haul herself up behind him.

“Hurry!” she yelled, wrapping her arms around his waist as he heeled the stallion with boots.

Freyja burst through the door of her house, her skirts flapping around her ankles. Time was of the essence right now, but she needed to make sure her father was all right.

“Father!” she called, dragging on his old oilskin coat, and reaching for his stout staff. Any weapon was better than none, and if Rurik thought she was going to allow him to face two treacherous dreki alone, then he had another think coming. “I have to go out this night. I need—”

“You’re not going anywhere.” Her father appeared in the doorway, blinking and rubbing at his eyes. He lowered his hands, revealing clear blue eyes that locked on her face. “Rurik told me everything. And he... he has given me a gift, in exchange for promising to keep you safe.”

Those eyes. She hadn’t seen him look at her like that in years.

The floor felt like it swayed. “Father,” she whispered in disbelief, waving a hand in front of his face.

“Yes, I can see.” Pressing a hand to his chest, his face lit up briefly. “It feels like such a weight has lifted off me, like my veins are filled with pure fire. I haven’t felt this way in years.”

Blood warmed his skin, breathing new life into it. Her father’s spine had straightened, and he resembled the tundra in spring as winter finally sloughed away, revealing new growth. She felt like she might almost choke on her heart. His condition had weighed heavily on her too, and heat flooded her eyes as she realized her father’s long illness had vanished.

Freyja slid a hand over his paper-thin cheek in wondering fashion. “But... how?”

“The dreki,” he said. “He gave me a gift.”

Rurik had done this? Given her father new life? It struck her then, like an arrow to the heart. All along she’d been wary of him, holding him at arm’s length even as she submitted to his touch. Guarding herself for the betrayal she knew would come.

She’d been wrong.

He’d given her more than she could ever repay, and her words bit through her: Give me a gift beyond any worth, and I shall give you my heart.

This was that gift. One last attempt to prove his sincerity when she had doubted it. Freyja clapped a hand to her mouth. Her heart beat a little faster, a little louder, as the world swam around her, shifting on its axis of what she knew to be true and what she’d feared to accept.

She’d not dared love him. Yet it had crept over her night by night, stealing through her intentions as if they were mist with every smile he gave her, every little argument, and every determined quirk of his brow when she refused to fall into place. She’d known it and worried over the sensation late at night. Locked it up tight within her so he could never know, as if that could somehow protect her.

And now it left her utterly bereft.

“Oh no,” Freyja whispered.

Tears blurred her vision. He’d gone off to fight two dreki alone, believing she would refuse to let him court her. And he’d weakened himself, curse him, in healing her father so she would not be alone.

That thought, more than anything, sent steel straight down her spine.

“Rurik visited me and told me everything. About Benedikt and what he had threatened you with.

About him tying you to a stake.” Her father’s lips thinned. “Freyja, why did you not tell me all your worries? You know I would have protected you.”

But how sprang to her tongue, where she managed to catch it in time. Her father had his pride. “I know.”

She needed to thank Rurik. She needed to... God. To apologize for all she’d said to him. To make it right. It seemed her father wasn’t the only one who had to account for pride.

“Freyja,” her father warned, seeing the look on her face and interpreting it correctly. “Where are you going? Rurik wanted you to be safe. He doesn’t want you involved.”

She did not argue, or shout her sudden fury to the world. Instead she fetched the kitchen knife from its block. An odd sense of calm descended over her. “And what about him?”

“He’s a dreki,” her father said. “You cannot fight this battle for him.”

“No,” she whispered, “but I can stand at his side and give him a reason to fight.”

“Freyja!” Her father caught her arm as she moved to the door.

Freyja eased his grip from her arm. “No, Father. I know you want to protect me, but that time is done.” She hesitated. “And you should know I am quite capable of protecting myself, even against dreki.”

For the first time she let the storm show in her eyes. Her father’s mouth parted, but no words came out. He’d always known she had power—how could you not, when your child tore the earth apart with a thought?—but he’d always pretended she wasn’t different. It had been her secret to keep for far too many years, something her mother warned her to hide, and her father pretended not to see.

Freyja gently let his hand go. “I cannot deny what I am anymore, Father. And I know this upsets your beliefs, but there is something within me that is not human. And I don’t know what it is or where it came from, but I know my mother knew of it too. And I have to save the man I love.”

“Your mother’s powers are what stole her away,” her father whispered. “Please don’t ask this of me.”

Freyja’s eyes narrowed. “What do you mean?”

“She never breathed a word of where she’d come from,” he admitted, “but she always feared certain things: circles of stone, or birch; All Hallow’s Eve. I don’t know why she entered that circle that last time, but when she came back, she was never the same. It killed her. They killed her.”

“They?”

Her father shook his head and made a sign of the cross, and she knew he would not speak of it.

Freyja’s heart ached in her chest. “I love him,” she whispered. “He needs me. I know you’re frightened to lose me, but I promise I will come back. Would you have let her go, if you could have saved her?”

Her father’s hand curled into a gnarled fist. Then he finally broke down with a sob. “Be safe.”

“Always,” she said with a parting smile, and opened the door to step into her destiny.

Outside in the yard, Haakon waited impatiently. Time was running out, but she’d needed to ensure her father was all right before she went into battle.

“You want to make amends?” she asked him grimly.

“Yes.”

“Then you can start now.” She gestured to the south. “If Rurik dies, then you’ll never find out what happened to your wife.”

And she would never get to tell Rurik the truth—that she’d been such a fearful fool she’d run away from the best thing that had ever happened to her....

Oh, Rurik. Heat slid through her eyes, but Freyja was determined. She was not going to lose him, nor her chance to tell him the truth she nursed deep in her heart.

“What can we do?” Haakon demanded, bringing her back into the present. “They’re in dreki form, Freyja. Immortal, powerful, and impervious to harm. We are but human, and they could crush us like gnats.”

“Almost impervious,” she said darkly, picturing Magnus’s face in her mind. “You have a ballista....”

“A crippled ballista,” he countered.

“Then put it on a wagon. I only destroyed the wheels.”

Haakon dwelled on the thought. “And you?”

“Well, you’ve caught a glimpse of what I can do, but that’s not important. What I have is a burning desire to save the man I love,” she said grimly, turning toward the stables to fetch Hanna. “Go and fetch your ballista, and I will meet you at Krafla. We don’t have much time.”

Chapter 18

Rurik soared in slow circles around Krafla's smoldering peak, riding the thermals and the heated edge of his fury.

There was no sign of the other dreki, but he'd expected that.

"Come out, you cowards." He bellowed a challenge into the air, and it echoed like the thunder that was brewing on the horizon. Weakness stole through his veins, a little whisper that wore away at his confidence. Healing Freyja's father had taken more out of him than he'd expected, but the heaviness in his heart was the true weakness.

I should have told her how I feel about her.

Maybe then she wouldn't have run from him.

Rurik poured all of his world-weary pain into another bellow. "You want your throne? Then come out and take it from me!"

This entire plot had Stellan's hand all over it. His uncle, the dreki queen's brother, always liked to tie up any loose ends, and while Rurik and his brother were still alive, the queen's control over her throne was not complete. Amadea could keep Árdís in check, but not her male progeny.

As if exiling him for a crime he didn't commit hadn't been bad enough.

Pain bled through him. He'd lost every dreki he ever loved by choosing exile over a challenge to his uncle and mother, but he'd made that choice to protect them. Challenging Stellan would have dragged his younger brother and sister into the war, and they hadn't been strong enough then to survive. He had little doubt his mother and uncle would cut their own blood down in a heartbeat.

After all, his uncle had murdered his father and his mother hadn't blinked at blaming Rurik.

He let the rage of his loss fuel his strength. "Come out!" he roared as he overshot Krafla and went south in a swoop over the glaciers.

"You're not fit to rule these lands," came Magnus's thought-whisper. "And who are you to call us cowards? You, who tucked tail and fled when your mother took the throne?"

"When your father stole it for her," he shot back. "By plotting to murder his king."

"My father didn't kill yours." It echoed with truth, and Rurik gritted his teeth together.

"Maybe it wasn't his hand that ripped my father's heart out of his chest," Rurik shot back, "but his was the hand behind the murder."

“You stupid fool.” Magnus’s laugh echoed through the link. “My father had nothing to do with the death of yours. You did that yourself.”

Truth again. The rage that filled Rurik almost threatened to obliterate rational thought, but he couldn’t afford to lose his mind now. Not when there was so much at stake.

But the answer still ached within him. All he could remember was blood slick on his hands, and his father’s ribs spread wide, the heart torn from within. And the thought he’d pushed this death upon his king, because he hadn’t known enough to back down when he overheard his mother and uncle plotting a coup. In an act of mercy, an attempt to reach the dreki who’d birthed him, he’d actually warned her he knew what she was up to. No. “Come out, you coward! Where are you?”

“Here.”

Rurik wheeled in a fury, sighting his opponent rising from a valley near Krafla. Bat-like black wings thrust Magnus into the skies, and his lip was drawn back from his fierce fangs. Twenty tons of fury struck through the air toward him, but Rurik was fueled by vengeance and rage.

Storm clouds brewed on the horizon, and he was riding his own storm now. The black dreki pinwheeled through the skies ahead of him, banking just enough to flash his claws at him.

“Rules?” Rurik demanded.

“There are no rules.”

So be it. “Killing you will be my pleasure.”

With a twist of his body, he plummeted toward Magnus, claws spread for a strike.

He had the better position and the weight advantage here, plus years of experience battling other dreki, but Magnus was no stranger to battle himself. They called him the Black Prince in the dreki court, for his cunning and deviousness, and Rurik was weighted down by the exhaustion that had stolen through his veins the second he healed Freyja’s father. Magnus was completely fresh.

Which meant he needed to finish this battle as swiftly as possible.

At the last second, Rurik flattened his wings against his body and dove straight down toward the other dreki, knowing his claws could not pierce Magnus’s black hide. Not from above.

Magnus’s wings flared wide in surprise, and then he tilted sideways to avoid the clash in a defensive maneuver. Which was exactly what Rurik wanted. Ignoring Magnus’s wings—the most obvious target—he caught his cousin’s claws in his and then rolled and flung them both into a pinwheel of violence. The world blurred around him, sky then ground then sky flashing through his vision, and just as the ground grew dangerously close, he let go, flinging his cousin toward the jagged rocks below.

Perfectly timed. Perfectly executed. “You’re getting slow in your old age, cousin,” he taunted, as Magnus used sheer strength to haul himself out of the dangerous dive in an inelegant maneuver.

“And you’re still brimming with false nobility,” Magnus spat back. “No rules, Rurik. Remember?”

A flash of shadow in the corner of Rurik’s eyes alerted him a split second before claws raked his unprotected flank. Pain seared his nerves, but he'd twisted in time to prevent the second dreki from opening up his abdomen. Lashing out with his whip-like tail, he scored a cut along the silver dreki's snout, and it wheeled away in a spiraling pirouette that hurt his heart.

"Andri. Stay out of this."

His former page banked in an eerie glide. "I have my orders." Regret laced Andri's mental touch. "You bring a dreki youth to this battle?" he demanded of Magnus.

"He was my brother before he was ever your page," Magnus spat back, "and it is his turn to prove his loyalty to his blood kin."

The betrayal would be tearing Andri apart. He knew the lad. Andri was the one shining branch in his uncle's family, the one son who remained uncorrupted. Rurik dove for Magnus, using his larger form to batter at the black. Claws slashed and tore, and wings thrust in midair to hold them locked against each other. If he could get the bastard's throat....

A body battered against his, knocking him aside a second before his razor-sharp teeth locked around Magnus's neck.

Andri, forced into this conflict against his will.

The three of them spiraled apart.

"This is not your fight," he shot toward Andri. "Remember who you are. Remember what I tried to instill in you. You're better than this."

The silver dreki drew back from his touch, rejecting the attempt to reach out to him. But guilt laced Andri's withdrawal, and Rurik had to cling to that.

Two against one. He'd had worse odds, when he fled the dreki court. But this was different. He wouldn't—he couldn't—strike down the younger dreki he loved like his own brother.

And Magnus knew that.

Time to play dirty. There was no honor in fighting a battle against these odds, and the last thing he wanted was for Andri to be forced to do something he'd never forgive himself for.

Battered on both sides, Rurik fought and slashed, smashing his body back against Andri's to force the youth out of the way, even as he tried to slash open Magnus's belly. The ground was getting dangerously close. Lightning stabbed through the air, but so far neither of them had brought their powers to bear in this duel.

Can't afford to.... Not with Andri hampering both of us.

Rurik's lungs strained. Care for the younger dreki was possibly the only similarity both he and Magnus shared.

Again they came for him. This time they were fighting in unison. And Rurik felt a crucial claw scrape against his belly, igniting a line of fire along his flank. Panic surged through him as Magnus's teeth scraped across his shoulder, and shuddered free. Close. Too close. For the first time, he felt the tides of the battle changing. A shiver of cold knowing ran through him.

He couldn't defeat both of them.

Filling his lungs, in desperation he vomited a gush of white-hot fire toward the fierce black dragon, and Magnus screeched and dove out of the way in frantic haste.

It was the one true advantage he had here.

“You’re no true heir,” Rurik shot at his cousin. “I see fire still eludes you.”

Only the most powerful bloodlines still had access to Tiamat’s gift.

Banking, he began to climb, his weary wings sweeping through the air so he could get some height. A silver wisp trailed him. Andri was far lighter than either of them, and moved through the air like a bullet.

“You don’t have to do this.” He tried once again to connect with Andri. “I know you. I know this is not you. You have more loyalty in your littlest claw than either of your brothers, or your father.”

A mournful hesitation. “It’s been different since you left. You don’t understand.”

But he did, oh, he did. Stellan had always wanted to drive the gentleness from his son, and he would have ruled the dreki court with an iron fist.

One last thought-whisper from the boy. “I have to protect my mother, Rurik. Please understand.”

And then the silver dreki came after him with pure, bloody-minded vengeance.

No way out without hurting him. Rurik knew Andri’s mental defenses, could have smashed through his psychic shields and knocked him from the skies with barely a thought. But the same mind that’d conjured this ploy knew his weakness well, and knew Rurik could no more hurt the boy than he could lift a hand against his own brother or sister.

Someone else didn’t have the same conflict. Andri flinched as he came after Rurik, shaking his head, and Rurik saw the golden dancing lights of Freyja’s touch strike the youth.

Freyja. Intense terror suddenly struck him, straight through the heart. She shouldn’t be here. She couldn’t be here.

But he also knew the stubborn woman would have come after him, if she’d caught any hint of what was going to happen here.

“No! Freyja, stop! Go home!” He threw the thought at her, losing track of what was going on around him for a split second.

And it was in that split second Magnus attacked.

The furious black dreki came out of nowhere, slamming into him. Rurik staggered sideways, his right wing momentarily locking with Andri’s. The smaller dreki lashed out, trying to catch his balance and stop himself from plummeting, and Rurik caught him with a claw around his shoulder, helping the boy stabilize—

Pain smashed through him, razor-sharp claws shredding through his left wing. Magnus saw only the win, not the risk to his brother.

Rurik flapped desperately, trying to get out of Andri’s path, but something was wrong. His wing wasn’t working properly, and as he plummeted between them, he clipped Andri, sending the youth into a spin.

One last thought speared through him. Rurik caught at Andri's mind, even as his crippled wing began to scream in pain as he fell. "I forgive you," he whispered, and then lost the connection.

Air whipped past him. Panic. Fear. His claws scrabbled to right him as he tried to haul out of the dangerous plummet with his one good wing, knowing, knowing it was too late.

Freyja! He saw her face in that moment, as if she stood there watching him, her hands clapped to her mouth and her eyes wide in horror. The only true regret he had was not knowing her love. And not telling her how much she meant to him. Capturing her mind in a caress of golden thread, he sent that last thought to her before it was too late.

"Rurik!" Andri cut through their connection as Rurik fought the air... and lost.

"Hurry!" Freyja screamed, urging Haakon and the rest of his men up the rough road that cut through the landscape. She could see the three dreki fighting in the air above him, and every harsh bellow and dive stole her breath, as the three clashed again and again.

The bloody wagon with the ballista was too slow. They'd never get there in time.

And Rurik was being hit from both sides.

It was also clear that though he attacked the black dreki, he merely avoided the silver one, when he could so easily clip him from the skies with one hard slam.

Something was wrong. Why wasn't he fighting back? He couldn't win against those odds. She could see it in the oddly reluctant way he tried to duel.

Her heart stayed in her throat as she belted her heels into Hanna's flanks and urged the small pony into a gallop. Everything that had never been said welled up between them, and for one ridiculous moment, her eyes were blurry with tears.

I never told him how I feel. I never told him I love him.

Pure stubborn pride and a healthy dose of fear had stopped her from letting him inside her guarded heart, and she had the horrible suspicion that now she was going to be too late.

"Freyja!" Haakon bellowed behind her, but Freyja leaned low over Hanna's shoulder and urged the startled mare on.

Blow after blow was rained upon Rurik. Hanna balked at the top of the hill, nearly throwing Freyja over her shoulder. Three dueling dreki were probably more than the mare could handle.

Freyja wasted no time. Slinging her leg over the mare's back, she landed on her feet and let the mare flee. Then she was running, her skirts flapping around her calves as she hauled herself across the barren terrain.

The earth rumbled beneath her feet. Freyja's lightning flickered in the southern skies, but it wasn't anger she felt now, not when Rurik's was so hard-pressed, but fear. And fear kept her thunder quiet.

"Rurik!" she screamed, hitting the crest of the hill.

Freyja spread her feet, grinding her teeth together as she locked eyes on the silver dreki. Magnus and Rurik were too close together for her to attempt to take the black, but the silver dreki was like a dart in the skies, hammering at Rurik's golden back. She lifted her arms and felt the rush of lightning begin to skitter along her nerves. She'd never attempted something so powerful or focused before. The very air felt like it grew thick and static with electricity. Freyja unleashed everything she had in her toward the silver dreki.

And then it happened.

Rurik must have felt it, for he lurched into Andri's path, knocking the young dreki just enough to take the brunt of her energy upon himself.

She almost thought the silver dreki was going to overshoot Rurik, but then Magnus slammed into his golden body, just enough to send him straight in to the path of Andri. It happened in an instant that felt like an hour. Rurik's wing tore under Magnus's second strike, and those deadly claws went straight through his precious wings.

"Rurik!" she screamed, and scrambled down the rocky path, cutting hands and fingers as she ran for him. "Rurik!"

A flood of golden heat swept her up as he plummeted, and for a second she was seeing through his eyes as they linked. Warmth surrounded her in a golden haze. An absolute rightness of being that felt like she walked with her power braced against his. There was no him and her in this moment. No secrets, no lies. And she knew instantly what he was trying to tell her. What he'd been trying to tell her all along.

"I'm sorry, Freyja. My fierce, beloved mouse." And the feel of it was like liquid gold bursting over her skin, like molten warmth rushing through her veins. A feeling so pure and strong she knew she could never feel alone again.

Then something cut the link.

No! She tried to grab hold of him, but the feel of Rurik's touch slipped from her grasp like mist dissolving in her hands.

Suddenly she was alone and falling to her knees, the pain of the blow shocking her back into her own skin, her own mind.

Just in time to watch her beloved dreki plummet from the skies in front of her.

Chapter 19

“No!” Her scream seemed to echo in the air, in her mind, and even in others. She felt Haakon and his men fall to their knees behind her, and realized she’d somehow extended her horror beyond herself and connected with other minds in the vicinity.

The silver dreki plummeted after Rurik, cutting through the air like a knife. Freyja slammed her hands over mouth in horror as the silver dreki attacked.

She had never, in her life, felt so helpless.

Rurik fell backward through the air, his claws scrabbling for purchase and his wings splayed flat. Andri almost caught him, claws reaching for him. And just when she thought he would cut her dreki’s unprotected belly to pieces, he tried to catch Rurik’s talons in his.

Andri’s left talon caught Rurik’s right, and it was just enough to turn him so he was no longer flat on his back. Rurik slammed into the shale-covered side of the mountain with his left side. Andri tried to let go at the last minute, but it was too late. He crumpled atop Rurik, then flung apart when they both rolled and tumbled down the slope. Wings flashed and rock flew as both of them vanished.

“Rurik!” She was running before she knew it, watching hopelessly as he bounced and jolted down the shale, his wings held clear. Andri hit with a jarring thud, and slid past Rurik, sending a rain of shale down the hillside.

Freyja found herself caught in it, her boots finding little purchase beneath her. She reached out and the earth slowed beneath her feet as she manipulated it, letting her ride a flat piece of shale to a safe plateau. Freyja grabbed at a boulder and hauled herself to a halt as the avalanche swept past her.

Dust obliterated her vision and settled thickly in her throat. Freyja coughed, trying to sweep it from her eyes. Where was he? “Rurik?” She threw the thought into the void around her.

She couldn’t see him. But she could feel his touch flicker against her own, a smoldering ember against the rush of heat it usually was. Their minds meshed again, just for a second.

“...so tired....”

“Hold on, you stubborn male! I am not done with you yet.”

“Andri...?” She could almost feel him struggle to lift himself. He was protecting her from most of the pain he felt, but the searing edge of it made her head ache.

“I’m not sure where he is.”

The dust began to clear. Freyja glanced around her. The shale had settled, but who knew what would set it off again?

You rode it last time. She wondered if she could do that again, and as she lost her connection to Rurik for the second time, she knew she didn't have the time to worry about herself anymore.

Freyja's gaze settled on a flat piece of shale and she hauled herself up, examined the distance between her and Rurik's crushed form, and then stepped onto it. Steering the earth beneath her feet, she whizzed down the slope again. Her passage set off another minor rockfall, but she managed to reach the bottom in one piece and jumped off, staggering at the sudden loss of velocity.

"Rurik!"

The enormous dreki lay crushed and broken. He struggled to lift his head and she simply couldn't look at that wing. One section of it was completely shredded.

"Rurik, you have to get up! Why did you take my wave of force upon yourself?" Her skirt tore, and her palms were grazed as she slipped and skidded on the uneven surface. "Damn you, I hurt you!"

"Andri is my... kin. I swore an oath to protect him when he was a boy, and a dreki's oath is binding, or he may no longer call himself dreki." Rurik's golden flanks heaved. The bone in his left wing sheered straight through the skin, making her feel sick.

"He was trying to kill you!" She finally reached his side and hesitated there, not quite certain where to begin. Bloodied gashes marked his flanks, and he wasn't moving very much, his wings curled in against his sides as though something hurt. Tears heated her eyes, turning her vision to a blur.

"If he'd truly wanted me dead, then he had at least three chances at my wings," Rurik gasped. The link between them seemed thin and faded, almost like a knot that was unraveling. "He's as caught in this as I am. Freyja, get out of here."

"No! I won't leave you." She put her hands against his golden scales, trying desperately to hold on to the link between them.

"Freyja." He managed to haul himself up onto his belly and she saw the wing wasn't the worst of his hurt. Mottled dark veins bruised his left shoulder, and bloodied muscle protruded through his scales. "This is... not done. Get out of here before Magnus hurts you."

As if he knew that they spoke of him, a dreki's scream pierced the skies above them, and wind whipped as the black dreki sailed above them.

A fire began to burn in her heart. Her nostrils flared with anger. That treacherous snake had lured Rurik into an unfair fight. And it wouldn't end here.

"Will he try to kill you?" she whispered.

"He'll not stop... until this is done." Her Rurik sounded absolutely exhausted.

And the logical part of her brain said Rurik had no more fight left in him. He couldn't handle a twenty-ton dreki like Magnus, not in this condition.

There was no one who could stop the fierce beast.

No one but her.

Cold slid down her spine and sweat broke out on her temples. She had some defenses, but not enough to take on a creature a thousand times the size of her.

But the alternative was to walk away as Magnus assassinated her lover, and that was something Freyja couldn't do. Something she wouldn't do.

Shale slid down the harsh slope. Magnus appeared at the top of the ravine, his dark wings spread in a victorious fashion.

"Freyja," Rurik pleaded, finally moving. But not to flee. No, instead he tried to shield her with his own ruined body.

"You should know better than to argue with me," she told him, stepping over his tail and facing the black dreki. Her heart pounded in her chest, but she'd felt the earth rouse to her call and she'd wielded lightning before. She was not helpless, and she wouldn't abandon Rurik. "Don't come any closer, you mangy cur, or I'll shred your wings!"

A wave of psychic force lashed down upon her, like a fist slamming into her mind. Freyja screamed and clenched her fists against her temples, but it wouldn't stop. Her vision blurred and something warm wet her top lip. Just as she thought that she could no longer withstand the onslaught, it suddenly vanished.

She came to pressed against Rurik's flank. Her nose was bleeding and he was shockingly still, but she could sense the warm cocoon of his own mind shielding hers.

"Run, Freyja," came the whisper, and that link between them seemed so thin now she feared it would snap. "I can shield your mind, but... not much more than that."

He was dying. She could feel the heat of Magnus's psychic attack slamming against Rurik's shields, and knew he was too weak to withstand them.

Too weak because he'd risked everything in order to heal her father.

Risked it for her.

"I love you," she whispered, running a hand over his flank. "Keep him out of my mind."

And then she stepped forward.

The earth began to tremble beneath her as Freyja reached for it. She held her hands out as shale began to skitter across the slopes. Magnus hissed as the ground beneath him began to move. Freyja could feel the currents of it rising to her call. She knew this land. She knew the feel of it, the weight of it, the immense power of it. Rurik might have claimed these lands as lord and master, but she was mistress of it.

"Shift," she whispered, tearing the earth apart with but a thought.

Magnus danced uneasily as a furrow ploughed its way through the rock beneath them, toward his feet. A thrust of his wings sent him into the sky, but there was no refuge there.

The sky belonged to her too, and the wind that whipped her hair behind her answered her call. For the first time in her life, Freyja lost herself to the power swimming through her veins. No more hiding, or trying to quash her own powers. She flung a hand toward the airborne dreki, and a whip of wind sent him scrambling for the ground again, landing on the haphazard slope. Magnus's claws scrabbled frantically, but there was no escape into the air, nor any shelter on the ground. As if he realized it, he turned and those vicious green eyes locked on her. He stopped fighting against the slide of shale beneath him, and rode it down into the ravine where she protected her dreki.

Thunder grumbled in the distance. Clouds swam against each other, brewing darkly as she called the winds to her and split the sky with lightning. Its electric lash ran through her veins and when Freyja opened her eyes, she knew they gleamed.

"You foolish girl," the dreki hissed as it alighted on flat ground. "You think you can turn my own skies against me?"

"They're not your skies," she told him in a hollow voice. "And they're not the only thing I control."

Freyja flung a fist into the air, and the ground erupted around the dreki in a whirlwind of shale and rock that cut and slashed at him. He screamed in fury, lashing out with his claws, but there was no way to fight a thousand shards of rock.

She caught a glimpse of narrow green eyes and then he lashed out, sending an enormous shard of shale directly toward her.

Freyja jerked her hands up. The shard stopped in midair, then dropped to the ground. So did all of the razor-sharp pieces surrounding Magnus. She lost control of the whirlwind and it petered out, letting her skirts fall against her stockinged calves.

Freyja gasped, her knees trembling. Wielding so much current was taking its toll on her. She'd never mastered so many different elements at once. Only the storm, and she'd been angry then, the night she went after her ram.

"A child," Magnus chuckled, in a murderous voice that echoed in her mind thanks to the protective shield Rurik encased her in. "Who does not know what she plays with."

"Play with this," Freyja spat, and a strike of lightning speared through the skies toward him.

"Freyja, no!" Rurik screamed, and something seemed to encase her. A protective dome of... nothingness.

The lightning hit the ground where Magnus had stood an instant beforehand. The black dreki vanished as light obliterated her vision, and the world clapped around her in a sudden fierce explosion of heat. She realized her mistake almost instantly. She might wield the lightning, but she was not entirely impervious to it. Small fragments of rock cut against the dome around her and as she blinked, still half-blinded, she realized Rurik had probably saved her life.

Between one blink and the other, an enormous shadow reared above her. Magnus. She'd missed him. Magnus began to strike toward her, his razor-sharp claws gleaming in the light above her, and his wings flared as though he were some demon from hell. Freyja suffered a moment where she saw her own death striking toward her with absolute inevitability.

“Fire!” someone bellowed.

Haakon. Freyja glanced up from beneath the arm she’d thrown above her head, and saw iron flash in the shaft of sunlight that suddenly split the clouds. Then the enormous bolt from the ballista sunk into the enraged dreki’s chest, right where his black heart lay.

Magnus screamed, and the sound cut through her like a knife. Freyja slammed her hands over her ears, her blood seeming to vibrate within her veins as the earth had done at her call. She went to her knees and was grateful when Magnus hit the earth in front of her. His wings flapped like a downed bat’s, and he clawed at the rocks, his tongue protruding from his gaping maw. Freyja slowly took her hands from her ears as Rurik stumbled into her, wrapping his right wing around her in a move too slow to prevent the previous strike. He made a mournful sound in his chest, one that sounded akin to a whale’s bellow, and Freyja pressed her hand against his neck.

“I’m fine,” she whispered. “Fine.”

Stepping out from under his protective touch, she saw the light go out of Magnus’s eyes. A green glow began to emanate from deep within his chest, and then it hovered in the air above his fallen form, an enormous wraith of electric green that flapped faint wings at them before it began to fly into the sky above them.

She’d seen those lights before, when the night skies darkened, and the flicker of green and pink began to dance across the Arctic. But she’d never before understood what they were. Freyja watched in wonder as Magnus’s actinic form vanished over the horizon.

A mournful sound echoed behind her, and then a second joined it, as both dreki lifted their heads and wailed.

Andri appeared in a flap of wings, alighting with a limp beside her. Freyja barely had time to step back before Rurik’s growl filled the air, and he somehow hauled himself up onto his feet, and hissed at the smaller dreki.

Those violet eyes blinked at her, then Andri bowed his head before his cousin. Rurik snapped at his cheek, almost in chastisement. “Freyja is mine. If you touch her I will kill you.”

“You’re barely in any condition to swat a fly,” she snapped back, hurrying back to his side and pressing her hands against the hollow of his chest. “You stupid dreki.”

“You foolish mouse.”

“Fierce,” she corrected, stroking his muzzle. Her heart wrenched in her chest. “Don’t ever frighten me like that again.”

And suddenly tears spilled from her eyes down her hot cheeks. Freyja flung her arms around his neck, but could barely reach halfway around. She couldn’t believe he’d survived. I promise you I will never turn from my fate again, if only you heal, she thought, hoping that any gods who were listening might hear her.

Heat shimmered beneath her touch. Power flushed and ebbed. Then her arms clung to the bare, naked shoulders of the man she loved so much. He winced and took a step to catch himself. Freyja clung tightly. “Rurik?” she blurted.

“Take me into the volcano,” Rurik gasped, his left arm curled against his side and his skin mottled with bruises.

“What are you doing?” she demanded. There were dreki hunters here. Men she didn’t trust, not with her dreki’s life.

“Got to... protect my wings,” he replied, and his face blanched of color.

Freyja turned, her gaze locking on Haakon’s. He and his men stood at the top of the ravine, the ballista glaring dangerously down at them. His face remained implacable, but he nodded, once, toward her. An apology, and an offer of amends.

That didn’t mean she trusted him an inch.

Freyja’s eyes narrowed. She reached out and swatted the ballista with her power, and the hauling mechanism cracked and split in half.

“Just in case you have any foolish ideas before my dreki has a chance to heal,” she called up to him.

“Damn it, Freyja.” Haakon curled his fists at his sides. “That’s twice you’ve broken my ballista.”

“Which makes us even,” she shot back, before Rurik groaned and slumped against her. “Now get out of here, before I really lose my temper.”

Chapter 20

But Rurik stepped into the water with a sigh of relief, and lowered himself into the sulfurous liquid. He almost completely submerged, water turning his golden hair dark.

Freyja knelt beside him, though she didn’t dare touch. Would it be enough? He’d said the waters would heal him and he could drain energy directly from the elements around him—fire, water, and earth—but she couldn’t shake the horrible suspicion his wings would never be the same again.

“He’ll heal,” Andri said, stepping up beside her. The youth had helped her haul Rurik into his caves. Black curls raked over his face, and his eyes were the same unearthly violet color he wore in dreki form.

She wasn’t quite certain she trusted him—but Rurik evidently did. And she had no one else to turn to, who might know how to help Rurik.

“Will he fly again?” she whispered.

Andri looked down at his cousin, his face devoid of all emotion. “If he allows himself time to rest, then yes. He’s of the First Line. A pureblood.”

The dreki saw her confused expression, and interpreted it. “His line descends directly from the goddess, and his blood has been kept pure. Within his line, dreki have only mated with dreki. They have not mixed their blood with dragons or serpents, or even humans. He has powers very few dreki own, including the ability to directly channel fire. He can manipulate the damage to his body if he regains his energy. In fact, he should have been able to heal himself out there. He was dangerously overtaxed for some reason.”

Her father. Freyja’s nostrils flared.

“I understand why he helped you, but I do not understand why you helped him,” Freyja murmured. She had no intentions of leaving Rurik behind, nor of turning her back on Andri even for a second. “You came here to kill him, and I won’t forget that.”

For the first time, conflicted emotion showed on Andri’s face. He looked down at his cousin. “I came here because I was ordered to. My father wanted him dead and promised his lands to my brother.” For a moment, he seemed more of a boy than a man. “You do not argue with my father. I am not the son he would choose,” Andri replied, and lowered his gaze. “My father thinks my weakness is my mother’s fault. She’s his second mate, and he’s never thought highly of her. I was given a choice: prove I can be a son he is proud of, or watch her suffer. I had to come. I had to... to protect her. But being here... seeing Rurik again. It reminds me of everything I once was.”

A hush fell.

“What will your father do when he hears you failed and watched your older brother die?”

More emotion in those dangerous eyes. Andri blinked through long lashes. “I do not know. His heir is dead. Some within the court will say Magnus earned his death for daring to trespass on Rurik’s lands, but... my father’s loyal companions will take offense at this death.”

A chill ran through her. “They’ll come for him again.”

“Maybe.” The word echoed in the hollow chamber. “Some will be wary to rise against their prince. Magnus was one of the best, and Rurik defeated him. They’ll—”

“Their what?” she broke in.

The dreki met her gaze. “He did not tell you?”

“He did not tell me quite a few things, from the sounds of it,” she said angrily. A prince.

“Rurik was his father’s heir,” Andri said. “Which makes him a prince of our people. When his father was killed, Rurik was offered the means to fight for the throne or to go into exile. He chose exile.

“So not only is he their prince, but he is more powerful than most of the entire court. If my father’s dreki come again, they’ll come in force.”

“I won’t let them hurt him,” she whispered fiercely.

“What are you?”

She’d been asked that question so many times. Circles, circles, what did the damned circles have to do with her and her mother? Freyja rested her elbows on her knees, next to where Rurik rested his head on the edge. A golden gleam seemed to emanate from his body, highlighting the dark waters, but he seemed quite oblivious to the world around him. “I don’t know,” she admitted. “My mother called me a Daughter of the Storm, and I think she knew some lore that gave rise to me, but... I don’t entirely understand how it all works.”

For so many years she’d been trying to hide from her nature, to suppress the unnaturalness within her. Every time the locals crossed themselves, she’d looked away and locked her true nature deep within her, but the past few weeks had pushed her to accept truths she’d long turned away from.

There was power within her.

Immense power.

And it seemed both tied to the elements as Rurik’s magic was, but also somehow separate.

Andri squatted down beside her. He was naked, but until that moment she hadn’t truly noticed it. He eyed Rurik with a faint frown. “Whatever you are, you’re a threat to him, because you’re the one person who could stop his people from accepting him. Without allies, Rurik has no hope against Stellan, regardless of your powers. And his people will never accept you, or any children you might bear.”

A stark chill ran through her. “His people exiled him.”

“He is beloved among those who were his dreki. I hear their mutters, their whispers that things would be better if Rurik were king. There is no love for my father, Stellan, but none are strong enough to challenge him.”

“Except for Rurik,” she said, finally understanding.

“Except for Rurik. But you’re human and he is dreki. It’s the one thing that could turn those who are loyal to him, against him. You’re not dreki. Mating with you goes against the creed, and his people will consider this an act of defilement of his pure blood. We can take humans as lovers, but they are never accepted as our consorts, and their children are bastards. They will never accept you as his mate, and he can never come home again.”

Home. The blood ran from her face. Home. Rurik’s greatest dream, the one that had put shadows of loss in his eyes. His sister, his brother, his people... all things he could never have if he tried to stay with her.

A cold knot seemed to settle in her chest. “Rurik and I never had a future,” she said quietly. “I have always known that.”

“And yet you fought for him?”

“I love him,” she whispered.

“Love.” Andri seemed to consider the word. He frowned.

“Rest,” she whispered, brushing a strand of wet hair from Rurik’s temples, knowing she could not explain. “Rest and heal.”

Chapter 21

A week later, Rurik awoke.

He was still submerged in the pool, and the waters were finally cool against his skin, as though he'd adsorbed all of the heat within the volcanic waters. Vague memories returned: of a hand cupping his forehead as though checking for a fever, and a pair of lips pressing gently against his cheek. Of words whispered in his ear that stole straight to the heart of him, even through his protective coma.

"I love you, Rurik. And so I must set you free."

"Freyja?" Rurik staggered to his feet, his knees still shaky, though his body finally felt whole. "Freyja?"

"She's gone," Andri said, stepping out of the shadows and staring at him.

No! He bared his teeth, primitive urges arising within him and shaking the volcano around them. His dreki heart ached, hollow once more, as though it had lost something far more precious than just love. "Where is she?"

"She's gone," Andri repeated, stepping between him and the exit to the cave. "I explained what would happen to you if she accepted your mating bond."

Rurik's head swiveled toward the youth, and he forced his fingers to curl into fists, rather than smashing him flat. "You explained what, precisely?"

"The truth." The words came out of Andri in a rush. "She's human and you're not. You cannot mate with her, or the entire court will turn against you. You can't defeat them all, and they'll destroy you for daring to pollute your bloodline."

"They can try." He shoved past the lad, but Andri slammed both hands against his chest.

"No!" the boy burst out. "No. I won't let you do this. Your people need you. They need their prince. You're our only hope."

Stillness slid through him. "You have a queen."

"We have a monster." The words tore from Andri in an almost sob. "You don't understand what has changed. Your mother doesn't believe in honor, or in dreki code. The strong make their own rules, and only the strong survive Hekla. I didn't even believe in the power of right, until I saw you again. Until you made me believe it doesn't have to be this way anymore." The youth's eyes filled with tears. “I lost my way, Rurik. Everything you taught me had been ground to dust under the never-ending erosion of my father’s will. I stopped believing. I have done things I will regret forever, but it wasn’t until I saw you again that hope gleamed. You tried to save me. You wouldn’t hurt me even when I worked against you because you gave your word. You don’t know what that means to me.”

Rurik’s heart thudded dully in his chest. “If I’d stayed, I would have plunged the entire court into a war it couldn’t cope with. Dreki would have had to choose sides.”

“Father killed Áki, Prior, and Sámaur.” All of them powerful warriors who might have swayed the court, and stood against Stellan and Amadea. “Marduk fled, and no one has seen him since. The court’s already at war, and no dreki trusts another, for fear their words will reach Amadea’s ears.”

Marduk, the little brother who was named after a god-killer. Rurik froze, turning all his predatory attention upon Andri. Marduk and Árdís were the reason he’d accepted exile, rather than fight. His little brother had been barely across the threshold of adulthood, and no match for Stellan and his sons. Not yet, anyway. “Are you certain he’s still alive?”

“Árdís seems to think he is.” Andri hesitated though. “She doesn’t say much, and told Amadea she didn’t know where Marduk has gone, but I’ve heard whisper among your father’s dreki that his heart still beats. As for your sister, my father’s promised Árdís’s hand to Sirius.”

Andri’s other black-hearted brother. “What does Árdís think of this?”

“What do you think?”

Árdís would be furious, but with her uncle’s dreki around her and no allies, there might not be much choice. Rurik paced, his knuckles cracking. He’d only ever intended to protect those he loved.

Could he kill his uncle? Could he challenge him?

Stellan’s not the dangerous one.

Truth, said his dreki magic.

Amadea was only queen with Stellan’s backing. As a female dreki she wasn’t powerful enough to face challenges herself, but with her brother standing at her side, who could unseat her?

And could Rurik honestly kill his own mother?

“I’ll think about it,” he said hollowly. This was no small cause he had to commit himself to. And Andri spoke part of the truth. Those who might be his allies at court would balk at seeing Freyja by his side.

How could he make that choice? He’d only just found her, and she was everything to him. Only with her at his side did he feel whole. Dreki spent their entire lives searching for their twin flame, the one lover who completed them.

And he knew now she was it.

But as prince of his people, he owed them more than he’d given them. How could he stand aside and see his sister forcibly mated, and his brother hunted down and killed? How could he speak of duty and law and right to Andri, when he would not even accept the duty his people needed from him?

“My father’s been in contact with me.” Andri hesitated. “I have to return.”

“What did he say?” Rurik demanded, in a chilled voice.

The lad was young, but his eyes were ancient as their gazes met. “Someone must be punished for this failure, and for Magnus’s death.”

“He’ll kill you.” Rurik stepped forward, trying to catch his cousin’s arm.

Andri backed away, his lips pressed together in suppressed emotion. “Maybe. Maybe not.” Andri shuddered. “There is a great deal I could survive, and he has already lost one son. Only Sirius and I remain, and Stellan likes having a spare in the wings. If I do not go, then he’ll choose another to take my place.” Thick lashes swept down over his eyes. “He’ll choose my mother to submit to my punishment.”

No. Rurik bared his teeth. “And the court allows this?”

There was no honor in punishing females or kits. And dreki youths were to be cherished, because they were so rare.

“Who can stand against him?” Andri asked simply.

Damn him. Turmoil turned Rurik inside out. He needed Freyja. This was no simple choice his cousin asked of him, but... this was wrong. And he was the only one who might stand a chance at uniting his clan and casting out the usurpers.

“I need to speak to Freyja,” he said, because this was not a choice he could make alone. “And maybe you’re wrong.... I don’t think she’s entirely human.” Some part of his subconscious had been dwelling upon what he’d seen when she confronted Magnus. “I knew she could shift the earth and touch the storm, but what she did during that fight was more than simply open herself to the elements. She controlled them. She more than matched a dreki, especially one of Magnus’s power.”

“Only dreki control the elements,” Andri said softly. “She’s not dreki.”

Did they? There was one other, but he’d barely seen fragments of that myth long ago in his youth, and he’d not studied enough to remember what it was. More a glancing recollection. But Daughter of the Storm. He’d heard that name before. Somewhere. “She might have some dreki blood within her,” he argued, though he wasn’t entirely convinced. “In the Dark Ages, when our numbers were dwindling, some dreki took humans for mates.”

“And when it became clear the progeny of such couplings could not fully control the powers they’d been gifted from their dreki side, the clans set to hunting down their descendants and killing them,” Andri said incredulously. “That’s why it’s forbidden.”

“Maybe they didn’t find all of them,” Rurik countered. “Maybe some of them could learn to control their magic?”

“And maybe her powers will spiral out of control—”

“If anyone thinks to move against her, then they will deal with me,” he snapped. That was one decision that could be easily made. “Stay here, and wait for me. I will speak to her.” He turned to leave.

“Rurik!”

He shot his cousin one more glance.

“Even if she isn’t entirely human, you still can’t have her. You’re of the First Bloodline. Your children would lose the gift of fire, and no dreki would follow you. It’s forbidden. It’s been that way since the courts first formed.”

“She is my twin flame,” he said gently, seeing the boy flinch. “The other half of my soul. And I cannot walk away from her.” His heart grew heavy. “I will think on what you have told me about the court. Don’t make any rash decisions. I will need you if I decide to face your father.”

There were debts to be paid before he could seek out his mate.

Rurik stopped in the village, following the scent of his old enemy—the man who’d saved his and Freyja’s lives. Haakon could finally add a dreki to his dragon-killing tally, and Rurik hoped none of Stellan’s men ever discovered how their leader had died.

Haakon jerked upright as Rurik’s hand clasped over his shoulder. He’d been slumped over the table in the taproom, staring so intently at nothing he hadn’t even heard Rurik enter.

“You again,” Haakon slurred, and then wiped a tired hand over his face.

“Me,” Rurik said, surveying the room. Only one of Haakon’s men lingered there, keeping careful watch over his leader, and sharpening his blade. “Out.”

The man arched a brow, and looked to Haakon. “Go,” Haakon said, slinging his leg over the bench so he straddled it. “He’s not here to kill me, Gunnar.”

Gunnar hauled his enormous bulk to his feet and left—but not after shooting Rurik one last threatening glance.

“You survived,” Haakon said, the second the door shut behind his man.

“It would take a great deal more than my cousin’s assault to kill me—so don’t go getting any ideas.”

“What do you want?” the man growled.

Rurik stared down at his nemesis. There were a pair of coins in his hand, and he turned them over and under his fingers, moving with dexterous grace. They reminded him of what he owed this man. He bared his teeth. “Every move you have made since you arrived has been against me, but you also saved Freyja’s life. I owe you nothing, for we are even now. But another of my kind does, another of my... line. And dreki always pay their debts.”

While Haakon might have hurt Freyja, he had done so for a reason, and that reason was a lie. How many other innocents had been swept up in this mess?

“You hunt the dreki who took your wife,” Rurik said, and Haakon sat up straighter. “This truth will cost you,” he warned.

“Then I’ll pay it. What do you want?” The man stood, yellow bruises splayed all up his face, as though he'd gotten in some fight. "I have gold! I have—"

"It will gain me nothing," Rurik interrupted, holding his hand up in the air. "But it will cost you. Cost you the depths of the lie you have been telling yourself ever since your wife vanished."

"Curse you!" Haakon suddenly roared. "Do not toy with me!" He kicked over a chair, then turned and upended the bench. "Tell me where she is!"

As the other man subsided into a pulsing heap of fury, Rurik closed his fist around the coins, his choice made. "There is only one golden dreki beside myself," he said. "Her name is Árdís, and she is my younger sister. She resides in the dreki court below Hekla."

As Haakon strode toward his bag, Rurik stepped in front of him, shoving him to a halt. "You will never get into the court. It was built with magic and resides between this realm and the next, created out of pure Chaos magic. A realm within a bubble of power. Over a hundred dreki live there. Perhaps you could kill one, but they will chew you up and spit you out before you even set foot in the place."

"I don't care." Haakon tried to shove past him. "That dreki took my wife!"

"She did not steal your wife, you fool," Rurik hissed. "She was your wife."

"What?" Haakon slammed to a halt, the breath hissing out of him.

"Think about it," Rurik warned. "Dreki do not eat humans, unless provoked. And what need would Árdís have to steal away your wife, when she has no interest in mating with her or eating her? You said yourself that your wife—Arja—had eyes like polished amber. You describe my sister's mortal form. Her coloring. Tell me this, did she like berries? They were Árdís's favorite too. And she despises smoked cod with a passion. She loves to lie in the grass, warming herself in the sun, and she has an obsession with jewelry, particularly emeralds." He saw the other man flinch. "I don't know if your wife had a temper, but Árdís does. She is petulant and spoiled, but when she laughs she could light the entire room."

The color drained out of Haakon's face. "No," he whispered, but it was with the tone of a man who knew he was wrong.

"Yes," Rurik corrected, righting the chair. "Your wife was a stranger to your village, one caught out in a wild storm one night, a storm the likes of which you've never seen before. Those are the kinds of storms dreki ride upon. None of you knew her, you said."

Haakon's knees gave way beneath him as he sank onto the bench. "But... how? Why?"

"Ten years ago, my sister went abroad in the world. I heard the ripples of her passing in the wind, and she is the only dreki I've connected with since I was exiled. There would have been... pressure on her to breed, and Árdís has always disliked pressure. She wanted to see more of the world before she was old enough to accept a mate. Perhaps she came upon you. Perhaps you pleased her... for a time. But my uncle would have been pushing her to return, and she could never take you with her. I'm sorry. I don't know her reasons for marrying you when she knew it could never last, and I can only suspect why she left. But I do know you deserve the truth."

Haakon scraped a hand over his face, reeling from the news. For a second, Rurik almost felt sorry for the man, and didn't understand why. One did not feel pity for one's enemies. But...

Haakon had based his entire life on a lie, and had killed three dragons and chased Árdís halfway across the seas in an attempt to find her.

Perhaps Rurik understood what would drive a man to do such a thing, for he felt the same need in his heart when he thought of Freyja.

"That lying bitch," Haakon whispered. He looked up, heat returning to her face. "Everything we had was a lie. What the hell do I do?"

"Go home," Rurik said gently. "Go back to your family. And bury your memories of your wife."

The other man's nostrils flared. "No. She owes me the truth from her own lips."

"The truth will get you killed."

"You don't know that."

"My mother believes dreki blood should remain pure. The second she sees you, she will kill you for daring to touch immortal flesh. Perhaps the reason Árdís left you is because she sought to save your life. Doing this will only guarantee your death."

"I don't care," Haakon croaked. "What would you do if that were Freyja?"

Burn the world to ashes to confront her, and demand the truth. Rurik's lips twisted.

"You cannot change my mind," Haakon declared, and Rurik saw the truth of it in the other man's eyes.

"Dig your own grave then. I'll be no more a part of this insane quest."

He had paid the debt Árdís owed the man, and fate would work what it intended.

It was time to find Freyja.

Chapter 22

Rurik found Freyja in the barn, pitching hay into the stalls where her lambs rested. After all that was said and done, everything they'd been through, she was back to acting as though she had nothing else to do right now.

Doubt filled him as he watched her silently from the shadows. Light pierced a hole in the ceiling, highlighting the gilt in her dark blonde hair. She muttered to herself, cursing under her breath as she finished her task and leaned on the pitchfork to rest. His heart twisted in his chest at the sight.

Let her go, said logic. Your uncle will kill her if he hears of her existence.

But there was a part of him that was not so rational. A part of him that curled its lip and growled deep within at the mere thought of surrendering what was his. It burned within him like the molten heart of a volcano, threatening to erupt through his veins.

He could no more deny himself than deny the truth. Freyja was the other half of his soul.

The connection that burned between them from the start was finally one he understood. Here was his other half, the one spirit who could match him. All he had to do was claim her as his and bond with her, for the link between them to be complete.

Freyja's head lifted, almost as if she heard him, which was ridiculous.

Or was it? He still did not understand her powers.

"Rurik?" she whispered, turning around to search for him in the shadows.

Their eyes locked.

And he was done.

Fever danced within his blood, a primal need surging through him, driving him to claim her. Arguments whirled through his head, all the reasons he should not do this. But there was such a sense of rightness within him too. His wildness ached for something more.

Rurik stepped out of the shadows. Freyja's face lit up hungrily, as if she too shared the wildness that lit him on fire, before she swiftly shuttered her expression. Her eyelashes swept down, hiding those magnificent eyes, sunlight staining the tips of them.

"You're well again," she finally said, and her chest heaved as she let out a relieved breath. She hovered on the balls of her feet as though she wanted to go to him, then stopped herself, brushing a strand of hair behind her ear.

Precious Freyja. More beautiful than a storm itself and almost as dangerous. Still a mystery, though he vowed he would unearth the secrets of her power. One day. If she'd let him.

"Thanks to you."

Color darkened her cheeks, and she finally met his gaze. This was when she was at her most beautiful. Both defiant and yet opening herself up to him. No longer holding him at arm's length.

"You weren't there when I awoke," he said, taking a step toward her.

"Your cousin said you were a prince," Freyja whispered, her hands turning white as she gripped the pitchfork. "Your people will not accept me, and I know you would stand between me and them to protect me. I cannot do that to you. You long for home, Rurik, and I will keep you from it. You long for your people, and I cannot join you there. I left as soon as I knew you were healing and your cousin was no longer a threat to you."

"Is that not my choice?" he demanded, taking another step toward her. "I know the risks, and the dangers. And I accept them, for if I cannot have you, then what is the point in living? At every moment in our journey together, I have taken no more than you would allow. You wanted everything that happened between us to be your choice, and it was. So how can you deny me my right to make that choice now?"

"I love you, Rurik. And so, I must set you free." He drew the memory from his subconscious and shared it with her, letting her feel all of the hurt he'd felt at such a decision.

"Do you know what it felt like to wake alone, without my Freyja?"

Freyja swallowed, and a single tear slid down her cheek. "I watched you almost die," she croaked. "Because of me. You weakened yourself for me."

"And I would do it all again, because you mean everything to me, Freyja. Everything."

A look came over her face, as if the weight of his words finally sank in, as if Freyja finally accepted the inevitable truth. Their gazes clashed, and suddenly he knew he wasn't the only one who felt that fire in his blood. Capturing her face in his hands, he pressed a kiss to her lips. Then another. The desire to claim her was nearly overwhelming, especially when she slid her hands up and down his chest, kneading the muscles there, then slowly filtering lower.

But she needed to know what the mating bond meant for her.

He'd promised her a choice in everything he did to her.

With a groan, Rurik withdrew from her, clasping her wrist and drawing her hand away from its devastating work before he could no longer think. He pressed his forehead to hers, breathing hard. "Freyja, Freyja, stop. Wait."

"I don't want to wait." Her breath caressed his lips. "If I stop, I'll start thinking, and I don't want to think of all the reason this can't work."

Neither do I. Rurik bared his teeth in a snarl. "There's something you need to know first."

Those mismatched eyes opened and locked on his.

"This time will be different. There's no coming back from this. I mean to claim you and take you as my mate,” he told her bluntly, breathing in her sweet, wild scent. His fingers brushed her cheeks, his body firm against hers as he pressed her against the stall door. “I’ve never felt this way before. You make me weak and mortal, and every instinct tells me you will be my undoing, but I can’t give you up. I can’t. I need to claim you.”

“Your undoing?” Freyja pushed past him, earning some breathing room. Her eyes spat sparks as she stood in the center of the aisle, facing him down with her hands fisted at her sides. Tendrils of golden hair snaked around her face, tugged free from her braid.

And something sang within him. The same sensation he’d felt when she entered his lair the first time and faced him down. A pure exhilaration unlike any he’d ever known.

He’d known then she belonged to him, and he would have her. He’d thought he could burn the feeling out of his blood once he slaked this reckless thirst on her flesh.

What he hadn’t understood was that reaching out and merely tasting her fury would never be enough. He could never slake this thirst.

But the cost would be tremendous. Freyja weakened him, for suddenly, he had far too much to lose. Not himself. Not his people, or his court. But her. The one being who owned his heart.

“Yes,” he breathed, taking a step toward her. “My undoing.”

“And you’re mine,” she shot back, no longer retreating. “I am mortal. And this... whatever this is between us... has an expiration date.” Her expression suddenly turned entreating. “I have made some decisions in the last few days. I am no longer ashamed of what I am, nor will I ever hide from myself again. I am powerful and dangerous, and I... I love you. I know this now, but the practical side of my nature understands that loving you does not mean there are no more obstacles to surmount. You will not age, Rurik. And I will. Will you still love me when I am an old woman, and you are a young man? What of children? I’ve always yearned for them, deep in my secret heart, but your people will not accept my mating with you.”

Rurik reached for her, but she darted under his arm again, igniting all of his predatory impulses. “I speak of love, and she throws logic in my face.”

“One of us must be practical,” Freyja whispered, wrapping her arms around herself.

Rurik cupped her cheek, caressing her silken skin. “I used to think we had an ending too,” he whispered, sensing how much she wanted him to convince her there was a chance. “But I was wrong. There is no beginning or ending when it comes to us. The dreki speak of the other half of their soul, a being so twined together with theirs that when they find them, it is like realizing how empty you have always felt, and staring at the one being who completes you. You’re my twin flame, Freyja. You’re my forever. And I will rail against the stars themselves if they seek to part us.”

“I think the stars might be your undoing.”

He gave her a sleek, predatory smile. “Then you know nothing, little mouse. A dreki’s lifespan is tied to their twin flame. We will age together if you accept this mating bond. And as for children, if anyone dared touch ours then they would face my wrath. Perhaps the dreki need to accept a new world order. But lying with you tonight changes everything, Freyja. The last time our bodies met, I was not entirely certain what was happening to me. Now I do. I'm mating with you. Claiming you again completes that bond, and there is no going back from this point." His voice dropped to a whisper. "It's your choice."

Questions danced in her mismatched eyes, making her gaze distant. Rurik bit her lip. "What was that?"

"What was what?"

"That doubt in your eyes."

Freyja swallowed, her eyes wary, as if he suddenly had the power to destroy her. "If I am your forever, then why would you call me your undoing?"

He brushed a strand of wheat-gold hair from her eyes, stroking it with a tenderness he'd never felt before he met her. It was a curious sensation. "Freyja, Magnus, and Andri didn't just come here of their own accord. They were sent here by my mother to kill me. I told you once about my exile, and my mother." A shudder ran through him. "Loving you weakens me. If my mother wants to strike at me, then now she has a means to do it. I would rip her throat out if she dared to harm you, but I don't know if I can protect you. Not from an entire court of dreki who are loyal to my mother." He finally exhaled, "You are my undoing, Freyja, but I am your destruction. They will kill you for loving me. You must know this."

He could not keep the truth from her.

Even if it destroyed this fledgling hope that beat in his chest. A dream of a better existence. A promise he had been searching for, all his life.

Freyja frowned up at him. "They can try."

"Freyja—"

"No," she told him fiercely, pressing two fingers to his lips. "All my life I never dared yearn for more. And the one time when I could see my heart's true desire was when you walked into my life, and I pushed you away because I feared the way you made me feel. You nearly died, Rurik. Because of me. But you didn't. And in that moment I swore an oath to the gods, both old and new, that I would never turn my back on my fate ever again."

"I owe my people a chance at freedom," he said. "Andri wants me to challenge Stellan, and take my mother's throne."

"Do you want your throne?"

His heart seized in his chest. It had been all his father ever dreamed of. Everything Rurik had been raised to reach for. But matched against Freyja, it was little more than a cold, stone throne, and a heartless court. "Not if I cannot have you. I love you." His voice dropped to a whisper. "And I understand little the emotions that rage within me, but... I cannot give you up."

"Then let them come," she breathed. "I am not without my defenses, dreki-mine."

His heart skipped a beat in his chest. "There are others who can take the throne. Others I trust."

His thumbs caressed her mouth. “But Andri is right. I cannot walk away from my people. I want to mate with you, but duty compels me to go to war for my people.”

“I love you,” she breathed, her eyes shining with unshed tears. “And your words terrify me. But I am done with fear. I am done with regret. And if your mother, or your uncle, or your fellow dreki try to come between us, then I will face them at your side.”

“Freyja.” He shuddered.

“I accept your bond,” she whispered. “Forever and ever, no matter who tries to tear us apart.”

A distant rumble of thunder echoed and he glanced to the walls, before looking back at her. Lightning danced in her eyes, the hum of power whispering through her veins.

Yes. His heart soared. This was just the beginning, and yet it was their beginning. He captured her mouth, his thumb stroking that wet tear from her cheek as he kissed her. “Everything and forever,” he breathed, tracing the corner of her mouth, his fingers delving into her silky hair.

Freyja’s tongue tangled with his. Fearless. Fierce. All the things that first ignited his curiosity. Her mouth brushed against his, and he tasted the violence of her power on her tongue. Mine. Rurik fought free of her hands and captured her around the waist, drawing her into his embrace. This woman could be a queen, if only his people could see the same things he did when he looked at her.

Breathing hard, with her breasts crushed against his chest, she let him plunder her mouth. Rurik felt his hard body melting into her soft curves. It was a kiss to tell her everything he felt in his heart. He wasn’t letting her go. Maybe he hadn’t been entirely certain of that when he came here, duty to his people warring within his breast, but seeing her now, having her skin beneath his, cemented his desire.

The court could wait. His uncle could wait. Freyja was his to claim, and without her there was no point in existing.

Suddenly, he could no longer withhold the heat of his need. The world reeled around them as he pushed her backward, hand sliding down her hips, then up, to the curve of her breasts, as if to make sure she was real. That she was really there, in his arms. He couldn’t get enough of her. Freyja’s back met the barn wall, and her mouth tilted to his as she claimed him with her hungry lips, her hand still fisted in his shirt.

Rurik dragged a handful of her skirts up between them, even as her hand slid down to caress his erection through the thin fabric of his trousers. Cupping her thigh, he dragged it up to nestle around his hip, thrusting into her hand. The shock of that touch lanced through him. Sweet goddess, but he’d yearned for this. To see Freyja boldly take what she wanted from his body, as if there was no longer any barrier between her heart and his. To curl those fingers around his hard length and work him, as if she wanted to imprint the feel of him on her skin.

Biting back a gasp, Rurik thrust his cock into her hand, rubbing against her touch. A desperate ache filled him. He wanted to be inside her. Now. To claim her and fulfill their mating bond, so she could never, ever be taken from him.

His fingers found her, wet and slick. He didn't know if it was his hands that freed his cock from his trousers—or hers. But he grabbed her under the ass and lifted her, impaling her with a single thrust.

“Mine.”

Her thought-thread connected with his. “I claim you, Rurik, prince of my heart.”

“And I claim you.”

Power spilled between them as the mating bond roared to life. A strangled sound tore from his throat as the heat within him suddenly flared volcanic. The world faded. All that remained was him and Freyja, and her tight little body clutching at his as he thrust home. One. Last. Time.

Pleasure roared through him, and he could feel her match him as the mating bond took them both over the edge. Freyja cried out, throwing her head back as they rode the storm. Sweet Goddess. Rurik sank his teeth into her throat, rocking into her hard, grinding his hips against hers as his seed flooded within her.

Their minds danced against each other, until he no longer existed as Rurik, nor she as Freyja, but both blended as one. White-hot pleasure obliterated all else, until slowly sensation began to return; Freyja's hand cradling his nape, her face nuzzling against his throat as little aftershocks ran through her. Rurik turned his face and found her mouth, kissing her with slow affection. His. Finally his. Utterly and irrevocably. He gasped against her lips, completely spent.

Freyja's skirts fell around her thighs. Slowly she looked up, her eyes heavy-lidded and a lazy, satisfied smile on her face. “Everything and forever.”

Her mind touched his, locked together in a thought-thread that could never be broken. She could never hide anything from him ever again. Nor he her. The feeling might have left him slightly exposed once upon a time, but this was Freyja. His mate. His twin flame. He could feel the sated ache in her body where they joined, as if her body was merely an extension of his own, and it felt like coming home. Like finally feeling complete in himself.

“Everything and forever,” Rurik whispered, and lost himself in the sensation of loving her.

The End

CRIMSON UNDERCOVER

A covert mission. An ancient artifact. A shifter mafia...

Lyra Thorne's life as a hunter of vampires is over, but her job protecting humanity is far from finished. As an operative for a secret team keeping unhumans in line, she's willing to do whatever it takes to keep Chicago safe. But she never expected she'd end up going undercover with a mob full of wolf shifters...

Mace Conner thought he had everything figured out until he fell for Lyra. Now he's forced into surveillance duty while he watches Lyra romance a Russian double agent. Can he keep his feelings in check to prevent an ancient magic from wreaking havoc?

As the mystery deepens, Lyra and Mace have one chance to stop the city from tearing itself apart...

Chapter 1

Lyra Thorne crossed one leg over the other in her short dress, careful not to reveal the hilt of the knife hidden in her boot. The smell of roasted tomatoes and cream sauce wafted over to her table, which was covered with a fine tablecloth that could only be found in a four or five-star restaurant. She took a sip from her red wine and looked across at the muscular Russian sitting in front of her. Nikolai may have been strong, but he seemed to approach each sentence with caution. Lyra wasn't sure if it was the fact that English was his second language or that he was worried someone was watching him. He had a right to be worried.

Lyra raised an eyebrow. "Do you take all of your blind dates to restaurants where the wine costs over $200 a bottle?"

After a moment of hesitation, Nikolai smiled. "Do you not think you deserve wine this good?"

"I know that I do. But from your side, it seems like you're taking a chance on a stranger."

Nikolai took his own sip. "Maybe I just like expensive wine."

Lyra couldn't help but smile. Even though she wouldn't refer to this as a completely social encounter, she couldn't remember the last time she'd been on a date.

She brought her hands together on the silken tablecloth. "I guess this is the part where I start the small talk."

"Small talk. Big talk. I don't mind either way."

Lyra tried to look beyond the veneer of the Russian man's finely-pressed dress shirt and the gold watch on his wrist. She tried to even get beyond his brown eyes and into the soul of the man who was involved in something magical and deadly. "What is it you do for a living, Nikolai?"

Nikolai straightened his collar, an action he'd done several times since they'd arrived. "I work in the family business." The Russian looked to his left briefly before returning his gaze toward her. "It's maybe not so much my dream job, so sometimes I'm not doing exactly what I want. But there's something good about sticking with your family."

Lyra nodded. "I understand, though I haven't seen my own family in a while." She let out a wistful sigh. "They didn't exactly approve of some of the choices I made during my youth."

For some reason, choosing to hunt and kill vampires to protect humanity didn't sit well with my parents. I wonder why?

Nikolai looked down at the table for a moment. "It is tough when the past continues to haunt us, no?"

Lyra attempted to decipher all the meaning behind her date's statement. "I couldn't agree with you more."

After the waiter came by to take their orders, Lyra and Nikolai engaged in some polite small talk. When nothing related to her mission had come up for several minutes, she heard a faint buzz in her earpiece.

"Stick to the script, Casanova."

Lyra's lips curled into a smile.

Mace sounds a little bit jealous. I guess some vampires just can't stand humans having a good time.

"Sorry, what did you say Nikolai?" Lyra tapped the comm device in her ear. "My hearing aid was on the fritz for a second."

Nikolai smiled. "I was just asking why you chose me over many eligible bachelors on dating website."

Lyra let her fingernails slide down the glass. "Who's to say I didn't pick five men to date on the same night? In fact, we should probably hurry things up a little."

Nikolai didn't seem like he was sure that he should smile. "This is a joke, yes? I have yet to master American sarcasm."

"Don't worry. I don't have any other dates." She let her arm extend as she laid her palm on the table. "Tonight I only have eyes for you."

Lyra kept her laugh internal as she heard a cough on the other side of the comm device. Nikolai laid one hand on top of hers. There was something about the man that seemed both strong and weary.

He gripped her hand gently. "Good. I only have two other dates, so it's okay if this one runs longer."

Lyra snorted. "You're better at this American sarcasm than you let on." She withdrew her hand and took another sip of wine. She wished for a second that her superhuman metabolism allowed her to get at least a little bit tipsy. "So why are you in town?"

Nikolai laced his own fingers together. "More of this family business. My father and brother are planning a big event. It's something they've looked forward to, so I will try my best to help."

As Lyra nodded her assent, she could sense an out-of-place movement in her peripheral vision. She'd been practicing distinguishing vampires from regular humans since the age of 10, which made it all too easy for her to spy the three vampires walking in together through the front door. Her heartbeat quickened. While it was now common for vampires and other unhumans to mix openly with the population, there was something out of place about this trio.

Business or pleasure?

The answer came to her quickly when all three of the restaurant's newest patrons looked right in her direction.

Chapter 2

Mace Conner shifted uncomfortably in the small, musty van. He hadn't felt quite right about this covert operation ever since Rhea, the group's godlike leader, had suggested it. Despite her protestations, Mace had insisted on being inside the surveillance vehicle when Lyra and the Russian mobster made contact. He tried to find the best position for his spine in a way-too-small chair beside their trusty technology expert, Doug. To his left, their criminologist and morgue specialist, Heidi, took up very little space beside him.

Doug shifted his shoulders from side to side. "You know, this whole surveillance thing is a lot more comfortable when we don't stuff three people into a two-person van."

Heidi's high-pitched voice echoed inside the van. "You're just mad that you aren't here alone and can't catch up on old Ghost Hunters episodes."

"That's just a rumor that's never been proven. Although, I do love the show, and every so often, they do spy a real ghost." He glanced over at his petite coworker. "Anyway, why are you even here? Don't you have some dead or undead flesh to cut into?"

Heidi sighed. "Nobody's brought in any dead bodies in a while. I got bored down there."

Doug grunted. "And what's your excuse, Mace?"

Mace wondered if there was any way he could share the truth. While he trusted Lyra out in the field, he was in no way on board with having her go out on dangerous dates with the mafia. Ever since he had drunk some of her blood to revive himself, his already intense feelings for the former vampire hunter had grown. Even Lyra's requirement that their relationship stay professional as long as she was on the team couldn't stop him from thinking about her. It couldn't stop him from dreaming about her at night. He hoped that deep down Lyra felt the same way.

Mace tightened his headphones. "Honestly, I wanted to watch a few episodes of that ghost hunter show."

Heidi and Doug chuckled while Mace listened more intently.

Hearing her flirt with another man boiled his blood. But he'd spent his entire life hiding his true emotions from the people around, so the fake, faint smile remained plastered upon his face.

He wrinkled his nose. "She doesn't have to act so... interested."

Heidi leaned over and placed her hand on his shoulder. "You sound a little jealous, Mace. Are you threatened by his sexy Russian accent?"

"No. Of course not."

Doug licked his lips. "I know what you should do. You should try to adopt a Transylvanian accent. Then Lyra would be all over you."

Mace grumbled and listened more intently to Lyra and the Russian.

"After we finish our pasta, I could really go for a late-night sandwich."

Mace's body stiffened. "That was the safe word."

Doug groaned. "A man drops one sandwich, and she'll never let me hear the end of it. Couldn't you have just chosen some kind of innocuous safe word. Like yogurt? Or giraffe?"

Mace ignored the computer genius and looked into the camera screens they had set up around the perimeter of the restaurant. At the exact moment his heightened sense of smell caught wind of fellow vampires, he could see an increase in activity in the screens both in front of and behind the bar. Whatever the dozen darkly-attired unhumans wanted with the restaurant, Mace guessed it had nothing to do with pasta.

Chapter 3

Lyra placed her napkin on the table and stood up as if there weren't a group of vampires waiting outside the restaurant to kill her.

She faked a smile. "I need to use the ladies' room. You'll still be here when I come back though, right?"

Nikolai raised an eyebrow. "Okay, as long as you don't take too long. My other date starts in half an hour."

Lyra chuckled softly and walked toward the back of the restaurant. When she reached the hidden hallway of the restrooms, she knelt down to unstrap her heels. She quickly kicked them off into the corner and walked over toward the swinging kitchen door.

Let's see what we're dealing with here.

Lyra gently pressed open the door. She spied half a dozen vampires in formfitting dark clothes having an escalating conversation with the kitchen staff. She had a feeling that the head chef would not come out the victor in this scenario. She let the door slide shut as she tiptoed back into the main dining area. She looked back over at her table and was surprised to see the three vampires standing around Nikolai.

Wow, I haven't had a date interrupted by a vampire since high school.

Nikolai seemed calmer than she anticipated. Her date placed his napkin on the table beside his plate and stood up to face the unwelcome guests. As the Russian took a step back, all three vampires stepped forward in sync.

Lyra didn't hesitate, stumbling over toward the table and in to Nikolai's arms.

She affected an intoxicated giggle. "Nikolai. I told you not to take any clients this late. You need to get me home and into bed."

As the Russian's muscular arms worked around her midsection, she nuzzled her head against his neck. She had to admit, the mobster smelled pretty good.

Nikolai seemed unfazed. "You are right, Dear. If you gentlemen will excuse us."

The three darkly clad visitors stood steadfast in their way. They didn't seem to be buying the drunk act at all.

Lyra threw herself to the ground and made it look like an accident. "Oh my God. I really should have stopped after the fourth martini."

When one of the vampires folded his arms and looked down at her disapprovingly, she brought her fist straight up into his groin.

The unfortunate recipient of her punch doubled over with a scream as Lyra pressed her hands into the ground and pushed herself off. Her powerful bare feet slammed right into the center of the vampires' chests. The kicks caught both unhumans off guard as they sailed through the restaurant and onto a large table of breadsticks and appetizers. As they cracked the plates and scattered silverware, the patrons of the restaurant shrieked and scattered.

As Lyra stood back up, she took her date's hand. "You need to come with me."

Nikolai shook his head. "I can handle myself. You are the one who should run."

Lyra yanked the Russian's arm, and he reluctantly followed as they sprinted toward the back of the restaurant. As she looked over her shoulder, she saw the half-dozen additional attackers coming out through the kitchen.

Nikolai yanked at the handle to the back door. "It is locked."

Lyra turned around without speaking and slammed her superhuman foot into the door. It gave way with ease, ripping apart from the doorjamb and landing with a thud in the alleyway.

Nikolai let out a sharp laugh. "You do the CrossFit, no?"

Lyra grinned. "Come on."

As they reached the alley, Lyra quickly sensed danger closing in on them from the only way out. She could see additional attackers coming toward them through the dimly lit gap between buildings. When she turned back toward the restaurant, she could see the other unhumans streaming into the back patio. Behind her was a brick wall that she could scale, but she doubted her Russian friend would be able to do the same.

They were completely surrounded.

Lyra smiled and put up her hands. "You've got us. You're welcome to have our leftovers and the second half of a $200 bottle of wine. But only if you let us go."

The vampire who she'd struck where the sun definitely doesn't shine adjusted himself before her. "We don't want you, little girl. We're here for him. Give him up or we'll turn you into leftovers."

Nikolai whispered in her ear. "Run, Lyra. This is not your fight."

Lyra smiled. "I wouldn't be a good blind date if I just left you here to be killed. I have a feeling my star rating would go down on all those dating apps."

"Do you never stop with the joking?"

She looked back at the 12 very strong-looking vampires before her. "Haven't had to yet. But I'll let you know tomorrow." Lyra cracked her knuckles. "If I live that long."

Chapter 4

It didn't take long for Lyra to absorb her surroundings completely. Her former handler, Piers, had trained her to fight her way out of almost every possible scenario. He'd even once dropped her into a well to fight some kind of sea creature. She left the fight with a broken ankle, but she lived to tell the tale.

Lyra smiled during her moment of absorption when she saw a half broken chair sitting beside a green metal dumpster.

It almost feels like my birthday.

Before any of the vampires could make a move, Lyra sprinted and dove for the chair. She grabbed the wooden weapon with one hand and smashed it into the ringleader's face. As two more unhumans reached for her, she rolled underneath their grasp and took the now-broken chair legs in her hands. With incredible speed, she whipped the makeshift stakes directly into two attacker's chests. The creatures exploded in a puff of dust. All that remained was the two chair legs clattering to the alley ground. She glanced over to her side and saw Nikolai backing away from four of the vampires. The rest of them closed in on the greater threat, which of course, was her. She swung her leg with a roundhouse kick to keep the attackers at bay. But with six of them surrounding her and just one little former vampire hunter to fight them off, she knew it was only a matter of time.

Lyra continued to back away until she could feel the brick wall behind her.

Any time now, Mace.

Almost as if on cue, several blasts of blue light fired into the alleyway. The laser beam struck several of the vampires, stunning them and knocking them to the ground. She caught a glimpse of her hunky coworker, his futuristic gun blazing as he mowed down more unhumans.

Mace continued to fire as he tossed an object toward her. "Catch!"

Lyra leapt high into the air and snagged a sharpened stake from the night sky. When she landed, she turned left and immediately stuck the weapon through one attacker's back. The moment he screamed and disappeared, Lyra snagged the stake from the now-dusty air, and used it on the heart of another attacker. When he disappeared, the alleyway was littered with piles of dust and unconscious unhumans Mace had gunned down.

Lyra sprinted to Mace's side. "You guys certainly took your sweet time."

Mace looked back and forth between Lyra and Nikolai. "I didn't want to be a bad wingman."

The Russian looked down in awe at the unconscious vampires. "I don't understand. Is this date or rescue mission?"

When the tires of the surveillance van screeched to a stop in front of the alley, Lyra grabbed her date's hand once again. "A little bit of both. Come on."

The three of them rushed forward and jumped into the now-even-more-cramped surveillance van.

Doug shouted from the driver's seat. "Hold onto something!"

As the van peeled away from the restaurant, Lyra slammed the door shut behind Nikolai. She heard a loud thump as one of their pursuers leapt upon the vehicle. Then another thump. Then another. Before Doug could get the van into third gear, one of the vamps began pounding on the metal roof.

Lyra looked up at the noise. "Does Dougie Boy's magic gun shoot through metal?"

"I heard that! Stop calling me Dougie Boy!"

The van swerved to avoid oncoming traffic, and the passengers inside lurched to their left.

Mace shook his head. "Might just ricochet around in here and kill one of us."

Lyra pulled the knife from her boot. "Guess we're gonna go old school with this."

When the vampire pounded so hard through the top of the vehicle that his hand went through, Lyra stabbed her knife right through his palm.

The attacker screamed and lost his balance, falling off the van and landing with a thud behind them.

Nikolai braced himself against the backdoor of the van while Doug once again swerved to avoid oncoming cars. "I may not have the best memory, but I do not think any of this was in your dating profile."

Before Lyra could respond, the backdoor flew away from the van, torn off by one of the remaining attackers. Nikolai lost his balance and fell out of the moving vehicle.

Heidi shrieked. "Stop the car!"

As the van skidded to a stop, the remaining vampire on top of the vehicle went flying forward. Lyra watched him land on the pavement with a sickening crunch.

She leapt through the now-open back and looked to see what damage had been done to her Russian date. The vampire with the knifing through his hand and the one who'd pulled off the door closed in on Nikolai, who remained motionless on the street.

Lyra rushed toward him, until she noticed something that gave her pause. Through the back of the Russian's dress shirt, she noticed tears begin to form. And through the new rips in his shirt, she no longer saw muscles and skin. When the Russian arched his back, she could see the fur begin to spring forth as his body grew in response to an unnatural change. Claws descended from his hands, which now looked more animal than human.

She shook her head and continued to walk toward the transformation. "Great. Looks like my blind date is a shifter."

Chapter 5

Mace could feel his jaw drop as he watched the Russian mobster's full transformation into a werewolf. In over 100 years of life, he could barely remember the last time he'd seen what looked like a human transform into something very different. The Russian's fingernails had grown into sharp, frightening claws. The well-fitting dress shirt had been torn in several places, with ratty fur sticking through the ripped stitching. And there was one trait almost all of these wolflike creatures seem to share: they always looked pretty pissed off.

Mace pulled his futuristic-looking stun gun from his holster and glanced over at Lyra. "I guess neither of us saw that coming."

Lyra's beautiful eyes stared straight ahead at the vampires surrounding the Russian mobster turned wolf. "I guess not. Hell of a lot super smell did for us."

"I suppose we're out of practice."

Lyra's response came in the form of springing out of the now-damaged van and running for the closest vampire.

Heidi, who didn't look shaken in the least, took the spot the former hunter had vacated. "You guys are great with this conversation stuff. I think you're meant to be."

Mace grumbled as he joined Lyra in the fray.

As his partner seemed to be handling her vampire quite well, he pointed his weapon and fired blasts of hot blue light toward the closest assailant. His first two shots were true, stinging the side of one vampire, who convulsed and fell to the ground. Attacking members of his own species never sat well with Mace, but everything had to play second fiddle to the mission. The second vampire he fired upon was faster than most, avoiding several blasts and getting right up in the face of the former prince in a matter of moments. With a swipe of his razor sharp fingernails, the vampire attacker sliced through the side of the weapon, causing sparks to fly and rendering Doug's creation useless. Well, not completely useless, as Mace used the weapon to pistol-whip the unhuman in the face.

The vampire touched his cheek and turned back toward Mace with a smile. "You're on the wrong side, my brother." When the vampire stood all the way up, Mace realized the attacker had half a foot on him. "You should be shooting the wolf in the face with that thing."

The former vampire prince crouched into a ready stance. "And you shouldn't be disrupting fine dining without a reservation."

The unhuman sneered and once again used his speed to his advantage. His fists were lightning fast, and Mace barely avoided a series of three rights and four lefts. As he dodged the blows, he took his eyes off the attacker for just a second. While it afforded him the opportunity to see that Lyra had her boot on her attacker's neck, and that the wolfman Nikolai seemed to have carved out the chest of his attacker, it wasn't a great idea against such a speedster. The vampire unloaded a barrage of attacks on Mace's jaw and chest. The former prince lost track of the number of hits the tall, lanky assailant landed on his body. While vampires didn't feel quite as much pain as humans, Mace could feel these resonate throughout his body. His eyes began to water before they turned blurry. He threw up his arms in front of his face and attempted to leap backwards to avoid the assault. But it was no use, as the vampire jumped with him and wrapped his sharp nails around Mace's midsection. The unhuman slammed the former prince into the blacktop so hard, it unlodged a manhole cover and caused a crack in the street.

Mace could feel a stinging sensation through his spine as he tried once again to block the vampire's attacks. Fists and elbows flew at him with incredible speed, though he was able to block about half of them with his own reflexes. One whopper of a blow landed under Mace's chin, causing him to let his guard down and the vampire to show off a fanged smile.

"It's not going to be better if he wins, Turncoat. Do you really want the city crawling with werewolves?"

Mace quietly moved his left arm to the side and grabbed hold of something solid between his fingers. "I don't, but I appreciate the heads-up."

With a faster-than-expected swipe of the manhole cover, Mace sent the metal disk right through the vampire's neck. The speedy creature didn't even have a chance to scream as the improvised weapon decapitated him. The severed head flew off the unhuman's body and rolled to a stop with a surprised look on his face. The headless body flopped to the side as Mace quickly got to his feet.

With the rest of the vamps disposed of, Lyra looked straight into Mace's eyes and began to slow clap.

She grinned. "Now that is something I've never seen before. Kudos."

He cracked his neck and rubbed at a particularly nasty blow the now-headless unhuman had left him. "I'll take the style points." He glanced over at Nikolai, who seemed to be wobbling a bit over the dead vampire beneath him.

Lyra was the first to his side. "You're not looking good there, Wolfman."

Mace watched as the fur and claws retracted and the transformation reversed itself. Gone were the wolflike indicators, replaced by a now-half-naked man with his clothing in tatters.

Nikolai stumbled and Lyra caught him before he could fall.

"Is a more exciting first date than usual."

Before Mace or Lyra could say a thing, the wolf shifter went completely unconscious in her arms.

Mace gingerly walked toward them. It was true that vampires had incredibly fast healing, but it certainly wasn't instantaneous.

He placed two fingers on Nikolai's throat. "He's still alive."

Lyra smirked. "It sounds like you're surprised."

"This whole thing is surprising. What the hell did those vampires want with the Russian mob anyway? And since when was the Russian mob made up of wolf shifters?"

Lyra heaved the unconscious mobster onto her shoulders. "I think you're telling me we're going to do an interrogation, right?"

Mace sighed. "We are. But can you try not breaking the suspect's arm again this time?"

"You're no fun." Mace and Lyra walked back to the van as the former prince wondered if they'd accidentally stumbled into a gang war.

Chapter 6

Nikolai felt terrible pain in every organ of his body as he came to on what felt like a hospital bed. He hated having to transform without getting properly warmed up, as it gave him one hell of a hangover the next day. He groaned as he tried to bring his hand up to his head to rub out some of the cobwebs. Unfortunately, his wrist was bound by his side, along with his ankles being shackled down as well.

"I guess I have not earned much trust."

"Being a wolfman plus a mobster puts you at a disadvantage."

Nikolai's eyes widened as he watched the blonde American woman keep her distance from the bed as she checked his vital signs on a monitor.

At first, he thought he might be in some sort of hospital, but the equipment seemed too new, and from his keen sense of smell, he couldn't pick up the usual mix of disinfectant and illness that a medical building usually gave off.

He wrinkled his nose. "If you got to know me, you would know I was a very nice mobster and wolfman."

The woman gave a slight smile before returning to neutral. "Don't try to charm me, Russian werewolf in America. I don't care much for the living."

Nikolai chuckled. "Where am I? Or is that on a need to know basis?"

"You are usually where I examine the dead bodies. But they apparently want to keep you alive, so I suppose that's a good sign."

Before the Russian could say a word, a tall, skinny man who looked like he belonged in front of a computer monitor came blasting in through the door with way too much energy.

"Okay, thank God interrogation hasn't started yet. I have so many questions about shifting. I've never had a chance to talk to a shifter before."

Nikolai chewed at his cheek. "This seems like interrogation already."

The skinny man laughed. "No, no, no. They have way tougher questions than I'll have. So, do you have like dozens of the same shirt to get ready for when you tear yours apart during the transformations?"

Nikolai glanced toward the blonde woman.

She waved her hand. "You don't have to answer him. He's not that important."

The skinny man looked shocked. "Not that important? My tech runs this place. I probably make your job 20% easier."

"Your tech makes it 20% easier. Your voice makes it 50% more annoying."

Nikolai laughed. "You fight like married couple."

The man and the woman shot him a glance at the same moment. "We're not together."

Just then, his date and her comrade stepped into the room. He remembered seeing the two of them in the van with him before the backdoor was torn off its hinges and he was forced to transform for the fight. While some creatures couldn't remember their actions upon transformation, Nikolai remembered every single second. At least until the combination of unpreparedness and wine sent him collapsing into his date's arms. Whoever she truly was.

His date was the first to speak. "Rise and shine, Honey. I think we're past the small talk portion of our relationship."

Nikolai tried his best to look relaxed even though he was surrounded by strangers and had no idea where he was. "I don't know. I would love to know more about your family, your friends, and your occupation."

The only vampire who seemed interested in keeping him alive stepped forward. "Date's over. Why was the vampire gang after you?"

"What, you can't ask your friends. Is there not some kind of vampire Facebook?"

The blonde woman laughed. "Actually, it's all about vampire Snapchat right now."

His date flashed her co-worker the side-eye. "Heidi, don't encourage the Russian comedian."

The vampire folded his arms. "We know some things about you, Nikolai. We know that you and your gang have been snatching up ancient artifacts throughout the United States, and we know that you plan do to something with them. Whatever it is, it doesn't seem like it's making the vampires very happy."

Nikolai didn't love that his family's secrets were being talked about so freely, but his well-practiced smile didn't portray any of those feelings. "And your friends would still be brooding." Nikolai looked around the room and did his best to give a shrugging motion despite his restraints. "Tell me I'm not right. Happy vampires are like golden goose, no?"

The Russian could tell he was getting under the vampire's skin. He couldn't help but laugh a bit on the inside.

The interrogator shook his head. "Is somebody going to help me here?"

Nikolai's date bobbed her head from side to side. "The Russian does have a point. I haven't seen many happy vampires in my time."

"Enough."

A short, older woman with dark skin walked into the room and immediately took over. He could sense her magical, ancient energy from the moment she stepped in. Whatever she was, the woman was no one to be trifled with.

Nikolai could feel his smile starting to slip away. "I will cooperate. But, I would love to know where it is you have me imprisoned, first?"

His date put a hand on the vampire's shoulder as she gestured throughout the room. "This grumpy vampire, which I realize is kind of redundant, is Mace. That's Doug, Heidi, and Rhea. And you already know me."

Nikolai nodded. "Not as well as I previously thought." He looked into the eyes of the powerful, elderly woman. "Tracking down these artifacts is plan my father has had for many years. I am, how do you say, left in the dark? I'm just being good son."

Mace grumbled. "And a good mobster."

"Use whatever labels help you sleep at night. I imagine some would call you illegal vigilantes. But I am not one for labels."

Lyra walked up to the side of his bed. "So, you're telling me you don't know anything else about what your father is trying to do with these artifacts?"

Nikolai shook his head. "My father has great temper. Sometimes you just don't ask questions."

The short, powerful woman caught his eye. "And you have no clue why the vampires would be trying to stop you?"

Nikolai grinned, but not so much as to offend the magical woman. "What can I say? You've seen it in movies: vampires and shifters don't always get along. As you can probably tell, I am Team Jacob all the way."

Mace looked toward his master. "He's obviously hiding something. Maybe Lyra should break one of his arms."

Nikolai felt a shiver of nervousness go down his body as he saw just how close Lyra's hands were to his unprotected arm. "I tell truth. If I had choice at second career, it probably wouldn't be this. I am victim of familial circumstance."

Rhea put her hands on her hips. "We can't trust him, but we also don't get much out of keeping him here." She looked over to Lyra, who seemed to be eyeing his arm with hunger. "Lyra, I want you to accompany Nikolai to the gang's next acquisition."

Nikolai's heart beat faster. "This not sound like such good idea."

He watched with amazement as purple swirls of magic appeared above the woman's hands. "I'm sorry, but this isn't the kind of situation you have a choice over."

The Russian leaned back in his bed. "I understand you. No need for demonstration."

The vampire, unfazed by his master's magic, tried to speak under his breath. "I agree with the Russian. This isn't a good idea."

Lyra moved her hands toward Nikolai's arm, and a panic set over him.

"There is no need for broken bones!"

His date bypassed his arm and unfastened the restraints on his wrists. "I thought it said somewhere on your profile that you were full of courage and Russian vigor."

"We all exaggerate on dating profiles. This is not an American-only practice."

With his arms free, he stretched out his shoulders. "If I am to take date to gang meeting, I cannot guarantee her safety."

Rhea nodded. "You'll find she can handle herself quite well."

With the vampire burning a hole into his face using his eyes alone, Nikolai looked up toward Lyra. "I look forward to finding out all about this."

While a smile graced his lips, he hoped that bringing the woman into the inner circle wouldn't get both of them killed.

Chapter 7

Mace pleaded with Rhea for over 20 minutes, but his fearless leader refused to relent. He followed her down the never-ending hallway of their lair 10 stories below the Hancock Tower. "When it was mobsters, I would completely understand where you're coming from. But now that we know they're shifters as well, this could end badly, Rhea."

The short being who was neither human nor inhuman kept her gaze forward. "This isn't a decision you can haggle over. We don't know how much time is left before the Russians get all of these artifacts together. These are powerful ancient creations, even stronger than the bombs Lyra's handler had put together."

"Her former handler."

Rhea stopped and met the vampire's eyes once again. "I know why you're trying to protect her, but she can handle herself. She saved your life a couple of times already."

He looked away. "I saved her life too."

"This is not a competition, nor is it up for discussion. Lyra is going to help us get to the bottom of this, and we're not going to let your anti-shifter bias get in the way of the mission."

Mace put his arms up into the air. "I don't have a shifter bias."

Rhea lifted her eyebrows. "It's the only thing the movies seem to get right. You won't see Lyra for a while, so you should probably say goodbye."

With that, the powerful woman was already halfway down the hallway.

As Mace stepped into the doorway, he could see that Lyra was almost done crafting her undercover costume. Her outfit was lower cut than normal, hoping to disarm everyone she came across. But it still presented a few opportunities for stowing weapons, which would be a different kind of disarmament altogether. Even if she wasn't wearing more makeup to accentuate her lips and captivating eyes, Mace would be hard-pressed not to stare.

Lyra continued to focus on her clothing as she spoke. "You know, the walls are thin for those of us with superhuman hearing. Rhea has a good point. We don't have any information, and even if I tore the Russian's arms off, we'd probably be right back at square one."

Mace stepped into the room. "I know she's right. I just don't like to see you have to go after 20 werewolves on your own."

Lyra smiled. "You're sweet, but you also know I can handle myself. Besides, I'm starting to rely too much on your technology. It'll be nice to have a solo mission."

Mace walked close enough to Lyra to touch her. "You could still say no. You don't have to do everything Rhea says to do."

"I thought I was supposed to try to be a good team player."

"Not when it puts you in danger of getting killed."

Lyra looked deep into Mace's eyes. "This isn't about the Russian or the shifters or listening to Rhea, is it?"

Mace's heart felt heavy. "I think this boundary you've put up between the two of us is full of crap. There's obviously something more between us, and you going off on a suicide solo mission shouldn't be your way of proving that we can't be together."

Lyra shook her head and let the words stand for a few beats. "This is what I was afraid of. This is exactly what I was trying to avoid."

Mace put his hands on Lyra's shoulders. "I still have your blood running through my system. I can't stop thinking about you."

"So you're saying it's all about a freaky vampire blood attraction thing, right?"

"You know that's not the case. Before you found out who I was, we almost—"

"But then I found out I killed your father, you were a vampire prince, and you're part of a secret organization trying to keep shit from exploding in everybody's face. It's a pretty good reason not to date somebody."

As Mace took a step forward, Lyra stepped back and turned away.

She looked at herself in the mirror, and her eyes met Mace's in the reflection. "Do I look harmless and sexy enough to keep around as a Russian mobster's girlfriend?"

Mace gritted his teeth and did his best not to say what he really thought. "I'd never say you looked harmless, but I think it'll work."

Lyra turned back toward him. "You know I have feelings for you too. But if we start making compromises, they're going to get in the way of the mission. People will die because we wanted to bone."

Mace wished for a moment he'd been given his father's power of compulsion, because he certainly would have been tempted to use it. "Just be careful out there, okay?"

Nikolai arrived in the doorway. "Your boss lady says it's time to go. Are you ready, my fake girlfriend?"

Lyra glanced over her shoulder at him and back toward Mace. "I promise I'll be as careful as I always am."

With a wink, she stepped away from Mace and brushed past the Russian without giving him a second look.

Nikolai let out a small chuckle. "She still pays more attention than last girlfriend."

Mace ignored the tightness in his chest as he bridged the gap between him and the shifter. "I already don't like you, but if anything happens to her, I'll tear out your throat before you have a chance to grow paws."

The Russian didn't seem the least bit fazed. "You talk good game, but who is the one dating the beautiful woman?"

Mace stewed. "You two aren't really dating."

"Not yet, my temporary friend. Not yet."

The Russian turned and followed after Lyra, leaving Mace alone in the room.

He let out a low mumble. "If anybody dies today, it better be him."

Chapter 8

Lyra's arm linked with Nikolai's as they stepped off the elevator and walked toward his family's rented suite. The air smelled fresh, as if the mobsters had paid someone to walk around spritzing the place with floral aromas.

Not a bad way to spend dirty money, I suppose.

Nikolai leaned in toward Lyra's ear. "Just let me do talking, okay?"

Lyra bent her head towards his. "You mean they don't like strong independent women in the Russian mob?"

"Not at all. They prefer quiet ones."

Nikolai and Lyra stepped up toward two hulking bodyguards who blocked the way into the suite. She had absolutely no problem picturing these massive unhumans as terrifying gray wolves.

One of the strong men with a scar on the side of his face put all his attention on Nikolai. "This is family meeting, Cousin. There is no room for prostitutes."

Lyra bit her tongue, but she wanted to give the bodyguard much more than a piece of her mind.

Nikolai kept his head up high. "You underestimate me, Cousin. Lyra here is corrupt former police negotiator. A valuable asset to the mission." The scarred Russian mobster shook his head. "If your father doesn't slit her throat, your brother might."

"Let me deal with my father and brother. Will you let us in?"

The bodyguard hesitantly opened the door into the beautiful rented suite. Lyra gave a light nod. "Thank you, Cousin. And please don't assume that every gorgeous woman is a prostitute. It's not good for women's lib."

Nikolai pulled her forward before the cousin could craft a response.

He forced her arm to link with his once more. "If you are interested in being killed, please continue with back talk. It actually solves one of my problems."

Lyra ignored him as she took in the decadent furniture, artwork, and general amenities that came with the million-dollar rental. For a moment, she even felt like a high-end prostitute. As the eyes of Nikolai's family began to settle on the two of them, she could easily discern the dynamic. Given his father's distasteful look in his direction, she wouldn't be surprised if Nikolai was telling the truth about not being privy to the mission's true objective. By the graying patriarch's side was the angry-looking brother the bodyguard had mentioned. Unlike Nikolai, he seemed to look like a carbon copy of the mob's leader, right down to a wolflike scowl. Several other people in the room, who all bore a resemblance to Nikolai and his father, didn't mince words. Instead, they surrounded Nikolai and Lyra and appeared to get ready for anything.

The unpleasant-looking brother was the first to approach. "Nikolai, don't you know that we stopped making human sacrifice hundreds of years ago?"

Nikolai raised an eyebrow. "She is not sacrifice. She is both girlfriend and asset to the mission."

Nikolai's brother seemed to undress her with his eyes as he looked from top to bottom and back to top, with extra attention paid toward her bosom. "I am not interested in asset so much unless she is woman to be passed around."

Lyra was about to speak, when Nikolai put his hand on the back of her neck. "Father, since Vanya tends to let his temper get the best of him, I thought having negotiator in mix might prevent future issue."

Nikolai's father, Yuri, took an extended moment to stand up behind his wooden desk. Much like the desk, the mob leader seemed meticulous and ancient. But he also appeared to be as solid as an ox. Lyra hoped she wouldn't have to get involved with a creature that massive.

"My son, I hope you understand our skepticism. You know we have reasons for keeping everything in family." He stepped up toward Lyra, and she could smell the confidence emanating from the man in charge. "What is your name? And how do we know we can trust you?"

Lyra took a step forward until she was eye to eye with the mob's leader. "My name is Lyra and shifters, vamps, and other creatures don't scare me in the least." She turned back toward the still-seething Vanya. "But I don't like seeing deals go sour. I know the vampires are already on your tail, and I spent most of my youth killing them." She turned back toward Yuri. "I'm here to make sure your deals run smoothly and quickly so you can do what needs to be done."

Lyra took the temperature of the room. Several of the family members seemed impressed with her ability to stand up and face down their leader. But she seemed to have made very little progress with Nikolai's brother.

Vanya stomped toward her and grabbed for her wrist. She quickly darted her hand out of the way and took control of his wrist instead.

Nikolai's brother snarled. "Get your hand off me, filthy human."

"If there's any unstable element in these negotiations of yours—" she looked back toward Yuri. "I think it might be your son here."

Vanya's teeth began to turn into fangs before her very eyes. She ignored the tightening of her throat.

Yuri appeared bored by the entire encounter. "Vanya, that's more than enough. How about you take a cold shower before we meet the trolls."

Nikolai's brother growled, but his father's words seemed to make an impact. His teeth returned to normal in a matter of seconds, and Lyra let his loosened wrist drop.

Nikolai nodded toward his father and looked into Vanya's eyes. "Thank you, brother."

"If she screws anything up, I break her spine."

Vanya stormed away and toward one of the suite's multiple bathrooms.

Lyra placed her hand on the small of Nikolai's back. "That was fun, wasn't it? When do we go?"

Yuri put his hand up in the air as he moved lumberingly back to his seat. "You don't go anywhere until we run background checks. If all checks out, you've passed my tests."

Yuri smiled at his son. "Besides, Nikolai seems like he's been lonely lately. Who am I to stand in the way of love?"

Nikolai played his part well, smiling and taking Lyra's hand. "Thank you, father. I appreciate it."

Yuri nodded before addressing the room as a whole. "Get her info now, we leave in one hour."

Nikolai and Lyra sat on the corner of a bed that was bigger than any sleeping surface she's ever seen. She supposed crime really did pay.

Nikolai shook his head. "I am very surprised you are not dead." Lyra smiled. "I would say I've done a pretty good job of staying alive so far."

"If I know my brother, he will try everything he can to make sure your streak of living ends."

Lyra nodded. "I appreciate you looking out for me. He seems fun to be around." She looked toward the door and then back to him. "So, we get to play with trolls today, huh?"

"We saved the best for last. Well, second to last. Even I'm not sure where last artifact is."

"Good to know. Is there anything else I should look out for when I'm out with your family? Do they do that pull your finger joke in Russia?"

Nikolai smiled. "You never stop, do you?"

"Why stop now?"

Nikolai took a deep breath. "I will tell you one thing. Be careful what you say and do around the trolls. Because if they don't kill you, my brother still might."

Lyra grinned. "How is that any way to greet his fake future sister-in-law?" She cracked her knuckles. "Don't worry, I'm ready for anything."

Chapter 9

Mace sat alone with his thoughts in an unmarked van about 10 car lengths behind the Russian mobsters. With Doug on a research mission to determine the true meaning behind the artifacts the shifters were after, the former vampire prince was on a solo mission to keep tabs on a girl he couldn't stop thinking about. While they were in motion, the feed certainly wasn't perfect, but it was enough to make Mace's skin crawl.

"Nikolai, you really should wear more shirts like this." Mace could hear Lyra's fingers touch the material of the Russian's clothing. "They really accentuate your figure."

The vampire held his tongue. While he knew Lyra could hear him through Doug's much-less-conspicuous comm device, he understood that the covert operative would probably lay the compliments on even thicker if he voiced his displeasure.

It's like living in a nightmare. A werewolf mobster nightmare.

Mace kept tabs on the three vehicles far ahead of him as they progressed toward the unknown destination. He thought back to what Rhea had said about the history and bad blood between shifters and vampires. It wasn't as if there was some kind of known war between the factions that kept them angry at one another. The movies certainly hadn't stumbled upon any great truths about the rivalry.

As long as Mace could remember, his kind had hated the creatures with a fiery passion. He even remembered his late father's colorful language about the unhumans. He wondered how much of that hatred he'd adopted himself without even thinking of it.

The signal on Lyra's comm cleared up a bit as the lead car turned and slowed in a rundown parking lot. Mace listened intently while he watched the other vehicles turn in stride.

"We need to approach this very carefully." Nikolai's father spoke slowly, as if his words held wisdom that could keep the other shifters alive. "These trolls are very untrusting, and they're the only unhumans I know with a worse temper than Vanya."

A trickle of laughter worked its way through the vehicle as Mace drove past the parking lot and pulled over a block and a half past the building to stay in range.

"One of the reasons I agreed to take Pretty Face along was because trolls have soft spots for the women."

Mace could hear Lyra's smile even through the microphone. "A soft spot as in they like me? Or a soft spot like an evening meal between dinner and dessert?"

More laughter peppered the vehicle as Mace heard the door open to the outside world.

Vanya gave a grunt of disgust. "Enough with comedy hour. Let's do deal before trolls change their mind."

The other mobsters seemed to agree with their comrade as they began shuffling out of the vehicle.

Mace wondered how Lyra was playing her relationship with Nikolai. Was she holding his hand? Or was she draped over him?

Keep it together, Mace. She's doing this to stop the shifters, not to screw one.

As he listened closely, he could hear the mobsters enter a building, with the sound shifting from the outside hum of the city to the indoor buzz of fluorescent lighting. Since Doug's camera, which was expertly placed inside Lyra's top shirt button, tended to mess around with car radios, Mace waited until now to flip it on. He waited as his eyes adjusted to the low light on the inside of the troll's domain. The camera pointed straight ahead, the image projecting the upper torso of a slimy, bluish, gargantuan creature before her.

He watched as Lyra bowed alongside the shifters in a show of respect to the creature. When the troll bowed in return, he could see the grotesque top of his shiny head.

"Note to self: Create line of wigs for trolls."

As the creature finished his long, slow gesture, he waved them forward.

He'd become accustomed to a snarky word or two from the former hunter, but her relative silence seemed to indicate that Lyra was playing things cool in an unknown environment surrounded by killers.

When the mobsters reached a large chamber, Mace saw Nikolai's father step forward to greet a creature who appeared to be the head troll. Somehow, he was even bigger than the one who'd stuck by the front door.

"We appreciate this audience, Your Excellence." Nikolai's father had the grace of one ruler paying homage to another. "Were you able to discover artifact among your many treasures?"

The head troll's grunt was halfway between a roar and a belch. "We found treasure. It will cost you dearly, Shifter."

Nikolai's father waved his hand as two of his cohorts brought forth a chest that was likely filled with jewels, gold, and whatever other ill-begotten treasures the shifters had come upon.

Mace shook his head. "Getting those back to their rightful owners may be a project for later."

Upon seeing the contents of the chest, the troll nodded and began the exchange. The artifact another troll presented appeared to be half crumbling with age. Though amidst the dim light, it glowed with magical energy that Mace could feel even nearly two blocks away. It was adorned with the head of a wolf.

Lyra couldn't seem to help herself. "A little on the nose, wouldn't you say?"

Her whisper seemed to catch Nikolai's attention. "I am pretty sure it's not meant for a fireplace mantle or decoration."

"I think your brother could pull it off."

Almost as if on cue, Vanya shushed his brother and Lyra and stepped forward. "Let's get on with this already. I have no patience for pageantry."

The camera turned toward Nikolai's father, who appeared to be just as offended as the troll leader.

"You think we part with wolf we've had for centuries in one minute's time?" The trolls grumble grew in volume. "You not appreciate our sacrifice?"

Vanya let out a sound of disgust. "Sacrifice? Did you see just how much we've parted with for this trifle?"

"Enough, Vanya! Go back to the car."

The head troll certainly didn't seem appreciative of Vanya's back talk when he let out a scream that seemed more fitting for the battlefield than the negotiation table. "You'd rather fight for treasure? We can arrange this."

The hair stood up on the back of Mace's neck as he watched Lyra's camera shuffle in the hubbub that ensued. The trolls seemed ready to strike, and Nikolai's father and most of the shifters tried to take the submissive role.

"My son is wrong in head." Nikolai's father put up his hands. "He is only one who wants fight."

"I have been insulted! And someone will pay for his insolence."

Mace watched in horror as Lyra walked right up to the head troll.

Mace gritted his teeth. "Lyra, get out of there."

"You want someone to pay?" The former hunter stood straight up as she spoke. "Consider me the banker."

Chapter 10

Lyra was so close to the head troll she could see movement beneath the outer translucent layer of the unhuman's skin. It was unsettling to say the least.

The creature seemed just as surprised as Nikolai was when she'd stepped forward into the accelerating tension of the room. She expected the surprise, though she didn't anticipate the smell from being that close to the hydrophobic creature.

"This is graver insult." The troll's teeth were black with decay in his mouth. "You send woman as sacrifice?"

Lyra wondered if Mace was pissing himself in the nearby van. "Nobody sent me for anything, Your Eminence. I'm here because I want to see this deal get done without anybody losing their head."

The troll let out what Lyra could only imagine was his version of a hideous laugh. "Lose head? Trolls bludgeon to death and use head as decoration!"

The other trolls by his side cheered, as if this was some kind of rah-rah mantra amongst their community.

Lyra considered the unhuman's weak points. In most cases, she'd be able to use her speed to get such a lumbering monster into a bad situation. But she was on troll turf, which meant that there would be few corners to turn where she could find an advantage. Going hand to hand with the unhuman would most likely turn her head into a troll sculpture. Using her mind was likely the only path to survival this time around.

She ran her hand through her hair. "I heard that trolls have a thing for human women. Do you find me pretty?"

"Do not have sex with that troll!" Mace's voice buzzed in her ear. "You have no idea where he's been."

Lyra made a mental note to stab the vampire the next time she saw him.

The troll examined her like she was a science experiment. "Yes. Is this an offer?"

Lyra shook her head. "Unfortunately, I'm already spoken for. But, I looked inside that chest that these fine gentlemen were willing to provide. You could certainly buy a lot of female companionship for all of those jewels."

The king troll nodded along with his subordinates. "You speak much truth. Are you sure you have no interest in being our first ..."

Lyra stepped away from the troll and lifted the lid of the chest. She picked up a weighty jewel and tossed it toward the king. He easily caught it in his massive slimy hand.

"It's your choice. Either you get shifter blood all over your hideaway, which is notoriously difficult to clean."

The trolls grunted their assent.

"Or, you give them the artifact, which you weren't doing anything interesting with anyway. And you trade these jewels to get a woman's touch around the place. And around whatever place you want a woman's touch."

The troll seemed to be coming around. "I like her plan." He turned toward Nikolai's father. "You send another chest of jewels after this one. Will bring twice as much women."

Yuri smiled. "Of course, Your Eminence. This is worthy cause."

The troll's tone turned joyous as he extended his arm and wrapped it around the head shifter's shoulder. "No fight. Today is celebration!"

The other trolls joined in a slimy fist-pumping hoorah. The other shifters looked toward her as they dragged the chest forward. One of the head troll's subordinates passed the weighty artifact to her. She didn't hesitate to take the gaudy wolf sculpture and covertly place one of Doug's analysis chips in an undetectable crevice.

She proudly presented the artifact to Yuri. "I believe this belongs to you."

Yuri nodded his approval. "It would not have happened without you. Nikolai all of sudden has good eye for women."

Lyra smiled over at her fake boyfriend, and he seemed to grin his thanks back.

On the entire way back to the mobster's suite, she put up with frustrated comments from the vampire on the other side of her comm.

"You could've been killed. Do you know how much force is behind a troll punch? He could've caved your entire body in."

While she wanted to shut off the incessant chatter, it was kind of comforting to hear Mace's voice after she'd put herself in such a dangerous situation.

When they reached the hotel, Lyra held back for a minute in the vehicle to say a few choice words to her own comrade. But when she did, she realized far too late that Vanya had waited for her as well.

Lyra raised an eyebrow. "Did you want to thank me in person? You know, for keeping you and your whole family from getting killed?"

Vanya growled. "I don't trust you. There is something you're hiding."

She smiled as she leaned back against the car. "My love for your brother? A desire to stay alive?"

The Russian stepped toward her, his breath blew against her face from point-blank range. "The second I find out what it is, I will destroy you. It may break brother's heart, but eating yours will make it worth it."

He finished with an in-her-face snarl before turning away and stomping through the hotel's lobby.

Lyra enjoyed being threatened about as much as the next person, but most threats didn't come under surveillance.

Mace huffed on the other end of the comm. "If you don't slit that guy's throat, I'd be happy to do it for you."

She sighed. "I'm way ahead of you." She thought of the long knife concealed in her outfit. "Way ahead of you."

Chapter 11

Doug felt as if he were conducting a symphony as his fingers moved across the keyboard to place the final lines of code in his algorithm. Rhea taught him where magic and mechanics intersected to allow him to track nearly every type of mystical energy they could think of. His tech wizardry and her actual wizardry allowed them to locate the bombs Lyra's former handler had placed around the city just a few months earlier. And now, as he finished off his own fugue state, Doug put the code on a program that would track the artifacts the Russian mobsters were after as well. As soon as the last code was put in place, Doug allowed the program to start compiling to do its work.

He leaned back in his chair and smiled. "Another masterpiece, Dougie Boy." He scrunched up his face. "Great, now Lyra has me saying it too."

He snatched a Sharpie marker from his desk and pulled out a list of shifter questions he'd tried to ask Nikolai before the Russian had left. He crossed out several, though he hadn't been able to find a right way to ask what happens to shifters in wolf form when they need to go to the bathroom.

"Next time. I'm sure there will be a next time."

He glanced over at his much longer list of questions for Lyra. While he'd never told Mace or Rhea, he'd put together the list long ago as part of a file he was collecting on the history of hunters. It had been deep in a forgotten corner of the internet that Doug first discovered the lore of the hunters. Whenever he'd told his parents or friends about their supposed history, he was met with nothing but blank stares and admonitions to stop spreading weird rumors online. But Doug refused to drop his obsession, and as he gained more knowledge on coding and robotics, he likewise pulled together facts from unlikely sources to complete his unabridged history of hunter mythology. Lyra had only been somewhat helpful in filling in the gaps, mostly chatting with him to remind him of a time he dropped a sandwich when she pulled a gun on him. But his efforts over the last decade had gotten him far more information than any one person had ever compiled on the women meant to beat back the vampire scourge.

Doug's monitor beeped to signify its first sweep of the city. As Nikolai had said, the Russians were in possession of most of the artifacts they needed to collect to do whatever it was they intended with the ancient sculptures. He could see six hits in the hotel the Russians were camping out in in the South Loop of the city.

He let out a low whistle. "I wonder how many chest of jewels you guys had to give up to gather those."

As he examined the results further, he saw another blip in what seemed to be an abandoned warehouse district. A few Google searches of the area showed nothing of interest in the far northwest corner of the city.

The computer programmer grumbled to himself. "It's always in some kind of abandoned something. Of course, it's never really abandoned, is it?"

Doug saw a strange phenomenon when the computer ran it's second search. He blinked a few times and rubbed his eyes just to make sure he was seeing things right. There were three more dots that appeared on the screen. Only they weren't showing up in some abandoned corner of town. The three additional artifacts he picked up seemed to be coming from the Hancock Tower itself, but more likely was that they were within 100 feet of where he currently sat.

"What in the heck?"

Doug tried to move on to other projects, but over the course of the next hour, his curiosity got the best of him. He took an old handheld tracking device and found a way to program it with the algorithm he just developed. It took some time to get it right, but in this job, there wasn't exactly a boss breathing down his neck. The device began working right away, and a faint beep turned louder as he seemed to get closer to the nearby artifact.

He smiled to himself. "Just follow your nose."

The tracker beeped louder as he entered a walk-in closet he'd never stepped foot in before. The tracker seemed to beep louder and louder as he reached the corner of the dark and dusty room. He flipped off the device as soon as he saw what it was tracking. The design was almost exactly the same as the images Mace had sent over, minus the wolf on the top. Whoever had made the artifacts the mobsters had traded so much for had seemingly made this one as well. And the computer program had accidentally found three of them in their very hideout.

Doug picked up the object in his hands, and even though he had no mystical powers himself, he could feel the buzzing energy emanating from the object.

"I wasn't supposed to find this." He started to breath a little heavier. "And I'm guessing there's only one person who would have hidden this here." He looked from left to right and placed the object back in its corner. "What do you do when the supernatural woman who signs the checks is keeping a major secret from everyone?"

Chapter 12

Lyra tiptoed around Nikolai's condo. While most of his Russian brethren stayed in the massive suite in the South Loop, he'd made sure to give himself a second lodging. Lyra ignored the possibility that this house was somehow connected to their blind date just a few days ago. She looked through the mostly bare shelves and bookcases. Mostly everything was covered in Russian scrawl, which she only had a passing familiarity with.

Mace's voice intruded on her snooping. "You see anything interesting in there?"

Lyra shook her head. "I know vampires don't need sleep, but it seems like you spent an awful lot of time spying on me."

"You're on a covert mission; I'm on surveillance duty. If I spend more time spying on you, I'd say I'm doing my job."

She picked up a weighty book and opened the pages. She was surprised to find photos of Nikolai from when he was a child. "I never really thought mobsters were the sentimental type." She placed the book under her arm and continued to look around. "I don't think you need to worry too much about me, Mace. There aren't anymore trolls for me to confront. Did you really think I would try to have sex with a troll?"

Mace seemed embarrassed over the comm. "Of course not. I was just startled is all."

Lyra threw the book down on the bed and began flipping through it. She suppressed a chuckle when she saw Nicolai as a teenager with braces from ear to ear. "I can handle myself. Besides, nobody died and nobody slept with a troll. I'd say it's a successful day."

"I don't think you're going to find anything in that photo book."

Lyra let out a sigh. "How about you take a break for a bit, because having you narrate my every move is driving me crazy. Why don't we just go and find out where the trolls got that artifact from in the first place?"

She could hear Mace suck on his teeth through the other line. "No can do, Lyra. I need to be there when the Russians turn on you."

"Is this really all about the Twilight thing? That you guys hate wolf shifters for some reason?"

"I'm neither Team Jacob nor Team Edward. Vampires don't sparkle."

Nikolai cleared his throat as he entered the room. "Am I interrupting something? I could pretend to walk around the condo a few more times, but I'm starting to get sleepy."

Lyra waved him forward as she moved to turn off her comm. "We're going dark here, Mace. Good night."

"Wait, Lyra, don't!"

As she flipped off the devices, she held up the photo book to display her findings. "You looked pretty good in a fake tie. I'm not sure if the girl you were dancing with felt the same way though."

Nicolai laughed. She had to admit, he looked pretty good in his silk pajamas.

"I believe you've found what they call the motherload. These pictures could blackmail me quite well."

Lyra looked intently at the photo until she seemed to discover something. There was a little bit of fur on the back of his dance partners neck. "This was a shifter dance, wasn't it?"

Nicolai joined her on the bed and nodded. "Both my family and... condition... make it difficult to find people who understand me."

She laughed. "It's a shame that people like me are only one in a generation. It's like going to Catholic school: one person at a time and narrow prospects." She raised her eyebrows toward the Russian. "Have you dated some shifters?"

Nicolai leaned closer on the bedspread. She could smell his tasty cologne at that distance.

"Are you asking about my history of romance? This seems like territory for second date, no?"

"Call it what you will, Nikolai."

He smiled. "I dated werepanther once. And I have scars to prove it."

She chuckled and rolled away from him on the bed. "That's what I would call too much information." She stood up on the ground and stretched. "I guess I should be getting over to the couch."

Nicolai got up on his knees and put his hands up in the air. "No, no, of course not. I will take couch, you take much more comfortable bed."

She looked at Nikolai in the bed and over into the other room. She nodded to herself.

This is probably a bad idea, but let's see what happens.

She smiled. "You know what, after leaving your family, I could see them storming into the condo. How about we share the bed just to keep up the ruse."

His forehead wrinkled. "And vampire boyfriend won't be mad at this?"

"I don't have a vampire boyfriend. Just a jealous vampire coworker. Scoot over. And expect me to steal the covers."

Nicolai shrugged and moved the photo book to the nightstand as he pulled himself beneath the covers.

Lyra did the same, noticing just then that the entire bedspread smelled of his cologne mixed with something else. She supposed it was the smell of man mixed with beast. She sort of liked it.

Nicolai turned to her, his eyes driving deep into hers. "The more you learn about this mission, the more dangerous it is for you. I could figure out cover if you decided to leave."

She smirked. "Are you getting worried about me, Nikolai?"

"I can't help being sensitive. I develop fondness for people I share bed with."

"I appreciate your concern. But I need to follow this all the way through." She thought back to the troll and holding the artifact in her hands. "The power in that thing was epic. If your dad is planning something with a half dozen of them, I have no idea the implications. But it's not going to be pretty."

Nikolai nodded. "I wish I could be more helpful. My father trust no one with his plans."

She attempted to detect any dishonesty in the shifter's eyes. Unfortunately, he seemed to be telling the truth. "I understand. We better rest up. I have no idea if I'm going to be facing down any trolls or brothers tomorrow."

"Vanya is all talk. Well, talk and knives. But I feel like you can handle it more than most."

"Good night, Nikolai." She smiled softly. "May your dreams be filled with beautiful troll women."

Nikolai shuttered. "Ugh. I hope yours are too."

And as the shifter closed his eyes, Lyra let herself stare at his face for a bit. It would be so easy to wrap her arms and legs around him. She wondered what kind of vigor the unhuman would have in the bedroom.

Let's keep things about the mission. I'm not about to have Mace call me a hypocrite.

She heard the even breaths of sleeping across from her, and she closed her eyes to attempt to do the same.

Chapter 13

Mace hadn't realized just how frustrated he was by Lyra's radio silence until he felt his vampire fangs descend in his mouth. That and the fact that he was halfway between the surveillance van and Nikolai's front door when he felt the sharp teeth coming out his gums. He took a few long deep breaths before retreating back to the van and his solitude. He tried his hardest to ignore any thoughts of Lyra and Nikolai and whatever it was going on in his rented condo.

This is no time to have an imagination.

Instead, he took his friend's advice and flipped through the contents of an email Doug had sent him several hours prior. It turned out the device Lyra had slipped into the artifact had found out a fair bit of information. The sculpture had been crafted from a material that used to be referred to as blessed rock. It was a magical substance, and that made it very, very dangerous. As Mace tried to keep awake through the more boring specifications Doug's device had returned, he remembered something in an ancient text about this supposedly blessed rock and a prophecy. Fortunately, Doug had uploaded so many of these magical books in their database, it only took a few keyword searches to pull up exactly what he wanted.

"Technology is pretty amazing. Until it gets you killed."

The passage he sought after talked of unhuman guardians protecting humanity from enduring the same weaknesses as their magical counterparts. Mace's Latin was a little rusty, but there was something in the text about these artifacts making humans like everybody else. As he looked over at his now-useless headphones, he realized he was in no mood for riddles.

He rubbed his hands together absentmindedly. "She could be slitting his throat. He could be slitting her throat in there and I wouldn't know. It's like she's trying to get herself killed."

He shut out an image of the shifter on top of her in the bedroom for the hundredth time when his cell buzzed in his pocket.

"Heidi, tell me you're sending over some vodka."

He could hear her smile on the other end of the line. "You're having that much fun, huh? I found something interesting, unless you want to keep on surveillance duty for the rest of the night."

He shook his head. "I'll be there in 20."

Mace felt like James Bond as he descended the secret elevator from the alleyway down to their hideout. While he knew he traveled that path a thousand times over, there was still something very secret-agent-like about the whole endeavor. For some reason, he wondered what his dead, murderous father would think about the whole thing.

He was met with a sly smile as he entered the morgue.

"You get too tired of listening to Lyra and the Russian having sex?"

Mace grunted. "If you called me here just to make fun of me, I could just go drink in a corner alone."

"Now, now. I have something much better than making fun of you and your crush."

"I do not have a crush."

She smirked. "Fine, whatever you vampires call it when you're obsessed with someone after you drink their blood." She waved him over to a covered body. "Here, check this out."

Mace walked to her side as Heidi removed the cover from the vampire he'd beheaded a few days prior.

Mace marveled at the thick neck he'd been able to cut through with the manhole cover. "That's disgusting. Did you just want to show me my handiwork?" He let his eyes trail down over a tattooed back and the bare rear end of the motionless unhuman. "Or did you and Doug have a bet about showing me a bare butt?"

She bit her bottom lip. "It's not about his ass. Does anything seem familiar about those tattoos on his back?"

He focused his attention on the inked design. Mace looked back up at Heidi. "No, they're not from any clan that I recognize."

She raised her eyebrows. "I didn't recognize either, so I brought them into one of Doug's insanely nerdy computer programs."

She tapped on the nearby keyboard, bringing up the image of the tattoo on a large monitor. He watched intently as she hit a few keystrokes, and a small part of the image flew away. Something bit at the corner of Mace's mind that made him lean forward. When Heidi hit the same keystrokes again, even more of the image came into focus. He could barely believe his eyes. After one more set of clicks, the tattoo was clear as day. It was the same exact markings he bore on his own back.

He put one hand to the side of his head. "But that's impossible. After my father died, no one picked up the slack, and the Tuscan clan disbanded."

Heidi nodded. "At least, that's what they wanted you to believe."

"But why are they trying to stop the wolves from getting the artifact?" Mace stared at the image on the screen. "And with my father dead, who the hell is running the gang?"

Chapter 14

Nikolai blinked in the darkness. It was some kind of combination of his father's mission and having a beautiful woman by his side that kept sleep at bay. If it hadn't been for her, they might have all been bludgeoned to death by trolls. But a random blind date connected him with the one person who might actually be able to make his father's dream come true.

But are all my dreams his? Is there anything I want more?

As his body turned back to Lyra's, he saw her eyes on him.

"I can tell you honestly. You're tossing and turning and keeping me up."

He gave a sheepish look. "I am too nervous that I will pass gas before you."

She let out a girlish giggle, which may have been the most feminine thing he'd ever seen her do. "If we aren't going to sleep, can we at least eat?"

"I know just the place."

Nikolai and Lyra settled in at the table of an all-night diner, and the former hunter dove into a basket of fries.

Her mouth worked on the salty potatoes as she spoke. "I was like you once."

"Russian and manly?"

"When I was in full-on hunter mode, I never questioned what Piers had to say. If he told me to break in somewhere and steal something, I did it without question. If he told me to assassinate some kind of murderous vampire, I didn't look him up." She licked the salt from her fingers. "I just did the deed."

Nikolai nodded. "What made you stop listening? Why did you stop doing everything he asked?"

Her head bobbed from side to side. "It was a combination of him skipping town... and how he kind of went crazy and tried to kill all the unhumans in Chicago."

Nikolai felt the bubbles from his soda almost go up his nose while he snorted. "That would probably do it for me too."

Lyra grabbed Nikolai's soda and took a sip.

"Hey, you have your own for reason."

"I wanted to try yours too." She placed it back on his side of the table. "Mine's better. Anyway, what I'm saying is you don't have to listen to your father. You know that whatever he's doing is bad news and it could get a lot of people killed."

"Possibly. Possibly." He took a fry of his own from the bowl before him. "My family has asked me to do things of which I am not proud. But there is difference in our situation."

She lifted her chin. "Does this have something to do with you being part wolf? Definitely not part wolf."

He shook his head. "There is difference between leaving trainer and leaving family."

Her eyes seemed to catch his drift. "All I'm saying is you have incredible powers that you could use for good too." She dipped another handful of fries in ketchup. "It might do you some good to spend less time with your homicidal brother. Your father might understand." She devoured the fries between her fingers. "Though it could be worth fleeing the country if he doesn't."

It wasn't as though Nikolai had never considered leaving the gang. He doubted working for another person's goals was helping him to live up to his full potential. Then again, family is family.

"I appreciate your input. More thought would be needed before I could decide."

He reached toward the bowl in the center of the table, only to come up empty. "If we were actually dating, my father would be very impressed with your appetite."

"If this is going to turn into some kind of fat joke, I'd advise you not to continue."

Nikolai grinned. "Of course not, you have perfect body. Obviously, fries do no damage to you."

Her eyes examined his face before they locked with his. "You aren't so damaged yourself, Nikolai."

When they got back to the condo, Nikolai had a strong desire to hold Lyra's hand. He wasn't sure what she'd do, but something deep down wished that whatever this fake relationship was between them could be genuine.

He placed his hand on her shoulder. "If this was actual third date, I would say I had nice time."

She looked at his hand but did nothing to remove it. "I probably would too."

"They have spirits for nightcap if you are interested."

Lyra looked away from the building at a tiny bit of sunlight that came in at the bottom of the horizon. "It's almost morning. I think I'm going to go for a quick run to work off some of those fries."

He gave a slight bow. "Suit yourself. I may drink for two."

"Thanks for the midnight snack, Nikolai. And the chat. Think about what I said."

He nodded as he watched her turn away and start to jog down the steps. He did his best to be a gentleman and not watch her backside as she ran down the street. He took a deep breath and wondered if Lyra would survive when the horrors of the artifacts were released.

Chapter 15

Doug stumbled through the darkness of an unused portion of the hideout. The only light source came from the tracking device, which he'd rigged to light up instead of making sound. His stomach hadn't felt right since he'd found the hidden artifact in the closet.

"Maybe it's just all a misunderstanding. This tracker could be broken and all it's detecting is something a builder left here in the early 20th century."

While he hoped his technology was on the fritz, it certainly seemed to be working well enough to light up brighter and brighter as he stepped forward. When the device reached peak brightness, he moved it from left to right and discovered the second artifact in the room's corner. It looked exactly like the first one, and Doug's nervousness grew as he held it in his hand.

"I think she's even told me not to go in here. Said that it was dangerous. But is the room dangerous, or just what I'd find here?"

Doug thought back to the first time he met Rhea. He'd graduated from high school two years early, which made him an outcast in the top-notch university he attended. It didn't help his social status much that his parents moved nearby to be a sort of base of operations for him. It made it twice as challenging to keep his secret obsession hidden. He knew that nonhuman creatures existed, well before the day the vampires went public. But every time he shared that information with his few friends or his family members, they threatened to put him on medication. He was in the school library late one night, researching the prophecy about a dragon being born from the earth, when an old woman he didn't recognize tapped him on the shoulder.

"This research you're doing is pointless."

Doug's eyes widened as he turned toward the woman. "Excuse me?"

She had a wise smile about her. "I said that the research you're doing is pointless."

Doug minimized his internet browser window and turned toward the woman. "Did my parents send you or something? They've always told me my research is pointless too."

"It's not pointless because the prophecy is wrong. It's pointless because your math is off."

He laughed. "My math is never wrong."

She leaned over and pulled the keyboard and mouse toward her and opened a browser of her own. A site about ancient calendars loaded on the screen. "You assumed that the unhumans who created this document always used the same calendar to track their dates. Only, 1,100 years ago, they switched from a lunar to a solar calendar. So, in conclusion, your math is wrong."

Doug's mouth hung open. "Unhumans? Who are you exactly?"

"Come back here every Monday at 2 a.m. for the next few weeks. I'll tell you more about who I am and who I think you could be."

With that, the first conversation he and Rhea had ever had came to a close.

His curiosity got the best of him, and he returned every Monday at 2 a.m. for the next three years of college. While his grades never suffered, he was a genius after all, his career prospects weren't terribly enticing at the end of his four years. Working with Rhea for a secret organization was the only calling that made sense.

Doug looked down at his tracking device as it picked up the signal for the third and final hidden artifact. He was so focused on his path forward that he nearly ran straight into Heidi in the hallway.

She laughed. "Jesus, Doug. You're in the zone. The sandwich zone."

Doug tried and failed to compose himself. "Hello, Heidi. Good to see you here right now."

She cocked her head at an angle. "You're hiding something. You're hiding something, and you appear to be terrible at hiding something."

"What ever do you mean, my co-working friend?"

She shook her head. "Fine, I won't ask any questions about it. But in the future, I'm happy to give you some lessons on effective lying. My parents still have no idea what I do for a living."

He looked back down at his tracker and then at Heidi and then back at the tracker again. "That sounds fantastic. Great meeting, running into, I mean, seeing—"

"I'll see you later, Doug."

Heidi took a wide berth around him and continued in her original direction.

Doug hadn't realized he was holding his breath. "Good. She doesn't suspect a thing."

As he kept moving down the corridor, the tracking device grew brighter and brighter until it led him down another unused hallway and into a room he'd never seen before. When he closed the door behind him, he could sense more than the artifact inside.

He pursed his lips and turned the tracker off. "Hi, Rhea."

The lights of the room came up with a purple hue as the woman who set him on this path came into view.

She had a neutral look on her face. "Doug. You didn't really think I would ignore this little quest of yours, did you?"

His throat felt tight. "I don't know. I didn't really think about it. I just wanted to know for sure that we had the same kind of artifacts as the ones the Russians are looking for."

She nodded. "And do you trust I have a good reason for keeping them here? Do you trust I have my own reasons for keeping them secret?"

He blinked. "I assume so, but I also imagine that if you have artifacts just like them, then you know what it is the Russians are planning to do. And if you know that without telling all of us, then you seem to be keeping secrets from us for no reason. Is there a reason?"

Rhea's pained look spoke volumes as she stepped toward him. He instinctively took a step back.

"Do you trust me, Doug?"

"I haven't had any reason not to. But, I assume you'll tell us now what the Russians are doing. Right?"

She shook her head and continued to walk forward. His back hit the closed door behind him.

"The mechanics of the world are strange sometimes. I can't always intervene, and sometimes we just have to let bad things happen."

"I don't understand that. That runs counter to what we're doing here."

Rhea came closer until she was within an inch of Doug's face. "Do you trust me enough not to tell the others about this?"

Doug's hands were sweaty by his side. "I'm not sure. I'm a scientific kind of guy, and the evidence feels like it needs to be shared with others."

She let out a faint sigh. "I do understand. I knew you when I hired you."

Her hands began to glow a deeper shade of purple. "But unfortunately, that means I'll just have to make you forget the evidence."

As Rhea moved her hands upward, Doug could feel the room closing in on him. He let the tracker slip from his grasp and land on the ground with a crack as the darkness took over his world.

Chapter 16

Lyra and Nikolai arrived back at the hotel early that day. He'd been mostly quiet in the car ride, and she'd followed suit. While it was a little ridiculous, the fake dates she'd had with the Russian shifter may have been some of the most enjoyable ones of her life. Even if they were a part of a covert mission. At one point during the ride, she thought he was looking at her, but the moment she tried to meet his eyes, his darted away.

As Nikolai started for the lobby, Lyra caught his hand. "Nikolai, wait."

He turned back toward her, but kept his eyes focused on the ground. "My father is expecting us."

"Look, after we figure out what exactly these artifacts do, you don't have to keep going with this mission."

Nikolai's eyes slowly moved up towards hers. "It's a nice fantasy, but what would I even do?"

She smiled as she took his other hand in hers as well. "You could work with the team. Having a shifter on board would be a huge asset to us helping humans and unhumans throughout the city."

He gave a short laugh. "I don't think vampire boyfriend would be very happy at this."

"You know he's not my boyfriend. And maybe we can find a way to be both Team Jacob and Edward."

"This Twilight metaphor has really run course, no?"

She looked deep into his eyes. "Tell me that this is what you really want. Tell me that you want to go along with whatever your dad says and I will drop it. I'll find out what the artifacts are for, and if it's a really nefarious purpose, me and my team are going to stop it. Tell me this is what you want to do with the rest of your life."

His heart beat faster in his chest. "What you say is tempting. I know life could be more than this, but I just can't give up on family."

Her heart sank as she let his hands fall away from hers. "I understand." She walked ahead of Nikolai. "Well, we better not keep your father waiting."

When they reached the suite, Lyra could feel the tension bubbling out from the room. Several of the shifters seemed ill at ease, and Vanya appeared to be pacing more than normal. He didn't even look up at her to scowl, which worried Lyra more than anything else.

Yuri nodded at his son when they entered. "You are late. I share news of last artifact with everyone before you."

Nikolai gave a sharp nod. "My apologies. Tell me what we missed."

A creepy smile spread across Vanya's face. "What you miss? There is one artifact remaining. We are this close to success."

When Nikolai's brother resumed his pacing, Lyra couldn't bear the mystery any longer. "You all don't seem very excited about it. Where's the last artifact?"

Yuri glanced at her briefly before focusing on his son. "I have dangerous mission for you. The artifact lies with our greatest enemy. The Tuscan clan of vampires."

Lyra hoped against hope that the surprise she felt didn't show up on her face. As far as she'd known, from the moment she'd killed Mace's father, the leader of the Tuscan clan worldwide, the group had disbanded and scattered throughout the world. Even Piers seemed to think that the group was gone for good. She should have known that wishful thinking never paid off.

Nikolai licked his lips. "I have feeling vampires aren't interested in our gold and jewels."

Yuri nodded. "That is correct assumption, my son. You, your brother, and your lovely girlfriend will lead strike team into the heart of Tuscan stronghold."

Lyra tried to slow her accelerating breath. "They're here in Chicago?"

Does Mace know about this?

Vanya's nervous grin spread wider. "We're the ones who are going to pull this off. And then the mission will finally be complete."

On the word complete, Vanya's gaze rested upon her. She had a feeling that if Nikolai's brother had anything to say about their forthcoming mission, her death would be its final punctuation mark.

Chapter 17

Early that morning, Mace traded off shifts with an even chattier-than-normal Doug. The computer nerd had a glazed over look that didn't put the vampire at ease.

He gave Doug a sideways glance. "Are you sure you got enough sleep to keep an eye on her?"

Doug nodded about ten times in response. "Of course. You saw yesterday that she could handle herself anyway. I'm sure they'll just be planning out their final mission today."

"But if anything happens, you'll definitely call me right away?"

Doug's smile was wide and creepy. "You'll be the first to know, Mace. Besides, this van was starting to smell too vampiric. We need to bring a little humanity back to it, you know what I mean?"

"No. I don't know what you mean." He took his first step out of the van. "Just call me if anything strange happens."

Once again, Doug nodded way too many times for Mace to feel comfortable.

It didn't take long for the vampire to take a cab over to the former stronghold of the Tuscan clan. The taxi driver even asked him twice if he was sure he was going to the right address. Mace stepped out into the street of an abandoned lot that seemed more likely to attract squatters than unhumans. The building that had once been a powerful fortress hidden in plain sight now appeared to be crumbling along with the rest of the neglected corner. If the city of Chicago had any interest in the rundown neighborhood, the building might have been torn down years ago. It remained a relic, like the kind of building you might find underground in an archeological dig. He tapped on a rusted metal door, and the hinges creaked as it opened up the abandoned stronghold. Mace pulled out a flashlight and began pointing it left and right. While he spied a few symbols of the old Tuscan clan, everything else had been stripped bare from the walls and floors.

It felt like so long ago, but Mace could remember his father showing him everything that he would someday inherit. It made complete sense to the Tuscan king that his son would be interested taking over everything in the duplicitous clan, from its vast holdings of wealth, to its frequent criminal endeavors. The Tuscans had lasted for centuries in this way. But Lyra's timely assassination of his father plus the public outing of vampires seemed to erase all of that from history. At least, it had for Mace until he saw the altered tattoo on Heidi's computer. Mace touched the wall and wondered what had truly become of his "birthright." It was just then that he heard a sound coming from the front door.

Almost instinctively, Mace sprinted up the wall with incredible agility and braced himself between the wall and the ceiling. This gave him the perfect bird's-eye view to the source of the sound. Two men, who he assumed were vampires of course, entered the room with a purpose. One of them placed his hand on a certain part of the wall, and much to the former prince's amazement, a new doorway opened up on the other side of the room.

"These shifters are driving me crazy. Why doesn't she just have us go over there and slit their throats?"

The other vamp beside him nodded in assent. "I wish we could. Seems like they have a little bit of help."

"The hunter? She's out of practice."

The conversation continued as the two vampires walked through the doorway, which quickly shut behind them. To the naked eye, there was no obvious way that the wall had ever been anything other than what it was.

Mace released his grip and landed softly on the cement ground.

He examined the spot in the wall that the vampires had used. "They know Lyra as the hunter." He looked toward the door outside and then back at the wall. "I really should tell Rhea about this." He took a deep breath and pressed his hand into the wall, which instantly opened the doorway once more. "Maybe just a little peek."

Mace tiptoed across the room and walked into the secret passageway. As he could still hear echoes of the vampires' conversation, he waited a few minutes until nothing but silence met him. The passageway was lit by fire alone, which felt extremely familiar to Mace. His father had never been much of a fan of electricity. As the passageway angled downward, Mace could see the true Tuscan hideaway come into focus. The two vampires he'd seen weren't alone. He detected dozens of unique voices and smells amongst them.

"And they're probably going to smell me too. It's not worth it."

As he turned to go back, Mace heard the door behind him open once again.

His chest tightened. "Damn." With no hiding place to speak of, Mace pressed forward into the stronghold. He listened for voices and turned the corner whenever someone came close, doing his best to keep a mental map of the place.

While fire had lit the passageway, he now knew it was more of an homage than anything else. Everything inside the stronghold was as modern as can be. It looked as though it had been redecorated within the last few years.

"Someone has good taste." He quickened his pace as he heard more and more voices approaching. "Just go in a circle, get back to the exit, and get the hell out of here."

In his mind, Mace had made the necessary three lefts to get back around to the entrance, but as soon as he saw the passageway, he realized his plan was screwed.

A half-dozen vampires stood in his way, as if they'd been expecting him the entire time.

The vampire who first showed him the way inside stepped forward. "It seems as though we have a bit of a rat problem."

Mace's mind plotted every possible scenario as he spoke. "I'd be happy to call the exterminator for you. Should I tell him to go to the basement unit?"

"Funny. I have a feeling she'll know exactly what to do with you."

Mace could feel the presence of another three gang members behind him.

These are not the best odds.

Mace crouched low before pressing hard off his heels and flying backwards through the air. The unprepared vampires behind him couldn't react in time as he landed past them and immediately engaged in a full-on sprint. Mace grabbed one of the flaming torches off the wall and used it right away to smash an attempted assailant in the face. When two more vampires passed by, he threw the torch at one of them and caught the other in the face with his boot. He didn't hesitate for a moment as he continued to sprint past them and the wave of vampires closed in behind him.

He had reached top speed when a leg he never saw coming swept under him and sent him slamming hard into the ground. Mace kicked up and turned toward the mystery attacker. Even the momentary slowdown was more than enough time for the other members of the clan to surround him. But they didn't faze him nearly as much as the identity of the woman who stood before him.

Mace knelt down before her. "Isn't this a surprise?"

The woman smiled as she looked down upon him. "It's nice to see you too, Brother."

Chapter 18

Lyra had gotten used to not flinching when she heard the crackling voices over her comm device. But she had difficulty not reacting when Doug spoke these words.

"I just wanted to let you know that Mace is currently missing. He was examining something about the reemerged Tuscan clan. I'll call you when I know more."

Lyra gripped the seat cushion beside her leg as Nikolai glanced in her direction.

"Is everything okay? I'm sure the mission is going to go fine."

She nodded. I'll be all right. Just a few pre-breaking-and-entering jitters is all.

Lyra's chest tightened. She had no clue what the Tuscan clan would do if they got their hands on Mace. Will they treat him like a beloved former son or a traitor?

Vanya cleared his throat from the other row of seats in the van. "Lyra, I think we got off on the wrong foot, no? This is important mission and it's best if we work on same team."

Lyra looked into the eyes of Nikolai's brother and ignored the sense that she was walking into a trap. "That's very big of you. After all, we'll be spending a lot of time together over the coming years."

Vanya seemed to hold back a laugh as he spoke. "Yes, for years. Maybe dog years, right brother?"

Lyra scrunched up her face as she looked toward the Russian beside her. "What does he mean dog years?"

Nikolai shrugged his shoulders. "Not sure. You know that my brother is quite crazy."

Vanya laughed to himself once again and turned back toward the front.

On the edges of her mind, something was starting to come into focus about the artifacts, but she couldn't quite place her finger on it. Before any grand revelations could be made, the van came to a stop.

Nikolai gripped her shoulder. "I will handle my brother. You just focus on staying close to me, right?"

Lyra tried to detect any hesitation or wavering in her fake boyfriend's voice. There was none. Either he was telling the truth or he was one hell of a liar.

"Right. You wolves lead the way."

The three of them exited the van to a rundown part of the city Lyra didn't recognize. She used her powers of deduction to determine they were on the far Northwest Side, but beyond that, all she knew was that there were a lot of vampires nearby. Her ability to detect them hadn't wavered in the slightest over the last decade.

Vanya waved the two of them forward as they crouched down beside a former storefront that had long since lost its window.

"When you hear explosion, that is our cue. Me and the lover boy will take care of fanged friends, and you find that artifact. Good plan?"

Lyra nodded as the blast took her by surprise earlier than she expected. The ground shook beneath her as she saw a crater open up halfway down the block. The smile that spread across Vanya's face was unsettling to say the least.

He stuck out his tongue. "It is time for business."

Without a moment's hesitation, the Russian changed from human to grotesque wolf in a matter of seconds. He let out a howl and bared his teeth for Lyra to see.

She did her best "not impressed" face as she turned toward Nikolai.

"Have fun on all fours."

The Russian grinned. "I always do. Be careful in there."

Nikolai gave a stoic look as his transformation began as well. Unlike his brother, his wolf alter ego was well-kept and almost regal looking. He joined his wolfish brother and gave a nod in Lyra's direction.

She started off toward the crater. "Time to take you puppies out for a walk."

The wolfish Vanya howled once more and sprinted toward the vampire stronghold. His brother headed in his direction as well.

As she reached the improvised entrance, she could see the faint glimmer of an old symbol. On one of the walls, the ancient Tuscan clan logo was alive and well.

She shook her head. "I cut off the head, but it looks like the snake is still alive."

Chapter 19

Mace relaxed into his arm and leg restraints as he looked up into the eyes of Aella, his younger sister. As with most vampires, she aged quickly until she appeared to be in her 20s, only to stay that way for the rest of her life. Both of them were locked into an eternal youth that she appeared to wear well as the apparent new leader of the Tuscan clan. She'd been younger than him when their father died and the news broke about vampires being real. A hint of remorse washed over him as he realized he could have been a father figure to his sisters and brothers. After they were separated shortly after the bombshell dropped, he wasn't sure what had happened to any of his siblings. At least one mystery had just been cleared up for him.

Aella chuckled as she looked down at him. "I hope you like what I've done with the place. Father's tastes were a little old school for my liking."

Despite being in chains, he had to admit it was sort of nice to see her. "I should have known when I was snooping around. You always had a flair for art. Though I never pegged you for a clan leader."

Her tongue moved across her fangs. "Neither did I. But when the shit hit the fan, I had to fend for myself. You certainly weren't here to help me become a respectable member of society."

Mace ducked his head. "You're right. Me not being here certainly didn't help things."

Aella walked across the room and put her hand on his face. "I'm not mad at you, Brother. With you and everyone else out of the picture, I had to learn self reliance."

"You mean, you had to take over?"

"I may not have been next in the line of succession, but I was the only one available. There were challengers—" A sharp fingernail slowly sliced down the side of Mace's cheek. "But I handled them with a woman's touch."

The former prince ignored the stinging sensation on his face. "So, when given a choice to be good or to be a murderer, you picked being just like dear old Dad."

Aella let out a sharp pointed laugh. "Don't act so high and mighty. We struggled to survive just like you. Even considered trying to bring you in until we found out you became an agent of the FBI." She stepped over to her own bar and poured herself a drink. "Not to mention your whole secret society that stops all the bad unhumans thing everybody knows about."

He raised his eyebrows. "You do your homework."

She took a sip of the clear, strong-smelling liquid and bore her fangs. "We have to know everything that's going on. But you and your huntress are the least of our worries. For some reason, you seem to be aiding and abetting the wolves."

He watched his sister intently. "I'm not trying to help them. I just want to figure out what they're up to."

She shook her head. "You're going about it the wrong way. Torture is still the best way to get information."

"You and Lyra feel the same way."

"I'm not even going to get into the fact that you're canoodling with dad's murderer. I'm just here to tell you that the wolves are about to destroy the city you hold so very dear. And they couldn't have done it without your help."

He leaned toward her. "What do you mean? What do the artifacts do?"

She took another sip from her drink and sucked it through her teeth. "Apart, they're completely harmless." She stared right into his eyes. "Together, they create limitless chaos."

Just then, the ground shook beneath them as the echoes of an explosion reached their chamber. The electric lights that their father had been so hesitant to use all went out at once. The low light of torch flame was all that reached them from the hallway.

Mace tugged at his restraints. "What the heck was that?"

His sister gently placed her drink down on the bar and extended her long deadly fingernails. "They're here."

Chapter 20

Lyra could hardly believe her eyes. A stronghold of vampires she never knew existed was in perfect condition beneath the city. Well, perfect except for the giant crater the shifters had just blasted into the side of their secret hideaway.

She followed close behind the two wolves as the first wave of vampire guards moved forward. She crouched down to fight, but she need not have made the effort. Nikolai and Vanya quickly leapt into action, and with their claws and razor-sharp teeth, they tore through the necks of the vampire guards with ease. Before she knew it, half a dozen Tuscan vamps lay broken on the ground. She shook her head. "I should have kept a pet back in my hunter days."

She swore Nikolai turned back and flashed her a smile in wolf form, but it was tough to tell without his human veneer. When a noise reached their room from the left, Vanya went sprinting toward it. Nikolai followed close behind. She could sense the vampires all around her, but there was another energy inside. It was older and potentially more dangerous than the creatures with fangs or claws. The artifact was nearby, and she was the only one with the opposable thumbs to get it. As the shifters did their dirty work, she walked toward the vampires' cries.

As she moved in the direction of the energy, she wondered if the evil members of the vampire race could ever be snuffed out.

"I killed so many back in the day. And yet here they are right under my nose."

She sensed something coming up from behind her and ducked at just the right moment to avoid a sword-wielding vamp who'd gotten the drop on her. She felt nostalgic, wondering when she last fought a vampire one-on-one.

When the vamp approached again, three swift kicks to his arms sent the sword scuttling across the floor.

She winked at him. "Your move, Toothie."

The vampire growled and reached for her, and she easily slid under him and worked her way behind. An elbow to the back of his head sent him to the ground and instinct had her on top of him in a moment. It also had the stake in her hand and ready to strike.

As the vampire cowered beneath her, something stopped her from going through the motions.

This vampire did nothing wrong to me. And I'm the one who broke into his house.

She grunted and tossed the stake away before landing a solid punch in the center of his forehead. The vampire went limp and unconscious beneath her.

"You got me on a good day." She got to her feet and picked up the sword just in case. "Let's go find us some wolf art."

She listened to the chaos of the wolf infiltrators echo through the halls as she went down several corridors and found the artifact resting atop a pedestal. She snatched it from its perch and removed a shoulder bag from her pocket. "This doesn't really go with the place anyway."

As Lyra began jogging back toward the crater on the street, she heard the wolves galloping back toward her. She noticed Nikolai's limp right away.

Lyra knelt down and the wolf came right towards her. His mouth and fur was covered in blood, but from the smell, she knew that most of it wasn't his own. "That doesn't look too bad. Not deep at all."

Vanya growled in her direction.

She held up the artifact toward him. "Don't worry. I got it. Let's just get out and—"

The scent hit Lyra like a ton of bricks. She smelled vampires all over this place, some of whom were headed in their very direction. But that wasn't what shocked her. Mace was somewhere nearby in the stronghold.

She took the bag off her shoulders and laid it at her feet.

"You two go on without me. I've got something I need to do."

Vanya snapped in her direction with his teeth, but Nikolai clawed at him long enough for Lyra to get away unscathed. She kept the sword close by as she ran toward the smell of her partner. As it grew more intense, she continued to wonder exactly how they might treat the former prince.

"Be alive, you idiot. Just be alive."

Her heart beat faster as she sprinted toward the scent. When she reached a dead end, she realized the vampire was just through that wall.

"Mace!"

She heard a muffled sound from the other side, though she had no clue what the person said.

"I'm coming!"

As she prepared to lower her shoulder and blast through the wall, she heard a faint growling sound behind her. When she turned, she saw the wolf who hated her staring her down in a dead end. Vanya finally had her right where he wanted her.

Chapter 21

It didn't take long for Mace's eyes to adjust to the dim torchlight, though he could feel his nerves stretch with the far-off sounds of howling wolves. His sister didn't seem nervous in the slightest, in fact, she took another drink before placing it back down on the bar.

Mace strained at his shackles. "Aren't you going to do something? Aren't you the leader?"

Aella smirked. "I trust my generals. Obviously, you haven't had much management experience."

Mace gritted his teeth and did his best to rip his chains apart, but it was no use. "Let me out and I'll help."

She laughed. "Because I can trust you so much. Weren't you the one who sneaked in here in the first place?"

Mace heard the scream at the same time she did. While it was impossible to know which side was winning the battle outside the room, the vampire's death rattle seemed to indicate the tide of the battle.

"Look Sister, I promise that if you let me go right now, I'll make sure that we turn a blind eye to everything you do outside of murder."

Aella raised an eyebrow. "How generous of you."

Mace took a deep breath. "I know that I should have sought you out after vampires went public. I can't ever take that back. But if you let me go, I promise that I'll help you now."

When another scream followed by a throat gurgle wafted in from the other room, Mace's sister shook her head and dove toward her brother. With expert precision, her razor-sharp nails sliced through the powerful restraints, and Mace was once again free.

He nodded toward her. "Thank you."

Aella scrunched up her face. "Don't make me regret it." She looked toward the doorway. "You want some leadership? Come with me. Don't get killed."

Mace followed her lead. "You're practically Abraham Lincoln up in here."

"Minus the assassination I hope." She looked left and right. "By the way, if you break your word, I'll kill everyone on your team."

Mace didn't acknowledge the threat as he and his sister pressed forward. Almost immediately, Mace sensed the presence of three shifters sprinting toward them at top speed.

His sister smiled. "I like these odds."

As her claws grew longer in response to impending battle, Mace used his speed to catch one of the wolves by surprise. He tackled the lead shifter to the ground, and their two solid bodies rolled across the floor. When Mace slammed hard into the wall, the wolf took a swipe at his face. He caught the creature by the wrist and turned his arm against the socket. The shifter yelped and growled.

Mace winked. "You've been a bad, bad puppy."

With a swift punch to the shifter's jaw, the wolf went limp beneath him. His claws retracted, and the shifter went from doglike to human in a hurry. Mace didn't recognize the Russian who lay beneath him.

As he turned back toward his sister, he saw her claws slice through the throat of both of her attackers in quick succession. Their hairy bodies fell hard against the ground.

Mace frowned. "You could have captured them."

She wrinkled her nose. "Nothing is worse than a backseat fighter."

Just then, Mace picked up something he hadn't expected. Her smell was unique enough to make it to him from several rooms away.

Mace stood up. "It's her. I have to find her."

While her face remained neutral, her eyes told a story of hatred. "Go. I'll be fine on my own."

Mace met her eyes. "Thank you. I won't break my promise."

Aella said nothing as she turned her back on him.

Mace sighed and began to run once again. He dashed toward the smell of Lyra Thorne.

Let's hope she showed a little more restraint this time.

As he sidestepped half a dozen bodies along the path, he could now hear her as well. But as he reached the adjacent room, she wasn't the only thing he heard. He could hear growling and the gnashing of sharp wolf teeth as well.

Chapter 22

Lyra's hand was raw from alternately punching Vanya's solid wolf face and preventing him from clamping down on her arm. Vanya seemed to be tiring as well, and she wondered who would make a mistake first.

She grinned. "I guess all that talk of letting bygones be bygones didn't amount to much, huh Vanya?"

The wolf did nothing but growl in response as he ran toward her. Lyra once again removed the sword from the back of her pants and swung the blade in the Russian's direction as he came close. For the sixth time in a row, the wolf easily avoided the attack.

When she thought Vanya was vulnerable, she pushed off the wall with one leg and swung it toward the Russian's face. But Vanya was much less vulnerable than she supposed, changing directions in midair and clamping his jaw down on Lyra's calf muscle. The pain spread through Lyra's body like wildfire. Her leg locked up with agony, but her arms still worked just fine. With a quick swing, she lopped off Vanya's tail. The blood shot off in every direction as Vanya released his grasp on her leg. He whimpered and backed away, turning several times to examine the stump where his tail once lived.

Lyra took the opportunity to crouch down and examine her leg as well. Her eyes watered as she looked down at the wound, which almost seemed as though a shark had bit in and luckily hadn't torn her entire leg from her body. The blood seeped out onto the ground.

She clenched one fist in an effort to deaden the sensation. "No more treats for you."

Vanya snarled at the dog pun and ran toward her once again.

Her eyes lit up as she saw an opening and swung her sword. While she thought she had a clear path to the wolf's mouth, she hadn't expected Vanya's teeth to go straight through the blade. The metal crunched in his mouth, and the once-promising weapon was neutered.

She limped as she attempted to crouch down in a fighting stance. "That's all right. I like hand-to-hand better anyway..." As the blood loss increased, Lyra allowed herself to blink for just a second.

When her eyes opened, she saw Vanya a few inches away from her face. As she braced herself, a whoosh of air came streaming into the room. A blur her eyes didn't have time to register yanked the wolf out of the air and slammed him into the floor before he could get one claw on Lyra. When her eyes could finally discover the identity of the blur, she wasn't surprised in the least. Mace threw fist after fist into the wolf's jaw. Lyra saw the blood and teeth exit the creature's mouth, complete with whimpers and growls. The Russian didn't stand a chance against a vampire with a crush.

When Mace finished his smackdown, he breathed heavily atop the wolf. The shifter gave one final whimper as he transformed back into human form. He didn't look much better than his wolf counterpart, as the blood and gaps in his mouth remained even after changing his shape.

The Russian spit blood toward Mace's eyes. The crimson missed the mark. "Try a fair fight. One man against one man."

Mace raised an eyebrow. "No thanks."

With one last swing, Mace's knuckles connected right between the Russian's eyes. With a groan, the crazy brother went silent.

Lyra took a deep breath and shook loose the cobwebs. "I was coming to save you."

He grinned as he stood. "We really should keep tabs on how many times we've saved each other."

Lyra fought the urge to give her vampire savior a hug as she looked back in the direction she'd come from. "I'm glad you're alive."

"How glad on a scale from 1 to 10? I want to make sure we include that data in our spreadsheet."

She waved him toward the doorway. "First, we get the artifact. Second, we do the data entry."

Mace's eyes twinkled as he followed close behind Lyra.

They reached the crater just as she heard the sound of a van starting. As she got back into the sunlight, she saw Nikolai in the passenger seat of the van with the bag draped across his shoulder.

She called out. "Nikolai! Wait!"

Nikolai met her eyes and smiled. He gave a short wave as the wheels from the vehicle peeled out, leaving them in the van's dust.

She growled and looked down at her still-bleeding leg. "Damn."

Mace put his hands on his hips. "I guess your boyfriend went home with another date."

Before Lyra could scowl in his direction, an attacker she didn't see coming leapt upon her back and wrapped an arm around her throat.

Lyra instinctively rolled forward, shedding the assailant and taking another roll to get to her feet. Her leg burned in response to the motion, and she turned back to face someone she didn't expect.

The creature scowled and extended her claws. "This is for my father, you bitch."

The vampire sprinted towards her, but once again Mace dove through the air and slammed the attacker to the ground.

Her vampire partner held the woman back. "Come on, Sis. There isn't any time for that."

Lyra's mouth hung open. "You have a sister? You have a sister who just tried to kill me?"

Mace's sister screamed beneath him. "She murdered our father, Mace. Doesn't that mean something to you?"

Mace pulled her to her feet. "The Russians got the last artifact. So unless stopping her is going to save the city, you better start telling us what the hell that thing does."

The sister let out one last snarl before her temper seemed to cool.

Lyra could see the family resemblance now that she had a moment to look. The sister had Mace's eyes, as well as her father's ruthlessness.

The sister shook her head. "There's nothing you can do."

Mace grabbed her shoulders and shook. "Tell me what the artifacts do."

She looked him right in the eye. "You think a half dozen wolves is bad?" His sister's eyes moved toward Lyra's. "Imagine an entire city of them."

Chapter 23

As Doug moved the small sculpture to the “X” of tape in the spot Rhea had told him, he couldn't help but feel there was something missing. It was as if a portion of his brain had been temporarily removed. And when a person is as smart as Doug, even the smallest change is easily noticeable.

"Why do I feel this way? Did I eat a bad sandwich or something?"

He placed the ancient-looking sculpture down and faced it in the proper direction. Now all three pieces of art were in place. But for what reason?

"Rhea told me something about these. Right? There's some reason why I'm doing this?"

Not having the answers bugged the programmer and resident genius to his core.

Heidi walked into the room and gave her coworker a sideways glance. "Did you find what you were looking for?"

Doug's forehead wrinkled. "I'm not sure what you're talking about."

"You know, some weird tracker device. You almost running into me in the hallway. Does any of this ring a bell?"

Doug had been known to hyper-focused sometimes so much that his interactions with people went out the window. But this seemed different and more unsettling.

He cleared his throat. "Sure. I found it. Thanks for checking in."

Heidi shook her head. "You're a terrible liar. I suppose that's probably a good thing in the long run." She looked down at the sculpture. "Rhea get a new decorator?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "I'm just the hired help."

But to what end?

Doug sighed. "I better get back to the office. It's been a while since Mace and Lyra checked in."

She nodded, a hint of skepticism remaining upon her face. "You know, that sculpture would look much better over—"

"Don't move it!"

Heidi put up her hands. "Why?"

"I'm not sure. Rhea said not to move it."

Heidi stared at her coworker. "I'm not sure what's gotten into you, Doug, but it's not a good look."

She turned and walked away.

As Doug tried to piece his last two days together, he placed the third and final sculpture in the area Rhea had instructed. The second it locked into place, he felt a low hum of energy. A warmth seemed to enter his chest, like he'd been wrapped in a blanket of protection.

As he stepped back to the control room, Rhea looked across the room from him. "How does that feel?"

"It feels good. Why does it feel good?"

She looked toward a monitor that showed a half dozen camera feeds in the Loop. "Sometimes you have to protect yourself against what's coming."

Before Doug could ask exactly what was coming, a ring came in on the comms. Doug pressed a blinking red button.

"What's happening?"

Lyra's voice echoed through the room. "I found Mace. We're headed away from the Tuscan stronghold; I need to know if the artifacts have moved."

Doug pulled up a new window on the monitor, which displayed the six artifacts he'd been tracking.

"Wait, weren't there nine?"

Doug shook his head and focused back on the monitor. "They are moving. Looks like they're headed downtown. Is there an artifact festival this week?"

Lyra's voice was rushed over the comm. "I would consider locking yourselves down if you can."

Doug looked toward Rhea, she didn't seem the least bit worried. "Why? Why do we need to lock ourselves down?"

Lyra sighed. "Because things are about to get hairy in Chicago."

Chapter 24

Once Lyra passed along the instructions to the cab driver, she could get back to her current purpose: berating Mace for his stupidity.

She wrapped her leg in a piece of fabric she'd torn from one of the dead vampire's uniforms. "How could you just go into the stronghold without any backup whatsoever?"

The vampire gritted his teeth. "If someone hadn't been too busy spending the night in a shifter's bed, maybe none of this would've happened."

She let out a sharp laugh. "I see. Now all of this is my fault."

Lyra watched cars whiz by as they got to a more populated area of the city.

Mace pointed his finger at Lyra. "You're the one who turned off your comms to do whatever it was you wanted to do with the wolf."

She shook her head. "You're jealous. You're jealous of anyone who gets to spend time with me. And because your jealousy has clouded your judgment, you let yourself get captured. They could've killed you."

The cab driver in front turned slightly to the back. "This seems like a private conversation. Is there any chance you could hold off until we get to—"

The driver's words began to change into screams. The car swerved from left to right as the human shook in the driver's seat.

Lyra turned her rage into focus. "Open your door, Mace."

Mace's eyes grew wide. "What?"

The car continued to swerve, now going even faster as the transformation came into full focus.

"Open your damn door!"

Mace tried the handle, but with the door locked, he was forced to resort to more primitive means.

Lyra watched as the vampire's fist slammed hard through the car. His hand left a hole in the vehicle, but the door still remained. Lyra checked the rearview mirror and saw that their driver had now fully become a wolf. He growled and strained at the seatbelt holding him in. The vehicle sped up and seemed destined to crash into the swerving vehicles in front of it.

Mace leaned back against her and used his feet to propel the door off his wrist and skidding along the ground below.

Lyra's heart pounded within her chest. "Go now!"

The two of them undid their seat belts and dove out the uncontrolled vehicle. Lyra's shoulder roll got her back up to standing on the blacktop in a hurry. Mace wasn't as lucky, slamming his legs and rolling along the street. When Mace finally came to a stop, she saw a pack of wolves behind him. Their clothes were tattered from the transformation, and they seemed interested in one thing alone.

Lyra screamed. "Mace, look out!"

Mace just avoided a swipe from two wolves that sprinted for him. As he stood, he pointed once again at Lyra.

"Look out behind you!"

Lyra turned to see another vehicle swerving out of control, and it wasn't the only one. She leapt at just the right moment, tapped her good leg on the top of the car, and came down in a crouch. Sharp pain shot through her injured calf as Mace reached her side.

"My sister apparently wasn't kidding. But we're not wolves."

Lyra took a long look around. Men, women, and children had all been changed into predators. And in their eyes, Mace and Lyra were the prey.

"Just supernaturally lucky I guess. We'd better find those artifacts."

Lyra and Mace sprinted away from the middle of the street and spied one of the wolf statues attached to a streetlight in the very center of town. Mace spotted it at the exact same moment. "There's another one across the street. It's like they're acting as some kind of magical beacon."

She nodded, but she couldn't help but notice that while they were scoping out the Loop's latest decorations, hundreds of wolves that had previously been shopping or walking were now prowling. And all of them seemed to have eyes for her.

Chapter 25

Mace glanced to his left and right, but wherever he looked, a wolf seemed to be circling toward them.

Lyra pressed her back against his as the wolves continued to build their presence. "Well, if we destroy one of these, it should break the spell, right?"

Mace grabbed the nearest weapon he could find, a hunk of a cement block he had to rip from the ground to lift. "Let's find out."

As the wolves continued to converge, their teeth bared, the vampire tossed the block through the air. Its aim was true, crashing hard into one of the artifacts. The wolf statue broke into a thousand pieces, but the wolves remained.

Lyra cursed under her breath. "What do we do?"

His nostrils filled with the smell of fur. "Start punching."

Mace didn't have to tell Lyra twice. Despite her injury, she flew through the air and began attacking whichever wolf was closest to her. The creatures struck with incredible efficiency, but she was faster.

Mace turned toward his own set of creatures. "Trust me when I say this is for your own good."

Mace's fists blazed through the line of wolves ahead of him. His knuckles cracked furry heads around him. Speed was his only weapon against numbers this ridiculous. As he knocked several wolves down, more creatures filled in the gaps to face him. When they leapt for him, he punched them in the underbelly. When they stood their ground, he went for the head. Before he knew it, two dozen wolves lay unconscious on the ground. But now any nearby wolf seemed poised to fill their spot from the surrounding city blocks.

The sound of hundreds of growling angry creatures surrounded them.

"Mace? Can you hear me?"

The vampire kicked one wolf into another trio, giving him a moment of respite. "Doug? You're still human?"

"It's a miracle. Now, it seems like the artifacts together created a magical frequency. If you're going to stop the frequency, you need to destroy all of them."

The vampire cracked one wolf with the back of his knuckles and swung his foot through the air to take down two other assailants as well. "And that should turn everybody back?"

"That's what the data says."

"One plan is better than no plans." After knocking down another creature, Mace leapt off the shoulders of one wolf and propelled himself into the air. Wolves jumped up and swiped at him as he reached another streetlight. As he climbed up, he could see another artifact hanging from the top. He looked down at Lyra and noticed that while she was surrounded, the hunter knew how to hold her own.

He shimmied up the streetlight with incredible speed and cracked the artifact in half.

"Two down. Four to go."

He climbed atop the streetlight over 20 feet above the ground. Mace spied the third artifact across the street and leapt with all his might toward it. As he flew through the air, he didn't expect a shifter to be able to jump just as high. But, when the wolf creature grabbed Mace by the leg, the vampire knew he had no chance of reaching the other artifact. Mace attempted to reestablish his balance in midair as the shifter threw him down hard onto the middle of the street. The blacktop cracked beneath him as he tried to ignore the pain.

Landing softly beside him was the shifter who transformed back into human form.

Mace was surprised to see the smiling Nikolai staring straight at him.

"If it isn't jealous boyfriend. I hope you like what we have done with place."

Mace bent his knees and clenched his fists. "If it rains, this city's gonna smell a lot worse than usual."

Nikolai laughed. "Now, everyone will know what it is like to be wolf. And everyone who isn't so lucky will be first meal."

Mace sensed more wolves coming around behind him as his stare into Nikolai's eyes intensified. "You knew what was happening all along."

"Guilty as charged. Except no one will be left to charge me."

Nikolai easily transformed back into a hulking wolf figure. But as he took a step toward Mace, something whizzed past the side of the vampire's head and struck the creature in his hindquarters.

Nikolai yelped and growled as both of them turned toward the source of the projectile. Aella and a dozen vampires behind her walked proudly into the square. Mace's sister loaded the next crossbow bolt.

"It's about get Twilight up in here."

Chapter 26

As Lyra saw the dozen vampires streaming into the intersection, it was the first time she could remember ever being glad to see the unhumans in mass. She swung her leg around in a circle, keeping several approaching wolves at bay.

"Looks like the cavalry has arrived."

While she appreciated the support, 14 against an army of confused wolves and their shifter masters still didn't inspire much confidence. A wolf that, from the looks of her, used to be a housewife in mom jeans leapt for her back. Lyra ducked the assault and spun to sweep her leg into the other attackers who tried to take advantage. The endorphins had kicked in to reduce the pain of her leg, but it wasn't completely gone. Between that and constantly having to fend off what used to be a few hundred humans, she wasn't sure how much she could keep this up.

"I'm getting a little tired of doggie daycare. Sandwich Man, you got anything that can help?"

Doug's voice was frantic on the other line. "This is happening throughout the city. Unless you get to those artifacts, I'm not sure what we can do from here."

Lyra leapt forward to avoid another attack and planted herself beside one of the city's parking meters. She braced herself and tore it out of the ground. Quarters flew out into the street, clanging as they went. She swung the meter like a bow staff, keeping an ambitious trio of wolves away.

"Great. Anybody know any other vampires' gangs we can get our hands on?"

Mace grunted on his comm. "I don't exactly have them on speed dial."

Lyra twisted herself like a top, swinging the meter in every direction. The wolves kept their distance, but they seemed to be growing feistier and hungrier with every passing minute.

Lyra spied one of the remaining artifacts in throwing range. She took the parking meter in one hand, wound up, and threw it like a javelin. The metal pole whirled through the air as it struck another artifact right in the center. The sculpture shattered as she prepared herself for the next onslaught of wolves. "That's half of them."

Lyra could see the other magical artifacts mocking her from across the street. Between her and them was a battlefield she couldn't see any way to cross.

"I could really do with a tidal wave right about now."

As she punched four more wolves to knock them to the ground, the kernel of an idea began to expand.

"Doug, we need a storm. We need a tornado."

The computer programmer seemed confused on the other line. "I'm not exactly sure what you mean. We don't control the weather."

Lyra pushed a diving wolf hard in the chest. It crashed into several more approaching creatures. She flipped backwards over another attacker and back-handed the wolf who tried to take advantage. Her arms started to grow numb with the flurry of attacks.

"I don't mean an actual tornado. Tap into the city's controls and set off a tornado warning."

She could hear Doug's mouth open wide on the other line. "I think I know where you're going with this. Just give me a second."

Lyra watched as half a dozen wolves circled around her. It wasn't hard to tell that they planned to strike at the exact same moment.

She breathed heavily. "Not a problem, Doug. Take all the time you need."

"You called me by my real name."

"Set off the damn alarm!"

Lyra tightened her body and readied it for the assault as the alarm began sounding throughout the city streets.

The sound echoed loudly against the buildings. She looked intently at her would-be assailants and watched as one of the wolves lifted his head into the air and started howling.

Chapter 27

Mace didn't have time to cover his ears to block the deafening noise that engulfed the city streets. But after landing one final blow on one of the wolves beside him, he watched as wolf after wolf lifted their heads and joined the city's alarm system. As he spied so many of the converted humans joining the chorus, something unexpected happened. Not only did the street open up considerably for the quest to take down the remaining three artifacts. He could also tell from the wolves who weren't howling, exactly who the shifters were. From the corner of his eye, Mace saw Lyra dash across the street and obliterate one of the remaining artifacts with a powerful kick.

Two left.

Mace followed suit, running through the howling creatures and grabbing one of the statues from its high-up perch. He tossed it to the ground, where it fractured into hundreds of pieces. He landed on the street beside it.

One to go.

As Mace's eyes darted over to the final artifact, he could see a wolf with no interest in howling at the base of the streetlight. As Mace began walking over, he spied the former hunter sprinting toward the artifact and the shifter. But she never made it half way. A bloodied and massive shifter who could only have been Nikolai's brother tackled her to the ground and began slicing at her face.

Mace was about to rush to her side when a shout entered his comm.

"Get the statue, Mace. Just go get it!"

His heart stung a bit as he followed directions. He stared down the only shifter who wasn't currently engaged in combat with the vampires.

Mace wiped the sweat from his brow. "Nikolai. I'd say your undercover assignment is over."

The shifter smiled a bit before clenching his teeth together in a growl. Mace ran toward him, but the wolf was faster than he expected. Before the vampire had a chance to react, the shifter had sped through the air and clamped his teeth down on Mace's shoulder. Mace whipped his elbow into the creature's face, which knocked him off and revealed the massive wound the shifter had left behind. As Nikolai came in for another speedy attack, Mace dove to the ground, but a sharp set of claws tore through his shirt and his back on the way past.

The vampire kipped up to standing and felt the pain of the two assaults throughout his body.

Straightening his back was nearly impossible, but he wasn't about to slouch in front of the shifter bastard.

"Is that all you've got?"

Mace could swear he heard the wolf laugh as he leapt in once again. But this time, the vampire was ready. He circled his arm over Nikolai's outstretched paw and tightened his grip hard. Before the wolf could clamp down his teeth, Mace let loose with his free arm. He wasn't sure quite how many body blows he unleashed on the wolf, but he could feel one punch in particular absolutely tear through the shifter's ribs. Nikolai's wolf face went from angry to frightened in a hurry as Mace continued to strike time after time. When the vampire finally let go, Nikolai wobbled on shaky paws. Mace didn't give him any space to stabilize, however, as he leapt high for a superman punch and slammed his fist down just behind the wolf's neck. The shifter's legs splayed out as he slammed into the street with his chest.

Mace held back instincts that told him to clamp down on the shifter's neck. "Why'd you even do this? Why would you want the city to all be like you?"

The vampire watched as Nikolai's body changed back from wolf to human.

The Russian seemed to have a lot of trouble breathing, as if his lungs were on the verge of collapse. "We didn't find artifacts ourselves. A vampire helped us."

Mace shook his head. "No vampire is going to work with a shifter."

The Russian ignored Mace's words. "Yes, he led us right to artifacts. It was very generous of your father to help us."

Chapter 28

Lyra could hardly believe Nikolai's brother had anything left after their previous encounter, but she supposed that a little bit of crazy went a long way. She pressed her legs against the shifter's chest and kicked him high into the air. As she rolled back to standing, she marveled at the shifter's mid-sky-flip and redirection. The shifter landed back on all fours with ease.

"I guess they do always land on their feet."

Vanya briefly transformed back into his human form. "That is cats. You humans never understand shifters. So we make you all become them."

She smirked. "Looks like you left one of us out. It's a pity."

"You will not become wolf. You will become corpse."

Vanya shifted back and ran for her with incredible speed. She tried to punch him as he arrived, but the wolf clawed her arm out of the way and slammed her hard in the chest. Lyra lost her balance and felt the impact of a car's hood beneath her. She turned to her left and noticed the wrist Vanya had clawed was bleeding profusely. When she turned back toward the fight, the Russian was already on top of her. First he clawed at her chest. Then the side of her face. The warm trickle of blood from all her wounds began to coat her body. She could feel darkness press in from the corner of her eyes.

Vanya reared back his wolfish head and made one final leap for her neck. Lyra gripped down hard on the metal behind her and rolled at the last second, taking the entire hood of the car with her. She heard the crunch from Vanya as the creature bit into the car's engine. His teeth seemed to tear through it as easily as he'd ripped the sword blade earlier.

Lyra held the hood with one hand as Vanya quickly turned and rushed toward her. As he leapt into the air with a snarl, Lyra kicked hard in the exact right spot. Her aim was true, connecting with the unhuman's throat. Vanya's trajectory changed drastically as the wolf fell to the street, clutching at his neck while he tried to breath. Lyra leapt toward him and placed her foot on his chest.

She held the car's hood high in the air. "I guess you won't be the best man at me and Nikolai's wedding after all."

With impeccable speed, she slammed the metal object straight through the wolf's throat. The attack was so quick that her improvised weapon easily severed the shifter's head.

She turned away from the gushing blood and convulsing wolf body and looked toward the final artifact. She could see Mace standing nearby, but he seemed to be dealing with a shifter of his own.

She grabbed the bloody car hood and set her feet. "And here I haven't played Frisbee since college."

With a flick of her wrist, Lyra threw the hood like a disk. It traveled over the howling wolves, the fighting vampires, and the dying shifters. As the metal object connected with the sculpture, she could feel a wave of magic shoot through the air. When the artifact shattered, the transformations began immediately. The wolves, who had minutes ago been aiming for her throat, shifted back into humans in tattered clothes. They looked down at their hands and bodies, wondering what on earth had just happened.

Lyra ran towards Mace, who appeared to have Nikolai right where he wanted him.

The former hunter ignored the Russian. "We have a lot of confused people here. It's probably a good idea to get a team out here."

Mace looked down at the coughing Nikolai and back up to Lyra. "According to your fake Russian boyfriend, all of us have one hell of a problem."

Chapter 29

Lyra stood across from the battered Nikolai in one of the pristine rooms of the headquarters 10 stories beneath the Hancock Tower. She crossed her arms and looked into the eyes of a shifter she'd thought could be different.

"I'm surprised you'd go to all this trouble for a family you didn't see eye to eye with. Or was that a lie too?"

Nikolai smiled, though it appeared as though it pained him to do so. "Women are always trying to change men. The case is no different here."

Lyra shook her head. "I don't think I wanted to change you, so much as hope that you weren't an asshole trying to take over the city."

"I don't think you understand the plan." He winked. "We weren't trying to lead. The hope was chaos. Chaos was what we got."

Lyra scratched her head. "Then why work with Mace's father? How is Mace's father even alive?"

Nikolai's eyes twinkled. "I keep thinking back to that night in bed. If things were different, maybe you would have wolf child inside you."

Lyra shuddered at the thought. She had found Nikolai attractive, that much was true. But for some reason, she thought of Mace's reaction above anyone else's.

"Just tell me how the Tuscan King is still alive. That's all you need to do."

Nikolai raised one eyebrow. "Is not too late, you know. You turn off cameras. You take off shirt. Everything can be as it was a few days ago."

Lyra slapped the shifter hard in the face. His hands instinctively reached toward his now-red cheek, but the restraints wouldn't let him get that far.

He shifted his jaw from side to side. "Violence always comes from truth. Just undo restraints and I will be happy to give pleasure."

Lyra considered hitting him again with all her might, but she was worried an attack like that might leave him in the same state as his brother.

"Rhea, Mace? We're gonna have to get creative."

The vampire and their leader walked into the room. She was impressed that Mace looked a few shades shy of wanting to tear a hole through the shifter's chest. She lamented that she'd yet to say anything about the news related to his father.

Rhea lifted her small, wrinkled hands and a bubble of purple magic appeared between them. "Creative, you say? I'm happy to oblige."

Nikolai struggled in his restraints. "What is witch doing? You cannot make me say a word."

Rhea smiled. "A creature formed so long ago, with no knowledge of the magic the world possesses." Rhea let the bubble of magic leave her hands, allowing the mystical purple sphere to float across the room and enter the shifter's mouth.

Even Mace seemed impressed as the shifter gagged several times before the words tumbled out of his mouth.

"Was coalition of unhumans who brought Tuscan King back to be our leader."

Lyra shook her head. "How is that even possible?"

The Russian continued undeterred. "Once he was back, he worked with my father to create plan that would open door."

Mace stared toward the shifter with steely resolve. "Open the door for what?"

Nikolai laughed, as if he only just realized what truths he'd revealed. "There is army of unhumans coming. Now that you stop them once, they will come back faster, bigger, and angrier." Nikolai's smile turned into horror. "No, no. I would never tell you." His eyes locked on Rhea. "You wretched witch. My father will tear your throat out."

Rhea nodded toward the shifter. "Let him come." She looked around at Lyra and Mace. "I think we have the information we need."

Mace touched his hand to his forehead. "So my father is really still alive? How did they even—"

"Very dark magic. Ancient magic that hasn't been seen in millennia." Rhea turned towards the door. "Magic that means there's a war brewing. And it's going to be very, very difficult to stop."

With that, the old, powerful woman stepped back into the hallway.

Mace gave Lyra a look. "You need any help getting him to holding?"

She shook her head. "Thanks."

Mace ducked his head and walked through the door.

Lyra felt herself reach for him. The creature who'd created him. The unhuman she herself had killed was back in the world, somehow. Killing him had nearly ended her life the first time. She wasn't sure if she had it in her to do it again.

Nikolai cleared his throat. "You have ruined my life. I hope that makes you feel terrible."

She sighed. "Oh, you're still here. I forgot you existed."

"If you truly want to forget, let me go, and you'll never hear from me again."

She smiled to herself. "Wouldn't that be nice? If we could just forget everything you did wrong and every lie?" She walked up to the Russian and grabbed him by the shirt. "That's not how things work. Life has consequences, and where you're going, nobody will ever hear from you again."

Nikolai's eyes turned cold. "But Lyra. I was just following the family business. You have to understand."

She grabbed the back of Nikolai's transportation unit. "Tell it to the wall you'll be staring at for the next hundred years."

Chapter 30

Mace took a sip from his latte and placed it back down on the table as he waited for his sister to say something.

The two of them had been almost silent since Mace revealed that their father was still alive. His sister seemed absolutely dumbstruck by the news.

Aella's hand shook on her mug of hot chocolate. "How? Who would do such a thing?"

Mace shook his head. "Apparently, someone who wants to start a war."

His sister ran her hands through her hair. "Look, Mace, you aren't the only one who isn't interested in killing humans. That's why we came and helped, but if he's still alive—the others aren't going to follow me anymore."

Mace held out his hand, and his sister took it. He looked up into her eyes. "You don't know that. It's possible to prove that not all vampires are bad."

She only met his eyes for a second before looking away and down toward the table. "I'm just not sure what to do."

Mace chewed at his cheek. "I have no clue either."

Aella looked up. "Come back to the stronghold. You and I can lead together. Then maybe we have a chance at challenging Dad's power if he comes back."

"I'm not sure, Sis."

She squeezed his hand. "Things can be different. We'll stop doing all of the things you don't approve of."

He sighed. "I don't think it can ever work. I've got my calling, and you've got yours."

His sister bit her bottom lip. "Just don't say no right now. Think about it, will you? I'm not sure if I can do this without you."

Mace wasn't sure what to do. They'd need every ally they could get if a war was truly happening. But he wasn't sure if he was ready to draw up the battle lines quite yet.

"Okay. I'll consider it." He stood up and tossed down a ten-dollar bill. "We should see each other more often."

Aella nodded. "I would like that. I'll see you around."

"See ya."

As Mace arrived home, he saw someone sitting on his doorstep. He wasn't sure how long Lyra had occupied the stoop outside his front door.

Mace walked up the steps and sat down beside her. "How's the healing?"

Lyra flexed and unflexed her leg. "Dougie Boy's medical devices sure are something." She turned toward him. "I wanted to tell you sorry."

"For what?"

She scoffed. "Oh, come on, Mace. I muted the comms to piss you off. It pissed you off. It didn't really make me feel any better, so I'm sorry."

He laughed. "I was acting like a jerk. So, no apology necessary."

She sighed. "You think Nikolai's right? You think there's really going to be a war?"

Mace looked into her eyes. "If my dad's involved, then it's certainly possible. If all the unhuman gangs got together, they could cause some serious havoc."

Lyra and Mace sat in silence for a little while. Mace continued to look forward when he finally broke the pause. "But if there really is something coming, I completely understand where you were coming from. We need to keep things professional. We need to keep our priorities straight."

Lyra almost seemed a little disappointed at his words before she nodded in agreement. "Look at me, a new trendsetter for being logical."

Mace grinned. "Come here." He opened his arms and enveloped Lyra in a hug. He could feel her warmth sinking into him, and he wished for a second the world was a different place. He wondered if someday it would make sense for the two of them to be together.

After the hug had lingered a few seconds too long, they broke off and nodded at each other in sync. Lyra stood up and began to walk away.

Mace felt the words come to him all of a sudden. "Lyra, wait!"

Lyra turned and raised an eyebrow.

Mace smiled. "No more blind dates, okay?"

Lyra chuckled. "I'll consider it."

The former hunter gave a wave and walked off out of view.

As Mace sat there on the stoop for the next few hours, he thought far too deeply of the horrors his resurrected father could bring upon the world.

EPILOGUE

Rhea examined one of the half-shattered artifacts in her hands. It wasn't until closer inspection that she realized she actually knew the designer of the magical object hundreds of years ago. This wasn't the only set of such sculptures in the world, and for many years they had intentionally remained separate. Upon seeing them together, she truly understood their purpose.

"I figured out what you did to me."

Rhea broke off her train of thought and looked up at Doug, who appeared as angry as she'd ever seen him.

She pursed her lips. "It was only a matter of time. After all, I recruited you because you could figure things out, not because you were a sheep."

Doug looked straight through her. "How many times have you done that to me? How many times have you used your magic to erase my memories?"

She sighed. "Doug, I only do these things for—"

"How many times, Rhea?"

She placed the half sculpture back down on the table in front of her. "Six."

Doug appeared shocked by the news and looked toward the other walls of the room, as if he'd find some support there. "If you knew you had the magic that would potentially protect the city, why didn't you do something to stop this? A lot of innocent people could've died."

She walked toward him. "There are certain things that must come to pass for the world to move forward. I could tell this was something that I wasn't supposed to intervene in."

Doug looked down at the floor and then back at her. "Can you really see the future?"

Rhea locked her fingers together. "For the longest time I could. Sure, changes could occur over the hundreds and thousands of years, but I could see it as it was supposed to happen."

"What do you mean you could see it?"

She took a deep breath. "I had always hoped it was a mistake. But the future always seemed to be black after a certain point. The future ended at that point."

Doug frowned. "But it wasn't a mistake."

"A thousand years ago, I assumed it was a blip. Something we'd skip over. A hundred years ago, I got more concerned. But there's still nothing left after a certain point."

"When?"

She opened her eyes wide. "You know that if I tell you I'm going to have to erase your memory."

He managed a slight smile. "I know."

She turned away and looked back toward the artifact. "As far as I can tell, the world as we know it will be gone in six months." She turned back toward Doug. "All of us have six months to live."

Animal activist Denise Hammond had no idea the wolf cub she just rescued was a shifter—not until the werewolf sent to recover him kidnapped her.

Saving a wolf cub from an animal-testing facility changes everything for Denise Hammond, a feisty and dedicated animal activist. Determined to protect the innocent pup, she's shocked when the cub shifts into a toddler right before her eyes.

Yogi, a wolf shifter, is bound by honor to keep his species' existence a secret. He kidnaps Denise and takes her to the cub's family to make her prove her trustworthiness. Knowing a hellion with curves like hers is the ultimate temptation for the other males in his pack, Yogi stays close to Denise, fighting to keep his desire for her under control. But she just might ignite the animal within him.

Chapter 1

“Denise, if you don’t get moving right now, we’re going to be arrested!”

Denise Hammond bit her lip and stared at the wolf cub on the other side of the bars. The little thing was crying, its paws pressed to the door of the cage just under her hands.

Reliance Research wasn’t supposed to be doing animal testing on anything bigger than a rat. Between this cub and the chimps now in the van, her team had been right to target this place. But what was she supposed to do now?

Unlike the other cages in the adjoining room, this one had a digital combination lock. Even with her repurposed ATM decoder, it would take more time than she had to get the cage door open.

She spun around, checking the dimly lit lab space for anything that would help her. The facility was a series of converted warehouses, whose big storage rooms had been divided into a bunch of smaller ones. There were no other cages save for the wolf cub’s in the central laboratory. Most of the space was taken up by lab benches and shelves full of chemicals that lined the plain white walls.

Unfortunately, there were no crowbars handy. Not even a misplaced plumber’s wrench.

“I’m serious.” In Denise’s Bluetooth earpiece, Karen’s voice was getting louder. “We’ve got to get out of here! The guards will be passing on their rounds any minute. Denise, are you there?”

“Yes, I’m here. Lower your voice,” she whispered.

“Why aren’t you out yet? The rest of us are in the van. We’ve got the chimps. We’re done, but you’re way behind schedule. Any second and the guard will check the lab.”

Shit. “I can’t go yet,” she whispered. “There’s another animal here. A wolf cub.”

Another voice cut in. “Damn it, Denise. You can’t save them all. The chimps were our priority. Get your fat ass out here,” Max hissed.

A cutting response rose to her lips, but she heard footsteps in the distance. She gripped the bars weakly, her hands starting to sweat in her gloves. Wincing, she stared down at the little wolf. Max was right. She was out of time.

“I’m sorry,” she whispered.

Inside the cage, the wolf whined. Its eyes seemed to plead with her not to leave it behind.

The footsteps were louder now, closer than she expected. Frak. She’d miscalculated. The guard was outside the door. Denise spun, diving for the only cover at hand—a narrow space between a lab bench and a poorly placed equipment shelf. When she squeezed between them, she cursed her plentiful curves as the metal drawer handles dug into her thigh.

Max wasn't wrong about her ass. However, as her new boyfriend, he was supposed to be less of a jerk about it. But Max had never received the how-to-be-a-supportive-partner memo.

Maybe getting involved with one of her teammates hadn't been the brightest idea. Whatever. She would deal with that later—possibly after she got out of jail.

The guard was inside the room now. Denise held her breath, her eyes so wide they hurt. Across the room, the little wolf was still looking at her as the security guard stepped closer. Denise could see a bit of the man's pant leg as he moved to the occupied cage. Praying the little cub wouldn't start yipping or do anything that would give her away, she put a finger to her lips, silently shushing it.

Please don't bark.

The little wolf cocked its head, then moved it up and down. Denise blinked. Had the animal nodded at her? Impulsively, she gave it a thumbs-up.

What the hell am I doing? The cub couldn't understand her. She had to focus and figure a way to get out of here, or everything she'd worked for would be over.

Except... the cub nodded again. Or at least it appeared to before it sat on the floor of the cage, resting its head on its paws.

Okay, the stress of being caught was making her crack up. Crap. The guard had moved to the left. All she saw was the back of his head. If he turned around now, he'd see her crammed between the shelves.

Moisture pricked and began to trickle between the valley of her breasts. Would the guard hear if a drop of sweat hit the tiled floor?

"Hey, Jackson, did the lab coats order the chimps moved?"

There was the crackle of a radio. "I don't know. Why?"

"Well, obviously cause they're not there."

There was silence for a minute before the voice on the on the radio came back. "They don't have anything down in the schedule, but weren't they due to start testing that new drug soon? They probably forgot to file the paperwork again."

"Well, we have to call them to make sure," the guard in front of her said.

More silence, then the voice broke through the static. "I can't find the number."

The guard in front of her swore. "Sure you can't."

"Just come back and find it for me."

"Fine. But you're still making the call. I don't want to talk to the asshole in charge either."

"It's your turn," the voice on the radio protested.

"The hell it is. I did it last time—when the fire alarm short circuited."

"Fine, whatever. If Mr. High and Mighty didn't want to be bothered at home, he should have forced the brass to upgrade the wiring in this place. Hold on, I'm coming back."

The guard moved out of view, his fading footsteps indicating he was walking away. Denise knew he had left the room when the little wolf stood up, its head swinging between her and the direction of the door. It was almost as if it were trying to tell her the coast was clear.

Denise hurried back to the cage. "Okay, little buddy. I owe you for that one." Without stopping to think of the likelihood of success, she ran to the other side of the room and grabbed one of the lab carts. She sprinted back to the cage and lifted the whole thing onto the cart with an audible grunt.

"Don't bark," she ordered the pup, praying it would remain quiet until she reached the facility's side door. Half-running, she pushed the cart toward her designated exit, wincing every time the wheels squeaked.

By the time she reached the exit, she was panting. But she didn't stop. Taking a deep breath, she flipped the handle and shoved, wedging the cart into the opening and pushing with her hip to widen the gap enough to get it through.

It was dark outside. There was no armed guard pointing a gun at her. No spotlight shone down as she hustled the cart beyond the trees where the van was waiting. But the reception from her team left a lot to be desired.

Max was standing at the door. "Damn it, Denise, what the hell? You got the dog anyway."

She ignored his bluster. "It's a wolf cub. Now help get this in the back."

"No, you idiot. It won't fit."

Her blood heated. If he called her an idiot one more time...

She glared at him. "It will fit. So just open the door and make room."

"I'm telling you it won't fit. Why don't you ever listen to me?"

Maybe because you're an immature jagoff?

"It's my van. If it doesn't fit, I will take the cage and leave you here instead. Now open the door and make room. We don't have much time. The guards have already noticed the chimps are gone."

Max swore under his breath, but he finally yanked open the door. The long bed of the van was crowded, but by stacking the cages, they could fit all four inside.

"Go!" She waved him to the passenger side and ran to jump into the driver's seat.

"This is a bad idea," Karen said from her crouched position in front of the cages. "The dog is going to get the chimps all riled up."

Denise fastened her seat belt. "Again, it's a wolf cub, not a dog. And it's too late. If you wanted quiet, we should have drugged the chimps."

That had been a point of contention for the group. To carry off the rescue quickly and efficiently, she had suggested using a small amount of animal tranquilizer. They needed to keep the poor animals from hooting and screeching during the extraction or the guards would come running.

Her arguments had been rejected. According to them, drugging the animals was cruel. The fact that the excitable chimps would get them caught without sedation didn't seem to matter.

The others, Karen in particular, argued they would be no better than the monsters experimenting on them if they drugged them. Only Max had agreed with Denise, and that was probably because they were dating.

She sighed. I may have to rethink the team's composition.

Denise was the organizational force behind their little band. She had originally chosen the members of the rescue team according to their degree of commitment to the cause, but that had clearly been a mistake. They needed dispassionate and methodical thinkers if they were going to keep doing this without getting arrested.

"The chimps were being quiet before you brought that damn dog in here," Karen said with an annoying cluck of her tongue.

Because I drugged them anyway... She couldn't let the plan fail because members of her team were too soft.

The chimps had been gibbering quietly since they picked them up. They were making more noise now, but it wasn't the earsplitting screech they would've made without the partial sedation she'd secretly administered.

"Listen, we are a democracy—"

Denise's temples were starting to throb. "Karen, stop yelling. I made an executive decision on the fly to save a life. That's why we're doing this after all, isn't it? We just saved an innocent wolf pup—one that is not even barking right now—so can we argue about this at the next meeting?"

"What good will that do after the fact? It's not like you listen to anyone else anyway."

Denise focused on the road ahead, but silently conceded Karen had a point. She'd been doing this on her own for a while before deciding to take on bigger targets. Larger research facilities meant more test animals. Unable to handle the job alone, she'd formed a team. But a lot of the time, she still acted like she was flying solo...

She sighed, turning right onto the highway. "Let's just wait until we're in the clear before we continue with this discussion."

Karen muttered something under her breath that sounded like bitch, but Denise ignored her. Karen was the veterinary technician in their group. She worked at a zoo and had experience treating primates. Denise needed her too much to cut her loose, but maybe she could convince the woman that she could serve their goals better by joining the second team—the one that transported the animals to the nature preserve.

"That reminds me. I need to ask you for a huge favor." She looked in the rearview mirror, trying to gauge Karen's reaction. "I meant to talk to you about it earlier, but I think it would be a good idea if you went with the chimps to Zambia."

Karen poked her head between the two seats. "Me? I...I have to work."

"Can't you call in sick?"

The vet tech sounded uncertain. "I don't have enough vacation days."

"Would it be possible to get some unpaid leave? I can cover you as long as you make sure the animals get where they need to go in good health.”

“Um...”

“I would really appreciate it.”

Karen thumped the seat behind her. “You know what? I’ll do it. I’m going to call my boss now.”

Beside her, Max snorted. No doubt, he’d be using this in an argument later. It wouldn’t be the first time he’d accused her of being manipulative.

Denise didn’t see it that way. She was a problem solver—more concerned with getting results than soothing bruised egos. There weren’t enough hours in the day for that. Besides, Karen always had dark circles under her eyes. An all-expense paid trip to Zambia might be exactly what she needed.

Twenty minutes later, Denise was pulling behind the abandoned gas station on the edge of a tiny no-name town. Parked in a break in the tree line was another vehicle—a truck this time. It was attached to a horse trailer.

They transferred the still-drowsy chimps with a minimum of fuss, something none of the others thought to question.

Even Max didn’t appear to catch on to what she’d done. “You guys are cute, but lazy little bastards, aren’t you?” he asked them before poking her in the ribs too hard. “Now we know why they lost the evolutionary arms race.”

Intent on getting the chimps unloaded as quickly as possible, Denise simply gave him a tight smile. Her teeth were gritted to keep from correcting him on what that term actually meant.

As the others finished up, she changed the plates on the van and added matching decals to the side panels. Once they were in place, the van looked older, like a seventies throwback. A few strategically placed dirt smears cemented the transformation.

Denise studied her work critically and decided it would pass muster in the dark. Even a cop at a checkpoint would most likely fail to recognize the van unless they looked very closely.

Here’s hoping no security feeds caught it in the first place.

The chances of that were slim. Reliance Research was in an isolated corner of Wyoming, a few hours from the Colorado border. The nearest town was ten miles away, a place with a budget too tiny to have traffic cameras. The facility only had a handful that were easily avoided. As the guards had pointed out in their argument, their budget had not gone toward infrastructure or security.

“What are we going to do with the cub?” Max asked. “You’re not planning to send it to Africa, are you?”

“No, of course not. We’ll take it with us, at least until I figure out what to do.”

Max shuffled his feet. “Oh yeah, about that. I was thinking I could maybe tag along with the chimps or something. The second team probably needs help.”

He looked at Karen—or more precisely at her low-cut sweater and skinny thighs—and shrugged.

Denise’s lips parted. “Oh.”

Blinking hard, she fought to mask her reaction. The sudden lump in her throat made that difficult. “If you think you can help them, knock yourself out. But first, I’d appreciate some help with the pup’s cage. See if you can open it,” she said, handing over the decoder device.

Your voice was steady enough. She hadn’t given herself away. Denise turned, needlessly adjusting the decal one more time as he went to work on the lock.

Why am I even upset? She had just been thinking he was an ass. But he’d been her ass.

Apparently, that was about to change.

After a few minutes, Max called out to her. He’d managed to unlock the cage. Well, at least you’re good for something. Leaving the cage unlocked but fastened with wire, she shut the van doors and casually waved goodbye.

Denise waited until she was a few miles away before letting a few tears slip down her cheeks.

It doesn’t matter. I don’t care. She was used to being on her own. That was the primary reason for dating him in the first place—to stave off loneliness. But it hadn’t exactly been a match made in heaven.

Behind her, the pup yipped, and she snorted, remembering she wasn’t as alone as she thought. “Well, I guess it’s just you and me, kid.”

The little animal yawned as it curled up on the floor for a nap.

Chapter 2

Yogi Kane scowled at the road ahead and adjusted his Bluetooth earpiece.

Why was the chief calling him? His mind leapt to the worst-case scenario and he yanked on the steering wheel, pulling his Jeep over to the side of the road.

“Are Sal and Sammy all right?”

He’d talked to his younger sister and brother just yesterday. Everything had been fine, but he knew from experience things could change in an instant.

“Yes, they’re okay. It’s not them.”

He exhaled a pent-up breath. “What’s going on? Is it Connell or Mara?”

The chief’s children were his closest friends. They had stuck with him through his family’s recent troubles, making a show of their friendship and giving him and his siblings their unconditional support. Not everyone in the pack had been so generous.

Douglas paused. “Actually, this is about one of the Averys.”

The Averys. If there was a werewolf equivalent to the Hatfield and McCoy feud, it was the conflict between his family and the Averys. His father had railed and ranted about them for years...

“Yogi, you still there?”

“Uh, yeah. I’m sorry. What’s going on?”

“Do you remember the girl Santiago married? The human named Sheri? She’s missing, presumed dead.”

“That’s fucked up,” Yogi said, wondering where Douglas was going with this.

He only met Sheri once. She was a quiet and timid woman, small in stature. Jessup Avery’s son, Santiago, had taken her as a mate a few years ago. Santiago had died unexpectedly last year while doing another tour as a ranger, but Yogi didn’t know anything about him or his family beyond that.

“They have a baby boy,” Douglas continued.

“They do?”

“We need you to look for them.”

“Me?”

“Logan thinks they’re near you.”

Logan, the Air Elemental and Connell's mate, had a freaky way of finding things out. Part witch and part force of nature, she could do impossible things—crazy shit Yogi had only seen in superhero movies. And that's coming from a werewolf.

Yogi had seen proof of Logan's skill and magic firsthand. If she said he was near Sheri and her kid, then he probably was. Of course, with her powers, she could literally fly anywhere, so why did they need him?

"Is Logan on her way to swoop in to save the day?" Did she need backup? Was Connell unable to help her for some reason?

"She and Connell are somewhere in Eritrea. They can't drop what they're doing to come. I'm afraid this is on you."

Yogi swore under his breath. As comforting as it was that his alpha still had some faith in him after what had happened, he'd literally just left home. If he found Sheri and her kid, he'd end up having to take them to their pack.

So much for escaping...

"Yogi."

"Where do I go?"

"Logan gave me two places to check. The first should be just a few miles from where you are now."

Sheri had been dead at least a day by the look of it. Yogi found her small compact off the highway and down a steep embankment. The vehicle had slammed into a tree amid some dense shrubbery, hiding it from the sight of the vehicles passing on the road above.

There was no sign of Oliver, Sheri's eighteen-month-old son.

The baby had survived the crash. His scent was strong in the trees around the car, but it died abruptly a half mile from it. The trail ended just a few dozen feet from a smaller access road that branched off the highway.

Someone had found Oliver. Whether that person had anything to do with the accident had yet to be determined.

While any road was potentially dangerous, the one Sheri had driven off was well lit with a decent railing along the edge. The lack of skid marks suggested she might have fallen asleep at the wheel—or she'd had no time to react and brake when another car forced her off the road.

Sheri's car was too much of a mess to know if it had been struck by another vehicle, but there were a few bits of orange plastic on the asphalt. It was the kind that came from a headlight. Two cars had collided on this road, but he couldn't say when it had happened.

Somehow, Logan had known the baby wouldn't be here. It was why she'd given him two vague locations, not one. He'd assumed she simply hadn't been sure of her information, which sometimes happened. But at least he had a second chance to find the kid.

Chapter 3

Denise left the wolf cub in the garage of her rented cabin while she ran out to get supplies. The cabin was on an isolated stretch of Alsop Lake, but it was close enough to town to get most of the food and gear she needed on short notice without having to resort to ordering anything online.

Would a wolf eat dog food? Denise stared at the selection, which was a large one considering the size of the store.

People must love dogs around here. She grabbed a can of each different brand. To be safe, she thought she should probably get some meat too.

Denise shuddered. Though a strict vegetarian when it came to her own meals, she had studied enough biology to know better than to try to impose that kind of diet on an animal. However, just because she was willing to serve meat didn't mean she had to like it, she acknowledged as she unenthusiastically ordered ground chuck from the butcher.

By the time she returned to her rental, the little wolf had shredded the blankets she'd piled together as a makeshift dog bed.

"Jesus, kiddo, what are you going to do tonight? It's supposed to get below freezing."

The cub cocked its head at her and proceeded to stroll to the door leading to the kitchen. It paused as if waiting for her to open it.

"Sorry, little buddy, you have to stay in here." The cub yipped and whined, scratching at the door. Feeling guilty, Denise took the ground chuck out of her grocery bag and put it in a bowl on the floor next to a plastic basin she'd filled with water. She rearranged the shredded blankets into a nest by the water heater and ducked into the kitchen before the little cub finished eating.

Wolves have thick fur. No matter how cold it got in the garage, the cub would be fine. Denise went to the kitchen, but she couldn't summon the enthusiasm to prepare dinner for one. Finally settling on a yogurt and a granola bar, she headed for the tiny bedroom to eat in bed.

"What the hell? How did you get in here?"

The wolf cub snorted and wiggled on the burgundy sleeping bag she'd thrown over the bed.

"Shoo! Get off there," she said, waving at it. The cub shook itself and curled up, its head resting on her pillow.

Denise grabbed the little animal, cradling it. Realizing it was a boy, she snorted. It was just like a male to cause trouble. She carried him to the garage, fishing out a few of the larger blanket pieces that were still intact. Setting him next to the heater, she wrapped him up.

“Now, stay,” she ordered.

The second her back was turned, the cub shot past her through the crack in the door.

Damn. He moved fast. When she caught up with him, the cub was back on her bed.

“All right, kiddo, you win. I’m too tired to fight you on this. You can stay here with me tonight, but if you eat my face while I sleep, I’m going to be pissed.”

Maybe feeding it meat earlier had been a mistake. What if it now had the taste for raw flesh? Or had it been the right move? If she made sure he was full all the time, maybe he wouldn’t decide she looked like dinner.

“You sleep at the foot of the bed,” she ordered, pointing.

Naturally, the cub ignored her, rolling over on his back and lifting his paws in the air. With a sigh, she picked him up and moved him.

The cub waited until she climbed into bed before pattering over and curling up against her head. “I’m serious. If you eat my face, I will neuter you.”

The cub yipped again, hopefully in agreement. Drained, she passed out with his furry little body warming her cheek.

Mama.

Denise’s eyes flew open. She rubbed her eyes with the heel of her hand and sat up.

“Mama.”

What in the world? Was that a baby? How could that be? She was the only one here.

Another wail. Yes. Somewhere in the night, a baby was crying.

Was she hallucinating? That didn’t make sense. It was too early for her biological clock to explode. There was no reason for her to be dreaming about babies. She had at least another ten years before the decision to procreate became an issue.

“Mama.”

Why was the crying louder now? Was this one of those freaky dream-within-a-dream things? Denise didn’t think those happened in real life.

The sleeping bag was an unbroken expanse of pearlescent cloth. No fur pile. The cub wasn’t on the bed. Had he rolled off in his sleep?

The crying was the cub. Wow. It sounded almost human.

She scooted across the mattress and blinked rapidly at the sight that met her eyes.

“You’re not really there. I’m still asleep.”

The naked baby boy crying on the floor didn’t care what she believed. He just cared that she was awake. He held up his chubby little hands in an impossible to misinterpret pick-me-up gesture.

Denise coughed to clear her raspy throat. “How did you get in here? Where is your mommy?”

At the word mommy, the toddler’s volume climbed to ear-splitting levels. Wincing, Denise hurried to pick him up. Unused to small children, she imitated what she’d seen women doing on television—holding him close and patting him on the back. The baby’s sobs turned to hiccups as Denise slowly made her way around the cabin, looking for additional intruders.

Had she left the door open? Was that how he had gotten in here? Denise knew she hadn’t done anything so stupid, but checked anyway. Both the front and back door were closed, as were the windows. She was alone.

She looked down at the still-sniffling toddler. “Hell, kid, did you get here through a wormhole? Is there a tear in the universe in the closet?”

The baby didn’t answer. Quiet now, he snuggled in her arms and drowsily blinked up at her.

Was she looking at a kidnapping victim? Or maybe he’d been lost in the woods? On this part of the lake, her rental was the only cabin for miles. Maybe the baby had stumbled to the only recognizable structure in the dark. Could he have crawled inside here on his own?

What if there was someone camping nearby and their baby had wandered away? The parents were probably frantic. What was she supposed to do? Go around the lake with a naked baby until she found the right tent? To her untrained eye, the lake was big—far too large for an aimless search of the shore.

Anger roused her to full consciousness. The lost-child scenario was all wrong. A baby couldn’t have physically entered her cabin. She had locked up tight for the night.

Someone had broken into her cabin and abandoned a toddler. A naked toddler. What the hell kind of person did that?

I’m screwed. Denise couldn’t call the police. She was in possession of a stolen research animal. Wolves weren’t typical pets. Unless the police officer was especially dense, she couldn’t pass the cub off as a dog. Not even a husky.

Wait. Where was the cub?

Still holding the drowsy baby, she crouched to look under the bed. Nothing. A quick scan of the cabin revealed a startling lack of wolf cub.

Shit. Denise swore under her breath, looking around for something to swaddle the little one with. Grabbing her phone to check the outside temperature, she frowned. It was too cold to take the baby out unless he was properly clothed. Even with a blanket, the frigid air would make its way through the cracks unless she could learn to swaddle in the next five minutes.

Denise had two options. She could leave the baby asleep on her bed and take a quick look around in the dark with a flashlight...or she could wait for morning.

If she went out now, she might run into the parents or a search party looking for the little tyke. Of course, if she left and they came here to check, she might miss them.

I’m better off waiting until morning. Despite living in the cabin for over a month, she simply didn’t know the area well enough to conduct a nighttime search. She’d just take a quick peek around the place itself in case help was nearby.

Decision made, Denise turned her attention to the problem at hand. She put the baby down on the bed and covered him with the blanket. Using her pillows, she built a makeshift fort around him.

The flashlight was under the sink. After checking the batteries, she crept out the front door before turning to go back inside.

The couch cushions. She could put them on the floor in case the baby rolled off the bed. After pulling the tan squares off the couch, she tiptoed to the bedroom. She nearly tripped over her own feet when she saw the cub was back...and it was covered by the blanket she'd used on the baby.

Her breath stuttered as she shakily inhaled.

The cub ate the baby. Yes, that was the explanation. The wolf was hungry and had eaten the baby. Because the alternative was too crazy to believe.

I have to find the boy. Despite a stern mental order to get her butt moving, she just stood there like an idiot, staring at the wolf cub. Bending over, she knelt on the ground, her eyes level with the sleeping animal.

The cub sensed her watching and opened his eyes. Then he sneezed. She blinked as a ripple of...something...passed over the wolf. Then the baby was in the cub's place, holding out his arms.

Denise backed away so fast she fell on her ass, hitting the wood floor with an oomph. The momentum rocked her into the bureau, sending a vase rolling off. The heavy ceramic piece glanced off the side of her head, striking with enough force to make her ears ring.

On the bed, the baby fussed and waved his arms. When she stayed on the floor, rubbing her head, he started wailing.

"No!" Denise scrambled to her feet. She held out her hands in a classic panic move, trying to ward off any tears. But that just made it worse. The volume of his cries climbed several decibels as the toddler screamed furiously.

Wincing, she lifted him up, holding him a little away from her body. The shrieking continued unabated. Denise squeezed one eye shut and kept the other fixed on the baby.

"What I said earlier still holds. Do not eat my face." Gingerly pressing the squirming little body to her chest, she rocked him until he stopped crying.

It took the better part of an hour, but the baby finally quieted down—for like a minute. The second she stopped rocking him, he started up again.

Maybe he's hungry?

Babies needed to eat regularly, didn't they? But would this one want milk or raw meat?

She squinted at the red-faced little boy. Both. She'd give him both.

Balancing the toddler on her hip, she dug through her bag until she found one of the jumbo-sized syringes she always packed. They were useful in case the animals were too young or weak to eat proper food and needed to be on a liquid diet. It would have to work as a baby bottle in a pinch.

Fortunately for her, the baby took the milk. Halfway through the syringe, he passed out in her arms. Moving like molasses, she set the sleeping toddler down as if he were made of glass. If he woke up again, she didn't know what to do.

Crap. What if he pooped the bed?

Denise tiptoed to the dresser and took a T-shirt from a drawer. She gingerly wrapped it around the baby's bare butt, wondering if he was warm enough.

With a feather-light touch, she tested the baby's forehead. It seemed hot, but maybe that was normal? It was cold here and she didn't want him to get sick. Deciding he needed another layer, she tucked a sweatshirt around him.

The baby rolled over and farted in his sleep. An exhausted and shrill giggle escaped before she could clap her hands over her mouth.

Too afraid to jostle the baby by sitting on the mattress, she settled down on the floor. When the sun came up, she was still there, watching the baby werewolf sleep.

Chapter 4

Denise scanned the aisle of the local grocery store, loading up her cart with anything in the baby aisle that was marked with a toddler stamp.

Diapers or no diapers? Would they fall off when the werewolf shifted again? And just when would he do that?

She eyed the baby, who was sitting contentedly eating raisins in the shopping cart, before throwing in a box of toddler-sized diapers. He had stayed human shaped ever since he'd woken up this morning. So far, he hadn't done anything wolfy or aggressive, not since last night. Part of her had wanted to believe it was a dream, but she knew better. There was no history of mental illness in her family.

Werewolves exist.

She had made herself say it aloud several times that morning. Denise was now acting caretaker of a toddler lycanthrope. She had spent all morning on her phone, trying to research werewolves. Most of what she'd found had been completely irrelevant. She didn't need to read werewolf erotica or watch any of the Underworld movies. No resources existed for her situation.

Denise had decided the unfortunate lack of how-to-care-for-baby-werewolf manuals wouldn't stop her. She would simply pretend the boy was a baby when in human form and an animal when he was a cub.

Hanging on to her practical side was the only thing that kept her from cracking up.

After spending most of her ready cash on a car seat, she and the baby headed to the cabin. "You and I are going to be okay, kiddo," she assured the drowsy toddler.

Denise wasn't as confident as she sounded, but the baby didn't need to know that. Sooner or later she was going to figure this thing out.

Whatever happens, I will protect this child-slash-werewolf, she thought, driving around the last bend on the road leading to her rental.

And keeping it away from the huge, muscle-bound man nearly bursting out of his army green T-shirt—the one currently climbing out of her cabin window—seemed like a good way to start.

Yogi heard the van's engine as soon as it rounded the bend leading up to the cabin. He jumped out the window, but the driver reversed and floored it, getting away.

All he had was a quick impression of a small, heart-shaped face surrounded by a cloud of dark hair. A woman had Oliver. Yogi hadn't seen him, but Oliver's scent was in and around the cabin. Instinct told him the cub was in the van.

Shit.

He ran to his Jeep, which was hidden around a clump of bushes.

His intention was to cut the other vehicle off before it got any farther, but the road was too narrow to overtake it. By the time he made it to the main highway, the van was already out of sight.

Damn it!

Yogi floored it, taking advantage of the empty street to fly over the asphalt. They couldn't have gotten far.

Chapter 5

Denise nearly spun the van out getting away from the cabin. Miraculously, she managed to keep all four wheels on the ground as she drove pell-mell down the unpaved road to the highway.

She'd only caught a glimpse of the man breaking into her cabin, but that brief impression was all she needed to know he was dangerous. He was massive, at least a foot taller than her five three. Despite the cold, he hadn't been wearing a coat—giving her an unobstructed view of enormous biceps and a barrel chest that tapered down to an enviable narrow waist.

The way he'd moved, slipping out of the widow so fluidly, pointed to some sort of military training. That or he was a professional thief. She wasn't betting on the latter. What pro-thief would target a random little cabin on a lake in Wyoming? Maybe a druggie would, but addicts did not look or move like that.

Was it Reliance? Had they found her? How?

Her van looked completely different. And if they had been on to her the whole time, why hadn't they busted down her door last night?

It didn't matter. She needed to dump this van and get a new car. Denise had more cash socked away in a safety deposit box in Cheyenne, but it was at least an hour away. Her plan had been to avoid cities while the baby was with her, but it didn't appear as if she had a choice. That money and a new car were now a necessity.

Denise had dozens of credit cards, some under different identities she'd carefully constructed over the past couple of years. Her inheritance had given her some serious advantages. However, living off the grid was the safest course of action for someone in her line of work. That was why she made it a habit to stash cash in various places around the country.

After Cheyenne, she would drive over the border to Boulder, the site of her next closest stash, to get that too. Babies were expensive...especially the ones who enjoyed a steak the size of their own head before their binky.

Scanning the traffic in the rearview mirror, Denise decided she'd lost the muscleman. She gave herself a little shake and apologized to the baby for the rough ride. However, he didn't seem to care about her driving. He was snoring softly. The baby continued to sleep deeply for the next several hours, even when she stopped to buy a truck at a junkyard she passed on the way.

Later that night, Denise checked them into a cheap motel off the interstate. She'd taken a room on the ground floor with the stipulation there was an open parking space directly in front for her use. Everything was ready for a quick getaway in case the muscleman somehow found them again.

That's not going to happen. I definitely lost him. And Max had laughed at her when she told him about studying evasive driving techniques with a disgraced police detective... Well, who was having the last laugh now?

She settled the baby in the portable crib she'd bought for its resemblance to a dog bed, then checked the battery on her Vipertek Taser.

A girl can't be too careful. She slipped it under her pillow and lay down fully dressed, just in case. There were more dangers in the world than one mysterious muscleman, especially in a place like this.

Denise drifted off to sleep with one hand on the portable crib and the other on the Taser. A few hours later, her eyes flew open when the window opened with the lightest of scraping noises.

Reacting on instinct, she shot from the bed, stun gun in hand. The dark muscular arm reaching inside the bedroom started to withdraw as she rushed forward, but not quickly enough. Flipping the switch, she pressed the contacts to his skin and blasted it with everything the Vipertek had.

The smell of burned hair, with a hint of cooked bacon, filled the air. Whoever was on the other end of the arm swore viciously and fell back.

Heart pumping wildly, Denise grabbed her backpack and the handles of the portable crib. She threw open the door and ran toward the new-to-her truck before skidding to a stop.

The hood was open, several wires haphazardly hanging out.

Fuck. She needed another vehicle. Spinning on her heel, Denise turned, ready to sprint to the motel lobby, but he was there.

The hulking figure stumbled in front of her, cutting off her path to help. His frame was so big it blotted out the light from the naked bulb outside the lobby door.

Denise pulled the baby from the portable crib, hugging him to her. He was awake now, upset at being unceremoniously yanked from sleep into the chilly night air.

The baby made his displeasure known, opening his mouth in an ear-splitting wail.

That little cry compelled her to move. There was no plan, no way to escape, but she ran anyway. Denise faked left, and the man fell for it. She broke right, heading toward a four-door Jeep with a soft top.

She didn't look behind her when other shouts went up. Multiple voices were calling out. The ruckus had alerted the motel's other occupants. A crashing noise signaled something heavy being thrown—maybe a lamp. Someone must have been trying to help her, but she didn't have time to stop and thank them.

Hurrying forward, she took out her pocketknife, prepared to slash her way into the cab, but when she tried the door, it opened. Buoyed by the stroke of luck, she jumped behind the wheel before anyone could stop her.

Sensing the danger, the baby shifted to a wolf and whined. Panicked that someone would see him, Denise shoved him out of sight below the passenger seat, stowing her backpack next to him to act as a sort of cushion. Without a car seat, it would have to do.

“Stay down, kiddo.”

She checked the visor and the seat around her for the keys, but there was nothing. Swearing, she reached underneath the dash, slicing and dicing wires by feel. But then the muscleman appeared in front of her, his features clearly delineated by the moonlight.

His face was sharp angles and flat planes—handsome in a savage kind of way. Even though he was wearing a jacket, she could still see he was built like a brick wall.

Denise shivered when he smiled at her. He raised a set of car keys and jingled them. They stared at each other through the windshield. The man opened his mouth as if about to say something when she finally got the wires connected properly. The engine started, transforming her adversary’s expression from smugness to shock. She threw up a one-finger salute and hit the gas.

Chapter 6

The Jeep was a war horse in disguise, but it didn't help her much when she didn't know where she was going. Denise took a blind turn, expecting to join the interstate highway, only to find the way narrowing. It unexpectedly turned into a dirt tract bordered by trees and high bushes. There wasn't enough room to turn the vehicle around, so Denise kept going. She hoped the road wouldn't be a dead end, praying there would be another turn off to the highway.

She never found out. A huge, blurry shape shot out from the trees on the left, leaping in front of the vehicle. Screaming, she yanked hard on the wheel to avoid hitting it, steering into a deep ditch on her right.

Denise tried to put the Jeep in reverse, but no matter how hard she pressed the gas, it didn't budge. She was stuck, the back wheels spinning in midair. Only a tow truck would be able to pull it free.

Hands slammed on the hood. She raised her head to meet muscleman's livid expression. Dumbstruck, Denise gaped as the now-shirtless stranger tried to incinerate her superman-style with his furious gaze.

Where did his clothes go?

A wail from the cub caught her attention. Still in wolf form, he yapped at her.

"All right," she told him, catching him in her arms. She threw open the door and shot toward the trees on the other side of the road.

Run. Don't stop.

Her feet flew over the uneven ground, stumbling over the rough terrain as she dodged tree trunks to get distance between her and the Reliance agent. Pain shot through her chest from a stitch in her side, but she held onto the cub and kept going until she was nearly doubled over, unable to catch her breath.

She didn't even hear her pursuer. The blood was rushing in her ears so loud it drowned out everything else. But something was chasing her, dogging her steps before overtaking her. It finally rounded on her in a lightning fast move—and it wasn't a man.

The wolf was deep chocolate brown with a white patch on the upper chest. Its malevolent yellow eyes were looking directly into hers...up until the moment it shook itself. A weird smoky shimmer passed over the wolf, and then the muscleman was there. And she could see all of his muscles.

Frozen in place, she gaped at him as he moved toward her, his outrageously defined body glinting in the moonlight. A little snarl filled the air, making her heart nearly stop. For a moment, she thought muscleman was making the noise.

She glanced at the little wolf. His teeth were bared, and he was barking at the stranger.

“Calm down, kid,” the man growled.

Holy heavenly crap. This was a werewolf, another one. “Are...are you his father?”

The man’s brow drew down. “No. He’s dead...so is his mother.”

Denise reflexively cuddled the cub closer, an ache of sympathy welling inside her. The baby boy was an orphan too. And he was so young. At least she’d had her parents until her teens. The cub might not even remember his mother and father when he grew up.

If he grew up.

She had no idea what the stranger’s intentions were. “Are you going to eat him?”

The man looked at her as if she were crazy. “No,” he spat.

“Are you going to eat me? If you are—I’m a vegetarian. We taste terrible.”

The irritated Adonis rolled his eyes, his head tipped back as if praying for patience.

“Well?” If she was going to be wolf chow, she wanted to know sooner rather than later.

Muscleman put his hands on his hips. “Actually, it’s carnivores that taste terrible.”

“Really?” Denise squeaked.

“Relax, I’m a vegetarian too. Well, except for steak, but who doesn’t like steak?”

Hoping he was serious, Denise glanced down to make sure he didn’t have any weapons before quickly averting her gaze. How did you forget he was naked?

The stranger didn’t appear to be the least bit embarrassed about his state of undress. His blasé attitude was particularly chafing considering she was the type of person who wore a T-shirt to the pool.

“My name is Yogi. I’m here for the boy. I’m taking him back to his family.”

Relief flooded through her. “Oh, thank God!”

Muscleman wasn’t a Reliance agent. “I didn’t know what to do with him,” she said, relief making her babble. “I mean, I could probably handle a wolf cub or a baby, but a combination of the two? I was alternating steak and formula for crying out loud.”

Yogi let her go on and on, apparently deciding that letting her run out of steam was the best course of action.

When he didn’t say anything, Denise shut her mouth and rocked the cub, abashed. He had stopped growling, but his little lips were still curled up and he was showing a distressing amount of fang. Why hadn’t Oliver’s family sent someone the toddler would recognize?

“Err, do you know his people? Are they...are they nice?”

Yogi hesitated. “I only know his grandfather, and that situation is complicated. Our families have a history. But he'd never hurt Oliver. Pack takes care of its own."

Pack. Like real wolves. She was talking to a werewolf about his pack. A naked—and ridiculously gorgeous—werewolf.

Focus. She was losing the thread here. Shifting, she rebalanced the cub's weight, turning him slightly so she could look down at his face. She knew his name now. "We haven't been properly introduced, Oliver. My name is Denise. Um... It was real nice spending time with you, but now this nice man is going to take you to your family."

Oliver whined. The sad puppy-dog eyes were killing her.

He looked so miserable, and it made something crumble in her chest. She couldn't just fob him off on someone else. The least she could do was check out his circumstances. His mother wasn't here to do it anymore.

"Maybe you could put me through to this grandfather? I'd like to talk to him."

Was it possible to get a sense of someone's goodness over the phone? Did she have a right to do that?

Doesn't matter if I do or not. She owed it to Oliver to try. At the very least, she could explain how and where she'd found the boy.

Her eyes had been fixed on Oliver, so when Yogi took her arm and started dragging her behind him, she almost tripped over her feet and dropped the cub.

"Hey!"

"Hurry up," Yogi said gruffly as he frog-marched her in the direction of the Jeep.

"Are you giving me a ride to my car?"

The grunt that followed was ambiguous, but Denise decided to stay optimistic as she quickened her pace to keep up. She kept her lips tightly shut when he nearly walked her into a tree, but scowled at him as he dragged her to a stop at the Jeep. He glowered right back when he saw the way the rear of the vehicle was in the air.

Did she owe him an apology?

It wasn't like she'd known who she'd been running from. Her only thought had been to protect Oliver. Nope, not doing it. He shouldn't have broken into her cabin and scared the crap out of her.

Why was he just standing there? Um, because naked werewolves probably don't carry cell phones, idiot.

Denise was about to ask if he wanted her to call a tow truck, but he held up a hand when she opened her mouth. He turned his head right and left as if checking to see if they were alone.

She was still wondering if she should call Triple A when Yogi put his hands under the Jeep's bumper and hauled it out of the ditch.

A low-grade buzzing like static rose in volume until she was having a problem processing other sounds. Denise swayed on her feet and blinked, holding onto Oliver a little tighter to get her bearings.

Yogi didn't notice her reaction to his show of inhuman strength—one done in the buff! He opened the back and started pulling clothes out of a black duffel bag. He was fully clothed in less than a minute.

She was still standing there like an idiot when he turned to her, a narrow strip of plastic in his hands. Before she could blink, he had snatched Oliver and set him on the ground. He had the strip around her wrists, holding them fast together, in seconds.

Denise found her tongue then. “What the flying fuck?”

One corner of his mouth turned up in a cynical twist. “You didn’t think I was just going to let you go, did you? You know what we are now...”

Without further ceremony, he hauled her off her feet, dumping her in the back of the Jeep before whipping out a second tie for her ankles. He picked up Oliver and lowered the flap, fastening it into place.

Outraged, Denise twisted, trying to sit up. “You can’t do this,” she yelled at him as he moved around to the driver’s seat.

For the first time, he laughed. Denise ignored the thrill that ran through her at the deep rumbling sound. “I’m serious. Hell, I saved him,” she protested.

Yogi settled Oliver on the floor of the cab. “And I’m grateful. Doesn’t change the fact you have to come with us now.” There was a shuffle up front. “C’mon, kid, cut that out.”

There was the sound of a scuffle, and Yogi swore.

“Bite him, Oliver. Bite him hard!”

Denise found the silence that followed unnerving. What if Yogi did something to punish the cub?

“You better not be hurting him, you piece of shit,” she yelled. “I swear I’ll kick your ass into next week if you’ve hurt a hair on his head...or, you know, the fur on his head.”

There was a long, drawn-out sight from the front of the vehicle. “Will you shut up back there? You’re making it worse. And I’m serious, kid. Nip me one more time and you’re riding in the back with her.”

The engine started, and then they were moving.

Holy freaking crap. She had been kidnapped by a werewolf. She was on her way to God knew where, literally like a lamb to slaughter.

Well, technically, Yogi hadn’t said anything about killing her, but what other conclusion could she draw from his ominous ‘You know what we are now’?

Baby Oliver was going to have to manage on his own. He was returning to his people. Her obligation to him didn’t extend to being hogtied and stuffed in the back of a moving vehicle.

And you just stood there and let him do it! Granted, she’d been a little shell-shocked, but still... She had to get away.

Denise shuddered, thinking fast. How did she get Yogi to stop this vehicle?

“He’s not going to stay a cub, is he? I mean, he’s too young to stop himself from changing back in his sleep or whenever else he wants.”

Silence.

“He’s going to need the car seat I left in my truck,” she called, experimentally testing her bonds. Yogi probably would have ignored her had it not been for Oliver.

There was more rustling, and then Denise swore she heard tiny jaws biting down on flesh. The long stream of blasphemy that followed almost made her smile. Instead, she braced herself as the Jeep made a sudden sharp right turn.

He didn’t say anything, but he didn’t have to. Yogi had taken the bait. She had to be ready.

Chapter 7

God, he hated when he was wrong.

By the time he pulled onto the highway, he knew he wasn't going to make it all the way back to Colorado with Oliver riding shotgun. The little cub hadn't stopped trying to bite him since he'd hogtied his guardian angel and tossed her in the rear storage space.

The little sucker knew where the vulnerable bits were too, not that Yogi had many...

As soon as the girl—Denise—mentioned the car seat, a plan formed in his mind.

If there was any way to get a cub that age to change back to his two-legged form, it was with food. Preferably full-sized doughnuts or candy bars, something that required human hands to hold properly. He would get the chair, then he'd stop somewhere and load up on the necessary bribes.

And somewhere along the way, he was going to find some duct tape for that woman's mouth. He didn't need to hear 'I told you so' for the next five hours, or however long it would take to get to the Avery homestead.

Yogi was determinedly blocking out what would happen when he took Oliver to Jessup Avery.

His father had blasted the Averys every couple of years like clockwork for the past few decades. If it hadn't been for Douglas Maitland's intervention, blood would have been spilled. Now his father was gone, but Yogi had no idea if the feud was still alive and well.

Don't be stupid. Of course the feud was still on. Werewolves didn't forgive or forget. The only karma they believed in was the kind that involved blood—drawing it from your enemies. Preferably in copious amounts.

Ritual battles to the death were a thing of the past—unless rogues were involved. Thanks to Douglas Maitland, Yogi was still a member of the Colorado Basin Pack, just like the Averys. Yogi could expect to make it in and out of Avery territory with all his limbs intact.

Probably.

And what about the girl? What was her deal? Her cabin had been filled with PETA literature and not much else. That meant she was one of those do-gooder types. But Denise had managed to cause him a lot of grief in a very short amount of time...and based on how quickly she'd hot-wired his car, he suspected frustration and regret was a normal reaction to meeting her.

Girl may as well have trouble tattooed to her forehead.

Of course, his misfortune was Oliver's stroke of luck. Saving an orphan cub in the woods had to be going above and beyond, even for an animal lover. How many other human women would have gone out of their way to do that?

Alternating formula and steak had been pretty smart. No wonder Oliver was so attached to her. The little cub was going to have a tough time without his mother and father. Denise finding him was probably the last break he was going to get for a while.

Although if things went as expected, Oliver might end up keeping her around for the foreseeable future...

What he'd told Denise was true. They couldn't let her go now that she knew about them. If she went running to the cops or the press, they'd dismiss her as just another crazy person making noise. But there were always a handful of true believers who needed to investigate every crackpot's claims. The pack couldn't afford that kind of attention—not in this technological age.

That reminded him of something. Yogi fished Denise's cell phone out of his pocket. He'd confiscated it when he put her in the back. He scanned the latest texts and photo roll for videos of Oliver. If videos of him shifting were now in the cloud, there would be hell to pay.

Well, he had gotten lucky there. There's wasn't any evidence Denise had photographed Oliver at all. But it seemed she had a boyfriend. Yogi eyed the skinny white guy and sniffed. The pair seemed mismatched. He didn't think such a wimp could handle the spitfire in the back.

Speak of the devil. The woman had been entirely too quiet for the last few minutes. It was probably too much to hope she'd accepted her fate and was going to go quietly with him to Colorado.

He got the answer to that a few minutes later in the form of a boot to the face.

Yogi grunted and dropped the car seat he was holding. In the minute he'd been away from the car, Denise had somehow removed the zip ties and squirmed into the backseat. When he opened the passenger door to set up the car seat, her leg flew out, a tiny hiking boot connecting with his nose.

"Fuck!"

She flashed past him, running at full speed for a human. Swearing under his breath, Yogi shut the door so Oliver couldn't follow her. And the little guy would. Despite the fact Denise was a different species, Oliver had grown very attached to her in a short amount of time.

It's the boobs, Yogi thought with a sigh as he started jogging after her. If he'd been a female, he wouldn't have these problems right now. Oliver's mother had taken him away from the pack shortly after her mate's death. The boy clearly wasn't used to males of his own kind anymore.

Poor Sheri had probably avoided the few she'd run into after leaving the pack. Yogi didn't really blame her for that. There were dangerous rogues out there. And pups Oliver's age were highly attuned to the emotions of their parents. They took their cues from them. If a parent was happy, the cubs were generally happy. The opposite was also true. If Sheri had crossed paths with an unfamiliar Were, she probably would have been afraid. Oliver would have sensed that fear and absorbed it.

This is going to be more complicated than I thought.

Up ahead, Denise managed to clear a rise. He could no longer see her, but he could hear the racket she was making as she ran from him, her footsteps pounding, leaves crunching under her weight.

Yogi stopped to take off his jeans and shirt.

His sister Sal might have had a point. Wolves needed breakaway pants. He'd always shunned them on principal. With his build, there were already too many Magic Mike comparisons. Wearing breakaway pants would simply enforce that stripper image. But it would make chases like these far more convenient.

He threw himself down, shifting to his second form with a big sneeze. After shaking his fur out, he loped ahead in a wide semicircle, cutting in front of Denise as she stumbled next to a large oak tree.

Had it not been for the expression of abject terror on her face, he would have laughed. Instead, he shifted back and grabbed her arm, dragging her behind him—her feet kicking up a cloud of dirt as she cussed a blue streak.

He whistled when she finally stopped to take a breath. “I know soldiers and sailors who swear less than you,” he informed her, trying not to smile.

Oliver's savior had a filthy and diverse vocabulary. Yogi admired that about her. In fact, he was almost starting to like the annoying little termagant—despite the boot to face. Maybe because of it.

“I'm. Not. Going. With. You,” she bit out, trying to pull away from him.

“Of course you are,” he said cheerfully, tugging her left so he could pick up the jeans and T-shirt he'd discarded.

She muttered something under her breath that he wouldn't repeat in front of Oliver, then she lunged. Yogi turned, his eyes flashing fire when she bit down on the fleshy part of his hand.

Denise was clamping down hard enough to draw blood, but he refused to wince. Forcing the corner of his mouth to kick up, he drawled, “You know, biting is foreplay among my people.”

She immediately opened her mouth and spit out his hand. Laughing, he swiped a bit of his own blood from off her mouth. He bent down so their eyes were level.

Staring into her hazel eyes was surprisingly...arresting. But he had to make sure she couldn't escape again. Moving very slowly, he ran his hands over her hips and around to her lusciously curved ass.

Denise gasped and slapped at his hands when he reached into her back pocket. But he withdrew quickly, tossing aside the small pocketknife hidden there. It landed far away, deep in the brush.

“You won't be needing that again,” he said before swinging her over his shoulder.

Chapter 8

Her self-defense training meant absolute shit. No matter how hard she struggled, Denise couldn't break the werewolf's grip. After one last desperate wrench to free herself, her hair tie promptly gave up in protest, snapping and letting a torrent of whiskey-colored locks loose. It spread everywhere, partially obscuring her view...but she could still see what was directly in front of her.

"Hey!"

"Yes?" The word was an exasperated sigh.

"You're naked."

"And?"

"And I'm staring straight at your bare butt!"

He stopped walking for a second before she felt him shrug—a move that nearly dislodged her from his shoulder.

"I hope you're enjoying the view."

Denise sputtered, too incensed to admit she was awkwardly bobbing up and down over what was undoubtedly the finest rear end on God's green earth.

Yogi kept her balanced on his shoulder when he stooped to pick up his discarded clothes, his arms like steel bands. Soon, they were back at the Jeep. Her captor put her down, but he kept one hand on her wrist, a hold she couldn't break, while he tugged on his pants. He shoved her into the backseat, corralling Oliver at the same time.

"Damn it, kid, go easy on the leather," he muttered, picking the pup up and dumping him in her lap.

Denise was distracted by the move, giving Yogi the opportunity he needed to tie one of her wrists to the pipe frame cage of the Jeep.

Furious, she tugged at the zip tie, but only succeeded in hurting herself. "Don't manhandle Oliver like that," she gritted out between her teeth.

Yogi scoffed. "Trust me, that was nothing to one of our kind."

"But he's just a baby."

"No, he's a Were cub. We grow up climbing all over each other and fighting—even with our friends. Trust me, Oliver is fine."

Yogi climbed into the driver seat and started the engine. They were back on the highway in a matter of minutes.

As the adrenaline wore off, Denise's anger began to chill. Feeling queasy, she shivered as her head started to pound.

Absently stroking Oliver's fur, she decided to pull the last trick she had out of her bag. "Look, I'm prepared to make you an offer."

Yogi glanced at her in the rearview mirror. "No offense, but I can get a piece of ass whenever I want. Granted, it's been a while, and most of those assess have not been as fine as yours, but I'm going to have to pass."

Her mouth dropped open. She didn't know what was more shocking—that he thought she was offering to sleep with him, or that he found her ass fine.

"I was offering you money, not sex."

"Oh." He paused. "Well, I'm still going to have to say no."

The pounding in her head was starting to get worse. "Don't say that until I tell you how much I'm willing to pay."

"Sorry, doll. There isn't enough money in the world."

"One hundred thousand in cash."

The car swerved slightly. Yogi coughed. "And just where would you get that kind of money?" he asked, glancing back at her.

"My trust fund."

Yogi snorted.

"Two hundred thousand."

"Look—"

"Three," she said, her voice cracking.

Up front, Yogi sighed. "Denise, it's not up to me. As children, we take an oath to do whatever we can to maintain the secret of our existence. Oliver's still too young, but when he's old enough to understand, he'll make the same promise."

Her lip trembled. "That makes it okay to drag me to your people so they can kill me?"

Yogi scoffed. "Lady, nobody's going to kill you. You're just going to be their guest for a while..."

A little knot deep in her belly began to loosen, but only slightly. "For how long?"

He was quiet a little too long.

"C'mon, tell me. I deserve the truth."

His massive shoulders rolled. "Until they know they can trust you."

She did not like the sound of that. "How long is that going to take?"

"I imagine that will be up to you."

Denise frowned. Some of her tension dissipated, but her headache lingered.

Shit. She didn't have her medication. She'd driven thirty or so miles out of her way to fill the prescription before her heist, but the pharmacy hadn't carried her meds. They'd had to order it. She was supposed to pick it up yesterday. With the recent insanity, she'd forgotten.

The headache was the least of her problems...

"Why do you keep saying they like that?" she asked. "Aren't you part of they?"

His deep inhalation was not comforting. "I'm just dropping you and the kid off. I'll need to check in with the chief and my brother and sister, but after that, I won't be sticking around."

The knot of tension behind her temples tightened a notch. Why was the fact he wasn't going to be there so unnerving? If she could get out of this car, she'd be happy to never see Yogi or his glorious ass again.

"And where are you going to be?"

He shrugged. "I have things to do."

Yogi was going to take her to werewolf country and just dump her there?

Denise was going to be prisoner for God only knew how long—provided he was telling the truth—and this guy wasn't even going to be one her jailers.

She wanted to question him further, but the pounding in her head was starting to get worse. Nauseated, she focused on breathing in and out, closing her eyes against the weak sunlight.

In her lap, Oliver squirmed and whined, adjusting until her hand was positioned on top of his head. She patted him, wondering if he could sense her pain. Dogs were often sensitive that way. Perhaps wolf cubs were too?

The Jeep hit a rut in the road, making her grit her teeth, a move she immediately regretted because it made the migraine pain flare.

The cub licked her hand in a clear show of sympathy.

Sensitivity must be something werewolves outgrow, she thought, opening her eyes a crack to glare at the back of Yogi's head. He continued to drive, ignoring her and Oliver.

Whether Yogi was going to be with her didn't matter. There were too many unknowns waiting for her at the end of this little road trip.

Denise was going to get the hell out of this car even if it killed her—just as soon as her head stopped trying to do it for her.

Chapter 9

Yogi glanced in the rearview mirror again. Denise had closed her eyes a while ago, but the way she was slumped over didn't indicate sleep.

Her mouth was tight. Every few minutes, she flinched as the car went over a stone or a pothole.

"It's not going to work," he warned, wishing she would sit up and open her eyes.

As much as he wanted to believe his captive was faking, he was starting to suspect there was something wrong. Denise was too much of a softie to ignore a pup. But she wasn't petting him or cuddling Oliver anymore, despite his repeated whines.

"Denise."

She didn't move.

"Denise."

Her lids cracked, but her gaze was bleary and unfocused.

"Are you okay?"

Denise hung her head and closed her eyes again. He swore and looked at the road ahead. Noting a sign for a rest stop ahead, he drove until he could get off the exit. After pulling the Jeep into an isolated corner of the lot, he got out.

Cautiously, he stepped around and opened the car door, making sure to stay out of range of any kicking feet. She could only play that card with him once. This time, he was ready for her tricks... except no little foot came flying at his face.

He reached in to put his hand on Denise's cheek. No fever.

"What's wrong?" he asked, giving her a little shake.

Denise's face immediately crumpled. She leaned over to one side and heaved, splattering vomit on the edge of the doorframe.

"Shit." After cutting the zip ties, Yogi unbuckled her, pulling her out of the car and laying her on the grass underneath a tree. The pup followed, pacing in front of Denise in a nervous circle.

Yogi cleaned her up with a crumbled paper napkin he found in his pocket. "It's going to be okay," he assured them, but he didn't know who he was kidding.

What the hell was wrong with her?

Denise mumbled something. He leaned down to catch her words, but she wasn't coherent enough for him to make them out.

"Are you sick?"

Nothing about her smelled of illness—aside from the vomit. But there was no hint of anything seriously wrong. His kind could pick up diabetes and even trace amounts of cancer, but whatever this was, it had no scent signature. All he could tell was that she was in pain.

"Migraine," she whispered.

Yogi relaxed. "Is that all?"

A micro-expression of annoyance tightened Denise's eyes, but even that seemed to hurt her. She covered them with her hand and groaned.

"I didn't mean it like that. But it's just a headache. A bad one, sure, but you'll be fine soon."

"Die a horrible bloody death," she whispered.

Okay, maybe that wasn't as comforting to her as it was to him. Werewolves didn't get headaches. Not unless they'd been bashed in the skull with something, which was more common than one would think. But he was genuinely relieved there was nothing serious wrong. Although...

"Fuck." They couldn't continue driving. Not if every pothole hurt her. And spontaneous vomiting probably meant the pain was intense.

Yogi exhaled and rocked on his heels, accepting the inevitable delay. They would have to find a hotel or cabin somewhere off the beaten track and wait until she got better. And he would have to find a pharmacy or something. Denise needed drugs.

The sooner he got her back on her feet, the sooner he could wash his hands of her and the kid.

"No offense," he muttered as he picked up his limp captive. But this was already more human interaction than he'd signed up for.

Undoing the car seat with one hand, he threw it in the back. He laid Denise across the length of the backseat, taking care not to jostle her head too much. Oliver jumped inside and onto her stomach.

"Sorry, kid, but you should stay off for now. She's not feeling well." He set Oliver on the floor and closed the door.

Yogi leaned on the hood and texted a few pack members, including the chief, to update them and ask for a place to stay. A few minutes later, he had the address of a no-name boarding house that was currently closed for the season. One of the pack's members was an investor, so he knew where the key was hidden.

It was a short drive away. Within fifteen minutes, he was at the apex of a circular drive in front of a sprawling Victorian.

Yogi studied the classic dormer windows of the old house, surprised to find such a structure plunked in the middle of the woods. The brief text forwarded by his pack mate hadn't given any details beyond the address and location of the key, but he imagined this house had an interesting history.

Leaving Denise to rest, he explored the Victorian with Oliver at his side. The dust in the living room wasn't terrible, but it was enough to make him and the cub sneeze. Luckily, the bedrooms off the central living room were in much better shape.

The house needed a little work, but it had good bones. Despite the fussiness of the gingerbread molding, Yogi really liked the old pile. It looked like a friendlier version of the Psycho house. He'd fantasized about living in it as a child—minus Anthony Perkins, of course.

After changing the linens, he dropped a glowering, but silent Denise on top of the big California king in the master. Feeling guilty, he zip-tied her unresisting arms to the headboard.

"I'm going to go get some food and something for your head," he said, motioning Oliver onto the bed so the cub could watch over Denise.

"Get bent," she rasped.

"Yeah...that's fair."

He patted Oliver. "Keep an eye on her. I'll be back soon."

Chapter 10

Lifting the opiates had been way too easy. The mostly empty grocery store had an attached pharmacy with one young and overworked pharmacist and an obviously fake security camera. In what Yogi considered his only lucky break so far, the pharmacist happened to be single and interested. It had been simple to convince her to leave her post to go find him something from the front of the store.

He managed to get behind the counter and grab the bottle of pills in less than a minute.

Yogi didn't know the names of specific migraine medications, so he stuck with the ones he'd seen mentioned on television. He shook a small number into his pocket and was back on the other side of the counter with seconds to spare.

After picking out more provisions, he drove back to the boarding house just above the speed limit. Though it had been necessary, he felt crappy over leaving Denise alone for so long.

Alone and tied up.

He rolled his shoulders, trying to loosen his stiff neck muscles. Just get back and give her the pills. Once she's able to walk again, take her to the Averys.

The tightening in his throat was telling. He really didn't like the idea of leaving her with Jessup. While he knew the Avery patriarch wasn't the villainous bastard his father had always portrayed him to be, that didn't mean he could be trusted to treat a prisoner right.

Guest. She'll be a guest.

Damn. Even he didn't believe that.

I need to talk to Douglas.

Yogi wouldn't take Denise to Colorado until the chief himself assured her safety and comfort. That last was becoming increasingly important to him. And why wasn't exactly a mystery.

What wolf could resist a hellion with curves that didn't quit?

What he needed was to get away from Denise as quickly as possible. Instead, he was hurrying back like his pants were on fire. Maybe the chief could have someone else come pick up his charges now that he'd secured them?

Except Yogi wouldn't even suggest it. Douglas Maitland had stood by him and his siblings through their recent trouble. Yogi owed him his loyalty. This one favor wasn't too much to ask, even if it was taxing his control.

Ahead, the trees began to thin as the road widened around the boarding house. He parked the car and narrowed his eyes. Outwardly, there was nothing wrong, but his instincts were prodding him. Denise was loose, and Oliver was with her. He knew it in his bones.

Yogi swore when he finally found the dynamic duo in the woods behind the Victorian. Denise had somehow managed to get the zips off again, but she hadn't been feigning her illness. Incapable of walking, she had apparently stumbled and crawled out the back door, her furry accomplice at her side.

Picking her up without a word, he dusted off her clothes and carried her to the bedroom.

"I hope you learned your lesson," he scolded Oliver, who was trotting at his heels. "She wasn't ready for prison break part two."

The pup hung his head and whined.

"Don't yell at him," Denise muttered.

He frowned at her, taking a pill out of his pocket and placing it in her hand. "Sweetheart, I wasn't yelling. Here. This should help."

"Don't call me sweetheart," she rasped. "What is it?"

"Something you can't get without a prescription. Are you going to take it or not?"

Denise grimaced, but took the pill anyway. He fished a bottle of water out of a bag and put it to her lips.

"There you go," he said after she swallowed. "Why don't you try to get some sleep? You can have something to eat after you wake up."

Her hot glare would have been intimidating if her eyes weren't glazed over in pain. In a few minutes, she began to relax as the medication began to take effect.

"You're starting to look stoned," he observed approvingly.

"Not going to tie me up this time?" she asked.

"No need. I'd catch you before you hit the door."

He smiled when she flipped him off. She's feeling better.

"C'mon, you," he said, herding Oliver to the door. "You're hanging with me from now on, you little traitor."

Oliver whined.

"Don't think I don't know who cut those zip ties," he told him. "I can see your teeth marks."

The cub yipped.

"Excuses, excuses," Yogi chided, closing the door so his "guest" could get some sleep.

Chapter 11

Denise Hammond wasn't rich. She was filthy rich.

Curious to see if Denise had the means to bribe him, Yogi had gone through her belongings. He had found an old Virginia ID among several high-end fake ones, figuring that one had her real last name. And he'd been right.

The pack's resident IT wolf, a female named Jania, had done a thorough background check. She'd dug up an article with a picture of a much younger Denise and her parents—a notice that described how the prominent couple had died.

Denise had only been sixteen.

The Hammonds had left their substantial old-money fortune to their only child. Denise had no other close relatives. Rather than going into the rich people equivalent of foster care, she had elected to spend the last few years before her majority in boarding school. There was no mention of her in the press after that.

Yogi didn't know which was worse, knowing Denise was a multi-millionaire or that she was alone in the world. Aside from the unimpressive boyfriend—the one who had just texted her about arriving safely in Africa.

He hadn't liked doing it, but it had been necessary to reply as Denise—a brief and impersonal message wishing him a good trip. He had no idea why this Max character was halfway across the world, but he was obviously a terrible boyfriend. Look at what had happened to her since he'd left town—she'd gotten kidnapped.

Ignoring the fact he was the kidnapper in question, he went to season the steaks and marinate the eggplant he'd sliced up for Denise. Afterward, he let Oliver out in the backyard to stretch his legs while he had a beer on the wrap-around porch.

He liked that detail. It reminded him of the porch around the chief's place in Colorado. This house didn't have the same hum of activity, but it was more relaxing without it. There was even a stream burbling just a stone's throw away.

Yogi pivoted at the telltale click coming from the hallway, frowning. Not again. He crossed his arms, debating going to investigate.

This time, the slight scratching sound was much closer. Denise had made it down the hall.

Maybe I should have tied her to the bed again. She wasn't going to feel any better if she didn't get some sleep.

Calling Oliver, he sighed and went to pick Denise up from the hall floor. She was too weak to do more than flick her thick lashes at him disdainfully.

“Here, take another half a pill,” he said, slipping the medication under her tongue. “Then sleep. When you get up, you will feel one hundred percent better.”

He hoped that sounded convincing.

Chapter 12

Denise bent over and put her eye to the keyhole. The only thing she could see was the dark oak paneling in the hallway. Keeping her balance was too much effort, so she knelt before falling over with a giggle.

It felt like eons had passed since she'd last tried to make a break for it, but it had probably been less than an hour.

Time to try again. Her head was feeling much better, although she still felt kind of loopy. Almost disembodied or drunk.

Denise didn't know what those pills were Yogi had given her, but it must have been the good stuff. She scrabbled to her knees, trying to get the doorknob to turn. It finally did on the third try. When she managed to get the door open, there was a tree wearing denim blocking her way.

Irritated at having to squeeze between the doorway and the tree, she swore a blue streak, something that made the tree chuckle—up until it bent down to help her up.

“Shit, sweetheart, you threw up again.”

“Hmm.” She had no idea what the tree was talking about. It was warm, though. Her hands were cold, so she tried to cuddle against it.

“Sorry, doll, under other circumstances, I would be all over that, but my kind have really sensitive noses.” The tree took hold of her shoulders and held her at arm's length.

Denise thought the tree was being too picky. “Can't trust fucking Ents,” she muttered.

“What did you call me?”

“Probably in league with the Orcs,” she spat at him, finally recognizing the walking tree from her favorite Tolkien tale.

Treebeard had betrayed the cause! If he had his way, he'd burn down the whole forest. I need to get wet or I'll burn too.

“I'm not going to burn anything, but maybe a shower would be a good idea. We can't leave you covered in vomit. Oliver won't get near you until you get cleaned up.”

“I don't smell bad,” she protested.

Denise's face crumpled, and Treebeard looked panicked. “We just need to give you a quick wash.

Oliver likes your natural scent.”

“But you don’t?” She sniffed. Damn picky tree.

“I like it a little too much,” he mumbled, steering her into the bathroom.

“Of course you do. I have the best pheromones,” she said, fitting the tips of her thumb and forefinger together. They tingled in response.

The tree scratched its head and turned on the shower before giving her a gentle shove toward the stream.

She stared at the sparkly water. It shone like liquid gold against the sunlight that poured through the window.

“Um...Denise?”

She reached out to touch the water, but became distracted by how puffy her hand was. She waved it in front of her face, the faint glow at the edges flaring with her movement.

Was that because she’d touched the water? Would it just make her sparkle or would it turn her completely to gold like King Midas?

“Denise, are you going to get in the shower? If you are, you need to get undressed.”

She tentatively reached out and poked the water. Just sparkly. That was a relief.

“Do you need help?” The tree frowned and put his hands on his head, quickly moving them in front of his face when she splashed him.

“We can play later when you’re sober. But first, you need to take that shirt off.”

The gold light of the water had attracted fireflies. She didn’t know if they needed the water to recharge, but they were getting too close for comfort. Did the fireflies bite? Was that why they were so tiny, like little gnats?

They started buzzing in her face. She started swatting them away, but that just seemed to upset the tree because he grabbed her wrist.

“You know we have to get rid of them. They could be bark beetles,” she told him. “You won’t like that—not when you’re all chewed up on the inside.”

There was a deep sigh. “Okay, my eyes are closed now. I’m just getting you started by helping you take that shirt off. You can do the rest yourself.”

Denise batted the annoying tree branch away, but it wouldn’t leave her alone until her top was snagged up and off her body.

Treebeard’s eyes were squeezed shut. He looked ridiculous.

“All right, that’s the most I can safely do and not feel like an asshole. Can you do the rest yourself?”

“The rest of what?”

“The rest of your clothes.”

Denise looked down, surprised to find herself in only her bra. Ugh. Trees were pervs. “Get out!”

The tree turned around. “I’ll keep my back turned, but I can’t leave you alone like this. You might fall down or drown.”

Fine. It was just a tree anyway. Denise stripped and got under the waterfall. She splashed around, finding some soap. Convenient. She took advantage of her good fortune to wash up.

She rubbed the soap up and down, enjoying the way the soap foamed over her dark skin.

“Shiny,” she said, playing with the liquid gold and bubbles over her chest.

In the distance, the tree groaned.

Denise washed and played, glad it was warm out in the woods today. Except she was starting to get tired. Slumping over, she leaned against a wall she hadn’t noticed before.

Treebeard took a quick peek, long enough to turn off the water. When he tossed her a towel, it hit her in the face.

So rude. Denise wrapped the towel around herself, but she was tired now. Yawning, she started to lie down.

The chilly tiles stung where her skin was exposed, but she was far too exhausted to care.

This is where I live now.

“Denise, the floor is cold. You need to get dressed.” Yogi loomed over her.

What was he doing there?

“I showered,” she said, looking at him through slitted eyes. She didn’t care what he was about to order her to do. Moving wasn’t an option. “It was grueling.”

“You have no idea,” he muttered before tossing a second towel over her. Standing, he added a third one for good measure.

“I’m going to pick you up now. You’re going back to bed.”

Denise shivered. Her brain felt fuzzy, “Aren’t I supposed to be on my way to werewolf jail?” she asked as he lifted her.

“We’re going to have to put that off. You didn’t react well to the meds. We’ll go tomorrow.”

It was only a night’s reprieve, not a stay of execution.

Worry about it later. She closed her eyes and fell asleep in Yogi’s arms.

Distressed yipping woke her up. It was dark outside the windows, but someone had left the bedside lamp in the corner burning.

Ow. It felt as if a freight train had run over her. Or a team of little leaguers had gone at her with their tiny bats.

Despite that, Denise forced herself to stand and walk to the bedroom door. The upset puppy sounds were coming from Oliver. She had to make sure Yogi wasn’t doing something to hurt him.

She was unsurprised to find the door unlocked. Why would her captor bother when he was able to catch her so easily? Yogi could move like lightning—and the way he picked her up like she didn’t weigh anything.

The one time Max had tried to pick her up, he’d grunted and set her down immediately. He hadn’t come right out and said she was too fat, but he'd whined about his back hurting for the rest of the night.

She found Yogi in the bathroom, but he wasn't using the steam shower this time. He had Oliver in the tub.

Denise took one look and nearly screamed. The pup was covered in blood.

"What are you doing?" she asked, holding the edge of the door to keep from falling. "Why is he bleeding?"

Yogi turned around to scowl at her. "It's tomato sauce. Oliver got skunked."

She frowned, blinking. The blood was a very bright, light red and slightly textured. "Skunked?"

"Yeah, as in sprayed by one." He turned around and scrubbed the tomato sauce deeper into Oliver's furry head. "As if I didn't already have enough to deal with," he grumbled, clearly put out by having to care for not one, but two people.

Denise scowled at the back of his head. "If I'm cramping your style, you could always let me go."

"As if you could go anywhere in your condition. You're only standing because you're holding onto the door. Now sit down before you fall again."

Again? When had she fallen the first time? Lying down on the bathroom floor didn't count. She had done it intentionally.

Denise wanted to bitch him out, but he had a point. She sat on the closed toilet with a huff, watching the bathtub proceedings with a wrinkled nose. There was a trace of skunk in the air. And didn't werewolves have ultra-sensitive noses? Where had she read that?

"Poor Oliver. How did it happen?"

"It was at the lake. We went while you were asleep."

"There's a lake?"

"There's one just beyond the trees in the back that's fed by a little stream. Looks like a good fishing area."

She sniffed disdainfully, but immediately regretted it. "Well, I'm glad you've found your next vacation spot, but forgive me for overlooking the location's many wonders. I can't really appreciate the view when contemplating life behind bars."

Yogi clucked his tongue as he rinsed Oliver and wrapped him in a towel. He thrust the bundle at her, then scooped her and Oliver up.

Clutching the cub to her, she tensed, preparing to be dropped. But Yogi didn't stumble or grunt. It didn't seem like he was exerting himself at all.

How strong is he?

"I told you, it's not going to be like that," he told her, carrying them to the living room. "In fact, given what a pain in the butt you are, I don't think your stay with the pack is going to be all that long. They'll be eager to let you go once they get to know you."

She narrowed her eyes, but her much-wished-for pyrokinetic ability failed to kick in. He moved around the room with fluid grace, not in flames, setting them on the couch.

Well, he is smoking, but not in that way.

Denise turned her attention to Oliver, drying him with the towel he was wrapped in. “You know, this would go much quicker without the fur,” she told him, rubbing weakly around his ears.

She was still feeling like death warmed over.

If only I had a gun... she wouldn’t do anything. Even to save her own life, she couldn’t take someone else’s.

Maybe he’s serious about the pack not hurting me. If the pack was going to have her killed, Yogi could have done it already. This place was isolated enough. If he had the urge to hack her to pieces with an ax, no one would hear her screams.

Instead, Yogi had given her medicine and taken care of her when she wasn’t able to do it herself. Plus, someone planning to do you in wouldn’t be such a complainer.

“Shouldn’t he be changing back by now?” she asked, drying the cub’s fur as best she could.

Yogi’s pants buzzed. “Don’t worry about him,” he said, fishing the phone out. “At his age, being skunked is a rite of passage. If it’s his first or second time, he won’t change back for a while. Our young feel more secure as cubs.”

There you go. He wouldn’t be explaining things if she was going to be killed, Denise thought, deciding to be optimistic.

She would go to werewolf-land willingly and do whatever she had to in order to win their trust... except being social and charming had always been difficult for her.

Too bad there isn’t a lycanthrope version of ‘How to Win Friends and Influence People.’

That didn’t matter. She would find a way. There were too many things she had to do, too many animals that needed her.

“I don’t suppose there is a way to speed up the process?” she asked.

“What process?” Yogi asked absently, still fiddling with his phone.

“The one where I get your people to trust me so I can get early parole. No offense, but I’d like to hurry up and forget your kind exist.” She bent to kiss Oliver’s fur. “Except you, kiddo.”

Yogi put the phone down, his chin puckered in thought. “Well, there’s one, but I don’t think you’re going to be up for it...”

Yet another man who underestimated her. She rubbed the towel on Oliver’s paws. “Just spit it out.”

There was another beep, and Yogi checked the phone again. His cheeks thinned as his expression hardened. “Never mind.”

Denise rolled her eyes. “Will you at least stop texting? Do I have to remind you that you’re in the middle of a hostage negotiation?”

Yogi looked up, lips flat. “That’s not what this is.”

“You know what I mean,” she snapped. “You keep acting like this isn’t a big deal when it’s huge.”

I may not have family, but there will be people who'll be looking for me—a boyfriend for starters.”

Yogi threw her an uncomfortable glance. “Yeah, about that...I’m not sure you do,” he said, showing her the cell he’d been holding.

“Hey, that’s mine. I thought it was yours!” Denise reached over and tried to snatch it from his hand. “What the hell?”

He handed over the black smartphone with no fuss. Confused and little bit startled, she snatched it from his hand and hugged it to her chest.

“I could call the police now.”

“But you won’t.”

They stared at each other. He broke eye contact first.

“Just check your messages. There’s a couple of new texts from your boyfriend,” he said, emphasizing the last word with obvious distaste.

“You should dump that loser. Trust me, he’s no loss,” he added.

Denise ran her fingers over the screen. She didn’t have to guess why she was suddenly getting this advice.

Chest tight, she hit the green message icon. There were over half a dozen messages from Max. After a string of selfies in front of the chimps he’d accompanied to Africa and some random elephants, there was a rambling message. One line leapt out at her—I think we should explore an open relationship.

She didn’t bother to read the rest. Denise set the phone down and blinked a few times to ease the sting of tears.

Well, that was humiliating. Not unexpected, but humiliating.

As if to prove things couldn’t get more surreal, Yogi sat next to her and awkwardly patted her on the back. Oliver turned in circles in her lap, a sure sign of agitation.

Under normal circumstances, she would have fought to hide her reaction. But she was too tired... and really, Yogi could go fuck himself if he taunted her about this.

Except he wasn’t doing that. He was rubbing her back. True, it was too hard and a bit rough, as if he was unused to handling humans, but it was the thought that counted, right?

Her sudden peal of laughter caught them off guard.

Yogi’s hand froze mid-pat. “What was that for?”

It was the tone of concern that overwhelmed her. She laughed harder, the sound tinged with hysteria.

She set aside a whining Oliver to wipe her eyes. “My boyfriend is such a shit that my kidnapper is comforting me. That’s how much my life sucks.”

“You don’t suck.”

“I didn’t say I sucked. I said my life sucked.” She collapsed on the couch cushions, totally drained.

“There’s a difference,” she added tonelessly, too tired to reach out and stroke Oliver’s ears. Fortunately for her, he did the work for her, pushing his furry little head under her hand.

Yogi took her phone back and started typing.

“What are you doing?” she asked, only half-interested.

“I’m texting this Max loser.”

She made a half-hearted effort to take the phone back. “I don’t need you to threaten him.”

He smirked. “That’s not what I’m doing.”

The swishing sound of a text being sent jolted her out of her apathy. She sat bolt upright. “What did you just do?”

Yogi’s smile was devilish. “I broke up with him for you—you’re welcome.”

“Are you serious?”

“Like a nun.”

Ugh. “You’re your sister’s worst nightmare, aren’t you?” She could picture the poor girl—wolf—now. He’d probably chased all her boyfriends away.

Yogi’s smile was blinding. “Actually, she adores me,” he said.

Denise jerked her phone out of his hand to see what he’d written. “I don’t want an open relationship, or a relationship at all, because I met someone else?”

“What? It’s perfect.”

She shook her head. “Werewolves obviously don’t understand human relationships. You probably just smell each other’s butts and decide to hump in the woods. Max is never going to buy that I met someone right when he asks for an open relationship. It’s an obvious face-saving lie. Do me a favor and stop doing me favors, please.”

Yogi ignored her butt-sniffing comment, his cheerfulness unabated. “Then let’s provide some evidence.”

He pulled her into his side, hugging her to him. Positioning the phone above them, he took a selfie. “There.”

Her mouth dropped open, but she closed it with a snap. “May as well show off the biceps while you’re at it—you know, to really rub it in his face.”

The sarcasm was lost on him. “Good idea.”

Yogi whipped off his T-shirt, revealing model-perfect pecs and a set of abdominal ridges that stretched down into oblivion.

Denise flushed warmly when he got back into position, curving his arm around her with his fingers dangerously close to her chest. She’d never been this close to a non-beer related six pack in her entire life.

He clicked the red button on the screen before bringing the phone closer to his face. “Well, it would be more convincing if you smiled, but this will have to do.”

The send alert whooshed again. “I’m going to make dinner now,” he said pocketing her phone.

“Make sure Oliver doesn’t go out again before he’s dry. Otherwise, he’ll need another bath.”

With that, Yogi left the room.

She sat there looking at the space he had occupied. That was either the nicest thing anyone had ever done for her...or the most devious.

“It won’t work,” she called, deciding on devious. With his superior werewolf hearing, he’d be able to catch every word.

“Even if we broke up, Max and the rest of my team will come looking for me!”

She didn’t bother to add that it would be because the others ran out of money to keep their operation going.

With that depressing thought, she picked up Oliver and cuddled him to her chest.

“If they do find me dead in a ditch, smartass over there just incriminated himself and gave the police a way to identify him, so that’s some consolation,” she told him.

Chapter 13

You do not want Denise Hammond.

Yogi had repeated that mantra multiple times since last night. Unfortunately, all those attempts to convince himself only seemed to reinforce his desire.

It was as if Denise's scent was a living thing, like one of those tangible teasing vapors from old cartoons—the kind that wrapped around, tweaking his senses and lifting him up until he was panting and drooling.

The universe was asking for a lot if it wanted him to keep his hands off her.

Too many times, he'd pictured himself biting her sarcastic tongue at dinner the night before. By the time the meal was over, he could barely concentrate on her actual words. He was too focused on her lips to even notice she was conversationally tearing him a new one in novel and snarky ways.

After locking her in the bedroom for the night, he'd gone on a quick run, followed by a very cold shower. He promised himself that by the time the sun rose, his affliction would be gone. That it was merely an aberration.

Yogi's willpower around the opposite sex was better developed than that of his peers. He wasn't a monk, but he'd been selective in his choice of partners, so much so that it had become a game for some of the women in the pack. They pursued him so often that wagers had been made over whether he'd succumb. Usually the winning side was the one laying odds on his restraint.

Except this time, he was rooting for himself to lose.

Yogi didn't know why that scrawny idiot Max wanted to see other people, but he had been around humans long enough to know they were frequently shortsighted and unappreciative of atypical women. If a woman had curves, then she wasn't skinny enough. If she was slim, she was too thin and needed implants to give an idealized hourglass figure.

Humans didn't even put real women on magazines anymore. Everyone was airbrushed and altered to the point that they didn't even look human. Models ended up looking like the fae, with their too-perfect faces and proportions that didn't exist in nature. Sometimes, even bits that should be there weren't, just like a failed glamour. It was unnerving.

Yogi knew a few of his kind who appreciated a svelte figure. But most werewolves were attracted to women with lush curves. Just like Denise's.

The idea of handing her over to the Averys on a silver platter was swiftly becoming an anathema.

It has to be done. Even if he somehow managed to convince Denise there were better things to do with her whiplash tongue, Yogi wasn't ready to settle down.

Stop thinking about her damn mouth!

After serving Oliver and Denise a big breakfast, he bundled them into the Jeep and headed for the Colorado border.

A little voice nagged him to drive in the opposite direction and head for the Canadian border instead.

Shut the f-up little voice.

To his surprise, Denise was going along quietly. She even offered to hold Oliver in her lap—although the pup didn't leave her much choice.

"Have a change of heart?" he asked after a few miles had passed. "Does this mean you finally believe me that being our guest won't be so bad?"

She picked at the fur on Oliver's ears. "No, not really. I think it's going to be a huge inconvenience. I have things to do, plans in motion. An extended stay in one place will put everything on hold. But...I guess I do believe that they're not going to bump me off or anything like that."

She turned and narrowed her eyes at him. "If I'm wrong, you're the first person I'm coming back to haunt."

It wasn't exactly enthusiasm, but he wouldn't look a gift horse in the mouth. "Everything will be fine. I'm sure you'll even be able to take care of some of your business interests from Colorado after a while," he promised before lapsing into a reverie of his own.

He was quiet so long even Oliver noticed. The pup barked at him repeatedly from Denise's lap.

"What's eating you?" she asked him, an adorable pucker between her brows.

"Nothing."

"Do you think they'll be trouble?"

He frowned at her. Had she guessed he was growing reluctant to give her up? "Trouble?"

"One of the first things you said to me was that there was history between Oliver's family and your own. I assume you meant the bad kind."

He was surprised she remembered that. Most women would only be able to recall seeing their first werewolf shift.

"Yeah, it's the bad kind, but don't worry. That won't affect their reception of you."

Denise stiffened. "Right," she muttered. "Something tells me they won't be rolling out the welcome wagon for me either."

"Oh, don't worry. Most of them will love you." Or at least, the single males would.

That was the problem.

Chapter 14

Denise felt as if Judgement day had come.

“Would you like something to drink?” Jessup Avery asked, looking down his nose at her.

The local alpha was tall and lean with a leathery face that bore multiple scars. Despite his lip service to the social niceties, his drawing-room manners did nothing to soften the impression his appearance made.

“No, thank you,” she murmured, silently counting the number of men in the room out of the corner of her eye.

Jessup’s house was a mid-sized cabin with several additions extending haphazardly off it. The central room was a massive kitchen. It opened directly onto a large dining area littered with a mishmash of tables and benches.

Everyone in Lunar Springs must eat here. That was what Jessup had called this tiny hamlet.

Denise desperately wanted to hold onto the easy bravado she’d had around Yogi, but couldn’t seem to in werewolf central. It might have been easier if there had been less men. Or if they’d been a little shorter.

Maybe the women are at work? The idea of the women bringing home the bacon to these hulking alpha males made her smile. She wiped it off her face when no less than six men smiled back at her.

To her relief, Oliver seemed to recognize many of the people. Yogi had explained in a whisper that cubs learned their pack members’ scents in their first few months—learned them and never forgot them. They could recognize an unfamiliar pack member from their scent even after years of absence.

But Oliver had been taken away, whisked upstairs for a nap after giving her a sticky kiss goodbye. Denise felt exposed without the comfortable warmth of his little body in her lap.

“Are you sure you don’t want to leave now?” Jessup asked Yogi, who was sitting stiffly in the chair next to her.

“I promised the chief I’d stay long enough to see Denise settled,” Yogi repeated. His face could have been carved from stone. His features were set so hard she was surprised he didn’t creak when he spoke.

“I’ll leave when she says it’s okay.”

She could feel the tension between not just Yogi and Jessup, but also Yogi and every other man in the room. Most of them were giving him dirty looks. The contempt in their eyes was chilling, but it dissipated when they looked at her.

What the hell had gone down between his family and theirs?

“I still want him to stay...” Denise trailed off as all attention was fixed on her again. “He’s the only person I know here.”

“If it would make you more comfortable,” Jessup offered with grudging grace.

“It would,” she replied quickly. Beside her, Yogi stretched, surreptitiously stroking her hand in reassurance.

Guilt and a flare of something else she didn’t want to name compressed her chest. She was starting to feel a tiny bit bad for insisting that Yogi remain with her.

“What happens now?” she asked, putting her hands flat on her lap. Now that they were finally here, she wanted to move things along.

“I don’t think I need to explain why secrecy is so important to us.”

“No.” After everything, she was crystal clear on the why. What she didn’t get was why they thought anyone would believe her if she ratted them out. Everyone would think she was crazy.

“If your kind found out about us—” Jessup began.

Denise held up a hand. “I said I get it...but this can’t be the first time a human has learned werewolves exist.”

Jessup’s smile was unnerving. “No, it’s not the first time. Each case was handled by the clan whose exposure was in question, which is why the chief has given me leave to decide what we do with you.”

“Only up to a point,” Yogi protested. “You know there are rules to this you have to abide by.”

Jessup’s mouth tightened a fraction, but Denise was starting to get annoyed too. “I already know I’m going to have to stay here until you trust me not to blab. What more is there?”

She gestured to Yogi. “He said there was a quicker way to get you to trust me.”

He turned to flash her a warning look. “Don’t go there, Denise,” he muttered from between set teeth.

Jessup grinned, acting as if she’d just handed him a gift. “I’m glad you asked...you’re unmated, correct?”

“You can’t ask her that,” Yogi protested.

Okay, she hated to admit it, but Yogi had been right. She didn’t want to go there.

“Nu-uh, no way.” Denise squirmed in her chair, eyeing the men with renewed anxiety.

“The chief was clear on this point.” Yogi’s tone was clipped.

“You asked for the shortcut,” Jessup said, holding his hands out expansively. “It’s a choice many women have made in the past.”

Yogi snorted. “It doesn’t work that way anymore. Forced matings are forbidden.”

“Who says it would be forced?” Jessup raised a brow. He turned to Denise, addressing his comments to her. “A heterosexual woman generally finds our kind irresistible. The average Were is strong, skilled, protective, and a good provider. It’s only the latest age of political correctness and ultramodern feminism that has made those traits less popular—on paper. In reality, a woman’s need for a strong male is ingrained. It’s biological.”

Yogi sighed audibly, but Jessup was just getting started. “You’re young and healthy. You do see yourself settling down and having a family someday, don’t you? Unless you prefer the company of females? Believe it or not, we can also accommodate that.”

Denise held up a hand, part of her unable to believe she was having this conversation. “I have a boyfriend.”

That didn’t faze Jessup. “But not a husband?”

Denise was tempted to laugh at his persistence, but this was too crazy.

“Where are your women?” she finally asked, blowing her hair out of her face with a huff.

“At their homes. But some communities are not blessed with an abundance of them. Were births skew to male. Luckily for us, we can breed with humans should the need arise. The vamps only wish they were so lucky.”

Her eyes nearly bugged out of her head. Did he just tell her vampires existed? “Holy shit,” she breathed.

“Enough, Jessup.” Yogi rubbed a hand over his face. “Denise is to be treated as an honored guest. Her discomfort—physical or emotional—is to be avoided at all costs. Those were the chief’s exact words.”

“Yes, but we both know what he didn’t say is what counts. And the quickest way out is in. All the way in. Besides, Denise must stay here regardless, so she may as well stay with one of the unattached males.” Jessup gestured to the men around them.

“You can bunk with me,” a big man in plaid offered with a huge grin.

“Why would she want to stay with your scrawny ass when she can stay with me?” another one said, slapping the man so hard on the back she felt the air shift.

The men continued to rib each other almost playfully. Denise’s stomach soured as she watched them. Her eyes passed over them until she glared at Jessup.

He waved at the men. “All are excellent hunters with good jobs. Pick one.”

Horrified, she shook her head.

Jessup frowned. “They’re really not so bad once you get to know them. I bet you’ll even like one or two of them. But if you’d like to see them in action—get a better sense of their attributes—then we can arrange that.”

“What the hell are you talking about now?” Yogi sneered. “Trial by combat isn’t going to impress a modern woman.”

Denise nodded emphatically in agreement.

“Actually, I was thinking something along the line of the fortitudo.”

Her head was starting to hurt. “What is that?”

“Part race, part obstacle course,” Yogi answered. “The oldest have puzzles and tests to get you from point A to point B. It’s basically like a scavenger hunt on steroids.”

She stared at them, horrified. “And I have to mate with the winner?”

“No,” Jessup assured her. “The winner merely has the privilege of being your host during your stay here. They are not allowed to touch you without your consent. Chief’s orders.”

That was still not great. “And what if this host decides to break your rules?”

“He’ll be beaten and ostracized from the pack or killed outright—it depends on the severity of his transgression.”

Jesus. Denise put a hand on the table to steady herself.

“Of course, we could skip that whole rigmarole if you pick one out now,” Jessup said, gesturing to the preening men.

Two of them edged forward, standing in front of the others as if waiting for her approval.

Denise didn’t move. She was even afraid to blink, lest it be construed as agreement.

“No?” Jessup rubbed his hands. “Then let’s get started.”

Chapter 15

“You’re leaving?”

Denise’s tone could have flayed his skin off.

Yogi was standing at the door of his Jeep, keys in hand. If Denise hadn’t decided to postpone checking in on Oliver after using the restroom, she would have missed him leaving.

He turned to face her, chest tight. “I was going to see the chief. My plan was to come back and see if you were okay with...”

“With whoever wins me?” she asked, a corner of her mouth curling up.

“With how things turn out,” he finished lamely. Yogi didn’t want to leave. He wanted to punch out every Avery who even looked at her. Except that would ruin all the progress he’d just made.

As tense as his reception had been, it had been a lot less ugly, and bloody, than he had been expecting. Jessup had even thanked him for bringing Oliver home. If Yogi played his cards right, he could bury this family feud now...except for one thing, of course. And it was standing in front of him right now.

Yogi put a hand under Denise’s chin so she would meet his eyes. “I need to explain something. For our kind, pack warfare used to be a way of life. Small grievances turned into big arguments. Eventually, those turned into challenges or outright warfare. Grudges got passed down for generations. The closest thing I can think to explain it would be to compare it to the feuds of the Scottish Highland clans. In fact, that’s our packs’ ancestral home.”

“And this is that big—the thing between your family and the Averys?”

He inhaled and nodded. “Truthfully, it’s not all on them. I can’t claim to be an innocent party.”

She crossed her arms and frowned. “You’ve gotten your hands dirty in this feud?”

“Well, thanks to the chief, no blood has been shed since I was born. However, there were some things—smears and innuendo I just let happen, mainly because I believed them. I don’t anymore. Now that my father’s gone, I just want this stupid thing over with. I have a younger brother and sister to think about. If I challenge the Avery’s claim for their right to ‘host’ you, it won’t be over. But I will if you ask me to.”

She sucked in a shaky breath, but she didn’t say anything.

“Denise...do you want me to race?”

She looked down, blinking rapidly. “Of course not.”

He nodded, half-wishing she had said something else. “What I can do is ask the chief to keep a close eye on the situation. If I tell him you’d be more comfortable being hosted by a female, he’ll ask Jessup to make a change.”

She wrinkled her nose and punched him in the arm. “Why didn’t you say so earlier?”

Yogi’s mouth twisted. “Because I know Jessup. After he moves you into the home of a female, a pipe will burst or the roof in your bedroom will spring a leak. You’ll have to be rehoused. This will go on until you show favor to one of the men. Then you’ll be pushed to move in with him.”

Denise’s lips flattened. “Oh.”

A call went up. Jessup waved at them from in front of a group of men. One had a remote control in his hands. At their feet was a red plastic cross with four propellers.

“Is that a drone?” Denise asked.

Chapter 16

Yogi was gone. He'd just gotten in his car and driven away. After that happened, it was hard to walk around with a hollowed-out pit where her stomach should be.

"Here you go." Jessup handed her a small tablet.

She took it with numb hands and looked at the screen. On it was aerial footage of herself and the men at the starting line.

"This is what the drone is for—to follow the race?"

Jessup smiled. "I admit, this kind of technology is beyond me. It's what happens when you get to be my age."

"How old are you?"

"A little over one ten."

She gaped at him. He didn't even appear to be middle-aged. "A hundred and ten years old?"

"We age well." He shrugged.

That didn't make sense. "But..."

"Is something wrong?"

"Why do you mate with humans, knowing they'll die so much sooner?"

"Because they won't," Jessup said, patting her hand. "Our mate bond extends the life of the women we choose, be they human or some other short-lived Supernatural species."

"How?" Denise was starting to feel dizzy as she tried to process this information.

He shrugged. "Just a few decades ago, I would have said it's magic, but now I would say it's both magic and chemistry. There are things that happen to a woman once we take them to mate—if the bond is true, that is." He turned to the men. "I believe they are ready to start."

Denise squeezed her eyes shut, trying to process all that information. "O-kay."

A gun went off, startling her into dropping the tablet, but Jessup caught it with a lightning-quick move. He handed it back to her.

"You still need this."

"Right," she said, taking it and trying to focus on the screen. "I'm surprised there aren't more of you out here watching."

Only a few people were with them. There had been at least four times as many in Jessup's cramped kitchen.

"They are watching, but from various parts of the course or on one of these," he said, nodding at her tablet, his gaze intent on the tiny moving figures on the screen.

She blinked. The men weren't men anymore. A pack of six wolves were running pell-mell up a hill that expert hikers would tread with care. As she watched, a black-and-grey mottled one was knocked off his feet by a larger brindled wolf.

Denise gasped as the wolf rolled down the hill.

"Don't worry. Dave will be fine."

She shot Jessup a disbelieving look. That fall had been brutal.

"See." Jessup pointed to the screen. "He's up and back in it."

He was right; the black and grey was on his feet and racing to catch up to the pack.

"They'll go up and down that mountain. At the bottom is a puzzle box with coordinates to the next location—which is across the gorge. Once there, they'll scale the highest tree to get the final route. There's a path that runs under the falls and down into the ravine. At the top of it is a flag. The one who brings that flag here is the winner."

She gave him a wooden smile. Under other circumstances Denise might have been flattered that all those attractive men were vying for a chance to be her host. They didn't even know she had money, which was the main source of attraction for most of the men she'd dated in the past.

Jessup kept throwing her expectant glances, and she wondered if he expected her to cheer.

Am I supposed to root for one of them? Seriously?

Even if she had been able to recognize the wolf form of any of the men she had just met, there was no way she could pick out an individual in that shifting and snarling mass racing through the forest.

She exhaled with a hiss, the sound blending with the sudden rumble of an engine. Her head jerked left, facing the source of the sound. In the next second, Yogi's Jeep came screeching to a halt a few yards away.

Denise's heart nearly stopped as he threw open his door. He flashed past them, shifting in midair with a deep-throated roar. She didn't see anything but a mahogany-brown streak as he raced up the hill after the pack between one beat of her heart and the next.

"Holy shit," she breathed.

Jessup clucked his tongue. "And I thought the boy was reasonable."

She grabbed his arm. "You're not going to go after his sister and brother for this, are you?"

His look was condescending. "Unlike his father, I don't punish the child for the sins of the parent. I actually think better of him for trying to get into this race. We've all smelled how he feels about you...but he'll never be able to catch up."

"How he smells about me?" What the hell did that mean?

Jessup started to answer, but another man came up and hailed him.

“Do you think we should send up another drone to follow Yogi?” the newcomer asked.

“Yes.” Jessup waved the man on. The teens at the starting line scrambled, getting a second propeller drone out of the back of a truck.

“Wait, you didn’t tell me how Yogi smells about me,” she said, trotting after the group.

They paid her no attention as they launched another quadcopter, scrambling to get the feed up and running. The drone zipped away, becoming a dot in the distance.

“I want to see that one,” she said, tapping at the menu of controls that bordered the camera feed in the center of her tablet.

One of the teens took the tablet and fiddled with it before handing it back. The monitor was now divided, showing the images streaming from both cameras. On the first feed, the pack had splintered, separating as the fastest and slowest sorted themselves.

Two wolves, the brindled black and a honey-colored one, were in the lead.

The second half of the screen was much harder to make out. Too many trees were blocking the way.

“Switching to infrared,” someone called out.

The tree-covered image stuttered. She could see a rainbow comet streaking across the blue and purple backdrop of the forest—it was closing in on the running form of another wolf.

“Whoa, wait. He’s much closer now,” she said, holding up her tablet.

Yogi was catching up. He was almost on top of the two wolves straggling at the tail end of the pack.

Someone whistled. “Damn, he’s fast.”

That was an understatement. Yogi was flying. He’d already overtaken half the pack. However, there was a big gap between him and the wolves at the front edge of her screen.

Jessup snorted. “Gus and Levi are still leading, but he’s determined, isn’t he? One has to admire that tenacity.”

Tenacity? It was fucking insanity. Animals had run themselves to death at lower speeds. Yogi could kill himself trying to overtake the others.

He’s doing it for you. Not only was he risking his life and health by acting like a maniac, but he was also potentially risking the safety of his brother and sister for her—no matter what Jessup said.

A few days ago, she hadn’t even met Yogi. Less than two days ago, she would have happily brained him with a baseball bat and left him in a ditch. But things were different now.

After more than a decade of being on her own, someone had taken care of her when she was down. He nursed her back to health, worried over her. He’d even sent that beefcake photo of himself to her douchebag ex so she could save face.

Denise didn’t want Yogi to give up the chance to bury his family feud. Not if keeping it going would hurt him or his siblings in the long run. It was too much.

Please let Jessup be telling the truth. The Avery patriarch had said the right things about not punishing kids for the sins of their parents, but it could just be talk.

“Wow, he’s almost there!”

The two halves of the screen were overlapping images now. The one on the right displayed the normal aerial view. On the left, the same area was shown in the shifting blues and greens of the infrared spectrum. She could tell which wolf was Yogi because he was glowing like a bright red coal, such was his level of exertion compared to the others.

The two wolves in the lead were running down a ravine, only a few hundred yards away, but the path was so narrow she didn’t see how Yogi could overtake them.

Except...he didn’t try. At a fork in the road, he ran in the other direction—not down but up.

“Where is he going?” Even Jessup was confused.

The glowing coal ran up the ridge to the top of the waterfall. For a second, he paced there, as if eyeing the distance from the top of the falls to other side of the gorge.

“No way! He can’t jump that. It’s more than twenty meters!” Jessup and the others crowded around her tablet, each wearing expressions ranging from shock to disbelief.

“Oh my God,” she squeaked, shaking her head. Don’t do it. Don’t.

Denise held her breath, clapping her hand over her mouth to muffle her involuntary scream when Yogi backed up to get a running start. He bounded over the short space at the top of the falls—only a few meters—before launching himself into space.

The blood in her veins ran ice cold. She shuddered as Yogi flew in a wide arc, his body an arrow shooting for the rocky outcropping on the other side of the gorge...a foothold that seemed miles away to her horrified eyes.

It could have been the exhilarating climax of a werewolf movie, but this was real life.

At the last second, she squeezed her eyes shut, tears stinging behind closed lids. There was no way Yogi would make it to the other side. She couldn’t watch him plunge to his death.

“Hot damn! He did it.”

Her eyes flew open, but she couldn’t see. The image was too blurry. Wiping the tears from her eyes, she blinked to clear them until she could see and confirm for herself that he was on the other side.

Yogi was now well ahead of the other wolves—far enough to safely shift and scale a tree. Jessup touched the image to zoom in.

“He’s got it. He’s got the flag.”

Un-fucking-believable! She couldn’t believe he’d made it. That he was still alive.

“I’m going to kill him!” The minute he crossed the finish line, she would wring his neck for scaring the crap out of her.

Instead of backtracking as she expected, Yogi shifted back into wolf form and veered left, now leading the pack around the falls in what she presumed was another route back—one that didn’t have him trip over the contestants trailing behind him.

“How did he even know where the flag was?” she asked, brow creased.

“He could smell it,” one of the teens chimed. Out of the corner of her eye, Jessup glanced at her as if to gauge her reaction.

Puzzled, she frowned at the screen. She could see a bit of cloth in Yogi’s jaws. It was bright purple. She squinted and hit the zoom button Jessup had used earlier.

“Hey! Not okay,” she snapped, glaring at the group around her.

Jessup had the grace to look slightly abashed.

“We needed something with your scent so we borrowed some clothing from your bag.”

She bit her lip to keep from bitching him out, drawing the tablet closer to her chest.

Yogi was almost there. The path back must be much shorter than the one to the falls. With that Hail Mary leap, he’d ensured victory—taking years off her life in the process.

Any minute now, he’d cross the finish line carrying the flag in his jaws—the purple bra she’d probably never be able to wear again. Not unless she wanted to sport the peekaboo look courtesy of fang-shaped holes.

Chapter 17

*H*is muscles were screaming when he finally saw Denise and the others waiting at the finish line.

A few more steps and he was there, collapsing at her feet with her brassiere in his jaws.

Yogi had driven a little over a mile before swearing and turning the car around. He couldn't let anyone else claim Denise. And regardless of what Jessup claimed, that was what the 'hosting' was—a thinly veiled attempt to snake his mate out from under him.

Trying to let her go had ripped his heart out. He'd nearly wrecked his Jeep getting back, then had run until every cell in his body throbbed and begged him to stop.

Now he was shutting down.

Denise hovered anxiously before she got on her knees and wrapped her arms around him.

Oh, that's nice. Shifting to his two-legged form, he took a deep breath and settled in her embrace, too spent to move.

"He cheated," Levi called out. Yogi cracked his lids, fixing a baleful glare on the Avery wolves just now crossing the finish line.

"How was that cheating?" Denise's tone was incredulous. "He caught up to you despite being like miles behind and then he flew—fucking flew—like a goddamn psycho kamikaze over that gorge!"

Levi began to argue, but Jessup interrupted with a raised hand.

"Enough, boys. It's obvious she's made her choice."

The Avery alpha's tone wasn't exactly enthusiastic, more like resigned and even slightly amused.

Levi scoffed and shook his head. "She just doesn't know any better. He's the first werewolf she met. It's classic imprinting."

Yogi raised a hand and flipped him off.

Levi started for them, but Denise scowled at him. She crawled around Yogi to put herself right between the two men.

Jessup laughed and walked over to join her. "It's clear these two have formed a bond. While we are disappointed Denise won't be joining our family, even temporarily, we should thank both her and Yogi for what they did for Oliver."

Levi and the other Were, Gus, shuffled and looked away.

“Thank you, Denise,” Gus finally said after a beat too long. “We do owe you for that—big time.”

He cocked his head and smiled flirtatiously. “And if you change your mind and decide to ditch this loser, we’ll be waiting.”

Yogi was within his rights to rearrange Gus’ face for that comment, but he was still too tired.

“Anyone would have done the same in my place. Well, anyone decent...” Denise said.

Jessup’s tone was wry. “I really don’t think that’s true. Most people would have left a lost cub in the woods, thinking it was his rightful place. For a real wolf cub, that is true, but Weres require more care. We can survive like that, orphaned so young, but we would never learn to control our dual nature without guidance.”

Distracted, Denise tore her gaze away from the others. “Wait, what do you mean by in the woods?”

“When you rescued him, I mean. You did do that, correct?” Jessup asked, a note of puzzled condescension creeping into his voice.

Her lips parted. “Yes, I did, but not in the woods.” She looked down at Yogi, brow creased. “Did you think I found him in the woods, too?”

Frowning, he nodded. “Of course,” he said, voice fraying a little in his exhaustion. “At least that’s what I assumed. Are you saying that’s not what happened?”

“No!” She held up her hands.

Jessup frowned. “Wait, so you didn’t save him?”

“I did, but he wasn’t in the woods. He was in a lab—a place called Reliance Research. It does illegal animal research. That’s why I was there. I...I rescue animals from places like those.”

“Fuck me to the seven hells,” Yogi swore as he grabbed her hand and tried to stand.

When he looked at Denise, she was nervously glancing between him and Jessup, panic on her features.

One minute, Jessup’s face was mildly annoyed. The next, he was a beast. His face contorted with rage, he whipped around and howled.

Denise gripped Yogi’s hand tightly as every wolf in Lunar Springs poured out of their houses, shifting as they ran. Even the men who’d raced against him shifted back despite being nearly as tired as he was.

Yogi held Denise close as they were surrounded—the center of a snarling mass of wolves. Only he and Jessup maintained their human forms.

“We have a major problem,” Jessup announced to the group. “Get the chief.”

Chapter 18

Denise's eyes flitted nervously from werewolf to werewolf. When Jessup had said, 'Get the chief,' she'd assumed the man would come out to the Averys, but that wasn't how things worked apparently.

She'd been hustled into an SUV and driven to yet another cabin in the woods. Only this one was more like a log mansion.

Now she was sitting at the wide oak table at wolf central, also known as Douglas Maitland's house.

It was a smaller group than the crowd of near-rabid wolves she'd left at Lunar Springs. Jessup and Levi were here, in addition to a few other members of the Avery clan.

The chief's daughter was also in attendance. She was an intimidatingly beautiful woman named Mara.

"Yogi," Mara called, holding out her hand.

Denise ignored the little pang in her chest when Yogi and Mara hugged warmly. The two had a whispered conversation, their familiarity obvious. How close were they? Was Yogi interested in the gorgeous lady wolf?

Of course he is, stupid. Look at her.

Yogi had only competed in the fortitudo to help her out. She'd made it clear she didn't want to be thrown with a stranger, so he'd raced to spare her that. It was the sort of thing the stupidly noble did.

Except he'd almost killed himself to win. She peeked at Yogi and Mara from underneath her lashes. He wouldn't have done that if he was interested in someone else, would he?

Mara's almost-luminescent green eyes turned to her and Denise looked away.

Hoo-daddy. Despite being model sleek, Mara looked like she could take Levi and Gus with one hand tied behind her back. Denise had never met a more physically intimidating woman.

If only she'd found someone like that for her team, then she could have left Max at home. Snorting, Denise transferred her attention to Mara's even more intimidating father.

And I didn't think they made them in sizes bigger than Yogi. Good thing she hadn't put money on that, because Douglas Maitland, the chief, was a stunning mountain of a man. She couldn't even tell how tall he was because it hurt her neck to look all the way up at his face.

Feeling like Gimli the dwarf surrounded by elves on steroids, she hunched down at the table. But as two final stragglers trudged into the room, Douglas turned to her.

“Explain how this happened.”

Even though she had been waiting for it, the order caught her off guard. Like a deer in headlights, Denise froze as every eye fixed on her. After a few blinks, she opened her mouth, but nothing came out. It was as if her tongue was suddenly too big for her mouth.

Why the hell do they all have to be so damn big? She hadn’t experienced stage fright like this since her high school debate against the nuns from St. Agnes.

He put a hand on her shoulder, and she quickly reached up to take hold of his fingers, a move she could have sworn made Mara smile. The brief grin was gone too quickly for Denise to be sure.

“I didn’t think to ask her where she found Oliver,” Yogi continued. “I assumed she’d found him in the woods, away from the body of his mother. But I was wrong.”

He turned to her. “This is my fault. If I’d given you a chance to explain, we might not be in this mess now.”

Denise squirmed, a little uncomfortable at having him take the blame. If she’d been thinking clearly, she would have realized they would be concerned about Oliver having exposed himself before she found him. It just hadn’t occurred to her.

If it had, she’d have tried to use the knowledge as a bargaining chip from the start...

She wasn’t tempted to do it now. Douglas was way too scary for those kind of hardline negotiation tactics. Plus, this mess had given her a chance to get to know Yogi.

“I’m not sure how big of a mess it is—I mean, I don’t know if the Reliance people knew what he was.”

Douglas stared at her. “This Reliance Research is in Wyoming?”

She nodded.

“And what were you doing there?”

“I was liberating some chimpanzees with my team. We had—”

“Why?” one of the hulking males standing against the wall asked.

“Why what?”

“Why were you saving monkeys?”

Denise met his eyes, but all she saw was genuine curiosity. “That’s what I do. Me and my team. We rescue animals from testing facilities.”

“Yeah, but why?”

No one had ever asked her that before. After floundering for an explanation for a minute, she decided to answer honestly. “Well...animals are generally nicer than people. To me, anyway. They deserve protection too. I know it’s not a popular opinion.”

“Why do you say that?” Douglas asked, his arms crossed.

“Well, most folks think I should be spending my time and money helping other people, but—”

Douglas huffed. “Denise, this is the last group that’s going to judge you for preferring animals to people.”

A few people laughed, but the chief held up a hand and asked her to continue describing that night. “Tell me about your team.”

“Three of us went into Reliance, but more were waiting to transfer the chimps to a nature preserve I own in Africa. Most of the team is there now, but the rest went home. We always split up after a job for weeks, sometimes months. Communication is discouraged in case one of us has picked up surveillance. We had already gotten the monkeys out when I saw Oliver in a cage.”

Douglas’ brow rose at the mention of her owning a nature preserve, but he let it pass. “Oliver was in cub form, correct?”

“Yes. And before you ask, I don’t know if they saw him change. We broke in after midnight. Only the security guards were there.”

Douglas tilted his head slightly. “What about cameras? Did they have any on him?”

She looked past him, trying to remember if there had been one she’d missed. “I don’t think so, but it was dark and I didn’t turn on the lights. The parking lot had one camera at the main gate, but we didn’t go in that way, so I don’t think it got us. I didn’t see any others. When we go in, most of our faces are covered so they can’t ID us even if we stumble onto a camera.”

“You told Yogi this facility wasn’t supposed to house primates. How did you learn that?”

Denise fiddled with a piece of lint. “Government records. There are lots of hoops for labs that do vertebrate research,” she explained. “The higher the animal is on the evolutionary ladder, the more paperwork is required. We compare that to a company’s purchasing records. I have a guy who hacks the biomedical supply companies for me. I get an alert when there are too many unexplained purchases.”

She leaned forward to rest her weight on her forearms. “Reliance Research isn’t licensed for anything bigger than a rat, but they were buying supplies no rodent would need. Big cages for one, and antibiotics and other drugs specific to primates. Not to mention the food they were ordering. Very little of it was rat chow.”

Douglas nodded as if that made sense. “We need to go back in and make sure they don’t have any evidence of Oliver’s true nature.”

A low rumble of agreement swept across the room.

“Should we call Connell and Logan?” someone asked.

“They’re in the middle of something,” Douglas answered. “This is on us, but we can handle a single research facility without an Elemental’s help.”

Denise caught Yogi’s eye. “A what?” she mouthed.

“I’ll tell you later,” he murmured before patting her hand and standing up. “Chief, I want to volunteer to take care of this. It’s my fault we didn’t know about it sooner.”

Douglas dismissed that with a motion of his hand. “If you hadn’t won Denise’s trust, she might not have confided in us at all.”

Denise blushed. The chief’s tone implied there was more between them than was actually there.

Well, maybe there was.

“All things considered, we haven’t lost too much time,” Douglas told him. “If any harm was done, it happened before you got involved. What matters now is determining the extent of the damage, if any.”

Several wolves nodded in approval, and she noticed Yogi’s shoulders drop a fraction as if he had been relieved of some burden.

“I still want to be the one to go,” Yogi insisted.

“First, we have to see what we’re up against. After the theft of so many valuable research animals, it’s likely Reliance will have increased its security measures. And if they’re aware Oliver is a werewolf, the place could very well be a fortress by now.”

It was worse than that. Denise hated to be the one to point it out, but she had to. “If they do have evidence of your kind, it’s also possible that striking this one facility is not going to help.”

“Of course it will help,” Jessup growled. “We can burn this place to the ground.”

“That would wipe all evidence of us, if it’s there,” another wolf added in a matter-of-fact tone.

Mara held up her hands. “Let’s not go off half-cocked. We need to be strategic about this.”

She gestured at Denise. “What she was about to point out is that Reliance might have passed on whatever information it had on Oliver already.”

Denise nodded quickly. “Yes, that’s exactly what I mean. Reliance is a small facility, but they’re owned by a shell corporation. My guy tried to follow the breadcrumbs up the chain—to put a name to the parent company. However, it got too convoluted and he lost the thread. Given that setup, chances are good that a big conglomerate now has proof werewolves exist.”

They hated hearing that. One or two men even growled.

Douglas waved at them to shut up. “Calm down, everyone. If the worst has occurred, we’ll deal with it. It wouldn’t be the first time the powers that be have discovered our existence.”

Denise’s eyes nearly bugged out of her head. “Like the government? What happened?”

Mara drummed her fingers on the table. “Let’s just say certain levels of the military are aware of us. It’s an old, but well-kept, secret, one that’s been passed down certain echelons of power.”

Yogi nodded, rubbing Denise’s back absently. “Things were pretty dicey for a while. A long time ago, we cut a deal. Weres make excellent soldiers—the best in the world. If they treat us with respect, that is.”

“And if they piss us off, we make the worst enemies,” Levi added.

“Occasionally—usually when a new administration comes into power—some smartass will want to use us in ways we find...objectionable. They find out this a bad idea fairly quickly,” Douglas finished before returning to the current problem.

“I’m going to call in some outside help on this one,” he said. “Our IT people are excellent for most purposes, but we have an unknown entity at play here and we’re going to want the best hacker we can get our hands on. One we can trust.”

Mara scowled. “You don’t mean who I think you mean, right?”

The chief’s eyes twinkled. “He’s not one of us, but he’s a known quantity, just the contradiction we need—a dependable mercenary.”

“Mercenary being the operative word here.” Mara’s lack of enthusiasm was clear. “He’ll charge us the earth and will insist on leading the op, not just being a part of it.”

“That’s not necessarily a terrible thing,” Douglas pointed out. “He has the experience to organize this. And, like a true mercenary, once we pay him, he won’t ask any questions.”

“Who are you talking about?” Denise asked.

Mara’s mouth thinned. “Another human. A total butthead.”

“Mara.” The chief sounded more amused than angry.

“No offense,” Mara said to Denise. “I don’t mean all humans are buttheads. This one’s a prize, though.”

Denise smiled. “No offense taken. What’s this butthead’s name?”

Yogi laughed. “She’s talking about Jack. Jack Buchanan.”

Chapter 19

As expected, Jack Buchanan did insist on taking charge. Having worked under him many times in the past, Yogi didn't mind, not when Jack had backed him up about including Denise in the op.

At first, Douglas hadn't wanted to let her take part. Though he appreciated what she'd done to bring the problem to their attention, Denise would be an outsider until Yogi claimed her...which hadn't happened yet despite some positive signs in that direction.

The chief had wanted Mara on the mission—insisting her combat training would be invaluable. Both Jack and Yogi had argued that point. Their goal wasn't to fight. A surgical strike by a three-person team would be more efficient.

Plus, Denise had more experience breaking into secure facilities. She was familiar with the layout at Reliance, and could point out any changes made to the security apparatus in response to the previous burglary. In the end, Denise came and Mara stayed home.

Denise was currently sitting in a van a few clicks away while Yogi did a circuit around the edge of the Reliance campus. He was wearing a camera, recording everything so she could point out any changes to the exterior of the grounds. Meanwhile, Jack was working his hacker mojo on anything and everything Reliance.

They didn't have a very big internet presence. But Jack had found out one interesting thing. Reliance was a subsidiary of the Denon Corporation, a multinational conglomerate that had been in the news last year.

His circuit done, Yogi headed to the van where Jack was waiting with Denise for his report and the footage he'd captured.

Handing over the reins should have bothered him more, but despite his upbringing, Yogi didn't feel the need to be the one calling the shots. It wasn't in his nature.

His father had detested his lack of ambition—his refusal to fight for fun or to make a point. For so many wolves, that kind of constant need for conflict was in their blood.

Yogi had always been a little different. He'd always believed that he'd probably be a lone wolf if he hadn't have had family ties.

But that was before Denise. If combat challenge over a woman was still sanctioned, Yogi would have torn Levi and Gus apart to keep either of them from being her ‘host’. That had been the first fight he hadn’t been prepared to lose, family feud be damned.

And Denise would have fought for him as well. Remembering the instinctive way she had put herself between him and Levi when he’d been vulnerable after the race made him smile.

Plus, she desired him. He’d seen the little signs of her attraction—had smelled her arousal. Once this mess was behind them, they’d spend some time alone. Then nature would take its course...with his help.

Yogi paused halfway up the hill as the truth settled in his gut. Quite unexpectedly, he had found a purpose—his mate.

Even her cause was something he could get behind. Spending their time rescuing animals was something he could picture himself being involved in. Furthermore, it was something he wanted to do. When was the last time he had said that about anything?

“Are you on your way back yet?” Jack’s voice broke into the silence.

Yogi adjusted his earpiece. “Yes, I’m three and half minutes out. Are you at the van now?”

“Yeah.” There was a chuckle. “And thanks for the exact update. See you in a few.”

It was a good thing Mara wasn’t here. Jack was all business in a clinch, but the rest of the time, he was as loose as a leaf on the wind. The chief’s daughter couldn’t stand him.

Mara, while fun in her own way, was a total type-A personality, organized and serious to a fault. She and Jack were oil and water.

Yogi relaxed, slowing his pace. It was hard to dislike the merc, but Mara somehow managed. Jack was a classic California-surfer type with the tan and sun-streaked hair to match. His easygoing personality won him friends and landed him tons of women...and he was alone with Denise.

Get moving, stupid.

Quickening his pace, Yogi hustled the rest of the way to the van, an old police surveillance vehicle Jack had bought and upgraded for his domestic work.

Yogi shouldn’t have worried. The look in Denise’s eyes when he opened the van door warmed him to his toes.

It was weird how the right person filled the empty spaces inside.

“Earth to Yogi.”

His attention snapped to Jack. The man was sitting at one of the vehicle’s two computer terminals with his hand out. Yogi took the camera off and handed it to him.

Jack’s ice-blue eyes narrowed at him. “Shenanigans can wait until after the op. Don’t get distracted now.”

“Pot meet kettle,” Yogi replied as Jack turned to download the footage. Though technically Jack hadn’t been to blame, there had been more than one occasion when a woman hitting on him had messed with one of his carefully crafted timelines.

Like flies to honey. Pale, watered-down human honey.

Jack ignored him, pushing buttons to download the surveillance footage. After a burst of static, the playback started on the monitors.

A blushing Denise turned in her chair, her attention fixed on the screen. “I take it you two have worked together before?”

“We have,” Yogi answered, not elaborating. Denise didn’t need to know about that night he and Jack spent in Guatemala.

Jack snickered. “Yogi and me go way back, but not as far back as Connell Maitland and me.” He glanced at Denise, his quick eyes taking in her curves with a little too much appreciation.

He ignored Yogi’s surreptitious kick. “How did you two meet?”

Denise looked up from the monitor with wide eyes. “Er...”

“We met here in Wyoming.”

Jack’s lips turned up at the corner, his attention fixed on Denise’s hesitant expressions. “Really, when?”

“Recently,” Yogi said repressively, his tone inviting Jack to take the hint and shut up.

“And you are the one who started this animal rescue operation? Any idea why Douglas Maitland is so keen on shutting this place down?”

“You’re not supposed to shut it down,” Yogi reminded him. “Just copy their research data before wiping it.”

Jack shrugged. “Not much of a difference if you ask me. Is there a reason Papa Maitland is jumping on Denise’s bandwagon?” He directed his question to Denise, but she smiled and turned back to the screen.

So much for Jack not asking any questions. “His reasons are his own,” Yogi said, infusing a this-discussion-is-closed tone to his words.

“You and Connell. Always so tight-lipped,” Jack murmured.

“Would you rather we took our business elsewhere?” Yogi asked.

“Jeez. The entire lot of you are so touchy,” Jack grumbled. His mouth opened before abruptly closing. He nodded at the screen behind Denise. “Was that utility box there before? It looks new.”

She squinted at it. “I don’t remember it. You may be right.”

Jack hummed and typed something on his terminal.

“Yeah, high-end from what I can tell, but if I’m right, we can use that.”

“How?” she asked.

“I’m familiar with this model. It transmits over Wi-Fi, which means it is susceptible to my magic.” He turned his back, the sound of rapid-fire typing filling the air. “Why don’t you two go grab something to eat? I’m going to keep at this and see what holes I can find. We can meet tonight and form our entry plan.”

Yogi didn’t need to be told twice. Eager to be alone with Denise, he reached out and tugged her from the chair. She took his hand, waving goodbye to Jack.

“See you at the hotel,” Yogi said, ignoring the merc’s knowing look. He climbed behind the wheel of his Jeep, which he’d brought along in case they needed to separate for whatever reason.

Once Denise was buckled into the passenger seat, he started down the road, spraying a cloud of dirt in his eagerness to get out of there.

“Where are we going?”

Yogi glanced at her. She looked good enough to eat in her black leggings and dark navy sweater. What he really wanted was to take her back to his hotel room, but that would have been rushing things.

“Let’s find a steakhouse.”

She groaned. “How did I not guess you would say that?”

“One with a salad bar,” he amended. It wasn’t like they’d find a vegetarian restaurant in this neck of the woods. Although if they managed to, he’d go there for Denise.

Damn. It must be love.

Chapter 20

Denise found little to laugh about later that night when Jack told her she had to stay in the van while he and Yogi went into Reliance.

“You can’t leave me behind!”

Jack’s tongue pushed his lower lip out. “From what I discovered earlier, that place has doubled the number of security guards and added at least four new cameras, one on each entrance. More of us going in means more of a chance we’re going to get caught.”

Yogi crossed his arms. “We have to go in? You can’t hack them from the outside?”

“No. It’s a closed system, networked only to the other computers in the building according to the contracts signed with their IT company—which I was able to find. The good news is that most any computer terminal inside should give us what we need. But we have to avoid those guards.”

Jack’s bright golden features darkened. “I get that, but it’s my reputation on the line here—”

“I’ll keep her with me,” Yogi offered.

Denise beamed at him, but Jack wasn’t having it. He put his hands on his hips. “Not good enough, I’m afraid. If she goes—and that’s still a big if—then she stays with me. That’s the only way I can guarantee she won’t give us up if she gets pinched.”

“I wouldn’t do that. In fact, it’s usually me saying that to new team members.”

Jack cocked his head at her. “Forgive me for saying this, but I can’t take your word. Yogi, I know. We’ve worked together on and off for years. He’s vouched for you and I trust him, but I can’t blindly extend that to you. If you go in, you stick to me like a cheap suit. This way, you getting caught is not even a question.”

Denise could tell Yogi didn’t like that from the firm set of his jaw, but he eventually nodded.

“Excellent.” She smiled and went to get her backpack.

Earlier, Yogi had taken her to her rental cabin so she could grab some clothes and supplies. Opening her bag, she took out her utility belt and wrapped it around her waist, adjusting the built-in sleeve that held her lock-picking set before it slipped out.

Jack whistled. “Nice. What’s in that little pocket?” he asked, pointing.

“Gourmet dog treats. You’d be surprised how many animals will eat them. These are infused with a strong sedative. I always carry them—in case the animals I’m trying to rescue give me trouble.”

“And that other black-and-green canister?”

“Bear mace.”

Yogi snickered. “Works for me. Let’s go.”

Jack grunted and picked up his own bag. She’d seen him stow his laptops, rope, and an assortment of weapons she didn’t want to examine too closely inside it.

Even though she didn’t need help, she let Yogi adjust the straps of her backpack before fixing her half-balaclava mask over her mouth and nose.

Yogi gave her a thumb’s-up before they moved out.

She trailed after the men, glad Jack hadn’t asked about the nondescript lipstick-sized tube next to the bear spray. That one was there in case things went sideways.

Every girl is entitled to at least one secret weapon.

Chapter 21

The interior of the building hadn't changed at all as far as she could tell. It was still a sterile utilitarian workplace for humans and a hellhole for animals.

"I don't believe this," she hissed at Jack and Yogi. "They've got another chimp!"

She was looking over Jack's shoulder as he typed like a demon on a computer in one of the lab's few offices. He'd pulled up the security feeds on the screen and had a command-line terminal floating over it.

Most of the researchers at the facility had desks in the lab spaces, not far from their work benches, but there were a few private offices reserved for senior scientists and their clerical personnel. They were in the one marked, ironically, chief.

The quality of the office chair told her this was where the big boss sat. Denise didn't think it was a coincidence that there was no name or personal effects. What Reliance was doing was illegal, and whoever was calling the shots was aware of that. He or she obviously didn't want their name associated with whatever they were doing.

Maybe I should have dug deeper. She should have figured out exactly what they were doing with the chimps and other animals. Just getting the records they possessed for the animals they weren't supposed to have had been enough for her to intervene. However, after seeing how carefully anonymous this office was, Denise had to wonder what other diabolical acts Reliance was up to.

I hope the spineless little worms who run this place shit their pants when the chimps went missing.

Denise gritted her teeth, eyeing the door. The hallway outside it led to the main lab space, where the lone chimp was being kept.

"Don't even think about it," Yogi warned. He was perched on the desk, looking like the world's hottest paperweight.

"But—"

"No, Denise," he said gently. "Jack hasn't turned off the cameras so we can keep an eye on the guards. Which means the security office can see what we see. If you go get that animal now, the rent-a-cops will come running."

Jack grunted in agreement. "Douglas said the data is a priority. We'll look at the cage after we're through here, once we don't need the feeds anymore."

Denise rocked on her heels—she wasn't sure why she had to wait. The camera was above the door to the lab, positioned to get the best view of the room. If she stood directly under it, she could get a closer look at the cage without stepping into the video's frame. She could figure out which type of cage they were dealing with...

Without lifting his head, Jack swore. "There's a guard entering the building. He's supposed to be two buildings over. Not sure why he deviated routes. We may need to take him out of the picture before he stumbles over us in here."

Yogi hopped off the desk. "I'll take care of it."

"You don't mean in a permanent way, right?" Denise felt compelled to ask. Even though she wasn't too fond of the people who voluntarily worked in places like this, she understood it was a just paycheck to most of them.

"Please," Yogi said dismissively before walking silently from the room, moving quickly against the wall to avoid the hallway cam. In seconds, he had melted away into the darkness.

"That did not answer my question," Denise said, aware Jack wasn't paying her any mind.

He was still tapping away, commands flying across his screen. "Starting the download now," he murmured, his eyes fixed forward.

Denise ran her teeth over her lower lip. Yogi would kill her if she went to check on the chimp... but the lab was literally just a few steps away, in the opposite direction of the encroaching guard.

I could just take a quick peek. She would be back in less than a minute.

The sound of the clacking keyboard covered the sounds of her footsteps. She was at the door of the lab a scant thirty second later, the night vision monocular she'd borrowed from Jack in her hand.

Those fuckers! Now that she was close enough, Denise could see the cage clearly. This one was set on a bench with an oversized lock, not a digital one. Instead, it was a thick commercial-grade padlock.

That wasn't the issue. Her bolt cutters could take care of the lock. However, under the magnification of her monocular, she could see a thin wire running along the mechanism, one that had no business being there.

The damn thing was booby-trapped. If the door was opened, it would trigger something. An alarm probably. But why would they bother to booby trap the cage... Unless they were expecting us to come back.

Fluorescent light flooded the room as someone flipped the switch on. "Stop right there!"

Denise pivoted, coming face to face with an armed security guard.

For a rent-a-cop, the guy pointing a gun at her was massive. This guy rivaled even Yogi in height, which was the only reason for what she did next.

She dove into a forward tumble, rolling in a little ball—right through the giant's legs.

"Hey, you little bi—"

He didn't get to finish his sentence. Mid-tumble, she had grasped the first cylinder she could reach on her belt before shooting to her feet. The giant got a mouthful of bear spray before he could aim his gun.

"Argh!" The man dropped his gun as his hands flew to his neck. Coughing and choking, he bent low enough for her to get him again, this time in the eyes.

Kicking the gun away, Denise reached into her pocket for the zip ties she had snagged from Yogi's pack.

"Sorry about the shot in the mouth. If I had been able to reach with the first try, I would have only gotten your face, but you're too tall."

Darting in and out, she worked quickly to tie his hands together. He tried to kick out at her, but she was too quick for his blindly flailing feet. To be safe, Denise used one of the longer ties to bind his ankles.

If any of the other guards were near—and she would bet her fortune they were—they would have heard this guard's shouts and coughs.

Yogi and Jack were going to kill her if she'd just alerted the cavalry. Standing on her tiptoes, she checked the window built into the door before running back down the way she'd come. Denise skidded to a stop as she rounded the corner.

In front of her was another hulking security guard and a man in a suit. They were standing in front of the open office door where Jack and Yogi were, their hands held up.

Denise ducked back around the corner before peeking out again. Of course. Hulk number two was holding a gun on them.

Fuck-a-doodle-do. If Hulk two didn't have a gun, she was sure Yogi could take him. His speed and reflexes were supernatural.

But the guard did have a gun, so what was she supposed to do now? If she charged them, the guy might turn and point the gun at her. The distraction would give Yogi a chance to take him down, but it would almost definitely get her shot in the process.

"What are you doing in my office?"

Denise snapped her attention from the Hulk to the man in the suit. He had said that. He was the head scientist!

The man wasn't what she pictured. A spare figure in a tailored suit, he wasn't wearing glasses or a lab coat. Barely taller than she was, he stood with his hands on his hips, managing to convey his supercilious disdain despite the fact his back was to her.

He didn't seem at all intimidated by the very large men who had broken into his office. Probably because he has his own armed muscle.

Delaying further would just give Reliance's henchmen more time to get there. She had to act now, and there was no time to think of something better. She was out of options.

Sucking in a deep breath, Denise hurried forward, trying to move as silently as possible in her running shoes. She only caught a glimpse of Yogi's eyes as she approached, but the warning flash they gave her was enough to let her know he did not approve.

The minute shake of his head—the one telling her to back off—didn't tip off the Reliance goons until she was almost on top of them. By then, it was too late.

Denise whipped the cylinder from her belt and jumped as high as she could, leaping to climb up Hulk number two like a tree. She latched onto his shirt with one hand, using the other to jam her lipstick Taser into his thick neck.

The security guard crashed down like the ton of bricks he resembled. He landed with a meaty thump, one that was accentuated by the staccato pings of metal hitting the floor.

Yogi dashed from the office. Before she could blink, the guard's gun was in his hand.

For a second, she was worried he would shoot the head scientist. Instead, he took out the clip and popped the bullets from the chamber. Once he was done, he advanced on the now-quailing scientist.

She was right there next to him. "Who are you?" she asked the suit. "I want a name."

The man didn't answer. He turned to run away, but Yogi picked him up by the scruff of his neck. It was far too easy for him. If he wasn't careful, he could kill the man accidentally.

"No, put him down!" She stepped up to them, yanking on the man's collared shirt until Yogi dropped him.

"What are you planning?" Yogi growled.

"This," she replied, drawing her arm back. She punched the suit with all her strength, her fist smashing into his face. The scientist crumpled to the floor next to his guard, unconscious.

Jack chuckled from inside the office. "Dayum, girl."

Yogi frowned. "I could have taken care of that."

"If one of you had hit him, you might have killed him," Denise scoffed, waving a hand over the bodies. "Look at the twerp! He's my size. Besides, wouldn't you rather his sins be exposed to the world? It would be a lesson to the others like him."

She turned to Jack. "Do you have their data? I'm sure there's enough dirt there to hang this guy."

"The copy is done—finally. There were a few more gigs of video files than we anticipated, so getting it all took a little longer than I calculated. Now we just let my virus scramble their system and Bob's your uncle."

She and Yogi exchanged a loaded glance at the mention of the video files, but Jack didn't seem to notice their trepidation.

"Why don't you go and grab that last monkey? I've taken care of the cameras. They're on a loop now," Jack said absently.

"Yes, please!" That was a great idea. Taking Yogi's hand, she led him to the lab.

"You took out another one?" He sounded shocked.

She shrugged. "Never underestimate a determined animal activist," she said with a frown.

The guard was still making a racket. She looked around. "Let's stuff some of those paper towels in his mouth,” she suggested.

“No need.” Yogi knelt, taking out the roll of duct tape he’d stashed in her bag. He applied a strip to the man’s mouth. “You know, I bought this roll to use on you.”

Denise sniffed. “Lucky for you that you didn’t try.” She gestured to the man lying prone at their feet. “Just look at what happens when you cross me.”

Yogi chuckled and she forgot about the guard, moving over to the cage.

Tentatively, she handed the monkey one of her special treats through the bars. The animal eagerly took it. “The cage is wired. It’s rigged to an alarm.”

“Don’t worry about it. I did some EOD in the army.”

“EOD?”

Yogi bent and started fiddling with the wires underneath the table.

“Explosive Ordinance Disposal,” he said, flashing her a quick but heart-stopping grin. “An alarm on a cage should be cake after that.”

“Wow,” she said, her head drawing back to admire the view as he bent over.

Focus, Denise. Her hormones were already getting a workout around him, but throw in a little bomb-disposal skill into the mix and she was about ready to pass out.

Yogi finished messing with the wires and straightened. “That should do it. Getting this little guy out should be no problem now.”

“Don’t worry about it,” he said, grasping the bars on the door and yanking.

The thin metal joint in the corner bent. Putting a hand in the opening, he pulled again until the entire door separated from the frame.

Denise blinked. Then she remembered the Jeep. He’d pulled the car from that ditch without a winch or any tools. She shook her head at the wrecked cage. “I guess I’ll just have to get used to the fact that the man I love is basically the Wolverine.”

“What did you say?”

Denise looked at him blankly before her mind replayed her words. She clapped her hands over her mouth.

Yogi’s grin could have lit up the room.

Did I just...

“Yep, you said it out loud,” Yogi said, sounding way too satisfied.

A throat cleared. “Monkey is escaping,” Jack said from the door. “You know, in case you were interested.”

Mortified, Denise looked wildly around. The chimp was halfway across the room.

Yogi leaned forward. “You better get her,” he said in an undertone. “Animals can be a little unpredictable around me.”

“Oh, of course.” Denise hurried after the chimp, her cheeks flaming.

She scooped up the monkey, refusing to look at either of the men. She didn't have to see their faces to know they were amused. Their laughter was a clear indication.

Chapter 22

After what seemed like an eternity, Yogi pulled Jack's van into the empty driveway of the boarding house on the Wyoming-Colorado border. He had left his Jeep there before they headed to Reliance, intending to use it as a fallback position in case they failed tonight and needed to regroup.

He'd originally planned to take the Reliance data to the chief immediately, but there was no way that was happening now.

She loves me.

For the entire ride, Denise had kept fussing with the chimp. She was still blushing and avoiding his eyes as they unloaded their gear—which was taking entirely too long.

He felt like pumping his fist in the air in victory. Denise loved him. And as soon as he got rid of Jack and the chimp, he could show her he loved her back.

He studied the monkey. It looked sleepy enough for him to handle safely. Tossing his and Denise's packs on the porch, he took the drowsy animal from Denise's hands and shoved it at Jack.

"Take this and go," Yogi said before taking his mate in his arms and bending her back in a Hollywood-style kiss.

Yogi had always believed the idea of time standing still was a cliché. He knew better now. Pouring his heart and soul into the kiss, he drank deep until Denise's body was putty in his arms.

After a very long minute, he finally noticed Jack was hemming and hawing, trying to get their attention.

"What about this?" Jack asked.

Reluctantly, Yogi lifted his head to see Jack holding up a thumb drive. Yogi held up a hand, catching the drive when Jack tossed it.

"Douglas will wire payment, thanks. Go away now," he said, lifting his dazed mate in a fireman's hold that should be very familiar to her.

Yogi headed for the boarding house door. Luckily, he still had the key.

Jack laughed until he realized Yogi was seriously leaving him with the chimp. "Hey, wait. I can't take this thing! There's not even a cage!"

Denise started calling out instructions and advice from over his shoulder, but Yogi was not about to stop and take the thing back.

“Figure it out,” he called as he opened the door, slamming it behind them.

“Yogi, he can’t handle that animal,” she protested as he set her down in the first bedroom suite he found.

“Don’t worry. Jack’s resourceful. Plus, he knows I’ll kill him if something happens to it.”

She looked at him doubtfully, but he managed to divert her attention by taking off his shirt. Yogi continued to strip. By the time he was done, he was confident she didn’t remember the monkey at all.

Chapter 23

Jack slid the second USB drive into his waistband and shook his head at the closed door of the boarding house. Yogi had been a little too trusting, not checking to see if he'd kept a duplicate copy of the Reliance data.

As if I would take that long to copy and corrupt such a basic computer system.

Shoving down the twinge of guilt, he stared at the monkey in his hands. "You're headed for the San Diego Zoo, bucko," he told the chimp.

He lived in a suburb just minutes away from it. Perhaps if he drove fast enough, he could break in that very night and leave the animal somewhere safe. His course of action decided, Jack hustled to his van.

He carried out his break-in and deposit a mere hour after hitting town. Chimp-free he drove home. He arrived at his Spanish-style house just before Douglas' payment hit his Cayman account.

Jack loaded the drive onto his desktop computer without further delay.

He knew it was wrong. Despite his closed-lip tendencies, Douglas' son Connell was one of his best friends. Yogi, too, for that matter. Connell had saved Jack's life on the battlefield on numerous occasions, and he had returned the favor once. The trust and faith of the Maitland family was something he valued. Douglas had tapped him for this job based on that confidence.

But now he was knowingly violating their trust. His curiosity about the Maitlands and their odd extended family had reached a tipping point. If what was on this thumb drive shed any light on the questions burning in the back of his brain, then he was going to look—just once—and then he'd destroy the data on the drive forever.

A few hours later, he was still sitting in front of his computer. Jack hadn't expected to be shaken by what he'd seen, but his hands were trembling a bit as he picked up his coffee cup. He put it down when he realized there was nothing in it.

Gotta change that now. He went to his kitchen for the seldom-used bottle of vodka he kept in the freezer. Pouring himself a double, he went back to his computer and replayed the way those scientists had poked and prodded the little wolf cub.

Mouth tight, Jack fast forwarded and again watched what had happened when the scientists had gone home and turned off the lights, leaving the cub alone in the dark.

After tossing back the vodka, Jack fingered the rim of the empty glass and debated getting another.

Okay, this explains a lot. For years, Connell and his ‘cousins’ had fascinated him with their quick reflexes and stunning physicality, on and off the battlefield.

He should be thinking about them, and what this revelation meant. But Jack’s racing mind determinedly focused on one thing—probably the last person he should be thinking about.

Mara.

EPILOGUE

SIX MONTHS LATER.

Yogi cracked an eyelid. Oliver was staring at him with a smug expression on his little face. Uh-oh. He knew that look. “You better not have done what I think you did,” he said, his voice like sandpaper.

The kid stuck his tongue out, not to mock Yogi, but to lick the traces of blood from the corner of his tiny mouth.

Okay, he definitely had.

Oliver was almost two and half now. Although he had accepted his cousin as a caretaker, he missed Denise whenever they were gone.

The little cub had been so distraught that Jessup took the unprecedented step of asking Denise for help, which she had been eager to supply.

“You can’t fight such strong imprinting,” Jessup had said in an aside to him, shrugging off the momentous occasion. As far as Yogi knew, it was the first and last time an Avery had ever asked an outsider for help with anything.

At first, Denise was just supposed to visit Lunar Springs on occasion. But once Yogi and Denise were officially mated, they started spending more and more time away from the pack on research and rescue missions. Out of necessity, Oliver had started to visit them. Now he came to sleep over whenever Yogi and Denise weren’t away.

There was plenty of room since they had bought the boarding house and made it their home.

When Yogi had first agreed to overnight stays for Oliver, he hadn’t realized he was signing up for weeks at a time. It was okay, though. The little punk had finally accepted that the two of them had to share Denise. The cub had even stopped biting him. Now they were friends...of a sort.

It was occasionally weird to be a surrogate father, but Yogi was a practical man. He needed the practice for when they had their own cub. Glancing at his sleeping mate, he smiled.

Speaking of which...

Oliver tugged on his arm and Yogi got to his feet, hustling the boy out of the room before he woke Denise. He settled him in the living room with a fistful of dry cereal and went out to the garage to count white rabbits. One was gone.

Not again.

He and Denise had liberated some dogs from a research facility in Kentucky a few days ago. The place's animal abuse records had been wiped by the authorities, giving the staff free rein to continue their abhorrent practices.

They had only planned to take the dogs, but when Denise had seen the rabbits, he'd sighed, knowing he was going to end up having to make more room in the van.

And now, thanks to Oliver, the baker's dozen of fuzzy bunnies they'd brought back was one short...

At least this time, the kid had tucked the remains out of sight. Knowing cubs the way he did, Yogi figured he'd probably find the bones under the house. At least, that was where he had found them the last time.

On the bright side, there was no trail of blood leading to the body. Some of my lessons must be sinking in.

Unfortunately, Denise's weren't. She had tearfully lectured Oliver on the importance of not eating the rescue animals. However, there was only so much tofu and soy crap a wolf cub could eat. Eventually, instinct won out.

Of course, there had only been three rabbits last time. Maybe Denise wouldn't notice one was missing if Yogi released them quickly enough. In the meantime, he would keep her busy. Yogi had become more than adept at distracting his mate.

When his friends teased him for rescuing the animals they would normally eat, Yogi shrugged their jeers off. It made Denise happy. That was all that mattered.

He went into the kitchen and started on some pancakes. By the time Denise woke, Oliver had torn through an entire stack and was working on round two.

"Did you save any for me?"

He smiled at his mate as she came out of the bedroom. Meeting her halfway, he gave her a good morning kiss. "Of course, but I had to hide them from Oliver. Your pancakes are in the oven."

"Mmm, pancakes...I'm just going to check on the rabbits first."

Shooting Oliver a black look behind Denise's back, Yogi followed her out to the garage.

"Babe, don't you want to eat now before your food gets cold?"

"Uh, yeah...wait, weren't there thirteen rabbits?"

Yogi feigned confusion. "Naw, I don't think so."

"But..."

"Come back to the kitchen," he said, holding out his hand. "We've been so busy ever since we expanded to two teams. You should sit, put your feet up. I got that Canadian maple syrup you like..."

Hunger won over curiosity. "That does sound good. I could eat a horse," she said, walking in and settling at the kitchen table. She sniffed appreciatively. "I don't know what's with my appetite lately. I practically ate my weight in waffles yesterday."

Yogi added an extra pancake to the pile as she began to eat. A growing Were cub needed a lot of calories.

She paused with the fork halfway to her mouth. “Are you sure there weren’t thirteen rabbits?”

“Pretty sure.”

Denise narrowed her eyes. She turned to their guest. “Oliver, did you go see the bunnies today?”

Oliver beamed at her, but said nothing.

“Babe,” Yogi prodded, waving the syrup bottle at her.

Denise ignored him. “Oliver, sweetie,” she began, standing up.

“You’re pregnant,” Yogi blurted.

Denise stared at him, eyes wide. After a minute, she blinked. “Oliver ate the rabbit, didn’t he?”

Damn. “Yes. Yes, he did.”

She put her hands on her stomach. “I’m really pregnant?”

It was too early to tell with a human test, but a Were’s nose was infallible when it came to this sort of thing. “Yes, sweetheart, you are.”

Denise nodded as if that made sense, but then she wrinkled her nose. “I’m going to want steak now, aren’t I?”

“Don’t worry. I stocked up last night. I got some really choice ribeye and four filet mignons just for you.”

She stayed still and quiet for a little too long. “Can I have one now?”

He released a pent-up breath he hadn’t been aware of holding. This was going way better than he’d thought it would. “Steak and pancakes, coming up.”

Denise smiled and took a shaky breath. She held out her arms and Oliver scooted into the next chair, cuddling into her.

Yogi took the steak out of the fridge, sneaking a peek at the picture the pair made. His little family, and it was already growing. A small, insecure voice told him he didn’t deserve to be this happy, but he wasn’t stupid enough to reject the gifts he’d been given. Quite unexpectedly, he’d found not just a purpose in life, but love as well.

“Yogi?”

“Yeah?”

“Can you make that steak rare?”

He grinned. “Coming right up.”

DOUBLE HELIX CASE FILES

1st Place, Royal Palm Literary Award 2015

In a world transformed by the Genetic Revolution, Kyle Norwood is an honest-to-God human and proud of it. His deadly skills come from hard work and not genetic sleight of hand. An easy mission to protect two Proficere Labs scientists turns into a shoot-out that leaves a scientist and a federal agent dead. Worse, the research data the scientists were carrying disappears.

In a world where human derivatives are hated and feared, Sofia Rios is almost human. When a fight during her waitressing shift turns fatal, a dying scientist launches her into the shady world of scientific espionage. The unwilling trustee of research that people would kill to obtain, Sofia turns to the man who steps out of the shadows to protect her, even though he appears as dangerous and disreputable as the people who hunt her.

Together, Sofia and Kyle must unravel the truth behind the illicit information she carries before one or both of them are killed. Their mutual attraction sparkles, but the spark could just as easily become an explosion if Kyle ever finds out that Sofia is a despised telekinetic.

This is a standalone futuristic thriller set in the award-winning world of the Double Helix.

A NOTE FROM ZARA ITANI

Circumstances have conspired to make me seem responsible for every societal calamity since the second Genetic Revolution, which, I confess, I might have inadvertently triggered, but in spite of what you may believe, and most certainly contrary to what Danyael Sabre believes, I do not wake up every morning and stare at my to-do list with wicked anticipation, wondering how exactly to check off item one on the list, “Make trouble,” and item two on the list, “Drag everyone else around me into trouble.”

Nevertheless, increased scrutiny of my activities and those of Three Fates Agency demands greater transparency. Hence, I’ve decided to release these case files, some of which predate my relationship with Danyael. If nothing else, it should prove that the many talented mercenaries who work for me are at least as adept at creating trouble.

Chapter 1

The wooden, narrow-eyed door guardian wore a permanent open-mouthed scowl hovering on the verge of a war cry. A garish array of feathers spread over the headpiece perched on his furrowed brow.

Fortunately, no one who stared up at his head, mounted over the door, was terrified of him.

Under the frightful Zulu mask, a bored bouncer routinely checked IDs and waved customers into Zanzi-Bar.

The wine bar and nightclub in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, prided itself on its selection of South African wines, its mismatched name notwithstanding. In the dark interior of the bar, spotlights pulsed, bathing the wooden dance floor in pools of white and red. A Latin tune thumped through the loudspeakers; the compulsive rhythm set hips rocking to the beat. Leggy waitresses meandered around clusters of couches covered with zebra-skin and leopard-skin patterns.

One of the waitresses walked to the bar, which displayed an outstanding array of wines and spirits. Sofia Rios tucked a stray lock of brown hair behind her ear, leaned against the wood façade of the bar, and flashed the bartender, Stefan Agnor, her sweetest smile. “I need a Jameson on the rocks, an Eikendal merlot, a brandy, and a Sprite on the house.”

He chuckled as he set a wineglass filled with a pale pink wine on a tray marked with Chelsea’s name. “That smile’s really cute, but it isn’t going to bump you to the head of the line, munchkin.”

Sofia rolled her eyes. “For the record, I’ll have you know that I’m wearing four-inch heels, which elevates me two inches above munchkin status.” She was not going to admit to the blisters on her feet.

“So you’re what, five-foot-four now? Color me impressed.” Stefan began work on another order. His blond hair, slightly longer than was fashionable, lent new meaning to the words “artistic disarray.” He grinned at her. “How are you doing tonight?”

Sofia’s rosebud mouth twisted into a wry smile. “Had a microbiology exam this morning.”

“You aced it, right?” He turned his back on her and reached for a bottle of Absolut.

Her eyes narrowed as she focused on the ice chips beside the sink. The transparent shards quivered and then leapt, as if flicked by an invisible finger, into the sink. She shrugged. “Won’t find out for another week, but I hope so because I hauled ass on that one.”

“And such a cute ass it is too.” Stefan turned around and leered at her. “When do you get to anatomy? I can help you with the practical exam.”

“I bet you can. Tell you what; you rush my order and I’ll bump you to the front of the line on my practical.”

“Ahead of the video game-playing geek who lives on your right and the overweight accountant who lives on your left?” Stefan snorted. “Oh, can you tell that I’m really worried about the competition?” He set a glass of Sprite down on her tray.

Chelsea, a well-endowed blonde, swung by the bar and hefted her full tray. She arched an eyebrow, and her grin was wicked. “The hot guy’s back.”

Sofia leaned to look past Chelsea’s shoulder. “Where?”

“He sat down in your section again. That’s three nights running. Maybe he’s got a thing for you. He’s not alone this time, though.”

Stefan jerked his head in their direction. “Go get their order. I’ll have this one filled by the time you get back.”

Sofia grinned. She leaned over the bar and kissed him on the cheek. “I’m moving you up to the head of the line.”

Stefan snorted. “I should be so lucky.”

As she returned to her section and to the three new customers who had claimed a large circular booth, Sofia tugged down her white shirt to cover more of her bare midriff. She blamed her fluttering pulse entirely on the dark-haired, leanly muscled man whose steady green-eyed gaze seemed to take in everything, from the small mole just over the left side of her mouth to the fact that her manicure was slightly chipped. His mouth was firm and unsmiling, which was a shame. A smile would have gone a long way toward making his rough-hewn features more attractive.

She inhaled deeply and fixed a warm smile on her face. “What can I get for you, gentlemen?”

“I’ll have a Kahlua coffee martini,” one of the man’s companions said in a reedy voice. Sofia placed him somewhere between fifty and sixty years old. His tweed jacket was too large for him, and his large brown eyes darted from side to side behind the large frames of his eyeglasses. He was definitely not typical nightclub material.

“Me too,” the third man squeaked. He seemed slightly younger, but cut from the same cloth. If Sofia mentally merged her geeky video game-playing neighbor with her overweight accountant neighbor, and then aged him thirty years, she would have expected him to resemble those two men. They seemed like professors or scientists, grossly out of place in a nightclub.

How different they were from the man who stared intently at her. He did not belong in a nightclub either, but that was because she could imagine him in military fatigues, toting a machine gun with easy expertise. He looked dangerous enough for that impression to fit.

“And you?” she asked.

“Water.”

“No vodka tonight?” She smiled. “Sodas are complimentary for designated drivers.”

“Water’s fine.”

Sofia resisted the urge to roll her eyes. Couldn’t he be friendlier? A smile wouldn’t crack his face. At least he had not sounded irritated, though his indifference was insulting. Then again, she was not in the market for another guy, so what did it matter what he thought of her?

She straightened. “I’ll be right back with two martinis and a glass of water.”

Stefan arched his eyebrows when she returned to the bar. “No hot date, huh?”

He had always been good at reading her mood. Sofia shot him a dirty look. “When do real men give me the time of day?”

He pressed a hand to his chest and managed a passably good impression of pain. “You wound me, baby. What do they want?”

“Two martinis and water.”

“Boring.”

Stefan was often right, but not that time. Sofia’s eyes narrowed. From her place at the bar, she watched the man scan the club while his two companions sat in silent and apparent discomfort. Something was not quite right, but she could not place her finger on it.

She had remembered what he ordered.

Kyle Norwood gritted his teeth. Damn it. Observant people were dangerous.

It probably did not matter, though. She was just a waitress, one of the regulars he recognized from his prior two visits. Many of Zanzi-Bar’s customers and employees were regulars, a fact that made the nightclub a perfect place for a drop. He did not want to be surprised by hostile parties or unexpected enemies. It had happened on more than one occasion, and the last time had left scars, physical and emotional.

“Where are they?” A thin voice, its tone whining, interrupted his thoughts.

Kyle glanced over at Alvin Smith. The lanky professor was one of the leading minds on genetic manipulation. He and his counterpart, Bert Reynard, were scientists at Proficere Labs, a research facility that prided itself on work so innovative and so cutting-edge that it would have been illegal if only the authorities knew what to make illegal.

Kyle would typically not have taken them on as clients, but it was not his call. Zara Itani, his boss and the owner of Three Fates, an agency of mercenaries, made those decisions, and she tended to skim close to criminal behavior. Her close connections with the government allowed her to escape without repercussions, most of the time.

As long as she extended the same courtesy to her employees, he would be happy to take on any job she offered. Zara paid well and did not micromanage. One could not hope for much more in a boss.

He continued his scan of the club, mentally checking the employees against the employment records he had downloaded from Zanzi-Bar earlier in the week. Once he confirmed that they were all longtime employees, he moved on to the customers. The three men at the bar flirting with the male bartender were regulars; he had noticed them the prior night. Young professionals occupied some of the tables in the other sections. Unless he missed his guess, and he rarely did, he pegged them for lawyers or bankers. They looked just uptight and miserable enough.

Four students in University of North Carolina sweatshirts and jackets, their backpacks sprawled in untidy heaps beneath their chairs, occupied a table in his section. The waitress stopped by their table and chatted while unloading their drinks from her tray. Laughter, warm and infectious, exploded before subsiding into muted chuckles. The students were regulars too, judging from the waitress's easy conversation with them.

What was her name? He frowned as he searched his memory of her employment records.

Sofia...Sofia Rios. She had begun working at Zanzi-Bar several months prior, typically for three or four nights a week.

Several minutes later, she reluctantly wound down her conversation with the students and headed toward his table. She set two glasses of martini in front of Alvin and Bert, and slid a glass of water toward Kyle. "That will be twenty-two fifty, including tax."

Kyle pulled a couple of bills from his wallet and tossed it on the table. "Thanks. Keep the change." His gaze darted to the entrance as three men strode into the club. They were built like wrestlers and looked like thugs despite wearing tieless suits. One of them he recognized; the thick black mustache was a point of pride for Luis Sanchez, chief lieutenant in Rue Marcha, one of Colombia's most vicious drug cartels. "We're leaving," Kyle said, his tone flat.

"What?" Alvin asked. He followed Kyle's gaze. "But he's here, Kyle."

Kyle's eyes narrowed. "He's your customer?"

Alvin nodded.

"Do you know who he is?"

Bert's lips pressed into a thin line. "He's the man who agreed to our price."

Only then did Kyle take a closer look at one of the two men who accompanied Sanchez. The man matched the photograph the scientists had shown Kyle previously, but Sanchez's presence was hardly coincidental. Damn. He would need all of the devil's luck to get out of this mess.

Sofia cast a quick look at the three men who had just entered the club. Zanzi-Bar attracted a wide range of clientele, including gangsters looking to move up the food chain. The three men would not have overly alarmed her if not for the reaction of the man in the booth, the one called Kyle. He looked up and met her gaze. The slight upward motion of his chin told her to leave.

She did not need to be told twice. With slow, careful steps, she backed away from the booth.

Motion flickered in her peripheral vision. Two UNC students shot to their feet and spun around, automatic pistols in their hands. “IGEC agents. You’re under arrest.”

Sofia’s eyes flared wide. What was the International Genetics and Ethics Council doing in a nightclub in Chapel Hill? Why were they pointing their weapons at the innocuous geeks instead of the suited gangsters or the man, Kyle, who so obviously exuded danger?

The men in suits reached into their jackets, the motion so smooth it was practically instinctive.

Kyle lifted the edge of the small table and flung it, drinks and all, in the direction of the three thugs.

Sofia ducked, shrieking, as bullets laced across the room. She dropped to the ground and rolled into the cover of the circular booth. The two scientists huddled beside her. One of them, hands trembling, opened a steel briefcase.

It wasn’t a briefcase but a cooler. A pale blue florescent light activated as the case opened. The light glowed softly over test tubes filled with translucent liquid tightly packed among cooling crystals. A mini disc, encased in a thin jewel case, was nestled in a bed of Styrofoam.

The scientist ignored both test tubes and mini discs. He reached for a circular metal tube, two inches long and no thicker than a toothpick. He wrapped his fist tightly around it and lunged from the booth. Gunfire cut him down two feet from the door of the bar.

He screamed, writhing as a pool of blood formed beneath him.

Oh, God. Ducking beneath the spray of bullets, Sofia leaned out, grabbed his feet, and dragged him back into the booth. His gaze was panicked, and his breath came in quick shudders. Blood bubbled out, mixing with the spittle leaking from the side of his mouth. He reached up, his fingers like claws, raking her shoulders as he fought to breathe. In his eyes, terror supplanted panic.

Sofia leaned over him and raised his head to elevate the pressure off his punctured lungs. She flinched as a sharp pain pierced her bicep, but it vanished instantly. He died moments later, his final breath escaping in a rattling wheeze as his eyes rolled up in his head.

Gunfire faded into smoky silence. Stunned, Sofia looked up. One gangster was dead, and the other two had fled. Three of the IGEC agents were down. One sprawled unmoving across the floor, blood leaking from a bullet hole in the middle of his forehead. The other two groaned softly, injured. The remaining scientist cowered as the last IGEC agent slapped electric handcuffs on him, but there was no sign of Kyle or the cooler.

Chapter 2

Kyle walked, his pace no faster than those of the college students teetering unsteadily out of the bars and clubs on Franklin Street. The steel cooler felt heavy, a burden that stood out, stiff and formal, in a collage of scruffy backpacks and classy handbags. Training contained the urgency that dogged his steps as he wove past cheerful and belligerent drunks, leaving behind the violence that fractured Zanzi-Bar.

He squeezed his eyes shut and gritted his teeth. Willpower wrapped tight spirals around the vibration of cold anger.

What the hell were International Genetics and Ethics Council agents doing at the club? Its field agents exceeded the U.S. Marshals in the scope of its operations, and its activities spread like tentacles across the globe.

Why was the council interested in a simple research transaction?

Unless, of course, there was far more to the research than he realized.

His knuckles whitened as his grip tightened on the handle of the steel cooler.

Bert Reynard swore that the transaction was just the result of a genetic screen. Kyle, too, had scanned the research transcript and found nothing more than a jumbled mess of four letters—A, T, G, and C—adenine, thymine, guanine, and cytosine, the four nucleobases that interlinked into a sinuous coil to create deoxyribonucleic acid, DNA, the double helix of life.

And that was where he had screwed up. In a world transformed by the Genetic Revolution, he had underestimated the power of DNA—the blueprint of life—to drive men to violent acts inspired by greed or fear.

In fact, he had more than screwed up. He had not fully understood the research transcript, and he had made the mistake of taking a scientist at his word. Those intellectual types, those doctors and scientists, could not be trusted. Doctors had killed his mother with their insistence on unproven drugs.

He was enough of a realist to acknowledge that his mother would have died anyway—liver cancer spared few victims—but the drugs had killed her, not the cancer. She had died clawing at his chest, pleading desperately for help. Her eyes were wide with terror as she fought to breathe through the viscous phlegm that blocked her air passage. She had not even realized that blood was spilling from her every orifice. The autopsy confirmed that her internal organs had ruptured. Cancer did not kill her; the drugs did.

The doctors denied it. To defend themselves, they held up her scribbled consent, indicating that she had understood the risks of the experimental drugs.

Risk. Hell, no one had understood the risk, not until his mother died.

Kyle grimaced, shook off the past, and refocused on the present. Was anything missing from that cooler?

He stepped into a convenience store and brushed past its browsing patrons as he headed toward the restrooms nestled in the back of the building. The small room stank of hastily mopped up vomit and urine, but the glaring florescent lights reflecting off the dirt-stained white tiles were exactly what he needed. He lowered the toilet cover, set the cooler on top of the lid, and punched in the security code on the lock.

The contents of the cooler glowed pale blue under the light.

At first glance, everything seemed in place. The mini disc, the test tubes—both decoys—were untouched.

His green eyes flashed over the contents of the cooler yet again. His breath caught.

The microchip injector was missing.

He slammed the cooler shut. Damn it!

His hands clenched into fists, and he paced the tiny length of the restroom. If Bert had taken it, the microchip would be in the hands of the IGEC by now—hardly ideal—but the IGEC, at least, had a reputation for scrupulously playing by its excessively thick rule book.

But if Alvin had taken it...

Alvin Smith was dead. Was the microchip embedded in his corpse or was it still encased in its injector, perhaps lost in the debris and aftermath of the fight?

He jerked to a stop. The tracking code for the microchip had to be around somewhere.

He reopened the cooler and tore through its contents. A white card imprinted with an unlabeled data matrix code was tucked into the lining of the cooler. He pulled out his smartphone, scanned the image, and then hit the “Track” button. A map flashed onto the screen of the smartphone. A red dot blipped. It moved.

Kyle ground his teeth. The microchip tracker was live; it had been activated by body heat. Could the cartel—? No, Kyle was certain the Rue Marcha did not have the microchip. Alvin had not made physical contact with them.

The waitress.

Damn it. She was the only one who had come close to Alvin. She had held him as he died.

He had to go back for the microchip and get it out of the waitress, one way or another.

Sofia released her breath in a soft sigh of relief when the medics and police officers finally left the club, taking with them the bodies of the deceased gangster, the IGEC agent, and the scientist. She slumped down in a chair, looking up only when she felt someone crouch beside her.

“Here.” Stefan placed a steaming mug in her hands. The lightly fragrant scent of chamomile wafted toward her. “Drink. It’s good for you.”

She laughed, the sound catching on a sob. “I didn’t even know the bar carried teas.”

“We don’t. I thought you could use one and sent Harry to a store for it.” He tugged up a chair, turned it around, and straddled it. His blue eyes searched her face. “How are you doing?”

She huffed out her breath. “I’m tired of answering the same questions over and over again. Yes, he’s been here for the past three nights. No, he was alone prior to tonight. No, I didn’t see him before that. No, I don’t know his name. No, he paid cash. Ugh!” Sofia forced herself to relax her two-handed grip lest she shatter the mug. She lowered her gaze. “I’m tired, and I’ve just learned that you don’t learn enough from a semester of nursing to know what to do to help a man who’s been shot in the lungs.”

Stefan shook his head. “There’s nothing you could have done.”

“Maybe not, but he died in my arms, and I couldn’t do anything except watch.” In her mug, the tea bag bobbed in response to her frenetic thoughts. She stared down absently at it until she realized that Stefan was staring at the same.

The tea bag stopped moving. She looked at Stefan, her brown eyes wide and a lump of fear clogging her throat. “I…”

A faint smile tugged up a corner of his mouth. “It’s all right, Sofia. I’ve always known that you were the one telekinetically sweeping the ice chips off the countertops when my back was turned.”

“You did? You don’t mind?”

“Why would I?” He sounded perplexed.

“Some people don’t like mutants.”

“I’m not one of those people.”

She relaxed enough to smile. “That’s good, because I’m not much of a mutant. Other telekinetics can hurl cars and create physical shields thick enough to deflect bullets. I got the short end of the stick. I have as much telekinetic power as I have strength in my finger and thumb.” She pressed them together in a pincer grip. “It’s scarcely enough for carnival tricks.”

“It’s good enough to clean up ice chips.” Stefan leaned forward and placed a brotherly kiss on her forehead. “Come on. I’ll walk you home.”

Home was a brownstone house five blocks away. As she marched up the ice-slicked stairs to the door, Sofia wondered if Stefan would ask to come in and ruin a perfectly good friendship by trying to push it to the next level, but she need not have worried. He bid her good night in a polite though perfunctory way and continued down the road. He did not try to come in; he did not try to kiss her; he did not hug her; heck, he did not even shake her hand.

Sofia opened the door and slipped in before the warm air inside the house could escape. She closed the door, leaned back on it, and wondered why she felt so insulted. Perhaps because Stefan was, in spite of his occasionally lewd humor, an intrinsically good guy—the kind of guy she should spend more time trying to hook up with.

Or not. She sighed. She did not need the complication of romantic entanglements.

Her home, a three-story house, had been just right for her parents and her. They had passed away six months prior, but she had not been able to bring herself to sell the house. It was too full of memories, of Thanksgiving dinners around the scuffed up oak dining table, and Christmas Eves on the rug in front of the fireplace. The house was empty now, and quiet, but it retained all its memories. It was still a home.

The stairs creaked as she climbed up to the second floor, passing by her parents' bedroom. The bed was neatly made. The green bathrobe that her mother had carelessly tossed on the bed lay there, untouched. Her mother's jewelry and her father's cufflinks lay on the dresser, next to a picture of them—two people still deeply in love—their arms around each other, in front of a swirl of cherry blossoms. She had taken that picture of them in the spring, a few months before they were killed during a terrorist assault on Washington, D.C.

The three of them visited D.C. often, staying at the small town house they owned overlooking Dupont Circle. Independence Day celebrations always drew them to D.C., and she had been with them in the early hours of July Fourth when the members of the mutant terrorist group, Sakti, broke into homes and slaughtered parents in front of their children. Sakti's actions were decried as its psychotic leader's grudge against his father, but it provided no consolation for the children who lost their parents that day.

She had put the D.C. town house on the market almost immediately. Buyers had yet to show interest even though she had priced the home well below its market value. It appeared, she concluded with a grimace, that death devalued house prices.

The house in Chapel Hill, however, was still home, untainted by death, alive with memories.

She paused as she always did for a few minutes in her parents' bedroom, using a feather duster to brush off the thin layer of dust that accumulated each day. Time was determined to march on. She would have to move on as well someday.

She climbed the steep steps to her loft bedroom on the third floor. Her room had low, slanted wood ceilings, a pale green carpet, and a green-gold dusted wallpaper that evoked images of a fairy meadow. Sighing softly, she tossed her backpack on the bed and stepped into the bathroom. The tiles were cold beneath her feet, and she grumbled under her breath. The water was hot though, and soon, the small bathroom fogged up. She scrubbed shampoo liberally into her brown hair and followed up with wads of conditioner. She closed her eyes. The water ran down her face, mingling with the salt of her tears.

The scientist's terror-filled face blended with her father's. The scientist's final rasping breath became her father's. She had held him as he died. Shaken and deeply traumatized, she had gone back to school and enrolled in a nursing program. She did not want to stand by helplessly as someone died in her arms, but tonight, it had happened again. She had stood by helplessly as another man died.

She dragged her hand across her eyes. Damn it!

Sofia turned off the water, stepped out of the shower, and wrapped a thick towel around her body. She rubbed her hand across the surface of the mirror and scowled at her appearance. She did not consider herself vain, but she looked like hell, her eyes swollen and red-rimmed.

It was just as well she was not trying to impress anyone. She twisted the doorknob and swung the bathroom door open. Perhaps if she—

She gasped.

The man browsing through the books on her shelf looked up.

She swept her hand out, flinging the female clutter from her dressing table into his face. Fueled and strengthened by panic, her weak telekinetic powers fluttered, sending a cloud of powder into the air. As he recoiled in apparent surprise, she dashed past him and ran down the stairs, but got no farther than the second-floor landing.

He threw himself over the third-floor bannister and landed in a crouch in front of her. She backed away in alarm.

He lunged at her, seizing her hands.

The towel fell away from her body as she pulled back, but his grip tightened. "Stop," he said, his voice low. "I'm here to help."

She stared at him, focusing on his green eyes set in a face of harsh, sculptured good looks. "Kyle?"

His eyes narrowed. "You know my name?"

"Yes...yes, the man who died called you Kyle."

"You are much too observant," he said. It did not sound like a compliment. His eyes raked over her naked body, and a smile, wicked and appreciative, curved his lips.

Sofia swallowed hard. She would have covered herself if she could get her hands free of his tight grip.

He released her, picked up the towel she had dropped to the ground, and wrapped it around her body. "Get dressed. We don't have much time."

"Much time for what?"

"To get out of here before the IGEC or Sanchez and his men show up."

"Sanchez? Is he one of the gangsters who came to the club?"

He shoved her up the stairs. "Yes. Move it."

She stood her ground. "How do I know you're not one of the bad guys?"

He arched an eyebrow. "Because I haven't hurt you. Yet."

She definitely heard the hint of a threat in his deep voice. It was, however, offset by the glint of amusement in his eyes. “Why would—?”

“Because you’re carrying a microchip containing the genetic data that Sanchez paid dearly for.”

“A micro—” Sofia pressed a hand to her bicep. The sharp pain.

Kyle grasped her arm gently and ran his callused fingers over her skin. The sensation charged down her spine. Heat coiled in the pit of her stomach at his touch. “Is that where he injected you?” His tone was strictly business.

The man was turning her into a hormonal pile of mush, and he did not even know it.

He met her gaze, and the corner of his mouth tugged into a smirk. Perhaps he knew it, but just did not care.

She yanked her arm out of his grip and stalked up the stairs with as much dignity as she could muster, which was difficult, seeing how he had already seen her scrawny ass. At least he had the decency to wait outside her bedroom as she dressed, quickly pulling on a sweatshirt and a pair of faded denim jeans over her bra and underwear. She grabbed her backpack and stuffed into it a few changes of clothes, toiletries, her cell phone, and electronic tablet. Sofia turned around and jolted with shock to see him standing behind her.

She hissed with irritation. “Don’t you ever—?”

He pressed a finger to her lips.

She raised her head slightly and heard the soft tread of feet upon the creaky stairs.

Chapter 3

Only Kyle's training, so ingrained as to be instinctive, helped keep his mind off the small and neatly packaged female who scowled ferociously at him. He flung open the window and he was greeted by a blast of cold air. He gritted his teeth. It was a twenty-four-foot drop to the ground. He reached into his leather jacket for his handgun. They would have to fight their way out, and the only advantage he had was that whoever was in the house had no idea that Sofia was not alone and unprotected.

Sofia slung her backpack over her shoulders, tugged on a pair of sneakers, and followed. Her breath came quickly, but her composure was steady. Her hands did not tremble too visibly. Girl has guts, he admitted reluctantly. He pressed against the wall and caught a glimpse of a shadow moving on the second-floor landing. In a moment, it would be in view.

He fired. The pistol spit out a single bullet in a near soundless hiss, thanks to the silencer. The first assailant fell back with a cry of surprise and pain. Another pair of heavy feet raced past, dashing up the stairs. A man in black fatigues scrambled around the curve in the staircase, a pistol in his hand. His eyes widened when he caught a glimpse of Kyle.

He swung up his hand, but Kyle kicked out, knocking the gun out of the man's hands.

The man lunged for his fallen weapon.

Kyle leaped over the railing. His weight slammed into the man, knocking him down the steps. Momentum tumbled the man down two flights of stairs. His head smashed into the wooden floor. He lay there, sprawled over another man, both unmoving.

They were not dead. Kyle knew better than to hope for as much. He seized Sofia's hand, dragged her down the stairs, past the two unconscious men, and out of the door. The icy bite of the wind slapped him as he dug into his pocket for his car keys. He pressed on the remote, unlocking the doors of a dark blue BMW parked three doors down from Sofia's town house. Its headlights blinked.

The doors of a black sedan parked across the street opened, and two men stepped out. Streetlights reflected off the metal highlights of the guns in their hands.

Kyle yanked Sofia down behind a vehicle as the muzzles of guns flashed. Windows and windscreens on nearby cars shattered in a spray of glass.

Glass shards like tiny icicles dusted the black of his leather jacket as he shoved her to the pavement and crouched over her. He threw her a glance. Her eyes were wide with alarm, and her jaw was tense, but she had not fallen apart on him yet. The last thing he needed was a fainting female.

He pressed his car keys into her hand. His other hand tightened around his Glock. “When I say go, run for the car. Get it started.”

“You want me to drive?” She sounded incredulous.

“No, just get it started.”

She nodded. Her lips pressed into a thin line.

The sound of gunfire fell briefly silent.

“Go!” Kyle shot to his feet and twisted around to fire at the black sedan.

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sofia scramble away. Moments later, a car door slammed. The low hum of a BMW engine purred through the night.

Now it was his turn to run the gauntlet, without the support of cover fire.

Teeth gritted, he fired twice more at the sedan.

A sharp pop. Air hissed out of a tire.

Kyle dashed for his car.

Bullets sparked against asphalt. Shards of bitumen skittered against his denim-clad legs. A sharp pain shot through his side. For a moment, his vision flashed white before blurring into normal hues.

The door on the driver’s side swung open.

What the hell was she thinking, exposing herself to gunfire?

He lunged in through the open car door and slammed his foot down on the pedal.

Wheels screeched. The smell of burning rubber scorched the night, and the BMW accelerated away from the curb. Momentum slammed the door shut moments before he swung the steering wheel. The car swerved, skidding as it rounded a corner. His attention was focused on the road ahead, but he was vaguely aware of the tiny-framed woman huddled in the passenger seat. She gripped the edge of the leather seat, her knuckles white.

The car raced down dimly lit suburban streets, past charming row houses and charmless apartment complexes. Kyle spared the rearview mirror a quick glance. The black sedan’s flat tire promised him a five-minute head start, certainly no more. He looked at Sofia. “What’s the fastest way to Highway 54?”

She swallowed hard. “Take the next left. You’ll avoid two lights.”

He did not slow down until he swung the car onto Raleigh Road and merged into traffic. Headlights pockmarked the street. Kyle released his breath in a quiet sigh. He had doubled their lead, though ten minutes was hardly anything worth bragging about. In his experience, fortunes and lives could be lost in less than ten minutes.

Sofia threw him a sideways glance. “Was that the IGEC or—?”

“The Rue Marcha.”

“The Rue Marcha. The Colombian cartel?”

Kyle frowned. She had heard of the Rue Marcha. Granted, the Rue Marcha did not exactly keep a low profile, but he had not expected the cartel to register in the worldview of the typical suburban American, especially not one who looked like she had never before contemplated drug use in her entire squeaky-clean life.

“How do you—?”

“Dad was from Brazil, Mom from Venezuela. We were on a first-name basis with all the cartels in the area. So, this Sanchez works for the Rue Marcha? Was he one of the men in the house?”

“Unfortunately not.” Or he would almost certainly have fired his gun with intent to kill.

“How did they find me?”

“The same way I did. The microchip has a heat-activated tracking device. It’s feeding off your body heat.”

“Okay...” She drew in a deep breath. “So we get it out of me. I have a friend who’s a paramedic—”

“Smith used the latest model, the RX-27. The microchip is going to go deep, as far as it can until it hits bone.”

He did not have to take his gaze off the road to know that she had turned to look at him, her brown eyes wide and face pale. “So, to get it out, we’d have to cut through muscle?”

He nodded.

She pressed her lips together. “Take me to a hospital.”

“And go through all kinds of explanations on what you’re doing with top secret military technology embedded in your arm?” His low grunt concealed the sharp inhalation of pain as he pulled his smartphone out of his pocket and told it to connect him with Zara Itani.

It was three in the morning, but she answered on the third ring, her voice briskly professional and not in the least bit sleepy. “What is it, Kyle?”

“The drop went bad.”

“Define bad.”

“Turns out, the customers were the Rue Marcha. Sanchez himself showed up. The IGEC was there too, and at least one of its agents got killed in the firefight.”

“I see...” Her voice was cool. “I think Proficere Labs’ agency fees just climbed several notches, and its right to ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ just got revoked.”

“You’re going to have to collect from someone other than Smith. He’s dead too.”

“I’ll take it out of Reynard’s hide. Did the IGEC claim the drop?”

“No, it’s sitting in a waitress’s arm. Smith shot her up with the microchip before he died. I have the cooler with the test tubes, but that’s useless without the information on the microchip. I have to get the chip out of her. Sanchez’s goons and the IGEC will be able to track her as long as it’s in her.”

Zara was briefly silent. “Take her to the free clinic in Anacostia.”

“In D.C.?”

“The only doctor I trust is in Anacostia. The clinic is on Good Hope Road and Seventeenth. Call me when you get into D.C., and you can give me an ETA. I’ll have him meet you there, regardless of the time.”

Kyle hung up the phone and glanced at Sofia. “We have to get to D.C. There’s a doctor at a free clinic who can help you.”

“D.C.? But that’s five hours away.”

“Four. We’ll be there before dawn.”

“No, no.” She shook her head. “I want it out of me now. There are hospitals in Chapel Hill, and I have classes in the afternoon, damn it.”

She had just been shot at, and all she could think about were her classes? Either her self-equilibrium was out of the world, or she was completely lacking perspective. Likely both. “Your life is in danger. Just roll with me on this one. I can get you out of this, but not gracefully or well if you’re going to fight me every step of the way.”

“It’s my arm, damn it. The free clinics are terrible. The doctors there are terrible. They’re the ones who can’t get jobs anywhere else. You can’t just take me to a clinic so that a hack of a doctor who’s too stupid to ask questions can cut the microchip out of me.”

He did not hesitate. “Zara doesn’t give her trust easily, and if she trusts this doctor, it’s where we’re going.”

“Who’s Zara?” She frowned, her eyebrows drawing together. “What...what do you do anyway?”

“Whatever needs to get done.”

“Like shoot up a club?”

He snorted and shook his head. “It was supposed to be a transfer. Proficere Labs wanted a neutral intermediary in the transfer of goods.”

“What kinds of goods?”

“Information. Proficere—”

“Is almost as bad as Pioneer Labs was,” Sofia said. Her voice was low and firm. “The kind of genetic research it does is wrong, and worse, the scientists are proud of it. They’re always taunting the IGEC. No wonder the agents showed up to stop the transfer of whatever it was. What was it?”

He shrugged.

She turned wondering eyes on him. “You don’t even know what it was? And you work for them?”

Her censuring tone set him on the defensive. “I work for Three Fates. We do contract work.”

“You’re mercenaries.”

It was the first time he had heard of his profession spoken of with that much disdain. “Do you have something against trying to make a living?”

“Make a living, no, but you don’t seem too selective in your choice of clients.”

“Zara chooses the clients and hands out the work.”

She huffed and folded her arms across her chest. “Right. Go ahead and blame the boss. It’s the standard cop out.”

Kyle shook his head, gritting his teeth against the sharp stab of pain in his right side. He would have to assess his injury before making the drive to D.C. If there was any chance of passing out from eventual blood loss, he would prefer to know about it sooner rather than later.

He pulled into a gas station. “Stay in the car,” he told her. Grateful that the crimson stain would not easily show up against his black shirt and pants, he stepped out of the car and started filling the car with gas. He then walked into the attached convenience store.

The young man behind the counter did not look up when Kyle walked around the poorly stocked aisles into the restroom at the far end of the store, next to a door marked Exit. The restroom was filthy, but the stall was large and had a sink, which was all he needed. Kyle stripped off his shirt and grimaced at the deep cut in his side. Fortunately, the bullet had not ripped through organs or major blood vessels. He would be all right, at least long enough to make it to D.C. Perhaps the doctor there could help.

Behind him, the door lock clicked.

What the—?

Hadn’t he locked the door?

Reaching for his Glock, he spun around. His jaw dropped when he saw Sofia glaring at him with a first aid kit in her hand.

She scowled at him. “I knew it. I thought I smelled blood in the car.”

“Didn’t your mother ever teach you to knock?”

“Not when you’re hoping to catch someone butt-naked or with an injury that they’re trying to hide.”

“How did you—?”

“You walked funny. You were favoring your right side.”

That was not an answer to the question he had intended to ask. He had locked the door, hadn’t he? Kyle glowered at her. “Did I ever mention that you’re too observant?”

“Several times now.” Sofia washed her hands in the sink, and then leaned down to peer at the cut. “You could use some stitches.” She opened the first aid kit and carefully picked through its contents.

“I see you rummaged through the trunk of my car,” he said blandly. “It’s a good thing I didn’t have a body hidden in there tonight.”

She cast him a dirty look. Clearly, the girl knew no fear. “I can make do with what you have here.”

“Do you know what you’re doing?”

“There are lots of self-help videos on YouTube.” She giggled when he frowned. “Of course I do. I took courses in first aid before I decided to sign up for my nursing program. It wouldn’t do to learn that I’m queasy about bodily fluids after graduating. In fact—”

She paused suddenly. He did too. He had not imagined the low thud, like that of something heavy, a body perhaps, falling to the ground. He shrugged on his shirt and pulled his gun from his leather jacket. Pale and silent, Sofia closed the first aid kit and picked up his leather jacket. She looked at him, and he nodded. It was the only assurance he could give.

He eased the door open and tried to peer out of the bathroom, but was driven back by a hail of bullets that ripped up the wooden doorframe. “Do you have the car keys?” He mouthed the words.

Sofia patted the pocket of her denim jeans.

“On my count, get out the back door and get to the car.”

She swallowed hard and nodded. He did notice that the only time she did not argue with him was when their lives were in danger. Smart girl.

“Three...two...one.” He stepped out of the doorway, ducked behind a nearby shelf, and opened fire in the direction where he had heard gunfire. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sofia, crouched low, dash out of the exit.

Cold night air wafted in her wake.

Kyle spared a quick glance out from behind the shelf. The young man who had been standing behind the cashier counter was nowhere to be seen.

Bullets smashed into the refrigerated displays behind him. Kyle brought his hands up to shield his face as the glass doors exploded into a deadly spray of shrapnel.

Damn it. Two shooters. He had to get clear, and he had to stop them both here, or they would follow Sofia.

He glanced up at the large, circular mirrors that the management of the store had installed to deter shoplifters. He could not see the shooters. It did not surprise him. The people of the Rue Marcha were more than street hoodlums; they were professional killers.

So was he.

Time to even the odds. He took careful aim at the long tubes of florescent lights overhead and blew them out with a single shot. A section of the store plunged into darkness. In that instant, he moved, racing toward the cover of another shelf.

Bullets raced over his head. Cans and packages of food tumbled from the shelves, rolling over his back. Kyle lunged forward, sliding over the slick linoleum tiles. He twisted onto his side and fired.

Someone howled in pain.

One down. Maybe.

He blinked as the glare of straight-on headlights flooded the store. The familiar purr of his car engine crescendoed into a roar.

What the hell was that girl doing?

Moments later, the glass storefront shattered to the cacophony of panicked screams.

Kyle raced past the cowering gunmen. His racing feet crunched on glass fragments. Sofia’s wide brown eyes stared at him from behind the steering wheel, her face pale in the surrounding darkness. He scrambled into the passenger seat and pulled the door closed. “Go!”

Sofia slammed her foot down on the gas pedal. Tires squealing, the BMW screeched into reverse, switched gears, and raced down the road.

Kyle looked over his shoulder. The dismayed faces of two Rue Marcha goons, who had scrambled from the ruins of the convenience store, shrank behind a cloud of exhaust. A tight grin creased his face as he turned back to Sofia. “You’re crazy, but I like your style of crazy.”

Chapter 4

Crazy?

She would have been insulted if Kyle hadn't made it sound like a compliment. Still, she took issue with his comment, and she would, at least once her heartbeat went back to normal. "That was the Rue Marcha, right? Not the IGEC?"

Kyle nodded. "IGEC agents play by the rule book. They announce themselves first and shoot later. Still, they'll be on your trail. Just a matter of time. We have to get the microchip out of your arm. Pull over."

"What?"

"I'll drive."

She shot him a narrow-eyed glance. "You're hurt."

"Yeah, well, I can still drive."

"And so can I."

"But—"

"But what? You think that just because you have a Y-chromosome you can drive better than I can?"

"Of course," he said, his tone matter-of-fact. "When did you get your certification in Israeli tactical driving techniques?"

She huffed out her breath. Sanctimonious prick.

He pointed at the building on the street corner. "Pull into that parking lot."

The police station? "What? You're not serious."

"Nowhere safer. You're not a fugitive from the law, at least not yet. I'll get out. You scoot over. No point in anyone seeing you."

A chauvinistic sanctimonious prick.

Who was trying to keep her safe, or at least anonymous.

She did as he instructed and watched him as he stepped out of the car. His stride was strong, and she had to stare closely to notice that he was favoring his right side. How badly hurt was he? "You should get that treated," she said when he reentered the car.

"I will, after we put a hundred miles between us and the Rue Marcha."

“You said the tracking device is feeding off my body heat. Is there any way to dampen the signal?”

“Sure.” Kyle nodded. “We could cut off your arm and bury it in ice, but that’s not optimal, right?”

Jerk. She slanted him a glance as he pulled the car out of the parking lot. The pale golden streetlights flashing by accentuated his harsh profile. His mouth was set in a firm, unsmiling line, but his eyes did not seem as hard and unyielding as they had back at the club. He was almost gorgeous.

She ground her teeth in an attempt to refocus her thoughts. “What about ice packs?”

“An ice pack on your arm isn’t going to cool your body temperature enough to dampen the signal.”

“I meant you. You could use an ice pack on your wound.”

He shook his head. “It’s not bad. Glancing shot. Mostly skin. The bleeding’s stopped.”

She almost made a snide comment but thought better of it. Honey worked better than vinegar. “I can hold the ice pack for you while you drive.”

“I said I’m fine.”

She threw up her hands. “Fine. Just be sure to pull over before you pass out.”

A long, silent moment dragged between them, and then he chuckled, a deep rumble that caught her off guard. “Crazy, with an attitude. You’re growing on me, you know.”

“If you think comparing me to mold sounds romantic, think again.”

“I have been thinking hard. You’ve just been shot at. How is it you’re so calm? Most women would be in hysterics by now.”

“Most women?” She rolled her eyes and settled in her seat, tugging her jacket around her for warmth. With effort, she shoved away the memory of her last encounter with a gun. “You don’t get out much, do you? Ever seen a hospital delivery room? Women are plenty calm. The men, however, are basket cases.”

Kyle punched a button on the car dashboard. He had activated the seat warmer, she realized, as a cozy heat radiated from the car seat. He continued without missing a beat. “I know several women who might be able to kick my ass in hand-to-hand combat, but it doesn’t change the fact that most women can’t.”

“Who are they?”

“What?”

“These women who can kick your ass in hand-to-hand combat. Friends?”

His brow furrowed for the briefest instant, pain flashing through his eyes, before his expression smoothed into stoniness.

Sofia drew in a jagged breath. She had overstepped. She braced for a flash of violence; she knew, certainly, that he was capable of it.

The silence simmered between them.

Kyle was quiet for so long she was certain he did not intend to reply. “It would depend on your definition of friends,” he said finally.

The tension in his voice warned her not to probe further.

For a few minutes, she obliged. Her jaw taut, she stared out the window at the familiar scenery of fast food chain restaurants and big box stores peppering both sides of I-85N. Within a half hour, the pervasive signs of suburban America would give way to snow-dusted trees and empty fields. She rubbed her hand against her arm where the microchip was embedded. Her arm did not feel any different, but everything had changed. She turned to Kyle. “What’s going to happen when you get the microchip out?”

“You go back to Chapel Hill.” He glanced at the digital clock on the dashboard. “You might even make it to your afternoon classes on time.”

“And what’s going to happen to you? To the microchip?”

“Zara will probably use it as leverage, make sure Proficere Labs pays up before she releases it.”

“But what’s on it? Why does the Rue Marcha and the IGEC want it?”

“What does it matter?”

“It matters because it’s in me, Kyle. I’d like to know what the hell I’m carrying. It matters—it really does—who we give the microchip to.”

Kyle raised his eyebrows. “We?”

“Yes, I was trying to be polite. The microchip is in me; I could have said ‘I’ instead of ‘we.’”

He shook his head. A muffled sound escaped past the fist he pressed to his mouth.

“Something in your throat?” Sofia asked politely.

He dropped his hand. “Right.” The amused gleam in his eyes sharpened. “Look, you’re a bystander, an innocent one at that, caught up in something far larger than yourself. Not exactly what you bargained for when you started your shift at Zanzi-Bar. As soon as the microchip is out of your arm, you can cut yourself loose.”

“Three people died today.”

“Not a big number in the grand scheme of things.”

“What?” Her eyebrows drew together. “You’re kidding, right?”

“How does that make what happened today trivial?”

He scowled. “That’s not what I said. I just don’t get how you’re so eager to jump into this when most people would be trying to get out of it.”

“Perhaps I wouldn’t feel the need to be so involved if you showed a bit more interest in what the microchip actually contains.”

“Look, it’s not my job—”

“And I’m sure that’s going to hold up just great in a court of law. Do you know how much genetic research is considered out of bounds? Flat out illegal?”

He hesitated, but not long enough to satisfy her. His response certainly did not. “This is Zara’s problem. She’ll take care of it.”

“She sounds as mercenary as you. Worse, actually.”

“Right, one that a drug cartel and the IGEC would kill to obtain? I don’t think so.”

“What’s with your obsession with getting to the bottom of this? What are you, some kind of private investigator?”

She inhaled deeply and waited until she was certain her voice would hold steady. Her true reasons ran deeper, their consequences devastatingly personal, but she offered the logical argument, the one that most people, including Kyle, she hoped, would buy.

“International Genetic Law is a mandatory first-year class. The professor bombarded us with examples of irresponsible research. Five years ago, in a village in Chad, a genetically engineered strain of the common flu killed twenty percent of the people it infected. Two years ago, a variant of the bubonic plague escaped or was released by a Chinese laboratory into a rural countryside. It devastated the region, killing seven hundred people before it faded out. Nine months ago—”

He waved a hand, cutting her off. “You think there’s a lot more to this microchip than a basic genetic analysis.”

“Don’t you?”

Kyle did not answer.

He mulled over her question—no, not a question. It had been a statement.

Three Fates mercenaries were known for their strict adherence to their stick-to-the-project-scope mentality. Zara had drummed it into them, which was ironic considering she was practically compulsive about exceeding the scope of her projects. But then again, they all knew how much havoc Zara caused when she deviated from the plan. Society was still reeling from its repercussions.

No surprise then that Three Fates contracts were written to protect the agency from legal entanglements, regardless of how borderline illegal its mercenaries’ actions appeared to be.

Like overseeing an information transfer between a genetics laboratory known for breaking rules and a South American drug cartel.

His contract compelled him to retrieve the microchip and return it to Proficere Labs, no questions asked.

Sofia demanded differently.

Kyle ground his teeth. The last thing he needed was a do-gooder with a shaky grasp on reality. Real life had a tendency to kick those people in the ass.

He just had to convince her of it.

He glanced at her. “Sofia—”

She was asleep, her head resting against the car door. Her face was serene, and her chest rose and fell with each gentle breath.

The tension locked around his heart like a clawed fist eased away. He smiled. She seemed young and fragile. No, she was young—an entire decade younger than his thirty-three years—and still naive enough to be idealistic, but she was not fragile. She was cool and levelheaded under fire, and apparently had the gumption to ram his car into a storefront to save his life.

None of that matched her public profile of a middle-class college graduate raised in suburban America. Who was she really?

More importantly, where did her strength come from?

Most importantly, what kind of a pain in the ass was she going to be?

Kyle let her sleep. The miles raced by, but each minute seemed to crawl. The pain in his side settled into a dull throb. The wound was not much more than skin-deep; the bleeding had stopped quickly. Surely, the doctor could look at it.

Zara's apparent trust notwithstanding, Kyle was as leery as Sofia was of the free clinics. They skimmed the bottom of the barrel as far as medical talent was concerned, but even a free clinic doctor, however incompetent, should be able to handle a simple wound cleaning and apply a bandage.

He passed the time by alternately checking the digital clock on the dashboard and his rearview mirror. As far as he could tell, they were not followed, though he was certain that the Rue Marcha and the IGEC were tracking the microchip. At best, he had a fifteen-minute to half-hour lead, and he had been squeezing the speed limit for all it was worth. It would not do to get pulled over by an overzealous police officer.

The predawn sky was still dark when he crossed into Washington, D.C. He pulled out his smartphone and called Zara. He kept his voice low. "I'm fifteen minutes out."

Her reply was terse. "All right. He'll meet you at the clinic."

He hung up and glanced at Sofia. She had hardly stirred in all that time. He reached over and shook her gently.

After several moments, she sat up and blinked, rubbing sleep from her eyes.

"We're almost there," he said.

She twisted around in her seat to look out the rear window of the car. "We're okay?"

"So far."

Her shoulders sagged with relief. She turned to him. "And you?"

"Still alive."

"Maybe you can get the doctor to look at it."

"Yeah, I will."

The clinic was dark when they pulled up. "Stay here," he instructed curtly before stepping out of the car. His caution was instinctive. Washington, D.C., was Zara's backyard and playground, and as a rule, Three Fates employees stayed out of the city, but even he had heard of Anacostia. One had to be suicidal or desperate to enter the gang-controlled warzone.

He liked to think he was the latter, not the former.

The glow of streetlamps seemed too far apart, their meager pools of light devoured by the surrounding darkness. Graffiti adorned the buildings, and the windows were barred. He wrinkled his nose against the stench, a blend of cheap alcohol and urine, wafting from the gutters.

Unease tickled along his spine.

The shadows were far too deep even for someone like him who utilized them as allies and weapons. He looked up at the sound of uneven footsteps.

A man emerged out of the darkness, his features cast in shadow. He leaned heavily on the crutch under his left arm. “Are you Kyle Norwood?” His voice was a melodic tenor with an underlying sheen of polish that hinted at private schools and a life of privilege. Certainly not what Kyle expected to hear in Anacostia.

He buried his surprise with a gruff answer. “Yes.”

The man nodded. “I’ll open the clinic.”

Kyle glanced back as Sofia stepped out of the car. “I thought I told you to stay in the car.”

“Is that the doctor?” she asked quietly.

“I guess so.”

The man unlocked the door of the clinic, pushed it open, stepped in, and turned on the light. Sofia and Kyle followed. The man turned to face them. Sofia gasped. Kyle took a step back.

The man’s pale blond hair was cropped short, and it accentuated the stark perfection of his sculptured features, marred only by a nearly invisible scar on the right side of his face, from ear to chin. His eyes were dark, almost black.

He was instantly recognizable.

The stunned whisper ripped from Kyle’s throat. “Galahad?”

Everyone knew Galahad, or at least knew of Galahad, the genetically engineered perfect human being created by Pioneer Labs.

Sofia breathed softly, almost reverently. “No, you’re not Galahad. You’re his physical template. You’re Danyael Sabre, the alpha empath.”

It wasn’t Galahad. It was worse. Far worse.

To Sofia’s astonishment, Kyle took another step back.

Danyael cast Kyle a glance of veiled amusement. “Don’t worry. I won’t hurt you.”

Sofia tried to choke back a giggle and failed. It was ludicrous to hear a cripple say what Danyael had said to a man who was built like a special-ops soldier, but from the alpha empath, it sounded matter-of-fact.

Where Kyle exuded an air of controlled menace, Danyael projected quiet, the kind of silence in which one could hear oneself breathe and think. Danyael did not posture; he had nothing to gain. His reputation had been made. He was not just Galahad's physical template. He was an alpha empath who could, if rumors were true, heal or kill with a touch.

And he was actually standing in front of her.

She shook her head, breaking out of her reverie. "I'm sorry. It's like seeing the tooth fairy or the Easter bunny. You're like...legend."

Danyael shrugged. "I just work here. Let's get your arm tended to." He led the way to the small operating room. "Sit." He nudged his head toward the narrow bed, and turned around to search the drawers.

Sofia hiked herself up on the operating bed. What did one say to an alpha empath to whom all emotions were transparent? How about starting with the truth? "I'm in a nursing program. I started last fall."

Danyael turned back to her with a faint smile. He held a scalpel in his hand. "Are you enjoying it?"

"Yes, very much. Is it going to hurt? Shouldn't you give me a jab or something, or clean the area with antiseptic?"

Danyael chuckled. The sound warmed her as if he had wrapped a soft blanket around her. "If it'll make you feel better, I can go through the motions, but no, it won't hurt, and no, you don't need antiseptic. I'll clean the wound before I close it."

Kyle leaned against the doorframe, his face set in stoic lines.

Sofia had intended to talk about her nursing program, but instead, she watched in fascination as, with gentle fingers, Danyael probed the area where the chip had been inserted and then touched the scalpel to her skin. She knew she should have felt something when the scalpel slid into her flesh in an incision that was as deep as it was long. Blood welled up, but the pain never materialized.

No, she was wrong. It appeared in Danyael's eyes. His jaw tensed, and he closed his eyes briefly, breathing deeply and slowly until the hitch of pain passed.

Danyael set the scalpel down, parted the incision, and with a pair of tweezers, extracted a tiny, bloody microchip. He placed it in a petri dish and looked up at her. "Done."

The alpha empath placed two fingers on the lowest point of the incision and slowly traced its length. Where his fingers touched, warmth sank into her. The sensation of flesh stitching together was disconcerting, like live worms wriggling, melding into each other. Muscles repaired as if they had never been cut, flesh healed, and finally a thin layer of healthy skin replaced the angry slash of scar tissue that had initially formed over the incision.

Sofia could not manage a word. Her jaw still hung open.

Danyael stepped back. He said nothing either. He rinsed the microchip with cleaning alcohol, and slid it into a small and translucent plastic case no larger than a fingertip. He turned and held it out to her. “Here you go. How do you feel?”

“Great, just great.” She grinned. “Wow, that was amazing. Thank you.”

“You’re welcome.”

She stared at the plastic case containing the microchip but did not reach for it. “What do you think is on it?”

Danyael shrugged. “Impossible to guess without an analysis, but based on my limited experience with Proficere’s work, probably something cutting-edge with dangerous implications. Do you want me to give this to Zara?”

“If it’s dangerous, wouldn’t Zara be at risk if she had it?”

He laughed softly. “You’d have to meet Zara to understand.”

Kyle stepped forward and held his hand out.

Danyael did not relinquish the microchip. His dark eyes searched her face.

The choice was hers.

It had been easier to hold on to principles when it was embedded in her arm. It was a great deal harder to reach out to seize it.

Except that she remembered her father’s shuddering shoulders, his arms wrapped around Sofia’s mother. Their heads bowed over the misshapen infant they had lovingly wrapped in a hand-knitted blanket. The child’s face was waxy, her tiny body still. Her eyes had never opened.

The baby who would have been Sofia’s younger sister had been stillborn. The doctors had declared it a mercy. She was deformed, physically and mentally damaged, an innocent victim of a virus Sofia’s mother had contracted while pregnant.

A genetically engineered virus accidentally released from its sterile laboratory confines.

Sofia, then only seven, had crept into the hospital room to stare upon the face of her dead sister, the sister she had wanted with every ounce of her being.

The baby did not even look human.

Sofia’s fingers inched tentatively toward the baby, but did not make contact.

When the nurses finally removed the corpse from the room, guilt plunged through Sofia. She looked back at her mother, at her sagging belly, now bereft of child. Just the prior night, Sofia had pressed her lips to her mother’s swelling stomach. “I can’t wait to love you and play with you. I’m going to give you lots of kisses!”

She had lied.

Sofia blinked back the sting of tears and looked up. Danyael’s eyes were surprisingly gentle, as if he understood. She drew in a deep breath and took the plastic-encased microchip from him. For you, sis.

Danyael turned to Kyle and gestured to his right side. “Did you want me to help with that?”

Alarm flashed across Kyle’s face. He shook his head. “No, I’m fine.”

Danyael shrugged. He steadied the crutch under his arm and limped out of the operating room. Kyle and Sofia followed. Danyael met their eyes. “You should head out before Zara gets here.”

Sofia glanced past Danyael’s shoulder as a sleek black car pulled up to the clinic and parked in front of the No Parking sign.

Kyle grunted. “Too late for that.”

The driver’s door opened, and a woman stepped out onto the cracked pavement. She paid little attention to her surroundings as she opened the back door of her car and leaned in to retrieve something from the backseat.

From the alleyway beside the clinic, two figures peeled out of the shadows and stalked silently toward the woman.

Sofia grabbed Kyle’s wrist. “Kyle—”

Kyle shrugged. “She’s fine.”

Sofia twisted to look at Kyle and Danyael. Kyle looked indifferent, Danyael unconcerned. Neither man appeared inclined to come to the woman’s aid.

The thugs closed the distance. Ten feet became five. Five became two.

Sofia had to do something. She rushed to the clinic door and flung it open.

The woman stepped back and turned.

The two gangsters froze. The man closest to the woman stared unblinkingly into the muzzle of a handgun an inch from his nose.

The woman’s ruby red lips curved into a smile. “Run away, children.” Her voice was a soft purr. “I don’t have time to play, and you don’t want to die.”

The thugs pulled out switchblades and lunged at the woman.

Sofia blinked, recoiling instinctively. Gasps and thuds filled her momentary disorientation. By the time her mind sorted through the blur of motion, one man was on his back, groaning, and the other had fled, limping. The woman stood, unscathed. “Get lost,” the woman said, an undercurrent of steel in the seductive purr of her voice.

Muttering curses under his breath, the man hobbled to his feet and staggered away, his hands pressed against his crotch. The woman watched until he slunk into a dark alley and then glanced over at Sofia. “You must be Sofia Rios.”

“I...uh...”

The woman slipped her gun back into the shadows of her leather jacket and extracted a sleeping toddler from the car. With a soft grunt and a snore, the toddler settled against her shoulder. The woman turned and strode into the clinic.

Sofia got her first good look at Zara Itani.

Zara was at least half a foot taller than Sofia and attractive, the product of a mixed racial heritage. Blue-black hair framed a fine-featured face dominated by violet eyes. Her skin was the color of bronze honey.

Sofia blinked and took an involuntary step back.

Kyle was a soldier, tough and rough, but something about him seemed inherently trustworthy.

Zara, on the other hand, looked like an assassin. Her stance reminded Sofia of a tiger stalking prey. Not even the angelic blond-haired toddler dozing on Zara's shoulder could negate the sense of raw danger emanating from her.

Zara's eyes narrowed when she looked at Danyael, as if assessing him, but she said nothing. When she returned her attention to Sofia, she smiled. For a moment, she could have been just another attractive woman peddling useless luxury goods on a prime-time commercial—all welcome, no threat.

“Miss Rios, I'm sorry for all you've endured today, but I assure you, you're safe now. I'll arrange for another one of my employees to take you back to Chapel Hill.”

Sofia's grip tightened around the microchip. “What will happen to this?”

“I haven't decided.”

Sofia blinked. She had not expected Zara's frank reply.

“Technically, I'm its custodian, aren't I?” Sofia asked.

Zara threw her head back and laughed with genuine humor. “Technically, yes, but that oversight can be amended.”

Sofia's brow furrowed. Was that a threat?

Kyle crossed the small room to stand beside Sofia. His proximity braced her and stiffened her spine.

Sofia met Zara's eyes. “Do you know what's on this microchip?”

“No, not yet.”

Her voice quavered. “I intend to find out.”

“I can arrange for the microchip to be analyzed.”

Sofia shook her head. “I don't think I trust you.”

A low chuckle rumbled from Kyle's chest. “Smart.”

Zara tilted her head. Her violet eyes narrowed into cold slits.

Sofia's heart pounded. She swallowed hard through the lump of fear in her throat as Zara reached into her jacket.

Kyle yanked Sofia behind him. In that same instant, Danyael frowned and took a step forward, placing himself between Zara and Sofia. He cast the assassin a warning glance. “Enough.” His dark eyes glittered; his empathic powers flashed.

The tension in the room vanished, its heated edge dulled by the emotional equivalent of a dash of cold water.

Sofia inhaled sharply. She was not certain who was the more dangerous of the two—the assassin, Zara, or the crippled empath, Danyael.

Zara slanted Danyael a quick, annoyed look. “Stop screwing with my emotions. Stay out of this.”

“Too late. You dragged me into it,” was Danyael’s cool answer.

Kyle interceded quickly. “Leave Sofia and the microchip to me. I’ll handle this, figure out what the IGEC’s stake is.”

Zara’s gaze shuttled between Kyle and Sofia, before returning to Kyle. “You have twenty-four hours.”

“Give us forty-eight. If we hit a dead end, we’ll bring the microchip back.”

The assassin scowled.

Danyael reached for Zara’s hand, the gesture casual. Sofia, however, was immediately suspicious of his intentions. An alpha empath of Danyael Sabre’s caliber could not afford to be spontaneous or careless with touch, not when physical contact offered a perfect conduit for his empathic powers.

Sofia was right. Moments later, Zara waved her perfectly manicured hand in a dismissive gesture. “Fine.” She turned to Kyle. “You have forty-eight hours. Go with her. Keep the microchip safe.”

Sofia rolled her eyes. Good to know exactly where she fit in Zara’s grand scheme of things.

The toddler stirred and straightened in Zara’s embrace. She dragged a chubby hand over her eyes. A dazzling smile danced across her face as she extended her arms to Danyael. “Daddy!”

Daddy? Sofia’s wide-eyed gaze flashed between Danyael and Zara. She could not have imagined a more incongruous couple.

Except, their daughter notwithstanding, they were not a couple. Sofia had seen lifelong enemies regard each other with less wariness than Danyael did Zara.

Zara transferred the toddler to Danyael before walking Kyle and Sofia to the door of the clinic. “The last transmission from the microchip would have come from the clinic. How many people are tracking you?”

Sofia’s mouth dropped open. “Have I put Danyael at risk?”

Zara shook her head. “He can take care of himself—and he will, especially now that Laura’s with him. Still, I plan to keep an eye on the clinic for the rest of the day. The IGEC won’t mess with Danyael, not without authorization from the Mutant Affairs Council, so it’s only the Rue Marcha I have to worry about.”

Only the Rue Marcha? Zara had dismissed them as lightly as a forecast of brief afternoon showers.

Kyle frowned. “Are you going to call others in? It’s my mess, Zara, and I can take care of it.”

“Don’t worry about it. I’ll alert the Anacostia gangs to hang out around the clinic for the next few days.”

“Gangs?” Sofia echoed.

“Danyael’s on good terms with all the gangs in Anacostia. He’s treated just about every gang member since he started working at the free clinic. They’ll keep him safe.” She turned to Sofia. “Where will you go? Back to Chapel Hill?”

Eventually, but not yet. Sofia needed time to clear her head and figure out what to do with the microchip. “I have a town house in Dupont Circle.”

Zara looked thoughtful. “I’ll have Xin hack into the property records and change the title on the town house, at least until this case is over.”

Sofia’s mouth dropped open. “You can do that?”

“Yes, and we’ll handle your real estate agent too. We’ll have to cook up a different story for her, but we’ve done it before, and it’ll be easy. With luck, the Rue Marcha and the IGEC wouldn’t have gotten around to checking your public records yet, and you’ll be able to camp out safely in the town house. I’ll suggest you still keep an eye out for them, though.”

Sofia found Zara’s matter-of-fact tone deeply disturbing.

But Zara was right. Sofia was trapped at the center of a deadly triumvirate.

A South American drug cartel.

The enigmatic and supposedly all-powerful International Genetics and Ethics agency.

Three Fates—composed of mercenaries and assassins—possibly even more dangerous and less bound by ethics than the Rue Marcha and the IGEC.

What the heck had she gotten herself into?

Her fingers trembled, the palm of her hand sweaty against the plastic casing around the microchip. Her hand moved, the start of a forward motion to return the microchip.

Kyle’s hand landed on her shoulder—warm, reassuring.

The gesture anchored Sofia enough to meet Zara’s eyes. She would figure it out somehow. Her fist tightened around the microchip.

The fact that Kyle worked for Three Fates faded into irrelevance.

She could count on him to protect her, couldn’t she?

The curve on Zara’s lips was more smirk than smile. She jerked her head at Kyle’s car. “Now, get out of here before someone actually sees you.”

Chapter 5

Kyle felt uneasy when he pulled into a narrow parking lot behind a town house complex close to Dupont Circle. He cut the engine but made no move to open the car door. With an arm on the steering wheel, he turned to give Sofia a look that he hoped was sufficiently intimidating; it had cowed hardened soldiers before. “You’ll be safer in a hotel.”

“Where hundreds of employees have a master key to open your door? I don’t think so.” Not only was Sofia not intimidated, he did not think she even realized he was trying to intimidate her.

The corner of his mouth tugged into a wry half-smile. Yeah, didn’t work, but he had to try. Sofia’s independent and stubborn streak would have given even the notoriously headstrong Zara a run for her money.

Sofia opened the car door, stepped out, and pulled her key chain from her backpack. “The place might be a bit dusty, but it’ll have everything we need.”

He followed her up the narrow steps and threw a glance over his shoulder as she fiddled with the stubborn lock on the back door. No one had followed them, but a nasty coil of tension lodged in the pit of his stomach. He had not scoped out the place, had not plotted his escape routes. He was walking in blind, and he hated it.

Sofia twisted the key. “There!”

He stopped her before she could enter the town house. “I’ll go first.”

“I don’t think—”

He pulled his gun from its holster, pushed the door open, and stepped into the darkened interior.

Sofia sighed and folded her arms across her chest. “Watch your—”

His head rapped sharply against something hard. “What the—?”

“Head.” She sighed again, but a chuckle overlaid that sound.

He ducked beneath the overhead wooden shelves that seemed purposefully positioned to smash unsuspecting foreheads. “Who put that there?”

“My dad. We were all short. He didn’t have six-footers in mind when he installed the shelves for my mom.” She followed him into the house. Her fingers brushed against the side of his body as she groped along the wall. Florescent lights flickered reluctantly to life, illuminating the kitchen in a pale white glow.

The kitchen was ordinary, even plain, its brown-tiled floors and laminate countertops worn from long use. A vase of artificial flowers decorated the island, and two place settings were set on the small round table in the breakfast nook. The cabinets were still filled with glasses and dishes; pots and pans hung from an overhead rack.

This house was not just staged. It was fully furnished. “How long did you say this place has been listed for sale? Five months?”

“Yeah.” Sofia cracked open a windowpane to air out the musty room.

“And you haven’t moved out yet?”

She shuffled her feet and looked away. “Well, sometimes, my friends like to visit D.C., and they stay here instead of at a hotel. No harm, no foul.”

Why did she sound so defensive over a simple question? Kyle frowned but tucked the question into the back of his mind as he explored the rest of the first floor. The dining room was small, but the charming living room, with its French windows that opened to the front and back of the house, more than made up for it. He peered out the window; the car-lined road was empty, but lights illuminated the town houses along the street. Within an hour or two, Dupont Circle would bustle with activity unique to urban neighborhoods—people walking instead of driving—but for now, the lack of movement was reassuring.

Kyle tugged the lacy curtains together and rolled his eyes at the lack of privacy. He glanced at Sofia. “Looks like a nice neighborhood, and the real estate market in D.C. is tight. Why hasn’t anyone snatched this house up?”

A grimace of pain twisted her lips. “It’s a long story and it doesn’t matter.” She traced the brickwork on the mantelpiece. Her touch was gentle, lingering, as if caressing memories. “The bedrooms are upstairs, and I could use some rest.” She raised her head. Unshed tears glistened beneath her long eyelashes.

Kyle frowned. “Sofia?”

She tossed her head like a restless colt, turned her back on him, and marched up the stairs.

Women.

By the time he followed her up the stairs, she had claimed a small bedroom. Though cleared of personal items, the room was prettily coordinated with a cream furniture set against rose-pink wallpaper. Sofia was replacing the sheets on the twin bed when he entered. She bent over to tuck in the sheets, displaying the shapely curve of her denim-clad butt. He grinned with appreciation but wisely held his tongue.

She straightened and turned around. “You can have the guest room next door. I’ll get you fresh sheets.”

“What’s that?” He gestured at a closed door across the hallway. “The master bedroom?”

She nodded once and said nothing else as she stood on tiptoes to pull a set of sheets from the armoire before handing them to him.

His arms laden with bedsheets, Kyle walked into the guest room adjoining Sofia's room. The pale blue wallpaper was decades out-of-date, but it warmed him with memories of his adopted mother's old-fashioned but welcoming home. The wooden Quaker-style bed, side tables, and dresser appeared even older, but were well maintained and polished into a gleaming mahogany hue. The air freshener plugged into an electrical outlet filled the room with the scent of cedar logs.

He smiled. A comfortable, albeit tiny, guest room in a lovely home beat out a cookie-cutter hotel room any day. He had spent nights in far worse places, and none of them had a cute, though stubborn and innocently wide-eyed do-gooder in the next room.

He was ten years older than Sofia, and she was, by extension, a client of Three Fates, which made her strictly off-limits. He shook his head. She's wrong for me in so many ways.

Stifling a groan, he shrugged off his leather jacket, and grimaced as he probed his injury. Blood caked around the wound. Carefully, he peeled his cotton shirt away from his body. Fresh blood welled up. "Damn."

Sofia's quiet footsteps stopped outside the door. "I have towels—oh my God. You're bleeding again." She tossed the towels onto the bed and seized his hand. "Come with me."

She led him to a clean, tiny bathroom across the hallway. There was hardly enough space for one person, let alone two, but she ushered him in. Reaching past him, she lowered the cover over the toilet seat. "Sit down. I'll get the first aid kit from the car."

"I brought it in. It's in my backpack in the room."

Sofia nodded and scurried out, returning moments later with the first aid kit. She glowered at him as she dabbed at the wound with antiseptic wipes. "Why didn't you just let Danyael treat you as he offered?"

"I don't like mutants."

"What?" Her head snapped up. "You..." Her lips parted. Her eyes were wide and her expression vulnerable.

His brows drew together. "What?"

She shook her head. "Nothing." Her shoulders sagged on a silent sigh. "It's nothing."

Of course, it was something. Ah hell. Women were trouble. He opened his mouth to speak, but his voice escaped in a hiss of pain. He bit back a curse.

"Just a bit longer." Sofia applied an antibiotic cream to the injury and spread it across the angry red streaks radiating from wound. "You're lucky. This could have been so much worse." She applied a bandage and then stepped back. "Danyael would have done a better job than a first-year nursing student, but there you go."

Kyle grunted his thanks and shoved to his feet. His chest brushed against Sofia's fingertips. The tingle that sparked through him was completely unrelated to his injury.

Their eyes met.

Her unpainted lips, soft and moist, parted involuntarily.

Damn. To hell with Zara's damn principles on non-client involvement. He wanted her. "Sofia."

His voice ripped through the dreamy glaze in her soft brown eyes. She blinked hard. The vision of a young woman, on the verge of being seduced, vanished. She turned and scurried out of the bathroom before he could say another word.

Ah hell. He rolled his shoulders and stretched his back muscles. A dull pain tugged at his side, but it was bearable. A few hours of sleep would put him well on the path to recovery. Never mind that the sun was only just rising. He had been awake for twenty-eight hours. Unutterably weary, he dragged his hand over his face and sagged against the cold tiles of the bathroom wall.

Cloth rustled in the bedroom. What was Sofia doing? He left the bathroom and stood bemused by the doorway of his bedroom, watching in silence as she changed the sheets on his bed. When she was done, she turned around, her arms heaped high with bedsheets. She looked up at him, but the bright sparkle of her eyes seemed clouded and her smile was restrained.

"Go get some rest."

"Sofia—"

"Goodnight, Kyle." With a gentle hand, she stroked his cheek.

He turned his face into the palm of her hand. Her touch sent a tremor down the length of his spine. It had been too long if something so simple could turn him on. "Sofia..." His voice was husky, roughened by need.

Her eyes widened. She swallowed hard and took a step back, breaking contact. "I...should go... get laundry started."

Sofia dashed out of the bedroom and shut the door behind her.

A tight grin spread over his face as he stretched out on the bed, closed his eyes, and tried to ignore the ache in his body. He had to find a way to change her mind, after he caught up on his sleep.

Sofia released her breath in a shuddering sigh and fisted her hands against her eyes. What the hell had she been thinking?

That, she grimaced, was precisely the problem. She hadn't been thinking. How could she have thrown herself so shamelessly at a total stranger?

All I did was touch his cheek.

Yeah, right. Her gesture was hardly innocent; she had wanted to touch him. She closed her eyes but could not block the memory of his muscled torso quivering beneath her fingers as she dressed his injury. Surely drooling over a patient was a violation of the Hippocratic Oath.

She tensed. Danyael. She had even forgotten that she had endangered an innocent man by going to his clinic. An innocent man—an alpha mutant—protected by an assassin who appeared to be as cold as she was unscrupulous.

Sofia inhaled deeply and released her breath in a jagged sigh. Her mind told her that Danyael would be all right. In her heart, she still worried.

Her footsteps tapped lightly on the wooden floors of the landing as she walked past the closed door of the master bedroom, her eyes averted. She carried the dirty sheets down to the laundry machine in the basement. A dull pang shot through her as she wobbled on the unstable wooden step her father had never gotten around to fixing. The bottle of laundry detergent was almost empty—she added it to her mental shopping list—but the washer still worked, rumbling and grumbling its way through its wash cycle.

Sofia laid an affectionate hand on the machine. The town house in Washington, D.C., was as much home as the one in Chapel Hill. She knew when to watch her head and where to watch her step. She would miss the house when it was sold, if it was ever sold. On the advice of her real estate agent, she had cut the price three times. The house she had inherited from her parents was priced well below comparable properties, yet it didn't sell.

It was tainted.

She ground her teeth. Tainted was a horrible word. It negated her parents' existence, as if all the good they had done over the fifty or more years of their lives was completely undone by how they had died.

Then again, perhaps tainted was an accurate word after all. What else could explain her refusal to enter the master bedroom, the room where they had died?

The house seemed to close in, constricting like the coils of a boa tightening around her chest. She had to get out. Tears brimming in her eyes, she fled from the basement, snatched up her backpack, and stumbled out through the front door.

The blast of sunlight reminded her that the world continued to revolve, heedless of her personal troubles. She swallowed the lump in her throat and continued down the street. The familiarity of her surroundings comforted her—the promise that normality would soon return in spite of the plastic-encased microchip tucked in the pocket of her denim jeans.

She walked past adults in business suits, joggers in sweat suits, and dogs on leashes. A cat coiled on a sun-drenched windowsill yawned at her. Saigon Moon, the Vietnamese restaurant, was still around, as was the Dupont Diner. She would have to stop in for brunch one of these days. The grocer's store at the corner of Connecticut Avenue and Rhode Island Avenue was not open yet, but Jose Garcia, the owner, was inside. She waved at him through the glass door. With a smile, he bustled over and flipped the lock on the door.

"Chica!" He enveloped her in a hug before stepping back. "I've not seen you in so long."

"I've been in Chapel Hill."

He nodded, his brown eyes gentle with understanding and sympathy. "How you doing?"

She shrugged. "Okay, I guess."

"I heard you went back to school."

“Nursing.”

“You enjoy it?”

She mustered a thin smile and nodded. “Yeah, I do.”

He patted her on the back. “Your parents would be proud of you.”

She liked to think so, too.

Jose’s bushy eyebrows drew together. “But what are you doing here? Hasn’t school started?”

“Oh yes.” She scrambled to pull together a credible excuse. “Just an overnight visit.”

A grin split his face. “Well, good to see you again.”

“Thanks, Jose.” She glanced over her shoulder and surveyed his well-stocked shelves. “I know you don’t open till ten, but I need to stock the pantry.”

He frowned. “You’re back at the house? Are you okay there?”

“Sure,” she lied. “It’s furnished, and electricity and water’s still running.”

He shook his head. “You know that’s not what I mean.”

She laid a hand upon his beefy arm. “I’m fine, I promise.”

He sighed, but waved his hand in a gesture that encompassed his store. “Go ahead.”

Sofia grabbed a basket. Kyle seemed like a meat and potatoes kind of guy. Unfortunately for him, she was a beans and rice kind of gal. Perhaps they could compromise on gourmet pasta served over grilled chicken breast. Mouth pursed, she planned several meals as she wandered down the aisles before hauling her full shopping basket to the checkout counter.

“Wow, you having a party, chica?” Jose asked as he tallied up the bill. “Not inviting me?”

She handed him her credit card and grinned. “You party too hard, Jose. I am trying to sell the house; I can’t afford to wreck it.”

“Pssh.” He waved off her concerns. “Haven’t trashed a house in over three months.” The door buzzer went off with a violence that rattled the windows. He peered over her shoulder. “The newspaper’s here.”

“You still stock those?” she asked as he moved past her to unlock the door for the newspaper deliveryman.

“Some folks still like their news on real pages. Hey, Kent. How’s it going?”

“All good.” The deliveryman hefted a bundled stack of newspapers off his dolly and placed it in the wire newspaper container next to the checkout counter. With a tip of his baseball cap to Sofia, Kent strolled out, whistling tunelessly.

Sofia smiled at his back, but the smile drained from her face when her gaze fell upon the headlines. “Accused murderer discovered at IGEC raid of nightclub.” Finger trembling, she picked up the newspaper and scanned the tiny print. Her chest heaved with each unsteady breath. No...that’s impossible.

Jose’s concerned voice tore her out of her bemusement. “Sofia? You okay?”

“Yeah, I...” She folded the newspaper, added it to one of the brown paper bags Jose had packed with her groceries, and dug two dollars out of her purse to pay for the newspaper. “I’ll see you around.” She seized the handles and rushed out of the store.

The fifteen-minute walk back to the town house seemed too long. By the time she arrived, her arms ached from carrying the two heavy bags, and her mind was in turmoil. The house was quiet. Desperate loneliness clawed at her. She needed someone, and just then, the only someone was Kyle.

She left the groceries in the kitchen and ran up the stairs. Without a sound, she twisted the knob of the guest room door and eased the door open.

Kyle was fast asleep. He had kicked off the comforter and was lying on his side. She stared at him, a smile inching across her face. He was gorgeous. He did not possess Danyael’s supermodel features, but Kyle’s rough-hewn features made him feel more—Sofia groped for the right word—solid. And when he smiled, the corners of his eyes crinkling with amusement, he could make her stomach twist into intricate knots.

Somehow, he made her feel safe.

Sofia reached for the blanket to tug it over his body, but the movement jostled him slightly. Still asleep, he turned onto his back. His groping hand grasped her lower arm. A vulnerable half-smile flickered across his face. “You’re here...” he whispered.

“Kyle?”

“Lydia. You came back...”

She would have to be deaf to miss the pain in his voice. Was this the same man who had so brashly thrown himself into a gunfight to save her life? And who was Lydia? She shook him gently. “Kyle, you’re dreaming. Wake up.”

Green eyes flashed open. He blinked several times. “So-Sofia?”

The acute disappointment in his voice raked her even though she had no reason to expect otherwise from a man she had known for less than twelve hours. She leaned back, a fractional movement away from him. The room was suddenly stifling; she needed space. “I have to put the groceries away.”

“Groceries?” In an instant, he was fully awake. He sat up and swung his feet over the side of the bed. “You went out?” The hint of aching loss in his voice was replaced by sharp demand.

Her chin tilted up. “We needed food.”

“Are you out of your mind? The Rue Marcha and IGEC are still looking for you.”

She shook her head and scowled at him. “I needed fresh air.”

Kyle gritted his teeth. “Next time, why don’t you just hand the damn microchip over to them and be done with it?” He reached for his smartphone on the bedside table and glanced at the time. “How long were you out?”

“About an hour. A bit less.”

“Anyone see you?”

His abrasive questioning ground on her nerves. Her reply was frosty. “Yeah, about a hundred people going about their daily business.”

“How the hell am I supposed to protect you if you don’t tell me where you’re going?”

“I thought your job was to protect the microchip.”

He sneered. “You’re an extension of it.”

She glowered at him. When he was awake, he was as much a cold-hearted ass as Zara. “When you’re done being mad at me, you can come downstairs for a breakfast we wouldn’t have if I hadn’t gone out for groceries.” She spun on her heel and stalked out of the room.

The last sound she heard coming from Kyle’s room was a four-letter expletive.

Chapter 6

Kyle's hands fisted into the bedsheets. All right, perhaps he had been hard on her, but hell, she deserved it. What had she been thinking, leaving the house unescorted, unprotected? Was he supposed to applaud her gutsiness or smack her for her idiocy?

She deserved the former, but the latter would have been a great deal more satisfying.

He settled for getting out of bed and stepping into the shower. The hot water ran cold faster than he would have liked, but it was enough to reset his sour mood. With a towel wrapped around his waist, he returned to his bedroom and pulled on a clean shirt and pants that he had dug out of his backpack. If his unexpected stay lasted beyond the weekend, he would need several new changes of clothes. He snorted. Perhaps he could send Sofia out on another shopping expedition.

When the smell of bacon wafted up to him, he closed his eyes in ecstasy. His stomach rumbled. Armed with a few hours of sleep and a marginally better attitude, he went downstairs to the dining room where a plate of scrambled eggs, bacon strips, and grilled tomatoes awaited him. He peeked into the kitchen. He did not see Sofia, but rustling sounds came from the pantry.

"Is this mine?"

"Yeah." Her voice was muffled. "There's bread in the toaster oven. Butter's in the fridge."

Admiring her efficiency and her inability to hold a grudge, he sat down to enjoy his breakfast. Idly, he picked up the newspaper—the relic of a passing age—on the table and unfolded it.

It took several moments for the jumble of words to untangle. He waited patiently; experience had taught him that stress aggravated his dyslexia. He saw no need to turn a casual scan of morning news into a frustrating experience.

His fork paused on the way to his mouth. He leaned forward to stare at the headlines on the front page. What the hell?

The newspaper article described the IGEC raid on Zanzi-Bar and announced three casualties—one IGEC agent and two bar patrons. Their connections to the Rue Marcha and Proficere Labs, however, went unmentioned. The focus of the article was on the bartender. The good-looking and flirtatious man whom Kyle had thought was Stefan Agnor, a college dropout, was actually Stefan Karel Varak, an alpha telepath and eco-terrorist accused of five assassinations in Europe and on the run from Interpol. The terrorist had apparently disappeared after the raid.

Kyle snorted. Lucky bastards. The IGEC had not been hunting for Stefan Varak, but his presence, which the IGEC agents had apparently detected after the fact, had saved them from the embarrassment of admitting that their raid of Zanzi-Bar had failed to intercept the transaction between Proficere Labs and the Rue Marcha.

Still, Stefan was a problem.

Kyle shoved back his chair and stalked into the kitchen. He flung open the pantry door.

Sofia stood on tiptoes, reaching for jars of pickled fruit on the top shelf.

Kyle reached over her head, grabbed two jars, and handed them to her. "Need more?"

"No, I'm set."

"The bartender, Stefan...how well did he know you?"

She shrugged. "Better than most. He walked me home after every shift."

"Does he know about your town house in D.C.?"

"Yeah. He listened to me grumble about not being able to sell it."

"And your do-gooder tendencies?"

Her eyes narrowed into slits. "You know, you need to stop treating basic decency and a normal sense of ethics like infectious diseases."

That would be a yes. He reached for his smartphone and called Zara.

She answered immediately. "I hope your morning has been less eventful than mine." Her businesslike tone was brisk.

"What happened?"

"We've had two Rue Marcha runs on the clinic so far. The Mutant Affairs Council is furious that someone's coming after Danyael, so they sent out a team of enforcers to protect him."

"Really? Why would an alpha empath of Danyael's caliber need other alpha mutants to protect him?"

"Technically, he shouldn't, but he balks at killing, even in self-defense. Anyway, the Rue Marcha's body count is piling up. But enough about me. What have you done on this fine winter day?"

Oh, besides screwing up a transfer between Proficere Labs and the Rue Marcha, and heading on the run with a sexy snip of a waitress? "I got two hours of sleep."

"Lucky you."

"Did you see the report on the IGEC raid?"

"Yes, and the poor sod who's taking the fall for it."

Kyle snorted. Zara had a soft spot for other assassins. "Stefan knows about Sofia's Dupont Circle town house."

"Hmm..." The crisp veneer dropped away. Zara's voice softened to a seductive purr, a sign that death, or at least havoc, was on her mind. "I'll have someone take care of it."

He frowned into the phone. "Zara, Sofia considers him something of a friend."

"He's not going to be much of a friend if he's captured and gives her location away."

“I’ll make sure it’s as fast and painless as possible.” The next sound was a click.

With a sigh, he stared at his smartphone before putting it away. He had not yet met anyone who could effectively handle Zara Itani. Not even Danyael.

Sofia frowned at him. “What is Zara going to do?”

“She said she’ll handle it.”

She marched up to him, her hands on her hips. Kyle suppressed a grin. God, she was adorable when she was furious. Her brown eyes glowered like twin stars, and her pout, which she probably intended to be fierce, only managed to be cute. “What do you mean by ‘she’ll handle it’?”

Kyle did not think it would reassure Sofia to hear that it would probably involve lots of blood and a funeral, but Zara was right. Stefan was an issue—one with the potential to become a huge problem. The sooner the threat was neutralized by whatever means Zara determined necessary, the better. “She knows what to do. She’ll do the right thing.”

Sofia cocked her head to the side. “Really? I was under the impression that Danyael’s her conscience.”

Kyle suppressed a chuckle. “I’m going to finish my breakfast. Did you have something, too?”

“Yogurt.”

“Not much of a breakfast.”

“Not much of an appetite. Will you be done soon? We’ve got a lot to do. We need to find a scanner to read and translate the information on that microchip.”

Kyle leaned a shoulder against the pantry doorframe. “Your best bet would be a scientific laboratory. Proficere’s in Durban, but it is four hours from here; I wouldn’t recommend it. There’s Pioneer Labs in Boonsboro, Maryland, but it’s supposedly a wreck, destroyed by fire when Galahad escaped.”

“What about medical schools? They have laboratories too.”

“Lots of medical schools in the area—”

Sofia’s eyes brightened. “Johns Hopkins in Baltimore has a fantastic lab and an extensive library. It’s not far, right?”

“An hour, maybe more with traffic.” He glanced at the time on his cell phone. “I’ll be ready to head out in twenty minutes. How are you planning to get into the lab?”

“Knock on the door and ask politely, as opposed to your style, which would be to break in?”

Kyle grinned. The sweet innocence she exuded made her sarcasm that much more entertaining. He reached out and tweaked her nose. “You know, I could really grow to like you. Let me see what I can do.” He reached for his phone and hit the second number on speed dial.

“Are you calling another one of your mercenary friends?”

“Shhh. Xin’s with the National Security Agency.” He had the pleasure of seeing her eyes widen.

“You mean you actually have friends on the right side of the law.”

“Sometimes you need to be on the right side of the law to effectively get things done.”

“Wait...Xin...isn't she the person Zara was going to call to change the title on my house?”

Kyle nodded. “That’s the one.”

Sofia threw her hands up in the air. “What the—?”

“Hello?” A soft female voice answered the phone.

“Xin?” Kyle held up a hand to silence Sofia. “Hey, I need access to a genetic research laboratory, one with the technology to decode a Proficere Labs microchip. I was thinking of Johns Hopkins.”

“They should have what you need,” Xin said.

“Do you know anyone there who can help? My client has strong moral objections to B and E.”

Sofia’s brow furrowed. “B and E?” she asked in a whisper.

“Breaking and entering,” Kyle explained.

Xin laughed. Obviously, she had overheard Sofia. “Sounds like you have your hands full. Let me see what I can do.” She was briefly silent. “Well, I can tap into my contacts, but they tend to be suspicious, and I know you’d rather fly under the radar. Your best bet is to connect with a researcher, preferably an absent-minded one. Did you ask Danyael?”

“Danyael?”

“He got his M.D. from Hopkins. He’s probably still got friends there.”

Kyle gritted his teeth. “I’d rather not.”

“Really, Kyle.” Xin sounded exasperated. “What’s your problem? Do you dislike Danyael because he’s a doctor or because he’s a mutant?”

He fought to control his temper. “Now isn’t the right time for this discussion.”

“Fine. I’ll call Danyael. I’ll be back in touch as soon as I can.”

Kyle disconnected the call and glanced down to find Sofia staring at him with a worried expression.

“Can she help us?” she asked. “And is Danyael okay?”

“Huh? Yeah, Danyael’s fine. Go get ready. Xin can reach us on the road.”

Sofia cast him a searching look but did not probe further. She walked out of the kitchen, and he heard her footsteps fade as she climbed the steps.

Grateful for the solitude, he returned to his unfinished breakfast but found that he had lost his appetite. Xin’s casual jab had cut deeper than he expected.

He had reasons, but unfortunately, they seemed trite after his encounter with Danyael Sabre. Kyle grunted with frustration and dragged his hand through his hair. What was it about the alpha empath that made his firmly anchored worldview tremble?

Upstairs, Sofia showered quickly—Kyle had apparently used up most of the hot water—and changed, tugging a sweater over her T-shirt before picking up her coat. She threw a final glance at herself in the mirror. The makeup she wore was a habit, or at least that was what she liked to tell herself. The fact was, she felt an odd need to make herself look attractive to Kyle.

I'm not attracted to him, am I?

He was a mercenary who was different from terrorists only insofar that he was driven by money and profits instead of some fanatical religion or philosophy.

Or was he?

He had supported her decision to hold on to the microchip even though the money dictated that she return it to Proficere Labs immediately.

She walked out of her bedroom. As she crossed the landing, her gaze fell upon the door of the master bedroom. Her breath shuddered, and she closed her eyes against the prick of tears. The deep, hollow ache in her chest stunned her.

How long would it take her to get over the pain?

She found her hand on the door handle without even recollecting the few steps she had taken to close the distance to the door.

There is nothing to see in there.

She pressed down on the door handle and pushed the door open.

Light shone in through the white lace curtains, illuminating tiny dust motes floating through the air. The room, twice the size of her own, had a king-sized bed. The dark mahogany dresser, armoire, and dressing table matched its headboard. She still remembered the hours—actually, it had been weeks—her mother had spent agonizing over whether to buy the bedroom set. Her mother had always been watchful about money. In a one-income household, she had to be.

Small. She could think of no other word to describe her family. Small, but perfect.

Her mother had always been around for her, walking her to and from school each day and tutoring her through her schoolwork. In lieu of siblings, Sofia had her mother for a friend. Her father had been her protector, her white knight. When she lost them both, she did not just lose her parents. She lost her entire family and her best friends.

“Sofia?”

Damn it. She had not heard Kyle’s footstep on the stairs.

Sofia swiped her hand across her eyes and spun around as Kyle walked into the master bedroom. His gaze swept across the room before narrowing its focus to her face. “You okay?”

“Yeah.” Her voice trembled.

He frowned and glared around the room as if trying to find whatever it was that had offended her. She placed her hand against his arm. “Let’s go.”

“Yeah, I was waiting for you. What took so long? What’s in here?”

“Nothing, just a bedroom.”

“So what about it got you upset?”

She shook her head. “Let’s go.”

“Nope.” He sat on the bed. The quilt-covered mattress sank beneath him, sending up a small cloud of dust. “Not going anywhere until you tell me why this room has you all freaked out.”

“I’m not.”

His eyebrows drew together. “Sofia.” His exaggerated patience almost buried the underlying note of concern. “I’ve seen you look at the closed door of this room like there’s a ghost in it.”

She twitched. His words hit too close to home. Her shoulders sagged as she stared at the framed picture of a flower-covered meadow on the bedside table.

For twenty-four years of her life, the picture frame had contained a photograph of her parents on their wedding day, smiling at each other with as much love on that day as they had on the evening before they died.

There had been no smiles in the early hours of the hot and muggy summer day they died.

She turned her back on Kyle, but he caught her hand before she could make her escape. With a sharp tug, he pulled her to sit on the bed beside him.

“Okay, what’s up?” His voice was gruff, but his arm around her waist was gentle.

How could she speak through the huge and painful pressure in her chest? He did not look at her face, and for that, she was grateful. He kept his attention on the fingers that he entwined with hers.

“You know, back in the day, when I was with the Rangers, I developed something of a reputation for reading minds.”

She pulled back. “You’re a telepath?”

He shook his head. “Nope, just good at putting facts together. Let’s see. You say this house has been on the market for five months; that means it went up for sale in August of last year. Prime location, but no one has bought it. What happened in D.C. prior to August of last year?”

She tensed and tried to tug her hand out of his grasp.

He did not let her go. His large hand encompassed hers, warm and strong.

His face tightened, the muscles around his cheeks pulling his mouth into a thin, flat line. “Sakti. Sakti attacked the city on Independence Day.” He turned and searched her face.

She nodded. It was all she could manage.

He shook his head. “I’m sorry. We could move to a hotel. We don’t have to be here.”

“This was...is...home.” She glanced around her parents’ bedroom. As a child, she had spent many nights curled between her parents with a large pile of books spread across the bed. Her parents—her mother voice’s sweet and lilting, her father’s deeper and sonorous—would take turns reading to her.

Sofia blinked.

Her memories of their soft voices spiked into desperate pleas for mercy and screams of pain. Her quiet sobs of desperation had punctuated her parents’ final gasps as they were executed by mutants intent on spreading havoc through the city.

The newscasters had called it “generalized terror.” To her, the terror was brutally specific. She could still feel the chafe of the handcuffs around her wrists—handcuffs she had not been able to undo. She had watched helplessly as the bullets raced through the air.

Stop it! Stop it!

Her mind fumbled. The bullet slipped past her mental fingers.

What was the point of being a telekinetic if she could not do something as simple as free herself? If she could not stop a bullet aimed at her mother’s head? At her father’s heart?

Her chest hitched, catching around a sob. What was the goddamned point of her mutant powers if she could not save the ones she loved?

Kyle’s arm around her waist tightened, an anchor through the storm of her memories. He did not rush her; he did not say anything. He waited until she broke the silence.

When she did, the words came from a mind resolute on moving beyond the past. “I’m fine,” Sofia said. “Let’s go.”

Eyes narrowed with annoyance, Kyle followed Sofia downstairs to the kitchen.

He should have known better. Women clients were trouble. Women who thought he would stay around to solve their personal problems long after he solved their professional ones were the worst kind of trouble.

Sofia, though, was different, or at least he liked to think so.

She was not a hardened mercenary, like Zara and the other women in Three Fates, but she had witnessed her share of violence.

Hell, she was an active participant in the ongoing chaos surrounding the stolen microchip, and she was not trying to extricate herself from the madness, at least not without attempting to do some good along the way.

Experience told him that do-gooders were even more trouble than women with unrealistic expectations of him, but her determined desire to solve the microchip mystery was compelling, in a pugnacious sort of way. Seeing how it was his drop that went bad, he owed it to her to keep her safe.

He tried not to factor in his growing desire to charm her into smiles and laughter just for the pleasure of seeing her brown eyes sparkle with good humor.

Kyle drew aside the curtains in the kitchen and scanned the parking lot. Clear. “Wait here until I wave you over.”

She folded her hands across her chest. “You’re paranoid, you know that?”

Ah, she was regaining her sarcastic vim, though he supposed it was not sarcasm when it was true.

He unlocked the back door and stepped out. A thin dusting of the prior night’s snowfall remained undisturbed on the threshold. Too bad the snow around the car had melted from the heat of the asphalt.

He would have liked a few more cues to confirm the car had not been tampered with.

The alleyway that provided access to the town house parking lot was quiet; the only movement came from the flutter of startled birds from an evergreen bush as he passed. No one was concealed within its pine branches. He walked around the car, checking for the subtle clues he had left behind—a nearly invisible strand of black hair positioned across the car doors, the trunk, and the hood.

No one had tried to access the car.

He dropped to his knees and checked the undercarriage.

All clear too.

He stifled a grin; he could imagine Sofia rolling her eyes at him.

Kyle pushed back to his feet and waved her over before sliding into the driver's seat. He turned the key in the ignition and adjusted the controls until heat blasted through the air vents.

Bundled in a heavy winter coat, she emerged from the town house and locked the door behind her. She climbed into the passenger seat and tossed him a narrow-eyed glance. "Did you honestly expect the car to blow up?"

"Happened once or twice before. Wasn't pretty. If you survive it, the ringing in your head lasts for days. Here, keep warm while I check the door."

"I locked it."

He ignored her. Locking the door was not the same thing as securing it against evidence of entry. He worked quickly before the tips of his fingers became clumsy from cold. He was back in the car within two minutes.

"Got everything you need?" he asked. He searched her face but could not find any evidence of the miserable woman who had sat beside him in the room where her parents died.

Sofia's eyes were clear and her mouth set in a firm line. She patted the pocket of her denim jeans. "Yup."

He programmed the address for Johns Hopkins Hospital into the GPS and pulled out of the parking lot. For several minutes, they drove in silence until Kyle broke it with, "What do you think we'll find there?"

"Answers."

He shook his head. "If we do, this will go down in history as the easiest case I've ever been on."

"Easiest? Four people are dead."

"That's a small number, considering the Rue Marcha's involved."

She pressed her lips together. "Do you think more people are going to die?"

He shrugged. Lies were easy, but he did not want to make promises he could not keep.

"I don't want people to get hurt," she said.

"I think that's inevitable now. The only question is who is going to get hurt." A muscle twitched in his scruffy jaw. "I won't lie to you, Sofia. It's probably going to be touch-and-go for a while until we figure out what's going on, but I'll do everything I can to keep you safe."

She turned to him and flashed a smile. “Us.”

“What?”

“Do everything you can to keep both of us safe.”

Heat crept under his skin. Did she trust him that much?

The glow in her eyes told him she did.

He nodded and said the only thing he could, even though the guilt of the lie tore at him. “Yeah.

We’ll both get out okay.”

Chapter 7

The bright and sunny day in Washington, D.C., conceded to heavy clouds by the time Sofia and Kyle arrived in Baltimore. The gray sky, nevertheless, did not detract from the majestic sight of the Queen Anne-style domed administration building in front of Johns Hopkins Hospital. Built of red brick and trimmed with blue sandstone and molded terra cotta, the core of the hospital was surrounded by towering modern buildings linked by aerial bridges. The hospital sprawled over twenty-two acres, but like many first-time visitors, Sofia and Kyle marched up the steps of the administration building and entered its bustling lobby.

Kyle dug out his smartphone to connect with the Hopkins contact provided by Danyael Sabre. Meanwhile, Sofia stared up into the serene face and outstretched arms of the eleven-foot Christ statue placed on a pedestal in the center of the lobby, beneath the apex of the dome. A woman and child paused in front of the statue. The woman genuflected, tugging the child down beside her. Her fingers tapped her head and chest in the sign of the cross; her whispered prayer was too soft to hear.

The tears that leaked out from beneath her closed eyelids, however, needed no translation.

A thin line separated hope from desperation.

The line that separated courage from stupidity was no thicker.

Sofia could only hope that it was the former and not the latter that inspired her search for the data, and the truth embedded in the microchip.

“Miss Rios?”

She spun around as a middle-aged African-American man strode toward her. His graying hair was cropped short, his stomach slightly pudgy. He wore a genial smile. “Dr. Keith Henderson.” He cast an affectionate look at the statue. “I see you’re getting acquainted with ‘The Divine Healer.’ Carrara marble. It’s an exact copy of the ‘Christus Consolator’ sculpture in Copenhagen.” With an absent-minded gesture, he rubbed the statue’s toes with one hand and extended the other to Sofia. “Dr. Sabre called and said you’re a first-year graduate nursing student.”

Sofia smiled. “Yes, I’m at UNC.”

“Excellent program. So, Danyael mentioned you’re looking for access to a genetics research terminal to analyze a microchip?”

“Yes, I am. Oh, and this is Kyle Norwood.” She turned to introduce the man hulking behind her.

The doctor offered his hand. “Glad to meet you. Please come with me.” He led the way down a maze of corridors, weaving with ease through endless streams of people headed in every direction. “And how is Danyael doing?”

“Uh, fine. We just saw him this morning. Are you a geneticist? Is that how you know Danyael?”

“Oh no. I’m head of the cardiology department and a faculty at the medical school. Danyael was one of my students. I had always hoped he would specialize in cardiology, but he chose family medicine instead.” Henderson’s shoulders heaved. His huff of breath was tinged with regret. “He was one of my best students.”

Kyle cut in. “Wouldn’t he be, just based on the things he can do with his mutant powers?”

Sofia shot him a narrow-eyed glance. Surely it hadn’t been rancor she had heard in Kyle’s voice. Why did he hate Danyael?

Henderson looked at Kyle. “You’re referring to his empathic healing powers, of course. He hardly used it in medical school. If and when he did, it was an emergency, and all other conventional means had failed. His powers aren’t without cost—he heals by absorbing sickness, injury, and pain—and he can’t handle heart and brain injuries, not without risking death himself. In cardiology and neurosurgery, we always knew it was Danyael’s skill as a physician that carried him through, and not his fancy mutant powers.”

The doctor paused in front of a door and held his key card up against the security panel beside the door. The lock clicked. He pressed down on the door handle, pushed the door open, and ushered Sofia and Kyle in.

The room contained two computer terminals flanked by small pieces of electronic equipment. Henderson walked past Sofia and flicked switches to turn the equipment on. “This is the microchip reader. The output will display on the terminal. Do you know how to use it?”

Sofia nodded.

“All right, I’ll leave you here, then. You have my number. Call me if you need anything, and let me know when you head out. Just close the door when you leave; it locks automatically.”

“Thank you, Dr. Henderson.” Sofia extended her hand.

“Not a problem. Give my regards to Danyael, won’t you?” He turned and walked away, disappearing into the crowd flowing through the corridors of Johns Hopkins Hospital.

Sofia seated herself at the terminal as Kyle closed the door.

“Good, it locks from the inside,” Kyle said. “That was a lot of trust.”

“Who, the doctor?”

“Yes, leaving us alone to analyze a microchip when he doesn’t know what’s on it.”

Sofia rolled her eyes as she moved her fingers across the blank screen, activating the monitor and the terminal with a simple touch. “Not everyone in the world has paranoia honed to an art form like you do. Besides, it’s just information.”

Kyle placed his hands down on either side of her, trapping her against the computer, and leaned down. His breath was warm against her cheek. “My darling Sofia...”

A shiver, not of fear, quivered up her spine.

His voice, pitched low, twisted her stomach into knots of anticipation. “There’s no such thing as ‘just information.’ With a strike, a blade kills once. A bullet takes only one life. Information is far more lethal, its range far wider. Once released, it can never be recalled.”

Damn. He was talking about blades, bullets, and information, and he had managed to turn her into a fluttering ball of female hormones. She closed her eyes, released her breath in a trembling sigh, and willed her toes to uncurl. “For-forbidden knowledge.”

She could feel him smile against her. “Yes. Forbidden fruit tastes sweetest. I wonder, what do you taste like, Sofia?” His mouth nuzzled her cheek.

A soft sigh washed out of her as she closed her eyes and sank into sensation. “I—”

A faint beeping noise intruded on her consciousness.

Her eyes flashed open. She drew back sharply and stared at the terminal. The screen was fully illuminated; the terminal was waiting for instructions from her.

Saved by the...computer?

She felt like smacking her hand against the computer’s cold, unfeeling surface. “I...uh...” Carefully avoiding Kyle’s penetrating stare, she swiveled her chair around to face the terminal. Her fingers trembled slightly against the computer keyboard.

“Sofia.” With a gentle hand, he tipped her face up, forcing her to meet his eyes. “Get used to wanting me. God knows, I want you.”

His words were quietly spoken; they could have been a promise or a threat.

The unfamiliar sensation of being desired forced her to draw a deep breath. She turned away and fixed upon the monitor as if its glare shone upon a safe track away from the uncertain path that led to Kyle Norwood.

It was nearly impossible to yank her mind fully off the man who stood behind her, but Sofia tried regardless. She dug out the plastic-encased microchip from the pocket of her denim jeans, flipped open the cover, and extracted the microchip before sliding it into the slot on the terminal.

The hum of the machine was the only sound in the room.

Sofia broke through the awkward white noise. “What did the Proficere scientists say they were transferring?”

Kyle’s presence behind her shifted. He stood close, much too close. She twitched and leaned forward to increase the distance between them, but he chuckled, as if he were aware of what she was doing. “Genetic analysis. They didn’t specify what.”

Moments later, a string of four seemingly random, repeating letters appeared across the screen—G, A, T, C. Guanine, adenine, thymine, and cytosine, the four nucleobases that formed DNA.

“At least that much was the truth,” Sofia conceded. She chewed the inside of her cheek. Damn, it was absurdly difficult to focus on what she was doing with Kyle all but breathing down her neck. She shook her head and touched the screen to drag the segment of genetic code toward an icon labeled “Analyze international genomic databases.”

A message flashed across the screen, demanding proof of identity and security clearance.

Sofia frowned. “I guess we have to call the professor.”

Kyle peered over her head and pointed to another icon. His other hand landed casually, or perhaps not so casually, on her shoulder. “What about that one?”

“Local genomic databases?” Sofia tried not to give in to the thrill of pleasure that raced down her spine at his touch. She dragged the genetic code to the second icon, which accepted it without a fuss. The terminal whirred with activity. She also sent the data readout to the printer, which spewed sheets of paper covered with tiny letters.

Sofia sank into her seat. “It should be good enough. Hopkins probably has one of the largest genomic databases in the country, and we can access it locally from this terminal. The only problem is that it’ll take time to match the sequence on the microchip to samples in the database, and even then, it may not be exact.”

Kyle shook his head. “Given Proficere’s tendency to dabble in illegal research, I wouldn’t count on finding a perfect match.”

“But finding a close match on a chromosome would narrow it down, wouldn’t it? At least, it should be enough for a solid guess.”

Kyle snorted. “A guess won’t get you very far.”

“Look, I’m a first-year nursing student. I’m the farthest thing from an expert, but if we have something that looks suspicious, we can probably find some kind of expert to help us take the analysis to the next level.”

“It’s a small community of experts we’d be looking at. Chances are they all know each other’s research. How badly do you want to risk discovery?”

Sofia stiffened at the note of caution in his voice. “What are you saying, Kyle?”

“That if this looks bad, we turn it over to Zara.”

She swiveled around in her chair, folded her arms across her chest, and frowned at him. “Are you afraid?”

“You’re a student, and I’m ex-military.” He gestured to the computer terminal. “We’re dealing with genetic codes here. We’re out of our league, and that’s the fastest way to get into trouble.”

“Zara’s not a geneticist, either. What makes her any more qualified than we are?”

“Her ability to manipulate both people and systems, and her talent for getting out of trouble. She can channel resources and call in favors we can’t.”

Sofia shook her head. “I don’t trust Zara. She’s only looking out for herself. What about Danyael? He’s helped us twice now.”

“I don’t trust Danyael, so where does that leave us?”

She scowled at Kyle. “You have trust issues, you know that?”

He poked a finger at his chest. “I have trust issues? You just said that you don’t trust Zara.”

She shot to her feet. Standing up helped close the height difference, but he was still an entire foot taller than she was. “I have reasons. Did you hear what she said at the clinic? She brought their daughter, a baby, to the clinic to force Danyael to defend her if someone attacked him. What kind of mother does that to her own child?”

“What sort of man needs to be compelled to defend himself?” Kyle retorted.

“Do you read the news? They say he can kill with a touch. He defends himself, people die.”

“Do you hear yourself? You just met him this morning, and now you’re coming to his defense like you’re the president of his fan club. He’s an alpha empath. He controls emotions. You can’t trust what you feel about him, or anything you feel when you’re around him.”

She thought of Danyael—his tired eyes, his weary smile. The compassion she felt for him came naturally. Heck, if Danyael had tried to influence them with his mutant powers, Kyle would have become co-president of Danyael’s fan club. But he wasn’t.

Sofia’s scowl deepened. “You’re paranoid.”

“Zara, at least, is human. Danyael’s a goddamned mutant. You can’t trust them, any of them.”

She flinched. His verbal slap was worse than a physical blow. “How can you lump all mutants into one category? That makes you no better than a sexist or a racist.”

“Why are you defending them? You’ve seen what they’ve done to society. The mutants, and those in-vitros too, have made it nearly impossible for a naturally born human to succeed. Their unfair advantages—”

“What unfair advantages? You heard what the doctor, Henderson, said. Danyael heals at a price, and other mutants—”

The computer terminal beeped.

Sofia spun around. “It found something.” She sat in front of the terminal to read the report on the screen. Her heartbeat raced. “Actually...three sections of DNA from the microchip look similar to DNA markers on chromosomes eight, sixteen, and twenty-two.”

“Three?” Kyle echoed. “What do those sections do?”

“I don’t know yet.” Sofia tapped her fingers on the touch-sensitive screen. The image changed to display close-up pictures of chromosomes marked by distinctive dark bands. Her finger traced the summary of the analysis. “Looks like all three DNA sections are tied to heart function—”

The screen turned off.

She jerked back. “What happened? I didn’t do anything.” Sofia leaned down to confirm that the terminal was plugged into the power outlet and that none of the connections were loose. She flicked the switch repeatedly, but the screen remained black.

Kyle’s hand wrapped around her arm and yanked her to her feet. “We’re getting out of here.”

“What?”

“The database is probably monitored, and your search triggered an alarm that shut the terminal down. You can bet whoever's monitoring the database is on his way over right now."

Damn it. She pulled the microchip from the terminal, seized the printouts from the printer, and shoved both into her backpack.

Kyle pushed down on the door handle. It did not move. He tried again—he even slammed his weight against the door—but it did not budge. He cursed under his breath. "They've sealed the door. We're locked in."

Chapter 8

Sofia stood wide-eyed and silent, clutching her backpack to her chest while Kyle searched the room. No windows. Sealed door. He looked up. The air-conditioning vent was too small for him, but not for Sofia. He beckoned to her. “Come here. I’m going to give you a boost up. I want you to stay hidden until the coast is clear.”

“What about you?”

“Your prints are on the computer, not mine. I can play dumb bodyguard and lie my way out of this.” With a low grunt, he shoved her up onto his shoulders and gripped her ankles. She straightened and pushed up on the slatted cover of the vent. “Backpack first, then you.”

Sofia threw her backpack into the ventilation chamber and clambered up. Her wriggle would have been a sexy distraction under different circumstances. He pulled wads of cash from his wallet and held them up to her. “No credit cards. Don’t wait for me; don’t try to find me. As soon as it’s clear, get out of here and back to D.C. Go to Danyael if you have to; he can protect you.”

No credit cards. Damn. She had already used her credit card at Jose’s grocery store. Would the IGEC and Rue Marcha use that information to track her down? Her hand trembled as she took the cash from his hand. She grabbed the vent cover he held up, fit it into place, and inched away from the opening. Her face vanished into darkness.

Kyle slumped into the chair, fixed a bored expression on his face, and waited.

Thirty seconds later, the door slid open.

He looked up. “This hospital food better be edible—” His eyes narrowed. He shot to his feet. “Hey, you’re not Sofia.”

Two white-shirted security guards exchanged nervous glances. “Dr. Henderson said he let two people into the room.”

“She went to grab lunch from the cafeteria. What’s wrong?”

A guard shook his head. “She must have walked out before the door locked down.”

“The door locked down?” Kyle echoed. “What the hell is going on here?”

“I don’t know, sir. We’ve just been told to escort you to our security office.”

Hasty footsteps echoed along the outside corridor. Moments later, Dr. Henderson looked into the room. “There you are. Where is she?”

“She went to the cafeteria,” Kyle said.

Henderson nodded to the security guards. “I’ll walk him to the security office. You two find her.”

“What does she look like?” the other guard asked.

“Uh...short-ish. Young, mid-twenties.”

“What was she wearing?”

The doctor hesitated. His eyes flicked from side to side.

Kyle jumped in with a lie. “Khaki pants. Gray sweatshirt.”

“Got it,” the security guard acknowledged. “We’ll find her.”

Kyle waited until the security guards walked away. Given their lack of urgency, they had clearly not been briefed on the situation. “What’s going on, doctor?”

Henderson shrugged. “I don’t know. The International Genomics Center called the security office—the center monitors all database activity—and said that someone was accessing secure information from this terminal. The security office tracked the terminal and then called me since it was my ID card that let you into the room. I told the center it couldn’t possibly be the case; this terminal doesn’t have access to the secure databases, but the guy on the phone insisted on speaking to you anyway. I believe he’s on his way over.”

The international agency was not tipping its hand. Well, as long as it played nice, Kyle was willing to play along. The International Genetics and Ethics Council, and its offshoot, the International Genomics Center, were like the FBI; its agents tended to play by the rule book in a plodding though persistent way that occasionally worked. They were not the bad guys, though he could not say the same for some of IGEC’s people.

But what was IGEC’s stake in Proficere Labs’ research?

The security office was clearly designed primarily for security personnel. A large sofa with faded floral print dominated the room, and the two wooden side tables were scuffed and thinly layered with dust. Apparently, the security office did not receive the same level of cleanliness scrutiny that the rest of the immaculate hospital endured.

Kyle settled on the sofa and stretched his legs out. He might as well conserve his energy. His upcoming encounter with the IGEC promised to be moderately unpleasant.

Sofia, though—

Would she be all right?

She was a nursing student. How could he shove her into an air vent and expect her to know what to do? She was skinny; he did not doubt her ability to wriggle through the narrow vent, but hell, she was so short, she would probably hurt herself when she jumped down from the ceiling.

The door opened.

He glanced up, unsurprised. Knocking was not part of the IGEC playbook.

A lean African-American man, not much older than he, entered the room. Like most G-men, the IGEC agent wore a dark gray suit of questionable fit. Kyle did not recognize him, but then again, he was much more familiar with west coast IGEC agents after spending the prior three years working on Three Fates cases in Seattle, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. He had had a few run-ins with the IGEC, though he certainly crossed the FBI far more often.

The IGEC agent flashed his identification. "I'm Agent Sinclair." He set his electronic tablet facedown on the side table and adjusted the lapels of his suit. "Where were you last night, Mr. Norwood?"

"If you know my name, don't you know where I was?"

A faint, unamused smile appeared on Sinclair's face. "Answer the question."

"Am I being charged with something, agent?"

"Accessing classified genetic information."

"That would be hard to do from a research terminal that doesn't have access to classified databases."

Sinclair sighed. "Look, we know you have information you're not supposed to have. Where did you get it?"

Kyle spread his hands. "The only reason I scraped through introductory biology in college was because I slept with the teaching assistant in exchange for private tutoring. What makes you think I know what to do with genetic information?"

"I didn't say you knew what to do with it; only that you have it."

Kyle shrugged. "Look, you're going to have to be more specific. Not saying I did, but what information did you think I was accessing? Must have been bad to get the IGEC so riled up."

The door flung open, and a slender woman walked in. She wore her long hair pulled back into a ponytail and a smirk on her face. "Considering you're involved, it's no surprise we're so riled up."

His heartbeat skipped, but he kept his expression bland. "Lydia, you're a long way from Los Angeles."

Her smile was thin. "That's Agent Warner to you." She sighed theatrically. "What trouble are you up to now, Kyle?"

"That would be Norwood to you, Agent Warner."

Her response was a cold silence.

He knew how to push her buttons just as she knew how to push his. A heated fourteen-month love affair that had not ended well could do that to anyone. He sank into the sofa and hoped his shoulders did not betray the tension he felt. "So, no work to keep you occupied out west?"

"The action settled down after you left."

"Double entendres, Agent Warner?"

"Don't flatter yourself, Norwood." She paced the length of the small room, her stride graceful. "I want to know what information you were trying to analyze.”

“When is curiosity a crime?”

“When we have witnesses who might place you at a shootout between the IGEC and Proficere Labs employees yesterday.”

Might. That meant their witness was unreliable, or had disappeared. Like Sofia Rios, perhaps. He still had a shot at lying his way out of the situation. “Proficere Labs employees. You mean scientists, right? The brilliant geniuses who can explain the origin of all life in the universe but aren’t sure what day it is, or even what year? They were in a shootout with the IGEC? Did the scientists know which end of the gun to hold?”

“Were you there?”

He shrugged.

She leaned over and placed the palms of her hands on the side table.

Kyle snorted. He supposed she might have looked more intimidating if her stance were not cramped into twelve square inches of scuffed-up wood.

Her tone was quiet and cool. “A federal agent is dead, Norwood. Accessory to murder could get you twenty years.”

He relaxed into his seat and extended his arms over the back of the sofa. “If you’ve got a charge, bring it. Otherwise, you’re just probing, and we both know that won’t get you anywhere. I was trained in anti-interrogation techniques by the CIA, same as you.”

Irritation flashed across her face. She leaned back. “Who was the woman with you?”

“The one I started out the night with, the one I woke up next to, or the one in between?”

“Kyle—”

“The middle one was almost as pretty as you.”

Lydia blinked. Her gaze flashed to her IGEC partner, and for a brief moment, she was once again the young and idealistic IGEC agent he had fallen in love with twenty-four months prior instead of the hard-ass she had become.

It sucked to be reminded exactly why he had broken up with her.

She had become like Zara—worse than Zara.

At least Zara had never betrayed him.

He drew in his breath and reflexively pressed a hand against his left side. The bullet wound no longer hurt physically, but he had a scar to remind him that Lydia had used him, their relationship, and his love for her to lead his best friend, Jake Kerrigan, unwittingly into a trap.

Kyle had been slightly injured in the firefight that exploded.

Jake, the target of the IGEC’s ire, had been badly hurt.

The last he had seen of his friend was as Jake, bleeding profusely and scarcely conscious, was cuffed and dragged away.

Stunned, Kyle had pressed a hand to his bleeding side and looked up at Lydia as she walked up to him. She commanded the team that had fired at him and brought Jake down.

With alarm, concern, and what he had once mistaken for love in her eyes, Lydia had knelt down to check on his injury. He pulled back when she touched him.

They did not touch again.

In the Hopkins security office, Lydia looked back at him, her sudden vulnerability buried behind the cold-as-ice federal agent facade. She reached for the electronic tablet, turned it on, and shoved it across the side table.

Sofia's face, likely taken from a university enrollment photograph, smiled up at him.

"Ever seen her?" Lydia asked.

"Who's she?" he asked.

She pulled the tablet away. "We think Proficere Labs has hired the Rue Marcha to provide muscle, and the girl's involved somehow."

Wrong on the first count. Right on the second.

Lydia sighed and sat down on the far side of the couch. She looked weary, as if she had been awake most of the night, which she probably had. "Vital genetic research is missing, and we're trying to track it down. We traced it to the free clinic in Anacostia, but the Mutant Affairs Council won't let us touch Danyael Sabre. Even if we could, we wouldn't be able to get anything out of him; he has insanely strong psychic shields, bar none." Her lips twisted into a scowl. "What doesn't seem coincidental is the fact that he knows Zara Itani, and you work for her. If you're involved in this, Kyle, I'd strongly suggest you cooperate. It won't end well otherwise."

"Is that a threat?"

She shook her head. "It's a caution, for old time's sake. We know the Rue Marcha is involved, and people who screw with them tend to end up dead."

Oh, he knew that fact, better than most. Zara's half-Venezuelan heritage gave her access to terrorists from that part of the world seeking a fresh start and a better life. Many of his colleagues in Three Fates were South American, and they tended to be as dangerous, or worse than the Middle Eastern ones.

He relaxed into his chair. "What kind of research is missing?"

Lydia's face tightened.

"Look. Let's both be professional about this," Kyle said. "We know you have no case against me, and interrogation techniques won't work either. Perhaps we can help each other."

"You do know that Three Fates is on the IGEC's blacklist, right?"

Kyle laughed. "Considering the amount of chaos Zara has single-handedly unleashed, I'd say it's about time, but this isn't about Zara's tendency to get into trouble. What's gotten the IGEC so riled up?"

Lydia bit down on her lower lip. A ghost of a smile flickered across her face. "Nice try, Norwood, but it's not going to work. In fact, you and I are going to camp out in here while the rest of my team searches for the girl. We'll find her, and then we'll just see what she has to say about you.”

Chapter 9

Sofia cupped her nose and mouth with a hand as she crawled forward on her elbows and knees, but dust still tickled the back of her throat. She scrunched her nose in disgust. Good thing I'm not allergic to anything.

She shook her head and huffed out her breath. Why on earth was a nursing student crawling through the air ducts at a hospital? When she figured out the answer, she would have to give herself a hard kick in the rear end. It was embarrassing to realize that she had gotten herself into this fix. She could have turned the microchip over to Zara Itani and returned to Chapel Hill.

And miss out on all this fun?

The air duct twisted through turns, and at some point, she lost track of how many rights and lefts she had made. It did not matter, she supposed. She could hardly go back to the research station.

Her back ached from her crouched and cramped position as she inched forward. Her heartbeat still raced, but as countless minutes passed, she noticed it less. Up ahead, light beckoned through a panel. Sofia peered down into a nurses' station. Nurses clad in a variety of pastel nursing scrubs bustled in and out, exchanging lively conversation as they passed each other.

Darn.

She had to get out of the air duct. Among other reasons, she really needed to pee.

Gritting her teeth, Sofia pushed forward. The next air vent overlooked a crowded waiting room; she huffed in quiet frustration.

Sofia crawled over the third air vent before realizing what it was. The room beneath was dark except for a faint sliver of light slipping through a crack in the heavy curtains drawn across the windows. For a moment, she paused to listen, but heard nothing. Sofia inhaled deeply, but her racing nerves did not settle. Her fingers worked at the panel and pried it loose. She had to take a chance and hope that she was not jumping down into the psychiatric ward.

She wriggled backward in the narrow shaft and swung her feet around so that she could leap down feetfirst. She was ready—no, heck, she could never be ready to jump into the darkness without knowing what awaited her, but she would do it anyway.

Biting back a shriek, she let herself fall.

And landed on something soft.

Something jerked beneath her. Someone screamed.

“Oh my God, I’m so sorry!” Sofia swung her feet to the side, scrambled off the bed, and dashed toward the door. Light burst into the room when she flung the door open. She flinched from the sudden glare but did not look back. Her feet thudded on linoleum tiles as she raced down the corridor. She skidded through blind turns around corners and almost ran into a passing orderly.

“Whoa, slow down, what’s the rush?” he demanded.

“Sorry.” A shaky grin accompanied the apology she tossed over her shoulder. She shook her head sharply and released her breath in an unsteady sigh. Blend in. And that meant not running as if she were pursued by the hounds of hell, or a South American drug cartel, or the International Genetics and Ethics Council.

Although, everything considered, she would settle for being pursued by the hounds of hell. Myth had nothing on reality.

She slowed her pace to a brisk walk and allowed herself to merge into the human traffic weaving through the crowded corridors. Blend in. Get out. Blend in. Get out. The quiet chatter of conversations around her blurred into white noise. She kept her gaze lowered and focused on the bustle of feet until the scent of flowers caused her to look up.

The hospital gift shop swarmed with customers. The garish metallic hues of “Get Well Soon” balloons outshone the sedate shades of pink roses and cream-colored lilies, but Sofia’s attention fixed on the T-shirts and sweaters that hung from hangers on a circular rack. Blend in. Blend in.

Ten minutes later and $39.99 poorer, Sofia walked out of the gift shop wearing a Johns Hopkins Hospital sweatshirt. She had tucked her brown hair into the baseball cap she wore backward on her head. Her backpack was concealed in the large plastic bag the gift shop cashier had given her.

A bustle of activity drew her attention to the central foyer. Two men in suits strode under the marble statue, their sweeping gazes searching for something or someone.

Most likely her.

Her heart pounded, but she forced herself to adopt an impassive look. Her grip tightened on the handle of the plastic bag as she slipped into a group of young adults, apparently medical school hopefuls on a guided tour of the famous hospital.

The tour guide’s high-pitched voice chirped on about the hospital’s history. The two men in suits walked past the group after a cursory glance.

Sofia swallowed hard. Her pulse settled.

The group curved around the foyer and stopped next to the main entrance of the hospital.

A man in a suit stood by the massive double doors.

Another agent. Damn.

“And this concludes our tour,” the guide said to the polite applause of the group.

For a moment, the large group loitered in the foyer before breaking into smaller subsets of people who seemed to know each other.

“Lunch?” one of them asked another.

“Sure.” They both turned toward the corridor that would take them to the large cafeteria.

Sofia stepped forward. “You’re going to eat in here?”

The young man who had suggested lunch looked at her, confused as to who she was but apparently too polite to say so. “Why not?”

“Because if we’re lucky, we’ll be invited to spend the next four years here,” Sofia said with a laugh. “That’s four years of hospital food. The way I see it, there’s no reason to start on institutional food this early.”

The two men laughed with her. “Fair point,” one of them conceded. “So, did you see anything else to eat around here?”

She threw a quick glance over her shoulder at the main entrance. Her pulse skittered on a lie. “There’s a deli two blocks down that way. Looked like a mom and pop, not one of those big chains.”

The two men exchanged glances. “Works for me,” the other man agreed with a shrug. He looked at a few others in the larger group. “Sandwiches, soups, and salads?”

“Sure.” Several others broke off to join Sofia and the two men.

Chatting gaily, a group of eight young men and women walked past the suited man standing at the entrance of the building. Sofia was buried in the middle of the group, concealed as much by the crowd as by her lack of height. She forced herself to match the maddeningly slow pace of the others. The group walked down the street and turned the corner where the crowds grew thicker, providing safety in obscurity.

Sofia fell back gradually and slipped down a side road. She sagged against a brick wall. A sigh whispered out of her. I’m not cut out for this. She counted down the minutes that passed before her pulse returned to normal. It did not quite get there, but it settled down enough to alleviate the feeling of her heart pounding hard against her rib cage.

Several deep breaths steadied her enough to push away from the wall. All good. Still alive. Yesterday, being alive had not seemed too much to ask for. How quickly things changed.

And Kyle...

She bit down on her lower lip. She prayed the IGEC was the play-by-the-rules type Kyle made its agents out to be, but she had little hope of it. As far as she knew, government agencies were not above bending the rules when they thought circumstances required it.

Did they? Did the circumstances demand bending, even breaking, the rules?

Sofia reached into the pocket of her denim jeans and dug out the plastic-encased microchip. She stared at it—tiny and seemingly innocuous. Apparently deadly.

Whatever was on it was enough to provoke the IGEC into interfering and the Rue Marcha into killing.

Kyle’s words came back to her. “Information is far more lethal, its range far wider. Once released, it can never be recalled.”

Sofia grunted. Her small hand clenched into a fist around the microchip. Forbidden knowledge was overrated, and everyone forgot to mention the cost until it was too late.

How many lives am I going to endanger in my search for the truth?

She had to talk to someone who understood the price of standing up to the government and who possessed the conscience to do so anyway.

Danyael Sabre.

For a moment, she contemplated taking a cab back to Washington, D.C.—Kyle had given her enough money for the ride—but it would be too difficult to convince a cab driver to make the hour-long trip. Public transportation was the only viable option.

Besides, crowds offered safety.

She stepped out onto the main road and flagged down a cab driver. “Take me to the MARC Camden Station.”

She kept her gaze on the hospital entrance as the cab driver took off. The swarm of IGEC agents scrambling down the front steps of the hospital did not materialize, but the momentary sense of relief did not reduce her vigilance.

Hyper alert, she watched the traffic flow and wished she knew more about spotting abnormal patterns. By the time she hopped from the cab and onto the Maryland Area Regional Commuter train that would take her from Camden Station in Baltimore to Union Station in Washington, D.C., she was mentally exhausted.

How did Kyle do it, day after day, hour after hour?

It was crazy to live like that.

Passengers were sparse aboard the MARC train. Sofia made her way down the narrow aisle, coach after coach, until she found a seat at the back of the train.

She sagged into the chair, hugged her plastic bag to her chest as if the plastic were steel armor, and stared at the scenery flashing by the window.

Logic told her she was in over her head. What chance did a nursing student stand against a drug cartel and an international law enforcement agency in search of the microchip she carried?

On the other hand, the alternative was turning over the microchip to Zara Itani, who would likely return it to Proficere Labs.

The alternative sucked.

If there was an answer—a way out of her predicament—Sofia had no clue what it could possibly be.

The sun was low in the sky when Sofia arrived in Anacostia, but she counted on daylight to offer a slight advantage. Her careful study of the map on her smartphone paid off. Without referring to it—and looking like a tourist in the process—she walked from the metro station to the free clinic.

The key, she reminded herself, was to look confident, as if she belonged. The problem was that she did not entirely fit in. Her sweatshirt was too new, and despite her attempt to affect nonchalance, she knew she tossed wary glances over her shoulder to scan the people swirling around her.

The good news was that the business-suited IGEC agents would likely stand out among a local populace that demonstrated a high level of affinity for leather and chains. The problem was the gang-attired Rue Marcha blended in perfectly.

She was no longer certain which one she feared more.

Sofia was grateful when the free clinic came in sight. It swarmed with activity. The men, women, and children who filed in and out of the clinic in an unending stream paid little attention to the visibly armed gangsters who loitered outside the clinic. Weapons were treated as little more than scenery, no different from the bars across the windows and boarded-up doors on the buildings on either side of the clinic.

If she needed a reminder that she was far out of her comfort zone, she had just received it.

Across the street, two men loitered in a black sedan. One of them looked sharply in her direction. Her pace faltered.

The car doors opened and two men, one in a brown suit, the other in gray, stepped out. They had to be government agents, unless the Rue Marcha had decided to invest their hard-earned drug money in cheap suits instead of yachts, seaside condos, and fast cars. One of the men held up a badge—not that she could make out its details from that distance. “Miss Rios, we’re with the—”

Panic kicked her feet into motion. Sofia ran, shoving past the startled gangsters who guarded the entrance of the free clinic and scrambling into the questionable safety of the building.

The waiting room was packed. Several pairs of curious eyes turned to her as a gray-haired woman in nursing scrubs approached her. “Is something—?” The nurse peered through the glass doors at the hubbub of tension building outside. Consternation flicked over the nurse’s face. The lines around her mouth tightened into a frown. Without a word, she scurried into Danyael’s office.

Moments later, Danyael emerged.

Sofia’s eyes widened.

The alpha empath’s face was drawn, and the pallor of his skin accentuated the shadows beneath his eyes. His hand trembled on his crutch, and he looked about ready to drop from exhaustion. He glanced at her, but said nothing as he headed to the door and pushed it open.

A black man in gang colors waved his assault weapon like an extension of his hand and glared at the suited men. “No can do. Yo ain’t got no warrant.”

The two suits kept their distance. One of them held up his hands in a placating gesture, though Sofia caught a glimpse of a firearm under his coat. “Look, we just want to ask Miss Rios a few questions.”

Danyael looked over his shoulder. His eyebrows raised in inquiry.

Sofia shook her head, her heart pounding. Please don't turn me over to them.

But then again, Danyael owed her nothing. He had taken a risk for her once. Why would he do so again when she could see fear in the dark depths of his eyes?

Danyael hesitated. A muscle twitched in his smooth cheek before he turned back to face the government agents. His smooth tenor cut through the heated conversation between brusque street dialects and crisp New York accents. “Miss Rios isn’t interested in answering questions at this time.”

The agent turned to Danyael. No question, the agent knew who the real threat was—not the heavily tattooed men clad in Kevlar and leather and toting assault weapons, but the unarmed, crippled alpha empath. “Look, we’re not some damned journalist looking—”

“I know who you are. Without a warrant, Miss Rios isn’t obliged to go with you or answer any of your questions.”

“We don’t want to make this difficult.” The man’s tone had a hint—more than a hint—of a threat.

“It isn’t, though it will be if you choose to escalate it. I’ve had a difficult day. Don’t push it.”

Behind Danyael, the gangsters eyed the agents. Their hands fidgeted on their guns. One of the men, obviously their leader, stared down the two men in suits. “Yo heard the man. Don’t push it. Get outta here.”

The agents cast Sofia exasperated glances, and then turned away, returning to their car. They did not drive away.

The gang leader looked at Danyael. “Want me ta get rid of them?”

“Don’t start a fight, please.” Danyael averted his gaze. “I’m tired.”

“Ain’t gonna be no fight if they just listen good.”

“When has the government ever listened to us?”

The gang leader laughed, a chilling sound. “Ain’t never, but mebbe we can help those two see the light, no?”

Danyael reentered the clinic. He looked at Sofia. “Are you all right?”

“Yeah, I think so.” She wiped her hands on the side of her denim jeans. “Uh, I know you’re busy but I need to talk to you.”

“Now, or can it wait until the clinic closes at ten?”

She studied the long line of patients in the waiting room. “It can wait.”

He nodded toward an empty chair. “Have a seat. You’ll be safe here.”

“Until someone comes in with a warrant.”

“They won’t. Your files are blocked.”

“They’re what?”

Danyael closed the distance to Sofia and lowered his voice to keep the conversation private. “Zara reached out to me an hour ago after Kyle called her to let her know that he’d been picked up by the IGEC. According to Zara, Xin blocked your files. Only someone with top-level security clearance will be able to issue a warrant, and there aren’t too many of those around—certainly none who will want to get involved in something they know nothing about.”

“Xin’s the NSA person Kyle spoke to.”

Danyael nodded. “Xin works for Zara, or vice versa. It’s hard to know the exact dynamics between Zara and Xin at any point in time.”

“But why would Xin—?”

“I don’t know. That’s a question you’ll have to ask Xin or Zara.”

The minutes crawled. The free clinic officially closed its doors at 10 p.m., but the line of patients did not thin for another hour. Danyael was in the office with his last patient when Zara entered the building. The passing glance she gave Sofia was far from reassuring, but she walked past Sofia without a word and entered Danyael’s office without knocking on the door.

Minutes later, Danyael’s patient scurried out, a worried furrow on her brow.

Zara did have that kind of effect on people.

Sofia pushed to her feet and crept closer to the open door of Danyael’s office. Both Danyael and Zara spoke in the hushed tones of a couple in a private argument.

“I don’t want anything to do with your cases.” Danyael’s voice was a low hiss of frustration. “I don’t want to get dragged into the muck. I don’t want to get forced into a showdown with drug cartels or international agencies—”

Zara’s voice was a seductive purr. “Turn her over to me. I’ll take her off your hands.”

“You know I can’t do that. She’s in over her head.”

Sofia nodded. Same thing I told myself.

Danyael continued. “I’m not going to turn her over to you.”

“She had a chance to get out but she insisted on holding on to the microchip,” Zara said. “She didn’t have to. This isn’t her business.”

“Someone made it her business when he stuck the microchip in her. Considering what it might contain, it’s no surprise she’s holding on to it, especially when the alternative is turning it over to you.”

“What are you saying?”

“She doesn’t trust you, and I don’t blame her.”

Zara snorted out a humorless laugh. “She’s out of options. I suspect she’d rather take her chances with Kyle than risk an encounter with the Rue Marcha or count on the IGEC to be understanding.” Zara paused. “You could, of course, talk her out of it.”

A moment of silence passed between them.

Danyael sighed. “I don’t know what’s on the microchip, but I do know that sometimes, you need someone with a different perspective to change the way the story ends. The microchip...you don’t care enough to ask what's on it, and I...I'm afraid."

Sofia winced at the ache she heard in Danyael's voice. She had not imagined the fear she had seen in his eyes.

He continued so quietly that she had to strain to hear. "I can't risk another run-in with the government. I can't lose what I have."

"What do you have, Danyael?" Zara's voice was almost tender.

Sofia heard the sound of cloth rustling. Had Zara stepped into Danyael's arms?

"I have enough," was Danyael's whispered acknowledgment.

"But it's so little," Zara said. "How can it be enough?"

Danyael's response was another soft sigh.

"Fine." Zara's response was brisk. "Keep running from reality, if that's what you want. Kyle's on his way back to D.C."

"What happened to him?"

"IGEC. Xin had to go down to Baltimore, wave her badge around, and remind the IGEC that they couldn't hunt down or hold American citizens without a warrant countersigned by the NSA, and the NSA wasn't in the signing mood. Still, there's something nasty on the microchip. The IGEC was evasive, but Xin picked up enough to raise her hackles."

"It's always amazed me how Xin picks up as much as she does without actually being a mutant."

"Yeah, well, the rest of us normal mortals learn to make the best use of our five senses. In Xin's case, her naturally suspicious attitude works almost as well as a sixth sense. Anyway, Xin bought Kyle and Sofia a bit of breathing room, but the IGEC won't be deterred. You can expect them to come down hard, and they won't try to be subtle. And we haven't even begun to discuss the Rue Marcha. They don't care about the rules. Fact is, Sofia doesn't have much time to figure out the contents of the microchip."

"Twenty-four hours?"

"Less. Much less. I have to go. I'll let you explain the hard facts to her."

Sofia pulled away from the door but could not make it back to her seat before Zara strode out of Danyael's office.

The assassin's only reaction was a smile as she walked past Sofia. The heels of her boots snapped on the linoleum tiles. She let herself out of the clinic and locked the front door behind her.

Sofia blew out her breath. Zara had style all right, along the same lines as the Snow Queen in fairy tales. How and why Danyael put up with her was mind-boggling.

From behind Sofia, Danyael asked quietly, "How much of that conversation did you overhear?"

She spun around and tried not to blush. "Pretty much all of it."

"Then you know that you don't have much time."

"Can I show you what I found?"

Danyael hesitated.

“Please. Maybe you can make sense of it. Even if you can’t, maybe you can tell me where to go next, who I can talk to.”

He looked away.

Sofia bit down on her lower lip and told herself not to plead. Danyael had his reasons not to get involved, but if he—the one person who seemed to understand her best—could not help her, then who would?

Certainly not Zara. And Kyle was still trying to untangle himself from the mess she had created by going to Johns Hopkins Hospital and searching the genomic databases.

How many more people am I going to drag into this madness? How many more will get hurt?

Danyael’s jaw clenched. He held out his hand. “Show me what you have.”

The smile of relief that spread across her face betrayed no sign of the conflict within. Sofia reached into her backpack and pulled out the stacks of paper she had spent the past five hours poring over to no avail. She spread the printouts over his desk and jabbed her finger at several salient points. “These three sections of DNA map to cardiac function, but I’m not sure what it’s supposed to tell us about the information on the microchip.”

Danyael traced a finger over the printed tangle of genetic code. “Just looking at this, I can’t tell you what the DNA sections do. You’ll need to dig deeper and find out how these particular sections differ from examples of ‘typical’ sections of DNA in the general population.”

“You think these sections are mutated?”

“It’s a possibility. In fact, you’ll need to consider the source of the code and the intended purchaser. Proficere Labs isn’t researching the cure for heart disease, I’m certain of that much, and the Rue Marcha is one of the most ruthless South American drug cartels. Why would the Rue Marcha be interested in understanding the genetic basis of cardiac function?”

Sofia pressed her lips together. “Could they be creating drugs that target specific genotypes?”

Danyael inhaled sharply. “Maybe. Possibly. I don’t know.”

His answer was vague, but she heard the whisper of fear in his voice. If their speculation was right, she was in far more trouble than she had counted upon. Was she ready to live in a world of malevolent drugs targeted to specific segments of the population based on their genetic heritage?

Like panicked sparrows, the questions fluttered through her mind. Which segments were targeted, and what would the drugs do to them?

What could she do? She was just one person. If a trained assassin did not want to get involved—if an alpha empath did not dare get involved—who was she to think that she could fix the problem?

Returning the microchip to Zara and consequently Proficere, who would likely turn it over to the Rue Marcha, was out of question.

She could give it to the IGEC, but Kyle was already in trouble with the IGEC. Until she knew what was on the microchip, she did not want to get him into more trouble.

Danyael’s words replayed over the recurring image of her unborn sister, her shriveled skin waxy and gray. Sometimes, you need someone with a different perspective to change the way the story ends.

Zara won't, and Danyael can't. And I have Kyle to keep me alive.

Sofia stared down at the printouts. What secrets did they conceal? She steeled herself. “Where would I be able to find that information?”

Danyael looked troubled. “Your best bet? Back at Proficere Labs.”

Chapter 10

It was just a little before midnight when Sofia and Danyael walked out of the free clinic. She threw a nervous glance over her shoulder as he locked the clinic door. The two IGEC agents who had attempted to accost her earlier lingered in their car across the street from Danyael's clinic. Their baleful glares locked on her, but they made no move to get out of their car.

"Are the IGEC agents going to create any trouble for you?" Sofia asked.

"Not unless they want to cross the Mutant Affairs Council. It's never a good idea to annoy an organization filled with short-tempered alpha mutants."

"But aren't they going to follow us?" she asked.

"They don't need to. They know where I live," Danyael said. He nudged his head down the street. "Just two blocks that way. It's almost faster to walk than drive, even on a bum leg."

Danyael shifted his weight on his single crutch. "Long story." His tone did not invite additional discussion.

Sofia, however, was not any more intimidated by Danyael than she had been by Kyle. Besides, it was hard to work up an honest fear of someone who sagged so wearily against his crutch. "Aren't you getting it fixed?"

"When I've saved up for it."

Sofia's brow furrowed. It made no sense. Danyael was an alpha empath, rare even among the high-powered alpha mutants who dominated the Genetic Revolution. He was treasured, even priceless, was he not?

So why was he driving himself to exhaustion working a dead-end job in a dangerous neighborhood? Why was his obviously incapacitating injury left untreated?

Would she ever understand the murky politics that governed the treatment of alpha mutants like Danyael?

Seeking answers, she stared at his face, as perfect and expressionless as a marble statue. No, not quite perfect. It was marred by that old scar. His dark eyes, glazed with weariness, revealed nothing.

She would receive no answers from Danyael.

Perhaps she ought to be grateful that her mutant powers were so miniscule as to escape the notice of the Mutant Affairs Council. She was too insignificant to be a threat, too pathetic to bother with.

Too weak to save the ones she loved.

Her teeth clenched against the familiar ache, the sharp pang of guilt that would never go away.

Danyael glanced sharply at her but said nothing. He had sensed her feelings, no doubt, but politeness kept him from inquiring further.

His home was two blocks away from the clinic, a small one-bedroom on the fifth floor of a walk-up apartment complex. The living area was cheaply furnished with Salvation Army castoffs. It should have been dismal, even depressing, but something about the place infused her with peace. The only reason her dazzled senses could identify was that it was Danyael's home, the only place where he felt truly safe.

Even Danyael seemed to relax as he shrugged out of his black leather jacket. "Would you like something to eat?" he asked, limping into the kitchenette.

Her stomach rumbled at her, reminding her that she had skipped both lunch and dinner. "Sure, anything will do. Do you need any help?"

He shook his head and waved her over to the two-person dining table tucked into a corner of the living room. Instead of sitting, however, she wandered around the room, which seemed dreadfully impersonal except for the two plastic-framed photographs on the kitchen counter—one of a slightly younger though no less cherubic Laura Itani, and another of her mother, Zara. The assassin's face was angled away from the camera, but her gaze was direct and held a hint of challenge, as if daring the photographer to close the distance. Her smile beckoned, offering the promise of something more.

Sofia looked up at Danyael as he moved with quiet efficiency around the small kitchenette. "Did you take this photograph of Zara?" she asked.

"Yes."

"It's a beautiful picture."

He shrugged.

"You love her, don't you?" Sofia blurted out the words before she could check herself. She clapped her hand over her mouth and shook her head. "I'm sorry." She dropped her hand, her cheeks flushed. "It was rude."

"You don't understand why."

Sofia searched for the right words before realizing, with regret, that there were none. "No, I don't," she confessed. Zara Itani was practically the dictionary definition of "she-demon." She was cold and ruthless—the polar opposite of Danyael's innate compassion and empathy.

He looked up and smiled. The curve of his lips seemed sad. "Most days I don't understand it either."

"But then—"

"Love doesn't have to make sense. The people we love don't have to be like us or live up to our internal expectations to make us want more from the relationship."

She frowned. “But you’re an alpha empath. Can’t you just...you know...?” She wriggled her fingers at him. “Use your empathic powers to change her feelings?”

Danyael shrugged again. “What I feel for Zara is irrelevant if what she feels for me isn’t real.”

Sofia had not considered it that way before. “Does she know how you feel about her?”

“I don’t know what Zara feels about anything anymore.”

“But you’re an empath. You can sense my emotions. You know what I’m feeling.”

“That’s right, unless I erect a psychic wall between us, as I did with Zara.”

“But why?”

“It seemed easier that way.”

Sofia’s eyebrows drew together. “Easier?”

“Easier than working through her emotional turmoil every time I see her.” His tone turned reflective.

For a moment, Sofia caught the sharp glitter of pain in his eyes. She swallowed hard against the matching ache in her chest. She had pushed him too far. “Here, let me help you with that.” She took the plate of pasta from his hands, set it on the table, and returned for the second plate.

The sauce for the pasta had come out of a bottle, but the meal was hot and filling. Danyael, she noted, ate slowly. Frequently, he paused, closed his eyes, and fisted his hand over his mouth, as if fighting indigestion or nausea.

She did not ask.

Truth be told, she was not sure she wanted to know.

She was a mutant, but she was not an alpha. All her life, her parents had taught her to stay out of the political and social nightmare that ensnared the alpha mutants. It wasn’t worth the attention and publicity of using her mutant powers in public. Power had a price, but mercifully, it was a price she did not need to pay.

She had enough issues on her hands. Her thoughts trailed back to the one topic that had nagged at her for the past several hours. “Do you think Kyle will be all right?”

Danyael nodded. “Zara hires capable people. You’ll be safe with him.”

Sofia’s lips parted in a half-smile. She had not voiced the real question bothering her, but she was grateful Danyael answered it anyway.

The alpha empath continued. “I’m sure he’ll be here soon.”

The drive from Baltimore to Washington, D.C., had taken hours, and had nothing to do with rush hour traffic. Kyle had employed every trick he knew and some he made up on the spot to shake the disgruntled IGEC agents on his tail.

Hell, disgruntled was too mild a term.

Lydia had been apoplectic when Xin showed up at the Johns Hopkins Hospital security office. Like Zara, but with far more subtlety, Xin left chaos in her wake.

Kyle had met Xin several times, but had never seen her exercise her talents beyond an information-conduit role. It was apparently a rare treat to see Xin throw her real weight around.

Zara would have broken him out and left bleeding bodies or a burning building in her wake. Most likely both. She had trouble expressing herself without a gun or a dagger in her hand.

Xin, a slim Chinese woman, did not even raise her voice. She identified herself, flashed her NSA credentials, and threw the rule book at Lydia.

Lydia sputtered objections.

Xin crushed it with legalese.

Lydia threatened to call the IGEC director.

Xin handed her a phone.

Kyle sat back, stifled a chuckle, and enjoyed the elaborate play.

After a terse, largely one-sided conversation that included long bouts of silence from Lydia, she had hung up the phone, her face red. The look she shot Kyle was not a pleasant one. No big deal. Kyle dismissed the implied threat with a shrug of his shoulders. Their relationship had hit rock bottom several months prior and had not improved since. He was not going to get tied up in knots over another new grudge she bore him.

He had pushed to his feet and followed Xin from the security office, Lydia's glare burning into his back.

"I can't vouch for how long they'll behave themselves," Xin said as Kyle escorted her back to her car. "I can keep them from arresting you, but I can't keep them from following you. You should call Zara; she's expecting an update."

His conversation with Zara had been quick, but provided all the details he needed. The trip back to Washington, D.C., however, had taken the better part of the evening.

He had worried about Sofia the entire way.

Sure, Danyael was an alpha empath. In theory, he could protect Sofia, but Kyle would not count on it. Danyael was a mutant, and mutants were self-serving bastards, using their psychic powers for their own gain and advancing themselves at the expense of normal humans.

With a grunt, Kyle shoved away the memory of Danyael extracting the microchip from Sofia's arm and healing the open wound.

Danyael might have done one good thing, but he was no different from the other mutants.

They could not be trusted.

As Zara had promised in her phone call, Kyle found Sofia waiting for him in Danyael's apartment. His knock on the door was promptly answered. Kyle nodded at the alpha empath who opened the door and walked into the apartment.

With a smile, Sofia rose from her seat at the dining table and walked into his arms. "Are you all right?”

Her frame was small; her weight was slight, but comforting. The cold nip of fear fell away. He nodded. “Hell of a day.”

Behind him, Danyael chuckled. “Fortunately, it’s after midnight, so you can consider it a new day and get a fresh start.”

“We should go,” Kyle said. Zara had been explicit that Danyael needed his rest and was to be relieved of his babysitting duties as quickly as possible. “Thank you.”

“You’re welcome.” Danyael smiled as he followed them to the door. “Be safe.”

Kyle rolled his shoulders and released a relieved sigh when Danyael closed the door. One thing had come through loud and clear in his conversation with Zara. She did not like anyone messing with Danyael.

Kyle and Sofia walked down the stairs together, but he tugged her away from the front door of the apartment complex. “My car’s around the back.”

“Did someone follow you?” Sofia asked, alarm spiking her voice.

“Four detours and three car changes later, I should hope not. But the IGEC is camping outside the front door of Danyael’s apartment. They know not to mess with him, but all bets are off if you walk out of the apartment without him.”

Sofia sighed. “I don’t think I knew what I was signing up for when I decided to hold on to the microchip.”

“Never too late to turn it over to Zara.”

“I don’t think so. I’ve thought it over. We need to talk about what to do next.”

“Sure, we can do it over food.”

“Danyael fed me.”

“Well, nobody fed me. Is there food back at the house?”

“Oh, the food you berated me for buying this morning? Yes, there is food back at the house. Can we go back there, though? Won’t they be watching the place?”

“Not unless they follow us there. Zara got Xin to work some of her hacker magic. As far as anyone knows, your family has never owned that town house. No one can link you back to that property unless they see us walk into it.”

“Do all your friends possess such dubious skills?”

He thought about it for a moment. “Well, yeah.”

“Does that make me the only normal friend you have?”

Kyle grinned. Friend. Yeah, he liked the sound of that. Friendship was great progress considering their less-than-auspicious first meeting twenty-four hours prior. He nodded. “Pretty much, unless you know Krav Maga.”

“What’s that?”

“Tactical martial system used by the Israeli Defense Forces.”

Sofia interlaced her fingers behind her back and offered Kyle her most innocent smile. “Uh, no, but I can hit people really hard over the head with an umbrella.”

“That works in a pinch. You have to start somewhere. I can teach you.” He peered out through a grimy shade that covered the glass on the back door of Danyael’s apartment building. Several cars were parked under the pale glow of streetlamps. They were still empty. Nothing had changed in the five minutes it took to pick Sofia up from Danyael’s apartment. All clear. He unlocked the door and stepped out. His hand did not stray from the Glock in its holster.

Sofia inched out the door and followed him down the empty street. “This is your new car?” she asked, looking with skeptical distaste at the nondescript white Ford.

“It’s a loaner from Three Fates. The Ford’s just a shell. It’s nicely retrofitted underneath with an engine that can make 750 hp at 8,000 rpm.”

Sofia did not look impressed as she buckled herself into the seat. “What’s that in English?”

“Hmm, sounds cool.” She looked thoughtful. “Assuming the Ford frame doesn’t fall apart when your Lamborghini engine hits its full potential.”

He cast her a startled glance. It was a surprising insight from someone who probably could not explain the difference between horsepower and revolutions per minute. Sofia understood something fundamental about cars. It was never just about how powerful the engine was; in reality, a car’s maneuverability and speed came down to the coherence and unity of the design, including its structural support—the frame.

Perfection, in cars as in life, was found in the whole, not in its parts.

He pulled away from the curb. “So, you say you’ve thought about the situation?”

She nodded. “I have, but can we not talk about it until you’ve had a bite? I’ve done nothing but think about it for the past twenty-four hours, and I want to relax for a moment.” Sofia sagged into the ripped leather upholstery and closed her eyes.

She was fast asleep by the time he pulled up at the town house.

Kyle suppressed a chuckle as he carried her indoors and up the stairs to her bedroom. She sighed as he laid her down on the mattress. Her eyelashes fluttered, and her eyes opened into narrow slits. “Kyle?”

“Yeah?”

Her voice was a sleepy mumble. “Stay with me?”

Kyle grunted. How could he refuse an offer from a soft, willing female, especially one who turned him on as much as Sofia did? He shrugged off his leather jacket and stretched out on the bed beside her.

He wrapped an arm around her, and she wriggled deeper into his embrace. She sighed, a contented sound that did little to counteract the arousal her wriggle had triggered. He fought to keep his grip relaxed. Judging from her slow and steady breaths, she had fallen back asleep.

Damn, it was going to be a long night.

Dawn was a crack of light through slits in the curtains. Sofia peered, eyes half closed, at the familiar pictures on the wall, of seascapes enclosed in wooden frames.

Home. She was home.

She yawned and stretched.

She did not even manage to sit up. A heavy arm wrapped around her waist and pulled her back, snuggling her in the warmth of another body.

His possessive motion should have irked her, but at that moment, it made her feel safe. A smile escaped her. “Kyle?”

His sleepy grunt sounded distinctly unfriendly.

“Too early. G’back to sleep.”

Sofia twisted around to lie on her back so that she could look at his face. A faint dusting of whiskers covered his cheeks and jaw. He looked at peace, his face relaxed in slumber.

For several minutes, she lay in his arms, content to linger in the quiet of the early morning. She could not recall when she had slept so well in this particular house, unburdened by nightmares of her parents’ murders less than twenty feet away.

How much of her sense of security emanated from the man who had held her through the night—a man she had known for little more than twenty-four hours? But what a twenty-four hours it had been, and through it all, Kyle had protected her.

How odd that she would feel so safe in the arms of a professed mercenary.

She reached out, her fingertips not quite brushing against his cheek.

A corner of his mouth quirked up as if he had sensed the near contact. “Unless you want to go all the way, you should stop now.”

“Oh?” Apparently, he was not as asleep as she had imagined. A mischievous urge seized her. “You mean I shouldn’t do this?” She wriggled her denim-covered hip in a slow, circular motion against his groin.

He inhaled sharply. His grip tightened. “You’re running out of time, babe.”

“Time to do what?” She continued her coy grind.

“Change your mind. Hell.” His eyes flashed open. He rolled over and pinned her to the bed in a single swift motion. “You’re out of time.” His grin was wicked, but his eyes were questioning. “Last chance to say no.”

He had cared enough to ask. Relief and a giddy snap of joy coiled within her. She smiled at him. “Yes.”

Before she could get another word out, his mouth was on hers. His kiss was heated, and she returned it with equal fervor. With impatient fingers, she tugged his shirt out of his denim jeans and fumbled her way through the buttons before pushing the thick cotton material off his shoulders. His muscular torso was lightly covered with dark hair and deeply tanned, except for the white pucker of scars, including a six-inch scar on the left side of his chest.

She traced the wound. If it were as deep as it was long, it would have punctured his lung. How had he survived?

Sofia ran her hand along his arms. The large circular pockmarks on his arm, she was certain, did not come from picking at childhood scabs. "Are these what I think they are?"

"Huh?" Kyle looked down. "This came from a twenty-two, and that one was a nine millimeter. And, by the way, you're really killing the mood."

She laughed at his grumpy tone. "It's just that you're nothing like any other man I've ever been with."

Satisfaction gleamed in his eyes. "Good. Keep thinking that."

For a moment, she did wonder how he undressed her so quickly, but the thought vanished when he lowered his mouth to her breast. Her head fell back against the pillow, and her vision blurred with pleasure. A tremulous sigh whispered from her lips.

He was relentless in his exploration of her body. Awash in sensation, she scrambled for fleeting touches of his body, but more often than not, she was left gripping the sheets as another wave of pleasure built, one upon another, before crashing down on her.

Her entire body shuddered. His lips claimed hers, swallowing her gasp of sexual release.

His weight against her body shifted. The arousal that pressed against her thigh assured her he was not done. Sofia ran her hand against his sweat-slicked back before reaching down to cup his buttocks.

His gaze flashed to hers. Dark eyes, glazed with desire and need, met her own.

She parted her legs in invitation.

He eased out of his jeans, positioned himself over her, and slid slowly into the slick warmth of her body. Sofia's eyelashes fluttered with the burst of sensations as she arched and wriggled to accommodate him.

"Don't." He gritted his teeth. His arm muscles were taut with the burden of supporting his weight. "Not yet."

She laughed, a low, throaty sound. To think she had that kind of power over him. It was enough to make her toes curl.

When Sofia and Kyle began moving, it was in harmony, two bodies united in a race toward mutual ecstasy. She grasped his shoulders, glistening with sweat, and arched her back in time to his driving rhythm. The pleasure climbed until she did not think she could take anymore, and then peaked in a wail of release. Her body clenched around him.

Kyle groaned, a guttural sound that rang with triumph. He shuddered, muscles trembling, as he found his release.

He collapsed next to her and immediately drew her close into a cuddle that eased the moment from passion into intimacy.

The silence that followed was comfortable, even easy. Sofia smiled into the arm that cradled her neck. The cuddle was almost better than sex. She sighed, a contented sound. “That was good. It’s been awhile.”

“Oh?” Kyle pushed up on one elbow. “You did seem a bit out of shape.”

Her mouth dropped open. “What?”

He nodded sagely. “Practice. You need more of it. Good thing I’m willing to help out.” With a finger, he traced the curve of her breast.

Her lips quirked up in the hint of a smile. “You’re going to be my coach?”

“Think of me as a training partner. I’ve heard that varying the workout locations will keep the practice from becoming too routine.”

“Routine is the least of our problems right now.”

“Never hurts to plan ahead. So, how about we get our next round of practice in the shower?”

She glanced, askance, at the bathroom. “It’s barely big enough for just you.”

“Got to get real close, then. Think about it. You’ll get your morning acrobatics workout while showering. How’s that for efficient?”

Sofia rolled out of the bed. Hands on her hips, she glowered at him. “If someone ends up with a sprained back, you’re paying for the masseur.”

He laughed. “I’m great at massages, too. Have I ever mentioned that?”

“I’ll be sure to hold you to it.”

Their shared shower was a wet, slippery, and crowded affair. The shower stall was unforgivingly small, but it was just as well that she was light and Kyle was strong. It worked out—almost—even if he did accidentally bump her head into the shower rod.

The shower’s hot water turned lukewarm and then cold before Sofia and Kyle both emerged, flushed, smiling, and not in the least bit chilled. He grabbed a towel off the rack and wrapped it around her shoulders. “Good workout,” he said.

Sofia tried to conceal a smile. “Not too bad.” She tossed him another towel. “I’ll get breakfast started. How do you like your eggs?”

“Scrambled.”

She returned to her bedroom and stared at the clothes carelessly tossed on the floor. Fortunately, she had a change of clothes in her backpack, but she would have to do laundry or go shopping if she wanted clean underwear tomorrow. She gathered up her dirty clothes and Kyle’s before heading down to the laundry room to run a load.

The eggs were done and the bacon was sizzling in the frying pan when she heard Kyle’s footstep on the stairs. She looked up. He was staring down at his smartphone, a hint of a scowl on his lips.

Alarm pierced her, shattering the warm and cozy feelings that had infused her morning. “Something wrong?”

“No messages from Zara. Either nothing’s wrong or everything is.”

“There’s plenty wrong, as it is.” She set two plates heaped with bacon, scrambled eggs, and hash browns on the dining table, but she had lost her appetite. She stared with envy at Kyle as he attacked his breakfast with undiminished appetite.

He glanced up at her. “Technically, this meal is yesterday’s lunch.”

That was right. She had thwarted his plans for a late dinner when she asked him to stay with her last night. She slid her plate across the table to him. “Here, have mine.”

He did not need much convincing.

She held her tongue. He did not need to be bothered while he was eating. Meanwhile, the seed of worry buried deep in her sprouted.

He looked up at her. In between mouthfuls of scrambled egg, he asked, “What’s bothering you?”

“I have to go to Proficere Labs.”

His eyebrows shot up. “You’re not serious. That’s the last place I’d take you.”

Perhaps she should have couched her request more subtly and worked her way up, but the worry, firmly lodged in the pit of her stomach, had forced her to blurt out the thought that had nagged at her since her conversation with Danyael. “Look, that’s the only place that has the kind of information we need for evidence.”

He frowned. “Evidence for what?”

“Danyael says we need to figure out what’s different about the gene sequence, not what’s similar. Proficere Labs is almost certain to have that information.”

He shook his head. “It’s never a good idea to take a stolen object back to the owner’s house unless you intend to return it. It’s an especially bad idea to break into the owner’s house after the original theft to find appraisal or insurance documents to tell you what something is worth.”

She rolled her eyes. “This isn’t a jewelry heist. The information is at Proficere Labs. In fact, that’s probably the only place in the world where we can find what we’re looking for.”

“Not necessarily.” Kyle’s eyes gleamed. “Neither you or I are particularly good at hacking a computer, so just gaining access to Proficere Labs won’t do any good unless we can crack the network security as well. Who else do you think would know what the genetic sequences are intended to do?”

“The professor who shot me up with the microchip, of course, but he’s dead.”

“His partner’s not.”

“But wasn’t the other professor arrested by the IGEC?”

Kyle nodded. “How about we go talk to him instead?”

Sofia’s eyebrows drew together. “Wait, you won’t help me get into Proficere Labs, but you’ll break into the IGEC building instead? Are you crazy?”

“Hey, you’re the one who suggested breaking into a maximum-security research lab.”

“Which sounds easier than breaking into a maximum-security international governance agency.”

Kyle shrugged. “Not a whole lot of difference in practice, except that the lab expects a break-in and is designed to counteract it, but not so with the governance agency. People are trying to break out, not break in.”

“Are you trying to make it sound easier than it is?”

“Nothing easy about it,” he confessed. “But it’s a damn sight better than breaking into Proficere. It’ll just take some careful thought, and a hell of a lot of luck.”

Chapter 11

Kyle knew he had understated the risks slightly—all right, a lot—but he excelled at keeping the clients calm while making his work look easy. A call in to Xin provided Kyle and Sofia with government-issued fake IDs. The rest was up to them.

A one-hour shopping trip later and dressed in well-tailored business suits, Kyle and Sofia marched up to the security desk at the International Genetics and Ethics Council building on Constitution Avenue. Sofia's appearance was greatly altered. Her hair had been pulled back into a no-nonsense bun, and she wore a pair of thin-framed glasses. Her makeup was light, the clean look typically wielded by professional women. Everything considered, she looked like an attorney, albeit one with a stick up her ass.

On his part, Kyle had shaved.

An imposing security desk dominated the foyer of the IGEC building. Less intimidating were the two guards behind it, who were idly leafing through magazines. Glass doors on either side of the desk blocked off the elevator lobby from the foyer.

Kyle rested his arm on the desk. "I'm Jack Trader, and this is Noreen Calis. We're attorneys from the law firm of Trader and Markum, representing Proficere Labs. We're here to see Dr. Bert Reynard."

"IDs please." The security guard's tone was perfunctory as he held out his hand for their government IDs. He slid Kyle and Sofia's fake driver licenses through a device to verify their authenticity with the Washington, D.C., Department of Motor Vehicles and checked his monitor. "You have an appointment with Dr. Reynard in fifteen minutes. You're a little early, but you can go on up." He pushed their driver licenses and two badges across the desk to them. "Please keep these on you at all times. Elevator four will take you to the eleventh floor."

The glass door buzzed as the security guard released the lock. He stood, opened the door, and escorted Kyle and Sofia to the waiting elevator. It had no buttons, but the message on the touchscreen panel installed beside the door confirmed that it was headed to the eleventh floor—no side trips permitted.

The security guard stepped away. The elevator slid into motion.

Kyle glanced at Sofia. Her face was pale but her composure was steady, even expressionless. She had taken heed of his warning—no questions or displays of unease at any time. The entire building was monitored, and they had to play their roles without flaw. The only time they would not be observed was when they were in the interview room with Bert Reynard. Attorney-client privileges extended even to Americans held by the IGEC.

Another security desk greeted them upon exit from the elevator. The guards manning the desk were much more alert than the ones in the lobby. They scrutinized Kyle and Sofia's faces, double-checked and triple-checked their IDs and security clearances. Kyle drummed his fingers on the security desk. The studied and typical impatience of a lawyer only drew an irritated look from the guard.

Sofia's clear voice cut through the tension. "Do you need to do a body cavity search too?" The mild question, offered politely, came across more as a joke than sarcasm.

A grin flashed across the guard's face. "No, ma'am." He handed their driver licenses back to them. "Sorry for the delay. Just doing my job."

Kyle wished he could touch Sofia, give her hand a light squeeze to show how proud he was of her presence-of-mind and seemingly intuitive ability to defuse a tense situation.

The guard escorted them down a corridor lined by doors, each marked with a number, and stopped in front of room seven. "You can use this interview room. I'll bring Dr. Reynard over in a few minutes."

Kyle watched Sofia navigate gracefully around the table to claim one of the four chairs at the far end of the room, just as he had instructed her. He sat in the chair closest to the door, setting himself between Sofia and anyone who might enter the room.

The next person who entered the room, though, was hardly imposing or threatening. Dr. Bert Reynard, his wrists and ankles cuffed, was shoved into the room. His thin gray hair was in disarray and his gaunt face unshaven. He looked exhausted, but his eyes flashed wide with recognition.

The door closed on them before Bert could blurt out anything to blow their cover.

Bert's nervous gaze darted around the room. "Are we being observed?"

Kyle shook his head. "Attorney-client privilege."

"Are you here to get me out?"

"Not unless you want to live the rest of your life on the run. You're better off playing by the rules of the system." Kyle pushed out an empty chair. "Sit."

Bert looked across the room at Sofia. "Who is she?"

Apparently, Bert did not recognize Sofia as the waitress at Zanzi-Bar. Good. The longer Sofia stayed anonymous, the better. Kyle shrugged. "She's one of my associates, here to help my cover. What happened after the IGEC took you into custody?"

"Where is the cooler?"

"Safe."

"And the contents? The test tubes? The microchip?"

"Both safe."

“Thank God.” Bert sagged into his chair. “You can’t let the IGEC get its hands on them, or they’ll shut down Proficere.”

Sofia leaned forward. “What’s on the microchip?”

Bert frowned, his eyebrows drawing together.

“Answer the question,” Kyle ordered. “Your protected status as a Three Fates client isn’t all that stable right now. Zara Itani is furious about the lack of disclosure that led to the fiasco at the nightclub. If she cuts you off as a client, the cooler goes straight to the IGEC.”

“You can’t! The repercussions—not just for Proficere—but for the wider research community... The IGEC will use it as ammunition to trample over intellectual freedom. They’ve already set so many limits on what can or can’t be researched. God, they’ll drive us back into the seventeenth century, if they could.”

Sofia spoke up. “Why was Proficere researching differences in cardiac function?”

Bert smiled thinly. “What do you know about cardiac function? I’m not going to explain my work to a common mercenary.”

“Alvin Smith was the real brains behind the research, wasn’t he?” Sofia asked. “He was nominated for a Nobel Prize, but your name wasn’t nominated alongside his.”

Bert’s face reddened. He shot to his feet and slammed both fists down on the table. “I did the work! Alvin was the big name, but I did all the research. The innovation, all the cutting-edge ideas were mine, but all I got was my name on the research paper, just ahead of the graduate student who washed the test tubes. Alvin stole all the fame, the glory that should have been mine!”

“What glory was that, Dr. Reynard?” Sofia continued in that quiet voice.

“I identified racial variances in cardiac function. You’d be surprised how much some people are willing to pay for that information and for samples of chemical agents that specifically target those variances.”

“You created chemical agents that can distinguish its victims by race?”

“By their genes,” Bert corrected. “And genes are more or less prevalent in certain racial groups, so for all intents and purposes, yes, I’ve created racially targeted chemical agents.”

Kyle’s hands curled into fists. “What exactly did you try to sell to the Rue Marcha? What was on the microchip?”

Bert raised his chin. “The genetic analysis on the cardiac function of South Americans.”

“And what’s in the test tube?” Kyle asked.

“Cardorin, a chemical agent I designed to exploit those racial variances.”

“What does Cardorin do?”

“It disrupts cardiac function, causes arrhythmia, and eventually cardiac arrest.”

Kyle’s brow furrowed. “All that, just from drinking the stuff in the test tube?”

The scientist shook his head. “Cardorin is stable and more or less harmless as a liquid sealed in a vacuum test tube, but when exposed to air, it becomes a gas—colorless, odorless.”

“The perfect chemical weapon,” Sofia murmured. She looked at Kyle, her brown eyes brimming with fear. She did not move, but Kyle was certain that only strength of will held her together. “What would the Rue Marcha do with that information?” she asked.

“The same thing they’ve always done,” Kyle snapped out a reply. “Control people and governments through the threat of terror.”

Sofia shook her head. “But it’s their people. They’re the same race. The same chemical agents will affect them too, and since it disperses through the air, there’s no way to contain it.”

Bert snorted. He leaned back and folded his hands across his chest. His smile was smug. “The antidote is more than just an antidote. It is also preventative—”

“Of course. What idiot creates a chemical weapon without an antidote?”

“What kind of idiot creates a chemical weapon in the first place?” Kyle demanded. “You know the Chemical Weapons Convention banned production, stockpiling, and use of chemical weapons.”

“And yet large stockpiles exist in spite of the Chemical Weapons Convention,” Bert pointed out. “We’re surrounded by hypocrites. Like the IGEC, government organizations and international regulatory groups strive to limit what you can do because it allows them to do what they will with greater impunity.”

Sofia’s eyes narrowed. “People like you are exactly why society needs limits. You’re a hazard to yourself.”

“Where is the antidote?” Kyle asked before Bert could respond to Sofia’s scathing observation.

“Back at Proficere.”

“Wasn’t it part of the price you negotiated with the Rue Marcha?”

“Yes, it was, but Alvin had doubts about what we were doing. The Rue Marcha wanted our research, all of it. They agreed to run field tests on both the chemical agent and the antidote, and deliver the results and data back to us, but Alvin couldn’t stomach the possibility that the Rue Marcha might let people die as part of the experiment. He wanted to hold on to the antidote until he received reassurance on their research protocols.”

Could Bert Reynard possibly be that clueless? Kyle wanted to hit the man. “What the hell do you mean by protocols? The Rue Marcha is a drug cartel, not a research laboratory.”

“Research happens in the field. Theories and hypotheses are useless without actual data, and the Rue Marcha would have given us what we really needed. Proof. Evidence.”

Sofia’s mouth dropped open. “At what cost?”

“Cost?” Bert scoffed. “Don’t talk to me about cost. I understand cost. There’s a cost to everything, but society has been shying away from paying the full cost of scientific advancement for a long time.”

Kyle shook his head and waved Sofia back. He could not let Bert get distracted, not when he needed more information out of the man. “What did you tell the IGEC?”

“Nothing. They think Alvin was the one in charge, and since he’s dead—” He shrugged. Clearly, he was not all that broken up over his research partner’s death. “As long as they don’t find the microchip or the test tubes, they have nothing on me. Our research files back at Proficere are heavily encoded, and without sufficient evidence, no judge is going to issue a subpoena.”

“You’re underestimating human paranoia over genetic research,” Sofia warned. “Your only chance is to come clean before the IGEC gets to the files.”

“Come clean?” Bert’s eyebrows shot so high they vanished into his hairline. “I’ve done nothing wrong. I didn’t create genetic variances. I only found them.”

“You created ways to exploit them.” Sofia pushed to her feet and folded her arms across her chest. “I think we’re done here.”

Kyle nodded. He stood, too.

“Wait!” Bert protested. “What are you going to do?”

“I’m going to make sure the Rue Marcha never gets its hands on your research,” Sofia said.

“You’re not going to turn the work over to the IGEC, are you?” Bert asked, alarmed. He rose from his seat. “If you do, I’ll sue Three Fates for breach of contract.”

Kyle snorted. “Considering how many laws Zara breaks on a normal day, somehow I don’t think that threat is going to faze her much, if at all. I’d think hard about ‘fessing up to the IGEC. They’re persistent little buggers—take it from me—I spent the better part of eight hours yesterday trying to shake them off my tail.”

“I’ve done nothing wrong,” Bert repeated.

“Only because lawmakers and regulators never imagined anyone would be crazy enough to do what you did. Come on, Sofia.” He stepped aside and gestured to Sofia to precede him out the door. “We’re done here.”

Kyle and Sofia left the interview room. They said nothing to each other on their way down to the lobby, but he could see her distress and unease from the way she nibbled delicately on her lower lip. It was a bad habit, he thought absently. Odd how well he knew her after two days.

Proximity and stress had a tendency to do that to a person. Attraction, too.

A muscle in his smooth cheek twitched. Bad move, Norwood. Attraction had a way of screwing with a man’s good sense.

The elevator door opened on the first floor, and people streamed out. He followed them.

A startled woman’s voice called out. “Kyle?”

Lydia. Damn, busted.

He had run into the one person in IGEC who would recognize him regardless of what he wore or the name on his identification.

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sofia walk calmly toward the entrance. In her business suit, she blended into the crowd of IGEC employees. She did not look like a graduate student, and she most certainly did not look like a nightclub waitress.

Instead of leaving the building, however, she sat in one of the chairs arrayed in the lobby. Sofia opened her tablet and idly flipped through its electronic pages with the bored air of a woman waiting for a companion. When I get my hands on her—

Lydia's sharp voice drew him back to his predicament. "Why are you here, Kyle?"

"You insisted I was in trouble with the IGEC, so I thought I'd come by and see just how much trouble I could get into. You know, just to help you make your case."

She grabbed his arm, swung him around, and pushed him face-first against the wall in the elevator lobby. Handcuffs snapped close around his wrists. "I'll bury you so deep in the vaults of the IGEC, Zara and your damned NSA friends won't be able to find you." She pulled him away from the wall and shoved him toward the guard desk. "You didn't come alone, did you? You brought her."

Shit. The guard would be able to identify Sofia and—

Kyle had both Lydia and Sofia in his line of sight when it happened. There was no denying what he saw, no passing it off as serendipity or chance. Sofia's hand moved against her tablet in a gesture that could not possibly have been related to manipulating the electronic device. In that instant, the strap of Lydia's handbag tugged sharply away from her shoulder, as if yanked by an invisible, malicious hand—a hand that mirrored Sofia's movements. The contents of Lydia's handbag scattered on the ground, among them, her Glock.

Lydia gasped and lunged for it, but it skittered away from her, as if tugged along on an invisible leash, a lure for an impatient puppy.

The handcuffs around Kyle's wrists clicked and fell away.

Across the lobby, a short, attractive woman in a business suit put away her tablet and walked out of the building.

Sofia!

Instinct and training kept him moving in spite of the shock that punched into his stomach and the curse words that set up a muffled roar in his head. A mutant. Sofia's a goddamned mutant!

The Glock had stopped moving. Her face mottled, Lydia reached for the gun. Kyle lunged forward and kicked it out of her reach. It spun across the polished tiles. "Gun!" he shouted, drawing everyone's attention to Lydia as she dove for the weapon.

He darted in the opposite direction and raced out the door. The plaza outside the IGEC building was crowded—perfect for his needs. He vanished into the press of bodies, Lydia's outraged shouts and orders eventually lost in the noise of the crowd.

It was easy for a man with his experience to make his way to a large office building several blocks away from the IGEC headquarters and catch a cab back to the general vicinity of Sofia's house. From his innocuous drop-off point two and a half blocks away from the town house, he carved a roundabout path to ensure he was not followed before returning to her home.

He prayed only that his caution had not cost him too much time.

He flung the door open and stormed into the house. "Sofia!"

Her voice, small and thin, called out from the second floor. “I’m up here.”

He took the steps two at a time, and within moments, found himself standing at the entrance of her bedroom, staring at a woman he thought he had known.

Her hands moved steadily over the contents of the Proficere Labs cooler. She tucked the plastic-encased microchip into the lining of the case. Her fingers traced the slim outline of the test tubes containing the chemical agent created by Bert Reynard.

She was packing up the case. She was going to turn it over to the IGEC.

Kyle opened his mouth and said the first thing that came into his head. “You’re a goddamned telekinetic.”

Sofia stiffened. She straightened and turned to face him. “What is it to you?”

“You didn’t tell me.”

Annoyance flashed over her face. “We’ve known each other for two days. You don’t know my mother’s name or my father’s name. You don’t know what kindergarten, grade school, middle school, high school, or college I went to. You don’t know my best friend, my favorite color, or my favorite music. You don’t know anything about me.”

He stalked up to her.

She did not recoil, though she had to tilt her head back to look at his face.

The woman was not frightened of him. If she were, she would have left the IGEC headquarters at the first opportunity instead of waiting around to see if he needed help.

She’s a goddamned telekinetic. He ground his teeth. “I hate mutants.”

His words took the stiffness out of her spine. Her eyelashes fluttered down to conceal her eyes. “I know.” Her voice was small, so tiny, like the voice of a child.

“You don’t know why.”

She shrugged and turned her back on him. “Does it matter? You obviously think your hate is justified since you’re clinging to it.”

“I— You should have told me.”

Sofia shook her head. “Why? So that you can lump me into the category of big bad mutants like Danyael Sabre, who can kill with a touch? I’m not a council-trained mutant; I’m not one of their enforcers. I’m not an alpha-level telekinetic. Hell, I’m so low on the totem pole my powers don’t even register on those machines they build to track mutants.” She held up her hand, snapping her thumb and forefinger together like pincers. “This is the extent of my telekinetic abilities. Good enough for carnival tricks and not much else, so forgive me if I don’t feel like being tossed, by people like you, into the category of ‘most hated humans’ just because I have a smidgen of psychic ability that I would much rather not have.”

She slammed down the lid of the cooler and turned around to face him. “You’re an ass, you know that, Kyle?” Her voice quavered. “The least you could have done was to say thank you before you ripped me apart.” She seized the cooler, holding it to her chest like a shield, before marching past him and heading down the stairs.

“Damn it, Sofia. Not telling me you’re a mutant is like not telling me you’re HIV-positive before sleeping with me.”

Her footsteps halted on the steps. “You bastard! Go to hell.” Pain and rage quivered in her voice. The sound of her footsteps grew fainter, and he heard the sound of the front door opening. “And just for the record,” her voice shouted up at him. “I’m not infectious!”

He slammed his hand against the wall and left a small dent. “You fucking lied to me!”

It all made sense now. The items on the dressing table that she had flung into his face. The toilet door that he thought he had locked. Carnival tricks, she called them, but those small carnival tricks had been enough to make a difference.

She had saved his hide.

Oh, sure, he would have gotten out of his predicament with the IGEC sooner or later, but she had done so with such ease and flair.

She’s a goddamned mutant.

And she didn’t tell me.

It was not just lying through omission. She knew, everyone knew, that genetic heritage was as important—hell, it was more important than anything else. More important than race, than class and social standing. It mattered if one was human or just a human derivative—a clone, in-vitro, or mutant.

Kyle’s upper lip curled. She was a derivative.

The memory of Sofia’s voice ricocheted through his head. “I’m not infectious!”

She was a mutant. Like Danyael Sabre.

She wielded psychic powers as effortlessly as others wielded charm or good looks. Mutants were inherently manipulative, untrustworthy. They were thoughtless, selfish bastards, who sought only to further themselves, winning trophies and securing triumphs they could not have won any other way.

There was no place in the world for mutants like Sofia and her kind.

Yet she had stayed. Instead of leaving as she should have, as he had told her to in the event of any trouble, she had stayed.

And she had saved him.

Kyle squeezed his eyes shut. Damn. Tension vibrated through him, causing his clenched fists to tremble. Why? Why had she stayed?

She was only a minor telekinetic. He had seen alpha telekinetics hurl cars and raise psychic walls real and solid enough to deflect bullets, but Sofia, by her own confession, did carnival tricks. Dragging handbags from shoulders and unlocking handcuffs probably strained the outer limits of her abilities, yet she had guts enough to challenge IGEC agents.

Sofia had stayed to fight for him, to save him.

He raced down the stairs and out the door, just in time to see a cab, with Sofia in it, turn the corner. “Damn it!”

He jumped into the first available taxi he saw at Dupont Circle. “A cab just turned down Connecticut Avenue. It’s probably going to the IGEC headquarters on Constitution Avenue. Follow it.”

Keeping sight of Sofia’s cab in the perpetually heavy D.C. traffic was not difficult. The car Kyle was in was two and a half blocks behind when Sofia’s taxi pulled up in front of the IGEC building. She stepped out, cooler in hand. God, she looked so small, so fragile and vulnerable, with her coat pulled tight around her and her shoulders hunched against the bite of the wind.

He hoped she had not been crying, but if she had been, it was his damned fault.

She turned toward the IGEC headquarters, but before she had taken two steps forward, six men leapt out of two cars idling in front of the building.

“No!” Kyle pushed the car door open and raced down the pavement.

Sofia’s small body was buried in the bulk of the men surrounding her. Kyle heard only her screams as they dragged her into one of the cars.

It screeched away from the curb, and the other car followed. Kyle caught only a glimpse of the license plate, but he did not have to run it to know that the Rue Marcha had taken Sofia.

Chapter 12

Kyle rushed back to the cab he had abandoned and lunged into the front passenger seat. “Follow those cars!”

The taxi driver shook his head. His hands gripped the steering wheel. “Did you see the size of those guys?”

Yes. They looked larger than gorillas and they had taken Sofia.

Kyle ran around the front of the cab, pulled the door open, and yanked the driver out. He jumped into the driver’s seat and slammed his foot down on the accelerator. The car shot away from the curb, leaving its owner, screaming on the street. “You didn’t pay your fare!”

“You’ve got bigger issues than that,” Kyle muttered. He, too, had a hell of a problem. Following a car through Washington, D.C.’s traffic was not difficult, unless, of course, it was a black sedan. Washington, D.C., was full of diplomats, most of them driven around in black cars. He kept an eye on the two black sedans as they turned a corner and sedately flowed through traffic.

They were heading for the freeway.

He swung the steering wheel to direct the car up the ramp and onto the freeway. The two black cars were a hundred feet ahead of him, one still trailing the other.

A large eighteen-wheeler changed lanes, blocking his view. Kyle leaned against the horn, cursed under his breath, and swerved out of his lane. His gaze searched the freeway ahead of him. His eyes widened in alarm. His quarry had moved out of its linear formation. The cars had split up and now blended into the mass of cars on the freeway. He had to choose which sedan to follow.

He accelerated, weaving through traffic to catch up with a black sedan. Damn the tinted windows. Teeth gritted, he swung his steering wheel and rammed into the car.

The sedan swerved out of its lane.

Loud car honks pierced the air as drivers all around him objected to the dangerous driving.

For a moment, the sedan and Kyle’s cab raced alongside each other before the sedan accelerated sharply. Kyle pushed down on the pedal and shot forward. The taxi’s frame, or its engine—something—rattled loudly; it was not made for high speeds. His options narrowed to the category of “stupid and dangerous.”

“Come on; don’t fall apart on me yet.” His cab shot past the sedan. He twisted the steering wheel, swinging into the sedan's lane. The other car spun to avoid a collision and screeched to a halt on the shoulder of the freeway. The front of the car pointed toward on-coming traffic. Kyle scrambled from his cab, reached for his handgun, and ran toward the sedan.

He swung the driver's door open.

A young black man, dressed in a neatly pressed suit, blinked up at him. Slowly, he raised his hands to show he was unarmed.

Damn. The Rue Marcha was South American. It did not hire blacks and its thugs sure as hell did not wear suits.

Kyle pulled open the back door. In the rear seat, a small child trembled in his mother's arms. Both were well-dressed and dark-skinned. A small and colorful child's backpack was nestled at the woman's feet.

He did not doubt that the headline news tomorrow would report that the wife and child of an African diplomat were rudely attacked and accosted while returning from the child's kindergarten program. Damn it! He slammed the door shut on them and looked up.

Two black sedans joined the traffic pulling off the highway at exit sixty-three.

Within moments, he merged into traffic before racing down the same exit. The two black cars stayed together, comfortably cruising down quiet neighborhood streets.

Which one had Sofia?

Trusting his instincts, he accelerated past the second car and broadsided the first.

It rammed back. The impact swung his cab onto the sidewalk, sending a mailman diving for cover. Kyle cursed under his breath. Too close. Hell, what he would give to have his finely tuned BMW instead of this piece of worn-down machinery masquerading as a car. Only his driving skills had kept him, and everyone else around him, alive thus far.

A bullet smashed through the windshield, scattering shards of glass across the passenger seat.

Kyle instinctively reached for his gun.

His car jolted forward as he was rammed from behind. The gun slipped from his grasp and slid across the passenger seat before tumbling off onto the floorboard.

Gunfire from behind sent him diving to the seat. Fragments of faux leather and polyester sprayed through the car interior. He leaned down and reached for his gun. The grip was a fraction of an inch beyond his grasp. He would have to dive for it.

Kyle inhaled deeply and braced himself. With his right hand, he opened the car door. In that same instant, he lunged forward, seized his gun, and rolled out of the car in a smooth motion. He scrambled around the car fractions of a second before the gunfire ripped up the asphalt around him.

One of the black cars raced past him.

A bitter taste flooded his throat. Sofia was in that car.

And he was trapped, pinned down by gunfire coming from the other car.

He crouched low, peeked around his bullet-riddled cab, and pulled off a single clean shot.

Air hissed out of the front tire of the sedan.

The familiar scream of police sirens pierced the air. Kyle threw a quick glance over his shoulder. The mailman huddled behind a large bush, fumbling with his cell phone. Thank God for innocent bystanders and their ubiquitous cell phones.

Two cops on motorcycles scrambled onto the scene. Gunfire from the car turned on the cops—the Rue Marcha members were instinctively violent in their response to law. One policeman skidded, screaming and bleeding from a shoulder wound. He tumbled onto the road and curled into a defensive position. His motorcycle slid across the road, coming to a rest beside the cab.

Kyle stared at the motorcycle's still-spinning wheels.

He pushed to his feet and raced to the motorcycle. He yanked it upright, swung his leg over the seat, and wrung the throttle. He raced down the street after the second black car.

Catching up with the car Sofia was in was not difficult. Getting it to pull over was an entirely different matter. He leaned forward, braced his arm across the motorcycle handlebars, and raised his handgun. For a moment, it wavered unsteadily in his hand before his grip tightened. His finger squeezed the trigger.

The back tire of the car popped. Rubber instantly shredded into fragments.

The car careened out of control. It swerved between the road and sidewalk before barreling at top speed toward a gas station at the junction of two roads.

No!

The thought was scarcely formed in his head when two thousand pounds of an out-of-control vehicle rammed into a gas pump. The glancing impact swung the car. Its rear squarely hit the adjacent gas pump.

Kyle's scream of disbelief was lost in the deafening sound of double explosions.

Chapter 13

Flames engulfed the car, shooting high above the square roof of the gas station. Alarmed employees scurried from the attached convenience store.

No one emerged from the car.

Shock rooted Kyle to the ground, but panic was greater and propelled him forward. He ran toward the burning sedan, but the heat of the flames drove him back. Soot and ash stained his face. His lips moved, shaping silent words. Sound followed, emerging as an animal cry of pain. “Oh, God. Sofia!”

He dropped to his knees, his lungs laboring to breathe through the thick smoke pouring into the air. His world coalesced down to the flames shooting from the dark sedan. Dimly, he heard screams around him and saw people running past his peripheral vision. He sensed a crowd forming a safe distance behind him.

He could not think, could not feel anything beyond the stunning sense of loss.

Some part of his rational mind screamed at him and told him it was impossible. He could not possibly hurt this much over someone he had known for less than forty-eight hours.

The gaping hole in his heart told him otherwise.

He choked on the acrid fumes. Sirens screamed as emergency personnel arrived. A well-meaning emergency medical technician dragged him to his feet and pulled him away to a waiting ambulance.

“Here, breathe deeply.” The EMT held an oxygen mask to Kyle’s face.

The oxygen jolted him into sharp awareness of his surroundings. He was bleeding from a shoulder wound, and his smartphone was buzzing.

He pushed the EMT away and stumbled out of the ambulance before snatching up his phone.

Zara’s voice, sultry as black velvet, purred at him. “The IGEC called and raised hell. What happened there?”

“They snatched Sofia. The Rue Marcha snatched Sofia.” He dragged a hand through his hair. It came away black with soot.

“And the microchip?”

Thanks for inquiring about Sofia. He ground his teeth. It was Zara. What else did he expect from a master assassin with a glacier for a heart? “It’s...” His voice trembled. “It’s gone. Sofia’s gone, too. The car hit a gas station.” I sent it into the gas station. “It exploded. Sofia’s gone. They’re all gone.”

Zara was briefly silent. When she finally spoke, her voice was crisp. “I’ve got your location from your phone. Don’t talk to anyone. I’ll be there in twenty minutes.”

“I’m fine. I got hit, but I’m fine.”

“Can you drive?”

Kyle stared at the motorcycle he had commandeered. The engine was still running. “Yeah.”

“I’ll meet you at Danyael’s clinic.”

“I said I’m fine.”

Her voice softened into a dangerous purr. “Be there.”

He pulled the phone away from his ear and stared at it as if it were a snake. His hand tightened around the phone. If he could crush it, he would have. Damn you, Zara.

And damn me.

He had killed Sofia as surely as if he had fired a bullet into her skull.

The motorcycle ride to Danyael’s clinic passed in a blur of blaring horns interspersed with white noise, of other vehicles sliding past Kyle as he wove recklessly through traffic. The stabbing sense of loss made it impossible to focus through the cacophony of his chaotic thoughts.

If he had held his tongue...

If he had controlled his temper...

If he had not driven Sofia away, she would still be alive.

A car horn blared. Instinct twisted his motorcycle away from a near collision. His heart pounded, but his head was no clearer when he pulled up in front of the free clinic and cut the engine.

For a moment, he sat there, shoulders slumped. I killed her.

His breath shuddered out of him, a jagged sound, and he fisted his hands against his eyes.

If Danyael had not sent Sofia on a fool’s mission—

No, my fault. She got me out of trouble, and in return, I told her I hated her.

He was responsible. Just him. And he knew it.

Kyle dismounted from the motorcycle, squared his shoulders, and stalked into the clinic. He marched past several startled patients and threw open the door of Danyael’s office.

Danyael’s dark eyes swept over Kyle’s disheveled state. He turned to his patient, an elderly gentleman. “I have to take care of this emergency. Would you mind waiting in the reception area for a few minutes?”

The old man cast Kyle a nervous glance. “No, no. Of course not.” He pushed to his feet. Leaning heavily on his cane, he tapped his way out of Danyael’s office.

Kyle slammed the door shut behind the man. “Sofia...Sofia—” His voice cracked.

“Sit down, Kyle.” Danyael’s tone remained calm, so calm it was practically emotionless.

Damn him. How could he remain so unmoved, so unaffected when Sofia, the one innocent person in this entire mess was dead?

“Didn’t you hear? Sofia’s gone.”

“Last I heard from Zara, Xin’s working with the FBI to identify the remains in the car. I’d hold off on grieving until they find a corpse with matching dental records. Now take off your jacket, your shirt, and sit down.”

Danyael’s steady tone of quiet authority was far more effective than Zara’s soft purr of pure menace. Kyle swallowed hard against the heavy, crushing pressure on his chest and shrugged off his jacket. With a wince, he pulled off his shirt. Dried blood peeled off, leaving an open wound that spilled fresh blood down his left arm.

Danyael pushed to his feet and limped over to Kyle. With gentle hands, he probed around the edges of the bullet wound that marked Kyle’s shoulder. “It’s clean. The bullet went right through you. There’s bruising around the bone, but nothing’s broken.”

“Just tape it up.”

“I can do better than that.”

“I said just tape it up. I don’t want a mutant or a doctor messing around with it.”

Danyael shrugged, apparently not offended. “I’ll be a minute.” He went into the adjacent room, leaving Kyle alone.

The silence of the room closed in around Kyle. He buried his face in his right hand. Mentally, he revisited every second of his car chase, every wrong move he had made, every bad decision he had taken. He had killed Sofia with his choices, his recklessness, his—

Danyael walked back into the room. The blame and self-hatred churning through Kyle’s head fell silent, settling like restless and bickering wolves in a den calming at the return of the alpha wolf.

Kyle looked up. “Don’t do that. Stop screwing with my emotions.”

“It’s what I do,” Danyael said. “Healing is eighty-percent mental. If you refuse empathic healing, you should at least be in prime mental and emotional condition so that your body can heal itself.”

“I said I don’t want your help.”

“Most people don’t get what they want. Trust me on that.” Danyael’s quiet chuckle was ironic. “You, however, are getting what you need.” He returned to Kyle’s side and cleaned the wound before swabbing an antiseptic ointment over it. A layer of deftly applied bandages sealed the wound without limiting Kyle’s range of motion.

The alpha empath stepped back. “How do you feel?”

Kyle swung his arm cautiously. The pain was a dull ache, easily ignored.

“Over-the-counter pain medication should suffice,” Danyael continued. “But if the pain gets too bad, come back here and I can prescribe something stronger.”

The door opened, and Zara walked in. Without greeting or preamble, she said, “Four corpses. All male. Are you sure Sofia was in the car?”

Kyle’s breath caught. The quick flutter in his chest—it could not possibly be hope, could it? “I saw them grab her. She wasn’t in the second car—the one that rammed me—right?”

“Metro police arrested those four men. No Sofia either.”

His shoulders sagged in spite of the surge of relief. A silent sigh whispered from him. “They must have dropped her off somewhere, but how could they? I was too close. I would have seen them.”

“Could they have pulled a switch on you?”

A switch? Kyle’s gaze became unfocused as he tried to re-create the scene of the highway moments before the two cars exited the freeway. The freeway remained crowded with black cars, many of similar makes and models. His voice was quiet, reflective. “They knew I’d be on the lookout for two cars traveling together. When they split up briefly on the highway, another black car—a decoy—could have taken the place of the car carrying Sofia instead. More than likely, the car with Sofia never pulled off on exit sixty-three.”

His hands clenched into fists. He had fallen for one of the most obvious tricks in the book. He had screwed up and Sofia had paid the price. “Where is she now?” he asked. He fought to keep his voice even but knew that it grated with frustration. “Any idea?”

“Impossible to know for sure.” Zara propped a hip against the side of Danyael’s desk. “The Rue Marcha doesn’t operate much in D.C. There’s no dossier of past movement to draw from.”

“And the four Rue Marcha who were taken?”

“In FBI custody, but they’ve proven resistant to questioning. They’re not mutants but they have strong psychic shields. It’ll take awhile for the telepaths to break through.”

And the entire time, Sofia’s life was at risk. What choice did he have? “I’ll question them.”

Zara snorted. “And what makes you think you’ll get any more traction than a telepath?”

“Psychic shields don’t protect against physical pain. They’ll talk. I guarantee that.”

Danyael shook his head and looked away. His shoulders rose and fell on a sigh. “I can get them to talk.”

“Oh?” Zara arched an eyebrow. “I thought you didn’t want to get involved.”

Danyael did not directly answer Zara’s challenge. “It’s the fastest way to get the truth out of them. They’re probably trained to resist interrogation techniques. Physical pain may not mean much to them, but their psychic shields won’t protect them from direct contact from an alpha empath.” He looked at Kyle. “If you’re willing to accept my help, that is.”

Kyle grunted. “Sofia is the only one who matters now.” Whatever it took—swallowing his pride and accepting help from a man he despised—he would do whatever it took to save Sofia.

Chapter 14

The J. Edgar Hoover Building loomed over Pennsylvania Avenue. Kyle found himself dragging his feet as he approached the building. He had spent most of his adult life avoiding law enforcement agencies, especially federal agencies.

In fact, if Xin had not been standing at the entrance, waiting for them, Kyle was certain that he and Zara would have been arrested immediately. The Chinese woman nodded in greeting and escorted Kyle, Zara, and Danyael past the security desk. No one made him give up his handgun, and no one insisted Zara turn over the multiple guns and daggers she was likely carrying.

How much influence did Xin—supposedly just an NSA analyst—wield?

“We’ve brought them together as you requested,” Xin said to Zara as she led Kyle, Zara, and Danyael toward the interrogation rooms on the seventh floor. She stopped outside a steel door. “Are you sure it’s a good idea?”

Zara deflected the responsibility. “Danyael’s request, not mine.”

Danyael shrugged. “True horror is self-inflicted. If I do this right, I’ll only have to talk to one person, and you’ll get the truth, or at least versions of the truth, from the others.”

Kyle shot Danyael a narrow-eyed glance. Danyael and Zara—in spite of their profound differences—were perfectly made for each other, after all.

“Who’s the leader of the group?” Danyael asked.

Xin nodded. “Biggest one, though they’re all big. I really don’t think you should go in alone.”

“You’ll need strong psychic shields to survive unscathed what I’m about to do.” Danyael glanced at Zara. “You’re not going in.”

Zara snorted. “If you think I’m letting you go alone into a room occupied by four trained murderers, you’re out of your mind.”

“We discussed this earlier.”

“So we did.” Zara’s smile was thin. “But I never agreed. I’m going in with you. I suggest you find a way to keep my emotions and mind protected while you’re in there driving them mad with horror.”

Kyle suppressed a snort. Zara specialized in delivering ultimatums.

Xin’s eyebrows drew together as she frowned. “Can you do it, Danyael? Zara’s going to be worse than four trained murderers if her mind and emotions snap.”

Zara arched an eyebrow. “That was almost a compliment.”

Danyael ignored her commentary. “I think so.”

“You think so?” Xin echoed.

“Good enough for me,” Zara said. “We’re wasting time. Let’s do this.”

Xin shook her head and reached out to catch Zara’s arm. “I don’t think—”

“Danyael would never put me at risk, you know that.” She shook off Xin’s restraining arm.

Danyael blocked her entry into the room. “When I take your hand, don’t fight me.”

She glowered at him. “Why?”

“I’ll need physical contact to protect you.”

Danyael nodded at Xin, who leaned close to the biometric iris scanner to unlock the door. Zara stepped in, followed by Danyael. Xin pulled the door shut behind them and gestured to Kyle. “We can watch them from in here.”

She led Kyle to the adjacent room, where a large glass panel provided a clear view of the interrogation room.

Kyle cursed under his breath.

Xin nodded, apparently agreeing with the sentiment. “Doesn’t look good, does it?”

Each of the four men in the room had at least half a foot on Danyael’s six feet and likely weighed two times more. Tattoos carved intricate patterns over heavily muscled biceps. Compared to them, the crippled alpha empath looked laughably weak.

The largest man snorted. “Who are you?” His words were thickened by his South American accent. His perfectly groomed handlebar mustache did not conceal the smirk he wore.

“If you have to ask, you’re probably better off not knowing.”

Kyle smiled in spite of the tension of the moment. Danyael had guts, that much was certain.

Danyael continued in the same quiet, confident tone he used with his patients. “Where’s Sofia?”

The man smirked. “Don’t know.”

“I’ll settle for whatever you do know.” Danyael hobbled forward, his hand outstretched. Zara kept pace beside him.

The gangster’s face paled. He retreated until his back hit the wall.

Kyle’s mouth dropped open. “What—?”

Xin shrugged. “Danyael shields a great deal of his power to blunt its effect on people around him, but when he exerts himself, it’s usually best not to be present. It’s a good thing he’s a defense-class mutant and his powers don’t penetrate physical barriers, or we’d be in trouble too.”

In the room, Danyael continued. “Your last chance to change your mind before I change it for you.”

The man shook his head, but his brow was deeply lined with worry.

The look in Danyael’s eyes was almost compassionate when he reached out and touched the man.

Danyael had made contact for no more than a second, Kyle told himself later—the briefest touch of skin against skin—but nothing could adequately describe the terror that surged into the man’s eyes; terror and fear so acute, so profound that they shredded the wall between sanity and madness. Behind the man’s psychic shields, his mind collapsed under the weight of stampeding emotions goaded by an alpha empath’s power. When the man screamed, it was the cry of an animal driven insane by horror.

His companions seemed glued to their seats, unable to tear their attention from their friend’s descent into madness. Their jaws hung slack, their eyes wide. Their faces turned ashen beneath their mocha-colored skin. When the man twisted around to slam his head into the wall, no one moved to stop him, except Danyael. He touched the man, and the man slumped to the floor, like a marionette with cut strings. Danyael turned to face the others and reached for Zara’s hand, his gesture casual. “Where’s Sofia?”

Kyle saw Danyael’s already dark eyes turn black as sin. Kyle had always known that the alpha empath was a killer in the guise of a helpless cripple, but in that moment, Danyael was almost ethereal—a demon in an angel’s body.

The truth gushed out of the three men as they stole occasional glances at their unconscious leader. Babblings of a warehouse in southeast D.C. Vague details of the armed guard that surrounded the place. Confirmation of the man in charge—Luis Sanchez, chief lieutenant in the Rue Marcha.

Danyael had turned hardened gangsters, known killers, into piles of mush in under a minute. Dimly, Kyle realized that he should be overflowing with admiration for Danyael’s brutal efficiency, but instead, all he could think of was all that devastating power wielded by a single man.

Kyle’s stomach churned with nausea. The taste in his mouth was sour. He had heard and seen enough. He spun on his heel, but Xin held out a hand to stop him from leaving the room.

Her brown eyes met his. “Danyael didn’t just do this for Sofia. He did it for them.”

He shook his head, dismissing her. “I have to get Sofia.” He had to do it alone. Zara, who was half-Venezuelan, could not help him.

Xin nodded. “Good luck.”

He stepped out of the room but not before he heard her whispered words. “You’ll need it.”

Chapter 15

Consciousness returned slowly. The dull ache drifting through her body coalesced into a painful throb in her head.

Sofia dragged her eyes open, and then squinted as a defense against the bright lights in the room. Spotlights glared down at her, unrelenting, merciless. She tried to bring up an arm to shield her eyes, but metal clinked at her wrists. The motion tugged at her other wrist.

Handcuffs.

Her eyes flashed open—spotlights be damned. She looked down at the steel cuffs that bound her wrists together. No big deal. She could pick the lock with her telekinetic powers, but then what? Sofia looked around a small room undistinguished by its cement walls and floor; no weird smears on either, though the latter was dusty and the air was stale. Boxes stood stacked high against three walls, leaving only the wall with the door clear.

It galled her to realize that her predicament was her fault. If she had not dashed off on her own, she would have been with Kyle and—

She paled. And what?

What could Kyle have done against the six thugs who snatched her off the street in broad daylight, right in front of the IGEC building? They had tossed her into the leather backseat of a car. She screamed. The last thing she recalled was struggling against the large hand clapped over her nose and mouth until darkness curtained over her vision.

If Kyle had been with her, they would have captured him too. Odds were the Rue Marcha would have perceived him as the greater threat and killed him.

Her heart skipped a beat. She swallowed painfully through a dry throat.

Common sense reasserted itself with a hard jerk.

If her hands were free, she might have smacked herself on the side of her head. She was worried for a mercenary, for God's sakes, for a man who had likely gotten himself into and out of worse situations.

Focus on yourself, kiddo. You're the one in trouble now, not him.

Sofia raised her hands in front of her so that she could study the handcuffs. Her eyes narrowed as she focused on the small lock. Her mind zeroed in on its target—there was no other way to describe the odd sense of “tunnel-vision” that preceded the use of her telekinetic powers. Something almost tangible stirred in the back of her head, a motion, perhaps imaginary, perhaps not, but moments later, the lock clicked.

Sofia shook the handcuffs off. As a precaution, she slipped them into the back pocket of her denim jeans and then proceeded to explore the room. The door was locked, of course, but it was not a problem for a third-rate telekinetic. The wooden boxes and crates were sealed, but she pried the covers off and rifled through their contents. She was oddly disappointed when she found neatly packaged containers of pharmaceutical products, each labeled with the brands of well-known American and international companies. Where were the heroin and cocaine? The Rue Marcha members were drug dealers, weren't they?

Sofia traced her fingers over the unopened bottles. Her brow furrowed. She recognized many drug names from her nursing program. The crates were filled with powerful prescription painkillers, depressants, and stimulants.

The Rue Marcha was trafficking prescription drugs and fueling the epidemic of prescription drug abuse in the United States.

Sofia bit down on her lower lip. All the more reason to break out of wherever she was, find the cooler, and make her way to the closest police station. Sometimes, her curiosity got the better of her, but until she was safe, she would have to restrain her nosiness.

After all, she was on her own. Kyle would not be coming for her.

The ache in her chest was equal parts hurt and fury. He had protected her and even gotten shot because of her, but he was still a stupid ass. Couldn't he see that she was different from Danyael, from the alpha mutants? How dared he act as if he was the injured party just because she had not revealed that she was a mutant from the moment they met? Hello, I'm Sofia Rios. I'm a mutant though you wouldn't know it because I can't do crap worth mentioning, but you should still feel free to treat me like shit just because you can't see past that goddamned chip on your shoulder.

She ground her teeth. Damn him. And to think I was falling in love with you, thinking that maybe you'd actually see me for the person I am.

He was an idiot, and, everything considered, he'd gotten off easy. When she got out of here—wherever here was—she was going to yell at him some more.

Yelling helped drown out the silent tears inside.

Sofia pressed her ear against the door but could not hear the sound of any movement outside. She breathed in deeply to steady her nerves. No better time. She squatted down to study the lock. Her brow furrowed with concentration.

Metal ground against metal. The door lock wrenched back. No delicate “click” here; the sound grated and echoed through the small room.

Someone had to have heard that sound.

Sofia winced and held her breath. Minutes passed, but no one came.

She did not bother to wait until her heartbeat settled down; she had more or less given up on the hope that it would. Slowly, she eased the door open wide enough for her to peek out. The door opened onto an indoor balcony made of steel. Closed doors, which presumably led to rooms similar to the one she vacated, flanked one side of the balcony. The other side overlooked the interior of a large warehouse space, partially filled with crates.

Male voices, speaking Spanish, engaged in idle conversation. From the doorway, she could trace the play of bulky shadows moving around the warehouse floor. On the other side of the warehouse, a series of staircases led to a lighted, glass-windowed room high above the warehouse floor—an observation room, perhaps.

The exit, if there was one, was nowhere to be seen.

Her gaze fell on a clutter of tools and equipment in front of the next room. She bent down to pick up a crowbar—not that it would do much good against one of the over-muscled thugs, but holding something that resembled a weapon made her feel better—and inched forward.

She peered down the length of the bridge. At the far end, a staircase led down to the warehouse floor.

Not a good option, but it was the only one she had. It was the only way out.

Shadows swathed large portions of the bridge, but spotlights were interspersed at regular intervals, though if no one looked up, she would be all right.

Sofia crossed the first expanse of darkness but hesitated at the brink of the pool of light. It was insane—twenty feet of unrelenting brightness. If she tried to move quickly, she would likely create enough sound to draw their attention, and if she moved slowly, the greater the likelihood that someone would look up and see her, smack in the spotlight.

Think, Sofia. Think.

A distraction. She needed a distraction.

Her brown eyes searched the breadth of the warehouse space below. Bare lightbulbs hung from long electrical cords in the ceiling. She frowned. Her father, a former engineer and amateur do-it-all handyman, would have had something scathing to say about it, but under the circumstances, she was grateful for the sloppy build out.

Her weak telekinetic powers fluttered. On the far side of the warehouse, a lightbulb swayed, moving in a languid circle as an invisible hand gently swung the long electrical cord around. Shadows danced erratically, drawing cries of alarm from the men on the warehouse floor. They rushed over to that corner of the warehouse; Sofia dashed quietly across the pool of light.

She managed to get across two lighted areas before the men's interest in that innocent lightbulb faded. Another three bright areas stood between her and the staircase. She did not think another lightbulb trick would work.

Directly beneath her, under the bridge, someone screamed.

She pressed against the wall, shrinking into the cover of the shadows as men raced across the warehouse floor. They were standing beneath her, their attention focused on something other than her.

Her heart pounded. She forced herself to move, scrambling across the bridge and racing down the staircase. A maze of boxes and crates beckoned. She ducked into its questionable safety; at that moment, its dubious cover was better than nothing.

The crates were stacked higher than her short frame. She ran until she found a corner, where she could keep an eye on both sides of the corridor of crates. From her position, sound was muffled, and she strained to catch snippets of the excited flurry of Spanish words. Something about an unconscious man. A silenced weapon.

Someone shouted out orders to search for an intruder.

Was it Kyle? Had he come for her?

Would he, in spite of everything that had happened between them?

Hope was noisy, vibrant. Her heart thumped so loudly she had to press her hand against her chest in an instinctive move to quiet it.

He would not come with guns blazing into a situation in which he must have known he would be grossly outnumbered, or at least she hoped he would not. Stealth. He would use stealth. He had taken on the guise of an attorney to enter IGEC. He would, she expected, dress down to match the coarse garb men used in hard labor, wear a cap, perhaps, to conceal his distinctly non-Hispanic features.

In other words, she had no chance of picking him out from a distance.

Effectively, she was still on her own. She had to find the Proficere Labs cooler, and then get the hell out of the warehouse. She glanced up. The observation room; she had to reach the observation room. If the cooler were in the warehouse, it would almost have to be up there, far away from the chaos on the warehouse floor.

The clutter of boxes and crates simplified her task. She darted from one cluster to another until she was almost at the foot of the staircases leading up to the observation room. Her fingers brushed against two large circuit breaker boxes located on the wall underneath the staircase.

The low buzz of conversation behind her assured her that the search for the intruder continued. She prayed it would keep the focus on the floor when she climbed the stairs.

She tucked her long hair inside her jacket, drew the collar around her neck and face, and walked up the stairs, affecting confidence she did not feel.

Each step drew her closer to the top.

Beneath her, on the warehouse floor, activity swirled as men searched between stacks of crates and boxes. Mercifully, no one looked up.

She continued on her way, a step at a time. She spared a quick glance down. If Kyle was somewhere down there, she did not see him. She had almost made it three quarters of the way up the stairs when a cry of alarm cut through the air.

“Allí arriba. La chica!”

Damn it. Forget confidence. Forget stealth. Sofia ran, her feet racing up the steel staircase that vibrated with the sound of heavy boots pounding after her.

She burst into the observation room. It was empty. The switchboard panel set against the wall glowed red and green. Two metal chairs had left scuffmarks on the white-tiled floor, but there was no sign of any cooler.

Her heart sank.

She was trapped.

Kyle saw her long before anyone else. In the dusty clothes of a day laborer, his work hat pulled over his features, he had little fear of being identified as he joined in the search for the intruder—himself. He had knocked out the guard at the entrance, but the man had been found sooner than he had liked.

He knew Sofia's hand was at work when the lightbulb started swinging. Like the other men, he had raced over to investigate, but out of the corner of his eye, he saw Sofia's slight form scramble across the balcony when all the men's backs were turned. She darted between walls of crates.

He concealed the smile of pride. That's my girl.

Now, if only he could work his way over to her.

The damned woman, however, seemed determine to head in the opposite direction from the exit. Frowning, he mentally traced her heading and looked up. What could she possibly want in the observation tower?

He made his way toward the staircase that led up to the observation room, but others were closer still, and inevitably, one of them looked up and shouted an alarm.

Kyle raced up the stairs, but others were ahead of him. They were steps away from the observation room when he heard the sound of shattering glass. Sofia must have broken the glass windows overlooking the warehouse floor. What the hell? Was she going to jump?

He surged forward. He had to stop her.

In that instant, the entire warehouse plunged into darkness.

Sofia crouched by the entrance of the observation room and held her breath as the first thud of heavy boots entered the pitch-black room. It was impossible to tell how many had entered the room. She only knew that she was completely outnumbered.

Divert. Distract. Then run like hell.

She had used the crowbar to smash the glass windows on the far side of the door of the observation room. Her telekinetic powers flipped the circuit breaker at the bottom of the staircase.

Please work, she prayed silently. The combination of the shattered glass and the darkness should lure the men to the far side of the observation room, farthest from the door, giving her a chance to make her way back down the stairs.

Her weak telekinetic powers did not lend themselves to a direct fight. She was also, just then, incapable of directing her feeble mutant powers to do anything more than they were already struggling to do. Her head hurt from the psychic effort of holding up the crowbar over the men's heads with the mental equivalent of thumb and forefinger.

“¿Dónde está?” male voices asked.

From the sound of the voices, Sofia guessed that the men were clustered on the far side of the room, gingerly feeling their way around the broken glass. Carefully, Sofia crept out of the observation room. Now! She blinked and let the crowbar fall.

A loud curse preceded the chaos that followed as the crowbar dropped on unsuspecting heads. Sofia scurried down the steps, the faint sound lost in the thuds and curses that filled the observation room. She had almost made it to the bottom of the stairs when the lights flared on.

At the bottom of the stairs, a heavily mustached man held the Proficere cooler chained to his wrist. He smiled, exposing perfectly even, white teeth. “Where are you going, chica?”

Sofia did not look over her shoulder, not even when she heard the sound of footsteps behind her. She had been outplayed, outmaneuvered, but she did not back down.

“That cooler's not yours,” she said.

The man smiled. “I paid for it. You shouldn't have kept it from me.”

“You don't know what—”

“Oh, I do. I know exactly what I paid for.”

Behind her, she heard the clicking of a gun, and then Kyle's voice. “You have what you want. Let her go.”

Startled, she glanced over her shoulder. Kyle stood behind her, his clothing as disreputable as the others. He held a handgun in each hand, one pointed at the man who held the cooler and the other at the men crowded on the staircase.

“I don't have it all,” the man said. “Where are the antidote and the formula for the antidote?”

Kyle responded before she could. “It's not in there. It never was. The professors didn't include it.”

“Oh.” The man raised his eyebrows. “Then you will go get it for me before I release this little chica.”

“I don't think so. Your issue is with the professors. You're going to let us walk out of here.”

The man shook his head. He opened the cooler and snatched out a liquid-filled test tube. “I drop this, and your little Latina girlfriend here dies.”

“But so will you.”

The man smirked and pulled out a gas mask. He wagged it in his hand, the gesture taunting.

“But your men. They'll all die, too.”

The man shrugged, callous and indifferent.

The nervous rustle of movement and whispered conversations convinced Sofia that the men of the Rue Marcha, at least, took the threat seriously.

The man's voice hardened. "Put down your guns or I test Cardorin's effectiveness right here, right now."

"Don't make this difficult," Kyle warned. "You can keep the cooler. Just let the girl go."

The leader of the Rue Marcha smirked. He jerked his head.

Two cartel members threw themselves at Kyle. He stumbled sideways, knocking Sofia face-first to the ground as he tussled with them. He pulled off two quick, precise shots. They collapsed, bleeding, but others jumped in to take their place.

Sofia reached out with her mind. Her telekinetic powers brushed against the side of the test tube, but the man's grip was tighter. She tugged. His eyes widened, but he did not let go. Instead, he stepped forward and swung the metal cooler at her.

Sofia brought her arms up to protect her face, but the cooler smashed into the side of her head. She screamed and coiled into a fetal ball.

"Sofia!" Kyle's shout blended into the blur of noises around her.

She raised her head in time to see a booted foot aimed straight for her face.

"No!" Kyle screamed as the steel toe of Luis's boot connected with Sofia's vulnerable flesh.

She slumped, unconscious, to the concrete floor.

Luis's chuckle, low and mocking, echoed through Kyle's head, fueling the fury that rushed through him.

The next few moments blurred into a flurry of fists and kicks. Outnumbered, Kyle fought until he too was beaten to the floor and his world plunged into darkness.

Chapter 16

“*K*yle? Kyle, are you here? Anybody?”

Sofia’s panicked voice dragged him back to consciousness. He forced his eyes open and blinked as the world wavered into focus. He looked around, uncomprehending, at the translucent walls that surrounded him. A layer of thick plastic lay over the cement of the warehouse floor. Hell, he was enclosed in the tent—an isolation chamber.

And so was Sofia.

The wooden back of the chair pressed against his spine as he rattled the handcuffs at his wrists. Sofia was seated in a chair across from him, her wrists cuffed behind her as well. Surprisingly, her eyes were blindfolded.

“Are you okay?” he asked. In that moment, he noticed the bruises on her cheekbone and the dried blood on her lips. Stupid question, he cursed himself. By tomorrow, the bruises would be a gory purple, assuming Sofia survived that long.

Armed men moved around outside the isolation chamber, their voices muffled into indistinct mumbles.

“What happened?” Kyle demanded.

“I don’t know. I just woke up myself,” Sofia said.

“Can you pick the lock on the handcuffs?”

“I can’t see! I need to see the lock to pick it.”

Damn it.

Sofia swallowed hard. “Where are we?”

“An isolation chamber,” he said. “A tent frequently used to contain hazardous airborne materials.”

Her voice quavered. “Like a chemical agent?”

Kyle ground his teeth. “How do you feel?”

“Like I was hit and kicked in the face, which I was.”

“Any breathing trouble? And your heart?”

“Racing so hard I can feel it pounding in my chest, but it’s been doing that since I met you and you dragged me into this hell.”

“I dragged you?” The snap of anger covered the rush of guilt. “I told you to turn the microchip over to Zara.”

“No, you stood beside me when she asked for it and I refused to give it to her,” she reminded him. “You’ve been standing with me all the time, through every stupid and dangerous decision I made, until —” Her voice trembled and she turned her face away.

The blindfold around Sofia’s eyes dampened. Kyle had to clench his teeth against the ache in his gut. “I wasn’t prepared. You could have eased me into it more gently.”

“There wasn’t time! Don’t you think that if I could have kept it from you forever, I would have? I know you hate mutants. You say it at least once a day. You treat Danyael like he’s a piece of shit when he’s done nothing except try to help us.”

“You weren’t there. I saw him use his mutant powers. He tore the truth out of drug cartel members in less than a minute.”

Sofia scowled. “This isn’t about Danyael. It’s about you and your insistence on painting all mutants, regardless of what they can do and who they are, with the same damned paintbrush! We’re not alike. We’re all individuals, and we’re all human.”

Sofia stamped her small foot. If she had not been blindfolded, he imagined he would have seen her eyes flash. “Derivatives is a definition coined by natural humans to make themselves feel superior to in-vitros. You’re better than that, Kyle. You’ve got so much going for you. You don’t have to push someone down to—”

The pain kicked in, sharper and more vicious than it had ever felt. “You know nothing about me! I was too stupid to keep. When my parents realized that I would always struggle to read and would never do well at school, they gave me up to the foster system and got their designer child instead. My younger brother—the in-vitro—was everything they wanted. He’s the CEO of Tyce Financial Systems. He makes millions a year.”

“But the CEO of Tyce Financials Systems isn’t a Norwood. It’s Robert Tyce.”

“My brother.” Kyle tasted bitterness on his tongue. “I was born Kyle Tyce.”

“Oh...”

He drew in a shuddering breath. “I changed my name to Norwood when I was adopted out of the foster system at the age of seventeen. My new mother—Cherise Norwood—sat down with me each day and taught me until I passed the GED at the age of twenty. I struggled through college, and after I graduated, I signed up for the military. It’s not as if I had anywhere else to go.”

Sofia’s whisper was scarcely louder than a sigh. “I’m so sorry, Kyle. Cherise is a wonderful person.”

“She died three years ago. Her pancreatic cancer spread to every other organ in her body.” And I couldn’t do a damn thing to help her. I was in such a panic, I couldn’t read, never mind understand, the documents the doctors gave me. Couldn’t research alternatives because the words kept jumbling up on me. “The doctors experimented on her, and I couldn’t help her. I didn’t know how.”

“And that’s why you hate doctors,” Sofia murmured.

“I hate doctors, but I blame myself,” Kyle said. “If I could read, if I were normal—”

“Of course you’re not normal,” she cut in. “No one really is. You’re definitely not.”

He stared at her, aghast, but she continued as if she had not noticed, which, considering her blindfold, she probably had not. Her voice was mild, but edged with steel. “You handle a gun like it’s an extension of your body; you seem completely inured to violence, yet you’ve always treated me with gentleness. You’re a mercenary, you’re practical, you’re in it for the money, yet you supported me the entire way even though there’s nothing in it for you. You’re not in the least bit normal, Kyle, and I’m glad.”

He closed his eyes. Her words sank into him, a balm against his aching heart. “How did you get to be so smart? You had good parents, didn’t you?”

She nodded. “Yeah.” Her voice was wistful.

“And they loved you, even though you were a telekinetic.”

Sofia scowled. “Yes, they did. And you need to stop treating mutants like we’re sick, or worse, infectious.”

The harsh sound of metal grating against metal cut off their conversation. Kyle looked up as the zipper that held the door flap closed was tugged open.

Luis Sanchez strode in wearing his familiar smirk. “Glad you’re both conscious. Wouldn’t be much of an experiment if we couldn’t record what was happening.”

Sofia turned her face in his direction. “What are you going to do?”

He looked up at the one-way vent in the roof of the tent. “Pump Cardorin into the tent and see what happens.”

Sofia paled.

Kyle yanked at the handcuffs but only succeeded in slicing the edges against his already raw flesh. “You can’t do that. She’ll die.”

“That’s precisely the point. She’s of South American origin. You’re not. If Professor Reynard’s theory is correct, she’ll die and you won’t. I’m not sure how long it’ll take, but that’s part of the experiment, too.” He stepped back out and pulled up the zip.

“Kyle?” Sofia called out, her voice trembling.

“I’m right here. You have to get me out of these handcuffs.”

“But I can’t see.”

“You don’t need to see. Your telekinetic powers are like an extra hand, aren’t they? Trust your psychic touch. Follow my voice. I’ll tell you when I start feeling your touch.”

He felt it first as a light tap against his boot, and then a faint brush against the hem of his denim jeans. “You found me, Sofia. Now just keep going up. I’ll tell you when you reach my knee.”

“Okay.”

Invisible fingers crawled up his leg. The barely perceptible sensation was tantalizing, hovering on the edge of awareness. If he closed his eyes, he could better focus on it, but a hiss of air drew his attention to the vent. Nothing except the sound alerted him to the fact that the chemical agent was filling the isolation tent. Colorless, odorless, Cardorin was designed to be the perfect killer.

“Kyle...” Sofia’s voice was edged with panic.

“Keep going, baby. You’re doing great. You’re at my knee. Move forward instead of up.”

“I don’t know how long I can hold my breath.”

Damn. “Don’t worry about it. Just focus on my voice.”

He could tell she was trying, but her psychic touch faltered. Her breathing grew labored, its rhythm unsteady.

“Come on now, babe,” he crooned. “Stay with me. Keep going. You’re almost there. Curve around my back.”

“Kyle, I—” Her lips were turning purple.

“That’s it, babe. I can feel you touching the handcuffs. Feel your way around to the lock. You can do it. Get me out of this and I’ll get us both out of here.”

She slumped forward. Her touch faded.

He yanked at the handcuffs. They still held. “Sofia!”

“I’m trying—” Her whisper was barely audible. “Kyle?”

“Yes?”

“I’m sorry I got mad at you.”

He ground his teeth against the searing ache in his chest. Thanks, Sofia. Now I feel like a jerk and complete asshole.

The cuffs clicked.

His handcuffs dropped to the floor with a sharp rattle, He dashed over to Sofia. His hands were frantic as he swept her into his arms and threw her over his shoulder. Her body shuddered once and then went limp. She was still alive—he could feel the faint movement of her chest—but her breath was erratic. “I’ll get you out of here,” he swore.

He yanked on the zipper of the door flap. A sharp jerk tore a vertical opening in the plastic wall of the isolation tent. On the other side of the tent, men carrying assault weapons ran away, screaming in panic for el jefe.

Damn. He had just released Cardorin into a warehouse filled with people of South American origin.

And Sofia was dying.

Her weight was so slight she might have weighed nothing at all. His grip tightened on her small, fragile body, and he pushed to a sprint.

No one made any move to stop him as he ran out of the warehouse. He slammed the door shut behind him. Would the warehouse contain the gas? He prayed it would.

His car was waiting where he had parked it, two blocks away. He set Sofia gently in the front passenger seat. Her skin was clammy and beaded with sweat, but she was still breathing shallowly. He climbed into the driver's seat and pulled away from the curb before reaching past Sofia to grab his cell phone from the glove compartment. He hit the first number on speed dial.

Zara picked up on the second ring. "What is it now?"

"Luis released Cardorin into the warehouse. Sofia's dying."

"And the gas in the warehouse?"

"Closed the door on my way out. Don't know if it'll contain the gas." And he wasn't sure he gave a damn. "Sofia needs help. Now."

"I'll pick Danyael up from his clinic. We'll meet you at Sofia's town house." She hung up on him.

He stared at his phone. 10:30 p.m.

The drive across town seemed to take forever. Every few seconds, he threw a quick glance at Sofia, waiting, riding each moment on the edge of agony, until he heard her next faltering breath. Helplessness clawed at him. Why couldn't he do more for her?

Kyle pulled into the driveway behind her town house. Zara had not yet arrived. Where the hell was she? How much longer could Sofia hold out?

He carried Sofia into the house. After flicking on the lights, he pounded up the stairs to her bedroom and laid her on the bed. Within seconds, he got her handcuffs off. He took her hand in his and searched desperately for a pulse. "Hang on, please. Just a few more minutes—"

Kyle glanced around sharply at the faint sound of the front door swinging open. Zara's voice called out. "Kyle?"

"Up here!" His grip tightened around Sofia's limp hand. He tried to warm her, tried to will life into her, but nothing drove the increasingly cold and clammy sensation away.

A tiny sigh eased past her discolored lips. Her body sank into the bed as her final breath escaped.

Kyle shot to his feet. "No!" He pulled Sofia to him and rocked her body. A sob wrenched its way out of him until it was a wild scream of denial and fury.

Chapter 17

A fist, driven into his jaw, rocked him back.
“Stand back so Danyael can help her.”

In shock, he released Sofia. Her body collapsed into Danyael’s waiting arms. Beside the alpha empath, Zara glared at Kyle through narrowed eyes as she massaged her sore knuckles.

Numbed by his pain and stunned by the overwhelming sense of loss over a woman he only knew for a few days, Kyle stood wide-eyed and silent against the wall. Danyael sat by Sofia’s bedside, his eyes closed, his hands wrapped around hers.

The seconds ticked by.

Sofia shuddered. Her chest moved slightly as she drew an unsteady breath.

She was alive. Kyle’s jaw dropped. He closed the distance immediately and reached for her.
“Sofia?”

Her face was pale, her skin clammy. Her breathing was slow and labored.

Danyael shook his head. “I pulled her back, but I can’t fix—”

“Why not?” Kyle demanded.

Zara cut in. “Heart and brain injuries are beyond his empathic healing powers. Absorbing them would kill him.”

Kyle opened his mouth to object, but Danyael said quietly, “I can keep her alive until you find the antidote.”

Kyle studied Danyael’s face, and then he nodded, his jaw tense. “How long do I have?”

“Six hours. Maybe eight. No more.”

He ground his teeth. Proficere Labs was at least three and a half hours away from Washington, D.C. One way. Seven hours on the road. It gave him all of one hour to break into the laboratory and find the antidote.

And it was Sofia’s only chance.

His hand was gentle as he stroked her cheek. Her chest scarcely rose and fell with each breath. One chance was all she needed, and Danyael was offering it to her. In that moment, Kyle and Danyael were two men driven apart by irreconcilable differences yet united with common purpose. “I’ll be back. Take good care of her.”

Kyle strode out of the room, and Zara followed him downstairs. He threw a quick glance over his shoulder as he stepped out of the house. “The warehouse?”

“Xin is on it,” Zara assured him.

“Fine. Let me know if she picks up Luis Sanchez.”

She nodded. “Do you need help? I can see what resources I can scrounge up. It may have to be something official, given the last-minute notice.”

He shook his head. The last time he had help on a case, he had landed up sacrificing his best friend. “I’m breaking into a laboratory. I don’t want, or need, anything official trailing along behind me.”

“All right, but don’t screw up. Three lives are riding on this.”

He spun around to face her. “What do you mean?”

“Danyael has a bad habit of pushing beyond his limits.”

Kyle frowned. Sofia and Danyael equaled two. “Three lives?”

“Yours,” Zara said pointedly. “I will kill you if something happens to Danyael.”

He chuckled in spite of the dearth of humor in the situation. “Noted.” He eyed her. “And you’ll stay here to keep them safe?”

She nodded. “Just come back soon.”

Kyle kept his foot rammed on the accelerator. Interstate 95 took him south, past dark patches of barren trees. Signs flashed by, announcing the facilities available at the next exit.

He stopped once for gas, but otherwise ignored the beckoning motels and 24-hour diners. He did not need sleep nor food. His body was too wired. His hands tightened on the steering wheel. A muscle tic set into his cheek.

All that shit over a waitress he had not even known for three days.

A waitress, a nursing student.

A bloody do-gooder. The type he had spent his entire life avoiding.

A tiny woman who stood up to the IGEC, Rue Marcha, and, hell, even Zara Itani.

How could he not respect that kind of courage? It had nothing to do with Sofia’s mutant powers. It was all heart—pure intentions, raw courage.

How could he not love that in her?

Love. Damn it.

His mind churned as he tried to recall the layout of Proficere Labs. He had visited the laboratory twice, both times to meet with the professors, and in both cases, he had never gone beyond the visitor meeting rooms set on the far side of the foyer. The guards were subtle, but present. Fortunately, Proficere did not dabble in clones and in-vitros, or the security would have been far tighter.

As it was, security was already tighter than he would have preferred. Fortunately, on his prior visits, idle conversations between the security guards had mentioned nightly pizza deliveries from a local pizza parlor.

He made it his first stop. Stealing what he needed from the pizza restaurant was like taking candy from babes.

Fifteen minutes later, he parked his car several hundred yards away from the entrance of Proficere, got out of his vehicle, and shrugged off his leather jacket. Beneath, he wore a black flak jacket. It would not do much to keep out the chill bite of the wind, but the wind was much less likely to kill him than bullets were. The clips in his two handguns were full, but he took several extras with him.

The last things he pulled out from his trunk were a white windbreaker emblazoned with the logo of the pizza parlor, a matching baseball cap, and a box containing a large pizza.

Dressed as a deliveryman, he jogged along the curved driveway leading up to the large building that housed Proficere Labs. As he approached, he could see the two guards behind the security desk chatting idly with each other.

He did not recognize them, which was a blessing. The guards from Proficere's day shift would have remembered him from his earlier visits to Proficere. He tipped the edge of his baseball cap up—it would not do to look suspicious—and tapped sharply on the glass door.

One of the guards hauled his large bulk to his feet and lumbered over. He unlocked the small door on the left side of the sealed sliding doors and pushed it open. "Where's Joe?"

"Out sick," Kyle said. "Your pizza. The works with jalapeños on the side."

"Thanks, man." The security guard held out his hands.

Kyle stepped forward, placed the large flat box on the man's hands, and reached down to pull the guard's gun from its holster.

"What!" The guard jerked away from him.

The other security guard ran from behind the desk.

Kyle snorted. The human instinct to run forward to aid a friend consistently overruled training, which would have kept the guard behind the desk, within easy reach of the emergency button.

Just then, though, Kyle had no arguments with human instinct.

He pulled his other gun out, and kept one trained on the first security guard and the other on the second. Both froze, staring at him. Newbies. Just as well. "That's right," Kyle said. He kept his voice low and calm. "Keep your hands where I can see them. You." He addressed the second security guard. "Take your gun from its holster. Keep the muzzle pointed to the ground. I want you to put it on the floor and kick it away from you."

His eyes betrayed a split second of indecision.

Kyle's finger tightened on the trigger.

The young man pressed his lips together.

Kyle recognized fear mixed in with brash bravado—not a good combination.

“Don’t do it,” he warned. “I’m not here to hurt anyone. I just need something from this lab, but I guarantee I can shoot faster than you can aim that gun, so don’t try.”

The man blinked hard and nodded.

Kyle did not let his relief show as the man slowly removed his gun and placed it on the ground. A half-hearted kick sent the weapon skittering over the polished tiles.

“Now back away slowly. Stand against that wall.” He jerked his chin at the far side of the security desk. Doors lined the wall—doors that led to meeting rooms.

They moved, their pace slow and their faces taut.

“Unlock the door,” Kyle said.

The second security guard swiped his security card key against the door.

“Good. Now take that card off and toss it to me. His too.” Kyle nodded toward the first guard.

The man pulled both security cards off and threw them onto the floor.

“Now, get into the room.”

Still backing away from him, they moved into the room. Without being told, they stood against the wall farthest from the door. If they could have retreated further, they likely would have. Kyle took his eyes off them just long enough to pump two bullets into the communications console.

Electronics popped and fizzed. Gray smoke hissed from the console.

The two security guards startled visibly.

“Who else is working in the lab tonight?” Kyle asked.

“Just Michael Hayes, Dr. Reynard’s laboratory assistant.”

“Where is he?”

“RS507. Research station on the fifth floor.”

Kyle nodded. “All right. Now, just hang in here and enjoy the pizza.”

He pulled the door shut, yanked a security card key from the floor, and swiped it across the terminal to seal it. The guards rushed forward and threw their weight against the door. It rattled, but did not give way.

Kyle figured he had a half hour before the guards figured out a way to break out of the room. He took both card keys with him, shoved his handgun back into its holster, tossed the guard’s pistol behind the security desk, and ran toward the waiting elevators.

Jaw tense, he glanced at his watch. He was running out of time.

Moments later, the elevator doors opened on the fifth floor, and Kyle stepped out.

He stared down the corridor. The overhead lights were dim and shrouded the corridors in overlapping shadows. The white tiles that should have glistened brightly were dull gray. Proficere Labs took on a desolate, abandoned quality at night. Kyle had walked through shattered edifices of bombed-out factories in Kosovo that had freaked him less.

Glass-enclosed research stations flanked both sides of the corridor. They were dark, except for one at the far end of the hall. Kyle made his way down the corridor and paused next to the stations. He peered in and saw a man in a white lab coat hunched over a large desk, his back to the door, Kyle pulled his Glock from its holster and pushed the door open.

Michael did not look back. “Is the pizza here yet?”

“The guards are probably chowing down your share, but you can join them downstairs once you tell me where the antidote is.”

Michael leapt from his chair and spun around. His wide-eyed gaze immediately fell upon the gun in Kyle’s hand. “Uh, I...”

“Where’s the antidote?”

“What antidote?” Michael retreated until his back hit the wall.

“The one for Cardorin”

“Cardorin? I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Of course you do. Smith and Reynard developed it.”

“If the professors worked on it, then it would be in their lab or their office. But who the hell are you? How did you get in here? What do you want?”

“The antidote.” Kyle stepped to the side and gestured with his gun. “Lead the way.”

With his hands in the air, Michael edged around his desk and walked out of the room. He cast repeated nervous glances over his shoulder at the gun in Kyle’s hand. “You don’t have to use that.”

“That would depend on you,” Kyle said. “Move it. I don’t have much time.”

Michael’s footsteps thumped on the tiled floors and echoed off the concrete walls as he led the way to a large research station. Hands trembling, he flicked the switch by the door, flooding the room with light. “This is where Dr. Smith and Dr. Reynard work.”

“Where do they store their work?”

“In here.” Michael led the way to a large refrigerator. He stood beside it, his sweaty fingers entwined in front of his chest.

“Open it,” Kyle ordered.

Michael’s Adam’s apple worked as he gulped. He pulled the refrigerator door open. Inside, a pale blue light glowed over rows of test tubes and sealed vials. Michael knelt down and peered into the fridge, carefully turning each tube around so that he could read the labels. “Nothing here says Cardorin.”

“I’m not looking for Cardorin. I want the antidote.”

Michael shook his head. “It’s not here. Whatever it is you’re looking for, it’s not here.” He swallowed hard. “I swear, it’s not—”

Kyle stared in frustration at the neat rows of test tubes in the refrigerator. He understood weapons—he could disassemble an AR15 blindfolded—but here, he was out of his depth, entirely out of it. And Sofia is dying. He scowled. “Is this where they store the volatile stuff?”

“Volatile stuff?”

“The stuff that kills people.”

Michael frowned. “We don’t make stuff that kills people.”

“Bullshit. Where do the professors keep the volatile stuff?”

“If not here, then in the safe room.” Michael inched slowly around Kyle and led the way down the hall to a large office marked with Alvin Smith’s name. He fumbled with a large portrait on the wall. Something clicked audibly, and the back wall slid apart.

The safe room was not much more than ten feet square. Stacks of shelves held binders and data discs. A sealed safe was anchored to the concrete floor. At first glance, nothing remotely resembled a vial.

“Unlock the safe,” Kyle ordered.

“I don’t know the code. It is the professor’s stuff. I work for Reynard, not Smith. I don’t have access to any of it.”

“Damn it.” Kyle knelt to examine the safe. Perhaps he could—

Michael darted past him, lunged out of the safe room, and slammed the door shut.

Kyle surged to his feet and threw his weight against the door. It did not budge.

“Damn it, Michael! Open the door.”

Michael’s voice sounded faint. “I’m getting security. I have to call the cops.”

“No, no, don’t. I just need the antidote.” Kyle fisted his hands against the door. “Michael, please. I just need the antidote, and I don’t have much time. Sofia’s dying.”

“What the hell are you talking about? What antidote?”

“The one Bert Reynard developed to counteract Cardorin.”

A long pause, then Michael broke it, his voice hesitant. “Cardorin?”

The words poured out in a desperate, frantic rush. “A chemical agent. It stops the hearts of people with South American genes. There’s an antidote. Reynard said he designed it, and it’s here in the lab somewhere. Cardorin is out, Michael. The Rue Marcha released it in a warehouse in Washington, D.C. Maybe the warehouse will contain the gas, maybe not, but Sofia is dying now. She needs the antidote.”

There was no sound from the outside.

“Michael, are you there?” Kyle took a step back and aimed his gun at the door lock, but before he could pull the trigger, the door swung open.

Michael, pale-faced, stared at him. “Are you certain? What you said about Cardorin?”

“Yes.”

Michael swallowed hard. “This way. I know where Dr. Reynard stores his work.”

Kyle followed Michael to Bert Reynard’s office, adjacent to Alvin Smith’s. Michael pulled out a small desk drawer. In it was a numeric keypad. He punched in a few numbers and the lower drawer popped out.

At the back of the drawer, nestled in a thick foam pad, were two sealed test tubes of clear liquid.

Michael picked one up and stared at the label. His eyes widened. “This is it. You weren’t lying.” His hands trembled as he set the test tube down on the foam pad. “I’ll get you a container to transport them.” He rushed out of the office, stumbling in his haste.

With careful hands, Kyle picked up the other vial and compared its label to the first. With focus, the jumbled letters straightened out; he had found two precious vials of antidote. The rapid pounding in his chest eased slightly and he inhaled deeply.

Michael’s footsteps sounded behind him. Kyle looked up as Michael returned with a small container specially designed to transport test tubes and vials. He held the cover open as Kyle slid the vials into the container.

Michael zipped it up and handed the container to Kyle. “Here you go.” He inhaled deeply and exhaled in a jagged rush of air. “I’ll start gathering Dr. Reynard’s research. I suppose the government or the IGEC will be coming for it shortly.”

Kyle nodded.

“Okay.” Michael pressed his lips together. His face was drawn into lines of tension, but his eyes were clear.

“You all right?” Kyle asked.

“Yeah, I guess,” Michael said. “I...” He looked up at Kyle. “My mother’s from Latin America. Cardorin...Cardorin would probably have affected her too.”

“And possibly you.”

He nodded. “Go save your friend. I’ll make sure the research gets to the IGEC so they can manufacture the antidote.”

Kyle glanced his watch. Three hours and twenty-nine minutes. He had just enough time to make it back to Washington, D.C., assuming nothing else went wrong.

The elevator chimed.

Damn, the guards had broken out.

Kyle looked out of the office.

A spray of bullets ripped up the carpet.

He dove for cover. Damn! Those weren’t bullets from a handgun. They were from an assault rifle on full auto.

Not the security guards.

Not even the IGEC.

The Rue Marcha.

Chapter 18

“Get down!” Kyle ordered.

Michael ducked, trembling, behind Reynard’s desk.

Kyle set the antidote container behind a metal filing cabinet and pulled out his Glock. He gritted his teeth. What was a handgun compared to the firepower wielded by the Rue Marcha? They were trapped.

“We can get out,” Michael gasped. He pointed at a side door. “It leads to Dr. Smith’s office.”

It would not have done much good; Smith’s office opened into the same corridor. Their chances would be scarcely better, though all he needed was a slight advantage.

Alone, he could get away.

Burdened with Michael, he could not.

If he escaped alone, leaving Michael to die, the Rue Marcha would claim the research. If he stayed long enough to protect Michael, he would lose Sofia.

Big picture. Small picture.

The sour taste of bile surged into his throat.

The big picture crushed the small one. Its fragments sprayed, slicing like a million dagger cuts into him. He could not let the research fall into the hands of the Rue Marcha. Not even if it cost Sofia her life.

Kyle looked up and met Michael’s gaze. “I’ll keep them occupied. Get to the computer. You have to transmit the Cardorin files over to the IGEC now.”

Michael’s eyes widened. He nodded and scurried over to the terminal. His Adam’s apple bobbed as his fingers tapped the screen, seeking files locked behind passwords and layers of network security.

Kyle ignored the sound of Michael at work. He braced himself beside the doorframe despite the splinters of wood spraying from the impact of the bullets. The hail of bullets ceased for a split second, and he twisted around to fire his gun.

Those split seconds were not enough to get lucky, but they offered him glimpses of the Rue Marcha’s position. At least four men, each armed with automatic rifles, and by the sounds of it, an unlimited number of rounds.

He had to get out of the office if he were to have any chance at all.

Kyle threw a quick glance over his shoulder. “Is it done?”

Michael nodded. “Almost. I need another five minutes.”

Five minutes in a firefight was practically eternity. He had to buy Michael more time.

He glanced up. The ceiling panels were large enough to fit through, and the ventilation ducts they concealed would certainly be larger in the modern building that housed Proficere Labs, compared to the ones at Johns Hopkins Hospital.

He turned, fired another shot into the corridor, and then scrambled back to the office. He slammed the door shut and dragged the couch over to barricade the door. “It’ll keep them out for a few minutes, but you keep your head down.”

Michael looked around, alarmed. “Where are you going?”

“To get a clean shot.” Kyle scrambled onto the desk and pushed up the ceiling panel. The crawl space was dark and wide. The injury in his shoulder throbbed when he hiked himself up into the ventilation duct. He gritted his teeth against the stabbing ache and slithered through the darkness.

The sound of gunfire died away. Damn it, the Rue Marcha was getting ready to break into the office.

Just a few more feet.

Below, he heard the sound of wood cracking.

Moments later, Michael shrieked, his voice thin and shrill.

Too late!

Kyle swung his feet around and slammed them down on a ceiling panel. It dropped to the ground with a clatter. Kyle leapt down and swung his Glock up. He fired twice. The bullets ripped through two Rue Marcha henchmen, catching them in their backs even as they were spinning around to face him. They collapsed with screams of pain. Kyle snatched up one of their assault rifles and raced toward the smashed office door.

The tight, controlled spray of bullets from Kyle’s weapon hit the two Rue Marcha men who had broken into the office. They crumpled face forward, their weapons falling from their hands.

Kyle rushed to the desk. He gathered Michael into his arms and pressed a hand against the crimson stain on Michael’s lab coat. “Hang in there. I’ll get help for you.”

Michael’s hands wrapped around his. The lab assistant’s fingers were cold and trembled as he whispered, “Files sent to IGEC. No stopping them now.”

Kyle reached for his smartphone. The digital clock flashed at him. He was out of time. Sofia... His breath shuddered. He pressed 911 and summoned the police and an ambulance.

Michael’s breath rasped. “Go. The antidote. Your friend.”

Kyle shook his head. “Someone’s got to keep you from bleeding to death. I’m not going until I know the EMTs have you. You did good, Michael.” A thin smile on his lips concealed the despair growing within. “You did great.”

Chapter 19

Dawn was more than a sliver of light on the horizon when Kyle arrived at the town house. He had pushed the car to its limit but he had missed Danyael's eight-hour deadline. He rushed into the house and took the steps two at a time. Zara stood at the top of the stairs, her face drawn with lines of worry.

She had not slept the entire night, he realized. Likely no one had.

"You have it?" she asked.

He nodded.

She jerked her head toward the master bedroom, the room Sofia had meticulously avoided during her stay. Frowning, Kyle preceded Zara into the room. He froze, eyes wide.

Danyael and Sofia lay, fully clothed, side-by-side on the bed, both as pale and still as death. They clasped hands, fingers intertwined. A thin strip of cloth bound their wrists together, ensuring physical contact even if they tried to pull apart.

Zara walked past Kyle to squat by Danyael's side of the bed. She stroked sweat-soaked locks from his brow and shook him gently. "Danyael?"

A full minute passed before Danyael opened his eyes and turned his head to look at Zara. He was clearly weighed down by exhaustion so deep, so profound it required a conscious act of will to respond. His dark eyes were glazed. Pain flickered in their depths.

"Kyle's back with the antidote."

A faint motion tugged up at a corner of Danyael's lips.

Kyle held up the precious vial.

Danyael's head moved. His eyes flicked toward Sofia. "Inject into her."

But Danyael was the doctor. Kyle frowned. "Can you?"

Danyael shook his head. His faint smile was rueful, even apologetic. He raised his right hand, the hand not touching Sofia's, off the bed. His hand trembled visibly. "Not steady enough. I...can walk you through it."

Danyael's halting directions were clear and simple. Kyle quivered with impatience as he filled a syringe with the clear liquid from the test tube. Each second, each minute, Sofia's life was at risk.

"I won't let her go." Danyael's voice steadied him.

Kyle stared into Danyael's pale face. He drew in a deep breath and then nodded tersely. "What do I do?"

Inserting the needle into a tiny, delicate vein was not quite the same thing as the crude violence involved with an adrenaline shot, but Kyle managed. Carefully, he depressed the plunger on the syringe and watched the antidote flow into Sofia's veins. He looked at Danyael for more guidance, but the alpha empath had closed his eyes. Danyael sank into the pillows.

Zara reached for the cloth that bound Danyael and Sofia's hands together, but Danyael whispered, "No, not yet."

Damn, the antidote isn't working.

Kyle cursed and turned away to slam his open palm against the wall, but Zara placed a restraining hand on his shoulder. "Give it a few seconds."

Seconds turned into minutes. Kyle counted them down, every one.

At the six-minute mark, Danyael's mouth curved faintly upward in a smile. "She's breathing on her own now."

Kyle knelt by Sofia's bedside and pressed light kisses to her face and hair. She was going to be all right, thank God, she was going to be fine.

Zara yanked the cloth away and pulled Danyael's and Sofia's hands apart.

Danyael's body seemed to collapse onto the bed, as if suddenly relieved of an unbearable burden. His breath still strained against his chest, but there was a soft sheen of relief on his face.

Zara said nothing. She stood back and watched him.

Kyle knew she too was counting down each second.

Several more minutes passed before Danyael stirred. "Time?" he asked without opening his eyes.

"Seven thirty-two."

A muscle twitched in his cheek. "I...have to go." He rolled to his side, but suddenly, his body convulsed.

Kyle raced around the bed, but Zara was already there. She snatched up the deep bowl by the side of the bed, and held it as Danyael vomited bile and clots of dark red blood. His body heaved, collapsing under the assault of self-inflicted exhaustion and pain.

Kyle stared, wordless. In that moment, he understood nature's perfect balance played out in the alpha empath as well; the devastating and deeply personal price Danyael paid for the power to kill and to heal—a power, Kyle realized now, Danyael had never wanted.

The look Zara gave Kyle confirmed that she had been through that particular scenario with Danyael many times. No wonder she was so protective of him. The anger in her eyes seemed directed at Danyael, but when she touched him, her hand was gentle, that of a woman in love.

She lowered the bowl and cleaned his mouth with a wet towel. "Water?"

Danyael shook his head. "Can't keep it down." He drew in a deep, shuddering breath and slowly pushed up on one elbow.

Kyle watched in silence, surprised by the dull ache he felt to see Danyael struggle to accomplish the simplest action.

Danyael paused, breathing heavily, exhausted by his efforts. He turned his head to look at Zara. “Can I please...get a ride to work? The bus and metro...won’t get me there in time.”

A thin line furrowed her brow. “Rest today, please.”

“I don’t have... I can’t afford—”

“You can’t stand. You can’t even sit. There’s no way you can work today. I’m paying for a doctor to cover for you at the clinic today. Don’t fight me, Danyael, please. Let me do this for you.” There was a plea in her voice.

Danyael stared at Zara, his dark eyes wary.

Kyle knew better than to interfere in a conversation that bristled with tension, but still he wondered. How screwed up did Zara and Danyael’s relationship have to be to make him so reluctant to accept any kindness from her?

She reached out to touch Danyael’s cheek, and he turned his face into the caress—a rare moment of physical intimacy between two people who made it a point not to touch each other.

Slowly, he nodded and sank into the bed, curling on his side.

Zara drew up the blanket to cover his trembling shoulders.

Danyael closed his eyes. A moment later, he was fast asleep.

Zara released her breath in a sigh that was more motion than sound.

Kyle turned to her. “The eight-hour deadline Danyael set, was that driven by when he had to get to work?”

Zara nodded. “Probably. He usually picks something completely arbitrary as his goal. A more practical person would have simply stopped when they started coughing blood four hours ago.”

“How much longer would he have been able to hold on?”

She shrugged. “I don’t know.” She met Kyle’s gaze. “I would have separated them.”

“I know.” Her statement did not offend him. She would kill to protect Danyael; he understood that fact now. He looked down at Danyael. “I guess I owe him.”

“He’ll settle for a thank you. What happened out there?”

Tersely, he reported the events of the evening.

Zara listened without interruption and then nodded. “I’ll handle the media fallout. Thanks for the heads up.”

“What happened at the warehouse?”

“Xin contacted the Federal Emergency Management Agency.”

“FEMA stepped in?”

“An untested chemical agent in a warehouse in the middle of Washington, D.C.? Hell, yes, it qualified as an emergency. With the FBI, they secured and sealed the warehouse.”

“Casualties?”

“Tons, though none from the government. Anyone with even the faintest hint of a South or Latin-American background was pulled from the task force. Even so, no one’s taking any chances. Those entering the warehouse are in full hazard suits. The task force recovered at least a dozen bodies from the warehouse. Many others are in critical condition and not expected to survive the night.”

“And Luis Sanchez?”

“We haven’t found him.”

Kyle cursed under his breath. He handed the container with its remaining vial of antidote to Zara. “Can you give this to the IGEC? If I show up at the building, agents will arrest me.”

“Sure.” Zara threw a glance over her shoulder at Danyael, pale and unmoving. “I’ll take care of it, but someone needs to stay here.”

Kyle nodded. “I’ve got this covered.”

“Danyael will probably sleep for twelve hours or more, but if he wakes and insists on leaving, drive him back to his apartment and make sure he gets safely up the stairs. He’s not going to be stable on his crutch for several days.”

He nodded again, that time to Zara’s back as she strode out of the room. There was little he could say when confronted with the cost Danyael had paid to keep Sofia alive. He owed Danyael, big time, and considering how skittish the alpha empath was around any gestures of kindness, whether spontaneous or deserved, he knew he would have a hell of a time getting Danyael to accept his gratitude and his apologies for his prior behavior.

He’ll settle for a thank you, Zara had said.

With a low grunt of pain, Kyle shrugged out of his leather jacket. His shoulder wound—the one he had stubbornly refused to allow Danyael to heal—had reopened from his exertions at Proficere Labs. The bandages were stained crimson. He could change them, likely neither gracefully nor well, but he would manage.

Just as soon as he caught up on his sleep.

A sigh escaped him as he stretched out on a loveseat much too small for him, but it was comfortable. He sagged against the soft microfiber cushions and turned his head to watch Sofia sleep.

Her breathing was steady, her expression at peace. A small smile curved his lips. Amazing. She had taken on the IGEC, the Rue Marcha, and Zara Itani with nothing but courage, conviction, and a collection of carnival tricks fueled by her weak telekinetic powers. No one else he knew could have gotten as far with so little.

“I love you,” he whispered. He was grateful she could not hear him. He would have to convince her first that his stupid response to her mutant powers had been completely out of line.

Then he could tell her he loved her and wanted her. Mutant powers and all.

Chapter 20

Sofia awoke with a sharp jerk and sat upright.

The afternoon sun swamped her, pouring in through the glass windows to flood the room. The heavy quilt that had covered her slipped off to pool around her hips. Okay, I'm not in hell.

Across the room, Kyle sprawled on a love seat too short for his length. He snored lightly. Sofia pressed her lips together to hold back a traitorous smile. Not in heaven either.

She was, however, in her parents' bedroom. For a moment, she had to squeeze her eyes shut against the memory of her parents pleading for their lives. She could still see the bullet she failed to stop. It traveled, as if in slow motion toward her father. She saw the moment of impact, saw steel penetrate flesh a fraction of an inch at a time. There had been surprisingly little blood at first.

The blood came later.

The heart-wrenching pain, the guilt, lasted forever.

Her stomach churned. She had to get out of the room.

Sofia flung the covers aside, and stared in surprise at Danyael, who was lying beside her, fast asleep. Even awash in sunlight, his face was pale. There were subtle lines of strain around his eyes and mouth.

That was when it hit her.

Despite inhaling the chemical agent designed to kill people like her, she was alive.

She suspected it had everything to do with Danyael and Kyle. He had been there in the hazy recesses of her final memory before she lost consciousness. His voice, his promise, had resonated through her even when the darkness took over. "I'll get you out of here."

Her Prince Charming, bad attitude and all.

He stirred, blinking blearily. A scowl crossed his unshaven face as he dragged an arm, swathed in bandages, across his eyes.

She leapt out of bed. "Oh my God, you're hurt!"

She gently pulled his arm away from his face, and turned it so she could study the fresh bruises and cuts on his rough-hewn features. "What happened?"

"The Rue Marcha showed up at Proficere Labs." He groaned softly and eased into a sitting position.

“Why aren’t you at the hospital? You need to get those injuries treated.”

“They’re not as bad as they look. Nothing’s bleeding or broken. Danyael bandaged me up yesterday, though some hard core painkillers would be a good thing right about now.” His eyes focused on her face. “And how are you, baby?”

“Pretty sure I’m alive.”

He nodded, a smile tugging at his lips. “Things weren’t looking so good at seven this morning, but eight hours of sleep—and the right kind of drug in your veins—can do wonders.”

Drug? She looked over her shoulder. “Danyael—”

“Kept you alive while I went for the antidote. Zara says to let him sleep. He looked like hell this morning.” Kyle’s eyes narrowed. “Actually, he’s not looking all that much better.”

Sofia went over to Danyael and laid her small hand on his forehead. “He’s burning up.”

“Zara said to leave him. His pain is psychic; the physical symptoms are the least of his issues. You can’t do anything for him.”

Sofia rolled her eyes at Kyle. She was certain she could at least keep Danyael comfortable.

She went to the bathroom and returned with a damp towel that she had soaked in cold water. Carefully, she draped it over Danyael’s forehead. He stirred but did not wake. A muscle in his cheek twitched as if even that small of a motion hurt.

Across the bedroom, Kyle shrugged and stood. He rolled his shoulders and arched his back.

Like a cat stretching in the sunlight after waking from a nap. Sofia smiled at the thought. No, Kyle was nothing like a cat. A tiger was a more appropriate analogy—a muscled predator with teeth and claws, sleek and deadly.

He folded the throw Sofia’s mother had spent several years knitting and draped it over the back of the love seat before turning to face Sofia. “You must be hungry. I’ll get something started for lunch.”

How many times had her parents said those exact same words to her?

Her throat swelled with unshed tears. She needed a shower, but more importantly, she needed to get out of her parents’ bedroom.

Sofia made a dash for the door, but Kyle caught her arm. His dark eyes searched her face. They were too sharp, too penetrating. “What’s got you so freaked out?”

“I’m not freaked out.” She tried to pull her arm out of his grasp, but only succeeded in tightening his grip.

“Large eyes. Pale face. Trembling lips. One makes you concerned. Two afraid. Three definitely counts as freaked. The only time you’re not freaked is when you’re obviously thinking about someone else—like Danyael or me. Spill it, Sofia. You’ve kept the door of this room closed the entire time you’ve been in this house. You give it this...look...every time you step past it, like you’re afraid of something in it.” He waved his other hand to encompass the room. “Tell me, what’s in here that sends you into a panic?”

Kyle shook his head. “No such thing as old memories. There are just the ones that hurt and the ones that don’t. What happened in here?”

“My parents died here, okay?”

His eyes flared wide. His grip loosened.

She yanked her arm out of his. Her mouth quivered but she fought the need to turn away, the need to run and hide. “And I let them die.”

“Sofia—”

She bit down on her lower lip, spun around, and walked out of the room. She held her head high even though, deep inside, she was a weeping wreck.

Kyle had not interrupted her while she was in the shower. Like most men, he seemed to have an intuitive sense for staying out of the way of an upset woman. He gave her the space she needed to cry herself dry, her tears washing down with the water from the showerhead.

A half hour later, she emerged from the bathroom, composed. The scent of roasted chicken wafted up to her, and her stomach growled. She would have to face Kyle if she wanted her first meal in more than twenty-four hours.

If he decided to be a nosy, interfering pain-in-the-ass and ask questions she did not want to answer, she could just toss him out of her house.

Or not, she sighed. She did owe him her life after all.

Sofia put on a pair of jeans and a green sweater. The baseball cap she had purchased from Johns Hopkins Hospital perched jauntily on her bedpost. Had it only been two days since she bought it? So much had happened in that time, and if she were to be honest, most of the chaos and confusion was her fault.

I should have just given Zara the damn microchip.

Still, she could not find it in herself to regret the decision. Someone had to do something. Zara would not, and Danyael could not. And Kyle...?

Kyle had stood behind her decisions, even the stupid ones, and fought for her the entire way, even after he knew she was a mutant. In spite of his feelings toward human derivatives, he had risked his life to save her.

She was grateful—immensely grateful. The intense attraction and the early blush of love had preceded her gratitude, but were also reinforced by it. How could they not? He was sexy, and, far more important, an inherently good man beneath his gruff, gun-toting exterior.

Sofia knew she stood on the edge, peering down with suspicious eyes, into the chasm of love. Could he get over the unchangeable fact that she was a mutant, or was she just setting herself up for inevitable heartbreak?

Bracing herself, she went downstairs to the dining room. The late afternoon sun poured in through the gauzy lace curtains drawn across the French windows, obscuring but not eliminating the view of the light weekday pedestrian traffic on Dupont Circle.

Kyle had finished laying out the meal on the table. Sofia's eyes narrowed as she studied the art project on her plate. Mashed potatoes had been smeared across the plate—the backdrop for a face—and Kyle had used peas for eyes, a baby carrot for a nose, and thin strips of zucchini for a smile. It was silly and childish, but it won a smile from her, and sent her tumbling right over the edge. She looked at him, and hoped he would not notice her glistening eyes. If her parents were alive, they would have loved him too.

“I never pegged you for a food art kind of guy.”

“It made you smile, didn't it?”

“Yes, it sure did. Thank you. And thank you for not bugging me about the master bedroom.”

Kyle shrugged. “I got the gist of it.”

“How can you?” the question popped out of Sofia's mouth before she could help herself. She sat down and dragged a spoon through the mashed potatoes before popping a heaping spoonful into her mouth.

“I'm not much of a reader, but I can add one plus one and get two. You said your house has been on the market since August. I know your parents died in July. Sakti broke in here and killed them, right?”

Sofia set the spoon down and pressed her fists against the hollow ache in the pit of her stomach.

“You're not alone in this.” Kyle sat across from her. “Sakti turned many children into orphans that day—”

“Yes, but how many of those children were telekinetics?”

Kyle frowned. “What were you planning to do? Pick up the terrorists and throw them through a window?”

“Why not? Why did I get the short end of the stick? I have mutant powers, but they're wimpy, and I still get categorized as a potential threat with all those uber-alphas—”

Kyle leaned back in his seat. “Want to know what I see?”

She was in love, but she would not be charmed. Sofia folded her arms across her chest. “What do you see?”

“A woman who is smart enough to use ‘carnival tricks’ to accomplish exactly what she needs. You didn't need awesome telekinetic powers to draw Lydia's attention away from me. You didn't tear down brick walls in the warehouse, but you got a hell of a long way with your escape plan.”

“Until you showed up and screwed it up.”

Kyle shrugged. “If we discuss it ahead of time, we'll be less likely to screw it up next time.”

Her gaze flicked to movement outside the window. On the far side of the street, a man in a bulky brown coat walked past her house. It was odd; she thought she had seen that same man walk past several minutes earlier. With a frown, she shook her head to dismiss that stray thought and refocused on the conversation. “There won’t be a next time, Kyle.”

“Of course there will be. You’re a do-gooder. You can’t help yourself.” He wore a faint smile on his lips. “The point is, you’re doing amazing things with your little bit of telekinetic power.”

He actually sounded...approving? Had she stepped into a dream? Nevertheless, the shock of his seeming acceptance wasn’t enough to melt the guilt. She shook her head. “It wasn’t enough to do what I needed when I needed it most. My father—” Her voice caught.

Kyle leaned forward and covered her hands with his. “What happened with your father?”

“They killed my mother first. I was too shocked to react, but with my father, I could see the bullet. I could have stopped it, but somehow, it just wouldn’t connect.” She squeezed her eyes shut, replaying the moment once more. “I wasn’t fast enough, or focused enough. I don’t know. I just know I screwed up, and my father...maybe he didn’t have to die.” A heavy sigh tore out of her. “I just wish I could do more.”

“And saving both our lives doesn’t count?”

“Picking a lock on a handcuff isn’t the same thing as creating a psychic wall to stop a bullet.”

“It was spectacular enough for me. You need to ease up on yourself. Staying calm is half the battle. Everything else you can make up as you go.”

“I’d be worried about my luck running out.” Sofia reached for a piece of roast chicken. A small frown twisted her lips as she studied the passersby moving past her window. Several of them were on their third or fourth rounds past her house. “Did you ever get the microchip and vials of Cardorin back from the Rue Marcha?”

He shook his head. “The warehouse is under wraps right now. FEMA and the FBI got involved.”

Sofia frowned. “But the microchip—”

“If it’s there, they’ll find it.”

“And the people in the warehouse?”

“Many died, but the FBI didn’t find Luis.”

“Luis?”

“Luis Sanchez, one of the chief lieutenants in the Rue Marcha. The one who hit you.”

Sofia’s gaze traveled past Kyle’s shoulder. Her heartbeat accelerated. “I know where he is.”

“Huh? Where?”

“He just walked past my house.”

Chapter 21

Kyle stared at the man walking on the far side of street for several moments before the blur of features through the lace curtain resolved into Luis Sanchez.

“He’s not the only one,” Sofia said. “At least three more men walked past the house several times in the past fifteen minutes, but I wasn’t sure, until I saw him.”

She was observant, but he would have to work on getting her to trust her instincts and voice her suspicions sooner.

Kyle ducked behind the curtains. “We have to get out.”

“Okay.” Sofia swallowed her fear. “Through the back door?”

“And Danyael?”

Kyle froze. Danyael. Damn. Danyael was in no condition to move, which meant, quite simply, that they could not leave unless they wanted to spend the rest of their natural lives hiding from Zara. Furthermore, Sofia’s conscience would never allow her to abandon Danyael. Kyle jerked his head at the stairs. “Go to Danyael. Do whatever you have to do to wake him. He’ll be able to protect you.”

“What about you?” Sofia demanded.

“I’ll buy you time.”

She shook her head, “No, no, I’m not—”

Hell, she had picked a fine time to start arguing with him. “Go!” He reached for his Glock. Another glance out the window allowed him to count three Rue Marcha, including Luis. Assuming an equal number coming in through the back door—

He gritted his teeth. Judging by the bulky swell of their ill-fitting jackets, he was outnumbered and outgunned. Got to make every shot count.

He spared a final glance over his shoulder. Sofia stared at him, a stubborn set to her mouth. He pulled her close and planted a quick kiss on her lips. “Go. Hurry.”

Something in her eyes before she turned and raced up the stairs warned him that she was not happy about being dismissed, and that if they both survived, she would have plenty to say about it.

Kyle glanced out the window again. Luis was nowhere to be seen. The remaining two Rue Marcha were walking up the pavement to the door, like two men paying a neighborly visit. They huddled close. One fiddled with the lock.

Kyle drew in a deep breath. Not only did he have to make every shot count, he had to make sure each shot landed, and preferably stayed, in the body of the Rue Marcha. High velocity bullets could travel through walls. With a bit of luck, the town houses on either side would be empty, their residents at work, but considering how his luck had recently worked out, he would not count on it.

The lock clicked. The door swung open quietly.

He raised his gun and leaned forward.

There was nothing quiet about the bullet that smashed into the wall beside him, from behind him. He ducked and rolled forward. His foot slammed into the partially open front door, kicking it shut once again. He twisted around and fired at the four men emerging from the kitchen door behind him. Hell, he had counted on a warning—curses as the men hit their heads against the ridiculously low shelf—but he had not even heard them enter.

One of the men collapsed with a grunt. The others fired back as Kyle dove behind the couch.

Bullets ripped through upholstery. Puffs of polyester stuffing rose into the air.

The front door swung open. Two men entered, assault rifles set against their shoulders.

Five on one.

And he still did not see Luis.

Kyle braced his back against the wall. With both feet, he pushed against the couch, sending it sliding forward into the two men at the front door. They stumbled back.

From the side, a strong arm seized him around the neck and wrenched the gun from his hand.

He managed to flip his first attacker over him, but two others were on him before he could regain his balance. He drove an elbow into one man's stomach and sent him reeling. It bought him precious time to tackle the second man.

The man suddenly stiffened. Pain exploded through Kyle's left side.

Stunned, he stared to his attacker as the man's eyes glazed. A crimson stain blossomed across the man's white shirt. Kyle stepped back, his hand going to the bleeding flesh wound in his side as the man toppled sideways. The man was dead before he hit the ground.

Luis Sanchez stood tall in the space vacated by his henchman. He smiled at Kyle. His weapon, a bulky silencer around the muzzle, was pointed at Kyle.

The leader of the Rue Marcha shot through his own man to hurt Kyle.

The two men behind Luis—the same two Kyle had repeatedly thwarted in their attempt to enter the front door—muscled their way forward and wrestled Kyle to the floor, pinning him down. Two others, whom Kyle had briefly shaken off, rose to their feet.

“Where is the antidote?” Luis demanded.

“Why?” Kyle sneered. “You dying?”

“You stopped my men at Proficere Labs, didn't you? You were looking for the antidote. Is the girl still alive?”

“What’s it to you?”

Luis’s eyes glittered. Apparently, he did not like his questions answered with questions, and for that reason alone, Kyle intended to keep doing so.

A muffled sound came from the second floor.

Luis’s gaze darted to the stairs. He looked back at Kyle, his familiar smirk on his lips. “Keep him there,” he ordered his two men, and nodded at the other two. They turned and ran up the stairs, ahead of Luis.

Kyle wrenched hard, but could not pull out of the vice-like grips that held him down. “Sofia. Run!” he shouted.

Sofia struggled to support Danyael’s weight. He was Kyle’s height, though he was not as heavily muscled. Still, he was nearly a foot taller than she was, and at that moment, he was not able to stand upright.

She had shaken him hard enough to wake him from his near coma, but not even the whispered urgency in her tone jolted alertness back into him. He slumped against her, eyes closed. Every now and again, his eyes opened, but his gaze was unfocused.

The sound of gunshots cut through the silence of the house. Muffled sounds of a tussle, then male voices, edged with violence, filled the house.

A familiar voice shouted, “Sofia. Run!”

The only “running” option meant leaving Danyael and Kyle. Sofia’s response was a resounding “hell, no” to that order.

Footsteps pounded up the stairs.

Danyael’s eyes flashed open. His body tensed as if struck by the sudden surge of emotions from the Rue Marcha. He pulled sharply away from Sofia, then reached out and touched the first man who rushed into the master bedroom.

An expression of inconsolable loneliness purged reason and intelligence from the man’s eyes. Sofia’s mouth dropped open. She pressed herself against the bedroom wall and watched the vivid play of emotions race across the man’s face, one after another. Stunned betrayal. Wrenching heartache. Unrequited love. Endless moments of mute misery and silent despair, stretching out into forever. Ingrained distrust winning the war over a desperate yearning for human connection. The brutal silencing of his needs, of his soul.

Danyael’s soul?

Sofia’s gaze tore to the alpha empath for a split second and then flashed back to the Rue Marcha henchman as he groaned. Stripped of humanity, it was a terrible sound. The anguish that flared through the man’s eyes quivered on the brink of madness.

Without fear, he stepped over the edge.

She would never have believed that she could see a mind snap, but in that moment, she did. Madness drove the clinging shreds of sanity away. The man reached for his gun.

Sofia threw herself between Danyael and the man before she realized that she and Danyael were never at risk.

Without hesitation, the man placed the gun against his temple and pulled the trigger. Blood, flesh, and brain matter splattered over the adjacent wall.

Sofia cringed, closing her eyes briefly. Her mind reeled.

The hushed whispers, the rumors about Danyael were true. He could kill with a single touch. The emotional trauma he had survived, the lingering heartache he had learned to live with, amplified by his empathic powers, were devastating enough to drive others to suicide.

What she had not expected to see was the sorrow and regret in Danyael's dark-eyed gaze.

Another man ran into the room. His eyes flared wide with equal parts shock and horror.

Sofia recoiled when Danyael touched him. He stumbled back as his emotions crumbled before the dominant power of an alpha empath. He too reached for his weapon and raised it to his temple. His finger tightened on the trigger. An expression of relief, of peace flashed across his face a moment before his body joined his companion's on the floor.

Luis burst into the room.

"Danyael!" Sofia shouted a warning, but it was too late.

Luis pistol-whipped Danyael across his face. Danyael stumbled against the wall and crumpled unconscious to the ground when Luis brought the butt of his pistol down on the back of Danyael's head.

Luis turned on Sofia. His gun pointed unwaveringly at her. "The antidote. Where is it?"

Sofia's gaze darted to the empty syringe on the bedside table. "It's gone."

Luis's face mottled with anger. He seized the syringe, stared at it, and then flung it aside. It landed in front of her. "All of it? He wasted it all on you?" A moment later, a shrewd gleam entered his eyes. "It's in you, no? I take you with me, and we'll find a way to get it out of you."

Sofia shook her head. "No, you won't." She snatched up the syringe.

Luis burst out laughing. "What you gonna do with that? You and your little injection against me, my weapons, and my men?"

Sofia pulled out the plunger, filling the syringe with air.

Luis lunged at her. She stumbled back on the bed—the bed where her parents had died.

She would not die there.

Carnival tricks were all she could do, but sometimes, carnival tricks were enough. Sofia stabbed the syringe into the bulging vein at the side of Luis's neck, but he was faster than she expected. He slapped her arms away and raised his hand to swipe the syringe out of his neck.

Focus! Her telekinetic powers slammed into the plunger of the syringe, releasing a bubble of air into Luis's bloodstream. Moments later, the syringe tumbled to the floor.

"Hah! You think you can hurt me?" Luis mocked. He pinned her down to the bed. His rank breath warmed the side of her neck, but she refused to turn her head. "You're his girl, aren't you?" he sneered. "What say I make you scream nice and good? What do you think that would do to him?"

She could not see the air embolism, but Kyle had taught her to trust her psychic touch. She did not need eyes to see. She understood human anatomy; she had spent hours staring at detailed anatomical maps of the arteries and veins, connecting like complex waterways, in the human body. She knew exactly how to guide the bubble of air to the brain.

Luis's hands tore her sweater off. A chill trembled over her body, but she did not react. Almost there.

Directed by Sofia's telekinetic powers, the air embolism bobbed in rivers of crimson, propelled up specific channels. The walls of the blood vessel narrowed. The air bubble lodged firmly, like a boulder blocking canyon walls. The gush of blood around it slowed to a trickle and then stopped entirely.

Luis's heartbeat flickered, a scarcely perceptible skip.

Sofia swung her legs up and kicked Luis away.

She should not have been able to move a man who weighed two times as much as she did, but she desperately wanted to get him moving in the right direction before the air embolism cut off blood flow to his brain and paralyzed his body.

Luis swayed. For several moments, he teetered on his heels, rocking unsteadily from side to side. His eyes glazed and rolled back in his head. He toppled backward, mighty Goliath felled by an air bubble.

"Sofia!" Kyle's cry preceded him up the stairs. He burst into the room.

Sofia shot to her feet. He wrapped his arms around her, and his stunned gaze swept across the room. "How did you—?"

She twisted around in his arms and looked at Luis. "I paid attention in anatomy class. Danyael... Danyael did the rest." As she moved, her arm pressed against a wet patch on his black shirt. She pulled her hand away to find it smeared crimson. "You got shot?" Her jaw dropped. "Again? We have to get you to—"

He grunted. "I know it's starting to seem like the standard operating procedure around here, but it's not. I'm usually better at not getting shot. I'll have to call Zara and Xin to let them know what happened here anyway. They can send a medic over to take care of me. Is Danyael all right?"

"Just unconscious, I think. Luis hit him pretty hard on the back of his head."

"Lucky for us he didn't kill Danyael, or we'd probably all be dead from Danyael's empathic super nova."

She pulled back from him and stared up into his face. "Are you sure you're okay? Are we okay?"

"Yeah. We're clear. The shots up here distracted Luis's men just long enough for me to break free and take them out.”

Her breath shuddered out of her. “So it’s over?”

“Yeah, except for the paperwork, but we’ll leave that to Zara and Xin.”

“Let’s get Danyael back to the bed. I want to check his head. Maybe I can reduce the bruising and the headache he’s going to wake up with.”

“Fine.” Kyle moved away from Sofia. He hefted Danyael over his shoulder and lowered the alpha empath onto the bed. He stepped aside as Sofia, her sweater hastily tugged over her head and slightly askew, leaned over Danyael and probed the swelling knot at the back of his head. “I guess I’ll go call Zara’s cleanup crew,” Kyle said. “It would suck if Danyael woke up and felt this compulsive need to heal people and undo everything we did.”

He looked around the room. His breath caught. Sofia knew he had come to the same realization she had. The slaughter in the room was beyond Danyael’s empathic healing capabilities. Blood splattered on the walls and carpets. Three bodies lay prone in death.

Kyle’s shoulders sagged on a sigh. “Sofia, this room—”

She twisted around to look at him. “No, Kyle, it’s okay. I’m all right. There was death in here, but there was life, too. You and Danyael saved my life. Heck, I just saved my life.” Her smile quivered on her lips, but her eyes were calm and at peace as she stared down at her hands.

All it took was a carnival trick.

Chapter 22

Sofia quickly concluded that her highest and best use was to stay out of the way of the cleaning crew that Kyle had summoned with a single phone call. She perched on the kitchen counter and watched, wide-eyed, as six men and women traipsed through her tiny town house with industrial strength cleaners. The crew scrubbed blood from the walls and the floors. Crimson-stained carpets, beyond salvage, were ripped up and replaced. No one bothered to take photographs for evidence, and the bodies were removed without a fuss.

The law-abiding citizen in her shrank at the amount of cover-up that was happening, and wondered why no one else seemed as appalled as she was.

Trouble came, or so she thought, in the form of a small-framed Chinese woman, only a few inches taller than she was. The woman wore a black pantsuit over a white blouse. Her long hair hung loosely past her shoulders. She was clearly not a mercenary—she did not possess that predatory prowl—but she walked up the driveway with the confidence of a woman in charge.

Everything about her shrieked “federal agent.”

Sofia leaped off the kitchen counter and dashed through the house to find Kyle. He was in the living room, cleaning his weapons, and looked up as she approached. “Someone’s here,” she said. “Looks like trouble.”

Kyle peered out of the window. “That’s trouble, all right. Stay here.”

Kyle went to the door to meet the woman. They spoke in lowered voices; Sofia could not make anything of their conversation, but within moments, Kyle invited the woman in and waved Sofia over. “Xin, this is Sofia. Sofia, Xin.”

Xin? The one with the NSA? Sofia walked forward to join Kyle and extended her hand to the woman. “Hi.”

The tiny woman’s smile was warm and genuine. “Hello, Sofia.”

Xin was nothing like anything Sofia had imagined—plain where Zara was attractive, subtle where Zara was flashy. Sofia could have imagined Xin quite at home behind a computer. In fact, her pale complexion suggested as much.

“How is Danyael?” was Xin’s first question.

“He’s resting, as comfortably as possible, considering the circumstances.”

Xin nodded. “Keeping him comfortable and safe is usually the most we can do for him at times like this. Thank you for protecting him from the Rue Marcha.”

Sofia smiled, a little uncomfortable with Xin’s expressed gratitude. “The least I could do. So...do you know what happened at the warehouse? Was FEMA able to seal it off?”

“It was a near thing,” Xin confessed. “The potency of the chemical agent actually worked to our advantage. Most of the people in the warehouse passed out before they could attempt an escape, which would almost have certainly resulted in venting the agent out into the atmosphere.”

Sofia shivered at Xin’s matter-of-fact tone.

“The release of the chemical agent gave the IGEC the ammunition it needed to demand a subpoena of Proficere Labs records. Of course, the ink on the subpoena had scarcely dried when the IGEC received an unexpected e-mail from a certain Michael Hayes, research files attached. The IGEC was a little unhappy, though, when they found out that you had taken the only two actual samples of the antidote.”

Kyle frowned. “But I gave a vial to Zara.”

“And she delivered it to the IGEC, which only partially mollified them. Regardless, the antidote is now in mass production, and the IGEC is in talks with our government and the South American governments on the topic of preemptive vaccination.” Xin released her breath. “It’s going to be messy for a while. The exact threat level isn’t clear, but the repercussions, if the threat ever comes to pass, would be massive, so everyone is acting like it matters—which it does.” She glanced at Kyle. “I’d suggest keeping away from the IGEC for a while. Actually, it wouldn’t hurt to keep a low profile for a month or two. Everyone knows, logically, you’re not to blame, and most certainly not you,” Xin added, looking at Sofia. “But you’ve stepped on a lot of toes, infringed on the territorial claims of several federal and international agencies. Lots of people are pissed off, even though it all ended as well as it possibly could have. It will take a while for them to come around and admit that they’re grateful you didn’t turn the microchip over to Proficere, which would almost certainly have given the information to the Rue Marcha.”

“And did you find the microchip?”

“Luis Sanchez had it on him.” Xin glanced at the ambulance parked in front of the town house. “Not that it particularly matters now that IGEC has access to Proficere’s research.”

Sofia swallowed hard. “About Luis—”

Xin smiled. “Officially, his death certificate will indicate that he died of a heart attack. If anyone digs deeper, we’ll attribute the kill to Danyael.”

“But—”

The Chinese woman shrugged. “Five hundred and fifteen. Five hundred and sixteen. At some point it becomes a rounding error, and Danyael has more or less hit that point.” She glanced at the stairs. “Will it be all right if I look in on him for a few minutes? The NSA and the Mutant Affairs Council sent me over to make sure he was okay.”

“Yeah, sure,” Sofia said, her brow furrowing.

Xin answered the unasked question. “Danyael’s sanity and health matter to more people than just Zara Itani. Chalk it up to national security and leave it at that.” She smiled and moved away, heading quietly up the stairs.

Sofia frowned at Xin’s back. In a lowered voice, she said to Kyle, “She’s the most normal of your friends that I’ve met so far, and even then, she’s a little...” She paused, searching for the right word that would not be offensive. Unfortunately, she realized, there were none.

“Scary,” Kyle supplemented.

Yeah, scary.

Kyle continued in a cheery tone that Sofia considered grossly misplaced. “Even more so considering she’s human, as is Zara. Some of the scariest people I know are human. I hadn’t really thought about it that way before.”

Sofia looked sharply at him. His smile was rueful and slightly sheepish. She did not resist when he tugged her close, wrapped his arm around her waist, and placed an absent-minded kiss on the top of her head.

She smiled, relaxing against him. Kyle’s easy affection promised normality and offered hope for a future together.

“So,” Kyle began. “It sounds like I’m on the government’s blacklist until a couple of people get over their injured pride. I’m sure I can talk Zara into giving me a leave of absence. I haven’t had a vacation in a long time. I could see the world—”

Sofia’s smile trembled. Her dreams and her hopes had overstepped reality once again.

“—go bar hopping in Chapel Hill, stalk the nursing building at UNC, walk a pretty girl home after her classes and her bar waitressing gigs.”

“Me?” Sofia asked. She winced at the childish lilt of hope in her voice.

Kyle did not seem to notice. His grip tightened around her waist. “Yes, you. Someone needs to keep a do-gooder out of trouble.”

Sofia’s eyebrows shot up. She giggled. “It certainly won’t be you.”

“Oh, you’ll be surprised how good I can be at keeping do-gooders out of trouble if she’s the only person on my agenda.”

She snorted. “I’ll believe it when I see it.” She leaned against him, enjoying his strength and support. “Kyle?”

“Uh-huh?”

“You know, I’m an only child, and you...you act like you’re an only child, but you’re really not.”

He was silent for a long moment, and then sighed. “Robert Tyce is not legally my brother anymore.”

“You have the same parents.”

“He’s probably forgotten me.”

“I’m willing to bet not. Won’t you at least say hi?”

Sofia nodded. “Of course not, but we obviously don’t do simple or we would have just returned the microchip to Proficere.”

Kyle sighed again, a long-suffering sound. “I’ll consider it if you promise not to come up with any more ideas for a week.”

That promise was good enough for her. She was almost certain she could wait seven days before stumbling headlong into trouble again. “Deal!” She looked up and smiled into his kiss.

The town house was perfectly restored by the time Zara showed up late in the evening.

“How is he?” was her first question as she stepped into the house. She shrugged off her leather coat and tossed it onto the new sofa that Three Fates had paid for.

“Still resting,” Sofia assured her. “I look in on him every half hour.”

Zara’s restless edge smoothed. Her smile was one of quiet relief.

“If you’d like some coffee, I can get a fresh batch going while you look in on him,” Sofia offered.

Zara nodded. “Thanks.” She went up the stairs, her heeled boots making no noise on the wooden stairs.

The coffee had been ready for ten minutes, but Zara had not returned. Sofia went upstairs and found her at Danyael’s bedside. Zara’s hands, long tapered fingers tipped with perfect manicures, pressed over Danyael’s subtly misshapen left hand. The expression on her lovely face was contemplative. The quiet patience in Zara’s stance told Sofia that the assassin would have willingly waited forever by Danyael’s bedside. The challenging glitter in her eyes was replaced by the soft glow of a woman in love.

Sofia drew in her breath sharply. Zara loved Danyael at least as much as or perhaps even more than he loved her.

And Danyael did not know.

Zara’s gaze flashed to Sofia. Their eyes met. Unhurriedly, Zara leaned forward and kissed Danyael’s lips, before pushing to her feet. “Is the coffee ready?”

“When you’re ready,” Sofia said. It was perfectly understood that Danyael, as a topic of conversation, was completely off-limits.

Back downstairs, Sofia handed Zara a mug of coffee as she sat in the newly furnished living room with Kyle. The blood and gore of hours past had been erased; her home was once again a haven. Memories would linger longer—memories of death but also of life. The quiet pop and crackling of burning wood in the fireplace filled in the silence. No one said much. It was enough to be alive and safe once more.

It was enough for Sofia that Kyle's arm draped across her shoulders and that his lips brushed often against the top of her head, offering kisses so absent-minded that, as a statement, they seemed downright possessive.

Sofia sat up when she heard an uncertain step on the staircase.

Zara too looked up, but made no move from her seat. The two women exchanged glances, their understanding mutual and immediate.

Sofia rose because she knew—they both knew—that Danyael would be marginally more willing to receive help from her. She found Danyael standing on the staircase, leaning heavily against the wall as he maneuvered his crippled leg and crutch down the narrow stairs. He smiled when he saw her and accepted her help without protest. Their progress was slow and unsteady. Danyael was still weak and Sofia too short to support him, but she, instead of Kyle or Zara, allowed Danyael to salvage whatever was left of his pride.

They made it safely to the bottom of the stairs. Sofia would have stepped away, but Danyael's grip on her hand tightened. "Just a minute." He inhaled deeply and closed his eyes. His grasp was gentle, but a tingling warmth radiated from the point of contact and infused her body, bringing with it a sense of serenity, of utter comfort and safety.

Sofia closed her eyes and allowed the emotions to wash over her. It would be so easy for anyone to mistake Danyael's instinctive compassion for love, fall in love with the alpha empath, and then smash oneself in an eternity of frustration against his equally instinctive distrust of others. Poor Zara.

Danyael released her hand.

She opened her eyes and met his dark eyes.

He smiled again. "You're all right." His focus shifted briefly to Kyle. "You're both all right."

Those simple words were more profound than any benediction or blessing Sofia had ever received from a priest at Mass or confession. To conceal the flush of embarrassment, she looked at her watch. "You've been asleep for fourteen hours. Would you like something to eat? I have leftover pizza in the refrigerator. I can reheat it for you."

Danyael's gaze moved past her shoulder to meet Zara's. Something seemed to pass between them in that wordless moment before Danyael turned his face away. He shook his head. "No, thank you." His voice was quiet, all the better to conceal the lingering exhaustion. "I slept too long. I have to go or I'll miss the last bus."

His crutch tapped an unsteady rhythm on the hardwood floors as he limped to the front door. He paused to zip up his black leather jacket, soft and worn from age.

Kyle reached for his car keys but was forestalled by a sharp shake of Zara's head. His brow furrowed, but he deferred to Zara and slid the keys back into his pocket. "Danyael," he called.

Danyael looked over his shoulder.

Kyle pushed to his feet and walked over to Danyael. He extended his hand. "Thank you."

Surprise flashed across Danyael's face. He had obviously not expected Kyle's gratitude. He shook Kyle's hand. "You're welcome."

Kyle continued. "When you interrogated the Rue Marcha, Xin said something odd. She said you didn't just do it for Sofia, you did it for them."

Danyael shrugged. "You needed the truth quickly. You would have put them through hours of physical pain and may not have gotten what you needed. What I did, I did in a minute."

"And after you left, he undid it," Zara added, her voice flat and cool.

Danyael reacted to the sarcasm and scorn in Zara's voice by looking away, but not before a flash of despair passed over his face—the despair of a man who did not know how to win the love of the woman he wanted.

Sofia ached for Danyael, for Zara, and for the love that lay unvoiced and unseen between them—healer and assassin, separated by a gulf too wide to bridge.

Without another word, he stepped out of the house and quietly closed the door behind him.

Kyle shook his head. "He's amazing," he said.

Zara was silent for a moment. Her face was expressionless, though her violet eyes seemed gentler, the hard, cool light gone. "He's infuriating," she added. She pushed to her feet, reached for her coat, and went to the door.

A gust of cold wind blew into the house as she stepped out, and then fell quiet when she slammed the door behind her.

For a moment, the only sound was the crackle of burning logs in the fireplace. Sofia drew back the curtains and peeked out to see Zara catch up with Danyael before he climbed on board the bus. She grabbed his arm and swung him around, steadying him before he fell. Sofia could not hear anything they said to each other, but whatever Zara said must have worked. He turned and allowed her to lead him back to her car.

Sofia released the curtain and sank back into Kyle's waiting arms.

He shook his head. "Seriously screwed up. And I thought we had issues."

"We do."

He grinned at her as he tugged her onto his lap. "But we have all our lives to figure it out."

EPILOGUE

Summer hovered on the cusp on fall, afternoon on the brink of evening. The cool air whisked the humidity away and replaced tension with laughter. Amused wedding guests stopped keeping track of the list of disasters that had nearly befallen the event. Everyone had held his or her breath as the three-year-old pageboy precariously balanced the rings on a lace pillow. The adorable five-year-old flower girl who danced her way down the tulle-draped aisle was applauded, much to the embarrassment of her mother who did not know whether to laugh or cry.

Kyle, standing at the front of the decorated garden grove, beside his brother, Robert Tyce, only looked bemused at the antics of his young nephew and niece.

Chelsea, Sofia's bridesmaid, blond and stunning in her hunter green silk gown, almost stole the show, but it was clear that Kyle only had eyes for his petite bride. Sofia had wisely decided not to bedeck herself out in layers of "fluffy stuff" as she called it. A heavy gown, she insisted, would likely topple her. Instead, her wedding dress was a cream satin sheath. Its hem, embroidered with lace, brushed her ankles as she walked down the aisle, leaving scarcely any trace of her passing on the grass.

Thus, on a perfect evening, at the end of summer, Kyle and Sofia's married life began. Her stomach was already gently swelling with child—their child, who would be loved, adored, and spoiled rotten, whether mutant or human.

By design, the ceremony was short and sweet, and the celebration was long. Sofia flitted through the crowd and introduced her nursing school friends to Kyle's mercenary colleagues, who, she had to admit, looked decidedly normal, except for the fact that they were all in top physical form and subtly armed, she suspected. She knew that many of them were alpha mutants, but no one did anything extraordinary, and the other guests were allowed to wallow in blissful ignorance.

With a reluctant frown, Sofia waved away the waiter who circulated with a tray of filled champagne glasses. She turned to Zara, who looked nothing at all like an assassin in her bright yellow sundress and straw-colored sandals.

The other woman smiled warmly. "Congratulations, Sofia."

Sofia grinned. "Thank you."

Zara continued. "Danyael sends his regrets. He had to work and could not be here, but he wishes you—the both of you—” She looked down at the swell of Sofia’s stomach. “—and Kyle all the best.”

Sofia’s eyes widened. “That night...he knew.”

Zara nodded.

Sofia stared at the assassin. She did not know Zara well enough to presume she had any right to ask the question lingering on the tip of her tongue, but she cared enough for Danyael to want to know. “Will you and Danyael be all right?”

Zara’s eyebrows arched. “Eventually,” she said quietly. Her thoughtful expression evaporated and it was replaced by her usual arrogance. “As soon as he pulls his head out of his ass.” She leaned down and touched her cheek to Sofia’s. “Be happy.”

Sofia wore a wistful smile as she watched Zara disappear into the crowd. Kyle appeared beside her and slipped an arm around her waist. With his other hand, he caressed her belly. “What did Zara want?”

“Just to congratulate us. She and Danyael don’t appear to be on any better terms than they were six months ago.”

Kyle shrugged. “It’s probably Zara’s fault.”

Sofia laughed. “She implied it was his.”

“And that’s why it will take them years to sort it out.”

She glanced over her shoulder and found Kyle’s brother and his family in the crowd, mingling with their other guests. After many long conversations and not a little bit of conflict, Kyle and his brother, Robert, had managed to repair their relationship. “How’s the family thing coming along?” she asked.

Kyle grunted. “He’s not that bad actually. His kids are kinda charming, and his wife isn’t just a sorority-chick-turned-trophy-wife.”

Sofia rolled her eyes. Lauren Harrington Tyce had a Ph.D. in astrophysics, and she had abandoned a promising career in management consulting to homeschool her children. The Tyces were definitely going to rub a few rough edges off Kyle’s preconceived notions of his birth family. “We should invite them over for dinner after the baby’s born.”

“Sure. They’ll probably find a way to fit us between their ski trips to Aspen and their shopping trips in Milan.”

On second thought, those rough edges would take a little longer to smooth off. Sofia looked up at Kyle, a scowl and a rebuke forming on her lips.

He, however, was grinning. “Gotcha.”

She sank against him and relaxed into smile. “You’re going to make my life difficult, aren’t you?”

“Don’t see any reason to change now. You’re a do-gooder. You need something to fix, or you get twitchy. I figure my job is to keep you occupied the rest of your life.” His grip tightened around her, and he lowered his lips to hers.

“Oh, you will.” She breathed out the promise, and then smiled into the kiss as applause burst out and the love of their friends surrounded them.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Jade Kerrion defied (or leveraged, depending on your point of view) her undergraduate degrees in Biology and Philosophy, as well as her MBA, to embark on her second (and concurrent) career as an award-winning science fiction, fantasy, and contemporary romance author.

Her debut novel, Perfection Unleashed, published in 2012, won six literary awards and launched her best-selling futuristic thriller series, Double Helix, which blends cutting-edge genetic engineering and high-octane action with an unforgettable romance between an alpha empath and an assassin.

Earth-Sim and Eternal Night won first place Royal Palm Literary Awards in the Young Adult and Fantasy categories respectively. Readers have clamored for sequels, and Jade will get around to them when her To Do list opens up (sometime after 2020.) Life Shocks Romances features Jade's sweet and sexy contemporary romance series, which proves that, at the very least, she knows how to alphabetize books.

If she sounds busy, that's because she is. Jade writes at 3 a.m., when her husband and three sons are asleep, and aspires to make her readers as sleep-deprived as she is.

A TRACE OF COPPER

A rogue frog on the loose threatens their future.

New recruit to the Queen's agents, Dr. Piyali Mukherji is given a simple first assignment. Travel to the small Welsh village of Aberwyn and solve the mystery of a young woman's blue skin lesion. A challenging task, for the alarming infection is unlike anything she's seen before—and it's spreading.

Evan Tredegar, the town's pharmacist and the only man to ever capture her heart, knows more than he's telling. Despite his efforts to push her away, her touch reawakens old desires. As more villagers fall victim to the strange disease, he'll have no choice but to reveal his secrets, even if it means sacrificing his freedom.

Together they must move past broken promises, capture a rogue frog, and stop the infection before it spreads out of control.

Chapter 1

Aberwyn, Wales

Spring, 1885

“It bit me,” the young woman informed Piyali, hiking her skirts and rolling down her woolen hose. “Right through my stocking.” Miss Price, the shopkeeper’s daughter, plopped down on a chair and propped her foot upon a stool, pointing. “And now it’s blue.”

Dr. Piyali Mukherji leaned closer. As insane as Miss Price’s words sounded, they rang true. Her ankle was indeed blue.

Well, part of it. There was a decided lesion approximately two inches in diameter above her fibular protuberance. Piyali pressed two fingers against the blemish. She would describe it as an infection. Except it didn’t appear inflamed, and it wasn’t hot to the touch.

And it was blue.

Unheard of. But that was why she’d accepted the Crown’s commission, taken on the added duties of a Queen’s agent. The Duke of Avesbury, the gentleman at the head of this small, select group, had offered her a chance to be on the forefront of investigations into strange and unusual medical conditions. This certainly fit the bill.

“A frog bit you.” Piyali’s eyebrows rose, hoping she’d heard wrong. “A blue frog. With teeth.” Did frogs have teeth? And frogs—at least in Britain—were supposed to be green. Or brown.

Miss Price bit her lip. It didn’t bode well that she needed to consider her story.

Hoping for an explanation, she looked to the man who loomed beside her taking up far too much space in the small parlor. Time had turned familiar into foreign. Mr. Evan Tredegar wore his dark, tousled curls longer, no cravat wound under his collar beneath the rough shadow of his beard, and a small, curved scar cut through the edge of his right eyebrow. Under her study, a muscle twitched at his jawline, and his lips pressed into a thin line. He refused to meet her gaze. Perhaps it was just as well, for his eyes never failed to ignite a slow burn beneath her skin, and she needed to focus.

Still, a certain unease gave her pause. Once she’d been able to read his every mood and would have labeled his expression as concerned. Except the man she’d known wouldn’t withhold information vital to a patient's treatment. What wasn't he telling her?

"Miss Price?" Piyali prompted.

The young woman nodded. "Then it hopped away and disappeared into the woods." Sticking her lower lip out in a pout, she looked up at her mother. "Is this really necessary? Besides, she can't be a real doctor. How can a woman hold such a degree?" With a sidelong glance at Piyali's clothing, her voice dropped to a whisper. "An Indian woman."

A real doctor. Piyali resisted the urge to roll her eyes. If she had a shilling for every time she'd heard that sentiment... Instead, she lifted her chin and replied, "I attended medical school at the Université de Paris where women have been accepted since 1860."

Never had Paris seemed so far away. Four of the best—and worst—years of her life. She'd earned her place there by being twice as good as the other students, most of them men. Any who had sneered at her inclusion swiftly adjusted their opinion as she collected one award after another, graduating first in her class. As to the prejudice, she no longer felt the need to justify the traditional clothing she wore. If a person could not appreciate the richness and intricacy of Indian designs, then it was their loss.

With an unsteady hand, Mrs. Price patted her daughter on the shoulder and threw Piyali a nervous look. "Lister University's choice of medical practitioner is alarming. No doubt Dr. Mukherji was all they could spare, but I have every confidence in Mr. Tredegar's ointment. The blue stain has barely spread since you first applied it. In fact, I think it's grown smaller." From the pinched expression on her face, the woman clearly wished Piyali elsewhere. "But your father worries and wanted to consult a board-certified physician in case amputation becomes necessary."

"Amputation!" Miss Price's chest began to heave, her eyes growing wide, her fingers digging into the cushion of her chair. "It's just a spot!"

"A very unusual spot." Evan finally spoke, though his words were tight and strained. "One that must be examined by someone with more expertise than myself."

Resentment sparked. His defense of her skills was unwelcome. Both by her and, judging from the deep frown upon her face, Miss Price.

Piyali glanced again at the blue lesion. Could it be no more than a stain of blue ink? Had she interrupted a hoax, a bizarre courtship trick designed to lure a handsome, young pharmacist into this parlor? For upon her arrival, her purported patient had been fluttering eyelashes and casting Evan glances drenched with unfulfilled longing. Or—she narrowed her eyes—did the fault lie squarely on Evan's shoulders? Did he toy with the young shopkeeper's daughter, making promises he couldn't—or wouldn't—keep?

For once he'd made her promises, ones she'd clung to for four long years abroad. Promises he'd failed to keep when he returned from his overseas voyage some three months ago. Upholding her own vow, she'd sent him a message, then pounced upon the daily post for days—weeks—hoping for word of his imminent arrival, but... nothing. Save a devastating silence.

Heartache must have shown upon her face, for her mother had hunted down coconuts and banana leaves before taking herself down into the kitchens of their London townhouse to personally oversee the preparation of Piyali's favorite dish, bhetki macher paturi—marinated steamed fish—in an effort to coax her to eat something... anything. Food wasn't her mother's only crisis response. Gentlemen of all kinds had begun to appear around the dining table. At first they were Bengali, then merely Indian. She knew her mother grew desperate when a six-foot-four, blond Swede had joined them.

"Choose a husband, Piyali," Ma had begged, reminding her that if her father were still alive, he would even now be arranging her marriage. Even Piyali's British stepfather conspired to assist Ma, making noises about grandchildren. But no other man, no matter how accomplished or handsome, could mend the rift in her life.

An acidic pain had lodged itself beneath her heart, slowly corroding all of her hopes and dreams. Though she'd buried herself in her work, establishing a research program in her laboratory while training to become a Queen's agent, nothing eased the ache.

Which was why she'd cringed when Mr. Black, the duke's right-hand spy, had handed her this first assignment. "Aberwyn, Wales?" she'd read. Evan lived there.

"Two birds, one stone." The agent's eyes had sparkled with mischief. "A competent research pharmacist and a specialist in infectious disease reconnecting over a mysterious and peculiar illness." He'd laughed. "What could go wrong?"

Though she'd wanted to cry, orders were orders. She'd packed a trunk with the essentials and boarded the first train to Cardiff, enduring lewd stares and bawdy speculations about the bedroom predilections of exotic young women. Aether, how she hated that word. In Cardiff, she bought a ticket for a rickety steamstage, one that had broken down twice en route to Aberwyn. There, despite her exhortations to be careful, the driver had tossed her trunk from the roof onto the muddy street where a grumbling stable boy had dragged it—bumping up each step—to a small, cramped room above the town's only tavern, Yr Ysgyfarnog Wen—The White Hare. Later, a short walk along the rutted main street had brought her here, to the shopkeeper's cottage.

"Are you all right?" Evan's voice was soft and considerate.

"Merely contemplating treatment options," she lied.

The long hours spent traveling had jarred every joint and coated her with a film of dust, all while doubts gnawed at her mind. But deceitful hopes kept whispering that perhaps Evan's missive had gone astray and so, though exhausted, she'd taken special pains for their first meeting in five years.

Shaking the travel wrinkles free, she'd donned a favorite green lehenga—skirt—with a simple, paisley embroidered border edging the hem. Buckling her corset atop the matching half-sleeved choli, she'd brushed her long, wavy hair to a shine before twisting a green, satin ribbon into a plait over her shoulder. But his eyes hadn't flashed with desire, his pulse hadn't jumped in his throat, and his fingers hadn't twitched—as they once had—with a need to touch her skin. Evan had barely looked at her at all.

The ache settled back into her chest. It was no use, clinging to the past. She kept her gaze fixed upon her patient, trying to anesthetize her response, for it hurt too much to gaze upon Evan's once familiar face, to fight the urge to smooth his unkempt curls and drag her palm over the roughness of his cheeks.

"Ointment?" she asked, pulling a decilamp from its loop upon her leather corset, shaking it to activate the bioluminescent bacteria within. She bent over Miss Price's foot, directing a beam of light at the lesion. There. At its center, a tiny, curved, pink line. A scratch—bite? —that had already healed. Possibly the entry point of whatever organism had invaded her skin.

"An ointment of khu-neh-ari," Evan replied, speaking a foreign word that likely originated deep within the Amazonian rainforest, "made from the Caniramon divaritum, a climbing shrub."

She glanced at him out of the corner of her eye. "Have you encountered this particular ailment before?"

"I've been unable to identify it." He shifted on his feet. "Though the outward progression of its margins is reminiscent of a fungal infection. Hence the ointment."

"Infection!" The older woman yanked her hand from her daughter's shoulder.

"Fungus!" In a move worthy of Drury Lane, Miss Price threw herself backward upon the chair and tossed an arm across her forehead.

"Possible, but—" Piyali shifted the beam of light and the lesion... sparkled? She flicked the light away, then back. For a second, the skin shimmered, flashing pink and silver. Then, once again, it was blue. Not good. "I'm going to need a biopsy."

"Biopsy?" Miss Price's voice quivered, and she squirmed on her seat. "What's that?"

Turning to her bag of medical equipment, Piyali extracted a glass aetherscope slide, a few eyedropper bottles of stain and a sterile razor, arranging them all upon the small side table. "I'm going to shave away a tiny portion of the surface of your skin so that I might analyze it beneath my aetherscope. You should feel no more than a slight pinch."

Miss Price whimpered.

With a long-suffering sigh, Evan reached out to take Miss Price's hand. Odd that he wore gloves inside the parlor. "Squeeze as tight as you feel you must."

Minutes later, the skin sample was prepped and loaded within her small, portable aetherscope. Once the light source was activated, Piyali screwed in a pressurized canister of aether, listening to the gas hiss as it filled the chamber of the device. Perched on the edge of a chair, she bent over, peering through the eyepiece to adjust focus and magnification.

"Interesting," she murmured under her breath, then changed the angle of illumination. The color shifted.

A brush of feet on carpet. The faint disturbance of the air around her as Evan crossed the room to her side and leaned close. "What is it?" The heat of his breath swept across the bare skin of her neck and sent uninvited shivers across her skin.

How was it one man could affect her so?

She took a deep, steadying breath before answering. “A pearly luster.” Still, her voice caught. He was much too close. “One that tends toward iridescence of the pink and blue variety. It could be...” She dialed in to the highest resolution and stifled a curse. As feared, the jolting of the steamstage—or the tossing of her trunk—had indeed broken valuable equipment. Shaking her head, she stood and stepped back from the aetheroscope—and away from Evan. “My objective, the one with the highest resolution? Its crystalline lens is cracked.”

She could guess, but she wouldn’t. Not even for Evan. Especially not for him. He knew something, and he wasn’t sharing. Childish of her, but now that she too knew something, she wasn’t sharing either. Resolve stiffened her spine. He could wait—they all could—until she confirmed her findings with cold, hard evidence.

“Piyali?” Evan prompted.

Mother and daughter drew offended breaths at his overly informal address of an unfamiliar and unmarried woman. Even in a small Welsh village, propriety must be maintained.

“Dr. Mukherji,” she corrected him, her voice cool and clinical. Unless Evan decided to share whatever he concealed, there was nothing more she could do today. She was tired and hungry and irritated. And a report was due to Mr. Black. “I can’t say for certain. Further tests are required.”

A light mist of rain dampened Evan’s hair as he stood in the street staring at the door of Yr Ysgyfarnog Wen. If only he could turn back time.

Five years and she was still as beautiful as ever. He had no right to look, no right to steal glances. But he had. Of dark eyes he’d once stared into. Of long, wavy hair he’d once twined about his fingers. Of deep pink lips he’d once kissed.

He’d done his best not to stare, not to notice how the graceful arc of her collarbone peeked from beneath the edge of her neckline, how a short corset clasped her narrow waist beneath its tooled, leather surface, how her skirt flared outward over generous hips, or how its raised hemline revealed ankles encased in laced boots.

Her corset was studded with metal loops, hooks and chains to which she’d clipped all manner of essential devices and tools. Including a government-issued TTX pistol that gave his pulse a jolt. Was there anything more alluring than a strong, competent woman? But it was the familiar, amber glass vial dangling from a chain beside her hip that focused his gaze. Wondering, he’d bent close to peer through the aetheroscope and inhaled. Essence of orange blossoms. All these years she’d kept it, the same essential oil still scenting the water that rinsed her hair. Long-suppressed desires stirred.

He closed his eyes. He had no right to such thoughts.

Not one week after he’d returned to Britain’s shores, a skeet pigeon with rust-tipped wings had alighted upon his window sill, a brief note tied to its jointed ankle with news of her degree and the direction to her family's London townhouse. To speed his reply, she'd even included a punched return card for the clockwork bird.

With stars in his eyes, he'd sat down in his tropical greenhouse to put pen to paper. Halfway through his letter a small, blue frog had leapt onto the back of his hand. A stowaway upon one of the many lianas—climbing vines—he'd brought back from his voyage to the Amazonian rainforest. He'd thought the shimmering creature cute, adorable, delightful.

Until it bit him.

Evan rubbed his thumb and forefinger together, the soft black leather of his gloves reminding him of the moment everything went wrong. He'd never sent that letter. Or any letter. One didn't ask the woman he loved to share a slow descent into madness.

Time passed, and the vine of his silence slowly twined itself about his throat, growing so thick that only a machete could cut it free. Too late to ask her for help now. Not only did she likely despise him, she was a Queen's agent.

Nonetheless, he must speak with her. Her aetherscope was broken and that meant she would want to return to London on the morning's steamstage. That couldn't happen. He couldn't allow her to leave, not with a sample of Miss Price's skin in her possession. Here, in Wales, things could be kept under control.

Stopping her meant entering The White Hare where one Miss Sarah Parker, the tavern's daughter, would be lying in wait. He willed his feet to move, to cross the rutted road, willed his hand to wrap around the iron handle of the tavern's door and pull it open.

"Evan!" Sarah cried, her voice a confection of icing and spun sugar. Wiping her hands on her apron, she rushed to his side.

Out of the proverbial pan and into the fire.

Three months ago, Sarah and Miss Price—Tegan, she insisted whenever her mother wasn't around—had begun fighting to gain his attention, all in a futile effort to secure a marriage proposal. Their bickering was a constant reminder of what he would never have, a thorn that pricked at his conscience.

Tegan found any remotely credible excuse to throw herself in his path. Unchaperoned, she regularly dropped by his cottage—a three-mile walk into the countryside—to request more packets of headache powder and throat lozenges for the shop. Chances she sold that much were close to zero.

And Sarah? She pounced on him every time he stepped into The White Hare, always ready with a pint of his favorite ale, begging for tales of his time in the rainforest even as she tugged the bodice of her dress scandalously low. Worse, her parents aided and abetted, turning a blind eye to her blatant flirtations and not calling her to task when she ignored the other customers.

"Miss Parker," he replied. "Where is Dr. Mukherji? I need to speak with her."

Wrapping her arm about his, Sarah urged him closer to the peat fire burning in the grate.

“Upstairs,” she admitted, playfully pushing him into a chair and dropping into his lap. “But I’m right here.”

“Sarah,” he warned in a low voice. “I’ve asked you not to—”

She leaned forward, pressing generous breasts against his chest while twisting a finger into his curls so tightly it threatened to rip his hair from its roots. “Oh, please. All these months you’ve been without a woman to warm your bed. You need a wife, one who can help you run that pharmacy of yours in Cardiff. Tegan might know business, but she’s far too uptight to keep you satisfied after hours.”

“Stop,” he snapped, grabbing her hips and shoving her away. “I’ve no intention of taking a wife.”

Laughing, Sarah caught her balance on the sticky tabletop. “No? Then you’d best be careful. The Indian princess can’t take her eyes off you.” The lift of her chin redirected his attention.

What? He whipped his head about, catching Piyali’s narrow-eyed gaze from across the room as she descended the stairs. Guilt stuck in his throat. He’d not been unfaithful and didn’t want her to think... Did it matter? Her eyes slid away, and she turned her back, climbing onto a stool at the bar. A deliberate move to avoid any and all private conversation.

“She’s not a princess,” he said.

“Oh?” Her voice rose in a teasing lilt. “Then why do you stare at her as if she wears a crown of gold and precious jewels?”

Evan glowered. “Please, just bring me a pint.”

“Of course,” Sarah said, then winked. “And I’ll see what I can do about a little something extra.” She sauntered away, swinging her hips with each step. Tossing a quick word to her father, she jerked her head in Evan’s direction. Then, sliding onto a stool, Sarah turned her bright eyes upon Piyali. Her lips moved, and Piyali laughed. Not good. Sarah’s interference was akin to swatting a bee hive with a stick. The dull, throbbing beginnings of a splitting headache began to hammer away at his skull.

Glass banged on wood as Mr. Parker dropped a pint of frothy ale onto the table before him. “The way you’ve been handling my daughter? I think we ought to speak about calling banns.”

Evan dropped his head into his hands.

Chapter 2

“So tell me, is the all-too-precious Miss Tegan Price going to live?” The blonde, blue-eyed serving girl dropped onto a stool beside Piyali and leaned close. “Not that I wish her ill,” she hastened to add, “just that we’ve been at each other’s throats fighting over Evan.” She waved a dismissive hand in the air. “Tegan’s always fabricating one ailment or another, any excuse for Evan to formulate her a new potion.” Her voice dropped to a whisper. “Not only is he the most handsome man for miles around, he has a shop in Cardiff, and both of us want out of this dismal village.” A deep sigh slid from her lips. “Not that he wants anything to do with either of us.”

Piyali blinked at the sudden onslaught of unsolicited information. “I’m sorry, I can’t discuss a patient’s health,” she said. Then, reminding herself she was an agent tasked with collecting information, forced herself to sip the bitter ale and plaster on a conspiratorial smile. “But please, feel free to share any and all gossip about her with me.”

A wide grin split the woman’s face. “We’re going to be great friends,” she announced, slapping a hand upon the bar top. “I’m Sarah Parker, daughter of this humble establishment. Sorry about the shameful display of overt flirting you had to witness. What is your trick? Evan can’t seem to take his eyes off you.”

“It’s not what you think,” she began, but a discordant note rang in her answer. “We knew each other once, long ago.”

“And now find yourselves forced to work together to cure Tegan of whatever it is that ails her.” Sarah held up a hand. “Which you can’t talk about, but it’s good to know you’re not added competition.” She leaned forward, eyes wide, waiting. “So tell me instead, are you from India?” She continued before Piyali could draw breath. “I love the embroidery on your skirt. I’ve always wanted to travel, but the only other place I’ve ever been—not counting Cardiff—is London.” She sighed. “I miss London.”

Sensing an easily won ally, Piyali shared a bit more than she would otherwise. “I was born in northeast India, but moved here as a young girl with my stepfather and mother. Aside from the four years I studied in Paris, I’ve lived in London.” After an epidemic of diphtheria tore her family to shreds, her mother had resisted remarrying, choosing to support them by selling the stunning kantha shawls she hand stitched, until a chance encounter with a British textile importer had brought her stepfather into their lives. Ignoring the many yelling and pleading aunties and uncles, they'd married and moved to England. Her mother had found a second chance at love... could she?

"Paris!" Sarah's eyes grew hazy. "I'm so jealous. It's awful here, but my father lost his job over a bar fight and decided he'd open his own tavern. Here. In Wales." She rolled her eyes. "I've no idea why. It's so remote. And forget about learning Welsh! It's impossible to wrap the tongue about. Just try to say the name of this tavern."

Piyali made her best attempt, and they both dissolved into tears of laughter.

"See?" Sarah said, then lowered her voice to a whisper as she waggled her eyebrows. "Thing is, I understand it just fine. Makes it fun to listen in on all the gossip."

"Sarah!" Mr. Parker yelled, beckoning his daughter. "Enough. Back to work."

Feeling as if she'd struck gold, Piyali pressed a hand atop Sarah's. "You'll tell me more about this town later?" Perhaps it was a path to nothing but renewed pain, but she needed to know about Evan, about what he'd been up to since his return.

"Only if you tell me more about India. And Paris."

"Agreed."

Sarah hopped onto her feet and turned back to the customers.

Sensing Evan's stare between her shoulder blades, Piyali took a deep breath and turned. Sad blue eyes met hers. Why hadn't he answered her message? Perhaps he'd fallen in love with another? Her chest constricted. They had been apart far longer than they'd been together.

Her heart had almost healed. Almost. Not that she would be giving him a chance to tear another hole by squabbling with Sarah and Tegan. It didn't matter what kept him silent. He'd made his choice.

His eyebrows drew together. Good. He ought to feel guilty about never answering her message. If he'd changed his mind, it was simple decency to inform her that she no longer fit into his life plans.

Difficult as it was, she needed to speak with him. She needed to know what he knew about the blue lesion and, to meet the bare minimum requirement of her mission, she needed to deliver Mr. Black's invitation.

She spun on her seat to face the bar and waved Mr. Parker over.

"Hungry?" he asked.

"No." She placed a punch card, a rolled parchment in a tin canister and two coins upon the bar. "Rather, I'd like to charter your skeet pigeon." The clockwork bird didn't look particularly airworthy. She frowned. "If it's in working order."

"Tends to malfunction," he warned, his voice suggesting she wasted perfectly good money. "Even on a good day, doesn't make it much past London."

Worth a try. It was the only bird in town, and she hadn't seen any telegraph wires. If Mr. Black couldn't arrange to have a new crystalline lens objective shipped, she'd take her sample back for analysis in her laboratory at Lister University. Waiting a few days for an answer would give her time to keep an eye on Tegan's lesion. "Good enough."

He pocketed the coins and, as he turned to tie the tin canister to the bird's ankle, his wife burst through the door, a bloody rag wrapped about her finger. Glaring at her husband, she pushed past him and plunged her hand into a bucket of soapy water all the while muttering under her breath about stupid plans and unreasonable men.

"What happened?" Sarah asked, handing her mother a clean cloth.

"It's nothing." Mrs. Parker dried her hands. "I scratched myself on some thorns by Seren's Well."

"The fairy well?" Sarah hissed. "You didn't. Tell me you didn't."

The steam in her mother's answering stare could make the nearby copper teakettle whistle. "I did it for you," she snapped.

"You can't," Sarah spat back. "That's the whole point. Do you know what the other girls will say if they find out?" She stalked away.

As Sarah's mother struggled to bandage her finger, Piyali offered, "I'm a doctor. I can look at it if you'd like."

Mrs. Parker's head jerked up. For a long moment, she stared at Piyali, her face expressionless. "More than a doctor, I'd say. Everyone knows what the Price Family is up to, pulling strings to drag you all the way here from London." Her mouth twisted. "Bet they were mightily disappointed when a woman arrived. And a foreigner at that. Nothing they'd like better than to see their precious daughter wed to a man of influence."

Piyali sucked in a sharp breath of air. She was a citizen, granted as a royal prerogative when she joined the Queen's agents, an offer only extended by special invitation. By working as a British spy, she had done—and would do—far, far more to serve this country than most natural born citizens. All this, however, was not something one announced, particularly in a Welsh tavern.

"Elena," her husband growled in warning, "there's no need to air the dirty laundry of others."

"Hmphff." Mrs. Parker snatched a rag and set to wiping the far end of the counter.

A hand touched her shoulder, and Piyali jumped.

"It's me." Evan's voice was hushed. "We need to speak. The rain has stopped. Perhaps a walk?"

Given the hostile glances the tavern owners hurled at each other like poison-tipped darts, Piyali was all too happy to flee. "I'll grab my overcoat."

"What's this about a fairy well?" Piyali asked him.

Lines of irritation pulled at the corners of her mouth. Insulted by the Parkers, most likely. They were experts at open hostility and masters of harsh insults. How they'd managed to conceive a daughter, he'd never know.

"Ffynnon y Seren. Seren's Well. A bit of local tradition and legend," he answered, happy to let more serious topics wait until the dark cloud lifted from her face. "A pretty little spot just outside the village. Come, I'll show you."

Evan didn't offer her his arm. He wasn't a gentleman, and she wasn't a lady. Besides, it was better if they didn't touch. He wouldn't want to let go.

Despite all they had to say to each other, they walked in silence beneath the gray sky, following a narrow, winding path into a wooded gully. As they neared the well, he waved her ahead of him, not wanting to obscure her view of the ancient holy site. A small pool edged by rocks collected the upwelling of water beneath an old tree. Its roots had twisted and turned, invading the crevices of the ruins that stood beside the well. Overhead, scraps of cloth tied to its branches fluttered in the wind. Rough stepping stones led downward to the cool, clear water.

"It's beautiful. And so very peaceful. Like a pabitra pukur..." She trailed her fingers over the moss-covered stones of a low wall. "What was this?"

"An alter? A shrine? A chapel?" He shrugged. "No one recalls. But," he couldn't suppress a smile at the ridiculous legend he was about to share, "tradition has it that one can cure epilepsy by bathing in the pool at midnight while holding a duck beneath one's left arm."

"A duck?" Her face lit up as she laughed. "Are there any other odd traditions?"

"Too many to count. All invocations involve an offering of a bent steel pin to the gwragedd annwn, the water-sprite, who lives here. Most requests are for healing various ailments. Warts. Leprosy. Toenail fungus."

Her eyebrows rose. "Skin lesions?"

Ah. It seemed they were done with pleasantries. "I've no idea what causes it."

Only a partial lie, but it wasn't like he could hand her the frog. The blasted critter had leapt from his workbench and disappeared into the tropical plants and vines that grew in his greenhouse. He'd searched for hours—days, weeks, months—but had never seen the creature again. He cancelled all visitations to his greenhouse, all the tours he'd promised of the strange, wonderful plants he'd shipped home, unwilling to expose another person to its bite. Now he was a recluse, fast becoming the village eccentric.

Unfortunately, forbidding anyone to enter his greenhouse had the opposite effect, generating ludicrous rumors that he'd brought home man-eating plants and snakes that could swallow a child whole. Soon adventure-seeking boys had arrived, peering through the condensation-fogged glass, trying to catch a glimpse of whatever lay hidden inside.

He'd ordered a lock—the 3XR CinchBolt—but it arrived too late. A little over a week ago, Evan awoke to find the door to his greenhouse ever so slightly ajar, the plants nearest the crack struggling to endure the cold spring morning.

Though nothing obvious had been stolen, his first thought had been of that blue frog. Had it escaped? It seemed so. For not three days later, Miss Tegan Price had knocked on his front door, begging an ointment for a strange rash. This time, she'd not been pretending an illness.

Plying Tegan with questions, he'd discovered that the frog had bitten her while she walked upon the foot path that led to his front door. After compounding a jar of ointment and sending her home with promises to call on her soon, he'd searched the path, the shrubs lining it, turning over every rock and fallen log he could reach, until finally resigning himself to failure. Instead, he turned to the desperate hope that the tropical frog had perished with the early morning's frost.

But he couldn't be certain. And now Piyali was here—the last place he wanted her.

"I owe you an apology," he said, speaking past the lump that blocked his throat. "I wanted to write... but things changed. I'm not the same man I was when I left." A gross understatement. He wasn't sure exactly what he was anymore, but according to the folklore the Kayapo shaman had shared, eventually he would no longer be human. Myth? He hoped so, but he couldn't be certain. With Tegan now facing the same fate...

"Did you meet someone?" Hurt shaded her voice as she searched his face. "Another woman?"

"No." His hand rose, reaching for her, but he forced it back to his side. "There will never be another woman for me, Piyali. I'm simply... unfit."

"An injury?" She glanced at his groin.

Blood rushed to his face, and he nearly choked. "Not that."

"Then what?" She placed a hand upon his arm, sending a fierce jolt of hunger through his body. "What is it that you feel you can't tell me? Once we shared... everything."

His eyes fell upon her rosy lips. He wanted nothing more than to pull her soft curves against his chest, to thread his fingers through the curls of her midnight-black hair that seemed to shine with its own light and pull her mouth to his. Kissing her would solve everything. And nothing.

The air between them shimmered with memories. At a fateful symposium—Herbal Extracts and Their Use in the Treatment of Parasitic Infestations—held at the Pharmacological Society of London, he'd lost awareness of all women but one. The attraction had been mutual, and a courtship had begun. Shared glances, touches, whispers over the course of several lectures, all culminating one fateful day in the shadowy recesses of the society's cloakroom. His pulse jumped at the memory of his mouth moving over her smooth skin, of linen and silk sliding to the ground, of her legs wrapped about his hips urging him closer, deeper.

He'd proposed the very next day on bended knee, asking her to come with him to South America. But her own dream had become reality, and with tears in her eyes, she showed him an acceptance letter granting her admission to medical school. In Paris.

Unwilling to let her go, he'd promised to ask her again in four years and begged her to wait for him.

Looking now into the twin dark pools of her eyes, he knew that with a few words, with a simple touch, she could be his once more. But at what cost? Her career. Possibly her life. He'd given her an apology, but he could not give her an explanation. Under no circumstances could he allow the British government to become aware of what had transpired. Nor would he inflict his future upon her.

The air was thick with regrets, making it hard to breathe.

“Evan?”

He dragged his eyes away, forcing himself to study the dappled light that filtered through the leaves above the surface of the spring. “You saw something through the aetherscope,” he said. “If it’s not a fungal infection, the ointment I compounded won’t cure her. Perhaps you ought to excise the lesion.”

“Perhaps.” Piyali moved out of reach, her boots tapping softly across the stepping stones. “Her skin, the basal layer, is blue. While that’s odd enough, it also color shifted when I changed the angle of illumination.” She lowered herself onto the low wall beside the water. “I’ve sent a skeet pigeon to London requesting my laboratory to send a replacement aetherscope lens without delay. Before I set a course of treatment, I want to collect more data.”

“Why not simply excise the lesion?” he asked, hoping she didn’t find his insistence too presumptuous.

“Excision would prevent its spread, but once removed, the tissue—and anything that has invaded it—will die.”

Exactly as he hoped. But she intended to investigate. Already, she’d dispatched a skeet pigeon to London. As his plans crumbled before him, Evan struggled to present her with a blank face. So much for his hopes of sending Piyali back to London without a sample. Still, if he could locate that blue frog, this disaster could be contained.

“Bet I can catch it first!”

“I’m faster!”

With a shout and a laugh, two boys ran up the pathway, skittering to a stop in the leaf litter at his feet.

“Simon,” Evan greeted one boy, then the other. “Aron. Glad to see the skin’s clearing up.” He glanced at Piyali and murmured, “I’ve written a paper and plan to send my findings to the Pharmacological Society soon.” They’d have to publish it, for he wouldn’t be speaking in public.

The boy yanked his collar away from his neck. “Almost all gone,” he said. “And no more itching.” His face twisted as he stuck out his tongue. “But the tea is... blech.”

Piyali stood and nodded a greeting. “Pleased to meet you both.” She peered at the boy’s face and neck, both impressed and incredulous. “You found a treatment for eczema?”

“From a shaman in the rainforest,” Aron answered, his eyes wide and sparkling.

“If you’re already cured,” Piyali replied with a smile, “what brings you to the fairy well?”

“Mr. Tredegar told us all about how the natives hunt in the rainforest. With blow guns and poison darts,” Aron said, snapping a branch off a nearby tree, whittling its end into a sharp point. “We’re gonna do the same, soon as we find that blue frog.”

“A blue frog,” Piyali said. “What a coincidence.” Her voice told him she knew it was anything but.

Biting back a curse, Evan closed his eyes. The creature’s skin secretions might not be poisonous —not like the boys foolishly hoped—but its bite was a different matter. He had to catch that frog. Now.

Chapter 3

Evans had bundled her back toward the tavern, reaching its door just as the sun slipped over the horizon. He'd refused to enter, refused to discuss the frog situation, muttering something about stoking the greenhouse stove as he turned away.

Bewildered, she stood there in the street as his form disappeared into the twilight. That he'd found an effective treatment for eczema was... amazing. Test, analyze, report. Since his return from Brazil, he'd sent a number of groundbreaking reports to the Pharmacological Society of London, and its members were all enamored of him. When this paper arrived, they would extend him a speaking invitation, but given he'd yet to visit London, she doubted he'd accept.

Was it because she lived in London? Or did it have something to do with this frog?

He'd almost kissed her there by the spring. She'd read the intent in his eyes. Dark and intense, it was the same stare he'd fastened upon her that first day their eyes caught in the lecture theater. Not the stare of hostility most women who dared step into the male stronghold received, but one of intrigued attraction. One he'd underscored by taking a chair beside her own. Then, as now, desire had rushed like liquid heat throughout her entire body.

If there was interest, was there still hope? Possibly. But this infection—and apparently a frog—stood between them. Love thwarted by an amphibian. Absurd.

Stomach growling, she stepped into the smoky tavern, hoping Sarah might be inclined to indulge in a bit of gossip. Perhaps she might know something about this elusive frog. Alas, she was busy carrying pints of ale and side-stepping the wandering hands of men who believed a compliment was best delivered by pinching a woman's rear. That they dared to do so in her father's presence said something about the man, casting him in a most unpleasant light. A father ought to defend his daughter's honor, consistently.

Among this cohort of men, one particular set of eyes with an arrogant gleam turned in Piyali's direction as she strode to the bar—back straight and chin held high—but the man's vanity refused to recognize her discouraging demeanor. His mouth widened in a manner suggestive of all kinds of improprieties as he rose from his chair.

A woman alone. An Indian woman alone. A young Indian woman in a skirt with a hemline that exposed her booted ankles... and escorted by no man.

Somehow this was an invitation. Once, such blatant interest unsettled her. Now, she viewed it as an opportunity to realign his priorities.

As he approached, his gaze shifted downward, raking over her body with an air of speculation, and she pulled back the edge of her overcoat, giving him a glimpse of her government issued TTX pistol in its holster. That snapped his drifting eyes back to a more acceptable location, and he dropped back into his chair, scowling. A most gratifying response. She allowed herself a small smile.

“Hungry?” the innkeeper asked as she settled onto a stool. “Got stew and Welsh rarebit.”

“Rabbit?” she asked, her brow wrinkling.

A long-suffering sigh escaped his mouth. “Cheese on toast.”

She could see the stew bubbling on the stove. Gristly beef and overcooked rutabagas in a fatty broth. Her throat constricted in protest, and her stomach also threatened to rebel. “The rarebit, please. And,” she stopped him as he turned away, “the skeet pigeon?”

“Liftoff went as expected.” He raised a shoulder and stepped aside as his wife slammed a pint of frothy, overflowing ale onto the bar before Piyali.

“Don’t even think of drawing your weapon in my establishment,” Mrs. Parker warned with narrowed eyes. “Next steamstage leaves at sunrise.”

“I need to keep the room a few more days,” Piyali said, ignoring the unnecessarily strong hint. “Bit of a problem with a frog, I’m afraid.” She leaned forward eyeing the bandage wrapped about Mrs. Parker’s fingers. “Is it infected?” Recalling Sarah’s reaction to her mother’s visit to the fairy well, and Evan’s comments about offerings to the water-sprite, she added, “Did the bent pin you stuck yourself with happen to be rusted?”

Mrs. Parker stiffened. “What do you know about Seren’s Well?”

“I know much about many things, such as a duck is a useful fowl. That two boys are on the hunt for a blue frog.”

“Blue?” The innkeeper snorted, setting a plate of rarebit before her. “That’s but a fairy tale to go with a fairy well.” He gave his wife a hard stare. “What were you doing out there? Dipping your fingers in the sacred waters to rid yourself of warts?”

With a glare, his wife turned on her heel, tossing a few final words over her shoulder, “Keep it up, old man, and you’ll find yourself outside sleeping in the steam cart.”

Sarah leaned close as she passed behind Piyali. “See why I’m so desperate to marry? It’s a rare moment they’re ever in agreement about anything. But what’s this about a blue frog?”

So much for her source of gossip.

Her mind unsettled, Piyali tossed and turned all night on the lumpy mattress and, by morning, she was convinced it was stuffed with hay—not feathers—and infested by creepy-crawlies with an inclination to bite. She'd had sleepless nights before, but always—even in Paris—her fingers had been able to trace the embroidered motifs of her kantha quilt, the various flowers and birds stitched into the fabric by her dida's very own fingers. During such restless nights, she allowed herself to remember a very different life, one she'd lost long ago. Such memories were the force that drove her to study infectious disease.

Before the sun had fully crept over the horizon, she was dressed—this time in a subtle coppery-orange lehenga—and pacing the rough boards of her room. A mythical fairy well, a blue frog and two boys on a quest to locate it in the undergrowth surrounding the pool. All had sounded like nonsense until Evan had turned her around and marched her away from said spring as fast as their feet would carry them, a muscle jumping in his clenched jaw.

Grounds for further investigation.

She glanced at the pocket watch that hung from her corset on a silver chain. The general store would be open by now. Miss Price, pampered daughter though she was, might be minding the counter with her mother. Perhaps if Piyali could draw her aside, she might coax forth more details.

With a quick check of her TTX pistol—men waking from a drunken stupor were often irate—she shrugged on her overcoat, picked up her doctor's bag and stepped from her room. She exited the tavern into the cool, fresh air that promised a beautiful spring day.

"I'm Dr. Mukherji, here to check on your daughter," she said, nodding a greeting to Mr. Price as she entered the store. He stood behind a gleaming brass till, tying on an apron as he prepared for the day's business.

"Heard about you." Mr. Price stared back at her, his eyes flat and unwelcoming. "Heard you were a woman. Trained in Paris, no less."

Would she always be greeted with such venom? Quite probably. Not that she would let that stop her. She pulled back her shoulders and met his gaze directly. "With a specialty in infectious diseases." She stood silent, letting that detail sink in, waiting to see if he was prejudiced enough that he would risk his daughter's health.

His jaw slackened. "Is it..."

"I've no idea," she answered, happy to have his complete attention, his grudging respect. "But I want to monitor her condition carefully."

Miss Price was presented without delay.

In a snit, Tegan flounced into the room. "This isn't necessary," she whined. "Mr. Tredegar is a renowned pharmacist."

"So he is," Piyali agreed, quietly wondering if anything more than the promise of financial security drove her interest in Evan. "But all men and women of science consult their colleagues. What two minds can accomplish together is far more than the sum of their individual work."

"Sit," her father commanded.

With a huff, Tegan sat upon a nearby chair.

Piyali knelt to unwind the gauze from Tegan's ankle. Much to her relief, the blue lesion didn't appear to have spread. Neither, however, had it decreased in size. Perhaps Evan's ointment had had some effect. Except, without an untreated lesion for comparison, no true scientific conclusion could be reached. Not that this was something she wished to test on a young woman. Or any other person.

"Where in the woods were you bitten?" If she could catch the creature, the minute her lens arrived she could analyze its saliva beneath her aetherscope.

Tegan shrugged. "On a path." But her eyes slid away.

Piyali dropped her voice to a mere murmur. "Might this unfortunate event have occurred beside Seren's Well?" A soft gasp from her patient. "The location of the attack—" A frog attacking. The very phrase sounded ludicrous. "Shall remain between us. Doctor-patient confidentiality."

"You—an outsider—have no business at our fairy well." Tegan crossed her arms and pursed her lips. "Who told you about it? No. Let me guess. Sarah. She'd do anything to win."

"Win?" What on earth could the spring have to do with the two women's matrimonial designs upon Evan?

"Don't pretend you don't know," Tegan huffed. "Your flashy dress and exotic, dark looks might draw Evan's glances, but he won't marry you." The spiteful use of his given name was not lost upon her, and it stung, the implication she was nothing but a pretty plaything to be used and tossed aside. "You wouldn't fit in. Not here. What he needs is a true Welsh woman to look after him."

Tegan thought her the newest competitor for Evan's romantic attentions. While Sarah had all but welcomed her to join the game, Tegan refused her admission outright. Yet once, Evan had asked Piyali to share his life. Not so these village girls, not even after months of shameless pursuit. "You'd rather lose a limb than confide the location of the frog?"

Hard eyes glinted at her and, when she spoke, her voice was hushed, staking an intimate claim. "If you must know, I was bitten on the path just outside Evan's front door whilst returning from our usual rendezvous." Her patient leaned closer. "We have spent time together behind closed doors. Frequently. His mother's opal and diamond ring will be mine."

That did it. She would not tolerate such disrespect. Slamming shut her bag, she stood. She was under no obligation to coddle Tegan's misguided hopes. And so Piyali left her there, perched like a queen upon her throne, to reapply Evan's miraculous ointment on her own.

Striding down the street, fingers clenched about the handle of her bag, Piyali searched the edge of the woods, hunting for a break in the vegetation, for the path that would lead her to Seren's Well. Either Tegan was lying or the frog had hopped through the woods until it found a likely location to establish a new home. She would find it, and she would analyze it, dragging it back to London as her small, blue hostage if necessary. With or without Evan's approval.

Evan. Good grief. Sarah and Tegan were poised to claw each other's eyes out over the man. But neither of the young woman knew—or cared—anything of his heart. Tegan wanted nothing but economic security attached to a handsome man. Sarah wanted all that and escape from her parents with the promise of a touch of adventure.

Piyali wanted him for himself.

Yes, Evan's physique was impressive. Particularly after spending four years deep in the rainforest. He had sharper edges now. His body was tougher, harder, as if his muscles were forged from steel. She couldn't help but wonder what it would feel like—now—to be wrapped in his strong arms. His gray-blue eyes held a depth that hadn't been there before, and yet his gaze still sent blue flames ablaze across her skin. Yet she craved more than his physical touch. She missed his impressive mind, his advanced thinking, his adventurous spirit, his kindness, his directness... though that last trait now seemed lacking.

She sighed. He was holding something close to his chest and—setting aside her hurt, anger, jealousy, and disappointment—she was nearly certain he was trying to protect her. She frowned. But from a frog?

Her eye caught upon a break in the underbrush. The packed dirt of a path. She ducked beneath a branch and entered the forest.

Whatever ate at Evan's conscience, it must be serious, or even now his ring would be on her finger. Opal and diamond. His mother's ring. The ring he'd presented her on bended knee all those years ago. She'd wanted to accept, to announce to all the world that they would be husband and wife. But the dreams they both pursued were about to drag them into separate hemispheres for four long years. Any number of things could happen to drive a wedge between them.

And, indeed, something had.

Evan had nearly caught the blasted amphibian twice. The first time he'd been too slow, the second time his net had snagged upon the underbrush. Half the night he'd sat awake upon the cold, hard stone wall, staring into the bubbling spring. Pointing his bioluminescent torch at one likely crevice after another, he'd tried to search out the wee beastie's new home. Then, like an ember jumping from a freshly stoked furnace, it struck him hot and burning between the eyes. He was an idiot.

Tree frog.

He'd turned the beam of his torch upward, searching the overhanging branches. The frog must have been snoozing comfortably, tucked within a cluster of dew-damp leaves, for it wasn't until the first rays of sunlight fell upon the leaf canopy that he caught a glimpse of something blue and shimmering.

Scaling the tree, he wriggled out onto the branch, holding the handle of his net tightly as he stretched his arm ever so slowly and carefully toward the frog. But despite his stealth, the amphibian turned about, blinked at him—once, twice—then launched itself into the pool.

Grumbling about frogs and trans-Atlantic voyages to vacation at a mineral spring in Wales, Evan dropped back to the ground. The cold shock of the water must have been too much, for the critter now hopped about in the weeds edging the water. Evan lunged, almost catching him.

Now the blue frog was somewhere between the stones of the low wall. On hands and knees, he crawled through dew-damp grass, peering into one crack after another.

“Much as I can appreciate the posterior view you present,” Piyali said behind him, her voice full of smothered laughter, “wouldn’t it be easier to admit you need help catching a certain blue frog?”

Evan scrambled to his feet, nearly pitching himself into the pool in his haste. He dragged a gloved hand over his hair, then cursed silently, remembering he’d just been on all fours in the dirt. Closing his eyes a moment, he swallowed his pride. It was for the greater good. “Will you help me?”

“Fine.” She set down her bag and picked up a long stick. “But if I find him first, I won’t share unless you tell me what’s going on.”

“No.” Absolutely not. Under no circumstances could the frog be allowed to leave Aberwyn. The poor creature would have to be destroyed.

“No?” she scoffed, poking into a crevice. “You’d rather see the frog dragged back to London, poked, prodded, its every secret extracted? That lesion of Miss Price’s? Still there, your ointment notwithstanding. What becomes of her if I don’t discover the cause of her skin infection?”

“The lesion needs to be excised,” he stated. The ointment would only slow the spread of the discoloration, not eliminate it. Better a doctor perform the surgery, but if necessary he would lift a scalpel and do his best.

“Oh?” She threw a challenging glance over her shoulder. “What brings you to that conclusion? Such a surgery risks an infection of another kind.”

The sunlight filtering through the leaves overhead accentuated her thick eyelashes, the curve of her cheek and the graceful arch of her neck. The pistol at her hip. She was a Queen’s agent now. Even if he told her everything, her loyalty was to Britain first, him... at best, second.

But if he didn’t tell her, she was going to keep digging. If that frog bit her... if what had happened to him, happened to her... His gut twisted. He couldn’t bear it. She could help. Together, they might just be able to solve—

The air shimmered. Odd. Nothing sat there upon the rock wall. Or did it? He swept his net across its surface and felt something catch in the mesh. A small weight, about that of a small, shimmering tree frog. Quickly, he tied off the opening.

“Did you catch it?” Piyali asked, crossing to him to stare into his net. “There’s nothing—”

There was. Tiny and thrashing and barely visible, the once-blue frog reflected the light of the forest around them. A near-perfect camouflage. No wonder he’d had such a difficult time locating the creature.

“I’ve a glass terrarium,” he announced, partly to her, party to the frog. “No more hopping about biting the ankles of young women.”

“Evan,” Piyali’s voice was soft as she wrapped a hand about his wrist. “You have to tell me what's going on. Don't make me summon Mr. Black."

"Mr. Black," he repeated. He'd met the man only once, but once had been enough to cement the man in his mind. If Mr. Black was involved, the situation was worse than he thought. "He sent you?"

"He did. I'm to solve the mystery of the blue lesion and evaluate your competence."

"For?" Worry twisted in his stomach.

With a deep breath, she dropped an artillery shell, exploding his calm resignation to his fate. "Mr. Ranunculus has taken ill and is not expected to recover. They're searching for a new Director of Tropical Plants to work in the Lister Botanical Gardens and Greenhouse. Your name was put forth."

"Mine." The depth of resources they possessed alone was enough to turn his head. To be a member of that institution—one that collected the greatest minds and the most obscure botanical specimens from all over the globe—would be an honor. To become one of its directors? He hardly dared hope they would ever consider him. His pulse jumped despite the impossibility.

Piyali shifted closer and the silver, metallic threads sewn into her bright skirt shimmered. Only then did he realize how overdressed she was for a walk in the woods. The moment he'd met her, his life had exploded into vibrant color. Without her, the intensity had slowly washed away... until now. He yearned to accept the offer, both her unspoken one and the directorship.

"I'm told your papers on the medicinal value of Brazilian flora are groundbreaking," Piyali cajoled.

They were, but he would never pass the interview process. They would note his reluctance to remove his gloves, to dig into the dirt with bare hands. No, he'd not be offered the position. Instead, he would find himself installed in the biological research laboratories as a specimen himself.

His stomach churned. He could not allow them to discover his secret. Notes scribbled as the shaman spoke about the curse indicated that Evan had a year. Perhaps two. In that time he needed to make arrangements for the support of his sister and grandmother, to explore the medicinal properties of the eighty-one novel plants he'd so carefully transported to Wales. To publish his results. He would not survive the intense scrutiny of Lister Laboratories.

As if she read his mind, Piyali said, "I'm afraid the clamor for one particular pharmacobotanist is loud. If you refuse, they may insist."

Imagining an entire suit-clad committee arriving in Aberwyn to inspect both him and his greenhouse painted a grim picture. His secret would be discovered. Better to trust one particularly insistent Lister University physician. He barked a laugh. Was defeat inevitable? "Come then, Piyali. Grab your bag."

Chapter 4

The moment Piyali entered the greenhouse, humidity began to curl the tendrils of hair that had escaped her braid during the frog hunt. Moisture gathered at her temples. “It’s amazing.”

She’d stepped into a traditional Welsh cottage of stone, through the large room—kitchen and living space—barely taking note of a large desk stacked with texts and papers, of a table and shelves covered with glassware and plant cuttings and chemicals. She’d hurried through to the back of the cottage, intent upon seeing the greenhouse Evan had described when they’d strolled the streets of London beneath the moonlight, speaking to each other of their pasts, of their hopes to balance careers and family in the future.

Slowly she turned about, staring in amazement. Great sheets of glass supported by an iron framework let in the fading beams of afternoon sunlight, and in the center, a leviathan of a stove burned large blocks of peat, churning out heat, intent upon defying the chill of a Welsh spring day. All about her, trees stretched their branches upward as vine upon vine twisted about their trunks, also stretching toward the sun. Exotic bushes and shrubby plants covered every inch of the ground, all but a narrow walkway that meandered between them. It was a lush, tropical paradise. Particularly as it came without the usual accompaniment of biting insect life. Her enthusiasm was dampened only by the knowledge that this must be where the blue frog with the toxic bite originated.

“It’s far more wonderful than you ever described.” She reached out with gentle fingers to stroke the soft petals of a beautiful, orange flower.

Catching her fingers, Evan shook his head in warning. “This one is safe. But remember my assignment was to collect potent flora. Not everything here is harmless, even to touch.”

“Much like its curator.” Her heart jumped as her eyes fell on his rumpled cravat, and her fingers ached with the memory of the last time she’d untangled its knot, pulling on its loose ends to bring his lips to hers. Did she dare? She lifted her gaze to his face. The corners of his mouth twitched with a suppressed smile. Progress.

“You smell of orange blossoms.” His gloved fingertip touched the glass vial that hung from a loop on her corset. “You kept it.”

Now was the time to revisit the past, before darker topics stole the moment. “Always,” she said, moving closer to rest her palm against the hard plane of his chest. “It’s my favorite scent. Ever since you gave me my first vial and informed me it was an aphrodisiac.” She tipped her face upward. “Is it working?”

“Too well.” His gloved hand tightened about hers. “It’s driving me insane.”

“Once you wouldn’t hesitate.” They’d shared stolen kisses in shadowed alcoves at any and every opportunity. She walked her fingers up his chest. “What happened? What could possibly be so awful that you would rather chase me away than confide in me, a woman you once asked to share your life?”

“Piyali,” he growled. “I can’t make promises anymore.”

“I’m not asking for one.” She slid her hand over the rough stubble of his cheek, its rasp triggering a flood of cherished memories. “Just a confidence, perhaps a kiss.”

Something deep inside him seemed to snap. Cupping the base of her skull with both hands, he dropped his lips to hers. Soft, warm, sweet. A gentle kiss that spoke of a longing ache finally satisfied. Then she parted her lips and reminded him that for too long, their hunger, their thirst for each other had gone unsatisfied.

His tongue dove into her mouth, devouring her, consuming her. Wrapping her arms about his waist, she pulled him closer, moaning encouragement as she pressed her breasts tight to his chest until she could feel his heart pounding.

Sparks flew. Five long years with an ocean between them. Not a single man compared to Evan. Not one of the many men who once pursued her had managed to hide his horror at the idea of a working wife. Not one had eyes that saw into her soul, causing her breath to catch, her heart to race in anticipation. This was why she’d waited.

“God, I’ve missed you,” Evan rasped as his mouth left her lips, trailing kisses along her jaw, her neck, sending shivers across her skin and a rush of warmth between her thighs. He slid his hands down her back to fall on her hips, yanking her tight against his own. Whatever it was that had kept him from her, it wasn’t a lack of attraction, for there was firm evidence of that.

Encouraged, she smiled against his neck. “We’ve waited forever,” she whispered, “to be alone like this.” She nibbled his earlobe. “Perhaps we could try a bed this time?”

A low rumble sounded in his chest. “Piyali, it’s near impossible to refuse you.”

“Then don’t.”

His hands loosened on her hips as he took a step backward, refusing to lift his eyes to meet hers. “We can’t. Not until—”

A loud knock sounded, and his head swiveled. Piyali wanted to scream in frustration. Not merely because she wanted to explore the advantages of a feather mattress with Evan, but because he’d been about to tell her what was wrong. If she knew what was broken, perhaps she could make repairs. She caught the edge of his chin in her palm. “Tell me. Until what?”

More knocking, this time louder and more frantic. “Mr. Tredegar!”

“Don’t,” she pleaded even as he turned toward the door connecting the greenhouse to the more traditional Welsh cottage.

“It’s Tegan,” he said. Regret softened his voice. “I can’t ignore her. The frog bite, it’s my fault. Or perhaps there’s been some injury to another within the village... Stay here. Don’t let her see you.”

Her face burned. “I won’t have what’s between us hidden away, Evan. Not this time.”

“I’m not ashamed,” he said. “I never was. But she’s a spiteful girl, always has been. Would you have the whole village know of our past before we sort out if there’s to be a future? It would compromise your entire investigation.”

Bang. Bang. “Evan!”

His fault. He’d said the frog bite was his fault. “You’ll tell me everything?” she asked.

His mouth opened, then closed. “I promise.”

For all that was worth.

Managing a tight nod, she conceded his point. “Fine.” She spun on her heel and moved deeper into the foliage, hiding like a shameful secret.

Evan opened the front door, and Tegan pushed past him, stomping into the small cottage. “What can I do for you, Miss Price?”

“A headache powder for Mrs. Lewis,” she answered, pacing about the room, stopping before his worktable to stare at the miscellaneous equipment—flasks, alcohol burners, glass distillation tubing, among others—gathered together, along with a number of various compounds extracted from tropical plants, ready for his next experiment. She waved at a mortar and pestle. “No, make that two.” Tegan pressed her hands to her temples.

Worry flared. He closed the distance between them to study her face. She seemed rather flushed, her eyes shadowed. What if the infection had spread to her blood? “Are you sick? Feverish? Does your ankle pain you?”

“I’m fine.” She waved a hand. “What pains me are the games we play, Evan.”

A whisper of worry snaked its way down his spine at the use of his given name. Rouge, not fever colored her cheeks and lips—and was that coal dust upon her eyelashes? Immediately, he regretted unlatching the door. “Games?” he repeated. “Miss Price, this is most improper.”

“It wouldn’t be improper,” Tegan fluttered her eyelashes in what must be an attempt at seduction, but only served to remind him that she was barely old enough for long skirts, “if you’d drop to one knee and offer that opal ring to me.”

He bit back a curse. “I—”

“I know you intend to offer for me.” She lifted her face. “You’ve been so patient, so solicitous of my fragile health, rushing to my side with a special ointment when that awful creature assaulted me in the woods.”

The bite of a frog was an assault? It sounded ridiculous, but given how the blue blemish would spread...

A strangled snort from the greenhouse had him reaching for Tegan's shoulder to steer her away from its entrance. "I'm sorry, Miss Price, if I've given you the wrong impression, but—"

"I'll make you the perfect wife, Evan." She lunged, flinging herself at him, and he was forced to catch the girl in his arms. "We shall run the most prosperous pharmacy in all of Cardiff. The sooner the banns are read, the sooner we can be together."

Aether, he'd sorely misjudged the love-sick glances she'd tossed him, chalking them up to a youthful infatuation that would pass. Gripping both of her shoulders firmly, he pushed her away. "I've no plans to marry. We cannot be together. You ought to go now, unless you still require headache powders?"

Her eyes filled with tears. Tears! How could he fix this?

"No," she sniffled. "No powders. Unless you've one for heartache?"

"Er."

Tegan ran for the door, flinging it wide. "When you realize your mistake, I'll be waiting. Waiting for you." With that dramatic aside, she ran from his cottage into the woods.

Strangled laughter burst from the greenhouse. Two dark eyes peeked around the door frame. "Oh you cruel, cruel man. How could you turn down such an impassioned plea?"

"Not funny." He ran a hand over the back of his stiff neck. "How am I to ever present myself at the town store again? Let alone examine her lesion?"

"You won't have to." Piyali glanced about as she stepped into the one large room that served as kitchen, living space and laboratory. What must she think of his primitive cottage? Of the uneven flagstones upon the floor, the cast iron stove crammed into an ancient hearth, little furniture beyond a desk, a rough wooden table and chairs? "I'll examine her lesion," she said. "And you need not stay in Wales. I hear there's a position available for a pharmacobotanist in London. That it's practically his for the asking."

She looked at him from beneath long eyelashes, and his mind flashed to his thick, feather mattress. There was nothing he'd rather do more than slide an engagement ring onto Piyali's finger, carry her upstairs to his bed. Then leave with her for London on a hunt for a special license followed by a visit to Mr. Black to accept the invitation to interview. Once she saw his hand, however... His stomach hurt as if he'd swallowed a solution of quicksilver salts.

Two paths lay before him.

Refuse to confide in her, and Piyali would summon Mr. Black. That would bring him under intense and unwanted scrutiny. It would, however, leave him time to excise Tegan's lesion and destroy the frog.

Or he could reveal his secret and beg for her help and silence. He lifted his eyes to meet her watchful gaze. Trained at the Université de Paris in infectious diseases, handed her own laboratory at Lister University and recruited to the Queen's agents, she was an expert in her field. If anyone could solve the mystery, he had no doubt it would be her.

He gave a stiff nod and, eyeing the terrarium where a certain shimmering frog crouched, tugged off his leather gloves. First the left—nothing unusual to see there—and then the right.

"It's blue!" Piyali gasped. "Your hand, the entire thing. Blue!"

That was the color of the moment. He rolled back the cuff of his shirtsleeves.

"Schistosomiasis!" Her hands clapped over her mouth as her impossibly wide eyes took in the disaster that had transpired. "How far has it spread?"

"Far," he said, yanking off his cravat and unbuttoning his collar. He tugged it aside so she could see how its tendrils crept across his shoulder toward the base of his neck.

"Does it hurt?" Her hand darted forward, then stopped, fluttering, uncertain if she should touch.

"No." Not physically. The anguish was entirely mental. "The infection is completely painless. A tiny bite by our tiny blue nemesis, and the next day I awoke with a lesion a half-inch in diameter. A day later, one inch. It had encompassed my entire hand and wrist by the time I compounded an ointment—the one I shared with Miss Price—that slowed its progress."

"Slowed," she repeated. Grief and heartache mingled on her face.

"So far I've only managed to delay the inevitable. There's a myth among the natives I studied with, it translates roughly as the 'Tribe of Invisible Devils'. Once bitten by the blue—sometimes invisible—frog, the curse overtakes the body, one limb at a time. Legend claims that when the disease consumes them, madness sends a man—or a woman—running into the rainforest never to be seen again. Many choose to take their lives rather than face that fate."

"And when it... consumes the entire body?" Piyali pressed a shaking hand to her throat as the full implications of his situation registered.

"Banishment." Wisps of a black fog began to cloud his mind as he stared down at his hand, at this now alien piece of himself. It was a daily struggle to reconcile himself to his future. "They can't allow a man—or woman—to remain within the tribe because with extreme or heightened emotion, the skin begins to glimmer, to color-shift and reflect the world about it."

"Making him—or her—invisible."

She had a beautiful, quick mind. "Exactly. And the tribe won't tolerate something it can't see. Ghosts. Devils. Call them what you will, they can no longer be a member of society. That is my fate. And the reason we can't marry. I may last a year, two." He lifted a shoulder, not wanting to upset her further by revealing his distress. "Perhaps five. But once the blue crawls up my neck, I'll no longer be fit for British society."

"Can I touch it—you?" she asked, reaching out again. "Is it contagious?"

"If it were, I'd never have allowed you to examine Miss Price." He held out his hand.

She cupped it gently in her palm, turning it over to study it from all angles. Determination injected steel into her voice. "I'll find a way to fix this. We'll find a cure. Together."

Hope had long since died. It lay, black and shriveled in a dusty, forgotten place. All that was left was to save others from a similar fate. He kissed her on her forehead, then dropped the other shoe. “You can’t tell Mr. Black.”

Jerking back, she released his hand, taking away the comforting warmth of her touch. He dared not reach for her. Not now. Emotion needed to be set aside. “But—”

“Imagine what Britain would do with such knowledge. Men—agents—would be purposefully infected, sent across borders. God forbid the technique fall into enemy hands. All because a small, blue frog hitched a ride on one of my plants. I’m begging you, Piyali. Better to destroy the frog and leave me—and Miss Price—to our ends.”

“Ends...” Wrapping her arms across her chest, she shook her head, unwilling to accept such a scenario. “It could take years. How do you propose to cope as whatever this is overtakes the both of you?”

“Excision of her lesion would be my first choice. Failing that, I could marry her.” Tegan would find it a bitter life. There’d be no romance, no pharmacy in Cardiff, no social interactions of any kind. Eventually, even her family would not be able to visit. “Hide her from society. You heard her, she’s amenable and already considered in fragile health.”

Piyali’s mouth tightened. “Yet you declined her.”

“I did.” Tegan was a constant thorn in his side. The only woman he wished to marry was Piyali. “But if it saves lives...”

“Unacceptable,” Piyali cut off his words. If anyone was to marry him, it ought to be her. How dare he suggest such steps? Tegan’s overt manipulations had been amusing until Evan raised it as a feasible option. But such messy emotions must be shoved aside; there was no time for them. They needed to take advantage of every moment left. “I refuse to abandon you to an uncertain fate.”

She spun on her heel to face the scarred wooden table that served as his workbench and studied his makeshift laboratory. A scale. Boxes and jars and tin containers filled with powders and oils and emollients. Bottles and flasks. Tubing and corks. All manner of titration and distillation equipment. An excellent chemistry setup, but not conducive to microbiology.

Evan followed her and began to clear one end of the table, his features set in stone. “Tell me what you need. If it’s not here, I’ll find it.”

She thought of the frog inside the terrarium. Calm, in safe and secure surroundings, it had returned to its lustrous blue color. She had to find a cure; the alternative was unacceptable. Gears spun in her mind. If infection was transmitted through a bite, that meant the contagion was contained within its saliva.

Ducking into the greenhouse, she retrieved her black bag and dug into it, pulling out a number of glass aetheroscope slides and cotton-tipped sticks. “To begin, we’ll need to swab the inside of the frog’s mouth—and biopsy its skin. Given its camouflage capabilities, I suspect the amphibian harbors the infectious agent throughout its entire body.”

So like him, always looking out for the welfare of others, putting her safety above his. But today it left a bitter taste in her mouth. If only he’d answered her message with the truth of his terrible situation. “I’ll set up my aetheroscope here.” She moved to the large desk, setting aside stacks of books and papers to claim a corner. “We’ll also biopsy your skin. Near the initial bite, further up your arm so that we might see if cell morphology alters over the progression, over the spread of the disease. And for comparison to Tegan’s biopsy.”

“The broken objective?”

“Will hinder our progress.” She pressed her lips together. Odds that Mr. Black would be able to send one in their direction any time soon were low. He’d made some quip about selkie trouble in the north and needing to travel to Scotland. His mission could take a day... or it could last for weeks, and she hated to leave Evan alone lest he take some drastic action. “Is there any chance of finding a replacement in Cardiff?”

“There is,” Evan answered. “Today, we collect evidence and, tomorrow, we’ll travel to Cardiff to gather necessary supplies?”

“Agreed.”

Piyali turned away, her grip tightening upon the swab she held. Conflicting loyalties battled in her mind. In Cardiff, there would be reliable skeet pigeons to hire. As a Queen’s agent, she was bound to report this development to Mr. Black, but what did she have beyond a fanciful tale of a rogue Amazonian frog prone to bite? Besides, this was Evan, and Mr. Black was likely still in Scotland. A few days of investigation would provide her with more data, more evidence. Her report could wait a few days.

Chapter 5

Piyali's wide smile set Mrs. Parker grumbling. Despite Evan's revelation, the prospect of spending a day at his side—this time in the open air and beneath the sunshine—had floated her mood into the upper aether, as if a curse placed upon them by some wart-nosed witch had lifted.

Yesterday, their heads together, they'd taken turns staring through her aetherscope at slide after slide after slide, until their eyes began to cross. The frog's saliva provided no answers. No visible micro-organisms writhed or wriggled beneath their view at which they could point fingers. All skin biopsies appeared—more or less—the same. Including that of the frog.

Nonetheless, they'd set up a number of cultures, using what was available from Evan's meager bachelor's kitchen stores, in an attempt to coax any infectious agent to grow and multiply.

Piyali had a favored hypothesis, but until she could obtain a higher resolution with her aetherscope, it was no better than wild speculation. If the organism responsible was intracellular, a replacement objective—along with a few additional specialized stains—would disclose its presence.

A grunt of irritation jerked her back to the moment, and a plate of oatcakes was slammed onto the table before her along with the tavern's ubiquitous ale. Mrs. Parker's expression suggested she hoped her breakfast guests would choke.

"For breakfast?" Piyali asked, eyeing the frothy, unfiltered drink.

"I suppose you're used to drinking tea." Mrs. Parker snarled the last word as if the beverage derived from a chamber pot. With a sneer, she dropped a copper tea kettle onto the range with a loud clang. "We aim to serve."

"Well, yes. Thank you." It was then that Piyali noticed Mrs. Parker's bandage was no longer confined to her fingers. It now wrapped about the entirety of her hand. Moreover, she pressed her hand to her waist as if its use pained her. "Perhaps I should look at your injury?"

Mrs. Parker's answering glare vibrated with barely-suppressed hostility.

"Mother." Sarah's voice cajoled as she crossed the room, "let her look. She is a physician. If it's infected, her attentions are better than Father's." She rolled her eyes. "Though I'm certain he exaggerated when he offered to lop off your finger."

The villagers seemed overly concerned with amputation, though the Parkers needled each other at every possible opportunity. Why on earth they'd chosen to marry was beyond her comprehension.

"I'm sure amputation won't be necessary," Piyali began diplomatically, "but infections shouldn't be left untreated. Mr. Tredegar is a competent pharmacist, Mrs. Parker. Today we are traveling to Cardiff, to his store. If you require an antibacterial—"

"Cardiff?" Her eyebrows arched toward her hairline. "Together? Alone?"

"Yes," Piyali answered. "I'm in need of supplies."

"No. That will not do. Sarah, get your bonnet. You must accompany them for propriety's sake."

Sarah's eyes brightened, but she glanced at Piyali and demurred. "I don't think my company is desired, Mother."

"Nonsense." Mrs. Parker waved her bandaged hand and winced. "I'll draw up a list of required items." She strode away before any further objections could be voiced.

"I'm sorry," Sarah sighed. "She pressures me daily to win Mr. Tredegar's regard. I promise not to be too obnoxious. Would it help if I promise to make myself scarce once we arrive? There's a book I wish to purchase at the booksellers and—wafts of aether—what I wouldn't do to escape Mother if only for a day." A mischievous look lit her face, and she leaned close, adding in a conspiratorial whisper. "I have to admit Tegan's jealousy would sweeten the trip just that much more."

Only rigid determination kept Piyali's shoulders from slumping. To invite Sarah along meant hiding—yet again—her rekindling relationship with Evan. A relationship that wouldn't have a chance if they couldn't concoct a cure. She wanted time with him, but maintaining Sarah's friendship and good graces was important. Particularly as her mother had acquired her infection at the fairy well before the Amazonian frog was apprehended. How else would she be informed about village affairs? And she had to admit, she liked the young woman. "Very well," she conceded, "but only if you answer one question about your mother."

"Oh?" Sarah looked as if facing her mother's irritation might be preferable. "What is it you want to know?"

"Nothing much. I'm a physician and can't help but care." More she was curious. "Her wound, is it blue?"

"Blue?" Sarah's face scrunched up as she thought. "No, not exactly, but it is spreading rather quickly. Her skin has taken on a rather odd appearance. I only glimpsed it, but I'd say it was pink and shimmery. The wound itself has mostly healed."

That fit. Mrs. Parker was nearly always in a foul mood. Shimmery and pinkish when feelings ran strong.

"Is that what's wrong with Tegan?" Sarah leaned closer. "The reason you're here? Is she—for once—truly sick?" She gasped. "Don't tell me her ankle is blue!"

Secrets in a village. One in exchange for another. Sharing that information went against all her medical training, but not necessarily that of the Queen's agents. "Cultivate the locals" was one of Mr. Black's favorite expressions. She needed to play along. Besides, Sarah had guessed. Was it wrong that deep in a corner of her soul she was enjoying this moment?

Pressing a finger to her lips, Piyali too leaned forward. “Shh. I never said a thing. Don’t let this become public knowledge.”

“Sarah,” Mrs. Parker bellowed. “Your bonnet. No daughter of mine shall freckle in the sun.”

Sarah winked, then hurried to her mother’s bidding.

A few minutes later, after forcing down a dry oatcake with weak tea, Piyali waited as Evan handed Sarah into the crank wagon. Resignation and reproach tugged his lips into a frown as he glanced at her sideways.

“I had to,” she whispered, noting how Sarah sat in the middle of the rough board that formed a seat. “An exchange of favors.” She pretended to stumble, bringing her mouth to Evan’s ear. “She doesn’t realize it, but her mother has also been bitten by the frog.”

He cursed under his breath. “You have Sarah spying for you?”

“A necessary step,” Piyali breathed back. “Mrs. Parker is refusing any and all treatment.” She hesitated. Much as she wished to dismiss this professional duty... “We ought to check on Tegan.”

“Already done,” Evan replied, taking Piyali’s medical bag to place it inside the cart. “Her condition remains unchanged. Now up, we’ve a long day ahead of us.”

As they drove away, a curtain twitched, and Piyali caught a glimpse of Tegan’s vexed face pressed to the window of the village store. Her pursuit of Evan was far from over.

The road to Cardiff was rutted and rocky, and Sarah—who had planted herself between him and Piyali—took every advantage to bump against him. Shoulders, hips, legs. Even her hand slid from her lap to press the side of her pinky finger to his thigh. Evan supposed he ought to be grateful that she didn’t outright climb into his lap. So much for enjoying the pleasant spring day with Piyali. His fault, he supposed, for refusing to reveal their relationship. From the amused press of her lips, she knew exactly what Sarah was up to. At least Miss Parker wasn’t demanding a proposal.

Relationship. He swallowed hard. A mistake. But with that kiss, a seed of hope had germinated. The oppressive feeling of doom and gloom had lifted—ever so slightly—as he unburdened his secrets. Still, there was a lingering feeling of melancholy, a certain pessimism that even if they managed to uncover the cause of his infection, they wouldn’t be able to formulate a treatment.

All night, he’d worried about bringing her into his confidence, not at all certain he had made the right choice. Now, with the unwelcome revelation that the frog had another victim, the situation threatened to grow out of hand.

He forced himself to listen to the women’s chatter.

“What book are you hoping to find in Cardiff?” Piyali asked Sarah.

“Well, I’m not certain.” Sarah fiddled with the ribbon at her chin. “Not exactly. Though I hope to find an intelligent husband,” she fluttered her eyelashes at Evan, “I thought I might follow your example and become a self-sufficient, career-minded woman.”

“Oh?” Piyali raised her eyebrows.

“I adore babies,” Sarah said, then addressed her next comment to him. “While I work to convince a handsome, young man to start a family of his own,” her eyelashes fluttered again, “I’m aiming to attend a woman’s college. There’s a school opening in Cardiff, and I mean to apply. Perhaps someday I might manage medical school. I hear there’s an entire field of medicine involving childbirth—obstetrics and gynecology.” Her brow wrinkled. “But first, I have to pass an entrance exam.”

Evan cleared his throat. “Hence the bookstore.”

“Yes. I won’t keep you from your errands, but perhaps you might recommend a few titles?”

Piyali rattled off a few, and it brought a certain measure of relief to know that Sarah was taking control of her future, beyond plaguing him with endless flirtations and shameless suggestions. Even though his ears began to burn as the two women discussed childbirth with much candor and detail. He squirmed on his seat.

He dropped Sarah off at the booksellers—with great relief—before continuing to his own store. “Was that necessary?”

She smiled and fluttered her eyelashes in imitation of Sarah. “Better than discussing the making of babies, was it not?”

Now he could think of nothing else. Could his face grow any hotter?

Ears burning, he redirected the conversation. “I hope you don’t mind, but I do have customers who will wish to consult a pharmacist. And, if you’re willing, a physician.”

“Of course.”

They rattled to a stop behind his store. Several long weeks had passed since he’d last visited his sister and mamgu, his grandmother. It was hard making constant excuses for his gloves but, when the worst came to pass, the business must support them, and for that, more preparation would be required. Only when he had no choice but to confide in them, would he reveal his blue appendage.

The moment his sister Megan realized it was him, not some delivery cart, she rushed from the service door. “Evan!” she exclaimed, throwing her arms about him. “And who is this?” she asked, knowing damn well exactly who Piyali was.

He hugged his mamgu, then performed introductions. “This is Dr. Mukherji, who has agreed to see a few patients. But don’t waste her time, make certain first that they are willing to trust in the expert advice of a woman.”

“I’m happy to assist in any way I can,” Piyali said.

His grandmother’s gnarled hands gripped Piyali’s. “A’i hon yw hi?” she asked. Is this her? His mamgu had insisted they learn the Welsh language when she came to live with them after diphtheria stole away most of his family. “The woman whose hand ought to wear opals and diamonds?”

Evan cleared his throat, replying in the same language. “Yes. Perhaps. There are complications to resolve first.”

His sister’s eyes widened.

Piyali turned to him with raised eyebrows. Unfair, using Welsh to speak around her in this manner.

“We have much to talk about, Dr. Mukherji,” Megan said, switching the conversation back to English. “The moment word gets out, our shop will be overrun today by people seeking your combined expertise. Evan, did you bring more of that miraculous eczema cream? One child in particular is in desperate need.”

“I did. Among other things.” He reached into the bed of the wagon and handed her a jar. “Before I tie on an apron and set to work, I need to escort Dr. Mukherji across town. She’s in need of a specialized piece of medical equipment that might prove difficult to find.”

“Oh, no you don’t, Evan,” Megan chided as she untied her apron and pressed it into his hands. “The list of items you need to attend to here is longer than my arm. Step to it. I’ll take Dr. Mukherji to Colonel Pickering’s. If anyone’s likely to have medical devices, it’ll be him.”

His sister would spend the entire trip quizzing Piyali about... well... all things related to that opal ring. He opened his mouth to object, but Megan gave him no choice. She slid her arm through Piyali’s and dragged her down the street peppering her with questions.

Though Piyali glanced back at him over her shoulder with pleading eyes, she was a trained Queen’s agent. With a pistol on her hip. He had every confidence she would survive the interrogation. Better her than him.

“While we hunt down this aetheroscope attachment piece,” Megan said, her arm tight, offering Piyali no illusion of escape as she turned into a delightful shopping arcade, “might we discuss weddings?”

Her stomach dropped. If Evan had mentioned her, that he planned to marry, that conversation lay far in the past. A wedding was not at all a certainty now, though she desperately hoped to one day call Megan her sister.

“You’re engaged?” Piyali deflected, as a touch of panic crept its way up into her throat. “Many congratulations! Who is the lucky man?”

“Not me,” Megan laughed. “Though I’ve suitors aplenty, I’ve yet to find one who makes my heart beat faster.” She squeezed Piyali’s arm tighter. “Yours. To my brother. He teased us before leaving for Brazil, telling us only that his future bride was an Indian woman born in Calcutta. I’ve studied the wedding traditions. A red gown—a sari—embroidered in gold is traditional, correct? Will you arrive in a palki?”

“A sedan chair? Through the streets of London?” Piyali cringed in horror, though she wouldn’t put it past Ma to try to arrange such an event. A quick simple ceremony in the front parlor would suit her much better. She looked at Megan’s face, so full of excitement, and sighed. Perhaps a small, traditional ceremony. Oh, who was she kidding? Small meant hundreds of people, even if her mother was forced to confine the event to the ballroom of her London townhouse. None of which would happen if she couldn't save Evan. "I'm afraid we've rather a serious obstacle in our path. I can't share the details with you. Suffice it to say we need that aetherscope objective badly."

"Are you ill?" Megan's eyes widened. "Is Evan?"

"Something like that. I'm sorry. I'm sworn to secrecy." By the Queen's agents, by Evan himself. Pulled in two directions, Piyali had a nagging suspicion her loyalty to both would soon be put to the test. Always, her career was a wedge between them.

She pressed her hand against a Babbage card tucked into a pocket, a card that could send a skeet pigeon winging in the direction of Mr. Black. Guilt weighed heavily upon her, but to send a message so soon would be disloyal to Evan. Three months he'd struggled on his own. She could give him a few more days. Then, if they still had no answers, she would have no choice.

"I'm doing my best to help him. If all goes well..."

For several steps, Megan was silent. "I can't lose my brother. He hates to speak about it, but illness is what carried away our family."

Evan had confided the story to Piyali one dark night as they walked through Hyde Park. Her heart squeezed at the memory of his tale. He'd been fourteen years of age when his father, mother, two brothers and a sister all died within the space of a month. He, Megan and his grandmother alone had survived.

"My family suffered a similar fate. I lost an older sister, a younger brother, and my father to diphtheria as well." Baba. She'd been so young—all of five years—that they were no more than a fuzzy memory. Was it better—or worse—to have crystal clear memories of how it had once been? "For a while, it was awful." She remembered Ma's grief. "Then my mother met my stepfather who brought us here. He's given me everything, including two little sisters, and the love of a father."

Megan reached out and squeezed her arm. "I'm sorry."

Piyali gave a tight nod. Their losses were the reason for both Evan's chosen profession and for her own, for the drive that pushed them both to seek to cure all manner of infections. She changed the subject. "How did you convince Evan to accept the grant to travel to Brazil? He almost turned the committee down, he was so worried about leaving you and your grandmother behind, unprotected."

"Yes, always worried for my future," Megan scoffed. "How? I threatened, at the age of sixteen, to wed a man twice my age to ensure my so-called security. As he did not care much for Mr. Jones, after much heated discussion, he agreed to leave me with Grandmother." She rolled her eyes. "For the sake of appearances, a cousin looked in on us during his time abroad, providing that all-so-necessary male authority."

They shared a knowing look as they came to a stop before a shop. Emblazoned across the storefront in gilded lettering: Colonel Pickering & Company's Scientific Gadgetries and Curiosities. Dusty, dark and dimly lit. Piyali squinted through a window pane and came face to face with the stuffed head of a quail sewn onto the neck of a squirrel. The chimera wore a miniature tiara. Such... décor did not provide her with much hope for scientific equipment, at least, not equipment that functioned.

“He keeps the legitimate items in the back, away from sticky fingers,” Megan said, reading her mind. They stepped inside. Useless oddities of all kinds were mounted upon display counters, the better to lure in the gullible. But in the back, boxes upon boxes were stacked from floor to ceiling. Perhaps there was some hope. A man emerged from a back room. “Colonel, we have need of a...”

“Crystalline aetheric objective,” Piyali finished.

“Right this way, dearies.” The colonel’s eyes twinkled behind a mass of grizzled facial hair, and she suspected he grinned at the thought of lightening her pockets by several pounds.

Chapter 6

After a long day of patient consults of ailments ranging from croup to toenail fungus—during which mild suspicion of her origins had been overcome by the promise of pain relief and treatment—Piyali was exhausted and all too happy to climb back onto Evan’s crank wagon and head for Aberwyn. This time, he arranged for her to sit between him and Sarah.

Not that such a maneuver stopped the other woman. Setting down a stack of thick, paper-wrapped textbooks, Sarah exclaimed, “Oh, no! My gown!” Her fingers fluttered over a dark smudge upon her bodice, drawing attention to its low-cut neckline. “Mother will have a fit!”

Beside her, Evan sighed. He tugged a handkerchief from his waistcoat and passed it to Piyali. “Here. Save her from her mother’s wrath.” He kept his eyes carefully focused upon the road before them. “Please.”

“It’s probably only a touch of dust, most likely from the bookstore,” Piyali said, using the square of linen to brush at the smudge, but her efforts only seemed to grind the dirt into the pale, pink fabric. “Um.”

“Let me.” Sarah snatched the handkerchief from her and made far better progress. “Did you find what you needed?”

“We did,” Piyali answered. In a dark, dusty recess of Colonel Pickering’s storage room. She’d all but given up hope. Just as they’d been about to try another store, the wizened old man had stumbled—coughing—out from among a pile of dusty boxes holding aloft a small box. Inside, an older model of the objective lay nestled in cotton batting. With luck it would be adequate. She clutched it in her lap now, wrapped and padded against the rigors of traveling over rock-studded roads.

After a few more awkward moments during which Sarah made several unsuccessful attempts to flirt with Evan, Piyali—tired though she was—attempted to buoy her spirits by suggesting a tutoring session. Gleefully, Sarah unwrapped one of her books—a chemistry text—and by the time they arrived at the tavern, they had explored John Dalton’s atomic theory, the periodic table of the elements, and the concept of whole-number ratios forming chemical compounds.

“I predict a successful admissions exam,” Piyali said, impressed. “You’ve a sharp mind and will go far.”

Sarah drew her shoulders back at the compliment. Had anyone ever praised her for her mind?

Given her buxom milkmaid appearance and the bar's clientele, the likely answer was no. "Mother would be furious if she learned of my plans, so tell no one. Better she believes I'm reading penny dreadfuls. You go in first, I'll scurry behind and hide these textbooks away."

Evan, who had been largely silent the entire ride home, spoke. "Dr. Mukherji shall accompany me to my laboratory." He walked about the wagon to offer the young woman a hand down. "We've a bit of a mystery to unravel."

Sarah tipped her head. "As in experimental?" Piyali nodded and Sarah's face grew somber as she hopped from the cart. "I admit, I'd love to see Tegan fall face-down in a mud puddle. But not die from some obscure infection. Is it serious?"

"It is," Piyali said and pressed a finger to her lips. "Shh. Not a word to anyone." After moment's hesitation, she added, "Keep an eye on your mother."

Frowning, Evan climbed back onto the cart. He gripped the steering wheel and released the break, setting the crank wagon lumbering along the road. "She's a terrible gossip."

"She guessed," Piyali defended. "And knows nothing about the frog."

They drew up before his stone cottage with its moss-covered slate roof. She barely spared it a glance as she waited for Evan to unlock the door before hurrying to her aetherscope at his desk. Time was of the essence. A remedy was desperately needed, and, if she could solve this quickly and present a cure, perhaps Mr. Black wouldn't relieve her of her weapon and consign her to her laboratory.

Conscious of the Babbage card she'd elected not to employ, Piyali wasted no time replacing the broken objective. She had a glass slide prepped and ready before she noticed Evan was not at her side. She looked up to find him frowning at the shelves that held jars and boxes of his chemicals and concoctions. "Is something wrong?" she asked.

"Someone has been here in our absence," he stated, gloves clutched tightly in one hand. "The nah-puh-de-ot ought to be next to the o-ko-ne-de-kuh, in clear alphabetical order. Look," he pointed, "this jar, it's been rotated such that the label is not easily readable."

"Theft?" Piyali had no idea what those plants were, but if he was concerned... "But the cottage is locked." Her forehead wrinkled. She'd seen the advanced lock he'd installed, both on the greenhouse door and the cottage door. "Quite securely." An agent might be able to break it, but it wouldn't be easily cracked by someone in search of free medication.

"So it is." Evan lifted each jar, examining its contents, replacing it upon the shelf. "I've not a clue who would go to such lengths. I've always reduced—or outright refused—payment if a client couldn't afford it." He set down the final jar with a grimace. "The minute a medication proves successful, I provide as much product as the plant's growth will bear."

"Has anything like this, anything unusual, occurred before?"

His brow furrowed.

"What is it?"

“Last week, the night before Tegan was bitten, I found the door to my greenhouse ajar. I installed the lock the next day, but I expect it’s how the frog escaped.”

“Frog!” Piyali jumped to her feet and ran into the greenhouse, Evan following close behind. The frog still crouched in its terrarium, safe, happy and blue. “Thank goodness.” The frog was not involved. She dug for an explanation. “You have a number of projects underway, all experimental. Have you boasted of initial success to anyone in so much as a simple letter?” Piyali went still as her words loomed between them, a specter from their past. She swallowed nervously.

“I’m sorry,” Evan said, his gray-blue eyes softening as they focused upon her. “I didn’t know what to say... I didn’t want to drag you into this disaster, and then I decided it was best if I didn’t write at all. I should have replied, I should have said... something. Can you forgive me?”

Could she? All too easily. But if they couldn’t solve this... problem, if she reported it to Mr. Black, could he forgive her? “Of course,” she whispered.

His hand glimmered with heightened emotion, and he reached for her and caught her hand. Heat shimmered in his eyes. “Come with me, upstairs.”

“Not yet.” Her entire body—ablaze with heated anticipation—objected to her words, but her brain insisted. “First, I want answers.” The question would nag at her until it was answered. She smiled coyly. “Only then can I give you my full attention.”

“Work before play.” He stroked his thumb across her palm, sending a shiver down her spine. “I gather the new objective is installed and ready for use?”

“All I need is a fresh biopsy,” she stuttered.

“Then grab your razor.” His voice rasped across her skin. “At the moment, there’s only one thing I’d like better than a definitive diagnosis.”

Minutes later, perched on a chair before the desk, she slid the prepared slide into the aether chamber and screwed in a canister of compressed gas. The seal popped and a low hiss indicated the chamber was filling. Staring through the eyepiece, she first brought his skin biopsy into focus using the lower magnification objectives, finally spinning in the new high-powered lens and carefully adjusting focus.

There lay the answer. But only part of it. She stared, not quite able to believe her vision wasn’t playing tricks upon her. This shouldn’t be possible, not in a mammalian species.

Evan cleared his throat, then spoke with an unsteady voice. “What is it?”

Piyali lifted her gaze to his. “It’s your melanocytes.”

He shook his head. “I only know plant histology.”

“Your epidermis, the top layer of your skin, is comprised of several layers dominated by keratinocytes—layers upon layers of flattened cells. Tucked among the cells in the basal layer—the deepest layer of the epidermis—are cells known as melanocytes. These are the cells that produce a protein responsible for skin pigmentation called melanin. Normally, the pigment is of a brown or black color.”

Understanding dawned on Evan's face. "Are you telling me that my affected skin has blue melanin?"

"Not exactly," she hedged. "It's iridescent, and I wouldn't call the pigment melanin. In any case, that's not what the cells are making, not anymore. They're producing an entirely different substance."

Running a finger beneath his collar, he asked, "Do you know what it is?"

"Yes. I've seen this before, but never in humans. Guanine crystals appear to have replaced your normal pigment."

"Guanine crystals." Confusion creased his brow.

"You've seen the effect before, in fish most likely," she said. "The silvery flash of scales as they swim. More tropical varieties can produce stunning shades of a variety of colors—blues, reds, yellows. It's also common in reptiles and amphibians. Normally, however, the colors are static. In your case, however, the angle of the crystal can change, altering the color of light that is reflected back."

Evan swore and stabbed his fingers into his hair. "I'm a bloody chameleon?"

"Of course not. But your comparison is apt in that you do possess the ability to color shift. Some scientists hypothesize that the flat, plate-like crystals are stacked, one upon another into a kind of lattice that can be actively adjusted."

"Which would explain why the infected members of the tribe, when angry or upset or afraid, would disappear into the rainforest." He threw a hand in the air and began to pace. "They were simply mirroring all the colors around them."

"I expect so." Her mouth tugged into a frown. How to break it to him?

"I don't like your expression, Piyali." He closed his eyes for a brief moment. "I'm not going to like this, am I? Maybe I should just look."

"Wait." She put her hand over the eyepiece. "There's good news and bad news." Evan groaned. "I've found the organism responsible. You have an intracellular parasite. It's not transmissible because it's creeping along beneath your skin at the basal layer."

"A parasite?" He grimaced, rubbing his shimmering hand. "Please tell me that's the bad news."

"I'm afraid not," she said. "The bad news is that I've never seen—or heard—of anything like it. But now that we can see it, we'll be able to quickly determine if any of the chemicals and drugs are taking effect."

"Let me see if I have this straight." He pinched the bridge of his nose. "An intracellular parasite entered my skin via a frog's bite. This tiny creature worked its way into my melanocytes, somehow altering the chemical makeup of my melanin—or replacing it, turning it blue."

It was more than simple replacement, but the description was apt. "Unless you're affected by strong emotion as you are now," she reminded him, recalling the first time she'd seen his hand color shift. It was the moment she'd realized there was still hope for them.

"At which point I shimmer pink and silver like a soap bubble." His lips twisted and his voice was wry. “How very lovely. If we manage to kill this parasite—”

Reaching out, she placed her hand on his arm. There was nothing she wouldn’t do to solve this, to find a way to stop this parasite. “We will.”

He raised an eyebrow in doubt. “If. Will my skin return to its normal color?”

“I don’t know,” she admitted. “Perhaps, if the presence of a living parasite is necessary to provide the melanocyte with whatever code is necessary to produce guanine crystals... or it might be permanent. Either way, if we stop it now—”

“At least my face won’t turn blue.”

As long as he was hers, Piyali didn’t much care what color his skin turned. Not that such a declaration would bring him any relief. If brown skin placed one on the edge of respectability, blue skin... Well, who wanted to be treated like a carnival side show?

When Evan finally peered through the eyepiece of Piyali’s aetherscope, he could hardly believe that such small, cigar-shaped creatures were the cause of all his problems. The biopsied melanocytes collected from his hand contained but one or two parasites, but those cells collected closer to his shoulder—where the infestation continued to spread toward his neck—were teaming with the creatures, all creeping toward the front edge poised for migration.

He imagined them crying out, “Onward and upward!” It seemed the only thing slowing them down was the ointment he’d concocted. Some component of that compound contained toxins. If they could isolate it, then concentrate it, perhaps there was a chance of ending—if not completely reversing—this nightmare.

Only then could she again be his.

Grabbing a machete, he stalked into the greenhouse to cut down one of the many khu-neh-ari lianas tangling through overhead branches.

“Evan,” she said quietly, following him. He could tell from her voice that she was about to broach an uncomfortable topic. “I know you wish to keep this secret—and why. I’ve not contacted Mr. Black, but if we can’t devise a cure and soon, I’ll need to let him know. With all of Lister University’s resources, with all their chemists working on this, progress will be fast.”

She wanted him cured. Given how his heart ached at the thought of a life without her, he understood. Not enough, however, to place a powerful, infectious biological agent into the hands of the government. It would be misused. Of that he was certain.

“A few days,” he hedged, slicing through the fibrous vines of the climbing shrub, a liana, and handing her a segment. With luck, perhaps they could avoid this argument. “This is the khu-neh-ari plant, the one I used to make the ointment.”

As she studied the leafy vine in her hand, lines of worry carved themselves between her eyebrows. “How do we go about this?” she asked. “Sorting one component from another.”

“Chromatography. Extraction and isolation of components. Distillation. Testing—over and over and over until we find the right dose, the right combination.” He cut free another branch and handed it to her. “I was taught to boil the leaves for two days, adding a handful of large stinging ants. I have a limited supply of those in dried form.”

Piyali gagged. “Along with eye of newt and wing of bat?”

He grinned. “The ointment works, doesn’t it?”

“Not quite well enough.” A determined look was back in her eyes. Cure him she would.

God, I hope so.

A glimmer of moonlight fell upon her cheek. Instead of reaching for another branch, he stroked her skin, that silky, smooth slope, with the back of his finger. “I never stopped loving you, Piyali, not once. Every night I would climb into my hammock beneath swaths of mosquito netting and think of nothing but returning to you.”

Pressing his hand against her face, she looked up into his eyes with such sadness. “Then why hide this from me?”

“I didn’t know if it was contagious. I didn’t know how fast it would spread, how quickly it would consume me. Like me, you watched your own family die, one person at a time. I didn’t want you to have to endure that again, watching a loved one die, unable to do anything.” It was why he’d tossed his reply to her into the fire, abandoning all hope of a wife and family. “It was hell.”

“But you wouldn’t have wanted to be anywhere but at their side. When you didn’t answer, when the skeet pigeon didn’t return, I thought...” A tear slid from the corner of her eye and Evan’s heart almost broke, and his lungs felt heavy, as if they might fail to inflate. “I thought you’d realized I was a mistake, that you’d come home to find a Welsh girl from your childhood had grown into the woman of your dreams.”

“Never.” He threw aside the machete and brought his other hand to her face. “You are everything to me. I thought it better if I simply disappeared from your life.” His thumb brushed aside a new tear. “You have so much potential, so much talent, hiding here—with me—in the forests of Wales would be the world’s loss. I was so proud when I heard you’d won a laboratory of your own at Lister University.” He smiled. “And now you’re a Queen’s agent with a pistol on your hip... it makes you irresistible.”

An answering smile tugged at her rosy, full lips. “Irresistible?”

The experiments could wait. Evan pulled the cut branches from her hands and tossed them in the general direction of the cottage door. He hauled her up against his chest and kissed her exactly as he’d dreamed about doing all those nights alone in the rainforest. She tasted soft and sweet—of everything that meant home.

Moaning, Piyali parted her lips and ran her hands over the linen of his shirt, making appreciative sounds as she explored the shape of his muscles. As his tongue delved deeper their kiss grew hungrier, touching a match to dry tinder.

Heat shot down his spine, gathering low. Kissing her wasn't enough. He needed her silky, bare skin sliding against his own, and there would be no focusing on anything else until such primal demands were met.

He dragged his mouth from hers. "Not here."

"Why not? The cloakroom didn't stop you." Her voice held a breathless note, as her fingertip traced the blue tendrils that radiated from his shoulder across his chest and about his neck. "You've no need to hide anything from me."

Even at his most vulnerable, laid bare before her eyes, she made him feel whole. Scooping her into his arms, he carried her back into the cottage and up the stairs. "Those walls weren't glass, and this time I want to see everything."

Chapter 7

Everything.

Nervous embarrassment hovered in her eyes, but she was no innocent. Their encounter in the Pharmacological Society's shadowy cloakroom—their joining desperate and frantic and wonderful—had seen to that. He'd clung to that memory, a memory he'd unsuccessfully tried to cram into a dark corner of his heart and lock away. His groin throbbed with need, but as much as he wanted to be inside her again, this time he wanted to see her.

He set her down on the edge of his bed and knelt before her to unlace her knee-high leather boots, but the way she bit her lower lip made his fingers pause as conflict gripped him. "I can only promise you today. If that's not enough, we'll stop." Though he might explode with the effort.

"I'm not asking you for forever." Piyali threaded her fingers through his curls and tipped his face upward. "Don't stop. Even if everything falls apart, I want this. Here. Now."

"Good. Because I don't think I can manage to wait much longer." He yanked the boots from her feet and threw them aside. His own shoes joined them. Without bothering to fully unbutton his shirt, he dragged it over his head. She shifted to unbuckle her corset, then, unclasping hooks, she slid her choli down her arms, leaving herself bare to the waist.

He let out a low whistle. "I knew I was missing out last time. So beautiful," he murmured, sweeping his palm over her breast as her nipples puckered under his gaze, "and begging for attention." Dipping his head, he caught the tight bud between his lips and sucked. With a moan, she gripped his head, holding him close.

Her back arched. "Oh, Evan!"

Cries of pleasure that had haunted his dreams fell from her lips, and he lapped in each one even as an unwanted thought crept into his mind. She was not his to keep. Not yet. Perhaps never. This explosion of longing, these shared moments of intimacy might be their last. All the more reason to treasure every one. Inhaling her sweet scent, he sent his hands wandering over the dips and curves of her body.

Hands. Hers were on his shoulders now, sliding over his biceps, then gripping his muscles. With the edge of his teeth, he scraped the tip of her nipple and was rewarded with a tight gasp—and the sharp bite of her nails into his skin. A heartbeat later and her fingers trailed over his chest, landing on the top button of his trousers, loosening it. He wanted this to last, but it wouldn't. Not if she wrapped her hands around his hard length. With a gentle push, he sent her falling backward onto the thick, down-filled mattress.

"You first." Bending over, he slid his hands over her soft skin, catching at the drawstring of her lehenga. A quick tug with his fingers, and the garment loosened. With a gentle kiss to her navel, he whisked away the satiny garment and lay her bare to his view. But before he could return his mouth to her skin, she rolled onto her side, propping herself on one elbow. Her long braid fell over her shoulder, and she toyed with its end, unfastening the tie that held the plaits in place.

"Take them off," she said, her eyes slightly unfocused. "You're not the only one who wants to look." She ran her fingers through her hair, freeing its long, silky lengths. "Take them off and join me."

All too happy to oblige, he yanked his trousers off and climbed onto the bed, stretching out beside her and skimming his hand over the curve of her hip. "So soft."

"So long," she said, her voice sultry as she traced his length. He clenched his jaw, wanting her touch but desperately trying to maintain control. His member throbbed as her slender fingers wrapped about him. "So thick and hard." Her flashing eyes teased. "Remind me how we fit together, for it doesn't seem possible."

"No?" He caught her wrist. Much more of that and he wouldn't last long enough to slide inside her. Encircling both wrists with one hand, he rolled her onto her back—then lifted her arms above her head, thrusting her gorgeous breasts upward. "Let me remind you." He brushed a finger across the soft curls at the apex of her thighs, then slipped a fingertip along the seam of her wet heat. Her well-kissed lips parted and her breath came faster as he circled her center. "Remembering now?"

Eyes closed, her dark lashes fanned across her cheeks. "A glimmer," she breathed, tipping her hips and parting her knees. "But I recall a bit more depth to your explorations."

Nipping the delicate skin of her neck, he laughed against her skin, then slid a finger deep inside her hot, wet channel. "Like this?" he asked, pushing slowly in and out of her. He watched, greedy for the vision of her pleasure. Their first time together had been one of touch and taste—he'd missed the sight of her hips flexing against his hand, her back arching, her heels digging into the mattress.

"More," she gasped. "All of you, Evan. Fill me."

In no frame of mind to deny such a plea, he rolled, dragging her with him, across him, crushing her heavy breasts to his chest. Her hips to his. Needing to be inside her, he guided her leg over his hip.

"You want me... on top?" She rose up onto her knees, straddling him, lowering herself onto his throbbing member. Long, dark hair fanned about her face and over her shoulders, its ends a gentle tease against his hot skin. His breath caught as she flexed her hips, gliding her wetness over his arousal. "Like this?"

He groaned, and his answer was strangled, but he managed a retort. "Exactly that way, but with more depth." It was her turn to laugh as he reached for a paper package upon his bedside table and pressed the sheath into her hand. No good pharmacist should be without one. He'd snatched a box at the store, hoping... “Cover me, then take me inside you.”

Sweet torture, her soft hands moving over his stiff rod. He dug his fingers into the sheets, fighting a need to surge upward. At last, she notched him against her opening and took a few inches of him inside. Slowly, she pulled away before easing him back into tightness and wet heat.

“Oh, yes,” she said, spreading her thighs wider, sinking onto him and finally, finally, finally taking him fully within her. “This is the delicious fullness I remember,” she said, her voice a low purr.

With a growl, he jerked his hips upward. “There’s more moving involved.”

“Is there?” she teased, holding perfectly and painfully still. She leaned forward onto her hands and took his lips with hers. A deep, soul-shattering kiss. He let go of the bed and pulled her face to his. As they kissed, her hips began to move, slowly at first, rising and falling upon his length until he tore his mouth away on a groan.

Reaching between them, he pressed a thumb to her swollen bud, and her hips bucked, taking him deeper. “Yes!” She threw her head back. Waves of hair tumbled over her shoulders as her back arched, tipping her breasts upward. Piyali, wild and beautiful. An image he’d never forget. “Oh, God, Evan. Don’t stop.”

His body tightened, tension coiling at the base of his spine, but he held back, wanting to wait until she found her pleasure. He clenched his jaw, trying to hold on, but he wasn’t going to last much longer. She was so perfect and it had been so long. Too long. He gripped her hips, his fingers digging into the soft flesh of her buttocks, and buried himself in her.

“Yes!” she cried.

Her hips jerked against his, and her sheath clenched about his shaft while her face contorted with pleasure. At last, he let himself go, diving deep to bury himself within her. His climax tore through him, his heart pounding wildly as he plummeted over the edge.

She collapsed onto his chest, her hair falling about them like a curtain, shutting out the world so that only the two of them were left. He wrapped his arms about her waist, holding her tight as their ragged breaths slowly returned to normal.

“I love you so much, Piyali,” he whispered, brushing a strand of hair from her face. Long ago he’d professed his love, and he’d not hold it back from her now. Not when it was the only thing he could give. He couldn’t promise her forever, not yet, but she should know that she would always have his heart.

She loved him too. But the words wouldn’t pass her lips. Suppressed anger that he’d not called upon her for help the moment he’d known something was wrong? Or the nagging feeling of disloyalty to the Crown? It was a most uncomfortable position. She ought to report her findings concerning the origins of the blue lesion. But to do so was to betray Evan’s confidence.

Or was it simply that she could only offer such words to someone who promised her forever, no matter how short forever was? A promise he would not make. Not yet.

Lying here curled in his arms, body and emotions laid bare, she couldn't bring herself to speak, to destroy the illusion that all was well. But even now, even as his glimmering fingers traced a slow, seductive path over the dip of her waist, the curve of her hip, her mind puzzled over how the infection might—at the very least—be stopped in its tracks. For it had to be stopped. This intracellular parasite could not be allowed to steal away her heart's desire.

"We need to get back to work," she said, breaking the silence. She rolled away, reaching for her discarded lehenga choli. "At some point, Mr. Black will take note of my failure to report." While she was willing to delay that particular missive, she would not compose an outright lie.

Evan groaned, but he too pried himself from the mattress and stood, discarding the sheath. "The minute we solve this problem, I'm dragging you back to bed—and we're staying there. For hours, if not days."

Glancing over her shoulder, she treated herself to one last glimpse of his toe-curling physique. Her heart leapt at the dark and sultry look he cast in her direction, a contemplation of all manner of erotic activities. The muscles of his broad shoulders, of his defined pectoral muscles shifted as he tugged on his shirt. Tempting, to reach out with her fingertips and trace the ridges of his stomach that marched downward toward a resurging interest in bedroom activities.

"Then let's begin." After dressing, she padded down the stairs and crossed to the iron stove, adding a block of peat to the fire and setting a pot of water onto the range. "Boiling leaves and dried ants. Primitive. My mentors would recoil in shock and horror." But not her dida. How many times had Piyali watched her grandmother boil methi—fenugreek—to make tea for settling her stomach and balancing her blood? Though in this particular case, dida's bottle of neem oil might prove more useful as an anti-parasitic.

"Back to the basics, with refinement to follow." Evan's voice rumbled over her skin, a sensual distraction she forced herself to ignore—until he caught her in his arms for one last kiss, leaving her breathless, her determination to resist his charms cracking and crumbling. "I'll gather the khu-neh-ari branches," he said, then took himself off to the greenhouse.

Fanning her hot face with her hand, Piyali examined the shelves of his supplies, contemplating a variety of options. Pharmacology was not her specialty, but she knew the basics, and so—braiding her hair and knotting a string about its end—began to gather any and all supplies that held even the faintest promise of a cure. Bottles and jars accumulated: black drawing salve, boric acid, calamine, castor oil, chaulmoogra oil, copper sulfate, gentian violet, iodine, mercurous chloride, sulfur, turpentine...

Hours later, glass Petri dishes covered the table's surface. Each held a small sample of biopsies of Evan's blue skin to which a variety of treatments—botanical and chemical—had been applied. Including the leaf and ant concoction. Conditions weren't perfect, but it was the best they could do without a fully outfitted laboratory. The heat of the stove would keep the cultures warm, if not exactly at body temperature. Piyali clung to the hope that one of their makeshift experiments would yield results.

Now they waited.

“Evan,” she said, slipping behind him to wrap her arms about his waist and press the side of her face to his broad back. She choked out words her heart advised against. “It’s nearly midnight. I need to go back to the tavern.” By now Sarah—and the entire village—would have taken note of her failure to return, and she did not wish to antagonize them.

“Stay.” He wrapped a strong hand around hers.

“I shouldn’t. You know as well as I that gossip will be bubbling. If you want to conceal our relationship, that isn’t the way of going about it.” Agreeing to the here and now hurt, but if it was all they’d ever have, she would grab it with both hands. However, there was his sister to consider. Though she hesitated to broach the topic, she forced the words past her lips. “Without a wedding on the horizon, gossip will wend its way to Cardiff and impact Megan’s future.”

He sighed, but nodded. “I’ll walk you back.”

Ignoring the ache in her heart, Piyali lifted her bag and followed Evan out onto the moonlit path that wended its way down the hillside. Halfway, a flickering glow illuminated the forest glen and the fairy well it cradled.

Swearing beneath his breath, Evan came to a sudden stop. His arm looped about her as she stumbled into his solid form.

“What is it?” she whispered into his ear.

“Wait.” Curiosity pricked, and she stepped past him, creeping closer to the well, taking care to stay well-hidden behind a nearby tree.

A number of young women—including Sarah and Tegan—gathered in a circle about the pool of water, looking remarkably serious. Each held a flickering candle in their left hand and pinched something between their right forefinger and thumb. With a glint of silver, one girl tossed her offering into the well, murmuring something—Welsh from the sound of it—and peered into the moonlit pool. There was a collective inhale, a holding of breaths, then a giggle, a blush and the announcement of a name. “Luc.”

“What on earth are they doing?” Piyali whispered as the next woman stepped forward. A time-honored ritual, but to what end?

“Tonight’s the night when a maiden can toss a bent pin into the well to ask the gwragedd annwn to show them the face of their future husband.”

“Gwragedd annwn?” Piyali tried to wrap her tongue around the strange Welsh words and failed.

“The water-sprite, a kind of fairy, that lives in this well. A few would even have you believe that a woman can—with the right words and offerings—coax the water-sprite into delivering the man of her choice into her arms.” He scoffed. “Sheer nonsense.”

“They seem quite serious,” Piyali observed, intrigued by the age-old custom and the seriousness of the ceremony.

“Mmm,” Evan answered.

Sarah’s turn arrived. She mouthed the words, tossed the pin, but instead of bending over to look, tossed in a scrap of cloth.

“That’s cheating!” Tegan accused, rounding on her. The harsh tone of her voice shattered the sacred silence. “You stole that handkerchief from him.”

Him. Evan’s missing handkerchief.

Smirking, Sarah gave a half shrug. “You snuck up here days ago, trying to coax the gwragedd annwn to do your bidding. That is cheating. At least I’m open about my wishes.”

“I did not!” Tegan pointed a finger. “You sent your mother to appeal to the sprite on your behalf.”

There was a collective gasp from the group of women. “Shh,” one admonished. “You’ll frighten the gwragedd annwn away.”

“At least I’m not creeping about Evan’s greenhouse,” Sarah said, “peering in windows or throwing myself at him with any number of ridiculous and fictitious afflictions. I hope your entire leg turns blue and falls off.”

With a howl, Tegan launched herself at Sarah, grabbing her by the hair and dragging them both into the shallow water. Both of them screamed, clawing at each other with their fingers, splashing and thrashing, each trying to hold the other’s face beneath the water.

“Stop!” The women cried out, leaping away from the brawl. A few—those who had yet to make their appeal to the water-sprite—burst into tears.

“That’s enough!” Evan bellowed as he stepped from behind the tree. “Stop this nonsense immediately. Home, all of you.” There was a slight hesitation as horrified faces turned in his direction, and then the women began to move, running down the pathway. He reached over the low stone wall and hauled Tegan away from Sarah.

“Ow!” Sarah cried as she crawled to the muddy edge of the pool, clutching at her lower leg. “I think it’s broken!”

“Now who exaggerates!” Tegan yelled.

“That’s enough!” he barked, scooping Sarah into his arms and leaving a sour-faced Tegan sitting half-submerged in the pool. “Once you manage to control your temper, Piyali will assist you.”

Reluctantly, Piyali extended a hand, but Tegan only narrowed her eyes. Several long gashes reddened where fingernails had streaked down her face. “You,” she spat. “You’ve ruined everything.” Thrashing about, the young woman dragged herself from the pool, and set off down the path behind Evan.

Chapter 8

Evan kicked the tavern door open and stepped into its smoky, alcohol-steeped interior. A number of men whooped to see him carrying Miss Sarah Parker, her arms wrapped tightly about his neck and her face pressed to his chest. Picking her up was a mistake he'd immediately regretted, but what was the alternative?

"What are you doing with my daughter?" Mr. Parker barked. "That's it, I'm calling the—"

"I'm not marrying her." A statement he made every time he walked through this door of late. He plopped Sarah's sodden form down on the nearest chair and pried her arms from his neck. Her torn bodice gaped. "Dr. Mukherji and I found her—and others—at Seren's Well. Miss Price and Miss Parker had an... altercation. Miss Parker has injured her ankle."

This announcement drew forth another round of whoops, including table slapping along with a number of ribald comments and speculation as to who had won the catfight. Congratulations were called out to Sarah, who wore a satisfied smile at all the attention.

"What happened to Tegan?" he asked Piyali softly.

"She refused my hand," she muttered. "And called you a number of creative names as she stumbled home."

He cringed. "I'm sorry, but we shall have to pay her a visit later." It was the last thing she wished do, but it was the right thing to do.

She jerked a nod. "Let me see to Sarah's leg first."

Dragging up her wet skirts, a whimper escaped Sarah's mouth. "There's a reason we call her two-faced Tegan." A deep, bloody gash cut through her stocking and into the skin of her calf.

Piyali set down her bag and bent to examine the wound. "That's going to require stitches." Painful ones. "Where is your mother? You should change into clean, dry clothes before I employ my suture kit."

"She's not available," Mr. Parker said, placing a hand on his daughter's shoulder, pressing her into the chair. "Stay." He nodded at Piyali. "Much obliged if you'd sew her back together."

"Your wife, is she ill?" Evan asked, recalling the accusation Tegan had hurled at Sarah—and Piyali's report that Mrs. Parker had also been bitten by the blue frog. Much as he disliked the woman, he couldn't ignore the possibility that she too might have need of treatment. His initial "rash" had spread all too fast. “I’ve heard reports that she’s favoring a hand. Shall I take a look at her injury?”

“She’s fine.” Mr. Parker’s words were gruff, leaving no doubt in Evan’s mind that he would never, ever, under any circumstances be allowed to attend his wife. His daughter’s injury, however, couldn’t be dismissed.

After much drama involving screams and tears and shots of gin to calm a much-distressed patient, Mr. Parker carried his now-contrite, inebriated daughter to her room.

A heavy sigh met his ears as Piyali followed him out of the tavern. It was well past midnight. “Tegan?” she asked. Her hand sought his, and he grasped it tightly, squeezing. A small comfort. But it wasn’t enough.

“Her injuries were minor,” he answered. “Better to call upon her in the morning.” With a tug, he pulled Piyali into his arms and out of sight of the tavern’s dirt-streaked windows. He slanted his mouth over hers and kissed her until she melted against him, until he nearly threw propriety to the wind and hauled her back to his cottage. Gossip be damned. Reluctantly, he released her. “Go. Sleep. We’ve much to do tomorrow. Today.”

“We do.” She lifted a hand to drag her palm across the stubble on his cheek. “I’ve missed you so much, Evan. We will solve this...”

The silver embroidery upon the hem of her skirt glinted in the moonlight as she stepped back into the tavern. She’d left a few words unspoken, but he’d read her unspoken thought in her eyes, and they sent a shaft of pain deep into his chest.

Whatever the cost.

The cost might very well be calculated by Queen’s agents and the scientists who kept Britain’s security at the forefront of their minds. Even Piyali struggled to rank him above her loyalty to the Crown. He’d know the minute she tossed a skeet pigeon toward London; guilt would scrawl itself across her face as if written in red ink, for she’d be unable to hide such a decision from him. At which point Tegan’s lesion would be excised, and he—and the frog—would disappear from Wales and from her life. Forever. He desperately hoped it wouldn’t come to that.

Long before the first rays of sun lightened the sky, Piyali tapped softly at the door to Sarah’s chamber. Something about the young woman’s wound nagged at the back of her mind. Only examining it, studying its ragged edges and finding nothing abnormal would put her at ease.

The door cracked open and a pair of sleepy eyes set in a drawn face peered out.

“May I come in?” Piyali asked. “I want to make certain there’s no infection.” Of any kind.

Sarah waved her in, dropping back onto her bed and stretching out her leg. “It hurts, but only a little.”

“Was it worth it?” she asked as she unwrapped the gauze.

“Even if Evan wants nothing more to do with me, he’s at least met the real Tegan. Such a brat.” Satisfaction stretched Sarah’s lips wide.

Agreeing with her mildly vindictive patient seemed unwise, even if Piyali’s heart hummed a happy tune at Evan’s inability to resist her charms. For years he’d waited. For her.

“No sign of excessive redness,” she said. But neither had Tegan’s ankle shown any normal signs of infection. That stray thought had her reaching for the torch at her waist. Not possible. Was it? Better to know than to leave any lingering doubt. Shaking the decilamp, she pointed the beam of light toward Sarah’s calf.

A glimmer, a flash and a nightmare unfolded. The edges of the wound—a tiny fraction of an inch—were iridescent. Guanine crystals.

An iron band tightened about her chest; air scraped its way in and out of her lungs. This was a disaster. With the frog in captivity, it could mean only one thing. Whatever parasitic organism lived in the amphibian’s saliva, it did not require its host to survive. Despite its tropical origins, the parasite had managed to colonize the cold waters of Seren’s Well, entering Sarah’s skin via the open wound.

Tegan.

Piyali’s stomach clenched. Sarah had dragged four fingernails—four wet fingernails—down the side of Tegan’s face. Her face. “Keep it clean and rest today,” she said, careful to keep her voice steady as she wrapped the wound once again. “I’ll have Mr. Tredegar prepare a salve. Be certain to use it.”

Outside Sarah’s room, Piyali fell against the closed door, pressing a hand to her chest. Her heart pounded against her ribs. What to do? Stepping back into the common room of the tavern, she searched out the rusty skeet pigeon, perched once again upon its shelf, returned from its last delivery. Hers. Odd that Mr. Black had sent no reply. He must still be in Scotland, her message languishing among his extensive correspondence. Not that her note mattered. More than an objective was broken now. An entire well was contaminated, one frequented by the local population. Disaster loomed.

She could delay one more day. If the experiments didn’t provide a cure within the next twenty-four hours, she’d have no choice but to write to the head of the Queen’s agents, the Duke of Avesbury himself.

This was a complete catastrophe.

Evan stared at the four blue streaks that raked down Tegan’s face. Tears ran from her eyes as she blew her red, puffy nose. “I’m going to die!” she keened.

As always, Tegan was completely self-centered. She offered not a single word of apology for instigating the fight, nor showed any concern for how Sarah might have fared. Sarah. He ran a hand over his eyes. If Tegan’s scratches were so affected, what of Sarah’s wound?

Her mother stood beside her, wringing her hands, looking to him with pleading eyes, but all he had to offer her were false promises and an imperfect ointment. Tegan might not die, but the quality of her life was definitely on a downward spiral unless he and Piyali found a cure and soon.

In the doorway, Mr. Price cleared his throat. “Dr. Mukherji has arrived.”

Mouth open, Piyali stepped into the room, yet her expression wasn’t one of surprise, rather one of horror at the verification of her worst fears.

A ball of lead dropped into his stomach. “Sarah?”

A grim nod was her answer.

There was nothing more they could do here; their time was best spent searching for a cure. Mouthing useless words of encouragement and instructing Mrs. Price to continue to apply the ointment, he grabbed Piyali by the elbow and steered her toward the shop’s door. “We’ll be back to check on her tonight.”

Piyali shook her elbow free. “If I might purchase a jar, Mr. Price?”

“A canning jar?” Mr. Price’s voice was incredulous.

“Yes.” She dropped a coin into his hand as he handed her the glass container. “Thank you. It’ll do.”

Evan kept his lips pressed tightly together until they had traveled several feet down the rutted road, exiting the village. “It’s not the frog this time.”

“No,” Piyali agreed. “It’s not.”

“The experiments are a failure.” Ice slid through his veins as he presented a cold and bleak report. “As you predicted, without proper incubation the cultured skin cells died. Even more worrisome, I examined a drop of the culture media beneath the lens of your aetherscope and,” he took a deep breath, “the parasites broke free from the dying cells and are now free-swimming.”

Pain, not surprise, crossed her face as she lifted the jar. “In the water of Seren’s Well too. It appears they require a wound, a laceration of the epidermis for direct access to the basal layer. Sarah’s fingernails digging scratches into Tegan’s face. The sharp edge of a stone wall cutting Sarah’s ankle.” She dragged in a ragged breath. “Evan, I need to write to Mr. Black. The water is contaminated. If anyone seeks the well’s healing waters, anyone with so much as a tiny scratch, they too might become infected.”

An entire town slipping into madness. There would be no hiding such a crisis. No longer could this be kept a secret. They turned off the main road, following the narrow path upward into the forest, winding their way toward the fairy well. Soon the small, sleepy town of Aberwyn would be overrun with agents of the Crown.

He, Tegan, Sarah—and quite probably her mother—would be quarantined, his sister and grandmother notified. He cringed. For the mental and physical safety of them all, separate—locked—cells would be required. Once the government realized the potential powers behind the side-effects of a blue frog’s bite... No, he could not allow himself to contemplate such a bleak future. Not yet.

“One more day,” he pleaded, stopping before Seren’s Well. Its once innocent waters now teemed with tropical parasites that had colonized an entirely new habitat. “One more day to find a cure.”

From the slight sag of his shoulders, Piyali knew it would cost him much to relinquish control. Though it was time to summon assistance, neither was she ready to admit defeat. A small concession was in order. “We’ll sample the water,” she said. “Confirm our suspicions. We’ll set up another round of experiments, and then I’ll compose a report. Maybe the parasites will prove easier to kill outside a host.”

She lifted a stick from the ground, threading it through the wire handle of the canning jar, and dipped it into the water. Sample collected, she stepped back onto the path, careful to hold the vessel steadily before her.

“Let’s hope so,” Evan said, his jaw set with determination.

Once the Queen’s agents became involved, quarantine was a strong possibility, and they might well judge the situation a security risk, refusing to inform his family of any specifics regarding his health or whereabouts. “If it comes to it, I’ll see to your sister and grandmother.” Whatever it took.

He managed a stiff nod.

They returned to his cottage in painful silence, neither one of them wishing to speculate as to what the future held.

Soon she was perched once again upon the chair at Evan’s desk and bent over to peer through the eyepiece of the aethroscope. Her skin crawled. Wriggling in the water droplet on the glass slide were hundreds of microscopic organisms.

Evan took one glance and cringed. “Perhaps we ought to consider a more toxic approach, with the primary intent of cleansing the well.”

“Chemicals?” she said. “Sodium hypochlorite would bleach the well. It might work, but it will also kill anything else living there. And once the bleach breaks down...” She shook her head. “The well would need to be monitored on a long-term basis. We don’t know the life-cycle of this parasite. If it forms a cyst—a tough, protective capsule—in response to environmental insult, it could return the moment conditions are once again favorable.”

“We would need to go back to Cardiff to obtain sufficient quantities of bleach to begin treatment. I’ve only enough here to destroy these samples. As to the problem of potential cysts...” He ran a hand through his hair. “We could post warning signs at the well, inform the entire village, but it won’t stop a determined individual from sneaking there in the dark of night and making offerings to the gwragedd annwn.”

Reaching out, she took Evan’s glimmering hand. Frustration had shifted the guanine crystals. She squeezed. “We proceed as planned.” She lifted her gaze to his tight eyes and pulled her shoulders back. “Now is not the time to concede defeat, but to redouble our efforts. You were up all night. What components did you manage to extract from the khu-neh-ari plant?”

They gathered together another collection of plant extracts, chemicals and organic compounds. She reviewed each Petri dish, each test they’d assembled the night before, hoping to find something they’d overlooked.

She didn’t.

Piyali set up a dilution series, testing the effectiveness of the few extremely toxic chemicals Evan kept on hand. At last, weary from work and the previous night’s events, there was little to do but stare at each other across the table, across a wide selection of Petri dishes, containing well water and a new range of potential anti-parasitic pharmaceuticals. With luck, a few hours from now re-examination would reveal a solution, a chemical and its necessary concentration to eliminate any and all life stages of the parasite. But neither their diligence nor their patience was rewarded. Bleach killed off the parasite, but only when used in unusually large quantities.

“Scrofula!” She slapped her forehead and jumped to her feet. Lack of sleep had fogged her mind. “Sarah! She has no ointment. And, really, I must see if there’s a way to convince her mother to allow me to view the bite to her hand.”

Evan handed her a small container of his ointment. “She needs to apply it four times a day.”

He kissed her forehead, and she wanted nothing more than to wrap her arms about his waist, lay her head on his chest, close her eyes and listen to the steady beat of his heart. Instead, she rose on to the tips of her toes and gave him an all-too-brief kiss. “I’ll be back soon,” she promised.

Chapter 9

Back at The White Hare, Piyali found Sarah up and about, hoisting trays laden with stew and ale. She tsked. “Eleven stiches warrant a day off.”

“Father says there’s no place for loafers in our family.” Her eyes lifted to the blackened overhead beams of the ceiling, and her next words were louder. “Not that I’ve seen hide or hair of Mother since I was gravely injured doing her bidding.”

“Her bidding?” Piyali tipped her head.

“I told you the first night you were here.” Sarah swatted a hand in the air. “They want me to marry Evan. They’ve been plaguing and pestering and nudging me in his direction ever since he returned from Brazil.” She wiped down a table. “Handsome as he is, wealthy though he might one day be, not once has he offered me any encouragement. Still, I dutifully stole his handkerchief as instructed and tossed a bent pin in a pool of water, mangling some ancient Welsh blessing. And what happens? Tegan, mad as a hatter, drags me into the water, and I end the night with you sewing my leg back together.”

“How is your leg?”

“Crusty and sore, if in a sparkling sapphire kind of way.” Sarah tipped her head and lifted an eyebrow. “You could have told me. I’m not the type to faint or fret. I do, however, expect you and Evan to provide a cure.”

No one could sum up a situation quite like Sarah. With a bitter laugh, she handed Sarah the ointment and gave her instructions. “Your mother ought to use the ointment as well.”

“It’ll hardly be enough,” Sarah said, pulling a face as she slipped the jar into her pocket. “It’s spread clear up her arm now. I told her to let you look at it. But no—”

“Sarah!” Mr. Parker yelled from behind the bar. His lips were a harsh, bloodless line and his eyebrows formed a sharply pointed V. “Hush your mouth. I’ve raised you better than to gossip about family.”

Sarah opened her mouth, thought twice, and snapped it shut. Piyali touched her elbow in silent sympathy. With a sidelong glance that spoke of the trials she endured beneath the thumb of her father, Sarah hefted a stack of dirty dishes and wound her way through the tables and chairs to the kitchen.

Curious that Mrs. Parker pushed the centuries old Welsh custom upon her daughter. Wanting Sarah to marry well was understandable, but Piyali wouldn't have pegged Mrs. Parker as the superstitious type.

Now was clearly not the time to press for a visit with Sarah's mother, so Piyali made her way to her room. She'd compose that letter to Mr. Black, then approach Mr. Parker about sending another message. Perhaps that would be the best time to inquire after his wife.

In her room, she placed pen to paper, then stopped. A frog attack? Her account read like a fairy tale gone horribly wrong. There had to be a better way to relate the odd events that had occurred in Aberwyn. She scratched out her words and tried again. And again. Tossing aside her fountain pen, Piyali fell backward upon the lumpy mattress. Describing the process by which the man she loved was slowly turning invisible simply was not possible in the small square of parchment a skeet pigeon could carry. Her mind was too muddled. She'd rest her eyes a few minutes, then make another attempt.

The sun was low on the horizon when she pried her eyes open. Schistosomiasis! She'd slept away the afternoon. No more time to dally, the evening rush would soon be upon the tavern, and Mr. Parker would only grow more taciturn and gruff without the aid of his wife.

Hastily scratching off a report to Mr. Black containing nothing but bare facts—and trying not to reflect upon how ridiculous it all sounded—she rolled the note into a narrow cylinder, slid it into a tin casing and sealed the end. She bent over her trunk, hunting for another skeet pigeon punch card.

Gone. They were all gone. Her hands stilled as she scanned her belongings. Nothing seemed out of place, and the trunk had been locked. Though, admittedly, her lock was not particularly secure, a mild deterrent. Someone wanted to keep her from contacting headquarters. But who?

Only one person knew she possessed such punch cards. He also happened to be the proprietor of this tavern and inn. Was it Mr. Parker? His wife?

Sarah?

Had her first missive ever reached London?

She slid the message into a pouch hanging from her corset and took a moment to inspect her TTX weapon. Overreacting? No. Her training had taught her it was better to take precautions when one's nervous system sent out an alert, and from the way the hairs on the back of her neck quivered... The Parkers were an odd bunch, but Piyali could think of no obvious reason they would wish to interrupt her communications.

Hand loosely poised by her hip, she slid down the stairs. Only a few bleary-eyed regular drunks occupied a dark corner beside the peat fire on the hearth. Sarah leaned on the window sill, staring out at the street. Her parents were nowhere to be seen. Careful to move silently, Piyali ducked under the countertop and crept on her toes toward the Parkers' private quarters. If challenged, she would insist Mrs. Parker required medical evaluation. For now, she listened at the door, to the cadence of what became increasingly hostile voices. Ever so carefully, she nudged the door ajar.

"What more do you want me to do?" Mrs. Parker grumbled. "I have it."

“What of the plant?” the innkeeper challenged.

Mrs. Parker huffed. “A cutting.”

“Not good enough.” Contempt laced his voice. “We need roots.”

“They’ve killed every live sample we’ve sent,” she snapped. “What good are roots? This time will be different. We take them the vine. They send a botanist to the rainforest to dig up an entire plant. We need to go. Now.”

“No. Not with Sarah injured,” he objected. “Besides, there might be further instructions.”

There was a long silent pause in which Piyali imagined they glared daggers at each other.

“You want her cured,” Mrs. Parker accused. “Yet you’re quite happy to leave me to my fate. After all these years together, you’d sacrifice the queen to save the pawn?”

“I’m not the one who declined treatment.”

“I overheard them. The ointment merely slows down the inevitable. Excision is the only cure. With that woman set upon recruiting help from London, we need to leave.”

“Then shall I sharpen the knife?” Bitterness honed his words. “For amputation at your elbow is now your only opinion. The more natural joints you preserve, the better the prosthetic will function.”

Mrs. Parker snarled back, her words too guttural and mangled for Piyali to understand. No, she realized, not distorted at all. The Parkers now argued in Russian.

Scrofula. They were both spies. Russian spies! Here. Living in the countryside of Wales—according to Sarah—for some years, establishing a cover, raising a daughter, biding their time. Realization dawned. If Mr. Black and Lister University wished to recruit Evan, so too would the Russians. Encouraging—forcing—Sarah to pursue him as a husband was a most excellent strategy.

Mrs. Parker must have been the one to break into Evan’s home, leaving the greenhouse door ajar, rearranging shelf items. Sloppy of her. But what, exactly, had they taken? They’d had three long months since Evan returned from Brazil. The list could be quite long, even if they’d taken pains to steal only small samples of his specimens and tiny fractions of his supplies.

Piyali swallowed hard. They must know she was more than a physician. Why else steal her punch cards? This cast Mr. Black’s silence in a different light. Had the tavern’s rusty skeet pigeon ever taken flight?

Slowly, carefully, silently, she backed away. Evan’s worst fears were about to become reality, but not at all via the channels he’d expected.

She needed to tell him. Now.

Evan scraped his hand through his hair.

Over the past several hours, a gnawing sense of desperation had overtaken him. The latest development—free-swimming parasites infesting Seren’s Well—had escalated the situation beyond anything he could hope to control. If he couldn't produce a solution, a cure, there would be no choice but to agree to summon Mr. Black and his agents, a most unwelcome conclusion to his struggles. While Lister University might be able to develop a cure, his secret would be in the hands of the British government.

He tried to imagine a positive outcome, but none of the scenarios his mind constructed ended well. Blue-skinned men—or women—with the ability to become invisible, an uncontrollable ability that was entirely subject to the whim of their emotional state. The government would ignore this unfortunate fact and try to mold such individuals into agents, to employ them for the greater good of the British Empire. But when inevitable madness resulted, what then? These agents would go rogue and disaster would result.

No. There was no alternative. A remedy had to be found.

“Copper,” he announced to the empty room as a flash of insight struck.

Turning on his heel, he stared at the bottle of blue vitriol—copper sulfate to be exact. Though it was a substance often used to treat skin diseases, it hadn't proven equal to the task of eradicating the parasite. Neither had a khu-neh-ari preparation optimized for maximum naphthoquinone content.

However, analysis of the khu-neh-ari vine had also revealed the liana possessed an unusually high copper content. What would happen if he supplemented, rather than reduced the copper content of the new ointment?

Minutes later, an alcohol lamp burned at the base of a ring stand beneath a beaker containing the khu-neh-ari preparation, a yellowish, gel-like substance. Above the flask, a clamp held a glass volumetric burette filled with blue copper sulfate.

Evan stirred the ointment in the beaker with a glass rod until it melted. Then, slowly, he turned the burette's tap, allowing a drop of the blue liquid to fall into the yellow solution. Drip by drip, the khu-neh-ari absorbed the blue vitriol, gradually turning a reddish-brown as the mixture became more acidic.

Time to place his hypothesis to the test. After pipetting a measure of this new mixture into a Petri dish containing contaminated well water, there was nothing left to do but wait.

Staring at the hands of his pocket watch, he paced the flagstone floor—and lasted all of ten minutes. If this worked, if he could exterminate the parasites in the fairy well, then Mr. Black would not need to be summoned. That would win him additional time for further experimentation, time to determine a method by which to kill the creatures that crept beneath his skin.

But he was getting ahead of himself. First things first.

Recalling how Piyali had operated the aetherscope, he prepared a slide and slid it into the aether chamber. A hiss. A process of focusing upon the specimen, gradually increasing the strength of the objective until the parasites came into focus.

For a moment, he forgot to breathe. Not a single one of the unicellular parasites moved, all floated motionless inside the small drop of fluid. A number of the wee creatures had lysed—burst—and fragments of their intracellular organelles were strewn about the field of vision.

Heart pounding, he leapt to his feet, knocking over the chair behind him in his haste to return to the solution-filled beaker. With a shaking hand, he lifted an eyedropper to extract a single drop of the anti-parasitic solution. He forced himself to take several long, steadying breaths—in and out—until his shimmering hand returned to a regrettable, yet familiar, blue.

He touched a drop of solution to the skin on the back of his hand and stared intently, praying, hardly daring to hope that it might penetrate the many layers of his skin to eradicate the creatures that burrowed within. Shock, then euphoria, rippled through him as a circle of blue color began to fade, slowly returning to a more normal, flesh-colored shade.

Whooping, he leapt to his feet, a wide grin stretching across his face as he strode across the room toward the door to snatch his coat from its hook. He needed to find Piyali, needed to pull her into his arms, spin her about and make plans for their future.

But before his hand could wrap about the handle, the door burst open and Piyali herself rushed into his cottage, wide-eyed and frantic. Her clothes were rumpled and several strands of hair had pulled free from her normally sleek braid. She slammed the wooden door behind her and fell backward against it, dragging in long, ragged breaths.

“What’s wrong?” Worry shoved excitement to the floor.

“Spies,” she panted, staggering forward. He caught her by the shoulders. “You’ve been living in a nest of them.”

“Spies?” He lifted an eyebrow. “In Aberwyn, Wales?”

“The Parkers,” she said.

As he listened to the rush of words that poured from her mouth, Evan began to pace. Her discovery reframed every interaction he’d had with them these last three months. As the proprietor of The White Hare, Mr. Parker had received and signed for every single item he’d shipped from Brazil during his expedition. Many of those crates had arrived before he himself even set foot on the dirigible that had carried him home to Britain. He’d not have noticed a few missing grams of dried Tawari tree bark or a few milliliters of Wasai extract. And his plants... Once he’d begun to propagate them here, a missing seedling or two he would have overlooked as a failure to germinate or root in British soil.

Evan turned on his heel. An inventory of his stores, of his plants, might reveal discrepancies, but how could he—at this late date—hope to pinpoint exactly what was stolen? “Wait.” His mind finally caught up with Piyali’s words. “Did you say they pushed Sarah to seduce me?” Her constant flirtations, her wandering hands and the ever-present overflowing bosom accidentally brushing against him at any and every opportunity.

She nodded. “Though I don’t think she knows her parents are Russian. I think she went along with the plan to wriggle out from under their thumb.”

“Instead it would have tightened the noose about my neck.” He strode to the tabletop, slapped a small square of paper upon it and lifted a fountain pen. “We need to send Mr. Black a message. Inform him of the spies and request backup. But whatever you do, don’t mention the frog.”

“What? We can’t. Weren’t you listening?” Her voice rose in volume.

“I’m sorry. Too much, too fast.” His mouth fell open as she repeated herself. “Even if we trusted Mr. Parker to toss the clockwork contraption into the air, he has stolen all my pre-punched direction cards.”

He looked pointedly at the pistol strapped to her hip. “Then we handle this ourselves.”

“I suppose I could shoot them both, then bind them hand and foot,” Piyali grumbled. “Heave them both in your crank wagon and haul them to Cardiff. From there I could contact headquarters, send them a cryptogram over the wire.”

He snorted. “Dr. Piyali Mukherji, bounty hunter.”

“Oh?” Her eyebrows rose. “You don’t think I could?”

“I don’t doubt it for a minute. I’ll help. But first we ought to cure this infection.”

“Evan,” she said, shoving a few loose strands of hair behind her ears. “We’re out of time. If they escape your village and turn this over to their handlers—”

“Let me rephrase,” he interrupted. “While you slept the afternoon away, I found the cure.” He no longer felt as if a spotted jaguar hunted him in the night. Once again the future held promise of happiness.

“A cure!” She rushed to the table, but its surface was clear. “What is it? What worked?”

“Copper,” he answered, pointing to the aetherscope upon his desk. “Take a look.” As she bent over to peer into the aetherscope, he explained. “You were right to suggest chemicals. Blue vitriol added to a khu-neh-ari preparation optimized for maximum naphthoquinone content. Neither works alone, but together, the copper multiplies the effect of the ointment.”

She straightened. A wide smile lit up her face, her eyes. “This means we can treat the fairy well.”

“Exactly. For now, the resulting preparation is rather watery, more of a tonic than an ointment, but there’s more.” He lifted the eyedropper. “Watch.”

Holding out his hand, blue but for one small spot, he touched another drop of the solution to the skin on the back of his hand. Piyali stared intently, her eyes widening as a second circle of blue color began to fade, slowly returning to a more normal, flesh-colored shade.

“A biopsy,” she demanded, breathless. “We need unambiguous confirmation. Have you performed one?”

“Not yet.” He handed her a scalpel.

Piyali took a deep, calming breath, performed the procedure and inserted the slide into the aetheroscope. A moment later she pressed a hand to her heart and looked up at him with tears in her eyes. “Cured,” she announced, then flung her arms about his neck, hugging him tight.

His—their—entire future, saved.

He wrapped his arms about her waist, ignoring the various attachments of her stiff leather corset that jutted into his skin. “With the entire fairy well infested, we’ll need more of it than I have on hand in this bottle, but I’ve copper and acid and the khu-neh-ari liana grows quickly... with a touch of effort, we should be able to generate enough for our needs without traveling to Cardiff.” He slid his hands lower, spreading his fingers wide over the curve of her backside. Her soft breasts pressing against his chest made it impossible to concentrate. “Perhaps, before we set to work, we could celebrate.”

Chapter 10

“Oh, is there something in particular you’d like to do?” Piyali kissed the rough edge of his jaw in encouragement. Now was not the time to speak of their future, but instead to celebrate that they once again had one, one that they would share together. Applying her fingers to the buttons of his shirt, she spread the coarse linen wide and hummed in appreciation as she ran her palms over the strong muscles and crisp hairs that lay beneath.

“As if you need to ask.” He unfasted the metal buckles of her corset and stripped away the leather barrier that encircled her waist. Sliding his hands beneath the hem of her choli, he skimmed his palms over her rib cage before pulling the garment down her arms and dropping it to the floor. “I’ve not been able to stop thinking about you, about us.”

She stood still as he caught a loose strand of her hair between his fingertips and drew its silky length forward across her shoulder. The backs of his fingers caressed the curve of her breast and her nipple tightened under his appreciative gaze. Then something in his eyes shifted. “I should have written sooner. The time we’ve lost...”

Brushing the pad of her thumb across his lips, she said, “I should have sent another skeet pigeon. And another. Until an entire flock pecked at your windows and compelled a reply. Forgive me?”

“Always.”

Catching his lips with hers, she poured every ounce of her love into her kiss. Barriers crumbled between them, but Piyali refused to allow the tears that pricked at her eyes to ruin the pure joy of this moment. She held still as he pushed her away, tugging the string free from the end of her braid. He ran his fingers through her hair until it fell in loose waves, covering her shoulders and cascading down her back.

Only then did she step forward to peel back the collar of his shirt and press her lips to the soft skin of his neck where his pulse throbbed and tendrils of blue skin glimmered. “I’ve a request,” she said, her voice once again light and teasing.

“Anything.” His hands encircled her waist, urging her closer until the hard column of his shaft pressed against her stomach.

“A final request of sorts.”

Worried eyes lifted to hers. “Final?”

“A final... performance for your hand.” Her face burned at the erotic image that rose to mind. “I want to see it—or not—as it moves over my skin.” Watching and not seeing, as if surrendering to a sensual dream.

His answering laugh was a low rumble. “Look down, then. Watch.”

She lowered her gaze as his work-roughened left hand—in all its iridescent beauty—slid upward over her ribs to lift the weight of her breast in his palm. Something scraped the tip of her nipple—his fingernail—but she saw almost nothing. Everything was pure sensation. The roll of her flesh between his invisible thumb and forefinger. A delicious pinch sending a jolt of heat through her core.

“Evan!” she cried out as heat flooded her center, and her hips bucked against his. Then his mouth descended upon her other breast, sucking its tip deep into wet heat. “More,” she demanded.

His hands left her breasts and cupped her buttocks. In one smooth motion, Evan lifted her into the air and strode across the room. Her backside landed upon the scarred, wooden table. He yanked the slippers from her feet and dragged off her skirt. “Not once did I ever imagine you spread like a feast upon my table.” His eyes glinted darkly as they raked down her body. “But now that you’re there...” He spread her knees apart, a glint of mischief in his eyes. “Don’t forget to watch.”

An unseen hand swept across her thigh, his finger slipping along her wetness, gently circling her nub. “Aether,” she whispered, falling back onto her hands and arching her back when he plunged an invisible finger inside. In. Then out. And in. Her eyes fluttered shut.

“You’re forgetting to look,” he said, dark laughter in his voice. She forced her eyes open. The pressure inside her increased—a second finger joining the first—and then the base of his hand pressed hard against her mound.

Her hips bucked. Enough. Clawing at his waistband, she unfastened his trousers and shoved them down over his hips. “I want you inside me.”

“So soon?” he asked. “I thought—”

“Now.” Encircling his thick, hard length with her fingers, she drew forth a groan.

The pressure from his fingers slid away. A moment passed as he dug into his pocket, then a paper wrapper tore, and he covered himself. Rough hands dragged her hips to the edge of the wooden table. She lowered herself backward onto her elbows and wrapped her legs around his bare backside, urging him closer.

The head of his cock notched against her center. He gripped her hips and took her with one powerful thrust of his hips. Yes. That. That was the pressure she craved. Filled, stretched. Claimed by the man she loved.

“God, you’re perfect.” He retreated, then surged forward again. Over and over.

It wasn’t enough. She wanted him closer. Needed him. She caught the free edges of his shirt and dragged him down on top of her. The crisp hairs of his chest rasped against her nipples, sending a tremor across her skin. The table beneath her grated against the floorboards, shifting with each passionate thrust, a potent expression of desire.

“Yes, Evan,” she cried. “Don’t stop.” She lifted her knees higher, tipping her pelvis and twining her legs about his thighs to pull him deeper.

He grasped her hips, increasing the angle of his thrusts to rub harder against her center. His hot mouth fell against her neck, a gentle bite that left her mewling.

“Piyali,” he rasped. “Come for me.”

Her nails dug into his backside as a desperate tension built inside her and at last burst free. “Evan!” She cried out as tremors rolled over her, muscles clenching around increasingly frenzied thrusts. With a yell, he stiffened, driving himself into her one last time.

Sense returned slowly. Slowly, lazily, she opened her eyes and smiled. “How many feet did we travel?”

Laughing, he stabbed his fingers into her hair and gave her a long kiss before straightening. “Three?” Lifting her into his arms, he carried her upstairs to his bed, laying her upon its soft surface. “Tables might have their points, but beds...” He climbed in beside her, and she draped an arm across his chest, resting her head on his shoulder. His fingers trailed through her hair and she let her mind drift away as he murmured into her hair. “Once we eradicate this parasite, the Queen’s agents never need know about any of this.”

On the edge of sleep, his words shattered her euphoria. “What?” She bolted upright, clutching the sheet to her chest. “You still think there’s no need to inform Mr. Black?”

“Exactly that,” Evan replied.

“It’s too late to hide what happened. Besides, he has ways of making people talk. When I bring them in, the Parkers will tell him everything. As will Tegan and her family. I’d look like a fool.” Her career would never recover. How could he ask this of her? She climbed from the bed, wrapping the sheet about her. “Impossible.”

“Why?” he countered, missing her warmth, even though the blaze of her narrow-eyed stare threatened to incinerate him. “Without the parasite, there’s no risk of further infection. Once we treat the pool...” He trailed off, knowing they were at an impasse.

“Not so. Even after it’s treated, the contaminated well water will need to be monitored on a regular basis to be certain the parasite does not take on a cyst form. Some unicellular organisms can survive months in cold water in such a state. To do that, my laboratory will need to know what to look for and how to identify the particular organism involved. I’ve no choice. Mr. Black must be informed.”

She was right. Even if she agreed to hide the events of the past few days, Mr. Black would learn of them during an interrogation of the Parkers. He asked her to jeopardize both her career as a Queen’s agent and the laboratory she’d been granted at Lister University. Not something he had the right to do.

“No.” Piyali sliced a hand through the air. “I’ll have no part in concealing this.” She shot down the stairs.

The sheet from his bed made a soft swoosh as its loose end trailed downward. He yanked on a pair of trousers, grabbed a clean shirt and followed. “If we can wipe it out entirely, it won’t fall into the wrong hands,” he entreated.

Already she was half-dressed and pulling on her slippers. “Better to make a full report in the event that someone—hostile or friendly—encounters this infection again.”

“Government has a way of abusing scientific advances,” he countered, buttoning his shirt then reaching for his boots.

“True.” She buckled her corset about her waist. “But who’s to say the Russians haven’t already been informed of this blue frog and the effects of its bite? Or whether or not they take the Parkers’ reports seriously? Even if they don’t have a sample yet, they’re going to know where to send their people to look. Tracking your movements through Brazil can’t possibly be that difficult. We take the frog into custody and record the cure. Better to be prepared, than to be caught unawares.”

Evan pressed his lips together. They would never agree. Though he didn’t relish the task, better for the blue frog to die, than to fall into the hands of Lister’s research scientists. Not that that would stop herpetologists from hunting out more of its kind in Brazil. Perhaps he could simply soak the creature in the cure and deny this entire incident? He grabbed the flask of copper and khu-neh-ari extract. Pouring a generous amount into the palm of his hand, he began to rub the solution over his arm.

Piyali lifted an empty, lidded jar and strode into his greenhouse.

“Leave the creature here,” he objected, following in her wake. “You can’t possibly apprehend two Russian agents and keep the frog safe at the same time.”

“If I leave it here, will you guarantee the frog won’t disappear for good?” she asked, her expression growing suspicious.

Guilty intentions made him glance away. He’d make no such promises.

“I didn’t think so.” She bent before the terrarium squinting through the glass, searching for a hint of the frog. Unable to locate it, she heaved a sigh. “Can you see it?”

“Rather the point of being invisible, isn’t it?” The greenhouse door was closed, secured with the 3XR CinchBolt. Still, he too stared through the glass. Not with the intent of handing it over but worried the frog had somehow escaped once again despite the heavy pharmacology textbook he’d placed on the terrarium’s lid. He saw nothing blue. Nor was there a telltale pink and silver shimmer. Not even a frog-shaped blob reflecting the green of the terrarium’s plant life. A cold tendril of fear wrapped around his spine.

“Stand back.” If anyone was going to be bitten again, it was going to be him. Setting aside the textbook and shifting the lid, Evan reached inside. He felt nothing. When was the last time he thought to look for the frog? Yesterday. Before he plucked Sarah from Seren's Well. "What exactly did Mrs. Parker claim she'd taken?"

A faint knocking began at his cottage door, one that grew more frantic by the moment.

"A plant cutting. But she also said, 'I have it.' Do you think she meant the frog?" Piyali clamped a hand across her mouth, her eyes wide. "That's why she was unavailable last night to attend her daughter. If they've been watching you—us—then they know our every move. Mrs. Parker must have stolen the frog while we dealt with the aftermath of the fairy well altercation."

A trained agent would be able to pick his lock. It was a probable scenario. His heart crashed into his ribs, then took off at a breakneck speed. "Yes." Sweat gathered at his temples. "I've no intention of handing over this frog to the Crown so they might seek out more of its kind. But I won't have the Russians run away with it either, and I'm ninety-nine percent certain it's not in this terrarium. They must have it already."

A face pressed up against the window of the greenhouse wall. Sarah. She slapped her palm repeatedly against the glass, shaking the metal frame. "Help!" she yelled. Tears streamed down her face. "You have to help me!"

Evan darted to the greenhouse door, unlocking and yanking it open. "What is it?"

Sarah fell into his arms, sobbing against his chest.

"Beginning to be a bit of a pattern, all these girls throwing themselves at you." Piyali's lips twisted as she reached out and pried Sarah free, steering her by the shoulders into the cottage. "Come sit. Mr. Tredegar has a new treatment to apply, a guaranteed cure. Your ankle will be fine." She pushed Sarah into a chair. "In the meantime, I have questions." She reached for Sarah's foot.

For months, the flirting had been relentless. Sarah and Tegan were too self-involved to realize his heart was sworn elsewhere. But Sarah wasn't one to cry crocodile tears. "It's not her ankle," he said with gut-twisting certainty.

"It's my mother," she keened, dragging in great gulps of air. "He killed her."

"Excuse me?" Piyali's hands froze on Sarah's stocking. "Explain."

"My father," Sarah cried, dashing away tears that would not stop falling. "They were fighting. It was awful. Worse than usual." Large glistening eyes blinked up at Piyali. Gasping for air, she struggled to control her breath enough to speak. "My mother was yelling about you being more than just a doctor. About how they were going to be locked away and tortured. She grabbed the teakettle from the kitchen range, shaking it at him and said something in a strange, foreign language. I've never seen my father look so angry. He raised his fist and struck her." A fresh deluge of tears poured down her cheeks. "Her head hit the corner of the table." A rattling gasp. "Blood. There was so much blood. And she didn't move. Father yelled at me to ready the steam cart, but I ran here instead."

"He needs to be stopped." Piyali's hand landed on her TTX pistol. She tugged it free, checking its readiness, before returning it to her holster.

"First we treat her ankle," Evan ordered as he lifted the bottle of copper and khu-neh-ari extract.

The situation was escalating out of control. He wouldn't have this infection leaving his village. In any form. "It will only take a minute."

Piyali threw him a narrow-eyed glance, but yanked down Sarah's stocking and unwrapped the bandage about her ankle to reveal a glittering laceration. He soaked a cotton ball with the copper-liana tonic, then swabbed the liquid along the length of the suture. Corking the bottle, he shoved it into his pocket and yanked Sarah to her feet. "Grab the gauze," he ordered Piyali. "We'll bandage her later."

After running from the cottage to a nearby shed, Piyali jumped into the passenger's seat as he heaved Sarah into the bed of the wagon. Furiously, he cranked the vehicle to life.

"Hang on!" he yelled. Then, leaping into the driver's seat, he jerked the break free and rammed the driveshaft into full forward. The crank wagon took off like a shot, its wheels clattering over the many stones that studded the packed-earth lane that led down the hill and into the village.

Chapter 11

Her teeth nearly rattling out of their sockets, Piyali clutched the edge of her seat while Evan took the corner onto the main street on two wheels. There, in front of The White Hare stood a steam cart, puffing as it idled with Mr. Parker at its side. He took one look at their approaching vehicle and flung the valise he held into the cart before climbing behind the wheel.

“Father, no!” Sarah screamed.

Mr. Parker didn’t so much as glance over his shoulder. The cart sprung to life, tearing down the muddy, rutted road. Villagers scattered, shaking their fists and cursing.

Evan followed.

Mr. Parker’s loaded steam cart rattled and clanged as he fled, its loose contents bouncing above the rim, tossing the occasional paper-wrapped parcel onto the grassy verge of the road. One item jolted loose, but didn’t fall free: Mrs. Parker’s heavily bandaged arm. It hung limp, swaying and jerking with the motion of the vehicle, a grim reminder that Piyali was in pursuit of a man not deterred by death. Did he seek to hide his crime? Or was the corpse of his wife no more than a sample of an infectious disease to be delivered to his superiors, a gruesome commitment to his orders?

Sarah cried out in distress.

Piyali drew her weapon, but they were too far away. “Closer!” she yelled.

“This wagon doesn’t go any faster,” Evan yelled back. “But he’ll have to slow down to take an upcoming turn. If I leave us at full speed, we can overtake him just before we run off the road. If we pursue him, we’ll likely lose the race.”

In short, the wagon’s fully loaded steam hopper would allow it to outrun a crank cart. She couldn’t take the chance. “Don’t slow down,” she yelled back.

“Get ready!” He gripped the driveshaft with white knuckles.

Ahead the road reversed course in a tight hairpin turn, a turn necessary to descend the steep hillside. The steamstage had slowed considerably with its approach to Aberwyn; Mr. Parker barely engaged the brakes.

Bouncing down the rough road on iron-rimmed wheels, Piyali raised her arm, sighting along the length of her TTX pistol. Three darts were loaded. One to stun. Two to render a man unconscious. A third would kill. Mr. Parker was a large man, and she prayed only a single dart would be required.

“Now!” Evan yelled.

Time seemed to slow as they shot past the steam cart. Careening about the tight turn, Piyali squeezed the trigger. With a whoosh of compressed air, the dart shot forth, striking Mr. Parker directly between the shoulder blades. He howled in anger.

The front wheels of Evan’s wagon ran off the road, jolting time back to its proper speed. The vehicle bucked, tossing Piyali free. Hours of training had her tucking into a roll. She hit the ground hard, and her body exploded into pain. Despite the screaming protest of every joint, she forced herself onto her feet and began to run across the muddy grass, back onto the road, pistol firmly in hand.

Mr. Parker’s shoulders sagged forward, his hands sliding down the driving wheel as the cart careened down the hillside. Lungs heaving, heart pounding, she chased after him, grateful for her raised hemline. Though the sharp edges of gravel stabbed into the soles of the soft slippers she wore, she could not stop now.

She slid to a halt and gasped for air, trying to steady her arm as she took aim. She fired. The second dart grazed his neck. Schistosomiasis! If any of the neurotoxin had entered his system, a third would kill him. Still, better to chance it. To let him escape was unthinkable.

Planting her feet firmly upon the ground, she fired a third and final dart into his arm. Mr. Parker slumped sideways on his seat, then fell, disappearing from view. Excellent. Evan ran past her, hauling himself into the cart and yanking on the breaking mechanism. By the time she arrived, he had already dragged Mr. Parker—still breathing—from the cart.

Sarah collapsed at her father’s side in a heap. “Will he live?” she asked as Piyali unhooked a pair of manacles from her corset and shackled his wrists.

“Yes.” For now. Once Mr. Black took him into custody, she could make no promises.

Face contorted in a mixture of anger and concern, Sarah lifted a shaking hand then laid it upon her father’s chest. “And my mother?”

“Dead,” Evan answered her simply.

Leaving Sarah to struggle with her grief, Piyali took a deep steadying breath. There was no avoiding it. Mrs. Parker must be examined, the contents of the wagon bed searched. She pulled herself onto the running board. It was impossible to pry her eyes from Mrs. Parker’s ghastly remains. The back of her head was caved in, clots of blood matted her hair. Her arm was wrapped in yards of dingy gauze that took Piyali several long minutes to unwind. Exposed to the light of day, Mrs. Parker’s arm was not only a scintillating blue, but her hand had swollen to twice its normal size. Untreated, blood poisoning—septicemia—had also taken hold.

Beside her, Evan let out a low whistle. “Murdered, yes, but even so, there’s little chance she would have reached Russia alive.”

“The frog,” she said. They needed to secure the creature.

Evan pried the lid off one of the many crates. Inside, padded with straw, lay several glass jars labeled with his own handwriting. A second crate held dried plant cuttings carefully pressed and wrapped in paper. He dug through a third, then a fourth. All filled with a variety of materials stolen from his greenhouse and laboratory. “Quite the collection they made this past year. To think that I never suspected a thing until the blue frog escaped.”

Frantic, Piyali dug through the remaining crates. “It has to be here...” A soft, plopping sound came from a copper teakettle tucked into the straw. Why would anyone pack a teakettle whilst fleeing for Russia? Frowning, she plucked it free. The teakettle was heavier than it ought to be, far heavier than could be accounted for by the addition of a small frog. As she shifted the kettle and reached for its lid, something inside scraped noisily across its base.

“Wait!” Evan cried. He dug into the straw and then emptied a glass jar of its contents. “Slowly and carefully.” He held the jar close as Piyali pried free the kettle’s lid and peered inside.

At first glance all she saw was a thin film of water and shards of the white ceramic pot she’d handed to Sarah, the container of khu-neh-ari ointment. But then the light glinted off two small, beady eyes. A dazed and confused frog. She tipped it gently into the glass jar. It looked exactly like the one they had trapped at Seren’s Well.

Except it wasn’t blue.

“It’s green,” Evan said, eyebrows knitting in confusion.

“Cured?” And then all the tension melted away as she began to laugh. Gallows humor, perhaps, but the two Russian spies had managed to steal so much, yet botched it in the end. “So close to success, but...” She examined the kettle, then held it up. “A copper teakettle to provide a damp habitat for the frog—not the worst plan. But add in a jar of your ointment and a rough wagon ride through the Welsh countryside...”

“And the frog itself is cured,” Evan finished.

Had the Parker’s plans not been disrupted—with more time to pack and pad the stolen goods—they might have reached the port of Cardiff with intact specimens. With a ship ready and waiting, there was a small chance the spies and a blue frog would have reached Russia. And then...

No. It didn’t bear thinking about.

Evan braced as Piyali straightened and dragged in a deep breath. “The Parker family must be delivered into Mr. Black’s custody along with any documents found in their private apartments.” Her voice held an edge that informed him she would tolerate no further objections.

“Agreed.”

Surprise lifted her eyebrows. “But concerning the blue frog and my report...” She set down the teakettle and brushed a piece of straw from her tunic. “I propose a compromise.”

“Go on,” he prompted. He wanted to reach out and gather her into his arms, but knew he could not. Terms were being set. There was no avoiding Mr. Black or his men now. A lump of coal burned in his stomach. What kind of future could they have together if they could not find common ground?

“Before the Queen’s agents arrive, I propose we soak Mrs. Parker’s arm in the copper-liana solution. We treat both Tegan and the water in Seren’s Well. If this works, if we can eliminate all traces of the parasite, I will petition Mr. Black to allow me to personally monitor the pool for the next several years. Mr. Black and the Queen’s agents would receive nothing more than a report about the parasite itself, excluding its origin. I won’t include a single reference to the frog.” She cleared her throat. “It will, of course, mean convincing everyone that Tegan fabricated the story concerning a certain blue amphibian.”

Dark eyes met his. Was Piyali holding her breath as she waited for his response? Did she envision a future which included him? What an amazing woman, one who could be his if he too made this small concession. The infectious parasite would not be preserved, living or dead, but it would be carefully documented along with its cure, a cure he would quietly share with the shaman of the village that had hosted him in Brazil. The Crown would not be provided with the means to create semi-invisible men, but neither would Lister biologists be left with no identification or treatment particulars should the intracellular parasite ever resurface.

“Tegan will never speak to me again, but I’ll manage.” With a light heart, he caught her shaking hand, pressing it between his palms. “If I augment that report with a living specimen of the khu-neh-ari liana, will you personally recommend me for the position of Director of Tropical Plants in the Lister Botanical Gardens and Greenhouse? I’ve a sudden desire to relocate to London.”

A wide smile brightened Piyali’s face. Her eyes sparkled as she answered, “Absolutely.”

“Curing unknown tropical diseases, uncovering entrenched Russian spies, firing poisonous darts with deadly precision.” He drew her close. “What other mad skills have you acquired these past years?”

Her smile turned coy as her arms slid around his waist. “I’m afraid you’ll need government clearance to find out. Have you ever considered working for the Queen?”

“I believe I could be persuaded,” he said, then lowered his lips to hers.

The rest of the evening passed in a blur. Sarah, alternately weeping over the death of her mother and railing at her father, was returned to her room at The White Hare. Although they took the precaution of locking her door, neither he nor Piyali considered her a flight risk. Mr. Parker, however, was kept securely restrained and administered regular doses of laudanum to ensure he remained subdued.

Tegan was promptly treated. Clutching his hand and pressing it to her heart, she swore her undying love and loyalty. Until he mentioned that he expected to join Dr. Mukherji soon in London and wished her—and her parents—all the best here in Wales. At that unwelcome and unexpected news, her face soured, and she threw his hand back at him with a frustrated howl.

Together, he and Piyali searched the Parkers' living quarters, finding both her original message—still sealed in its tin cylinder—as well as the punch cards stolen from her trunk. Lips pursed in annoyance, Piyali dashed off a brief message informing Mr. Black that she had apprehended a Russian spy and required backup.

The White Hare's skeet pigeon, though rusty, had taken to the sky easily enough, winging its way to London. A strong response arrived the next day in the form of a silver-ballooned dirigible. The entire village turned out in the rain—jaws hanging open—to watch the unprecedented arrival of a hawk-class vessel descend from the sky and settle in the mud before the tavern.

Two men leapt from its compartment; neither were Mr. Black. With a glance of apology, Piyali left Evan's side, secreting herself behind closed doors to present her report. Disappointment tightened his chest, but he was not an agent. For the moment, he was nothing to the Crown but an importer of a biological hazard. Step one toward their future involved Piyali arguing on his behalf.

Several hours later, they emerged. Precious few words were exchanged as they began the process of loading evidence—including a potted sample of his liana—into a secure storage compartment of the airship's gondola. A few minutes before their scheduled departure, one of the men led Mr. Parker and Sarah in shackles from the tavern to securely bolt them into their seats.

Mr. Parker's lips pressed into a thin line. He stared stoically into the distance, refusing to acknowledge anyone or anything.

"How is it possible?" Sarah asked, her eyes red and swollen. Gone was her usual ebullience, squashed beneath the truth of her parents' lives. "Russian spies!"

"It's a lot to take in." Piyali placed a hand on her arm. "Cooperate. Answer all their questions truthfully and, if—when—you're cleared of all wrongdoing, I shall do my best to help you start a new life in London. I'll see your textbooks delivered to your cell. Focus on your studies to pass the time and improve your future prospects. When this is over, I'll do what I can to arrange for you to take the entrance exams for Girton's College."

As the airship departed, as all faces turned upward to watch its departure, Evan asked, "Is all well?"

"Mr. Black agreed to my proposal," she answered, tugging him by the hand down the main road and away from the crowd. "The pool is now your—our—responsibility."

Together, they slipped away into the woods. Piyali folded her arm through his as they came to a stop before Seren's Well. Its waters glistened a turquoise blue from all the copper sulfate they had poured into the pool, and branches from the khu-neh-ari liana floated on its surface.

Traditions transformed and evolved with time, and another step forward needed to begin today. While Piyali spoke with fellow Queen's agents, he'd spoken with Mr. Price, impressing upon him the need to return his supply of steel pins to the manufacturer, to request that only copper pins be sold in the village store. Even better if Evan could convince the villagers that the gwragedd annwn desired payment, not bent pins, in the form of copper farthings. The more copper introduced to the pool, the better.

“I’ve been granted three days leave,” Piyali said, breaking the silence. “Three days to convince you that both you and your plants belong in the Botanical Garden of Lister University.”

“Done,” he said and reached into his coat pocket. Heart pounding, he lowered himself onto one knee and held up his grandmother’s opal and diamond ring, a ring that had burned against his chest all day. “That leaves me three days to convince you to say yes. Dr. Piyali Mukherji, I cannot envision my future without you in it. These years without you nearly killed me. Will you do me the great honor of becoming my wife?”

A tear slid down her cheek as she slipped the ring on her finger. “Yes.”

Her answer dispelled the gloom that had descended upon his life some three months past. Intensity of color rushed back into his life, leaving him breathless. Evan leapt to his feet and scooped her into his arms, turning toward his cottage. “How shall we spend the next three days? Planning a wedding? Packing the laboratory and the contents of my greenhouse...”

She tugged on his arm. “Anticipating wedding vows.”

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Though Anne Renwick holds a Ph.D. in biology and greatly enjoyed tormenting the overburdened undergraduates who were her students, fiction has always been her first love. Today, she writes steampunk romance, placing a new kind of biotech in the hands of mad scientists, proper young ladies and determined villains. Anne is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and Johns Hopkins School of Medicine. She lives in Maryland with her family.

Anne brings an unusual perspective to steampunk. A number of years spent locked inside the bowels of a biological research facility left her permanently altered. In her steampunk world, the Victorian fascination with all things anatomical led to a number of alarming biotechnological advances. Ones that the enemies of Britain would dearly love to possess.

WARRIORS OF SURTU

The one thing she couldn't do was fall in love.

TERRA

I've been preparing for this day my entire life.

For sixty years, Earth has been getting ready for their return. The first time they came, they killed our men and took all the women. That's not going to happen again. This time, we're ready. My unit looks unassuming, but we have degrees in kicking alien ass. They're not taking us without a fight.

So why can't I stop thinking about him?

JIDDEN

I've been preparing for this day my entire life.

Sixty years ago, we found what we were looking for: an entire species that we could successfully mate with. It's taken us this long to make sure the offspring were viable. I've been selected to be part of the initial mission to claim the women as our own, and it's my key to promotion. The one thing I'm not allowed to do is touch an Earth woman.

So why can't I stop thinking about her?

Chapter 1

TERRA

The Surtu were out there.

I could see their ships from my tiny window in the kitchen where I worked as a porter on the Fortuna space station.

I thought their ships would be more hostile looking, intimidating or depraved perhaps, like the Surtu themselves. But as I took a rag from over my shoulder to dry a glass, I couldn't help but think that the ships looked like glow flies out in the distance.

The view would have been romantic if we weren't worried that the Surtu were going to kill us all.

We knew the Surtu were going to come. It was a war Earth had sixty years to prepare for. Now that war was about to begin, and I was part of Earth's first line of defense.

My home, the Fortuna, was one of many military space stations constructed after Earth learned that the Surtu were out there, and we had to be ready. Unlike the other space stations, it was disguised as a spiritual sanctuary. We looked like a sisterhood, where women of the cloth were ready to welcome alien visitors into the gardens and marble halls under the pretense of peace.

Setting the glass down, I snickered at my own thoughts, more out of tension than any humor.

Nothing about the Fortuna was peaceful. Every woman on board was as lethal as a cobra. From one generation to the next, the women chosen for the Fortuna were taught the art of warfare with precision, as if it were a school subject like algebra or English. Earth never knew when the Surtu would come, but we knew why the Fortuna was built. We were the furthest station away from Earth. Fortuna was a deathtrap, meant to lure the enemy in, learn its weaknesses, then eliminate them.

Our time was now.

"Gallia wants to see you," Lucina announced brightly as she bounded into the kitchen, grabbing an apple from a nearby bowl. Lucina Whitmore was my best friend. Like me, the petite blonde had been primed to join the Fortuna since she was little. Our mothers had done a tour of duty here together before they returned to Earth to marry and have children.

All women assigned to the Fortuna were given the name of a Roman goddess, which was used proudly like a badge. Lucina and I were different. We had been given Roman names since birth, our destiny already decided by our mothers.

I'd known Lucina since I first beat half the boys in our kindergarten class at arm wrestling. We knew more about each other than our own families back on Earth. I didn't know one thing though. How she managed to stay so bubbly and upbeat, even with danger looming close to us, was beyond me.

"Did Gallia say what for?" I asked, deciding whether or not I should finish my duties in the kitchen before heading to our Commander's office. Lucina twirled the apple on her finger before taking a huge bite. "No," she said, her mouth full, "but I'm assuming it has something to do with the alien race that's about to attack. The ones with the big fangs and hollow eyes."

I was surprised. "Is that really what you think they look like?"

"We grew up listening to stories about the monsters in space. It's hard to know what to expect." Lucina shrugged.

"Those who escaped the attack on the colony all those years ago said the Surtu were humanoid."

"Even devils are humanoid," Lucina pointed out with a wide smile as if she enjoyed the prospect of standing her ground against creatures so unholy. Being pretty, small, and blonde, she was like a militant angel.

Unable to share her enthusiasm, I once again looked out the window at the glow flies in the dark sky, ignoring the girl with the mousy hair and earthy brown eyes faintly reflected in the glass. I was not a warrior, not like Lucina, or Gallia, or any of the other women on the Fortuna.

I mean, I had skills. I was perhaps one of the most skilled fighters on board, but I considered intellect a stronger weapon than a spear. And I was an optimist. We didn't know what the Surtu wanted, or why they were hell bent on attacking us, but I believed there was still a way to work our differences out before a war began.

Such sentiment was why I was in the kitchen, and Gallia was in command.

I turned toward the door, dropping the rag on the counter. "I guess I better go see our Queen Sister," I said, using the name Lucina and I secretly thought of for Gallia. "Maybe she wants a chance to yell at me one last time before the Surtu attack."

"Probably," Lucina supposed. "She better start yelling now. Based on the formation of those ships out there, we don't have much time left."

"Terra Lynch, how old are you?" Gallia asked as I entered her office. Like me, she was dressed in a skin-tight, plain white jumpsuit. It was the standard uniform on the Fortuna, regardless of rank.

One of many differences between Gallia and myself was that her jumpsuit complimented her raven black hair and green eyes, which were both reckless and wise simultaneously.

"Twenty-four," I answered.

She didn't seem pleased. "You're a little young, but it still might work."

A little young? Gallia wasn't that much older than me. Few women on the Fortuna were. Many left in their thirties, ready to fall in love and start a family after serving their time like my mother had.

"I've watched you train, Terra," Gallia stated. "You're one of the most skilled warriors on the Fortuna, but you have no bite. Why is that?"

"I think weapons should be the final solution, not the first," I said truthfully. I was confused as to why I was there.

Gallia frowned. "Even when the enemy already has their weapons pointed at you?" she asked.

"That's when your mind will catch them off-guard," I said earnestly.

"That sounds like fancy bullshit to me," she returned. "Why are you here if you won't fight? The whole reason for the Fortuna's existence is to fight."

I was getting nervous. Gallia's words suggested dissatisfaction with my performance. Was she thinking of sending me home?

I hoped not.

"The Fortuna is my legacy," I said, choosing my words carefully. "I've trained to be here since I was a little girl. It has always been my destiny. This space station is everything I know. I never said I wouldn't fight to protect it. I understand our purpose here. I just think we have to fight with our heads and our hearts as much as our fists."

"There's no heart in war," Gallia imparted. "You're naive to think so."

"Please don't send me home," I begged. "I'm an asset to this station."

She seemed amused. "Enlighten me."

"The girls trust me. They turn to me for support. They need me, especially now."

Gallia wasn't fazed. "That's why we have Bellona. She's here to provide counsel."

I thought of Bellona, the fiery priestess on board. "She's here to play a role. Her counsel is that of a superior. Mine is that of a friend."

I was panicked. I couldn't let Gallia send me home, no matter what the danger of staying here was. Although I did not want to fight, my life had a purpose on the Fortuna.

My last remark caught Gallia's attention. "You think Bellona is playing a role?"

"Bellona is an assassin before she is a priestess, able to live in the shadows, her first strike her last. Her counsel is sensible, but it's not always comforting. I mean, we're all playing a role here, right? I'm no kitchen porter. I can barely pretend to be one. I wish the Fortuna had a library. A real one, not the one with all the forged spiritual text. That's where I belong. I like to learn."

"And you're also a trained warrior," Gallia said thoughtfully.

"Yes, that too. Please don't send me away."

"I'm not sending you home," Gallia revealed, her expression softening. "You're right. You are an asset to the Fortuna, despite your own personal philosophies on warfare. That's why I'm making you Commander."

"Commander?" I asked, baffled. It didn't make sense. Why would Gallia put me in charge?

“Where will you be?”

“Right here beside you. We’re all playing a role. As far as the Surtu know, we’re women of the cloth, living in peace within a spiritual sanctuary in space. That’s why, unlike the other military stations that surround us, we have no guns or obvious weapons. There are no fighters like on the nearby base. Assuming the Surtu have long-range sensors, the last thing we need is for them to pick up on a storage room full of ammo. Our weapons are much more discreet.” Her lips curled into a proud, knowing smile. “And much more deadly.”

I thought of our last training session, where we learned to kill a man with our bare hands. We may not be armed with guns, just spears and daggers made up to look like religious artifacts, but we were as prepared for this war with the Surtu as the rest of the military stations set up to protect Earth.

None of this explained why Gallia was making me Commander. “Where does that leave me?”

Gallia folded her arms across her chest, surprisingly patient. “The problem with our facade is that women of the cloth are meant to be serene and insightful. Some would say even polite. I am none of those things, but you are all of them.”

Oh, now I understood. I wasn’t actually going to be in command. I was going to pretend to be in command, but this meant the task of collecting intelligence on the Surtu while Earth listened in would fall down to me.

Strangely, I was comfortable with the responsibility. Encouraged, even. Perhaps if I could discover what the Surtu really wanted, a war could be avoided.

Before I could work my mind around it further, Gallia added, “The Surtu have made contact.”

“With Earth?”

“Not Earth. With the Fortuna.”

That was shocking. “Why would they make contact with us first? We’re just a space station, and as far as they know, we’re not even military.”

Gallia shrugged. “Does it matter? It falls right into our plans.”

“I guess,” I conceded. “Did they say why they’re here?”

“No,” Gallia replied, “It wasn’t exactly a conversation. They sent a message directly to our satellite receivers – a galactic voicemail. They don’t want to hurt the women on board. They want the Fortuna intact. An envoy ship will land here tomorrow to negotiate our peaceful surrender.”

“So they’re buying it. They really do believe this is a sanctuary.”

“And we want them to continue to buy it,” Gallia insisted. “At least until I receive the signal from Earth to attack. We knew this day would come. As the one in charge, you’ll have to greet the envoy ship and its Lead Officer. You will be Earth’s first diplomatic contact with the Surtu. Everyone will be watching. Can you handle it?”

“Yes, Commander,” I answered in reflex.

“Not anymore. That’s your title from here on out. From now on, I’m just Gallia.”

“Yes, Gallia,” I corrected.

A shadow of concern passed across her face. “Remember, Terra, the only reason the Surtu are able to communicate with us in our language is because of what happened sixty years ago. They attacked an Earth colony, slaughtering the men and taking the women and children as slaves. They’ve had time to learn about us. We haven’t had the same luxury. We know very little, except for this – they’re not here to make friends. Neither are we.”

“Understood,” I said. I didn’t need the history lesson. Every Earth child knew the horror stories of the Surtu. The chances of negotiating a peace were small. But still...

“Good,” Gallia said. “Then it’s settled. I’ll tell Bellona to spread the word. Terra Lynch is now Commander of the Fortuna. Let’s hope you aren’t commanding the ship in her final hours.”

“I can’t believe they made you Commander,” Lucina gushed as she followed me down towards the docking bay. “I mean, you’re now the Queen Sister.”

“It doesn’t exactly come with privileges,” I reminded her.

“No, but it does come with a hideous costume,” Lucina said, laughing. “Gallia never had to wear that.”

I looked down at the pale blue Roman-inspired gown I wore. It was soft and billowy, meant to represent a woman of the same demeanor. It wasn’t hideous, it was quite exquisite, but I knew what Lucina meant.

I looked like a doll Earth had played dress up with. I guess in many ways, that’s exactly what I was.

“Are you scared?” she asked, keeping pace beside me.

“Yes,” I admitted. “You?”

“Yeah,” she answered, her smile weakening. “I’m trying to focus on the task, but this is too momentous. An alien race flew all the way across the stars to destroy us with God only knows what type of technology, and we’re about to welcome an entire ship of these Depraved onto our station.”

The Depraved. It was what Earth called the Surtu, usually in our folk stories. I hadn’t heard the term spoken since leaving Earth, but I had often thought it.

Lucina continued. “When our mothers sent us here as teenagers, I never imagined it would actually be us—”

“Shhh,” I warned her. “The envoy ship isn’t far. If they’re somehow listening in, they don’t need to know everything we did as teenagers.”

That’s what I said out loud. What I meant was, “They can’t know the three hundred women on the Fortuna are an army, not a sisterhood”.

But Lucina understood.

Outside the docking bay, a small reception gathered. Those in attendance had been handpicked by Gallia, either for their grace, their charm, or their ability to kill a man before he knew he was dead.

“Priestess,” I said in greeting to Bellona. Beneath her wild red hair and amber eyes, she showed no fear.

“Commander,” she returned, eyeing my dress smugly. “You look nice.”

“Then my ladies have done their job.”

My ladies was code for Earth, and right now, several of my ladies were watching and listening through a satellite feed. The surveillance on board the Fortuna was discreet, but I felt as if I had the eyes of a million men and women on me.

“The envoy ship is approaching,” Gallia told us, forcing all our attention on the transparent floor-to-ceiling divide that shielded us from the harsh conditions of space when the docking bay opened. “They land in five minutes.”

I nodded, getting myself ready. “And what of the other sisters on board?”

“Safe in their rooms,” Gallia answered. “Preparing.”

They would be sharpening their weapons and practicing for combat. We didn’t know when Earth would give the signal to attack, but it was likely a few days away at best. Right now, the priority was to garner intelligence and learn everything possible about the Surtu. Then we’d strike, launching the first of many military initiatives set up by the leaders of Earth.

“You ready?” Bellona asked. “Remember, you’re not Gallia. You’re you. That’s why you were chosen.”

“I’ve got this,” I assured her.

“Good, because here goes everything,” she said. Her eyes looked like hot steel as the docking bay shook with the arrival of the envoy ship. From behind the divide, I watched as the massive hatch to the docking bay opened, allowing a medium-sized craft to land within. It was angular and of a glossy silver element unnatural to Earth.

I guessed it could carry around a hundred people, as long as the Surtu were not fat giants or larger than the ancient elephants, as some of the legends told.

No one knew for sure. The survivors who escaped the Surtu attack on the colony were rarely seen in public. They were too traumatized to relive the events.

As the hatch closed, my body began shaking. I could not control it. Lucina had said it well. This was momentous, but for terrible reasons.

“It’s time,” Gallia instructed, pushing me closer to the divide. “The hatch is shut.”

“If anyone can do it, it’s you,” Lucina stated, always my cheerleader.

It was the boost of confidence I needed. Taking a deep breath, potentially my last as a free woman, I signaled to Gallia to drop the divide.

The Surtu ship sat eerily quiet. It looked like a masterpiece next to the much smaller cargo ships parked nearby.

I stepped further out into the docking bay, my entourage behind me. Adrenaline pumped through my body, and I was on edge. If this didn't go to plan, we wouldn't have time to wait for Earth's signal. The war would start now.

Suddenly, a white light filled the docking bay, taking away our sight. I held my hand against my head as if shielding myself from the sun.

Behind me, I heard Gallia move forward, but I reached out and blindly grabbed her arm. "Wait," I urged. "We don't know what this means. It could be harmless."

"It is harmless," a deep, almost musical voice said from somewhere in the light.

And then the light was gone, and we could see again.

My hold on Gallia's arm tightened, but this time for my own benefit. I needed to steady myself.

The dozen or so men who stood before me were not alien in the way any of the stories from my childhood told me. They looked completely human. Their height and build were slightly larger than the average man, and their eyes were much rounder and almond-shaped, almost elfin, but other than that, I was shocked by how human they looked.

It was hard to associate their physical appearance with the idea of the Depraved in my mind. This was the alien race who planned to destroy Earth?

"Are you the Commander of this space station?" one of the Surtu asked, stepping forward from the troop. He sounded like the same man who had spoken earlier, only now there was nothing musical in his tone. It was completely rigid and formal.

Game time.

"I am," I said, letting go of Gallia's arm as I straightened myself, the shock wearing off. "And who are you?" I asked, meeting him straight on.

Now face to face, I was taken aback by how attractive he was. His hair was so black. It was almost blue, matching perfectly with his eyes, a shade before midnight with flecks of white light around the pupil.

So. The aliens were hot.

Who cares, I thought, forcing myself to focus on my mission. It doesn't change anything.

"I am Jidden, the Lead Officer of this ship, under the command of my Fleet Captain," he answered.

"And I am Terra Lynch. The women here are under my care, along with our Head Priestess," I said, indicating Bellona behind me.

Jidden barely acknowledged her. "But you are the one in charge?" he confirmed.

"Yes," I said.

"Then I have no time for anyone else. She is not important to me."

Behind me, I heard Lucina snort. Bellona liked to live in the shadows, but she didn't tolerate disrespect. Everyone on the Fortuna knew it. Bellona maintained a diplomatic posture, but I could feel her seething.

Someone just made it to the top of her hit list.

“You have come here to negotiate our surrender,” I stated, trying to sound like an authority figure. “We have many terms to discuss, but you will not be met with resistance while you’re here. We wish for nothing but peace and open our doors to you freely.”

“Do you?” Jidden asked, raising a dark eyebrow in suspicion. “Because I have a hard time believing that.”

And then, to my horror, he ordered his troop of men to surround us.

When I was a teenager, I was obsessed with Earth’s past. What was the world like through the eyes of a girl my age? I read plenty of novels from eras long ago, and I was dismayed by how many predicted a dystopian future. Did people have so little faith in humanity back then?

The Earth was not a wasteland. As a child, I ran freely around the warm desert sands of a southern climate, usually carrying with me a long fighting stick so I could practice my combat skills against the Depraved, just like my mother had taught me.

Back then, in my childhood imagination, the Depraved were giant monsters, but I still kicked their ass.

Then, one day, I tripped over a stone while running. Though I fell in some sand, I still hurt my arm.

“Don’t cry, my little Terra,” my mother cooed, carrying me in her arms. “This is just a test to prove how strong you are.”

“A test?” I asked in my innocence, momentarily ignoring the pain. “Who’s testing me?”

“The Earth,” she replied. “That’s why it caused you to fall. It wants to know if you’re strong enough to protect it.”

“But my arm hurts,” I whimpered.

“Of course it does,” my mother acknowledged lovingly, and she squeezed me tight. “And I’ll take you home so we can mend it. But the test isn’t whether you are in pain. It’s whether you’ll get back up and fight.”

At the time, I just thought my mom was being weird, maybe even a little mean. But after coming to the Fortuna, I realized she had been preparing me for whatever my destiny held.

And as it turned out, she was right.

It’s a test, I thought, as Jidden and his troops surrounded us. If he really doubted our motives and knew we were warriors, the fleet would have fired on us. They wouldn’t have sent an envoy at all.

Trusting my instincts, I raised my hands in surrender. “We cannot fight back,” I claimed. “It goes against our moral code. We are peaceful women. Even if we wanted to, there are no weapons on board this ship to fight with.”

Unless you counted the stashes of daggers, spears, fighting sticks, and whatever else each woman had hidden away.

“Yes,” Jidden said, eyeing me carefully. “Our scanners showed only trivial weaponry. Nothing sophisticated. But why? Even a sisterhood is entitled to protection.”

“There’s nothing we need protection from,” I answered, praying the other girls didn’t make a move. “We’re alone on this station. When we need supplies from Earth, we fly down on cargo ships and collect the supplies ourselves. Regardless, our sisterhood is universally recognized. We don’t need protection from anyone because we are protected by everyone. Unless, of course, you mean to hurt us.”

“No,” Jidden said, and his men stood down. “Our Fleet Captain will not allow it.”

I dropped my arms, but I did not fully relax. Jidden’s words sounded compassionate, but they were spoken with great indifference. Clearly, his concern was the orders of his Fleet Captain and not the welfare of the women who called the Fortuna home.

What a jerk.

A stupid, gorgeous jerk.

On Earth, they must have been scrambling around trying to process the information they were receiving. Now they knew what type of guns the Surtu carried, their hierarchy of command, and that they were modest, dressed in uniforms of black and dark purple – the colors of a panther.

Again, it was all so humanoid. The line between our two species was very thinly drawn.

Acting submissive seemed to work, so I continued the charade, hoping to earn his trust. “How do we proceed from here?” I asked, dropping all sense of authority from my demeanor.

“The remainder of my men will disembark from the ship and take control of the station,” Jidden told, clearly more at ease now that I had given him command. “As long as there is no trouble, the women of this station will be allowed to continue on with their normal routine.”

“Will other ships be landing?” I asked, and then I quickly added, “Because we have plenty of room on the Fortuna if you wish to accommodate yourself. You will find our marble halls to be quite—”

“No,” he said, cutting me off. “All men who visit the Fortuna will remain housed within their own ship. We will be patrolling the station, but that is all.”

He didn’t directly answer my question, but his response was revealing. It sounded like other ships planned to dock. That was good news for me. It meant the signal to attack would be prolonged even further.

“And what of our negotiations?” I asked. “I have requests regarding our surrender.”

It was clear by his expression that Jidden felt no obligation to hear out any requests. To him, the surrender had already taken place. And in many ways, it had, but he complied. “Fine,” he said through gritted teeth. “I will hear you, in private. Name a place.”

In private? Alone? I had not expected that. My heart began to flutter, both in fear and for other reasons I refused to admit to myself. “The gardens,” I said, slightly off key. “Near the willows.”

“I will meet you there in...what is it you humans use...an hour,” he said. “Now leave us. I need to speak with my men.”

“I don’t like this,” Bellona declared, struggling not to walk ahead of me as we made our way towards the Grand Hall. “We have given them too much.”

“For now,” Gallia said, using her soothing voice to help calm Bellona.

“It could be worse,” I said.

“How could it be worse?” Bellona cried. “They have total control over the Fortuna.”

“They think they have total control,” Gallia corrected. “Terra is right. It could be much worse. You know the stories of the colony that was attacked. What they did to the women...My biggest fear going into today was that we were going to have to abort our mission in order to protect our integrity. At least, for now, that’s something we don’t have to worry about.”

That’s why I respected Gallia, despite the fact that she had never warmed to me. She had her flaws, but she would never expect us to give up our bodies freely, not even for the sake of intelligence.

“It’s a shame they are so damn hot,” Lucina chirped beside me. “When the time comes, it’ll make slitting their throats a lot more depressing than if they had fangs or slobbered everywhere. Did you see the way their eyes sparked?”

“I don’t mind a little fang,” Gallia divulged. “There’s no pleasure without danger.”

For the life of me, I couldn’t tell if she was joking or not.

“We shouldn’t be having this discussion in the open,” I suggested, afraid the Surtu were somehow following our conversation.

The women around me went silent in agreement, until Lucina said, “You did good, Commander, dealing with their Lead Officer.” She smiled as she called me Commander. It was awkward, even for me. “But you don’t have to meet him alone in the gardens. We’ll come with you.”

“I think he’ll talk more freely if she’s alone,” Gallia objected, whispering.

“I’ll be okay,” I assured Lucina. “Thanks, anyway.”

The truth was, I didn’t know what to expect. The only thing I could gauge from my conversation with Jidden was that he couldn’t care less what happened to anybody on board the Fortuna. I saw nothing but disdain in his eyes.

I wanted to ask Bellona what I should say to him regarding the negotiations. She would give me wise counsel. When I turned towards her, she was gone, having disappeared into the shadows.

Chapter 2

JIDDEN

“Did you see the little blonde?” Kalij asked from his seat on an ammo box while he polished his blaster. “I bet I could please her in a way no human man could.”

I immediately went over to him and yanked the blaster from his hands before shoving him in the gut with it. “You know the Fleet Captain’s orders. The women are to be left alone.”

“The women are why we’re here,” Kalij sputtered between breaths as he held his stomach.

If I had it my way, the men could do what they wanted to the women. It made no difference to me, but I wasn’t going to let the redheaded bastard steal my shot at a promotion.

“You touch her, you die,” I warned. “The lives of these women are worth more than your own. Our planet has plenty of soldiers. Don’t make the mistake of assuming you are irreplaceable.”

“What about the light bond?” Kalij asked, recovering.

I wanted to smack his ruby head, but the other men around us laughed, humiliating him for me.

“You’d never light bond,” one of the soldiers alleged, chuckling. “One woman for the rest of your life? You’d rather have ten ugly ones than be stuck with that blonde the rest of your life.”

Kalij merely grunted.

Unable to tolerate any more of the heathens, I went to my quarters. I looked forward to the day I was promoted and no longer had to play big brother to a bunch of thugs.

Being Lead Officer of a ship was impressive, but there were other, more profitable titles to be had – titles where respect wasn’t earned, it was mandated. Securing the Fortuna nearly guaranteed me a promotion if everything went according to plan.

My one doubt about the plan was the Commander of the station, Terra.

Thinking of her made me ache like a man, but I pushed it aside. She was superb, and she worried me. There was an intelligence within her, so strong it was mesmerizing. I could see it in her doe-brown eyes – a soul that was much older than the twenty-odd years she appeared to be.

Women like that – they didn’t run off to join a sisterhood. I could believe that she was in charge of the Fortuna, but I knew there was much more to her than some spiritual nutcase.

And that made her a threat.

Too bad beauty was so dangerous...

I shook my head, hoping the physical action would take the thought in my mind away. Claiming a woman was not in my plans. I wanted a promotion. I wanted power. That was what mattered.

So why couldn't I get Terra out of my mind?

Chapter 3

TERRA

Around me, the soft branches of the willow trees touched to the ground, sweeping lightly against the creek that ran through the gardens. On a normal evening, the gardens were my favorite spot on the station.

This was no normal evening. Normal no longer existed, thanks to the Surtu, not since their first attack on the colony.

Earth had only a few colonies that inhabited foreign planets. They were not favored. The expeditions to the colonies cost a great deal of money, and a large percentage of the ‘explorers’ died on the journey or the new planet, usually due to some technical glitch like a busted air mask.

Florentine was different. It was the one colony everyone on Earth was excited about. The atmosphere on Florentine was comparable to Earth’s. No air masks were required, no heavy space suits. It was a second home, and it was a backup plan for our species.

Should anything happen to Earth, humanity would not perish. We would live on.

Then the Surtu attacked. Until the attack on Florentine, alien races were still a myth. Scientists hypothesized that they could exist, somewhere out there, but no contact had ever been made.

If only that were still true. Then all the women and children on Florentine wouldn’t have been taken as slaves. And the men wouldn’t have been slaughtered.

And the Fortuna wouldn’t have need to exist.

I looked up at the stars through the transparent roof, made of the same unbreakable material as the divide in the docking bay. Among the stars was Florentine, now isolated. I wondered if any of the people taken were still alive. If they lived, where were they?

I didn’t know how the handful of survivors escaped the attack on Florentine, but thank God they did. Otherwise, they never would have been able to warn Earth about the Surtu. We wouldn’t have been prepared.

The problem was I didn’t feel prepared. I’d been thrown into the role of Commander the way a baby bird is tossed out of its nest into the air and expected to fly.

I was willing, but I wasn’t ready.

That didn’t matter now. Jidden was here, in the gardens. Lucina led him to where I waited, and then she left, leaving us alone.

He had changed into a navy blue uniform that highlighted his dark features. The uniform was sharp and sophisticated, matching Jidden well. I wanted to hate him, his uniform, and everything they represented, but I couldn't, not until I heard what the Surtu needed.

As children, we may have whispered over campfires about the Depraved – monsters that roamed space – but my heart told me the Surtu were not barbarians. If their plan was to simply annihilate Earth, they would have already done so.

They needed something from us. I was sure of it.

“Don't look at me like that,” Jidden said, forgoing any formal greeting. “I'm not a specimen to be studied.”

“Then tell me why you're here,” I prompted, hoping he would reveal information Earth was looking for. We may look alone, but there were ears listening in.

“You'll know, in time,” he said. “You may be the Commander of this space station. I may be the Lead Officer of my ship, but there are people above both of us who will decide when that conversation takes place.”

So he had a reverence for hierarchies. It might work to my advantage. “As a Commander, I pull rank over you. I'd appreciate it if you weren't so evasive.”

Oops. Bad mistake. He was indignant, to say the least.

“And as a Surtu, I pull rank over you,” he snapped.

“That remains to be seen. You haven't conquered Earth yet.”

“But I have taken over this station.”

“Because you had no choice.”

Terra, stop it! I scolded myself. I didn't know why I was arguing with him. The plan was not to anger the sexy alien. I had to earn his trust and get him to talk.

But something about his gorgeous body and mythological eyes...

I took a deep breath. “Yes,” I said, smoothing the edges of my pale blue dress. Unlike Jidden, I had not changed clothes. “We had no choice. We are a peaceful sisterhood. We do not want war. No one profits from war, no matter who wins. Everyone suffers.”

“Finally, I hear something legitimate from you,” Jidden said. “That's probably the first authentic thing you've said to me since I arrived.”

He was right. My thoughts on war were my own, but it alarmed me that he could read me so well. If he had suspicions that I was not being truthful, I had to squash them.

Everything depended on it.

So be truthful, I told myself. It's the only way you'll earn his trust.

“I'd like to show you something,” I said, and I waved my hand to the side. “Hologram,” I instructed. “Earth.”

“What are you—” Jidden began to ask, but he stopped when a magnificent blue marble appeared above us – a perfect replica of Earth.

With a further wave of my hand, I spun it around. “I know you can see Earth from your ships. By now, you’ve probably mapped it out in fine detail.”

He didn’t deny it.

I continued. “But I want to show you a special part of Earth.”

With several swipes, the hologram zoomed onto a small house in the middle of the desert. It was a humble structure, but it was warm and welcoming. For a moment, I forgot I was on the Fortuna. I was a child again, running around with my brothers while our parents chased us beneath the blazing sun.

“This is where I grew up,” I told Jidden. “This is my home. The image was taken last year when our satellites were last updated.”

For once, Jidden’s indifference disappeared. He seemed genuinely interested. “Where is everyone?” he asked, studying the image.

I had asked the same thing when I first saw the hologram. But I soon learned the answer. “Inside drinking lemonade,” I said. “That summer was particularly hot. My youngest brother – he still lives at home – planted a lemon tree the year before. No one believed it would actually grow in the desert, but somehow my brother managed it. My family spend the entire summer indoors drinking his miracle lemons.”

A thought occurred to me, and I spoke without thinking. “Do you honor family where you come from?”

“My planet is Surt. That is why we are the Surtu, and yes, we honor our family. We are very similar, humans and the Surtu. It is because of these similarities that we are here.”

Oh yeah. The war. I’d almost forgotten.

Jidden had just exposed something significant. I wanted to ask more, but I didn’t, afraid of breaking the momentum. He seemed to speak more freely when it was of his own accord.

Instead, I zoomed in closer to my house, all the way to the porch steps. On the side of the steps was my messy scribbling.

Love is intelligence.

“I wrote it when I was little,” I reminisced. “After reading it in a book. It sits there today.”

“What does it mean?” he questioned. “It doesn’t make sense. Love is an emotion. Intelligence is void of emotion.”

“Intelligence is many things, but void of emotion is not one of them. When I see an old man begging for food, my heart breaks because I have the knowledge that there is enough in the world to feed everyone, and the intelligence to understand that it will probably never happen.”

He frowned. “I’m not convinced. I’ve seen people in love. They’re idiots.”

I flicked the hologram so that it zoomed back out, showing Earth in its entirety. Then I zoomed further, revealing the hundreds of millions of stars in our galaxy. “Love is a connection, and we are all connected. There’s no higher intelligence than that – the understanding that everything is connected, including the Surtu and humans. Am I right?" I asked.

Jidden was confused. "That love is intelligence?"

"That the Surtu and humans are connected." The time for being coy was over. "You need something from us. Why else would you be here?"

He seemed surprised by my insight. "Maybe we're just bloodthirsty," he said.

"Or maybe you're stalling, waiting for more ships to arrive so you can take whatever it is that you need."

It was a risk. Jidden did not like being usurped.

Unfortunately, the risk didn't pay off. "I'd like to share a story with you," he said, retreating away from the direction the conversation had taken. "Will we walk as I tell it?"

"Okay," I agreed, trying to show him my trust, hoping to earn some back in return.

We strolled side by side along the creek, the willows brushing our shoulders. We walked for a while before he spoke again. "A popular goddess amongst the ancient Surtu was Nelti, a woman of great beauty with auburn hair and eyes without color, only flecks of light. She was a dark warrior, showing no mercy to her enemies. However, her ruthlessness was only to protect that which she loved. The ancients worshiped her because they believed she watched over their homes and their families. They considered her ruthlessness a gift."

His story of Nelti made me feel apprehensive. It sounded too much like the women of the Fortuna, so I went on the defense. "I don't think I understand what your point is. Are you saying it would be better if I was ruthless rather than peaceful?"

"I'm saying there is already something ruthless about you."

We were deep within the depths of the gardens now, in a spot where nature had run wild, claiming part of the space station as its own. Among the trees and wildflowers, I did not believe even Earth had surveillance.

We were utterly alone.

"Why haven't you made any demands for your sisters regarding their surrender? Isn't that why we are meeting this evening?" he asked, his voice full of authority, but his indifference from our first encounter waned, replaced with a hint of emotion.

It made me weak. It was easy to deal with him when he was cold. But to see any warmth in him at all made my heart flutter again. He was so exotic and strong...

"I was trying to earn your trust so that when I did negotiate our surrender, you were more likely to accept my terms."

It was a half-truth.

He moved closer to me. Too close.

My God, he was intoxicating.

I wanted to back away, I knew I should back away, but I couldn't.

"And what do you wish for your girls?" he asked.

“Their survival. Their freedom.”

“I can guarantee their survival,” he said, “but nothing more.”

“That’s not enough,” I told him.

Why did I suddenly feel like a teenage girl again, the night I gave myself to Gerard Dalton? I was full of the same anticipation now as I was back then.

It’s the gardens, I surmised. I’m not thinking clearly.

I turned to head back to where we could be seen and heard again, but Jidden grabbed my arm. His touch was gentle but insistent. “We have more to talk about,” he said. “Tell me what you’re hiding.”

“Tell me what you have planned for the Fortuna,” I countered, but I didn’t move away. “And the women on board.”

He wouldn’t. I already knew that. His silence confirmed it.

“Then tell me why you insisted we talk in private.”

This caught him off-guard. “I thought it would be better,” he answered after a moment.

He’s not sure why, I realized. Cold, indifferent Jidden had acted on impulse.

“At least tell me something real about you,” I pushed. “Anything.”

“I’m an orphan,” he answered, surprising me, and I think he surprised himself. “My mother died from the disease when I was young, and a few years later, my father was killed in a military training accident. He was a celebrated soldier, so his Captain took me in and raised me. The military is all I know. I don’t know what it’s like to have a home out in the middle of the desert. Or to drink lemonade. All I know about are ships.”

There was a real sadness when he spoke. It appeared neither of us was winning this game of tug-of-war between us, each trying to draw the truth from the other without revealing too much of our own.

“I’m sorry to hear it—” I began, but before I could say anything further, he kissed me.

Kissing Jidden was wrong. I knew it. I was a traitor to my people, but I couldn’t stop. During our time in the gardens, we had revealed more to each other than either of us meant to. I had enjoyed sharing images of my home with him. It felt compulsory to do so as if we were connected by a force much greater than our flawed selves.

And his kiss...It was firm and passionate and impossible to turn away from.

It was strange kissing an alien, but not in a bad way. It was like tasting a new exotic fruit – sweet and tantalizing and, in Jidden’s case, extremely dangerous. But it was the danger that made it all the better.

Gallia was right. There was more pleasure where there was danger.

Jidden pulled me tighter into his arms, and his kiss became more urgent. He had no intention of stopping, and I didn't want him to. My body was already responding to his touch, and his to mine. I could feel his cock growing as we kissed. Jidden may be an alien, but he was all man.

I pulled him back beneath a tree, using a thick, low branch as support. He was tall and broad, much more so than the average human male. I could handle the weight of his muscle as he leaned into me, but only barely.

"I want to know what a human woman feels like," he said, his voice deep and powerful.

"Go ahead," I permitted, feeling myself grow wet in anticipation.

He gently positioned me on the branch so that I was sitting down and his hand disappeared beneath my dress. His hand was strong as it traveled up my thigh, pushing the pale blue fabric of the dress away as he edged closer to my center. My eagerness to know his touch caused my core to pulse, and my heart to race.

Finally, his hand reached me.

Exploring me, I felt his fingers lightly circle the edges of my folds, lingering on the outside, causing me to swell.

"You're not wearing any garments under your dress," he observed.

"No," I said, breathless. Willing his hand to explore deeper inside me, I secured myself on the branch and opened my legs wider.

With a smug smile, he complied, pushing two of his fingers in. I moaned and arched my back, letting him explore.

"You're so ripe and healthy," he said, moving closer into me. "You feel fantastic."

I couldn't respond. His strong, ardent touch blew my mind. His fingers moved inside me like a key turning a lock, hitting all the right places, sending chills of rapture across my body. I shuddered, and he responded by exploring further, caressing his fingers in and out of me as I grew wetter, soaking him.

"I'm going to come," I warned, feeling a glorious heat build within my core. "You're going to make me come."

He didn't stop. Instead, he thrust harder, rocking my body. "I want to watch you," he said, plunging his fingers deeper inside me. "Come for me."

I did. I couldn't control it. A fury of ecstasy overtook me as I rode the sweet release, falling further into his touch, taking all of him in.

Even after I came, his hand lingered, readying me for more.

He wasn't through.

And neither was I.

My core pulsed again, craving more. I reached down and took his cock into my hand. It was large and thick, much like the branch I sat on, but his cock was also warm, like a furnace. I wanted to know what that furnace felt like inside of me.

Jidden closed his eyes as I removed his uniform, exposing him to the wilds of the garden. His cock looked as massive as it had felt in my hand, but despite its enormous size, it was normal. Human-looking.

“Tell me you want it,” he demanded.

“I want it,” I said with the greatest of truth. “I want your cock inside me.”

With much more force than before, he grabbed me around the ass with both hands and pushed me in close to him. Then he raised me slightly off the branch and slid me over his cock.

The fullness of it sent electric shocks surging through my body. I felt complete. It was almost sentimental, if not for the excruciating pleasure that came from his deep, lingering thrusts. I laid back on the branch, allowing him to drive deeper into me, as much for my benefit as his.

His movements were slow. His cock caressing me much like his fingers had, but when I began to moan as the heat built inside me once more, like a tidal wave of power, his thrusts became more urgent, igniting me from the inside in a way I had never known before. I floated from my body, swimming in agonizing bliss until I could bear it no longer. I went supernova, becoming like the stars in the sky, releasing my joy all around me.

With one final thrust, he joined me, calling my name as he came, as if I were his last wish. Together, we experienced just how closely connected a Surtu and human could become.

When he finished, I sat up on the branch and held him as he collapsed into my arms, our sweat mixing together as our bodies tangled, breathless and recovering.

Chapter 4

JIDDEN

*A*s I leaned into Terra's arms and breathed in her scent, which was earthy like cinnamon, I realized what a fool I was.

I had disobeyed a direct command. I risked not only my promotion but my life, and still I did not care. Terra had a hold on me that went against my will. She was an elixir I could not help but drink from, both potent and healing.

That made her even more dangerous than I originally thought.

Yet still, I could not pull away from her, even though I knew it meant I risked everything I had worked for.

I wanted to stay like this, just the two of us.

And then I remembered the plan – what was happening as I distracted the Commander of the Fortuna.

And I knew once she found out, Terra would never forgive me.

Perhaps it was for the best. I was just a soldier. Even if I wanted to claim a woman, to light bond with one, it could not be her. She was a Commander and above my station.

Reluctantly, I let go.

Chapter 5

TERRA

I have to go. The men are expecting me back on the ship to count out the ammo.

I bit my lip. My mind replayed Jidden's last words to me before he slipped away, and I returned to civilization – what was left of it with the Surtu in charge.

Now that I was alone in the gardens, the full reality of what just happened hit me. I was ashamed and conflicted. I wanted to believe our intimacy had meant something, that it wasn't a careless act, and I had not betrayed my people. I was having a hard time casting my guilt away, especially after the way Jidden left so suddenly.

There was no connection between us, I realized. I had imagined it, trying to justify my lust.

That made me a traitor.

Standing up from the branch, finally regaining my strength, I tidied my dress, then went to the creek to splash water on my face. I withheld the tears that threatened to pour out of my eyes by focusing on what Jidden had said.

Count out the ammo.

We had surrendered peacefully. Why would they still be concerned about how much ammo they had? Unless they were planning another attack, perhaps on the neighboring space station.

Is that why they wanted the Fortuna? Were we hostages of the Surtu's new command center?

Jidden and his ship were no envoys. I was sure of it now. We had been playing each other.

I rushed back, following the creek away from isolation, back to where the lights of the space station guided my path. I had to get to Gallia. She could help me warn Earth. The time for recognizance was gone. We had to strike. If we didn't take back control of the Fortuna, more ships would land and it would be more than we could handle.

Suddenly, I was grabbed from behind and dragged back towards the shadows. I would have fought back, used the skills I'd fostered since childhood to defend myself, but I didn't need to. I knew who took me. I had been dragged around by her many times before in combat training.

It was Bellona.

"I need to leave," I said when she released me.

Suddenly, the ground shook. Another ship had landed. With luck, only one.

"Like now," I added.

“It’s too late,” she asserted, her fiery amber eyes lost somewhere between anger and sorrow. “They’ve already attacked.”

I fell against a tree, willing myself to stay calm. I had to focus. Otherwise, I was no help to anyone. “They attacked the Fortuna?”

Bellona nodded, her anger winning out. It was almost scary how red her eyes became when they were ablaze.

I had been wrong. The Surtu weren’t using the Fortuna to attack our neighbors.

They were attacking us.

They must have figured out who we were. Or they had always known.

That meant Jidden...

I didn’t want to think about it. It didn’t matter. He didn’t matter, right now.

“Are our sisters fighting back?” I asked.

“Of course,” Bellona snapped, scowling. “This is what we trained for. We’re Earth’s first line of defense. But our weapons...compared to theirs? I thought it was smart, training us to be stronger than a blaster and how to use our agility to our advantage. But I was wrong. It wasn’t smart; it was suicidal. What was Earth thinking?”

“Maybe the Fortuna was never about combat,” I speculated. “Maybe we were only meant to be intelligence. The first line of defense wasn’t weaponry; it was knowledge.”

Great job I did, allowing the enemy to distract me when I should have been gathering more information for Earth.

Bellona must have read my expression. “Hey, don’t do that. Don’t let them defeat you. You did what you could. In the short amount of time you had, a lot of information was uncovered. Their ship was scanned. We learned about the Surtu hierarchy. It all helps Earth build a stronger guard. We may be the first line of defense, but we aren’t the last. Even if we fall, Earth still has a good chance of surviving. And so do we.”

“How?” I asked. “How can we possibly survive this? You said it yourself. It’s a suicide mission. We can’t compete with their blasters.”

“That’s what’s strange,” Bellona said, baffled. “They haven’t killed anyone. Not yet. They’re rounding the women up. It’s more of a siege than an attack. I’m not really sure what’s going on. That’s why I’m keeping to the shadows. The more we know, the better chance we have to save our sisters.”

The weight on my shoulders lifted. It wasn’t by much, but it allowed me some composure. “So no has died?”

Bellona allowed herself to smile. “No woman has.”

This was good news. “And how many ships have landed?”

“Just the one other, from what I can tell.”

“But it makes no sense.” I worked the siege around in my mind like a math equation. “We had surrendered peacefully. Why are they suddenly acting hostile?”

“They were always hostile. We just didn’t know it.”

“No,” I said. “I mean, yes, they were likely always hostile. But something else is going on here. Okay, let’s assume they know we’re not women of the cloth but actually a space station of femme fatales. Why not attack upon arrival?”

“They needed time to scout.”

She was right. I could see it. They wanted to gain our trust so that they could scout the station for our weaknesses before taking our weapons. “This isn’t about executing the women,” I concluded. “This is about disarming us. They must have known we meant to attack.”

Damn, Jidden was good. The way he had called our weaponry trivial, the way he had tested us in the docking bay to see if we would resist or play the game. It was all a ploy.

As was the way he had distracted me.

“I’m such a fool,” I said under my breath.

Bellona stared out into the distance, towards the inner station where our sisters battled against the Surtu. I could tell it was taking all her will not to go and fight, but she was right – the more we knew about what was happening, the better chance all the women on board the Fortuna had at surviving.

“They’re going to take us as slaves,” Bellona announced. “That’s why they’re not executing us. We’re going to be like the women on the colony. That’s what they need us for.”

It hit me then, exactly what all of this was about. The revelation was strong, sending me into shock. “What they need us for,” I echoed, closing my eyes, imagining the women on the colony being shipped off to some unknown planet like cattle. “That’s why they’re here.”

“Go on,” Bellona encouraged. I had her full attention.

“The women. They need the women. I don’t understand why, but I’m sure of it. Think about it – on the colony, they killed all the men. Only the women and children were taken as slaves. That’s why the Surtu didn’t attack the Fortuna. That’s why they’ve gone through all this trouble to strategize a way to take the station with as few casualties as possible. And it’s why they haven’t attacked Earth with their fancy technology. They can’t risk hurting the women. They need us.”

I knew Bellona agreed. I could see it in the way the flames in her eyes jumped from anger to rage. “One of them has Lucina. I’m afraid of what he’s going to do with her.”

My heart stopped. “What?” I asked.

“While our sisters were being rounded into the Grand Hall, one by one as they fell, I watched as a man with hair a much dirtier shade of red than my own grabbed Lucina. He didn’t take her to the Grand Hall. I don’t know where he took her. I lost sight in the rampage.”

I had trained to be a warrior since I was a little girl. I don’t know when my mind flipped against war or when I began to believe that there was a better solution. It had probably occurred while I was reading, when my adolescent mind was full of ideals, preferring the joy of peace over the tragedy of combat.

But that changed the moment Bellona told me about Lucina. An animal instinct took over and overwhelmed my intellect. I marched away from the gardens, towards the inner station.

“Wait!” Bellona called behind me. “You can’t save her, not without getting caught. I need your help.”

“You are like a shadow,” I said, more serious than I had ever been before. “If anyone has a chance of escaping capture, it’s you. But I’m not meant for the shadows. I need the light. If something happened to Lucina, I’d never forgive myself.”

“I understand,” Bellona said solemnly.

Before I could say anything further, she slipped back into the unknown.

I charged ahead, towards my quarters where I had hidden several weapons. Even if they had trashed my room, the Surtu would not have found them.

I had hoped that amongst the fighting, I could slide towards my quarters without being noticed. A warrior with a sword was worth much more attention than a mousy brunette treading quietly against the wall. But as soon as I entered the corridor of the inner station, I realized my mistake. Few women still fought, and their numbers dwindled quickly.

There was a rhythm to the battle. Soldiers with blasters would cause a distraction while others came from behind and disarmed the women. It was like watching poachers capture a rare cat, handling the creature carefully so as not to harm its coat.

“Stop there,” a soldier yelled behind me. I kept walking, praying he was talking to someone else, but then he grabbed my shoulder and spun me around. His face had the same mythological quality to it as all the Surtu, but his smile was grotesque. “Look, it’s the pretty Commander. I think I’ll claim you for myself.”

“You can’t claim her,” Jidden proclaimed, appearing beside him. “No soldier can. She is a superior, she is extremely intelligent and has a high rank. She’s not meant for soldiers like us.”

A small part of me was relieved to see him. The bigger part of me wanted to slap him.

He’d used me.

I’d let him.

“I never heard that before,” the soldier said, refusing to move. He had me pinned in a corner, and he knew it.

“Do you really think the Fleet Captain and his financiers will approve of a light bond between someone like her and someone like you?” Jidden challenged. “Do you think they’ll just give her away that easy when they could have her?”

The soldier faltered. It was the hesitation Jidden was looking for. He knocked the blaster out of the soldier’s hand. It would have been my moment to run, but there was nowhere to go. More soldiers filled the corridor, blocking my path. All I could do was watch as Jidden and the soldier started to fight.

Please be okay, Lucina, I thought, feeling sick at the idea of her locked away with one of these monsters.

The stories from childhood were true. The Surtu were monsters. They were the kind that stole the souls of women in the middle of the night.

I didn't want Jidden's help, but I knew I was safer in his hands than any other, so I was horrified when the soldier pulled a knife from his boot. The hilt was encrusted with a crescent moon. It was one of ours, taken from the hand of one of my sister warriors.

With the knife firmly in his hand, the soldier took a swipe at Jidden, but he missed. He tried again, but Jidden kept dancing around him, much quicker and more capable.

When the soldier lunged forward one last time, Jidden dodged and caused the soldier to stumble. The move ended the fight, but not in the way either man intended.

The soldier fell straight into me.

I felt the blade go through my abdomen, but I didn't feel any pain. I was in too much shock. The hilt glowed against the florescent lights of the corridor, calling my destiny out to me. I was mesmerized by the glow, reminded of how I thought the Surtu ships looked like glow flies out in the distance from my kitchen window.

Then the glow wavered, dimming as I bled.

I remembered Jidden picking me up in his arms, but that was the last thing that went through my mind.

The light hurt my eyes.

I struggled to wake up, unsure of where I was. A thick fog clouded my mind, and the glare around me blinded my eyes. What could I remember? I had been talking to Bellona in the gardens of the Fortuna, the space station I was now Commander of. And what about Lucina?

Oh God, Lucina!

Bellona had informed me that while the other sister warriors defended the Fortuna against the invading Surtu, Lucina, my best friend, had been taken captive by some redheaded mutt of a soldier. I had gone to look for her, intending first to go to my quarters and retrieve my hidden weapons – weapons I thought I'd never use.

And I had been stabbed.

Wide awake now, I pulled up the shirt I was wearing. There was a bandage around my waist which covered the stab wound, but I wasn't in pain.

"Our medicine is far more advanced than yours," Jidden said from across the room, "but even our medicine has limits. You're lucky the knife missed your heart."

I hadn't even asked a question. He was reprimanding me, but I barely noticed, suddenly realizing that I was no longer on the Fortuna. Nor was I in my clothes. I wore a gray thermal-looking top over white shorts. The clothes were too small to belong to Jidden. I had no idea how these garments appeared.

I wasn't even sure how long I'd been out.

"Where are we?" I demanded, looking around at what appeared to be sleeping quarters of a mental asylum. The walls cold steel with no decor, unless I counted the tiny window above the bed where I sat as interior design. A narrow closet and a desk lined the wall to my left, but there was little else.

"We're on my ship," Jidden replied, pulling off his top.

I briefly lost focus as I tried not to stare at his hard, chiseled physique, but I couldn't help myself. Jidden was many things, and unfortunately for me, sexy was one of them. The Surtu were a mesmerizing race – almost completely humanoid except for their broader height and elfin eyes, but Jidden was something special altogether. There was a depth in his dark blue eyes, which had flecks of light around the pupils. He was unaware of how mesmerizing his eyes were.

Ashamed, I thought of how intimate we'd been in the gardens, of his hand sliding up my thigh, exploring me.

I shook the memory away. It didn't mean anything. He'd wanted to distract me while his soldiers sieged the space station, so he'd seduced me. It was strategic.

Why do you have to be so hot? I thought, praying he would magically turn into some hideous creature. When that didn't work, I willed him to put his shirt back on so that I could hate him properly.

He didn't.

The ship shook, and I nearly fell off the bed. "Are we moving?" I gasped. Panicked, I stood and pulled up the metal shade covering the window.

"Yes," Jidden answered, but I didn't need him to. I could see the Fortuna growing smaller in the distance. We were heading deeper into space than I had ever been before. "I'm taking you to my Fleet Captain."

He was irritated. I didn't understand why. I was the prisoner being transported, handed like cattle from one owner to the next.

I didn't fear for my safety. Jidden wouldn't have saved me only to kill me later. He was cold and calculating, but he wasn't sadistic. I was scared for my integrity, however. I refused to be a slave like the women from Florentine, the Earth colony the Surtu had attacked sixty years prior. The Surtu slaughtered all the men, and the women and children were taken captive.

"You can't do this to me," I said earnestly, hoping to appeal to the gentler side of him, a side he kept hidden. I'd seen it, out in the garden. "You can't turn people into slaves. We may be human, but we're still people."

Jidden reached into his closet and pulled out a fresh top. It was black, similar to the uniform he'd worn when he first arrived on the Fortuna. "You fight well, but you were never a match for my soldiers," he said, pulling the top over his head. "You were fools to think you could defeat us."

He left the room, locking me in.

Chapter 6

JIDDEN

I had nowhere to go when I left the room. I just needed to get away from her.

I preferred Terra when she was asleep. She had looked so beautiful lying in my bed, her wavy brown hair falling over the sheets in a way that made me ache to touch her again.

Seducing her in the gardens had not been part of the plan. I had meant to distract her while my men sieged the space station, but what happened in the dark of the wood?

That was spontaneous.

I couldn't let it happen again. I wasn't some low-class gunner ruled by my lust. I was better than that. I was disciplined and the Lead Officer of my ship. I needed to set an example for my men and not be captivated by some human woman, no matter how fascinating she was.

Even if I did want to find a mate to light bond with, it couldn't be Terra. I hoped she would forgive me for deceiving her, but she was an elite mate. She was Commander of a space station, and she was intelligent. Those who outranked me would claim her before I could. I had to oblige.

I was still just a soldier. For now.

Chapter 7

TERRA

I couldn't get Lucina out of my mind, even as our ship docked, attaching itself to another larger ship like two pieces of a puzzle. Out the window, the Fortuna was a mere dot and hardly noticeable against the backdrop of stars.

The rage I'd felt hearing about Lucina being taken captive lingered within me, even as I realized all of the women of the Fortuna were now hostages. A tiny part of me still did not believe a war was the answer. With war, humans and the Surtu equally risked destruction. There had to be another way.

My instincts told me the Surtu were here for the women. It made sense.

On Florentine, they'd only killed the men. And when they invaded the Fortuna, they tried not to hurt my sister warriors, as if we were prizes in a game of hide-and-seek. Jidden had said it himself.

I can guarantee their survival, but nothing more.

I simply had to figure out why they flew across the stars for us.

Jidden returned to the room. The air around him could freeze a polar bear. None of the affection he had showed me before remained.

"It's time to go," he said firmly, leaving no room for me to object. "Captain Fore, the man in charge of this fleet, is waiting."

I obeyed, not because Jidden intimidated me, but because all I possessed at the moment was my dignity. I didn't want him dragging me out.

"Thank you, by the way," I said, passing by him briskly as I entered the long corridor. "For saving me. I appreciate it."

He seemed surprised by my thanks, but it did not change the frigid atmosphere between us. "The soldier who cornered you was out of line. Better men put a claim on women like you."

"No one's putting a claim on me," I muttered. "Least of all who your kind deems worthy."

We continued our walk in silence. I had questions, and I wanted to get answers. Now was not the time for that. I needed to focus and take in everything I could about the ship in case I was able to escape and contact Earth.

I will escape, I thought to myself. I need redemption. I let the Fortuna fall.

We passed beneath a giant metal arch. I assumed it was where the ships met. Soon after, we arrived at the Fleet Captain's office.

The office was functional, not decorative. Like Jidden's sleeping quarters, it was sterile and efficient, furnished only by the necessities. Though it was small, great power radiated from a man behind the desk at the center of the room. Wearing the same black uniform as Jidden, he looked to be in his sixties, his hair tipped with gray. The flecks of light in his eyes crackled with vitality.

"Your charade was clever," he told me, his voice booming across the room. Polite greetings seemed to be beyond the Surtu. "But it wasn't clever enough. Did you think we'd believe you were holy women or that the Fortuna was a sanctuary? Not only did you have military arms, but you also had a fight in your eyes. We knew that you were bait."

"Then why siege the ship?" I asked. "We'd already surrendered."

"No, you hadn't," Captain Fore argued. "You pretended to surrender so that you could learn about us before it was time to strike, just as we did to you when we pretended to send an envoy ship."

"We played each other," I concluded, not for the first time.

Captain Fore smiled. "But the Surtu won."

"For now," I said, forcing an unnatural confidence into my tone. I may have only been made Commander of the Fortuna because I was the most believable, but I still had a role to play and information to gather. "So why are you here?"

"For you," Jidden answered. He was standing behind me and refusing to be forgotten.

"For the women of Earth," Captain explained. "Two centuries ago, Surt was hit by a large meteorite. It did not alarm us. The damage was minimal. If anything, it was a scientific curiosity. But then our women began to die, taken by a mysterious disease."

It was terrible to hear, but I was intrigued. It explained many things.

"In the decade that followed, the population of women on our planet rapidly diminished. Thankfully, some were genetically immune to the disease, and others fought it and survived, but my people knew it was only a matter of time before we faced total extinction. We sent expeditions into space in search of an alien race genetically compatible with our own."

"The universe works in patterns. All the races are similar, no matter what their origin is. A flower on one end of the world is similar to a flower on the other end, requiring the same minerals to grow and the same air to breathe. Although we found many races that were close to our genetic profile, we couldn't find a race that we could reproduce with."

"Until we came upon Florentine."

It was a lot to take in. The Surtu were the first alien race Earth had encountered, but from what Captain Fore told, there were an indefinite number of alien races out there, beyond human reaching.

My emotions were mixed up. I felt compassion towards the Surtu. They were fighting for their survival, but I was not naive. Their method of survival was intolerable. It was uncivilized. The Surtu needed human women, but they didn't take them because they had no other choice. They took them because it was the easiest choice.

"So you stole us," I said bitterly. "Because we're a genetic match."

Jidden stepped forward. “The laws of the universe don’t care about morality.” he stated coldly. “We take what we need, or die.”

Captain Fore nodded. “We make no apologies for what we do. We know the implications our actions have on Earth, but we stand by them. After the expedition had returned with the human women, we waited an entire generation to ensure the women were capable of producing Surtu children, and that the children grew up healthy. They did, particularly those conceived within the light bond. Many are still alive today.”

“Our search is over.”

I wasn’t sure what he meant by a light bond, but I had more important questions to ask, the answers of which I hoped to feed to Earth. “What about the disease? If the disease is gender-based, aren’t human women vulnerable to it as well?”

“No, they are not, and neither are their daughters from what we can tell so far, but we are aware that by sharing blood, the same vulnerabilities in our genetic code may present themselves. That is why not all the Surtu soldiers will be returning home. They will remain here on Earth with the women they claim.”

It was a shock, but I tried to keep my composure. “Are there human Surtu within the fleet?”

“No,” Captain Fore asserted. “To keep the Surtu bloodline strong for as long as possible, only full Surtu are allowed to mate with humans. No one here is half-human.”

Their tribulations tugged harder at my heartstrings, demanding absolute empathy, but then I thought of Lucina, and the inner rage I had been carrying returned. “If you’re thinking about making me one of your playthings, then you’re dead wrong,” I told him, letting my rage show itself.

Captain Fore laughed. “I’m not thinking about you like that at all. My mate is of the Surtu, immune to the disease. She is the only type of woman in this universe more valuable than a human. You’re here because I want you to tell your people to surrender.”

“You have already captured the Fortuna,” I reminded him.

“I’m not talking about the Fortuna. I mean Earth. We are the first fleet to arrive, but we are not the last. More will come. Trust me when I tell you the Surtu are more powerful than you could imagine. Earth has two options – either the men can live out the rest of their days in peace, or they can die.”

“Either way, the women belong to us.”

“Why must it be war?” I demanded, before glancing over at Jidden, who stood as still as a statue. “I’m sure it’s possible for a Surtu man and a human woman to fall in love if the two races were to integrate peacefully, without force.”

“Love cannot be controlled,” Captain Fore replied coolly. “We need control. There are very little Surtu women left. We’re not here to ask permission. We’re here to dominate.”

To hell with that, I thought, but I didn’t say it out loud. Captain Fore had offered me an advantage. I wanted to take it.

“I’ll do it,” I said. “I’ll try to convince my people to surrender.”

I had no authority on Earth. If I asked the leaders of Earth to surrender, no one would listen to me. Agreeing to do it would give me the opportunity to tell Earth everything I had learned from my conversation with the Fleet Captain.

He seemed pleased. “Good. You know what you need to do to protect your people, as do I. That’s what makes us leaders.”

I was hardly a leader, despite the false title I’d been given, but Captain Fore didn’t need to know that.

“I will protect my people, whatever it takes,” I concurred, hoping it came out as the threat it was meant to be.

Finished with me, Captain Fore dismissed us. “Take her back to the Fortuna,” he ordered to Jidden. “Set up communication with Earth.”

“Sir,” Jidden said, bowing his head. Then he added, “And what of my promotion for overtaking the space station?”

I thought it audacious of Jidden to ask, but Captain Fore didn’t seem to take offense. “We’ll discuss it when we return to Surtu after the war.”

Jidden objected. “I can be of use to you here.”

Now the Captain was annoyed. “You’re as much use to me as I say you are,” he said, pulling rank. “We’ll discuss your promotion back on Surt, but in the meantime, you will remain in charge of the Fortuna, even as other ships land. And you may have your choice of women to claim.” He looked decisively at me.

“Just remember, no soldiers are to mate with the women unless they are light bonded. We’re here to save the Surtu race, not parade our cocks around. Applications for a light bonding ceremony can be made directly to me.”

“Yes, Captain,” Jidden conceded. He placed his hand on the small of my back and gently guided me away.

“You’re upset,” I noted, feeling Jidden’s tension through his hand. “You expected you’d be walking out of his office with your precious promotion – the one you would do anything to get. Do anyone to get.”

“I won’t talk about it,” he said, his voice low and surprisingly calm. “Especially not with you.”

I was outraged. “And what is that supposed to mean? You’re the one who seduced me in the garden.”

Swiftly, he pinned me against the wall of the corridor, his hand across my mouth. “You can’t speak of that here,” he decreed. “Don’t speak of it anywhere. No one can know. Understood?”

He wasn’t hurting me. Quite the opposite, his touch felt almost protective, his weight like a shelter. It sent a shiver through my body, kindling the same anticipation I had felt in the garden when he explored my core with his fingers, preparing me for when he entered my body.

But that was crazy. Jidden wasn't protective. He had made his intentions clear. He wanted to take his place among the leaders of the Surtu military. That was important to him.

I looked up, realizing we were standing beneath the arch that held the ships together. One step over and I'd be back in his command. I didn't look forward to it, but he was the lesser evil.

Unable to speak with his hand over my mouth, I nodded my understanding.

Relaxing, he let me go. "What happened before can't happen again," he told me, taking my hand as we returned to his ship. "We are not light bonded, nor will we ever be. Women are a distraction. They make men weak. I'm not looking for a mate."

"What does that mean – light bonded?" I asked.

His grip on my hand tightened. "I hope you never find out."

To an outsider, it would be impossible to tell that the Fortuna was under siege. Now that their weapons had been confiscated, my sister warriors moved around at will.

Juventas, a burly street fighter, regained control of the mill pantry; the sweet scent of her bread floated through the South lounge. The gardeners were out among the trees with their buckets and spades. Others walked idly around, unsure of how to fill their days on the space station now that our training had stopped.

It was all quite normal, if not for the men who stood guard at every corner, their blasters raised high for show. With my new knowledge, I knew the blasters weren't the real weapons they used to keep the women in line.

The true weapon was fear.

They were in control, and the women knew it.

Even if we tried to run, we didn't have anywhere to go. The only escape from the space station was through a ship, and the few clumsy cargo ships we had once possessed were now under tight lockdown in the docking bay.

Having been released from Jidden's custody, I searched the space station for Lucina, but I could not find her.

It was my hope that Bellona had somehow found a way to save Lucina from the redheaded soldier that had taken her captive, and that they were out there waiting to strike. Two assassins were out stalking their prey. But it was unlikely.

"Terra!" I heard someone cry out.

It was Gallia, the true Commander of the Fortuna. I had taken her place as a ruse. She was the one destined to lead us.

“I failed,” I said, holding back tears that wanted to fall. Warriors didn’t cry. “I was useless. They knew all along.”

“You didn’t fail,” Gallia told me sternly, and then she hugged me, her raven-black hair cascading around me.

The embrace wasn’t to comfort me. “Do they know who you are?” she whispered, holding me close.

“No, they still believe I am the Commander. They’re allowing me to call Earth later.”

“Good,” she said. “Keep it that way. I’ve taken your place in the kitchen. Being a kitchen mouse gives me the opportunity to listen in when the men are eating. I’ve learned a lot.”

“So have I,” I revealed. I was so quiet a dog would have a hard time hearing me. “Is there a place we can meet and discuss what we’ve learned?”

“In the temple, there’s a hidden—”

A soldier appeared, his blaster pointed towards us. “Break it up, lovebirds,” he ordered.

Regretfully, I pulled away. “Be brave,” I coached, playing my role in front of our audience, knowing very well Gallia needed no inspiration. “Our destiny has not been determined yet.”

“I hope not,” she said, glaring at the soldier. “Because it stinks.”

I waited until she disappeared in the direction of the kitchen before I continued to my quarters. I could feel the soldiers in the corridor watching.

Once inside, I leaned against the door, and I looked down into my hand. Before releasing me from our embrace, Gallia had given me something.

Emblazed on the top was the crescent moon – the symbol of our space station. The moon was feminine and divine, watching over the women of the Fortuna.

I wish I knew what the key was for or where it led.

Chapter 8

JIDDEN

Letting Terra leave and releasing her to the heathens reporting to me, had been harder than I'd thought. They couldn't touch her without the light bond. I took comfort in that. The soldiers knew the punishment if they disobeyed the Fleet Captain's orders. It wasn't pretty.

But I worried that one of the others would claim her and reserve her for himself while he sought permission with Captain Fore to hold a light bonding ceremony.

I would claim her for myself, but my pride had already won that inner struggle. I had no place for a mate in my future, especially with a war about to begin. Captain Fore was a fool to disregard me like he had. I had been useful before. Now, I had to prove that more than ever.

Kalij passed by me as he entered the ship. I grabbed his arm and held him back. "You're meant to be on patrol," I barked, having no patience for the soldiers today. They would feel my rejection, especially this dirty redhead.

He objected. "I'm tired. I was up all night making sure none of these other bastards tried to steal away my girl."

"Guarding her is all you better be doing; you know the rules."

"Unfortunately," Kalij grumbled. "Don't worry, we haven't mated. Yet."

"Don't worry, Sir," I corrected with my full authority.

Kalij looked like he was going to be sick. "Don't worry, Sir," he said, obeying me. "I'll wait until we're light bonded before I make her carry my sons."

"You should be praying for daughters," I told him, letting go of his arm. "Go patrol. And if you disregard your assignment again, you'll have nothing left to make sons with."

I knew he had something smart to say back, but he held his tongue.

Wise decision, I thought, and I stepped away, more worried for Terra than before. The pretty little blonde had certainly infatuated Kalig, but the Fortuna was now full of soldiers just like him who longed for a bite of the station's soft Commander.

Chapter 9

TERRA

I was glad to be in my quarters and away from the leer of the soldiers. Unlike the sleeping quarters on Jidden's ship, the rooms on the Fortuna were much more appealing. Like the skintight white jumpsuits the women wore back on the ship, there was no discrepancy in our quarters because of rank. My quarters were the same as when I first came aboard, despite being Commander. I didn't need anything more. I liked what I had.

A rich plum fabric covered the walls, and it warmed the room. My bed was comfortable, full of Persian inspired pillows that I had brought with me from Earth. When I lay upon those pillows and looked up, I could see the stars. The sun shone from time to time, its next rising due shortly, but we spent most of our time under the stars.

I moved beneath those stars now, first to turn off the light then to reach my hand behind my bookcase. I didn't dare open it, afraid of who may be watching, but when I removed my hands, I felt the dust sticking to my fingers. It had not been disturbed. My weapons were still safely hidden within the trick panels.

Staying beside the bookcase, I reached for my encyclopedia and stuck the key Gallia had given me inside. The bulk of the book hid it. Finished, I sat upon my bed, embracing the dark. I should have changed out of the top and shorts Jidden had dressed me in. The outfit was no longer appropriate since I was back on the Fortuna, but I was too tired to change.

It had been a long day or night. I couldn't tell which anymore.

I felt the bandage around my waist, and I remembered the way Jidden had picked me up in his arms before I blacked out.

I had faith in my people. I believed the women of the Fortuna would soon be free. Hundreds of military space stations surrounded us, smooth spheres that protected Earth like an army of giant bullets. Someone would come to our rescue.

But if they didn't – if we met the same fate as the women on Florentine – then I couldn't bear the thought of any other man claiming me other than Jidden.

It wouldn't come to that, I determined. Most of our weapons had been confiscated, but we still had our intellect. And our training.

If no one else would free us, then we would have to free ourselves.

The sun was too bright. It shouldn't be that bright.

I left my room and went to stand in the gardens alongside the rest of my warrior sisters though it was almost unbearable to do so. The heat from the sun that radiated in through the transparent roof was scorching. The temperature continued to rise as the sun grew brighter.

“What’s happening?” the women around me cried.

Gallia joined us, the green in her eyes a contrast against the golden light around us. “Do something,” she pleaded to me.

It wasn't like Gallia to beg. “Save us.”

There wasn't enough time. As we stood among the oaks and wildflowers of the garden, the sun pulsed with a surge of solar heat and the Fortuna lit up like a supernova before turning to ash.

I sat upright in my bed, sweating. Quickly, I checked my timepiece on the bed stand.

I still had another hour to go before my call to Earth.

Unnerved by the nightmare, I needed to move and burn off some of the adrenaline searing through me. I changed into a clean jumpsuit, taking comfort in the way it clung to my body. It was a second skin meant to protect me from harm. It also allowed the women who wore it to move during combat without restraint.

Leaving my quarters, I went to the gardens, satisfied when I saw the stars shining peacefully above. The sun wouldn't rise for a while longer. For now, there was only the tranquility of a very long night.

Because the Fortuna was designed as something spiritual – to disguise the fact that it was a battle station, like our neighbors – it had a temple in the center of the gardens. I went there, remembering that Gallia had mentioned the temple before handing me the key.

The key was still tucked safely away in my encyclopedia where no one else could get it, and it was important. I had to figure out what it was.

The temple was not large, but it was breathtaking, made of aged stone and covered with green ivy that cascaded around it. Like many details of the Fortuna, it was a replica of an old Roman temple, rectangular in shape with four columns encasing its doors.

I walked around the temple looking for a keyhole or anything that seemed out of place. I couldn't see anything, so I went inside. The ceiling contained a shade of pale blue which represented Earth's sky.

I hadn't seen such a sky in years. Within the blue were frescos of the goddesses of Rome – our namesakes. In the middle stood Fortuna, mighty and proud, the deliverer of good fortune. In one hand she held the Earth, and in the other the crescent moon, gracing us with her power.

The stone within the temple was a dusty rose color, feminine and warm. Space was open except for a slab of stone in the center – a ritual altar. Before the Surtu had invaded, the altar was decorated with artifacts, including a sword and two daggers. It was all for show. The artifacts had no meaning, but we could use them against an enemy.

Now the altar was empty and a reminder of a plan gone horribly wrong.

I checked the altar first, certain I would discover something related to the key, but there was nothing there. Nor was there anything of interest within the walls of the temple. It wasn't a dead-end. I knew Gallia had mentioned the temple, but it was a mystery I couldn't solve. Not right now. Earth waited.

Leaving the temple, I heard a rustle in the woods around me, and I thought of Bellona. She was out there still, a breeze in the night waiting to help us.

As I made my way back towards the inner station, I prepared what I would say to Earth. I wasn't sure how much I could communicate. The Surtu would be listening to everything.

When I entered the corridor, a soldier ran straight for me. In fear, I jumped against the wall and closed my eyes, haunted by the image of the soldier who stabbed me. I hadn't thought I'd been so affected by my stabbing, but the memory was a scar, causing my heart to pound in my chest as I waited for the soldier in the corridor to attack.

He ran right by me, in a hurry to get somewhere. More soldiers followed him with their blasters drawn. They spoke to each other in their language. It was a strange, musical language that calmed me, the same way the chords of a piano did, even though nothing about the situation was calm.

Jidden expected me in the Grand Hall, but I had to know where the men were heading. No doubt it involved my warrior sisters. So I followed the soldiers as they rounded the corridors of the Fortuna, halting once they reached the south lounge.

Designers on Earth created the lounge for our recreation. It contained multiple leather sofas where we could watch movies when the nearby hologram room was full. We would chat here, gazing at the Earth outside, reminiscing of home.

Until the Surtu arrived, the lounge was hardly used. We were more likely to be found on the boxing mats or in the archery room. That's where our friendships grew; we were warriors united in a common cause. The Surtu had changed that, locking down our training centers. Now the lounge was in full use.

Earlier, upon leaving Jidden's ship, I'd seen the women gathered within, whispering in its corners, trying to figure out what the next move was without the soldiers on patrol overhearing them. They waited for their Commander to lead them.

They waited for Gallia.

As did I.

The lounge was as busy as it had been earlier, but a man lay on the floor with a pool of blood growing around him. His throat had been slit clean. He wouldn't have had time to think, let alone act before he was dead on the ground.

I knew whose handiwork this was. The Red Assassin. Bellona, the fiery priestess who only sacrificed things that threatened us.

She wasn't a priestess, just as I was not a Commander, but her skills as an assassin were so good, they were sacred.

The soldiers rounded up the women in the lounge, but they would not find the one responsible. Bellona had left a message – a warning to the Surtu, and now she was gone.

“Finally, someone's taking action,” a woman said nearby. “I can't stand another moment sitting around.”

The women around her chatted in agreement until Jidden entered the lounge. His presence silenced everyone within. Jidden went to the dead soldier and examined him.

“Why didn't he save himself?” he asked out loud.

“He didn't have time,” the soldier closest to him answered. “None of us had time. We didn't hear anything or see anything. He just fell.”

Jidden nodded and looked around the room, his eyes settling on me last, surprised that I was there. “No one here did this,” he resolved. “All I see is fear, confusion, and joy. But no pride. Whoever did this has escaped. Take the soldier back to the ship. Clean him up. We'll send him off properly.”

Finished with his orders, he turned to leave. “You,” he said when he reached me. “Come with me. You have a call to make.”

Jidden marched in front of me as we made our way to the Grand Hall. I had not known him long, but in the time I had, he had never been this angry. His hands clenched at his sides as we walked, and I sensed it took all his self-control to not punch the walls around us.

For reasons I did not want to admit, not even to myself, it pained me to see him so upset.

“Jidden,” I called, setting a hand on his shoulders, feeling the heat rise from him. “Stop for a minute. Talk to me.”

“I have nothing to say,” he said, ignoring my touch.

“Did you know him?” I asked, dropping my hand.

Abruptly, he turned to face me. I could feel his fury. “No, I didn't know him, and I didn't want to. We are soldiers, Terra. We came here willing to die. I find his death tragic, but it does not devastate me. It does, however, reflect poorly on my ability to command this station and the women within.”

The women within. He meant me.

“You think I did it?” I asked, unsure of how that made me feel. They trained me to be a warrior. I should be proud he thought I could do it, but felt something else instead. Shame.

“Did you?”

“No,” I told him, shaking my head. “I was on my way to meet you when I saw the soldiers running. I followed them to the lounge.”

He studied me, his mind working. “But you know who did.”

I crossed my arms and looked away, unwilling to speak. My loyalty to Bellona and the Fortuna was far greater than any loyalty I was building with Jidden.

“So be it,” he said, and he continued walking.

Unlike the lounge, the Grand Hall was almost empty. With its marble flooring and high pillars, it was by far the masterpiece of the space station. It was primarily used to initiate new warrior sisters as they made the Fortuna their home.

A massive video screen had been set up within the hall, in front of which was a table full of communications equipment. There was no time to waste. Four of Earth’s leaders – two men and two women – waited expectantly on the video screen.

“Commander Terra Lynch.” One of the women, President Bentford, greeted me as I took my place in front of the screen. “I’m glad to see that you are okay.”

“We all are,” I told her, still trying to figure out how I could say everything I needed to without the Surtu disabling the call.

“So there are no casualties?”

“None on our side.”

She smiled, but she did not look surprised. I realized Earth had probably been monitoring the Fortuna all along. Still, there was information their surveillance could not have picked up on, such as my conversation with Captain Fore.

“I spoke with their Fleet Captain,” I said, instantly gaining the full attention of all four diplomats. I glanced over my shoulder at Jidden and the two soldiers on guard, and I quickly added, “The Surtu want to take over Earth. They want our women.”

I expected the screen to go blank and for Jidden to reproach me for revealing such information, but he didn’t flinch.

They don’t care what Earth knows. It doesn’t matter to them.

President Bentford kept a straight face. It was impossible to tell if the news shocked her, but that was how she’d earned the seat she currently held – she was stoic with her emotions and direct with her commands. People loved her or hated her for it.

“I see,” she said. “And what is it about our women that have brought them so far?”

“Their women are dying from an unknown disease. We’re the next best thing, genetically speaking.”

“And how do they plan to take our women?”

How are they going to attack Earth? That was what she wanted to know. She wanted me to tell her the Surtu’s strategy.

“I don’t know,” I admitted. “More fleets will arrive soon – that’s why they gave me this opportunity to speak with you. The Surtu have given Earth an ultimatum. Surrender so that the men of Earth can live, or let them die in war.”

“I see,” President Bentford repeated. She didn’t bother asking me my opinion on the matter. “And do the Surtu have anything else to say?”

Meaning, did I have any more information to share. I had loads, but I wasn’t sure how much time I had. “When the Surtu ships connected, I didn’t have much time to speak with the Fleet Captain. The Surtu sent me back to the Fortuna, where at least three ships have landed.”

This time, Jidden cleared his throat behind me – a warning. Good. It meant I had revealed something important.

“Thank you for calling us,” President Bentford said. Her face revealed a terrible sadness I had never witnessed before.

“We will get back to you, our fallen.”

“Until then,” I said, and the screen went blank.

I couldn’t stop thinking about what President Bentford had said. Our fallen. It was bizarre and too poetic for the abrasive, in-your-face politician. I had to find Gallia. I wanted to tell her about the call, and I had information to share. I also wanted to know why I had this key! Gallia would have the answers I needed.

Thankfully, Jidden didn’t follow me when I left. I headed towards the kitchen where I guessed Gallia was, but I stopped when I passed outside Lucina’s quarters. I still did not know where she was or if she was okay, but I took a chance and knocked on the door.

Someone on the other side moved, and then to my relief and joy, I heard Lucina speak.

“Go way,” she said faintly through the door, none of the usual cheer in her voice. “Kalij isn’t here.”

“Lucina, it’s me, Terra.”

“Terra?” She sounded as if she was going to burst into tears. “Thank God it’s you. I thought you were a soldier. Are you here to save me?”

I was now. “Quickly, open the door,” I said, looking over my shoulder to make sure there were no soldiers on patrol nearby. “I’ll take you to the gardens. That’s where I think Bellona is hiding. She’ll come for you.”

“I can’t,” Lucina said weakly. “Kalij has put a mechanism in the lock. I can’t open it.”

I thought of the key Gallia had given me, but it wasn’t a match. The doors of the Fortuna did not require keys. They had punch codes.

I knew Lucina’s punch code by heart, as she knew mine, so I tried it, but it was of no use. Lucina was trapped.

Defeated, I leaned my head against the door. I could hear her shallow breaths on the other side. “I’ll figure out a way to get the door open,” I promised her. “I’ll save you.”

She didn’t respond. It broke my heart. Lucina was my best friend. I couldn’t leave her like this, but I had no choice.

“Has he...hurt you?” I asked.

“Not my integrity. That’s intact. But he is violent. He’ll grab me, full of desire, but then he’ll push me away, ranting about some light bond. Do you know what that is?”

“No,” I answered. “Not exactly. I think it’s a union ceremony. That’s why the Surtu are here. They want to mate with us, to reproduce, but something about the light bond makes the children healthier. The men are not allowed to mate unless they light bond with a woman first.”

“I should be thankful he can’t touch me yet,” Lucina said, choking up, “but the idea of bearing his children repulses me. I’d rather die.”

I knew by her desperation that she meant it. “Listen to me, don’t lose hope,” I said, my hand against the door. “I’ll find a way to get you out of here before any light bond takes place, whatever it is. Okay? I will save you. Just hold on.”

“I will,” Lucina said half-heartedly, her will defeated.

“Swear it,” I begged.

“I swear by the pinky ghost, you are the one I honor the most,” she recited, echoing a song from childhood.

“I will save you,” I promised in return. “I swear by the pinky ghost, you are the one I honor the most.”

“You better go,” Lucina murmured. “Kalij will be upset if he finds you here. I don’t think I can handle any more of his moods.”

“Okay,” I relented. “I’ll be back.”

I stepped away from the door, losing patience with my pacifism. If I had it my way, I would take the mini-crossbow I had hidden in my bookcase, and I would show Kalij my mood – straight into his heart.

Not yet. I had to find Gallia.

Gallia was not made to be a kitchen worker. Even as she washed the dishes, wearing an old apron that was water-stained, her tall and elegant stature made her look more like a cat than a mouse. It was hard to believe that only a few days earlier it had been me holding the dirty dishrag. I had never liked being a kitchen porter, but I liked being the Commander even less.

“You almost look like you’re enjoying yourself,” I remarked, joining her near the sink. On impulse, I grabbed a spare rag and picked a dish out of the soapy water to dry it. Our methods were old-fashioned on the Fortuna to conserve our limited energy supply.

“I am,” she confessed. “I hate sitting in an office.”

I wanted to laugh. I had yet to spend any time in the office, but it wouldn’t have been appropriate to find even the smallest amount of humor in our situation. It was grim.

“Did you hear about what happened in the lounge?” I asked. “It was pretty gruesome.”

“It was necessary,” Gallia maintained, looking over her shoulder towards the soldier that stood near the kitchen door.

We seemed to spend a lot of time doing that these days – looking over our shoulders. We watched the soldiers almost as much as they watched us.

“I’m glad she’s out there,” I said, putting the dish away. “It gives the women hope.”

“Hope is good, but it isn’t going to free us. Has Earth given you an indication of what they plan to do to help us?” she whispered.

I shook my head. “No, but I think they’re still monitoring us. They must be planning something.”

Gallia set down the plate she was drying and pressed her lips together. I knew there was more she wanted to tell me, but this wasn’t the place. “I haven’t prayed in a while,” she said casually, stretching out her arms. “I think I’ll head to the temple later tonight and pray. Would you like to join me?”

“If I have time,” I answered, fully aware that the soldier at the door was listening. “We’ll see.”

“They say prayer is the key to surviving hardship,” she affirmed as she reached for another plate. “I hope to see you there.”

Taking my cue, I left Gallia in the kitchen and stopped by the garden to collect a handful of wildflowers. I walked towards the last place I ever thought I’d willingly go – the docking bay, now enemy territory.

From the reception area outside the docking bay, I looked upon the Surtu ships, wondering how we’d allowed three to land so easily on the station. The men moving in and out of the ships seemed complacent in their duties, but I doubted they all were happy about their placement. Men went to war for many reasons. The reasons didn’t always align with the desires of their superiors.

The dead soldier came to mind. He was the reason I was here. The soldier wasn’t the first soldier on the Fortuna to fall, and he wouldn’t be the last. We were enemies, but enemies could still honor each other’s dead.

I tried to enter the docking bay, but a soldier with dirty red hair and a snarl on his face stopped me. By the description Bellona had given me, I instantly knew he was Kalij, Lucina's captor.

"You don't have permission to be here. Step back," he ordered.

I wanted to kill him. He was the only person I'd met who I felt deserved death. If I killed him, I could free Lucina.

"I'm not here to cause trouble. I am the Commander of this space station, and I'd like to honor the dead soldier. It is within my right."

He laughed. "Says who? You have no rights. You're just a bitch leading her pack."

I thought quickly. "I am light bonded to one of your men. Your people are now mine. Let me honor the soldier." As proof, I held up the flowers in my hand.

"To who?" Kalij demanded. He was outraged. "I was told all light bonding ceremonies are on hold."

"We haven't announced it yet, but I spoke with the Fleet Captain this morning. He oversaw the ceremony. We talked for a long time about your customs. He was very proud to tell me his mate is a pure Surtu woman immune to the disease – the only type of woman more valuable than a human. Those were his words."

Because what I said had truth in it, Kalij let his guard down. Perhaps he simply lost interest. I was clearly no threat on my own.

Lucky for you, I thought, as he let me pass. I'll see you again. And when I do, you're not going to like it.

"Where do you keep your dead?" I asked a man leaving Jidden's ship.

"The first deck," he answered, pointing to the ship, and then he marched off. He was even less interested in me than Kalij.

It helped that I had been on the ship earlier. I recognized many faces from our brief voyage to see Captain Fore, which meant they recognized me too. They barely glanced my way as I passed, assuming I had permission to stay on board.

The ship was large and the hallways long, but I managed to find the dead soldier. He was alone in a chilled room that was as sterile as the others on the ship. The blood from his throat had been cleaned, and he wore a white uniform unique to the other uniforms I'd seen the Surtu wear.

It bothered me that he was alone. No one should be alone, not even in death. I placed the flowers across his chest, and I mourned on behalf of his family, wherever they were.

The death of the soldier showed why it was intolerable for Earth and the Surtu to go to war. Both sides would lose. And why? Because the Surtu believed love wasn't reliable? I did not know what type of man the soldier had been, but it was entirely possible he could have won the heart of a human woman and started a family with her – organically, without coercion.

Part of me still believe we could avoid the war and make a treaty, but neither side trusted each other. That was the tragedy of treaties – we only signed them after much bloodshed. Realizing how much death the future held, I decided it was time to pray.

“Goodbye, brother,” I said. “Be at peace.”

After I had left the docking bay, I intended to retrieve the key, and then meet Gallia at the temple so we could talk. I didn’t get that far. Gallia waited for me outside my quarters.

“Would you like to come in?” I asked.

“No,” she declined. “None of our rooms are safe. Let’s go to the south lounge instead.”

“And what of our prayers?” I asked.

“The temple has been disturbed. A soldier sleeps in the corner. I let him be. I’m not sure the Red Assassin will do the same. He’ll be lucky if he wakes.”

“They’re all lucky if they wake,” I said, thinking of Kalij, and I followed her to the lounge.

As soon as we entered, I understood why she’d chosen the lounge to speak. Once again, it was packed full of our sister warriors, their chatter loud. It would mute our conversation and allow us to hide in plain sight.

We chose a spot against a window that looked out at Earth. I thought of my family and wondered if they knew that the Surtu attacked the Fortuna. Probably not. It wasn’t information the leaders of Earth would freely circulate. Morale would suffer, as would the public opinion of the leaders’ capacity to lead the fight against the Surtu.

“Tell me what you know,” Gallia said. “Quickly.”

It was hard to know where to begin, but I told her everything, from my conversation with Captain Fore to finding Lucina locked in her room.

“Bellona is working on a plan to save her,” Gallia informed me. “She’s working on a plan to save all of us.”

“You’ve been in touch with her?” I asked. “How?”

“Haven’t you?” she returned, equally surprised.

“Only during the siege,” I told her, still unclear how long ago it was. One night. Maybe two. Jidden had never told me how long I was out.

“I assumed she had made contact with you before she killed the soldier.”

“No,” I said. “I had no idea what she had planned.” Then I remembered the rustle in the woods when I’d left the temple earlier. “Well, maybe. I visited him,” I admitted. “The soldier who fell.”

The soldier who fell. The fallen. It reminded me of what President Bentford had said. We will get back to you, our fallen. I repeated it to Gallia.

“No,” she said, taking a step back, her face suddenly pale.

“What is it?” I asked. I was frightened. If Gallia was worried, there was a reason for it.

Shivering, she stared out onto the Earth before answering. ““Our fallen’ means Earth is going to destroy the Fortuna and everyone on board.”

“They wouldn’t do that,” I said incredulously. I refused to believe it. “Are they that callous?”

“It’s strategy, not sentiment,” Gallia said. “Think about it. They’re trading three Surtu ships for one space station. There are hundreds of military bases guarding Earth. We are nothing. I see that now. I thought they chose us because we are strong. Our strength is expendable. We are just bait. We were always just bait.”

The Fleet Captain had said the same thing, that we were bait, but that didn’t make it true. Yes, we were meant to fool the Surtu into trusting us, but we were also supposed to kill them. The plan was never to destroy the entire space station.

“I still don’t buy it,” I said. “Earth wouldn’t do that. I think you’re mistaken.”

Gallia took my shoulders, shaking away my disbelief. “Listen to me, Terra. President Bentford was speaking in code. She was trying to tell you to prepare yourself and the women. I was given a list of codes when I became Commander. She has set the plan in stone.”

“You knew?”

“Of the code, yes, but there are many codes. I thought they’d only use this one if most the women were dead or if our cause was hopeless. I never thought they’d use it when we still lived. It’s still possible to free us.”

So it was true. We had lost the fight, and now we were destined to die. I closed my eyes. I refused to look at the beautiful blue planet below. I had been a traitor for sleeping with Jidden in the gardens, but the decision to destroy the Fortuna felt like a stab in the back.

“How long do we have?” I asked.

“They’ll likely strike at sunrise when the sun temporarily blinds the space station. They’ll send a nuke. It’ll be over before we know it.”

I still couldn’t come to terms with it. “Are you sure there isn’t a way to contact President Bentford? Can we reason with her? We’re still an asset.”

“Can you think of a way?” Gallia asked. “All the communication equipment is on lock down, and sunrise is in a few hours. We don’t have the time. Even if we did, I doubt President Bentford would change her mind. Once the codes are set, they’re set.”

“So we’re just giving up?”

“I’m not giving up,” Gallia said. “I’m accepting what cannot be changed. I don’t want to die.” She spoke with a vulnerability she had never shown before, and I knew it was hopeless.

But if we could not save the Fortuna, we could at least save the women.

“What if we told the Surtu?” I asked. “They might be able to get most of the women off the space station by then.”

Gallia had been horrified by the news of the code, but my suggestion sickened her. “Is that how you want people to remember you?” she hissed. “As a traitor? If you tell the Surtu, you prevent the destruction of three ships. You give up Earth’s advantage. My teacher trained me to be a warrior, Terra. We came to the Fortuna knowing we may have to sacrifice our life for the protection of Earth. I did not envision my death like this, but it is still an honorable one.”

I wanted to reason with her, but at that moment, Jidden stormed into the lounge, silencing the crowd for the second time that day. This time, he went straight to me. “I need you,” he commanded, and he grabbed my arm, pulling me away from Gallia.

His hold on me was not as gentle as it usually was. It would normally have frightened me, but I had bigger things to worry about right now. “Where are we going?” I demanded. He did not answer.

I found out soon enough. He took me to my quarters, using a key card to override the punch code.

“You can’t just lock me in here,” I said, assuming that was what he intended to do, but then he pushed me against the wall and began kissing me. He was forceful and unrelenting.

“Jidden, stop,” I urged, during a break in the kissing, and I tried to push him away. “Don’t do this.”

He refused to let go. Instead, he turned me around so that he pressed my head against the wall, and he unzipped the back of my jumpsuit.

“Please, stop,” I begged, but I knew it was useless. Jidden wasn’t going to wait for my permission. He was going to take me.

I could fight, but that might make it worse. So I relied on my intellect, the way I always had. “No Surtu man is allowed to touch a woman unless they are light bonded,” I reminded him, nearly shouting.

“That didn’t stop us before,” he proclaimed.

“I should have known you were no better than Kalij,” I said with as much menace as I could muster. “You’re worse. You disobey commands. You break the rules. No wonder you didn’t get your promotion.”

I shouldn’t have said it. I risked igniting his anger. He was already in control. His anger would not benefit me.

But the risk paid off. He stepped back, letting me go. “I’m not a heathen,” he expressed, conflicted.

Seeing an opportunity, I moved away from him and sat on the bed. If I couldn’t escape him, my bed was a good place to defend myself. Within the timepiece on my bed stand was a long screw I could use as a weapon, if necessary.

Jidden didn’t follow me. He had a look of disgust on his face as he realized what he’d almost done. “I’m sorry,” he said. He backed up to give me some space. “I just – I don’t know what I was thinking. I saw the flowers you left for the dead soldier, and I knew I had to have you. On my terms.”

“That’s no excuse,” I snapped, also feeling conflicted. I wanted him to leave. His actions were unjustifiable. It hurt me. I had trusted him, but anger was not what I wanted to carry with me if these truly were my last hours alive. If anything, this was a time for forgiveness. All of our souls should be at peace.

“Promise me you’ll never do that again,” I demanded. After sunrise, he would never have a chance to, but I still needed to hear him say it.

“I promise on my mother’s grave,” he said. “There is no greater promise to the Surtu. What I did was unforgivable.”

The room filled with silence. I looked out at the stars. I couldn’t see the Earth from my quarters, and I was glad for it. The Earth had betrayed us, but Gallia was right – we still had an obligation to protect it. So in silence I would remain.

I made a decision.

“Claim me,” I said to Jidden, standing up to confront him. My emotions were running high. I was irrational, and I didn’t care. I took control of the situation. Whatever happened next, it would be on my terms.

I stepped out of my jumpsuit, revealing my undergarments. They were nothing special, but I saw the way Jidden’s cock responded to my exposed flesh. “Make me yours.”

“Are you sure?” he asked, struggling to keep his distance. “I don’t think you’re—”

“I’m done thinking,” I announced. I wanted this. I wanted him. Hours from death, there was no reason to deny it any longer. Jidden was cold and arrogant, but he had an inner depth. That depth was genuine.

“Claim me,” I repeated, and I reached forward to grab his cock, massaging it with my hand.

Unable to resist, Jidden moved in closer to me and kissed my shoulder, his lips like petals against my bare skin. “I claim you,” he murmured as he let the strap from my bra fall. “How can I not? You’re beautiful.” He moved his kisses to my neck, sending a pulse down my body. “And you’re intelligent. And kind. I claim you.”

The pulse that ran down my body settled at my core, which was wet with pleasure. “And I claim you,” I said in return.

To show Jidden how much I wanted him, I massaged him harder, pleased when I heard him moan. With hunger in his eyes that matched my own, he undid my bra and flung it away. Then he knelt down and pulled off my panties, which were complete soaked.

Remaining on his knees, he kissed my thigh, slowly making his way to my center. Before his tongue touched my soft folds, he picked me up in his arms and placed me back on the bed.

“I’ll never hurt you again, nor will I ever let another man touch you. I’ll protect you,” he vowed.

Spreading my legs apart, he cupped his arms around my thighs, pulling me in close so that he could taste me. His warm, moist tongue circled around my flesh and caused me to ache with ecstasy.

He pulled me in even closer, licking my clit, drinking me in. A fire engulfed my body, and I was eager to explode.

Knowing I was ready to come, he removed his uniform, exposing his hard, thick cock, and he plunged his cock inside me, filling me up. It was almost more than my body could handle. I moaned loudly and folded my legs around him as he continued to drive into me, his need to come as desperate as my own.

I couldn't hold back. I released myself, riding the tidal wave of bliss, drenching his cock with my affection. Jidden continued to thrust, his cock growing harder until he also came, jerking deep inside me. We rode the wave together, our souls meeting as our bodies released themselves.

Exhausted and sticky with joy, Jidden collapsed beside me, and I held him, enjoying the way he stayed inside me, refusing to disconnect. Lying in my arms, he fell asleep. His head nestled against my breast.

I could not sleep. As I caressed his hair, I gazed at the stars. My stomach tightened as the first rays of sunlight began to pour into the room, illuminating our flesh.

It was time. Time to become the fallen.

I wrapped my arms tighter around Jidden, finding solace next to him. I was glad that of all the people on the Fortuna, I was with him.

When I heard the explosion, I knew our lives were over.

Chapter 10

TERRA

An explosion erupted across the Fortuna.

I closed my eyes, waiting for the fire to consume me and the lover I held in my arms as the sunlight shined on us.

Vesta was a goddess of fire. She protected the home and the hearth. Were we not dead, she would have made a great namesake for daughters born during this war. Though she ruled fire, she refused to take a lover. She was wise. Her passion would have burnt too strong, destroying all around her, the same way the Fortuna was being destroyed now.

Soon, we would be nothing but ash.

Jidden woke and jumped out of bed when he heard the explosion. He was confused and his muscles tight like a lion ready to pounce – a dark haired lion with flecks of light circling around his elfin blue eyes.

My alien Surtu lover.

Perhaps he was no alien. Perhaps he was a god. A flawed, self-absorbed god here to mate with mortal women, like me.

“Terra,” he called, pulling on his black uniform. “We should go.”

“Why?” I asked as I lay naked on the bed, embracing the warmth that poured in through the ceiling of my sleeping quarters. It had been so long since I’d felt the sun. Day and night on the space station were not like how it was on Earth. “You’ve claimed me,” I sang, “so come and take what’s yours.”

I tempted him, but he resisted, throwing my white jumpsuit at me instead. “I don’t know what dream you’re living in, but it’s time to wake up. There was an explosion.”

“I know,” I said, rolling over in the sheets. “We’re dead. The Earth blew us up – one space station for three Surtu ships.”

Jidden froze. “What are you talking about?”

“My sister warriors and I – we are the fallen. Instead of saving us, the Earth decided to blow us up, killing the Surtu with us. Well, some of you. So now we are dead.” I giggled as if it were a joke. I think I was becoming hysterical.

“Terra, wake up. We’re not dead. We’re very much alive.” He began to pace, his temper rising. “Did Earth think they could destroy us so easily? We prepared for this. Our scanners must have picked up whatever the hell Earth launched our way. That explosion must be our weapons stopping yours.”

I blinked. The sunlight suddenly felt harsh. It lost its warmth as I crashed down from my fear-induced high. We were alive. “I thought...”

“I know what you thought,” he said. There was nothing comforting about the way he spoke. His anger blazed. “You knew about this?”

“Yes,” I admitted, feeling sick.

Following Jidden’s lead, I dressed, the skintight jumpsuit suffocating me. I was glad to be alive, but I wasn’t prepared to face it. Hours earlier, I had told Jidden to claim me, thinking we were about to die. Now what?

“Don’t you realize what this means?” he yelled, interrupting all thoughts I had of what happened earlier. “Captain Fore won’t let this go unanswered. The war has begun.”

The war. If I wasn’t wide awake before, I was now. My daze was completely gone, like a fog lifting from a naive, trusting sea.

“Why are you so upset?” I demanded, matching his anger as my heart shattered. I realized how many people would die in the war – a war I failed to prevent. “That’s what you came here for, isn’t it? You started this. You should be elated.”

I went to the door to leave, but Jidden stopped me. Standing close to him, I could see anger wasn’t all he was feeling. I had hurt him as well. “You were willing to let everyone onboard die?”

Yes, I was. Or I had been. Not only had I been willing to sacrifice myself unnecessarily, but I was going to let Jidden die as well. Worse, I was ready to sacrifice the women of the Fortuna, women I was supposed to protect, even if my title as Commander was false.

After Gallia told me what Earth was planning to do, I should have warned Jidden so that we could evacuate the space station. But once again, I’d failed. My allegiances shifted, resting solely with my sisters. We were warriors, not pawns. We would die to protect our families at home, but that didn’t mean we had to do so on the whims of our so-called leaders on Earth.

We were worth more than three Surtu ships.

I didn’t tell Jidden this. I refused to tell him any of it. We were at war. Our positions on the opposite ends of the chessboard felt greater than ever.

My lover was my enemy.

“I was protecting Earth,” I defended bitterly.

He softened, feeling me pull away. “You shouldn’t have,” he said, brushing a piece of my messy brown hair away from my face. “Earth does not hold value. It does not have you. You can’t let yourself die, Terra. I won’t allow it.”

My defiance weakened. “We are at war, and I am Commander of this space station. You may not be able to control what happens to me.”

As the reality of our situation sank in, Jidden took me into his arms and held me tight. “I promised to protect you,” he said. “That promise remains.”

To seal his words, he kissed me, and I kissed him back, feeling renewed. I thought my life was over. Perhaps it soon would be, but for now, a new power ran through my veins. The source of that power was deep within me, pulled forward by Jidden’s touch. Soon, our clothes were on the floor once more.

“That didn’t take long,” I remarked as Jidden guided me towards my desk in the corner of the room where the light was brightest. He pulled out the desk chair and sat on it, his cock fully erect, ready to pleasure me.

“Make yourself come. Let me watch,” he implored, refusing to let go of my hand.

With a sly smile, I indulged him, using my free hand to rub a finger against myself tenderly. I remembered how he’d grabbed my thighs and lowered his head between them. His tongue had felt so good licking my clit, drinking me in like a cowboy thirsty for water.

Reliving the sensation, I moaned out loud and rubbed myself harder, growing wet with anticipation. His hand tightened around mine, sending a shiver down my spine. I wanted to feel his cock slide into my wetness. Aching for more than just my touch, I straddled him on the chair and threw both my arms around his shoulders. I teased him, cruelly circling myself over the tip of his cock, enjoying the way it massaged my inner flesh.

He had no objections. He teased me back, sucking on my breast. He took it completely into his mouth as my nipple hardened with joy, matching the pulse inside me. My entire body was on edge, burning with an electricity that reminded me how alive I was.

Slowly, I slid myself fully onto his cock, claiming him and becoming whole. As I grated my hips feeling his shaft moving within me, we kissed, losing ourselves in our ecstasy. His hand found my breast, taking over where his mouth had been. Very lightly, he caressed my nipple, igniting my body further.

I bobbed harder on his cock, feeling it rise deep within me. It filled every inch of me. Taking his hand from my breast, I stuck his finger in my mouth, sucking on it the way I wanted to suck on his cock. He moaned as he grew further within me, ready for release.

“Let me watch you come,” he gasped. “I want to see your face.”

Hearing him, I sucked harder on his finger and clenched myself around his manhood, feeling his full firmness within me. He pushed himself further, and I came, crying my pleasure out loud. He came as well, his finger still in my mouth as he shook and released himself. He held me close with his other arm. Our bodies were pressed together, joined physically as well as emotionally.

Out of breath and soaked in sweat, he kissed my breast. He bruised it earlier, while we were fucking. “You are the beauty where there is war,” he murmured. “And you are mine. I have claimed you.”

I rested my head against him, almost too tired to speak, but a thought invaded my happiness, one I couldn’t push aside. “We are not light bonded,” I said, remembering what his Fleet Captain had ordered. No soldiers are to mate with the women unless they are light bonded.

“No,” Jidden acknowledged, full of remorse. “We are not.”

“What does that mean for you if your Captain finds out?”

He didn’t answer.

“Jidden, tell me,” I insisted, looking him straight in the eyes, searching for an answer. The flecks of light around his pupils dimmed.

“Death,” he finally replied. “This is wartime, and a war that could save the Surtu from extinction. The punishment for disobeying the Captain’s orders is death.”

No one knew.

That was my first realization as I made my way through the embellished corridors of the Fortuna. No one knew how close we’d come to all of our demises. At least, not the women who gathered in the south lounge, impatient to fight back against the Surtu who occupied the station.

Warriors didn’t adjust well to being under siege. The Fortuna had become a snake pit, and there was venom in the women’s fangs.

I left the inner station and went to the temple in the gardens, ignoring the soldier who stood outside. For once, I was not going for appearances or to find someone. I did need a moment of quiet and inspiration. My head ached with doubts.

In the temple, the painting of the goddess Fortuna looked down on me from the blue ceiling, resembling the sky on Earth. I could feel her judgment.

I had failed.

My mission as the false Commander had been a simple one – collect as much information about the Surtu as I could. It was an intelligence mission and something that should be my specialty. But I had not realized that the Surtu knew about our plot to strike and that the envoy ship was as much a lie as the Fortuna advertising itself as a spiritual sanctuary. Nor did I have the courage to protect the women of the Fortuna when I knew of Earth’s plan to blow up the space station.

And I was sleeping with the enemy. I was a traitor – not to Earth, but to my sisters around me.

Worse of all, I didn’t care. I mean, I cared about betraying my sisters. But I didn’t care that I shared a bed with Jidden. Nothing about our time together felt wrong. It felt like sunlight.

In Fortuna’s hand above her, she held the crescent moon, the symbol of the space station. It was both divine and feminine. I wasn’t supposed to honor the sun. I was supposed to honor the moon.

I jumped when I sensed another body near me.

“Here you are,” Gallia proclaimed, joining me inside the temple. “I’ve been looking for you.”

With her raven-black hair and stern green eyes, Gallia belonged here among the goddesses on the ceiling. She was one of them – strong and relentless, like a leader should be. Standing up to her was going to be difficult.

“We shouldn’t have risked it,” I said, looking up at Fortuna. “Earth was wrong to send the nuke, and we were wrong for not protecting the people who look up to us here. We should have told the Surtu to evacuate the station.”

She didn’t agree. I could see it in the way she carried herself. There was no remorse. “We live. There’s no point dwelling on the past. We have to figure out a way to get back to Earth and join the fight there. Out here, we’re useless. Our training is going to waste. The last week has proven it. We have to return to Earth.”

“I couldn’t agree more,” Bellona said, sauntering into the temple. Against the dusty rose stone, her red hair was more aflame than ever, as was the smolder in her amber eyes. Her features were but one of many reasons she’d earned the name the Red Assassin.

“How did you get pass the guard?” Gallia asked.

“He won’t be a bother,” Bellona purred. “He sleeps in the heather.”

I doubted sleep was the accurate term, but it didn’t bother me as much as the first soldier she’d killed. The first soldier I knew about, that is. Plenty of soldiers had died during the siege but exactly how many and by whose hand I didn’t know.

“Where have you been?” I asked.

“In the shadows.” She replied as if it were something I should already know. “I hate how bare the temple is. It feels defenseless.”

Before the Surtu invaded, when we disguised the Fortuna as a sanctuary for women of the cloth, we covered the large, stone altar in the middle of the temple with a sword and daggers. They were weapons dressed up to look like artifacts. They had been Bellona’s toys. We all had weapons cached in secret places.

Now the stone altar lay empty, like the rest of the walls and tables throughout the space station.

“Can you at least tell me what the key is for?” I pressed.

Bellona looked over at Gallia. “You gave her a key?” She wasn’t upset. She was curious.

“She’s earned the right to know,” Gallia answered.

“I agree,” Bellona said. “She should have been given one a long time ago, before any of this. The women look to me for my wisdom, but they look to her for support and compassion. They always have.”

I appreciated the sentiment, but I still needed answers. “What is the key for?”

“Tunnels,” Bellona revealed, the secret burning in her amber eyes. “The Fortuna is full of underground tunnels.”

Gallia went to the entrance of the temple to stand guard while Bellona pushed the stone slab of the altar. The slab moved with ease, exposing a wooden door lying flat inside it. The door had a keyhole.

“It’s so primitive,” I uttered.

To my dismay, Bellona quickly moved the slab back into place. “It has to be. Anything technological risks being picked up by scanners. Very few people know the tunnels exist. There aren't many entrances. Just the temple. And the docking bay. And the kitchen."

"The kitchen?" I asked, surprised. I'd spent a lot of time in the kitchen working as a porter. I couldn't imagine where a door could be hidden.

"The bread oven," Gallia said, reading my mind. "The door is at the back of the bread oven, behind a metal panel."

I sat on the altar trying to process everything. "How does this help us?" I mused.

"As Gallia was saying, we have to get back to Earth. The only way we can do that is if we steal back our ships," Bellona told me. "The tunnels give us access to the docking bay. There are plenty of cargo ships we can use."

"But they're heavily guarded."

The way her face twisted told me she needed no reminding. "I'm working on that."

"Do we want to go back to Earth?" I asked without shame, thinking of the other women. "They tried to kill us."

Gallia scowled. "Not us – the Surtu. We're warriors. We came to the Fortuna—"

"We came to the Fortuna knowing we may have to sacrifice our life for the protection of Earth," I finished for her, having heard it before. "I know, but we didn't die in battle. We didn't go down fighting. We almost died as bait. You said it yourself – we were always just bait."

She couldn't argue with what she had said, but she didn't back down either. "I'm no traitor, and I hope you aren't either."

Bellona held a hand up before I could respond. "No one here is a traitor, Gallia. Let's not go there. We need each other." She turned to me. "I understand where you're coming from, Terra, but think of your family, of your parents and your brothers. They need your protection. All of our families need us. To hell with whatever President Bentford's intentions are. Our families are why we must go back."

"Of course," I sighed, unable to argue, thinking of the humble little house in the desert where I grew up. "We have to find a way to get to the ships."

"That is the plan," Bellona said again, but none of us had a plan. It would be difficult to do. There were almost three hundred women on board the Fortuna. We couldn't exactly sneak away, not even with the tunnels.

The Surtu had us trapped.

I thought of Lucina, a captive in her quarters after being claimed by the brute Kalij. She was unable to break free from a mechanism Kalij had installed into the lock of her door. The Surtu were far more technologically advanced than we were. Who knew what other tricks they had up their depraved sleeves?

"In the meantime, we have to free Lucina," I decided. "Kalij can't touch her integrity, so he pushes her around. She can't survive his abuses much longer. I don't think she has the will to."

Bellona clenched her fists. “The bastard is on my hit list, but I can’t get to him, not without revealing myself.”

“I can. He patrols the docking bay. I have permission to be there. I can kill him.” I spoke without thinking, but I stood by my decision.

“You?” Gallia asked with disbelief. “Miss ‘I think weapons should be the final ultimatum, not the first,’ Can you do it?”

“Lucina needs help. I have the skills. I just never wanted to use them. If there are no other options, but if we want to save Lucina, there is no better way.”

“You are one of the best,” she agreed. Gallia looked satisfied. “But you’ll have to be fast, like Bellona. Move in the shadows. Can you do it?”

Once again, I glanced up at Fortuna on the ceiling. “With a little luck.”

“Luck won’t cut it,” Bellona sniped. “Meet me in the tunnels after dinner. You’re a fine warrior, Terra, but I’ll teach you to be an assassin.”

I nodded, remembering how broken Lucina had sounded when I last talked to her. Before Kalij claimed her, she shined brighter than the sun. “I’ll be there.”

Gallia clapped her hands together. “This is progress. Terra, access to the docking bay is invaluable. Don’t lose it. First, you’ll free Lucina from the swine who holds her, and then you’ll free us all.”

Chapter 11

JIDDEN

I claimed her. Terra was mine. No other man could touch her.
I felt like a fool – weak, like a human. Or worse, like Kalij.

When I'd gone to the lower deck to check on the dead soldier, I'd seen the wildflowers she'd left for him. They had to be from her. Flowers were not of our custom, and no other human would have been allowed past my men.

Her reverence for the dead man was honorable. I couldn't control myself. I wanted her. I had to taste her again. Our time in the woods had not been enough to satisfy my appetite for her.

But I was never meant to claim her. It was a promise that would go unfilled. I cared for Terra. I preferred her company over any other, but I could not light bond with her. Light bonds led to children. I couldn't be a father. I didn't have the will or the time, not with a war to fight and a promotion to earn.

I could not shake the disquiet I felt when she looked at me like I was her enemy. We did not consider human women our enemies. They were a prize and necessary for survival.

I was no prize to Terra.

I was her destruction.

"Sir," Kalij called, finding me near the dead soldier where I was checking on him once again. I'd come here for privacy so that I could think. Dead men did not interrupt my thoughts the way the living did.

"What?" I barked. Of all the soldiers, Kalij was the least tolerable.

For once, he didn't seem to mind my authority. He was smug like he had won a victory. Against who was anybody's guess. "I received a communication from Captain Fore's office. My light bonding ceremony has been approved."

Right. I'd received the same communication. With the exception of Terra, I cared little for the women on the Fortuna. They were a means to an end. I pitied the little blonde claimed by Kalij.

There was nothing respectable about him.

"It'll be historic," he added. "The first light bonding ceremony on Earth."

"We're not on Earth," I corrected, offering him no glory.

He ignored the comment. "After that Commander bitch lied to me about being light bonded, I thought the Captain had denied me my rights, but as it turns out, she tricked me. There was no light bonding ceremony.”

He had my attention. “What about the Commander?”

“She told me she had light bonded with a Surtu man and she was now one of us.”

That didn’t make sense. “When did she tell you that?” I demanded.

“When she brought those disgusting things,” he said, pointing at the wildflowers. “They make my nose itch.”

That explained how she’d gotten onto the ship. Kalij was a useless soldier. He didn’t care about order or authority. He only thought of himself. He would throw one of his fellow soldiers into an incinerator if he benefited from it.

“So you believed her lie?” I asked. I emphasized that there was no truth to it, for both our sakes. “Because that’s all it was – a lie to fool the idiot guarding the docking bay.”

Kalij’s face began to show a sneer, but he showed an uncharacteristic self-restraint. “I’m glad it was a lie. It means I’m the first.”

“Very well,” I said, wanting him gone. He was no longer of interest to me. “We will send our dead off properly, and then you can have your light bonding ceremony.”

He was indignant. “I have to wait for a corpse?”

“Just be thankful it’s not you on the table.” If Kalij had died, there would be no table for him. I’d leave him on the floor.

“Yes, sir,” he said, standing down. “But I will be the first?”

“Stay out of my face, and you can have your ceremony the day after next.”

He smiled. It was grotesque. At home, the women thought him handsome, but his looks could not compensate for his foul nature. “Thank you, sir,” he said, and he left the room.

I pitied the girl whose life I had just signed away.

Chapter 12

TERRA

The encyclopedia was heavy in my hand as I pulled it out of my bookshelf. Inside was the key Gallia had given to me. The handle of which was a crescent moon, similar to the moon shining in the sky. The sun was gone by now. Our hours of sunlight were rare on the Fortuna.

I tucked the key in the cleavage of my jumpsuit just as there was a knock on the door. It wasn't like Jidden to knock. Worried he would see the key, I pushed it down further.

"Hello," I said, opening the door to my quarters.

It wasn't Jidden.

"Terra," a woman with curly chestnut hair greeted me in return. It was Minerva, from the winter plains on Earth. "Is this a good time?"

It wasn't, to be honest. I was supposed to meet Bellona in the tunnels, but I could see how upset she was. "Come in," I allowed.

Minerva sat on my bed, about to crumble. "There's a rumor going around the station that the explosion we heard earlier was a nuke sent from Earth to destroy us. Is it true?" She was disgusted.

"We're not sure what it was," I lied. I'd done a lot of that lately – lying, but I didn't mind. Minerva needed consolation. "But if it was a missile, it was only sent to protect those we love."

Minerva shook her head. "I never trusted President Bentford. She would sell her soul to the Surtu if it meant keeping her seat." Then her face fell into her hands, crying. It was a rare sight to see on the Fortuna, rarer than the sun. Warriors did not cry. But we were human, and we were all reaching our breaking point.

"I can't take this anymore," she sobbed. "All this uncertainty. Are we going to be slaves? Are we going to be set free? I feel like I have no purpose. I'm just equipment."

I sat down on the bed next to her and put my arm around her. "You're a valuable person here. We all are." I dropped my voice. "I don't know what Earth's intentions are, but I know what I'm going to do. I'm going to make sure we escape here, one way or another."

Her tears dried, but she didn't look convinced. "So none of the neighboring military stations will help us? Everyone will leave us to fend for ourselves?"

"I don't know," I admitted. "If they don't, we'll figure it out. No one is going to be a slave. We have Fortuna on our side. She watches over us."

I finally reached her. She smiled. “We’re an army of goddesses.”

“Yes, we are,” I agreed.

“Then I’ll wait for your orders, Commander,” she said, rising. “I’ll follow you.”

“We’ll follow each other,” I said, seeing her to the door.

She left, and I fell against the wall. My hand was on my chest where the key was, wondering if I was capable of living up to Minerva’s expectations.

The door opened again.

“Did you forget something?” I asked.

This time, it was Jidden.

“I see you had company,” he remarked. “Is she a friend of yours?”

“I’m her Commander,” I replied. “And we’re all friends here.”

“Apparently, that includes the Surtu. You’re one of them now, due to your light bond.” He studied me, but he wasn’t angry.

“You talked to Kalij,” I guessed.

“I did. You’re lucky no one pays attention to him. Otherwise, there might have been trouble.”

I shrugged. “I did what I had to do.”

“No, you did what you wanted to do.”

I didn’t say anything.

“Come here,” Jidden urged, smiling as he held his hand out to me. “I have nowhere to be right now. Let me show you just how much trouble you cause.”

I wanted to go to him more than anything. In his arms, I forgot the war rising around us, but I couldn’t let him find the key, so I held back. “I’m not feeling well. I think I better lie down for a while.”

“I can help with that,” he offered.

A few days earlier I had been stabbed in the stomach. The wound was fully healed now, and only a scar remained. Surtu medical treatment was wonderful, but this time, I had nothing to cure. “That’s okay. I’ll be fine. I just need to lie down.”

“Okay,” he said, yielding. “I’ll leave you be, but first I’d like to invite you to a send-off tomorrow.”

“A send-off?”

“For the dead soldier.”

I was touched. “You want me at his funeral?”

“Yes, very much so. You should learn the ways of the Surtu.”

I wasn’t sure what he meant by that statement. I had no intention of ever stepping foot on his home planet, but I accepted his invite. “I’ll go.”

My words pleased him. “Rest tonight, and I’ll escort you in the morning.”

“See you then,” I said, stiffening when he came to kiss me on the cheek, afraid he would see the key.

“Goodnight, human,” he teased. His mood was light.

“Goodnight, alien.”

I was late. Very late. Dinner had ended hours ago.

I hoped Bellona still waited for me in the tunnels. I wanted to learn everything she had to teach. Of all of us, she was the only one to evade capture. Every day, she avoided the Surtu and did as she pleased.

The temple seemed empty. I looked out upon the heather before entering and thought about the guard from earlier, wondering if there would be two send-offs tomorrow.

There was no light within, but I used the darkness to my advantage, allowing it to mask my movements in case a soldier patrolled nearby. I didn't care if Jidden discovered my empty bed. Saving Lucina was more important to me than Jidden's trust, but I didn't want anyone to find me in the temple.

No one could know about the tunnels. They were our only chance of escape.

Retracing Bellona's efforts from earlier and using the moonlight from the entrance to guide me, I pushed the stone slab away from the door with surprising ease.

There was nothing special about the door. The maker created it from plain wood and did not add a handle. The keyhole to the side was barely noticeable; its purpose was to conceal. If a passerby ever discovered the door, it could easily be mistaken as part of the low structure that supported the altar.

I opened the door with the key and discovered stone steps that descended into the tunnels. Eager to meet Bellona, I followed the steps down and let the door fall back into place. Behind me, I heard springs move, like those in an old clock. The stone slab became an altar once more, casting impenetrable darkness over me.

I could see nothing.

I didn't let it stop me. Using the wall for support, I continued down the steps. Eventually, the rough stone beneath my hand smoothed, and I was touching metal. Lights flickered on around me, illuminating the tunnels. My movements had activated the lights.

Now that I could see, there wasn't much to my surroundings. The walls were plain and glossy, like walking through a tin can. It reminded me of the cold and sterile environment of the Surtu ship. The lights above were dim. I would have found it dreary if not for the noise above me. Footsteps from the ground above me echoed through the tunnels, like a heartbeat.

There was only one way to go – straight ahead. “Bellona?” I whispered as I walked. “Are you here?”

There was no answer. Afraid those above could hear, I went silent, following the path until it divided into two.

Now what? I thought, irritated. Bellona should be here.

I chose the path to the right, working out that it led to the docking bay. If I became trapped, the last place I wanted to risk coming out of was the bread oven. Burnt flesh was not a good look.

Partway down the tunnel, someone grabbed me like a ghost appearing out of nowhere.

“And you’re dead,” Bellona said flatly, throwing me against the tunnel wall. “Another name checked off my list.”

I hadn’t heard her approach. Her footsteps were lighter than air, and her flames consumed the oxygen around her.

“Nicely done,” I praised. I needed to learn. “When did you start to follow me?”

“I approached you when you chose the expected path. I knew you wouldn’t risk the bread oven. Always know what path your target will choose. Observe your target before you strike. Don’t leave it up to chance.”

“Surprising someone with an attack is easy. How to get away is the difficult part,” I said.

“Not for me,” she boasted. “As long as you aren’t seen killing your target, you can walk out of a crowded room. I did.”

The dead soldier; she’d left him as a warning to the Surtu. “How?” I asked.

“I was quick, I was precise, and I knew my escape route. It only took me a second to slit his throat, and then I was gone. It was a mercy killing. He died instantly. There are much more enjoyable ways to kill someone.”

Kalij came to mind, my target. “As much as he deserves to suffer, I don’t think I’ll have time. The docking bay is full of soldiers. How do I kill him without being seen? None of the guards recognized you in the south lounge when you killed the soldier, but I’ll be the only woman in the docking bay. I’ll stand out.”

Bellona considered the problem. “You’ll have to kill him quietly.”

“I don’t understand.”

“Poison him. We have plenty of herbs growing in the garden, herbs with special properties.”

It made sense. Slitting his throat in front of the other soldiers wasn’t a possibility. I could inject him with a poison – something that would cripple him from the inside, so there was no risk of contaminating Lucina if he touched her.

“I need something with a delayed response. It can’t be obvious that it was me. When no one else is around, I can pretend to run into him, and then I’ll inject him.”

“Know his path,” she reminded me.

“I’ll be in the docking bay tomorrow. The Surtu invited me to the ceremony for the soldier you killed.”

“Which one?” she smirked, but she knew the soldier I meant.

“While I’m there, I’ll do as you say. I’ll watch Kalij, study his behavior.”

“Do you have anything you can inject him with?”

“I’ll think of something covert.”

Bellona indicated to the tunnels. “This is the Fortuna. Secrecy is our specialty. Now, let me teach you how to strike a man dead before he knows what hit him.”

I was exhausted after my session with Bellona. Striking with the deadly precision of an assassin was no easy task. Bellona may move with the grace of a ballerina, but she was as strong as a bear. I didn’t even know I had muscles in places that hurt.

I didn’t let my fatigue stop me from going to visit Lucina. I wanted her to know she wasn’t alone. Using the skills Bellona had shown me, I snuck up to her door and listened.

Unfortunately, Kalij was inside. He was yelling, but I didn’t know why. “Jidden is a fool! How dare he give dead men preference over me? He treats all of his soldiers like we’re no better than dogs, and he wonders why the Captain won’t promote him.”

“You are no better than a dog,” Lucina lashed.

There was a scuffle, and I heard her fall to the floor. “Then what does that make you?” he screamed.

If she replied, I couldn’t hear her.

Unable to stand listening any longer, I stepped away from the door, turning to find Gallia watching me from nearby.

“Is she okay?” she asked.

I shook my head, letting my expression speak volumes.

Gallia hardened. “Soon,” she said. “Soon.”

“Wear this,” Jidden said, handing me a formal black dress from my closet. It was one of many outfits supplied to me when I was meant to be the Commander of a spiritual sanctuary, not the Commander of a secret battle station. Like the pale blue dress I had worn when I met Jidden, the designer fashioned the black one after what the women of Rome used to wear.

“Is black a color of mourning for you as well?” I asked, taking the dress from him. I didn’t want to wear it, but I also didn’t want to disrespect his customs.

“No,” he said, perplexed. “We do not have a color for mourning.”

“Then why black?” I asked.

“It matches my uniform.”

He answered so formally, so matter-of-fact, that I almost burst out laughing. “Fine,” I said, and I slid the dress over my head.

“I’m glad you’re feeling good this morning,” he said. “I wish I called on you earlier. Then I could have made you feel even better.”

His suggestion made my center tingle. The last time I had worn a dress like this, I learned for the first time just how good Jidden and his cock could make me feel. “Good thing you didn’t,” I decided, smoothing down the billowy fabric of the dress. “Otherwise, we would have missed the send-off.”

“We still can,” he teased.

I knew we couldn’t. As Lead Officer of the Fortuna, he had to be there.

“Do the men know you’ve claimed me?” I asked.

“They’ve been told not to go near you,” he said, eyeing me over. “And with good reason. Terra, you’re like starlight.”

I smiled awkwardly, unaccustomed to such compliments. The flings before my placement on the Fortuna had never meant much. I wasn’t sure what Jidden and I had, or how long it could last, but it meant something to me for now.

I was glad he hadn’t said anything to his men. I didn’t want my friends to know either, especially not Gallia. She wouldn’t understand. If his men knew, the women would soon find out. Word spread across the space station faster than the winds of a hurricane.

When we were ready, we went to the docking bay. Kalij was on guard again. I wasn’t happy to see him. If I could kill him here, I would. But I was glad for the opportunity to observe him, especially when Jidden excused himself to take a call from his Captain.

Kalij wasn’t often alone. That was a problem if you wanted to assassinate him. The bastard was popular with his comrades. Virtue didn’t win friends if you were a Surtu man. Ego did.

“I’ll still find a way,” I vowed.

“What was that?” Jidden asked, returning from his call.

“I’m just plotting to kill your men,” I said as sweetly as possible.

“You and every woman here,” he returned, taking no offense. “But you won’t succeed.”

“What did your Captain have to say?” I asked, diverting the conversation.

He refused to answer. He couldn’t. Likely, they were talking strategy, planning the moves to take over Earth. Once again, the chessboard divided us.

“It doesn’t matter,” I said. “Not right now.”

In reality, it did matter. Everything about the war mattered.

We gathered in a plain room. I had been onboard the Surtu ship before, where the furnishings were minimal. This room was no different. The walls were completely bare.

The only color in the room came from the wilting wildflowers resting on the dead soldier. But he was not alone. Bodies lay at the center of the room, each dressed in a white uniform and lying on his steel table.

See, I wanted to say. See what the price of war is.

Jidden addressed the small group of men who joined us. “The life of a soldier never goes to waste. Because of the men here, we are closer to saving our people. They were born free, and they died with honor. There is no better way.”

“There is no better way,” the men around us echoed.

I waited for Jidden to go on, but that was it. He had said everything he meant to say. So I waited some more, expecting the men to move the bodies, perhaps to be cremated or sent out into space.

Nothing happened.

“Jidden—” I began to ask, but I was cut off when a blazing white light filled the room. It blinded me. Its brilliance was harsh but beautiful.

When the light faded, the bodies of the soldiers were gone, including the wildflowers I had left. Only the living remained.

I had stood within the light once before when Jidden and his men first came to the Fortuna. It was how the Surtu arrived. And how they departed, as I learned.

I couldn’t speak. In the tragedy of war, what just happened stood out in my mind. It was something powerful and special. I hadn’t thought the Surtu were capable of it.

“What was that?” I asked Jidden as the others filtered out of the room. “Where did the bodies go?”

“Elsewhere,” he answered. Once again, he didn’t want to tell me. Jidden had his secrets, just as I had mine. But one thing was for certain – we couldn’t underestimate the Surtu. Their abilities far surpassed our own.

That doesn’t mean humanity will be defeated, I reassured myself. We still outnumber them.

I returned to my room to change. I couldn’t walk around in the black dress all day, playing dress up with the enemy. Standing in my undergarments, I prepared to hang the dress back in my closet. The dark fabric appealed to me more than I realized, so I placed it on the back of my desk chair instead.

Back in a fresh jumpsuit, I went to the kitchen to update Gallia on everything Bellona and I had discussed. The soldiers had started a new patrol, leaving us a few minutes to chat unsupervised.

As soon as I walked in, she threw a plate at me.

“Hey!” I cried, throwing my arm up in defense as the plate shattered against the wall. “What was that for?”

“For not telling me a Surtu claimed you!” she shouted as she picked up another plate.

Oops.

I remained near the door in case she went on a rampage. “How did you know?”

Losing her vigor, she slumped forward, dropping the plate into the soapy waters of the sink. “It’s true then. Terra, why didn't you tell me?"

My heart broke as I realized she wasn't asking me as my Commander. She was asking as my friend.

"Who claimed you?"

"Jidden," I confessed. "I'm not even sure what it means that he claimed me, only that no other man can have me."

"The Lead Officer in charge of the siege?"

"Yes," I said, and I joined her at the sink. "But it doesn't change anything, does it?"

"I don't know," she admitted. "If he's watching you, I'm not sure we can risk you going anywhere private. It has to stay secret."

She meant the tunnels.

"He won't find out," I promised. "He's not like Kalij. He doesn't chain me to my room. He's too busy to do things like that."

"Then why did he claim you?"

Because I told him too, when I thought I was hours from death. Of course, I couldn't tell her that.

"The Fleet Captain gave him permission to claim whoever he wanted. I guess he thought a Commander was a good choice."

It was mostly true.

She huffed. "He should count himself lucky that he didn't end up with me. Otherwise, I'd scribble him onto Bellona's hit list myself."

"That's not necessary," I said quickly. "He doesn't hurt me. And it's useful. It's why I have access to the docking bay."

"Smart," she said, relaxing. "That's smart."

"How did you know Jidden claimed me?" I asked again, hoping rumor hadn't spread.

"Being a kitchen mouse has its advantages. Earlier, I was cleaning up after a group of soldiers following their meal. They mentioned that you, the Commander, wasn't to be touched. They also said they saw you on a ship this morning to attend a funeral. I put the pieces together."

It wasn't good news. Rumors would soon sprout like weeds. Then everyone would know.

"Have you told anyone?"

"There isn't anyone to tell, except Bellona...and I'm guessing by the look on your face you don't want me to do."

"I would rather no one knew," I said truthfully.

"That's your prerogative," she replied. "Did you meet Bellona last night?"

"I did. I'm going to inject Kalij with poison."

"When?"

"As soon as I can. I still have to find the right herb, but it'll be soon."

"Good," she said. "The sooner the task is finished, the sooner we can focus on how to escape."

I was tired, but I fought my fatigue and went to the gardens. Plants were not my strong point. It was a shame I couldn't reach my mother. From the orchards to the plains, she knew everything about the flora that nourished us, and the flora that killed us.

I wasn't in the garden long before Gallia found me again. What she threw at me was much worse than any plate.

"Come quickly," she urged. "It's Lucina. She's in a bad way."

Sitting on the carpet of her sleeping quarters, I cradled Lucina in my arms. She was sobbing. We had been like this for hours.

Earlier, Kalij had found her collapsed on the floor. He thought she tried to kill herself, so he'd called in the Surtu medical officer, who was eating in the dining hall at the time. Gallia had overheard everything, and so she summoned me.

Lucina hadn't tried to kill herself. Overcome with grief, she'd blacked out.

"This doesn't change anything!" Kalij had shouted at her as the medical officer showed him out of the room. "Our light bonding ceremony will go ahead tomorrow as planned!"

The light bond. That was the cause of her grief. I still wasn't sure what a light bond was, but I knew what it implied. She would be his forever, at least in the eyes of the Surtu.

"I can't go through with it," she heaved through her tears. "I refuse to be bonded to him in any form."

My stomach felt sick thinking about it. Once they were light bonded, Kalij could do whatever he liked with her. He would take away her integrity.

I wanted to promise her it wouldn't happen, but I couldn't. It would be another broken promise, just like the one I made when I said I'd free her.

Maybe if I'd spent less time fucking Jidden...

I was angry – at the Surtu, at Kalij, and at myself. I'd been selfish with my time. I had failed Lucina.

"Here, take her," I said, passing Lucina to Gallia. "The night is fading. I don't have much time."

"Where are you going?" Gallia asked, stroking Lucina's hair.

"I made a promise, and I plan to keep it." Before leaving, I whispered to Lucina, "I swear on the pinky ghost, you're the one I honor the most." Then I was gone.

Chapter 13

JIDDEN

“The ceremony will continue,” I told Kalij, hoping it would shut him up. It was late, and I had a long day ahead of me, starting early the next morning. It wasn’t just because of the light bonding ceremony though that played a part.

Tomorrow, my people planned to attack.

“As long as the girl is conscious, she’ll be there.”

“And what if she sneaks away tonight?” Kalij argued, pacing in front of my desk.

“Where will she go?” I asked. “We have the station covered. If it makes you feel better, I’ve already ordered extra soldiers to stand guard near her quarters.”

My words didn’t make him feel better. “It’s the soldiers that worry me. I see the way they look at her. They’ll sneak in and take her. And they’ll also take that bitch of a Commander you’ve been protecting.”

The little patience I had ran out. “Listen,” I charged. “You are not to go near that girl until we bring her to you in the Grand Hall tomorrow. If you disobey me, there will be no light bonding ceremony. There will be no Kalij. Now get out of my face before I break yours.”

He left, grumbling. As he turned down the corridor, I thought I saw a shadow.

It’s nothing, I thought, but my gut told me to follow it. My instincts had never served me wrong before. They were a large part of why I’d gotten as far as I had in the military. I turned down the corridor in the same direction Kalij had left.

It was a good thing I did.

Outside the bathroom, I found Terra with a knife in her hand, waiting to strike. I only saw her back. I assumed Kalij was inside.

You should have followed him in, I thought. Good thing for me you didn’t.

I grabbed her hand, making her drop the knife before I spun her around and pinned her against the wall.

“What do you think you’re doing?” I hissed.

“I’m saving my friend before you cast her into hell,” she spat.

I now saw a side to Terra I had not known. Behind her benevolence, there was a darkness to her. It pulled me to her closely, stronger than the wildflowers. If she had it her way, she would kill Kalij.

If I had it my way, I would watch, and then I would take her to my bed.

Neither of us would get our way tonight.

Chapter 14

TERRA

I wasn't scared. The way Jidden grabbed my arm and dragged me back down the corridor told me I should be, but I wasn't.

I didn't care that Jidden caught me. My only regret was that I hadn't slit Kalij's throat beforehand. I wouldn't have made it quick. I would have let the blade linger, the way the bruises lingered across Lucina's body.

It's not like they were going to kill me. I was a woman. To the Surtu, I was sacred. They wouldn't punish me. They wouldn't punish any of us. We were already being taken as hostages, betrayed by our leaders, and forced to face the possibility that, one by one, we would all be light bonded to a Surtu man.

Except possibly me. Jidden cared for me, but he still cared for his career more.

"What is a light bond?" I demanded when he pulled me into his office.

He let go of my arm, unamused. "I'll ask the questions," he snapped.

"No, you'll answer them," I said, confronting him. "You haven't won this war yet. You're not in charge. I'm sick of all the secrecy and evasion. If my women are meant to be light bonded to your men, then we deserve to know what the hell we're getting into."

I had him. He looked down, gathering his thoughts.

"Surtu are beings of light as well as flesh," he said. "So are humans. You don't know it yet because you can't control yourselves. We can use our minds to control the atoms in our body, to become like light or to stabilize into physical form. You don't have the same control over your body, but you have the ability change. We've seen it. During a light bonding ceremony, a couple alters into light together. It's a transcendental experience, uniting mates together forever."

"And is such a light bond always required before mating?"

"If you're asking if I've broken some moral code by sleeping with you, I haven't. All the soldiers here have known Surtu women. But many of those women are barren after fighting the disease. A light bond is required for a human mate because the children are healthier when parents conceive them. Healthy children are what my people need."

I remembered Captain Fore telling me something similar. "How does the light bond work for humans if we don't know anything about it?"

“When a Surtu man shares a light bond with a human woman, he alters her state for her, turning her into light. It’s brief but powerful.”

“It sounds beautiful when you describe it,” I told him. “But it’s not. Nothing about this light bond is wholesome if a male forces into it against her will. Let Lucina go. Call off the ceremony tomorrow.”

I was trying to appeal to his inner depths.

“I won’t,” he said, returning to his cold indifference. “This is why we’re here – to mate. The ceremony will go ahead.”

“Then you’ve just sentenced your first woman to death,” I warned. “Her soul can’t survive it.”

“She’ll have to try,” he replied. He was unmoved.

I was no longer angry at myself. He was the focus of my rage. “I never should have told you to claim me. It was a mistake.”

He moved behind his desk and allowed space to build between us. “You should return to Lucina,” he said, refusing to acknowledge me further. “She needs your support right now but don’t think about running. I’ve strengthened the patrol around her quarters.”

We’ll see, I thought to myself.

When I returned to Lucina, she was with Gallia, and she was a lot calmer than before. Her sobs had stopped, and she seemed almost hopeful.

“I failed.” It was heartbreaking to tell her. Lucina was the last person I wanted to fail. “But Kalij has been ordered to stay away. If we—”

“It’s okay,” Gallia said, cutting me off. “She’s ready.”

“I am,” Lucina assured me, a wisp of a smile turning her lips. “I’m ready to show Kalij everything I have to offer.”

“I don’t understand,” I stammered, stunned at Lucina’s transformation.

“You’re not meant to,” Gallia answered for her. “Just let it be.”

Lucina smoothed out the tangles of her blonde hair. “It’s okay.”

“All right,” I said softly, throwing my hands into the air. “I don’t know what this is, but I won’t intervene.”

“You’ve been such a good friend,” Lucina said, taking my hand. “Thank you.”

Her praise should have comforted me, but it left me unsettled. It was like watching a tree grow upside down. “Is there anything you need?” I asked.

“Just you with me, by my side. Stay here tonight. It’ll be like when we were little girls. Who says adult women can’t have slumber parties?” She turned to Gallia. “I want you both to stay.”

I didn’t think it was possible, but Gallia looked embarrassed. “I’ve never been to a slumber party before,” she admitted.

The night wasn’t much of a party, and there was very little slumbering. We stayed up chatting about our lives on Earth, of what we’d go back to if we won the war. I didn’t see myself staying in the desert with my parents. My brother already took care of them. I would likely head north to the winter plains where the big cities were. The liberty of living in a city would be comforting after so much discipline on the Fortuna.

“You wouldn’t remain in the military?” Gallia asked, appalled. “All your training will go to waste.”

“This is what I trained for,” I reminded her. “This war. I never thought we’d be the generation to fight it. I always thought that after my service to the Fortuna, I’d return to Earth and do some good in the world.”

“But you are doing good in the world. You’re one of the best we have,” Gallia claimed. “You’re spectacular.”

It was a rare compliment, gifted on a strange night that pulled our emotions out of us. I was touched, but I didn’t agree with Gallia. “If you knew everything, you wouldn’t think so,” I said. “I keep failing.”

“Failing?” Lucina was incredulous. “At the eleventh hour, you were thrown into the role of Commander. With no preparation, it fell on you to meet the Surtu and learn of their intentions. A lesser woman would have caved from the pressure. You haven’t failed.”

“I agree,” Gallia said. “By taking on my responsibilities, you’ve allowed me to stay undercover in the kitchen. Your position was temporary and for show. You were never going to succeed, and yet somehow you have.”

“How?” I argued. “How have I succeeded?”

“You stayed alive,” Lucina said.

“And you learned valuable information,” Gallia added. “Like the fact that the Surtu ships can connect into one, and that they abide by a hierarchy, and that their race is near extinction. Every scrap of information is an advantage.”

I couldn’t see what they saw. “But it’s so little.”

Gallia sighed and looked up at the stars. “When you’re fighting an unknown enemy, a little is a lot. Stay true, Terra. You’re doing well.”

“Isn’t this great?” Lucina chirped, watching as a meteor shot across the sky. “We should have done more stuff like this before the Surtu arrived.”

“You never told us what you’ll do once we win the war,” Gallia said. “I’ll stay in the military. Terra will go be a rogue angel. What will you do?”

I already knew the answer. Since we were girls, Lucina wanted to teach little ones and start a family of her own. But that was not the answer she gave.

“We’ll see what happens tomorrow,” she said. “Then I’ll tell you.”

The Surtu delivered a uniform for Lucina early in the morning. It was dark blue, stiff, and lacked any embellishments.

That was a good thing. The last thing Lucina needed was a white dress with flowers in her hair.

We weren't at a celebration. It was an insult to all of humanity.

A knock on the door signaled it was time to leave for the Grand Hall where Kalij was waiting.

"Are you sure you can go through with this?" I asked Lucina one last time.

"Positive," she said. She possessed a strange and awkward confidence. "I can do it."

Knowing she'd made her decision, I opened the door. I was annoyed to find Jidden standing on the other side.

"I had to make sure you didn't run off in the middle of the night," he said.

I assumed he was joking, but I wasn't in the mood. "I take it you're officiating."

"No," he answered, taking a step back as he realized he'd receive no warmth from me. "I'm not. I'm going to miss the ceremony. I have a call to take."

"You have a lot of calls."

"We're at war, remember?"

With nothing left to say, I let Lucina take the lead, resisting the urge to pull her back as we made our way to the Grand Hall. It was no secret what was happening. The women of the Fortuna looked upon Lucina with pity, but they saluted her properly as we passed, honoring her.

We entered the Grand Hall, greeted by a handful of soldiers who waited for us. There was no decor, but none was needed. The Grand Hall was magnificent on its own with marble flooring and colonnades. The tiling on the walls formed a mosaic of all of Earth's natural wonders – the rainforests and the white-capped mountains.

Until today, it had been one of my favorite places on the Fortuna, second only to the gardens. Now it felt like enemy headquarters.

At the front of the hall was Kalij with his dirty red hair and a smug smile. I didn't know how Lucina could act so brave when destiny stood before her looking so terrible.

I soon found out.

Lucina went to meet Kalij. He reached his hand out to her, but she did not accept the hand of the Depraved. Moving quickly, she let a hidden dagger drop from her sleeve, and she plunged it into his chest. Kalij stumbled backward, clawing at the dagger.

Instantly, two guards grabbed Lucina's arms, but she hardly noticed. Pleased with herself, she smiled broadly, a smile she'd learned from Bellona, the smile of an assassin.

Gallia ran to her.

It should have been over. Lucina did what I could not.

But it wasn't over. While I watched with frightened awe, a light shone from Kalij like a bright rage. He pulled the dagger from his chest as the light healed him, mending his wound like an invisible seamstress.

When the light disappeared, only his rage remained.

“Can you see?” he bellowed, waving the dagger in the air. “We can’t be defeated. We are your destiny.”

To my horror, he turned to Gallia. “You,” he seethed. “You with your eyes like green poison. You convinced her to do this. She would never have thought of this on her own.”

Gallia stood tall and refused to be intimidated. She said nothing.

Twirling the dagger in his hand, he stepped closer to her. “I can survive this,” he said, flashing the dagger at her. “Can you?” he asked, and he stabbed her in the heart.

“No!” Lucina screamed as Gallia fell in front of her. She struggled against the soldiers who held her.

I have to get Jidden, I thought, trying not to crack into pieces as Gallia bled to death on the marble floor. He can save her, the way he saved me.

But I didn’t get a chance to leave.

“And you, Commander of bitches,” Kalij yelled, removing the dagger from Gallia’s heart. He stared deeply into my eyes.

“You’re next.”

Chapter 15

TERRA

“No!” Lucina Whitmore cried, struggling against the soldiers who held her arms. At her feet lay Gallia, blood pouring from her heart where Kalij had stabbed her.

The Surtu could heal themselves. They were beings of light as well as the flesh, but the light seemed to be the higher power within them, allowing them to heal both their bodies and others.

Jidden could save Gallia. I needed to get to Jidden – my alien lover.

But I could not. He was in another part of the space station on a call and Kalij blocked my way, flaunting a dagger in front of me. The tip of the blade was stained with Gallia’s blood.

“You lied to me, Commander,” Kalij hissed. “You told me you had light bonded with a Surtu man, but you didn’t. Do you think I’m an idiot?”

Yes, I wanted to say, but I knew better. Frantically, I looked around at the handful of other soldiers in the room. “Someone save her!” I shouted, pointing at Gallia, not caring if it set Kalij off. “Claim her if you have to, but save her.”

No one moved. Kalij laughed. It made me sick. “They won’t betray me for you. Now beg, Commander. Beg for your life.”

I wouldn’t beg, and he knew it. I followed Gallia’s example. I would face the same fate she did.

I straightened my shoulders and held my head high, allowing the disdain I felt towards the dirty redhead to radiate from me like the blast from the nuke that almost destroyed the Fortuna.

“Very well,” he said, pleased. “You made your choice.”

He flicked his wrist, ready to strike me down, but he wavered when Jidden – the Lead Officer in charge of the siege on the Fortuna – burst into the hall.

Apparently, not all the soldiers were loyal to Kalij. One of them must have snuck out to summon Jidden.

“Enough, Kalij!” Jidden ordered. “Let her go!”

I was far from saved. I saw the wild look in Kalij’s eyes. He was going to kill me, regardless of who was in the room.

Jidden must have seen it too. He threw his hand out in front of him, and the dagger twisted out of Kalij’s grasp as if handled by an unknown puppet master.

It was a power I never knew the Surtu had. What else could they do, and how would we defeat them? They had masked it well from their enemies. When the dagger clattered to the floor, I quickly kicked it towards Jidden, and then I elbowed Kalij in the face, feeling his nose crack.

It was not like me to get joy from violence, but hurting Kalij in any way possible satisfied a dark part of me.

“Seize him!” Jidden yelled as a troop of soldiers stormed into the Grand Hall. “Seize them all.”

Except for Kalij, the other men in the hall surrendered quietly. Kalij was having none of it. “What of my light bonding ceremony?” he demanded, turning his attention to Lucina, who had collapsed at Gallia’s side, weeping. “She belongs to me. I’ve claimed her.”

Ignoring him, Jidden went to Gallia. He set his hand over heart. A bright light momentarily blazed across the hall then disappeared, taking my hope with it.

Gallia did not move.

I didn’t think Jidden was capable of regret until he looked at me with an unspoken sorrow. Gallia was dead. There was no bringing her back.

I went to her slowly, in shock. Sitting on the floor next to Jidden, I didn’t care that Gallia’s blood stained the knees of my white jumpsuit. I smoothed away a piece of her raven-black hair, hoping that there was a special kind of heaven for women who sacrificed themselves as bravely as Gallia.

Devastated, Lucina threw herself into my arms, and I held her.

“There will be no light bonding ceremony today,” Jidden announced, loud and definite.

“You can’t do that!” Kalij screamed, inciting a cluster of guards to surround him as if they were trapping a beast in his cage. “It’s my right! Captain Fore gave his permission.”

“Captain Fore will agree with my decision,” Jidden said, standing to confront Kalij. “The life of a human woman is worth more than the life of a soldier. We are at the risk of extinction. You betrayed your people, Kalij. The Captain will punish you accordingly.”

“You are mine!” Kalij yelled to Lucina as the guards escorted him out of the hall. “I will come back for you! We will be light bonded! I should have taken you when I had the chance!”

After Kalij had left, Lucina shuddered in my arms.

“Are you okay?” Jidden asked me, his tone much softer than when he had spoken to his men.

“No,” I said, looking at Gallia. “I’m not.”

He addressed the soldiers once more. “This will be a day of mourning,” he declared. “We will mourn for the woman and the Surtu children she would have borne. And the children they would have borne. And the children they would have borne. Especially their daughters. The greed of one man will destroy an entire line of our people.”

“What will happen to Gallia?” I asked, remembering the way the Surtu sent off their dead – by summoning a light that took their bodies. It was beautiful and powerful, but it was not what Gallia would have wanted. She was loyal to her people. She had died for them and given her life to the Fortuna to protect them.

She would want an Earth burial.

Jidden understood this without me having to tell him. “She will be placed within your temple. You may mourn her as you like.”

“We bury our dead,” I told him. “If someone dies while they are in space, their body is sent home to be laid to rest.”

“I’ll see what I can do,” he said, sounding uncertain. “After today, I doubt Earth will accept any ships from the Fortuna, not even a cargo ship.”

“What does that mean?” I challenged.

He didn’t answer.

Chapter 16

JIDDEN

What had we become?

This was not the Surtu way. We were honorable soldiers. We killed to serve a purpose, not kill out of self-indulgence.

At least, not in the time of my father. My father had been honorable, a well-respected soldier. That was why the military was eager to take me when he died. He had served my people well. But he was only a soldier, like me. Promotions in the military didn't come easy.

The men at the top were in an elite club. They didn't share their power with just anyone.

But they were still honorable, unlike the next generation of soldiers – soldiers like Kalij and his heathen friends. They were my age, but I lived in the old world while they lived in the new. They refused to work hard, believing their uniform alone entitled them to take what they wanted.

Maybe it was true when it came to human women. A Surtu man could claim the woman of his choosing, as long as a superior approved the match. But any man who would kill a woman so recklessly, the way Kalij had, was corrupt.

The question was – had Kalij always been corrupt? Was it inherent within him, or was his failure a consequence of being trained to take without remorse?

Either way, it was not honorable. My father would never have tolerated it. And neither could I.

I did not care about the fate of the women of Earth when I believed them to be nothing more than a means of survival. My time with Terra had changed my views. Along with our survival, they could offer us intellect, art, and humor.

We needed to mate with the human women. That could not be changed. However, we could allow them some dignity in the process.

We could offer them more than a generation of entitled heathens. We could offer them more than a dagger in the heart.

I sat at my desk in my office, my head in my hands. I was conflicted. I wanted to serve my people the way my father had, but I was not sure if I could.

How could I teach a pack of dogs integrity?

The light on my communicator came on. I watched the small circular device buzz on my desk, wishing it would disappear. In frustration, I picked it up and threw it against the wall.

It didn't break. Of course, nothing about the Surtu was breakable.

"Sir, the Captain is waiting to resume your call," the soldier in charge of communications informed me, poking his head into my office.

"I know," I grumbled, and I stormed to the communications room where Captain Fore waited on the video screen.

"What the hell was so important you had to leave your Fleet Captain waiting?" he roared, speaking in our native language, which was much more fluid than the languages on Earth. "We attack Earth today!"

"A woman has been killed," I told him. "By the hand of one of our soldiers."

Captain Fore instantly went still. There was no worse offense than killing a woman. "Who is responsible?" he asked calmly. He was still angry, but now it was like ice.

"Kalij, the soldier who was to be light bonded today, claimed she tried to stab him with a hidden dagger before the ceremony. To punish her, he killed her friend."

"And why didn't anyone stop him?"

"Because some of the soldiers forget why we are here. They believe this is a joy ride, like a raid on a candy store."

"Then bleed the corruption out," Captain Fore instructed. "I didn't get this far by playing fair. I earned everything I have by being a tyrant. My men tremble when I'm near. Yours should do the same."

"I have already sent Kalij to you on a glider," I said, speaking of the small vessels we used to transport goods between ships. "I'll take care of the rest."

Captain Fore had already lost interest. "The remainder of the fleets will arrive within the hour. Soon after, the light out will occur. It will blind the Earth, including the useless military stations that guard it. During that time, our ships will land on the planet. The takeover should be quick."

"It's best not to underestimate the humans," I warned. "My time with them on the Fortuna has taught me they are capable of much more than we realize. Their will is resilient."

"I never doubted they were resilient," Captain Fore said. "But a lamb cannot destroy a wolf, no matter how hard it bites."

I thought the conversation was over, but he added, "You've done well, Jidden. We were only the vanguard fleet, meant to assure the safe arrival of the other fleets. Not only have you secured a command center for us, but you did it without harming the women we came here for. I won't hold the actions of Kalij against you. Rest assured, when we return home, your promotion will be discussed."

"I'm pleased to hear it," I said, trying not to let my surprise show. Captain Fore rarely acknowledged success so formally.

"When should I expect the light out?" I asked.

"By the end of the day," he answered. "Be prepared."

Chapter 17

TERRA

“And so we bid goodbye to our dear sister,” Bellona said to the women of the Fortuna. We were all gathered outside the temple. Beside her, Juventas held Gallia in her burly arms.

Gallia’s wounds had been cleaned, and she wore a fresh jumpsuit, but her face appeared restless even in death.

I couldn’t believe Gallia would ever be at peace until Earth was safe.

The temple was usually a place of great beauty, with ivy cascading down the small Roman structure. As I looked around today, I only sensed a terrible sorrow. The sadness ripped through me as I stood at the back, listening to Bellona say farewell to our Commander.

Lucina could not bear it. She slept away her grief in my quarters, unable to return to her room after being trapped there for so long. I wanted to hide away with her and exchange the nightmare around us for the bliss of slumber, but I couldn’t.

Bellona needed me. We needed each other. We were barely holding it together. I knew what she was thinking because I was thinking it too. We had to kill the Surtu and rip them apart one by one.

It didn’t matter if we died in the process. It was better than letting them win.

“...as brave as the solitary moon. Let us leave our sister with the goddesses she now walks beside. She will be another star to light our path.”

Juventas turned and entered the temple with Gallia to lay her on the altar, followed by Bellona. Slowly, the women filtered in to say their individual goodbyes to Gallia before returning to the inner station. I watched them leave, understanding the cloak of anger and sorrow they shared.

I wore it too.

I was the last to enter the temple. When it was only Bellona and me beside Gallia, I ran a hand across the altar, afraid to touch our fallen Commander, knowing there was no warmth left in her.

“Some of the soldiers saw you,” I said to Bellona. “They stand guard on the edge of the wood.”

“There are three hundred women on this station. I’m sure they’ll forget my face soon.”

I doubted it. Her fiery red hair and amber eyes made her a rare beauty, even when those amber eyes held an assassin’s chill.

Standing next to her with my mousy brown hair, I felt like wood next to a flame.

“I think the Surtu are about to attack Earth,” I said.

Bellona didn't flinch. "It was only a matter of time. We have to escape before Earth succeeds in shooting us down."

"We don't have to make it to Earth. Not initially. We just have to make it to the next military base."

"True," Bellona said, and paused to think.

"We have to take back control of the cargo ships in the docking bay. I don't think we can use the underground tunnels to sneak away, but we can use them to launch a sneak attack. We'll find some way to distract the soldiers on the Fortuna, and then we'll raise the divide that cuts off the docking bay. That leaves fewer soldiers to fight. We can use the tunnel that leads to the docking bay to attack."

"Once the hatch is open, anyone not on a ship will be swept away into space. Some women may have to sacrifice themselves."

That included us, but I didn't argue. We were never going to be able to save everyone.

"We'll get to that," I professed. "First we have to figure out a way to distract the soldiers on the Fortuna so that we can access the tunnels."

Bellona nodded, distracted by her grief. She went to Gallia and slid her fingers down Gallia's already closed lids. "Will they send her to Earth to be buried?"

"I don't know."

"Then we must take her with us."

"Of course."

A tear trickled down Bellona's cheek, the first and only I had ever seen from her eyes. "I'll miss her. She was tough on us, but it made us better."

"We will remember her," I promised. "As our friend and as our Queen Sister."

Bellona smiled a sad, broken smile. "Our Queen Sister. I like that."

Suddenly, the Fortuna trembled, indicating the arrival of another ship. "We better get out of here soon, before the entire fleet lands," I murmured.

Bellona looked at me with heartfelt resolve. "Be prepared," she said. "You are the one the women will follow. You really are our Commander now."

The moon was almost full. With the limited sunlight on the Fortuna, the moon was like our sun. Sitting alone on a stone wall that surrounded the wildflowers in the gardens, I embraced the moon and absorbed its feminine power.

I was not the same woman I had been before the Surtu arrived. I felt a darkness brewing in me and boiling my blood black.

It wasn't because of my relationship with Jidden. With his dark hair, a strong body, and flecks of light dancing around his blue elfin eyes, his touch was the one thing keeping me from shattering. The way he ran his hands lightly over my bare skin sent shivers down my spine.

If anything, Jidden was my light.

At least, he had been at one time. I wasn't sure if I could forgive him for feeding Lucina to the beast that was Kalij. I had pleaded with him to call off the light bonding ceremony, and he had refused.

Now Lucina was devastated, and Gallia was dead.

I could not blame Jidden for the hatred transforming me, I blamed his people – the Surtu. They threatened everything I loved. My sister warriors on the Fortuna. And my family back home.

The Surtu deserved their extinction.

Chapter 18

JIDDEN

From the trees, I watched Terra as she sat on the wall in the gardens. Her expression was complicated. I could tell that rage twisted within her.

She had always been beautiful, but with the moonlight streaming down upon her, illuminating the curves within her skintight jumpsuit, she was more exquisite than ever.

She had me. I had claimed her, but I wanted more. I wanted to bring her into the light.

I doubted that would ever happen. Now, more than ever, I was her enemy. As much as it was in my right to do so, I could not take her against her will. I would not force her to light bond with me. If I did, I would lose her forever.

We remained enemies. The only thing I could do for her was to let my love harden into an anger of my own.

Chapter 19

TERRA

“Come with me,” Jidden ordered, finding me in near the wildflowers. “We need to talk.”

Whenever Jidden summoned me before, I had obliged.

Things were going to change, starting now.

“I’m not going anywhere. If you think you’ll get any action from me, you’re mistaken.”

“I don’t,” he said coolly.

“If you have something to say, just say it.”

He turned to leave, appearing unimpressed with my attitude. Suddenly he snapped back around. “What have you done to me?” he demanded, losing his composure. “I was grounded until I met you. I was in control. Now I constantly feel like I’m falling.”

I struggled with his words. Every part of me gravitated towards him, but he was a black hole. He was my destruction. This morning had proved it.

“I haven’t done anything,” I uttered. “You’re the one who claimed me.”

“Because you told me too!” He began to pace, running a strong hand through his dark hair. “You’ve weakened me.”

“Your obscene morals weakened you. It’s not my fault if your conscience finally outgrew your cock.”

“Don’t say that,” he said. “You know you mean more to me than our time in bed together.”

I did know it, but I wasn’t in the mood to let him off easy, not with Gallia dead in the temple. “I thought your career meant the most to you.”

“I’m not sure about that anymore.”

“What do you mean?”

“You call us the Depraved. Soldiers of the past would never have allowed the life of a woman to spill across the floor. Now we kill what is precious to us. We travel to the stars to find love, only to corrupt it. There’s no reason to claim women. Look at us. We’ve mated freely, haven’t we?”

“Yes,” I admitted, my mood softening. “We have.”

Jidden came to me, and we kissed, sealing our loyalty together under the moonlight. The kiss started tender, but it soon turned passionate. Without breaking the kiss, he reached behind my back to unzip my jumpsuit, using the stone wall for support. I let him, wrapping my legs around him, feeling his cock press against me through his uniform, but then I remembered Gallia.

“I can’t,” I said, pushing him away. “Not today.”

He understood. “Of course,” he said, stepping back. “You need time to mourn.”

Torn between my grief and my need for him, I looked up at the moon. It inspired me. “Tell me again about the Surtu warrior goddess with the auburn hair,” I implored. “The one you told me about before.”

“Nelti,” he reminded me. “With her auburn hair and eyes without color, only flecks of light, her dark beauty was incomparable. She was a merciless warrior and ruthless to protect those she loved. She had lovers, both men and women, but her love was cold like a starless night.”

He stopped, a thought troubling his speech. I saw the conflict waging within him. “There’s something you should know,” he said. “Earth will soon be invaded.”

“I already suspected. I didn’t know it was today, but I knew it was coming soon. How will it happen?”

“A light will blind out Earth and the surrounding space stations. Your technology will shut down. It will be brief, but our ships only need a moment to land on Earth.”

He was transparent, and it made me wrestle with a confession of my own. “I can trust you, can’t I?” I asked.

“I hope so,” he answered.

“I’m not the Commander of this space station,” I disclosed, my heart racing. “It was Gallia.”

Instead of trading lies, we were trading truths.

“I would never have guessed,” he replied, neutral, making it impossible to tell how he took the news. “You have such a high intellect. You’re a natural Commander.”

A day earlier, I would have disagreed with him, but there was no more time for self-doubt. “We need to do something.”

He agreed but didn’t have a direction. “We can’t save Earth.”

“No. But we can save the women of the Fortuna.”

My grief and rage ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. I wanted to fight, beginning with the scum who had terrorized Lucina and killed Gallia – Kalij.

Bellona, the Red Assassin, was able to move with the shadows. She often spoke of a hit list. I don’t know if she kept one or not, but I had mine, with Kalij at the top.

It was a shame Jidden had returned to the inner station to do whatever it was the Lead Officer of a ship did. Otherwise, I would ask him what became of my target.

I had not followed Jidden inside. As he asked, I stayed out in the gardens with no intention of going to my quarters. I did not want to wake Lucina nor did I want Gallia to be alone in the temple.

Bellona was with her now, but she couldn't stay all night if she wanted to continue avoiding the guards.

Bellona was like the warrior goddess Nelti. She ruled the shadows though her heart was full of inner light. Her state of mind was alluring.

An impulse propelled me to the herb section of the gardens. My knowledge of herbs wasn't great. My mother had tried to teach me, but it was a subject that didn't interest me. There were so many other subjects I wanted to explore, like geography and cosmology. I recognized a few herbs, including the perse-thistle with its reddish-purple leaves.

As I picked the perse-thistle, I looked over and spotted another something else. A root. I couldn't remember its name, but I knew its properties. Something that could prove useful in the future.

As I reached for the root, a bright light blinded me. It lit up the Fortuna like a solar flare. I don't know how long it lasted. When I could see my hands again, they were clenching the root. I barely noticed it as I was caught up in the implications of the light.

The Surtu had invaded Earth.

"Drink this," I said to Jidden later that evening, handing him a mug of tea. It had taken me a long time to find him here in his quarters on his ship. The tea was starting to go cold.

He smelt it then suspiciously pushed my hand away. "No," he refused. "It smells like the hair of a burkey."

"What's that?" I asked, swirling the hot yellow mixture around in the mug.

"It's like your human horses."

It didn't know what a burkey smelled like, but the tea smelled nothing like a horse. It was much worse.

"Drink it," I insisted. "Trust me."

He sat on his bed. It was the only comfortable furnishing in his small, efficiently sterile room. "You look too eager to trust."

"My appearance is exactly why you should trust me."

"That makes no sense," he replied, but he took the mug from me. He spit out his first sip, but he managed to down most of what remained.

"That tasted vile," he seethed afterward, wiping his mouth with the sleeve of his uniform. "What was it?"

I still couldn't remember the name of the root, so I made one up. "Pest control."

"Is that supposed to be a joke?"

There was no need to answer him. He passed out, falling unconscious on his bed.

"Nighty night," I said with a little wave, and I looked over at the timepiece on Jidden's desk.

“And the clock starts now.”

As I waited for Jidden to wake, I went to his closet and began searching through his uniforms. Most were black, but a few were dark blue. One was white. The white one was what his fellow soldiers would dress him in to send him off if he died.

It was chilling to think that to the Surtu fleet, death was part of the standard issue outfit.

Jidden didn't have much in the way of possessions. I didn't expect photos, not on a battleship, but maybe a trinket or two that revealed what his life was like on his home planet. There were only boots and uniforms and bed sheets.

And then I remembered Jidden had grown up in the military after his parents died, each in their tragic way, and I found the emptiness in Jidden's room terribly sad.

He woke sooner than I expected. “What the hell did you do to me?” he demanded groggily.

“Damn,” I muttered. “The amount of pest control I gave you would have knocked a human out all night.”

“I was your test dummy!” He was equally outraged and intrigued. “What if your tea had killed me?”

“I would have found another drug to try on someone else,” I said easily as I slid the door to his closet shut.

He studied me carefully, mistrustful. “Did you find what you were looking for?”

“I didn't give you the tea to snoop. It was an experiment. You were out for over an hour, almost two. That's how much time I have to get everyone where they need to be.”

“You're going to drug my soldiers,” he concluded. “How?”

“As Gallia said, being in the kitchen has its advantages.”

“But you're not part of the kitchen staff anymore. Whether you accept it or not, you truly are the Commander of this space station.”

“I accept it. That's why I have to find a way to help the women escape.”

“Where will you go?” he asked.

“As close to Earth as we can get.”

His face fell. “Maybe you shouldn't give me the details. It's better that I don't know.”

A knot formed in my stomach. It was my turn to study him. “Do you plan to betray me?” I asked.

He was indignant. “No. Of course not.”

“Then why aren't you coming with us?”

He was conflicted. It was funny how the war did that – caused people to confront themselves. “I'm not sure I can abandon my people,” he said truthfully. “Allowing you to leave is one thing, but leaving with you is another.”

I sat on the bed next to him. “How long can you go on here, just watching? You despise your soldiers and think they are heathens, as we do. Is this a life you can continue to live? Is your promotion that important to you?”

“No,” he determined, and he took my hand. “Not without you. I’ll leave with you. I’ll help ensure your women make it to safety. They will charge me with treason, but I have already acted against the Captain’s orders. If anybody finds out we have mated outside a light bond, I could be executed.”

It was momentous to hear. I dropped my eyes and swept my hand over his. “I thought you were my destruction when all along I was yours.”

“You are my salvation,” he said. “You are setting me free. But escaping does have its dangers. It’s possible we won’t survive this.”

It was true. War did not guarantee life. “It’s possible none of us will,” I added, my heart heavy.

“When a couple alters their state of being during a light bond, becoming light out of flesh, what do you feel like afterward?” I asked, curious to know.

“From what they have told me, during the light bond, it’s like sharing one soul. You are completely exposed to each other. After, you feel connected with the person. Your instincts about them are heightened. If they are in pain, you know. If they are happy, you know. If they are making love to another person, you know. Distance does not matter.”

“So the light bond connects you, but it doesn’t necessarily make you loyal to your mate?”

“No. Sometimes, the soul you see in the other person can be repulsive. You gain an understanding or compassion for why they have become who they are, but it does not mean you can tolerate it. Your little blonde friend was right to try to kill Kalij, she would have been miserable.”

“But it can also be an exhilarating experience,” I speculated. “Especially if two people love each other?”

He squeezed my hand, his dark eyes serious, even as the flecks of light within them brightened. “Yes, it can.”

“Then let’s do it,” I proposed. “I want to light bond with you.”

“Are you sure?” he asked. “You have my loyalty regardless.”

“Are you sure?” I returned, wondering if he had his doubts.

In answer, he kissed me, powerful and hungry, causing me to fall across his bed. His weight on top of me was a comfort and my armor in this war. I moved my body beneath his muscles as he kissed me, grinding my hips to an internal rhythm. I ached for him, greater than I had before.

I was his claimed. I was his destiny.

The Fortuna trembled, announcing yet another ship landing within the docking bay, but it did not halt our passion. If anything, it made us more hot-blooded than before.

He kissed me harder. His desire was uncontrollable.

Somewhere between our kisses, he managed to unzip my jumpsuit in the back. Gently but swiftly, he pulled it off my arms and down my waist, leaving me topless. Tossing my bra aside, he took my breast into his mouth and flicked his tongue over the soft skin of my nipple as he began to grind against me.

Feeling the hardness of his large cock through our uniforms and the pleasure of his warm tongue on my nipple caused my sex to soak. He continued to awaken my body with his mouth as he pulled off the rest of my jumpsuit, leaving tender, desperate kisses down my stomach and my thigh. He stopped only to remove his uniform, leaving us both naked across the bed.

No longer were we human and Surtu, defined by the uniforms we wore. We were just Jidden and Terra, undefined lovers.

“You are my light,” Jidden whispered to me, cupping my head in his hands. The flesh of his body was hot on my own. “You will always be my light.”

He entered me, his cock sliding into my wetness. I moaned loudly, enjoying the pain of his largeness, and I spread my legs open wider, inviting him to fill me completely, to make me whole.

Normally, fucking Jidden had an edge to it. That wasn’t necessary tonight. His hips grating against mine was enough. Feeling him thrust in and out of me was enough. It was all more than enough. As his cock massaged the inside of me, I felt a wave of euphoria build within me. My body felt numb with pleasure, then jolted with ecstasy that increased with every thrust of Jidden’s cock.

I could feel myself starting to come, a wave of bliss shaking me down to my soul.

And then it happened.

Plunging himself deep within me, Jidden grabbed my hands, pinning them to the mattress above my head, a look of complete bliss about him, and my body altered. I was pure light, as was he, two beacons shining brightly amongst the stars. I could feel Jidden as if he were a part of me. I knew his pain from losing his parents, his need to impress his superiors because they were the only family he had, and his rejection of what the new generation of Surtu soldiers had become.

More than anything, I felt his absolute need to protect me.

Together, we shined bright, embracing our flaws and our strengths, finding compassion in each other. And love.

I was light, but it was a love that left me breathless.

I slept beside Jidden for as long as I could, refusing to leave his side. I was content within his arms.

I knew the Surtu invasion had changed me, but when my being altered into light, not only did I see Jidden’s soul, but I saw my own. It was only for a brief moment of timelessness, but there was a complexity to me. I was neither light nor dark, good nor bad. Outside the light, it was hard to understand, but it lingered in my memory, like wisps of a ruined dream.

When the moonlight disappeared from the room, I had to leave. Lucina needed me much more than my mate. Slipping out of Jidden’s shielding arms, I left his ship and returned to the Fortuna, watching the docking bay and looking for weaknesses in the patrol that guarded it.

In my quarters, Lucina continued to sleep. Her pale blonde hair matted against my pillow as her body trembled with heartache. She still wore the Surtu uniform forced on her before her ill-fated light bonding ceremony. The uniform caged her to her terror.

I would have removed it, but I did not want to wake her. Whatever horrors she faced in her dreams would multiply when she woke.

Moving quietly, I grabbed the perse-thistle from my dresser. The herb-stained my hands blood-red as I carried it into the bathroom.

Later, when I emerged from a long shower, I stripped out of my white jumpsuit, and I put on the black Roman-inspired dress that lay across my desk chair. I had worn it previously to the Surtu remembrance of their fallen soldiers, but I had not wanted to put the dress back into my closet.

Now I knew why.

Leaving Lucina, I went to the temple, the dress billowing behind me. I walked through the gardens past the wildflowers and into the shelter of the woods where the temple was.

Bellona was inside, still keeping Gallia company. When she saw me, her eyes opened wide in surprise. That said a lot. It was hard to surprise an assassin. She no longer saw the Terra Lynch she had earlier that day. She saw a woman with auburn hair dressed in black – a warrior goddess. A Commander.

“You’re like nightshade,” she commented, but there was a mistrust about her. She looked at me as if I were of the Surtu.

“We have a war to fight,” I told her. “It’s time I accepted that.”

Her eyes burned. “And what side will you be fighting on?”

I didn’t understand. “The side of the Fortuna,” I answered.

“Yes, but for the women or the men?”

I was offended and confused. I watched Bellona move around Gallia, a snake about to strike. “I don’t believe I have to answer that question.”

“I think you do. I saw you by the wildflowers with your Surtu man. You seemed to be enjoying yourself on today.” With sorrow, she touched Gallia’s hand.

“If you were playing spy, you should have opened your ears,” I chided. “Then you would know that he is on our side.”

“I heard everything you said, but we can’t trust the Surtu. They use us. Was your Surtu lover truthful when he claimed to be the Lead Officer of an envoy ship? Was he truthful when brought you out into the gardens to negotiate the terms of our surrender while his men took our weapons? Don’t be weak, Nightshade. He’s using you by filling your heart with false promises.”

Her fears were valid, but I knew the truth. “Except that we mated before we were light bonded. He risked death to be with me. He still does.”

She stopped cold. “You are light bonded?”

I lifted my chin. I was not ashamed. “Willingly, but without his Captain’s approval. His sentence will be death for disobeying his Captain.”

Her mistrust turned to pity. “And what if his Captain knows already? What if this is all part of their game?”

It was impossible to explain the light bond to Bellona. I had seen Jidden’s soul. I knew he was truthful. She wouldn’t understand without experiencing it, so I appealed to her reason. “What would he have to gain? The Surtu already have control of the Fortuna. They have moved their efforts to Earth. The light that blinded us earlier – that was their attack. They have invaded.”

“I know. I heard you speak,” she reminded me.

“Then you know he spoke the truth.”

“I refuse to trust him,” she asserted. “But I will trust you. The Fortuna is our home no longer. More ships land. Apparently, the Fortuna will become a center for their command. Get us off this space station, and I’ll follow you wherever you go.”

Her loyalty meant everything to me. “I’ve found a way to distract the soldiers,” I informed her. And I filled her in on my plan. The longer I spoke, the more she smiled, her humor cold and lethal.

“It’s good,” Bellona said. “We have to do it soon. Tomorrow, if possible, before more ships land.”

“Yes,” I agreed. “Tomorrow. And we’ll bring our Commander with us,” I said, indicating Gallia. “She will have the Earth burial she deserves.”

Bellona could be wise and compassionate, but right now she was only vengeance. “The Surtu should get ready. They’re about to see what happens when you mix a Red Assassin with Nightshade.”

In the underground tunnels of the Fortuna, at the intersection where all three tunnels met, I aimed my mini-crossbow at the target I had created out of pillow shams and weeds. The target was named Kalij.

Like many of the women on the Fortuna, I had hidden weapons where no one could find them. My cache was in a trick panel on my bookshelf. We were all one big trick, a trick that failed.

Not anymore. Failure was no longer an option. This time, if we failed, we died. Or worse, we would be mated to those we despised.

Imagining that Kalij stood in front of me with his grotesque smile, I pulled the trigger of my crossbow. The arrow landed deep within what would have been his heart.

Damn it.

Then I shot again, this time hitting his groin.

If only he stood before me in real life, and I was not practicing on a makeshift target. I had never killed someone before. I was not capable of it before, but I would gladly kill Kalij and his friends. I would kill every single soldier that stood and did nothing while Kalij plunged the dagger into Gallia’s heart. Not only did they fail to stop him, but they refused to heal Gallia afterward. Her blood was as much on their hands as the target before me.

All of their names were on my hit list.

Unable to sleep, I spent the remainder of the night in the tunnels, practicing my aim with the crossbow. I was satisfied every time the arrow met the target. I barely missed. I had always been skilled. Now the Surtu would see how skilled I was.

“You’ve changed,” Jidden remarked, joining me from the tunnel that led to the docking bay. “You’re more you.”

He presented the key I had left him. It was Gallia’s key. I hope she understood my decision, wherever she was.

I didn’t take the key back. Instead, I crouched low and swept my leg out, trying to force him down by attacking his knees. My dress caught on my foot, and I slipped.

“You can’t wear that tomorrow,” he said, holding a hand out to help me up.

“It shouldn’t matter,” I declared, taking his hand and pulling him to the ground. He stumbled, but he did not fall. He was too tall and strong, much larger than an average human man. “My ability to fight shouldn’t depend on what clothes I wear.”

He held his hand out again, and this time I let him help me up. “Let me show you how to strike a Surtu soldier.”

I could hear the pain in his voice as he spoke. Jidden was taking a difficult path. He would not betray me, but he had betrayed his people. While justified, it ate at him like an infection.

He lifted the top of his uniform, revealing his hard abs beneath. “We are flesh, like you. Remember that. You won’t be able to knock us down, so you’ll have to strike while we stand. Aim here, between the ribs.” He pointed to where his muscles covered his rib cage. “If you hit here, you’ll knock the air out of us. That’s how you can hinder us.”

I attempted to punch him in the gut where he pointed, but his reflexes were fast. He grabbed my fist, stopping me. “Nice try.”

I smiled. “If I had you on the ground, you wouldn’t be complaining about what I’d be doing to you.”

Immediately, he dropped my fist. “Be my guest.”

I was all talk, but he wasn’t. Before I could step away, he grabbed me and held me close. “Hello, my light bonded,” he said before kissing me, harder than he ever had before. His lips left bruises on my own. I liked it.

A reckless urge ripped through me. The light between us had brought peace, but it wasn’t dormant. It was wild and overpowering. Jidden felt it too.

Roughly, he spun me around and bent me over. There was no time to remove our clothes. Our desire for each other was too strong. He flipped my black dress up and grabbed the ends of my now auburn hair, forcing my head back as he unzipped his uniform and drove his cock straight into me.

It hurt, but I liked that as well. I opened my legs wider and arched my back, allowing him to penetrate deeper inside. My body shook as he pounded me, his love excruciating. I rocked with him, breathing hard as the pain turned to pleasure. I soaked his cock with my wetness as I began to climax. He grabbed my hips and drove into me harder, unrelenting, until we came together, our puddles of love blending into a hot, sticky mess.

As we came, he pulled my head back further, and then he turned me back around and kissed me, breaking my soul completely.

“I love you,” I told him. “I always will.”

“I love you too,” he proclaimed, his inner depth finally winning over his flawed ego.

I was full of bliss, but there was a weight to our confessions. With our escape only hours away, it felt as if we were saying goodbye.

“What about Lucina?” Bellona asked me as we covered Gallia’s body in the temple with a white lace cloth. “She’s not fit to fight.”

“I gave her some tea,” I revealed. “She’ll continue to sleep. Jidden will take her to the ship as soon as the soldiers are in the dining hall.”

“Why him?” she snapped.

“Because when the fight begins, he is the only one who can carry her past the soldiers without her being harmed.”

Bellona couldn’t argue with my logic, so she said nothing.

“Trust me, Jidden won’t betray us.”

“He won’t reveal you,” she said. “We are another story.”

“I thought you were going to trust my decision.”

She sighed, wrapping the final corner of lace around Gallia. “I do trust you. That doesn’t mean I like it.”

It was morning on the Fortuna. It was hard to tell with the stars still shining through the entrance of the temple. In the starlight, we lifted Gallia off the altar. With a quick look behind us to make sure no guards were checking in, we pushed the stone slab of the altar back, revealing a flat wooden doorway beneath – the entrance to the tunnels. One of three, including the docking bay and the bread oven in the kitchen. I used my key to open the door.

“I’ll leave her next to where the tunnel exists at the docking bay,” Bellona recited, going over our plan. “That way, when we come through, we can bring her with us.”

I nodded, our plan finalized. “This is it.”

“This is it,” she confirmed.

“I’ll see you on the other side, sister.”

Leaving her, I made my final round through the Fortuna. It had been my home for the last few years. Lucina and I had been so excited after we were given our assignment close to the stars. We expected long days chatting, to train hard and to become warriors, and to leave happy knowing that we had served our people well, making our mothers proud. The Fortuna was our legacy.

We never expected to be the ones fighting the impending war with the Surtu. We never expected to die. Others might have, possibly Gallia, or maybe even Bellona. But not Lucina and I.

We hadn't viewed the Fortuna as our coffin. We barely even thought of it as a battle station. We thought it was another home for us.

We were wrong.

Leaving was bittersweet. The happy memories we had of our lives onboard were marked by the hardships of the last...what was it...a week? I couldn't tell anymore. It felt a lot longer.

In the mill pantry, I found Juventas. She was brawny, with short brown hair and tattooed muscles that gave her away as the street fighter she was. But she loved to bake. It was a passion of hers. And we loved her for it, often stopping to inhale the scent of her sweet bread, waiting for the dinner hour to arrive.

There would be nothing sweet about the bread she baked tonight or the soup we'd be serving with them.

"Commander," she said, greeting me. "Is it time?"

I placed my key on the counter in front of her. "It's time."

"Why are we all dining together?" a soldier protested nearby. "I know I stink. I don't want to sit next to a bunch of others who do as well."

I went to fill his bowl of soup. "Your Lead Officer said we have a blackout scheduled for tonight. You either eat now, or you starve until tomorrow."

The soldier wasn't impressed. "We have kitchens on our ships. And why are you serving us? Aren't you that Commander bitch? The one that got Kalij sent off to the Captain?"

"Nah," another soldier said, looking up from the bread he was chewing. "The Commander is meek. This girl has some gall. You claimed yet, sweetheart?" he asked, grinning hungrily.

I shoved bread at him. "Fortunately, yes," I said truthfully. "Now shut your ugly trap and swallow. We don't want the food to go to waste."

The soldiers were eating. That was good, but it wasn't good enough. They should have been drowning in their soup by now. I hurried to the kitchen. "Are you adding enough pest control?" I asked the girl at the stove.

"We've used all that we have," she said. "The longer it cooks, the more the sedative must wear off."

"Then we'll have to serve it faster," I called to the girls maneuvering in and out of the kitchen. "Get them to eat as quickly as possible. We want them all down at once. Brace yourselves. As soon as the first man falls, the others will be alert.”

I worried about my warrior sisters around me, but I shouldn't. We were not weak; we were all well trained. This was the real fight we had prepared for, though if we managed to escape, it wouldn't be our last battle.

“Funny that a root from Earth is going to be their demise,” the girl at the stove said whimsically, humming as she stirred. There was no fear in her at all.

I sighed, recalling what Jidden had told me of the Surtu's strategy. “Sadly, it won't be the demise of all of them. The ships that have landed on the Fortuna are a drop in the bucket compared to the fleets that have arrived.”

The girl pointed the spoon at the soldiers already asleep in the corner of the kitchen, where they patrolled. We had fed them first, as much as they could eat. “But there's still something satisfying about seeing the big bad Depraved snoring like teddy bears, completely at our mercy.”

I couldn't argue with that. There certainly was.

Juventas pulled another tray of bread out of the bread oven – one of two. The other oven, the important oven, was cold as ice. “More pest control, at your service,” she sang.

Whatever the original name of the root was, it was lost forever to the women of the Fortuna, exchanged for one much more appropriate.

A commotion in the dining hall sounded like an alarm throughout the ship. All of our waiting, all of our fears and our hopes, had led to this moment. I nodded to the girl at the stove. Immediately, she abandoned her spoon in the soup and helped to lead the women towards Juventas, who escorted them into the tunnels.

I returned to the dining hall. To my relief, most of the men were dropping. The few that remained standing were dazed, swaying around as they reached for their blasters. Some waved their hands, causing forks to fly off the tables. They were dangerous, but they were soon taken care of by my sisters. Some of whom fought while the others ran to the kitchen, wave by wave. Fight, then leave.

Out in the gardens, Bellona was leading a battle of her own. The women fought the guards on patrol and then escaped into the tunnel through the temple. They were heading towards the docking bay where Jidden waited, having sent the soldiers in their ships away.

If all had gone to plan, he was on his ship with Lucina and the divide between the space station and the docking bay was already up, keeping the Surtu men out.

“Why do we have to go through the tunnels?” a woman complained as she passed by me. “Can't we just go straight to the docking bay?”

“We don't know how long the soldiers will be out, there are still many left to fight. We were able to convince a majority to come to the dining hall, but there are more Surtu than women. As long as those of us still fighting can keep the soldiers away from the kitchen and temple, the tunnels are our best hope.”

“My sword is my best hope,” she grumbled. “They're lucky they managed to take it off me during the siege.”

I felt underneath my dress for my mini-crossbow. It was still there, strapped to my leg, as well as a dagger. I took the knife out and handed it to her. “It’s no sword, but it’ll have to do.”

She was delighted. Instead of heading towards the tunnels, she returned to the dining hall to fight.

Knowing the battle around the kitchen was won, I headed towards the gardens to help Bellona, stopping by my quarters first to make sure Lucina was gone.

No one bothered me. My sisters were doing well. With great contentment, I realized no one would have to stay behind. As long as everyone went to the tunnels, we would all make it out.

My quarters were empty. That was good. Jidden had done his part. Saying my goodbyes, I looked around at the home that was once mine – the Persian-inspired pillows on my bed, the warm plum-colored wallpaper, and the plush carpet. Here, I had been Terra Lynch, a pacifist trained as a warrior. Once I left the station, I would be known as something else completely. I would be Nightshade, a deadly poison.

JIDDEN

Soldiers filled my ship, but they were not men. They were women, an army of Roman goddesses dependent on me to set them free. I did not know if I was their hero or their fool.

I didn't care, not as long as Terra was among them.

I waited for Terra at the loading door of my ship, holding Lucina in my arms. I promised Terra that I wouldn't let her friend go and see her safely from the station. As my ship continued to fill, I was tempted to drop the little blonde and search for my mate, but I couldn't.

I wanted to earn Terra's trust.

I wanted to earn all of their trust, including the fiery priestess who was going to pilot the ship out of the hatch and away from the station. I had warned Bellona that piloting a Surtu vessel was not like piloting the lowly cargo ships gathering dust in the corner of the docking bay, but Bellona insisted she knew what she was doing.

I hoped so, for all of our sakes.

Convincing the soldiers to leave the docking bay, including my fellow Lead Officers, had not been as difficult as I anticipated. That was the beauty of the Surtu hierarchy. Captain Fore had put me in charge of the Fortuna until he arrived to transform it into the new Surtu command center.

At the moment, he was busy starting a war. Since I was in charge, the men had followed my orders. They had no choice. The punishment for disobeying the orders of a superior during wartime was death.

Death was what I faced if the men found their way through the divide that I'd raised. They gathered behind it now, watching the exodus of women boarding my ship. I had stolen their claimed ones they hoped to light bond with. All of the women were now under my protection.

You can lower the divide, a part of me told myself. Tell your men you knew of the plan, that this was a trap to break the spirits of the women warriors for good so they knew who was in charge.

The double betrayal tempted me. If it were me on the other side of the divide, I would want me dead. But I had to be true to my integrity, to my father, and to Terra. I was not turning my back on my people. I was going to look for another way. I was an honorable Surtu man.

I would make sure that when historians wrote about this time and when whispers of we saved the Surtu from extinction was passed around, the children of our children would speak with pride.

Terra finally came into view, rounding the last of the women into the ship like a dark shepherdess. In the distance behind her, the doorway to the tunnel was sealed.

“How did you manage to keep the divide up?” she asked when she found me.

“I seared the wiring,” I answered. “It was a simple solution, but they’ll be looking for something much more complex.”

“Good,” she said and made a call over the communicator I’d given her. She instructed Bellona to close the loading door to the ship and open the hatch of the space station.

“I can’t!” Bellona shouted through the communicator. “We’re on a Surtu ship, remember? They don’t have the remotes on board to close the hatch!”

“It’s okay,” Terra told her. “We’ll figure it out.” Quickly, she glanced at me, and then added, “Whatever happens, you leave. Understand?”

“Yes, Queen Sister,” Bellona confirmed. “Make sure you’re on the ship when I do.”

Terra turned to me, her mind working. “Can you activate the hatch with your mind?”

“I can, but it’ll take time. I’m unfamiliar with your technology. Melting a wire is easy. I did that with my hands. Using my mind to shift through the electronics of the hatch will be much more complicated.”

“We don’t have time,” she proclaimed. “I’ll have to do it by hand.”

I did not see any problems with her plan. The command desk within the docking bay was not far from us, so I let her go.

It was a mistake.

As Terra ran down the loading door of my ship with her black dress and auburn hair flowing behind her, a brilliant light appeared, blinding us.

I instantly knew whose light it was. The soldiers under my command did not possess the training to travel as light through the unbreakable material of the divide. Though we were beings of light, we were much denser than the light of the stars around us because we had to bring our physical forms within us.

The material of Surtu ships was easy to pass through by design, but it took a special kind of training to go through the toughest of Earth’s elements. The type of training a Fleet Captain had.

Captain Fore appeared within the docking bay. Terra saw him, but she didn’t turn around. She couldn’t when the lives of her women depended on the hatch being opened. I set Lucina down so that I could help, but before I could move, the loading door closed, and I felt my ship start to hover.

The door was no barrier. I began to transform into light, but a hand grabbed my ankle. “Don’t leave,” Lucina pleaded. “We need you.”

What the little blonde said was true. The women could make it out of the station without me, but what lay beyond – that was another story.

“I can’t leave her,” I whispered, agony building within me. “I love her.”

“Then honor her,” Lucina said. “Let her be the Commander. Terra would not want you to abandon us.”

She was right. If I left, it would mean sealing the fate of the women as slaves to the Depraved. If I allowed it to happen, Terra would resent me all the days of her life. I had to see her women to safety, and then I would come back for her. My soldiers could take her captive a thousand times, and I would always come back for her.

I knew heartbreak. I’d felt it when my parents died. And now I felt it again. A tear rolled down my cheek, the first in many years. Lucina stood, swaying slightly, and she wiped it away with the sleeve of her Surtu uniform.

TERRA

I ran to the command desk of the docking bay, playing the codes I needed to enter in my head so that my fingers would not stall. I didn't have much time. If Captain Fore lowered the divide before the ship left, we would all be ruined.

Luckily, Captain Fore had as much trouble with the seared wiring as the other soldiers. I reached the command desk, and I opened the hatch. Moments later, the ground shook as Jidden's ship lifted out of the space station and disappeared into the relentless night.

My heart broke watching them leave. I would never see them again. Not Jidden. Not Lucina. They were lost to me forever. But I was glad they had left.

Jidden had remained true to his word. He had not sacrificed us for his gain, even if that gain was me.

I loved him more for it.

I did not have time to grieve my losses. Captain Fore grabbed my arm and pushed me against the divide. Without turning to face the soldiers I had insulted, I could feel their anger.

"Women are sacred to the Surtu," the Captain raged. "But for some women, there is only death."

Four months had passed since the women of the Fortuna had escaped the leering clutches of the Surtu soldiers. They had been led away by Jidden, my alien mate with whom I was eternally light bonded. I missed my sister warriors, especially Lucina Whitmore, my best friend since childhood. And I missed Jidden.

It had been hard to believe that I would never see him again, but I had finally accepted it for my sanity, especially now that I was a slave onboard the place I once called home.

The Fortuna looked nothing like it had before. The Surtu had taken over completely, making it their command center as they fought a war against Earth. The gardens were overgrown, and the temple abandoned. The inner station had been gutted out, distorting the sleeping quarters into dormitory-style housing for the Surtu soldiers. Masked as a spiritual sanctuary, the Fortuna had been built spacious and harmonious, but now it was crowded and loud, the marble floors marked with the heavy traffic moving in and out.

There were many soldiers on the Fortuna. Although the Surtu were larger, stronger, and they had an ability to heal themselves, they weren't invincible. Plenty had died at the hand of my sister warriors. The key was to strike a fatal blow before they had a chance to recover. It was a lesson Earth had likely learned the hard way.

I should be dead, as the soldiers my sisters killed were. I had led the escape of the women from the space station. That was three hundred fewer women the Surtu men could use for baby factories. With the Surtu facing extinction and their females dying off from an unknown disease, my crime was punishable by death.

I had been sentenced to die, but Jidden had saved me. I wonder if he knew that his love had saved my life.

We were light bonded. We had shared the act of altering our state of being into light, becoming one beacon and one soul. It had been brief, but it had united us forever. It was because of the light bond that I knew Jidden lived. At times, I could sense him, feeling his anguish and hopelessness, usually when I was close to sleep.

After being imprisoned on his ship and sentenced to die, Captain Fore had come to visit me. He put his hand along the back of my neck. The neck was the only part left exposed by the Surtu uniform I had been forced to wear. I thought he was going to take away my integrity and force himself on me, but that was not his intention.

"So the rumors are true," he had said. "You are light bonded to the traitor."

The traitor was Jidden. "Yes," I'd admitted, feeling no shame, but I was confused. The only person I had told was Bellona. She'd had no contact with the soldiers – except to assassinate them before they knew she was even there.

"When the murderer Kalij petitioned for his light bonding ceremony, he was outraged that another man had been allowed to light bond with the human Commander before his appointed time. He wanted to be the first. I told him no such service had been approved, and a woman tricked him."

"I did lie to him," I said, refusing to allow the scum Kalij any merit. "I wanted access to the docking bay. The light bond Jidden and I share – that came later."

"I see," the Captain said. "You are light bonded to a traitor, but that does not change the fact that you are one of us. Our light shines in you. It is against the law to kill a human woman unless she has committed an unforgivable act of treason. You have done that, by the way, but you are no longer merely human. You are part Surtu. No Surtu woman is put to death, no matter what her crimes were. Your light bond saves you from death, but I plan to make your life a living hell."

I had imagined the worst. In my fears, the soldiers made me their concubine, but another Surtu law was that no man could touch a woman who was light bonded. It wasn't because of morals, but to ensure the health of her children. When it came to human-bred Surtu children, those birthed from bonded parents were healthier and survived longer.

To the Surtu, survival overshadowed every decision.

Captain Fore couldn't kill me, and he couldn't make me a plaything for his soldiers. All he could do was condemn me to servitude, making me wait on him and his fellow elite officers whenever they beckoned. When I refused, which was as often as my strength allowed, I was beaten or starved.

The Fortuna had been my home, but it was now my prison.

For now, I lived. As long as I lived, there was still a chance for escape. Jidden and my sisters couldn't save me, but maybe I could save myself.

"...even more traitors," a High Commander said to Captain Fore as I served them coffee in the Grand Hall, the nucleus of the command center. The Captain was no longer the big dog. With the arrival of the other fleets, he now had to report to his superiors.

I poured the coffee slowly as my interest increased. I often listened in on their discussions. From them, I'd learned that the takeover of Earth cost them more time and resources than they'd planned and that President Bentford refused to surrender, no matter what guarantees they offered her.

After learning President Bentford and the other leaders of Earth had tried to blow up the Fortuna, I had been resentful, but I was beginning to understand that there were no easy decisions in war.

It was fortunate they forced themselves to learn human languages as part of their integration program. Humans weren't capable of producing the musical qualities of the Surtu languages. Captain Fore hated it, which gave me great pleasure. The order for integration had come from a High Commander, so he had to obey.

"They've been away from Surt for too long," another Fleet Captain said, speaking of the traitors. "And they're desperate to mate. That's why some of the soldiers are turning and siding with their human mates. It was always our plan to leave troops here, and the soldiers know it. Their allegiances are mixed."

"For now, it's only a rumor," the High Commander stated. "Let's try to keep it that way."

Captain Fore saw me smiling. "That's enough," he said to me, and he dismissed me out of the room.

Pleased with what I'd learned, I went to the gardens. The herbs and the vegetables had become overgrown, becoming as wild as the woods that surrounded the patches. Walking through the tall grass, I went and sat on a low stone wall near the wildflowers. It was here where I first knew Jidden loved me. He'd always had a depth to him, and he'd finally acknowledged it. It turned out I had found my way into his soul.

"Hologram," I ordered. "Earth."

A blue image of Earth appeared before me. I swiped my hand, zooming into my family's modest little home in the middle of the desert. The satellite images were old. With the war going on, it had been quite some time since they were last updated, but I preferred to look at the past. I was afraid to see what the images may show me of the present.

Had the desert been conquered? Was my father dead, my mother a captive, and my brothers fighting for revenge? It was a strong possibility, and it broke my heart.

I had to escape. I had to help them. But until escape was possible, I felt uplifted staring at the image of my home as I remembered it.

A soldier stumbled out into the wildflowers. With his dark hair and wide elfin eyes with flecks of light swirling around the pupil, I could almost imagine he was Jidden coming to save me, but he wasn't. His skin was much paler than Jidden's, and his eyes were green, not blue.

"I need a woman," the soldier said.

Oh boy.

He reeked of whiskey. The soldiers weren't supposed to drink, not even when they were off duty, but clearly they'd found a way to smuggle alcohol onboard the command center from Earth.

My body tensed, ready to fight. They treated me like a slave, but I was still a warrior inside. "Why don't you sleep it off in the temple like the other soldiers?" I told him.

"Relax," the soldier coaxed as he stumbled closer, "I'm not going to touch you. You're not my type. I like big, meaty girls, and burying my head in their breasts. You've got curves but not enough fat."

"Then why are you here?" I demanded though I could hear the amusement in my voice.

"I told you," he said, leaning against the wall next to me for support. "I need a woman. I miss the company of a woman, and you're the only woman here. I was in love once with a full-blooded Surtu vixen. She was giant, but she could not borne children because she was infertile."

"From the disease?" I asked.

He shrugged. "Probably. I didn't care. I wanted to light bond with her, but officials wouldn't approve it. They said there were plenty of human women who needed a young, fertile man like me, so they drafted me into the military as part of the infantry that would stay on Earth for good. I'll never see her again."

It was rare, but this enemy warrior had earned my sympathy. "What's your name, Soldier?"

"Telki."

"You have any more of that whiskey, Telki?" I asked.

"Nope. You have to drink it fast before the rest of the dogs find it."

I laughed. It was short, but it was the first since being made a slave to the Depraved. "You sound like my light bonded, Jidden."

"Everyone here knows who your light bonded is, little Commander." He spoke with a surprising disdain.

"He's not a traitor," I said quickly, coming to Jidden's defense. "He didn't turn his back on his people. He's searching for a better way."

“That’s not the way the men tell it. I don’t like being here, I miss my love back at home, but I know what the consequences are for my people if we don’t win this war. There will be no children. There will be no Surtu.” He was starting to sober up.

“If someone had reversed the roles, what then?” I argued. “What if it was your love being ripped from your arms, forced to light bond and mate with a human man? Wouldn’t you want to find a path where Surtu and humans could come together freely?”

“I never said our current course was ideal,” Telki said. “But I don’t think my people have any options left. Some humans may fall in love with Surtu, but we need more than some. The human line won’t go extinct, and neither will the Surtu. We’re coming together and forming a new race. Hopefully a better race.”

“And what of the Surtu women and human men? What of them? We can’t toss them aside like broken toys.”

He looked up at the stars through the transparent ceiling. I imagined him searching for his home planet, thinking about the love he left behind.

With the greatest of remorse, he said, “We already have.”

My discussion with Telki had inspired me. If he could speak with such remorse, then the rumors of Surtu soldiers fighting for the humans must have some validity.

Jidden wasn’t alone in his cause. And neither was I.

I couldn’t wait any longer. I had to escape. The only way to do so was to sneak onto a ship headed for Earth and pray the Surtu didn’t blow me out of the sky in the process.

I had to get to the docking bay.

It would be difficult because Captain Fore had given strict orders not to let me anywhere near it. I had tried several times before, and they always caught me and punished me. I had to be bolder and more clever.

The tunnels were no longer an option for me after the Surtu discovered them. Once a means of escape, we used them for storage now. It was a shame, but I wasn’t too discouraged. The tunnels served their purpose by leading three hundred women to freedom.

I thought about seducing a soldier. I could give him my integrity in exchange for a favor, but my heart wouldn’t let me. I could probably learn to live with myself afterward. At least it would have been my choice.

I couldn’t do it to Jidden. Once light bonded, we were always connected, it’s how I felt his despair when I was close to sleep. The Surtu said if a person who was light bonded slept with another, their mate could tell. If I seduced a soldier, Jidden would know another man had touched me. He may even know I had given myself willingly, but he wouldn’t know why. That would devastate him.

I couldn't use the tunnels, I couldn't use my body, but there was another way. There was always another way. I just had to find it.

In the end, it was Telki who led me to my freedom.

In the weeks after meeting Telki, I ran into him a few times. We didn't speak as long as we had out in the garden, but he acknowledged me, which was more than I could say for the other soldiers. They looked at me with both desire and hatred as they refused to speak to me.

Telki would call me the little Commander, especially when he was drunk. His drinking got worse as time passed. He only had liquid to fill the hole in his heart. Usually, he would sleep it off in the gardens, but occasionally I found him passed out in the corridor. For his protection, I would put him in the mill pantry or another hiding place somewhere nearby.

I was strong, but the Surtu were larger than the average man. It was impossible to drag Telki far.

One evening, I spotted him walking in front of me. He was moving slowly, like a slug. I assumed he was drunk again, so I followed him. He turned down a corridor where the lights were dimmed so low; it was like walking in a faint shadow. A Lead Officer had complained of faulty wiring in this corridor.

Telki turned into a room that used to be sleeping quarters. I could only guess what it was now. I waited near the door, listening to the voices of his fellow soldiers. When there was none, I slid it open manually. The punch code had been removed.

The room was pitch black and the light from the stars shut out. As soon as I entered, my leg bumped into a crate, and I heard the sound of glasses shaking against each other.

"Telki, is that you?" someone hissed.

I froze.

"It's me," Telki answered, quiet but angry. "Next time, don't say my name. What if it was a superior checking in?"

The other man grunted. "The whiskey is running low. I'm going to take these empty bottles with me on my next run. The distillery isn't far from the northern base."

Telki didn't seem interested in the logistics at all. "Don't tell me I risked coming here for nothing. You said you had a bottle you could sell me."

"I do," the man said. A smuggler. I heard him move around. How he knew where he was going was beyond me. The room was dark, and I couldn't see my hand in front of my face. "Here. What will you give me for it?"

"You can have my ration of steak. I don't have much of an appetite these days. Only a thirst."

Fresh meat was difficult to come by on the Fortuna. Soldiers were only awarded it for a particular deed. I didn't know how valuable the whiskey was, but the trade was likely a fair one.

The smuggler accepted, and I heard Telki take the bottle. He opened it immediately and gulped down a swig.

“Don’t break the glass,” the smuggler warned. “The bottles are hard to come by.”

Hearing heavy footsteps, I quickly moved aside. I pressed my calves against the crate I had bumped earlier. Telki swished passed me, already smelling of alcohol, and then he was gone.

I stood in my place, breathing shallowly as the man in the room continued to move around. The clanking of the glass helped to mask my breathing. Only when I was certain he was gone did I inhale properly.

I felt around the room. The Surtu used it for storage. With the wiring out, it wasn’t much good for anything else. The smuggler had drawn the shades on purpose to block out all incoming light in case a superior checked into the room. The dark was easy to hide in, as I had just learned.

It was the dark that would save me.

From my exploration of the room, I found three wooden crates full of empty bottles. The bottles were in a neat line divided by placeholders that felt like cardboard, probably recycled from old boxes. Like everything the Surtu did, it was efficient.

A stack of blankets to cushion the glass was on top of each crate. The blankets were coarse and smelled of sweat, but freedom did not have to be pretty. I tucked myself beneath one of the blankets, ignoring the discomfort of the glass bottles beneath me, and I reached out to slide the top of the crate over me.

I hoped the smuggler was part of the cargo crew that would be departing in the early morning. If not, then my absence would be noticed as soon as I failed to serve Captain Fore his breakfast. They would search, and they would ruin my chances of escape.

Trying not to think about it, I fell into an unsettled half-sleep, dreaming of a pack of stray dogs chasing me, foam dripping from their fangs.

A jolt woke me up, but not my own. The crate I was in was moving.

What if I was making noises in my sleep?

Perhaps I had, but it didn’t seem to matter. The crate continued to jolt, moving on a motorized trolley. Light filtered in through the cracks in the wood of the crate, as did a white noise I had never been conscious of before. The buzz of the lights overhead. The purr of the motor from the trolley. There was noise, but there were very few voices.

Good. It was still early morning. I wanted to feel hopeful, but I knew better. This was not a time for sentiment. This was a time to listen, think, and stay on my guard. I took solace in knowing that to the smuggler, the secret in the crate was one worth keeping. He did not want anyone to discover his cargo was empty whiskey bottles.

And one stowaway.

I knew the moment we entered the docking bay. Here, the noise was prevalent as soldiers readied their ships. They shouted at one another, loading their cargo.

“The boss assigned me to glider 3A,” the smuggler told someone from his seat on the trolley. “I have five crates to load.”

I heard fingers tapping against a tablet only inches from me. “Right,” a soldier said. “You’re on time. Report to the command desk first. We’ve randomly selected you for screening.”

The smuggler was indignant. “What does that mean?” he snapped.

“It means our superiors are tired of soldiers poisoning their bodies with human contraband,” the soldier sniped back. “We have to keep everyone’s bodies healthy for war and for our children.”

“Fine,” the smuggler grumbled, and the trolley backed up.

The little hope I had evaporated.

I thought the crate was going to be my escape, but it was a cage.

“Glider 3A,” the smuggler said at the command desk.

There was a squawk of a scanner, and I heard footsteps walking around the stack of crates.

I wasn’t sure where I was in the scanning process or what cargo the smuggler carried in the containers that weren’t bottles, but I knew my heat waves would be picked up on the scanner. The question wasn’t if they would catch me. The question was, what was I going to do? Did I run, did I fight, or did I give in to the sentence the Depraved had given me?

Capture wasn’t an option. I could not take being a slave any longer. I would rather die.

Captain Fore had said death would not be a sentence for me because of my light bond, but I was sure that if I killed enough of his men, I would make it an option. I had never taken a life, but I was willing to, now more than ever.

“It looks like you’re carrying extra cargo,” the soldier who scanned the crates said.

“It’s harmless,” the smuggler replied confidently.

“How harmless?”

“A steak’s worth?”

The man huffed. “Not for this. What you’re carrying is big.”

“How big?”

I expected him to give me away. Instead, the soldier replied, “All the whiskey I want. And a box of chocolates. Two boxes.”

“I can’t get chocolate. That’s not my department.”

“You better, because if you come back empty-handed, I’ll tell Captain Fore what I saw here today.”

“Fine,” the smuggler mumbled. “I’ll get what you need.”

The soldier slapped something against the side of the crate. “It’s about time someone took out the trash,” he said. “Staring at it day after day is bad for morale.”

“Whatever,” the smuggler replied. “Can I go?”

“You can go,” the soldier said. “But don’t come back unless you have my whiskey and my chocolate.” Soon after, I was on the glider – the smaller ships the Surtu used to transport goods.

We took off, heading to Earth and freedom.

The northern base smelled as bad as the blankets in my crate. The Surtu appeared to maintain it as efficiently as the command center, but the men here sweated twice as much. They weren't completing the relatively easy tasks in war, like loading cargo or preparing ammunition.

They were out on the front lines with their blasters – invading, killing, claiming and conquering. The Surtu took the Fortuna peacefully, but not Earth.

Indentations from laser guns riddled their armor, mechanical suits that looked like armorers created them from heavy metal. I'm sure for every dent in their armor, they fired back a dozen more carefully placed shots. The Surtu tried not to kill women. We were the prize for which they had traveled across the stars. It was not an easy task, especially when half the soldiers who fired back on the Surtu were the femme fatales they wanted to claim.

After the glider had prepared to land on Earth, I snuck out of the crate and hid in a vent. I waited for the glider to be unloaded and abandoned with the other vessels before crawling out. Using the skills Bellona had taught me, I found cover in the shadows and made my way out onto the base without inhaling too deeply.

The base was a network of colossal canvas structures. I didn't know where we were, but I could see skyscrapers towering nearby. The Surtu were trying to break a major city. The frontline would be near the city borders, so my best shot at freedom was to leave in the opposite direction. That's exactly where I started off, but a tent full of women stopped me.

The guards had chained together these women, some in earthly military uniforms, some in house clothes. All were of childbearing age. I recognized the desolation they carried in their hunched posture and sad eyes. I had experienced the same feelings when I was a slave.

I couldn't allow it.

The tent had no sides, leaving the women as exposed as cattle at an open market. Quietly, avoiding the guard at the front of the tent, I hid behind a stack of boxes on the far side. “I can set you free,” I whispered to a brunette woman nearby. She wore a military uniform and looked lost in thought. I hoped she was the type who could lead.

She glanced over at me and immediately dropped her head down. “Mmmhmm,” she hummed.

Good. She knew better than to draw attention to me.

“Are you all chained together?”

“Mmmhmm.”

“Is the chain connected to a pole or any other anchor?”

She didn't answer. That was a no.

“Perfect,” I said. “My name is Terra Lynch. I was Commander of the Fortuna before it fell. You can trust me. I’ll be back soon. Be ready.”

“Mmmhmm.”

Retreating to my glider, knowing the smuggler was out gathering whiskey from the distillery, I gathered my thoughts. It wouldn’t be enough to free the women if the Surtu would just capture them again. I had to get them to safety, but I didn’t know how or where. We were deep inside the base.

I leaned against the wall of the glider. The situation seemed hopeless. It would take a miracle to get the women out. I tapped my hand against the wall, thinking, and then I stopped.

Maybe not a miracle. Maybe just a glider.

I hurried to the dashboard of the glider, my mind racing. The ship was small, the size of four buses, maybe five, but it could accommodate the women in the tent. I was no pilot, but learning to fly had been part of my training for the Fortuna. The glider was Surtu designed, but the science of flying was the same everywhere in the universe. Physics didn’t change from planet to planet. Bellona had flown Jidden’s ship out of the Fortuna with ease. I had to try, and I had to do it now, during the day, while there was the distraction of the war.

Preparing myself, I took a moment to study the dashboard. The technology was very simple. It made sense. In war, pilots didn’t need to be distracted with buttons. They needed to focus on their mission, be it hauling cargo or firing down on enemy lines.

“Nelti, help us,” I said, realizing the irony of praying to a Surtu warrior goddess. I did not want to pray to the goddess Fortuna. I had failed her. She would not grant me her luck. But now that my light bond with Jidden made me of the Surtu, I hoped Nelti would listen, because all hell was about to break loose.

I lifted the glider off the ground and hovered above the rest of the ships inside the Surtu base. The glider swayed slightly, tilting the way Telki had when he was drunk. Below me, a soldier waved his hands frantically in the air and mouthed imbecile. He must not have been able to see who was piloting otherwise he’d be doing a lot more than waving his hands. After some maneuvering, I stabilized the glider and circled above the base until I spotted the tent with the women below me.

I lowered the glider over the boxes next to the tent, assuming it was a warehouse, and I opened the loading door. The women were ready. They ran to me as quickly as their chains allowed. The soldier guarding the tent pointed his blaster at them and yelled for them to stop, but he didn’t fire. I knew he wouldn’t. Women weren’t to be killed. I lifted away as soon as the last woman was on board; the loading door was still open.

Other soldiers came and fired on us. They tried to disable our ship, but I flew high and fast, further than their blasters could reach. From my vantage point, I saw a nature reserve in the far distance. I steered there with the aim of setting the glider down in the thick woods.

I heard a loud thud from the back, and the woman I had spoken to earlier joined me at the dashboard, swinging a piece of chain around her wrist. “Are you Terra Lynch?” she asked.

“I am,” I answered.

“I thought you were dead.”

I huffed. “Ghosts can’t pilot gliders.”

“No,” she agreed, turning to the monitors. “They can’t.”

“Is anyone following us?” I asked, my focus on the nature reserve ahead.

“Strangely enough, no.”

It didn’t worry me. I considered it fortunate. “The pilots are probably too busy fighting on the front lines. A major city won’t fall easily.”

“No,” the woman said with pride. “It won’t.”

“What happened to you?”

“There’s a small town not far from where the Surtu base is. My unit was in the middle of evacuating the town when the Surtu invaded. The women here – we were claimed and placed in that purgatory of a tent.”

“And the men?”

Her face turned to steel. “Gone.”

“The children?”

“The soldiers sent them away, but I don’t know where. I’ve heard a rumor that the Surtu have set up schoolhouses where they’re indoctrinating children to the Surtu propaganda. The boys will grow up to become loyal slaves, and the girls will grow up to become brides.”

“At least they’re alive. It’s better than the alternative.” A thought came to me. “You said you thought I was dead. Do you know where the Fortuna women are?”

“No,” the woman answered. “I know of you because there is a story going around.” She hesitated.

“Go on,” I urged.

“I’ve heard that the women of the Fortuna escaped with the help of a Surtu soldier who turned on his people. A soldier who was light bonded to the Commander.”

“The story is true,” I said, wondering how the word had spread so quickly. It gave me hope that my sisters had landed safely on Earth. Maybe they had spread the tale.

The woman was astounded. “So you are light bonded?”

“Yes.”

“You are the only one.”

It was my turn to be in shock. “But you said they claimed some women.”

The woman continued to flip through the monitors, scanning for other ships that may be trailing us. “I said we were in purgatory. I don’t think the Surtu thought Earth would resist as much as we have. They’ve realized that many of their men may die. They do not want women to be light bonded to a dead soldier, so they have postponed all light bonding ceremonies until after the war.”

“Are we winning?” I asked, unsure if I wanted to hear the answer.

“No,” the woman said solemnly. “We are resisting, but we are not winning. The Surtu have powers that we do not. They can heal themselves.”

“And they can move things with their mind,” I added.

“I didn’t know that,” she said, but she didn’t sound surprised.

We arrived at the nature reserve. I dropped the glider down into a meadow and let the women off, a new plan forming in my mind. “I’m going to continue flying,” I told them. “If they trace the glider, it will set them off-course. Find safety. You’re in good hands.”

“May Fortuna smile upon you,” she said before guiding the women into the cover of the woods.

Flying away, I realized I hadn’t learned her name. It probably wouldn’t be the first time. War was like that – people passed in and out of each other’s lives like fingers strumming down the strings of a harp. Names weren’t necessary in war, just the safety of the people who bore the names.

I flew for the remainder of the day and through the night, finally landing when I saw the dawn illuminating more wilderness at the base of a mountain, far from where I’d left the women. Tired, I set the glider down for the final time, and I stepped out into the early light, my feet surrounded by tall grass and wildflowers.

Since tucking myself away into the crate of empty whiskey bottles, my mind had been focused on my escape, and then those of the women in the tent, but now I could embrace the moment. I was finally free.

And I was back on Earth. Strangely serene, I looked up at the blue sky – the beautiful blue sky. I hadn’t seen it in years. Why did people always turn to the stars for beauty when there was so much of it on Earth? I inhaled deeply, taking in the fresh air. It felt good, a lot more wholesome than the recycled air of the space station.

I started to walk, needing to build distance between myself and the glider. The slippers of my Surtu uniform sank eagerly into the soil as I trudged along. If I could live the rest of my life like this – a recluse out in the woods – I would. It would be a happy life.

But I couldn’t. I would not let my training go to waste. I would honor Gallia by doing my part to save my people. Maybe along the way, I would find the others.

And Jidden.

Thinking of him made my heart ache, so I focused on my trek. I did not know where I was or where I headed. I simply followed the creeks and springs away from the mountain, watching the narrow waters trickle downhill. In time, I came upon a patch of perse-thistle. I crushed the fresh purple leaves in my hand and sprinkled water over them, forming a paste that I spread into my mousy brown roots. An hour later, I washed it out, flipping my hair against the radiance of the sun.

I was no longer a slave. I was Nightshade once more. Even with Bellona’s nickname, I was still me. I was just more me than I had been before, summoning a fierceness from within.

My feet hurt. The slippers I wore had fallen apart long ago. Their soles were barely able to keep away the twigs and rocks of the woods. I continued, knowing I did not have much further to go before I broke through the tree line. The brush was becoming less dense, and the leaves on the trees were dry, having no shield from the sun.

I didn't know how long I had walked. A week, maybe? That seemed right. I had eaten nuts and berries and drank creek water. The night was a blanket, the day my inspiration. Survival in the woods was inconvenient but manageable. However, I was relieved when I pushed aside the last tree branch and stepped out into the open.

My relief was short lived. Voices echoed across the grassy field before me, and I scurried back behind the trees and ducked behind the brush, watching the area through the thorns. A pair of Surtu soldiers patrolled the area. Their voices drew closer until they stood before me, wearing black uniforms that matched my own. Theirs were clean and starched. Mine was worn and muddy. This camp was not at the front line of a battle. If a base was near, it was for intelligence and preparation, not fighting.

I held my body still, becoming one with the woods around me. Thankfully, my eyes were as brown as the thorns that shielded them and my hair as dark as the leaves of autumn. Still, my camouflage wasn't enough against the powers of the Surtu mind. They had powers I was still trying to grasp. They had kept them well hidden on the Fortuna so Earth would underestimate them when they attacked.

"I sense something near," one of the soldiers proclaimed.

"It's probably just a deer," another said, a skinny male much smaller than his companion. "There's no one out there. No one knows we're here."

"No, I can—"

"You can keep walking is what you can do," the skinny soldier said, and he pushed the other forward. "I'm starved."

"You always feel hungry," the other grumbled. "You eat, but you have no meat."

"My mother got the disease when I was still in her stomach. I may not be a fatso like you, but I'm strong. And I need food to feed my muscles, so move along!"

"I'm no fatso," the other soldier protested, but they resumed their patrol.

I remained frozen, trying to push down my paranoia. As they walked away, I was certain the skinny soldier had glanced behind his shoulder and looked directly at me.

When night came, I climbed to the highest tree branch. I needed to see the stars, but I did not want to risk the open field. Based on the constellations in the sky, I was close to the winter plains, within reach of the big cities but far from the desert where my family lived.

As much as I yearned to go home, it wasn't the time to do so. By now, Captain Fore would have learned of my escape from the Fortuna, and he would have heard of the women saved from the northern base. They would track me. If I went home, I'd lead the Surtu, and their vengeance, straight to my family.

I would have to wait for a safer time if such a thing existed during the Surtu occupation.

There were more than stars above me. Little lights spun around the oily sky. They were ships in the heat of battle. Hundreds of space stations circled the Earth. They were fighting the Surtu from the sky while we fought on the ground.

Smoke rose nearby. The Surtu base was closer than I thought. It was useless backtracking into the woods. I had to move forward. That would mean snaking along the base. It would be difficult to conceal myself when there was nothing but grassland around. The night provided the best cover, so I climbed down from the tree and stepped out into the open field, the shadow of darkness my only protection from the Depraved.

I moved swiftly, my footsteps silent, my ears open. I made less noise than a breeze as I glided across the grass. When I saw the first lights near the Surtu base, I swerved to the right, heading away from it. Unfortunately, the path took me straight to a cliff.

I'd have to travel closer to the base than I wanted. Using the lights of the base as my guide, I stayed far away, orbiting the base like Pluto did the Sun, a being of ice trying not to get burned.

The trouble with the night was that, though it masked my movements from the Surtu, it also masked their movements from me. I did not see the soldier on patrol, nor did I hear him until he turned on the light of his torch, illuminating me from several feet away.

"Stop!" he commanded, but I ran off.

He followed me, yelling into his communicator. I continued to run, but in the grassy field, there was nowhere to hide. I was agiler than the soldier chasing me, but I couldn't outrun the hover bikes that cut me off. I turned, prepared to face the chasm over slavery, but a soldier on a hover bike grabbed the back of my uniform and jumped off his vehicle to pull me to the ground.

"Got you," he said gleefully. "And it looks like I'm not the first." He turned to the other soldiers. "She's wearing our uniform. She's a runaway."

I had been wrong about the Surtu base. It was no base at all. It was a camp, a mechanical side venture where the fixed hover bikes and repaired armor. No wonder the soldiers here were clean-cut. They had only tasted grease, not blood.

Just like on the command center, I was once again the only woman around. Without the glory of the front lines, these soldiers had no one to claim. Not yet. They were probably waiting for their fellow soldiers to die off in battle so that they could find their mates. To them, women were pieces of meat for vultures to feed on.

“It’s my lucky day,” the soldier said. He pushed me into a tent. “I’ve been itching for a ride.”

“You can ride yourself,” I spat. “I’ve been claimed.”

I did not want to say light bonded. If what I’d learned was accurate, Jidden and I were the only alien pair light bonded since the human women from the colony were taken hostage sixty years earlier. If I told the soldiers I was light bonded, it would give away my identity. They would take me straight back to Captain Fore, whose punishment would be brutal.

“Like I care,” he said, stepping towards me.

His comrade grabbed his arm. “It’s against the law. She’s not worth your life.”

“I’m sick of this! We came here to mate with the women, but we’ve been here for months, and not one of us has been allowed to pull his cock out.”

“As soon as we win the war, that’s all we’ll be doing.”

It sickened me to listen to them. It reminded me just how much Earth had to lose if we lost. Our men would be dead. Our women would have their integrity stripped from them. And our children would grow up brainwashed, believing that cruelty was in everyone’s best interest. Our military needed a new strategy.

The skinny soldier I’d seen in the field earlier suddenly appeared in the tent. He looked at me as if I were something vile, as if I were the Depraved.

“Send her to me,” he instructed, rubbing his nose. “I’ll get her to talk.” Then he left.

“I hope you like having your fingernails pinched off,” the first soldier said smugly. “Kist is known for his personal brand of torture.”

They led me to a chair tucked behind a graveyard of vehicles destroyed by the war. Kist waited for me. A table of tools was laid out before him; he appeared to be a doctor preparing for surgery. I may be Nightshade, but I wasn’t invincible.

Watching Kist handle the tools made me tremble with fear. I tried to hold it in and remain brave before my enemies, but I was shaking in my chair. I knew the Surtu would do everything in their power not to kill women. I never considered they’d find torturing them acceptable.

Tell them you’re light bonded, that you’re one of them, I pleaded with myself. Then they can’t hurt you.

I remained silent. The torture might hurt, but it was better than life as a slave to Captain Fore.

Kist turned around, a pair of pliers in his bony hands. “Leave,” he instructed the soldier who’d brought me here. “You know I like to work alone.”

“Gladly,” the soldier mumbled. “It’s torture to watch.” He laughed as he left, finding amusement in his joke.

I did not see the humor.

Kist moved slowly towards me, taking his time. As soon as he knew the soldier was gone, he set the pliers in the palm of my hand. “Scream,” he ordered.

“I won’t play your sick game,” I protested, unable to take my eyes off the pliers.

“It’s no game,” he said. “If you want your freedom, scream.”

He wasn’t speaking from a place of insanity. He was quite serious, almost pleading. So I obliged. I thought of every beating Captain Fore had given me on the Fortuna, and I screamed. It felt good, if not for my current circumstance.

Kist shook his head. “Damn, girl. That was good.”

To say I was confused was an understatement. “What are you doing?” I whispered, realizing the soldier was more than he seemed.

“I’m saving you,” he replied.

My trust didn’t come that cheap. I was suspicious. “Why? I can’t offer you anything.”

He didn’t answer me directly. “Who are you?” he asked, returning to his table. “We do not dress our claimed in our uniforms. Not down here. You are someone special.”

“I am no one,” I told him. “I am of no interest.”

“You are of great interest,” he said, picking up a crowbar then setting it back down. “Tell me who you are, and I will set you free.”

It must be a trick. There was no other explanation for Kist’s odd behavior. “I am a human woman. I am a person with a soul. That alone entitles me to my freedom.”

“In an ideal reality, yes,” Kist said, “but this is not an ideal reality.”

“Then what kind of reality is it?” I asked, turning the interrogation on him.

He sighed and sat on a tire near me. “It’s the type of reality where a granddaughter who loves her grandfather and her grandmother very much must one day learn that her grandfather is a heathen, and her grandmother is a slave. She discovers her purpose in life is to grow healthy and bear children. She is treated like glass, unable to swim in the sea or climb the trees. As an adult, she must choose a mate before she is twenty-five. Otherwise, one will be selected for her. She runs away, altering her appearance look like a boy. She tells the military recruits that the disease disfigured her while she was in the womb, when, in fact, her only disfigurement is being a woman.”

“You’re a girl?” I hissed under my breath, unsure of how to react. I felt compassion for her, but I was even more confused than before. I could not understand her decision to join the military and force upon other women what she had experienced herself. “How can you do this to us?”

“I came here to rescue them,” she declared, keeping her voice low. “I am the destiny of Earth if this war is lost.”

I repeated her story in my mind, and it struck me. The grandmother she spoke of was of the Earth colony that the Surtu attacked sixty years before. Kist was not fully Surtu. She was part human.

It was hard to tell. She had the same elfin eyes as the rest of the Surtu, and the same flecks of light around her pupils.

“You’re not here to fight?” I confirmed.

“I can’t fight. My size won’t allow it. That’s why they put me on mechanical detail with the fatsos and the lazies. But if I were on the frontlines, I’d protect the women the fleets are seeking. That’s what I came here for.”

I wanted to trust her, but it was difficult. Torture came in many forms, and so did great actors. “Why did you tell me your story?” I asked.

“Because like me, you are more than what you seem.”

“What makes you say that?”

She stood, remembering the role she was meant to play. “Scream again.”

I did, but it wasn’t half the performance I put on earlier. “Who do you think I am?”

“You tell me.”

My situation was desperate. I needed someone to trust. “Lift up your shirt,” I demanded.

“I’m not that kind of girl, but thanks.”

I rolled my eyes. “Show me that you truly are who you say you are.”

Understanding, she lifted up her shirt. A nude cloth was wrapped in layers across her chest, binding her breasts.

I relaxed. “Good thing the Surtu uniforms are thick.”

She nodded but didn’t speak, waiting for me to say more.

It took me a moment to form the words. I knew once they were out, I wouldn’t be able to take them back. My efforts to hide the glider far from the northern base would be lost. “I am Terra Lynch,” I confessed. “I am light bonded to Jidden, of the Surtu.”

I didn’t know what she expected to hear, but that wasn’t it. Her eyes went wide with awe. “I knew Jidden and his mate had rescued an entire space station full of women, but I thought you were dead.”

There seemed to be a pattern forming. I did not realize everyone knew about our escape from the Fortuna. “Have you heard anything about my sister warriors?”

Kist glanced past the graveyard of vehicles, making sure no one was near to overhear. Then she came to me and pressed her lips close to my ear, working the ties around my hands as she spoke. “Earth is lost. The Surtu will win. It is inevitable. I belong to a network of Surtu who are helping humans to flee to a secret location – men, women, and children.”

The news was hard to take. “Is it that bad?” I asked.

“It is,” she said gravely, pulling away the last of the ties. “While it is still night, I will take you back to the woods. I’ll tell the others you died during torture, so I buried you. Find your way to the waterfall. I’ll have a messenger meet you there. It may take a few days. Whatever you do, don’t get caught again.”

I flexed my wrists, allowing the blood to return. “Can’t you tell me more?”

“No. It’s not safe,” Kist said adamantly. “The messenger will tell you more.”

I was uncomfortable with the secrecy. Everything was out of my control. But I had no choice. I went with her on her hover bike back into the woods, glad to be as far from the Surtu camp as possible.

“Thank you, Kist,” I said when I jumped off. “I hope we meet again, victorious in our cause.”

“It’s Kista, actually,” she admitted. “I changed it to Kist when I entered the military.”

“Thank you, Kista,” I corrected.

With a nod, she was gone, leaving me in the wilderness once again.

The waterfall was beautiful, especially in the daylight, but it was cold and isolating. I’d spent too many hours alone since watching the escape from the Fortuna. I wanted to find my friends, more than anything. I hoped that the messenger coming to help me would finally give me the news I longed to hear – that their ship had landed somewhere safe.

For days, I waited by the waterfall, watching the waters tumble like tears of the Earth. I almost gave up, believing no one would come, but I forced myself to stay.

He came one night while I was sleeping, shaking me gently awake. When I saw him, I thought I was still dreaming. Had the moonlight cast a spell? Was I projecting my heart outward.

It was Jidden.

Realizing I was awake, and he was beside me, I threw my arms around my alien lover, holding him tighter than I’d ever held him before, as he did to me. For the first time since Gallia’s death, I cried, overwhelmed with my love for him and the sense of safety he brought.

“I missed you,” he murmured, smoothing back my hair as I sobbed. “My life is empty without you. I love you, Terra. I love you more than I can say.”

I didn’t reply in words. I kissed him, my need for him great. My journey back to him had too many bruises and too many fears. Right now, all I wanted to feel was the bliss of his touch. I took off my Surtu uniform, resisting the urge to throw it over the waterfall. I helped him remove his clothing, sliding my hands up his hard abs and down the muscles of his arms, taking him in as if it were my first time with a man.

My sex was wet and ready to feel him inside me. Like a woman starved for too long, I pulled him onto the ground and wrapped my legs around his firm, naked body. He put his hand behind my back, lifting my hips up slightly, and then he entered me, his cock warm and thick inside me. Moving slowly, he began to gyrate, cherishing the joy of our lovemaking, in no hurry to let me go.

Every lingering thrust sent a jolt of ecstasy through me, making my body tingle with electricity. Jidden continued to take his time, sliding his cock in and out of me, savoring me. His lingering was deliberate. He was building my fire, touching me from the inside as his cock massaged my pink flesh.

“I love your smell,” he whispered into my ear, his breath hot and delicious across my neck, arousing me even more.

I began to moan, panting with every thrust, feeling a charge crackle across my body that sent shock waves of pleasure through me. I didn't want him to stop. I wanted to feel his cock inside me like this forever.

Finally, my body could take it no more, and he unleashed a fire within me. I grabbed his hair and screamed out his name as he pushed further into me, giving me an extra charge of pleasure. I felt as if I had once again transformed into light, but I hadn't. I was blissfully aware of every sensation running across my flesh.

His cock remained hard inside of me. I had come, but he had yet to. Hearing me scream his name set him off, and he began to drive harder into me, growing inside of me, causing my blood to flow back and making me ache for more. I grabbed his backside and rocked my hips, pushing him deeper into me, uniting our bodies as one.

My hands moved down his backside and over the base of his cock, which was sticky with our love. He continued to thrust as I massaged his cock, and the fire returned, shaking my body with an agonizing rapture. Euphoric, I came again, this time with Jidden. He plunged into me one final time, his cock expanding, and then he released his love, spilling into me.

Our bodies hot despite the chill of the waterfall beside us. Jidden fell beside me, holding me in his arms, refusing to let go. I hoped he would never let me go again.

JIDDEN

I had finally found her – my light bonded. Being apart from her all of these months had been agony. I knew she lived. The connection we shared had told me so. I also knew she was suffering. She wouldn't admit it, but her time as a slave to Captain Fore and his men had wounded her. Only revenge could heal this wound.

There was no time for vengeance right now. Earth was losing the war against my people. Soon, nowhere would be safe. The only option we had left was to break away from the war and rebuild in a secret refuge far from Earth. I had searched a long time to find Terra, not knowing if she was still on the Fortuna or made it to Earth.

Now I knew. I only had regret in my heart. I could have gotten to her so much sooner. I owed the network a lot. It had saved Terra and brought her back into my arms.

There was also no time for regret. We had to get to the rescue ship before it left. They timed departures accurately. It was the only way the network could ensure the safe passage of those we rescued. We ran. I held her hand as we raced across the grassy plains. I wouldn't let go again.

A sudden blast caught our attention. Ahead of us, a Surtu craft landed beside a boarding school for young women. For the Surtu, it was like hitting the jackpot. The blast had been a warning shot, scaring the girls out from their hiding spot in the cellar of the school. We watched as they emerged from the cellar doors with their hands raised high.

Three men exited the craft, their blasters out. They wouldn't shoot, but the girls didn't know that. They trembled in their long nightdresses, dropping their arms to hold each other.

Terra stopped and looked at the girls, her face twisting in anger.

"We don't have time," I told her, trying to pull her away. "We can't save everyone."

She didn't respond, caring little for her rescue. I knew then that I'd lost her to the cause. But Terra was my everything. My love for her was absolute.

If she were determined to die right now, then I would die with her.

Chapter 23

TERRA

I crept behind the barn of the boarding school with Jidden by my side. There were only three men, and none of them wore armored suits. They were vulnerable, easy targets.

Before the Surtu invaded, if I had imagined myself in this situation, I would have thought I could save the teen girls by reasoning with the men. It was almost laughable.

There was no reasoning with the Surtu soldiers. They had come to dominate Earth. The only way to win against them was to kill them first.

I entered the barn to search for weapons, not expecting to find a group of men, women, and children cowering behind the hay. On instinct, I pushed Jidden back before he could follow me in, not wanting to scare the people inside. There was more than a boarding school full of girls at stake. There was an entire community, likely farmers and their families from around the plains.

Holding a finger to my mouth, signaling for them to stay quiet, I picked out a rake from the tools on the wall. I thought it my best option, but a man approached me with a set of daggers in his hand. Grateful, I accepted them, and then I returned outside.

The soldiers had lined the girls up, no doubt choosing their favorite. It was repulsive. I waved Jidden back, indicating for him to cover the barn, and I went to the well at the side of the boarding school. It was the closest I could get to the soldiers without being seen.

Daggers could not kill soldiers. I had witnessed that firsthand the day Gallia died. But daggers could disarm them, even if only for a few seconds. That's all I needed – a few seconds.

I threw a dagger from behind the well. As I intended, it landed in a soldier's throat. He dropped his blaster and fell to his knees, choking on his blood. The two remaining soldiers immediately had their guard up, but I was Nightshade. They were fools. I threw two more daggers, and the soldiers went down.

Knowing there was only a little time before they healed themselves, I went to the first soldier and picked up his blaster. I pointed it directly at his head. I had never killed a person before. I never thought I could do it, but I did not hesitate as I pulled the trigger.

A blast echoed across the plain.

You cannot use your mind to heal if you have no mind to use, I thought, and I moved on to the other two soldiers to do the same. Two more blasts. Two less Surtu soldiers to claim the innocence of the young women.

I threw the blaster down and signaled Jidden to watch over the girls. “You can trust him,” I told them. “Don’t be scared.” Then I went to the barn and coaxed out the families inside. “We have to hurry. A rescue ship waits.”

“But our town – it’s just west of here. We managed to escape when the Surtu invaded, but we have to go back and save the rest,” a woman explained, grabbing my arm.

From my time as Commander on the Fortuna, I had learned that there was a time to fight, and there was a time to sacrifice. We had fought, and now we had to go. “They’re lost,” I told the woman. “We have to head to the ship. It’s your decision if you follow.”

Tears of sorrow spilled down her cheeks, but she nodded her understanding.

With Jidden leading the way, we continued to run across the plains. It was no longer just the two of us. Most of the rescued followed, but some had stayed behind to go back and fight. They would likely die, but at least they would die honorably. I respected their decision.

We arrived at the ship just as it was about to take off. It hovered over the ground, but the loading door was still open. Jidden and I lifted the people onto the ship one by one until only we remained. The stronger of us, Jidden jumped on first, and then he reach his hand down to me. “This time, we stay together, or we leave together,” he said.

I wanted to continue the fight on Earth, but I knew people needed me elsewhere. I grabbed Jidden’s hand and allowed him to pull me onto the ship. “Wherever we go, it will be together,” I promised, and I sealed that promise with a kiss.

With great sadness, I watched from the ship as the Earth grew smaller and faded from sight. Jidden wrapped me in his arms, feeling my pain through our light bond. Earth was lost. The growing number of military space stations floating in darkness told me so. The war against the Surtu was a war we could not win.

But I found comfort in Jidden’s arms. The Earth may be lost, but hope wasn’t. I looked forward to the refuge. My sister warriors waited for me there in a secret place where humans and Surtu lived together in freedom and love.

“Are you ready?” Jidden asked, caressing my cheek.

We would not be traveling at warp speed. The Surtu ship could move much faster than our own.

“I’m ready,” I said, and I braced myself for the light.

I AM HUMAN

All he wanted was an employee of the month placard. He didn't ask to be treated like a god or hunted by an assassin.

In 2017, the year Charlie Richards made his universe changing discovery, mankind had become content using their most significant technological advancements primarily to share videos of cute cats. Which is why when Charlie wrote the computer/genetic bridging code that would give birth to a whole new race, its importance was noticed by no one. Not even by Charlie Richards.

At least, not until he met Jade.

Jadyn of Crowley, your run-of-the-mill hybrid assassin from the future, arrived in 2017 intent on bringing Charlie to her time no matter the cost. She needed him. Her people needed him. The hybrid race, the race that Charlie Richard's code would one day create, was plagued with a disease only he could solve.

Fixing the code he had invented could be the answer to at least thirteen of Charlie's problems. It could get him out of his humdrum day job, make him a hero of the future, and win him a woman he probably didn't deserve and most certainly couldn't handle (see: hybrid assassin.)

Or, it could get him killed by the megalomaniac COO, Warren Relic, who's looking for a way to take control of the hybrid industry, the city, and possibly even the world. All Warren needs is a gullible programmer who can fix the code and that no one will miss once he flips the kill switch.

And all Charlie Richards had wanted was an employee of the month placard.

Chapter 1

There lived in the Topeka of Kansas, in the seventeenth year of the 21st century, an unremarkable young man by the name of Charlie Richards; confirmed unremarkable by all associates, relative or not. To others, he was a man who lived beneath his possibilities. A brilliant computer scientist who used his talents to make an application reminding cat owners to feed their feline friends (aptly named Feline Friend Feeder™.) To exasperate the situation, he didn't even like cats. So, it was pointedly remarkable that unremarkable Charlie Richards, of Topeka, Kansas, would make the discovery, which would change the world in greater ways than fire, gravity, online commerce and quantum theory combined.

In the year Charlie made this discovery, technological advancements had become increasingly senseless. The 21st century began with such titillating promise. Human innovation was on a roll, falling face first into the computer and virtual age. Nonetheless, somewhere along the way mankind decided to use these tremendous advancements to find different ways to share videos of cute babies and/or puppies. Sure, breakthroughs such as Wii Tennis or the automated-cleaning iRobot were important for generations to come, but they didn't come close to fulfilling the potential humanity possessed. So, when Charlie, eighty-sixth ranked computer programmer (out of eighty-nine) at Bandicoot TechSmart Corp. wrote the code that would create the most important bridge ever constructed - a bridge to bond computers and genetics; a bridge to birth the hybrid race; a bridge to alter life, death and everything in between - its importance was noticed by virtually no one. Not even by Charlie Richards.

At least, not until he met Jadyn (Jade) of Crowley.

To say Jade stuck out like a sore thumb, as she stood there at the end of the bar inside the Lonely Tree Tavern, was a grave understatement. She stuck out like a throbbing red thumb covered in sirens and strobe lights. There were several obvious signs. One would be the sheer black leather clothes, which made her look like a sci-fi character from another planet. Another might have been that Charlie could guesstimate that her height and muscle tone put her somewhere in the range of "she could break him in two" and "she could break him in four." Her physically intimidating strength was complemented by physically intimidating beauty, which surely had caused many a bar fight. She had sleek black hair that came to the shoulders. Her high, strong cheekbones ran under wide eyes of green.

Or, usually green, occasionally they seemed to shift in color. All this made the woman stick out, but the simplest and most obvious reason was this was the Lonely Tree Tavern, and she was a woman.

Charlie quickly averted his eyes.

One could kindly describe Charlie Richards as “not polished with the opposite sex” and rudely call him “a god damn loser with women.” Either way, they both were valid points. Instead, he stared into the series of numbers and letters he was scribbling on his bar napkin. Scrawling code was something he did anytime he was nervous (note: often.) He wrote furiously, drank his beer furiously, and averted his eyes furiously.

“What you wanna to talk to him for?” The voice, thick with drink, could only belong to one man: Sal. Charlie cringed at the sound of it. Most people here just left him alone. To them, Charlie was just some weird guy who sat at the end of the bar jotting in his notebook and drinking fancy foreign stuff. Some of the regulars here were even nice to him, and wondered where he was if he didn’t come around a night. But Sal, when he had too many beers (note: often), he would become a right asshole. Charlie could generally just ignore it, but not always. Once, Sal took his notebook and Charlie flipped out. Long story short, while Charlie ended up losing the fight, he did get his notebook back.

Charlie couldn’t help but look up and see Sal standing beside the woman, both looking at him. Then, the oddest thing happened. One of the woman’s eyes went ablaze in red, and a smile came to her lips. She was smiling at him. Charlie. A woman was smiling at Charlie Richards.

“Don’t waste your time with that one,” Sal said gruffly. “Guy is off his rocker. Just sits there writing gibberish.”

At the far end of the bar came some grumbles and murmurs and a hoot. Sal’s cronies stood by a pool table, enjoying their favorite part of the evening when Sal caused some trouble. Time for another round.

The woman turned to Sal. “Don’t speak that way about such a man.”

Charlie blinked twice. Wait. What?

Sal chuckled. “Why don’t you come have a drink with me. I promise, you’ll have a much better time.” He placed his hand on the woman’s shoulder. It was one of the three worst mistakes Sal had ever made, in contention with the ’96 Dodge Ram he bought with a fucked-up transmission and his six DUI’s (that collectively counted as one mistake).

In a blinding blink of an eye, the woman’s eye went from green to black. She grabbed Sal’s wrist, twisted it, and broke it with ease. Sal fell to one knee, screaming in pain. The woman grabbed his shirt and, like throwing a twig, tossed Sal across the floor where he hit the wall next to the pool table. It was, on any universally known scale, totally badass. And intimidating.

Dan the Man, the heavy-set bartender, knew it was in his job description to tell patrons that throwing people across the tavern was absolutely not allowed. Though Dan the Man was a sturdy man and no stranger to bar fights, as he approached the woman his face went from threatening, to considering, to something just north of fear. “Please,” he mumbled. “No more throwing customers.”

The woman gave a slight bow. "Of course."

It was subtle, but Charlie could sense laughter behind her words. Sal crawled to his feet and yelling some derogatory words as he slunk away to join his cronies and no doubt plot his revenge.

The woman then did the one thing Charlie feared most. She looked at him, smiled, and made her way towards him. Charlie's face remained blank, but his stomach was filled with a vast prairie of butterflies, including a purple one. The woman pulled out the barstool next to him and sat herself down. "What are you drinking?"

Charlie Richards had been coming to this tavern several times a week for, well, it had been quite some time, and the total number of female voices that had asked him what he was drinking totaled one. His mother. She had rudely stopped by and asked the question in an accusatorial tone. This was not the same tone. This was not his mother. This woman was, by any past, present, or future scales, hot. She also, it should be remembered, had just thrown Sal Thompson across the bar. While time is relative, no one could deny that Charlie spent a long time looking stupidly at the woman with no words coming out of his mouth. Finally, the answer to her question came to Charlie. "Um, it's an Amstel Light."

After a long pause, the woman finally asked. "Well?"

"Um, well...what?"

"Aren't you going to buy me a beer? It is the custom of the times, right?" The woman smiled a beautiful smile. She held out her hand in friendly greeting. "My name's Jade."

"Oh. Oh, yes. Right." Charlie ignored her hand, slapping nervously at his pockets for his wallet, before realizing he had a tab open. He waved Dan the Man over, still not making eye contact with Jade. "A drink for, um, the lady."

Dan the Man was at a complete loss as to what was going on in this world anymore. He looked at Charlie. Then at Jade. Then at Charlie. Then at Jade. He knew this Charlie, he was a regular - a regular loser (zing!). He was the guy who just sat at the end of the bar and work in his notebook, scribbling down random numbers and letters. This woman, on the other hand, was so hot you could fry an egg on her at midnight and she could tear anyone to shreds. This did not add up.

"I'll have what he's having," Jade said, breaking the awkward silence. Dan the Man stood up straight, eyeing them suspiciously a second longer. "Sure." He nodded an incredulous an alright I'll play along. "Sure thing."

Dan left to pour a draft and Charlie sipped his beer to avoid having to talk to the woman. It was clear Jade would have to lead the conversation, and she did so in the most surprising way.

"You're Charlie Richards," she said, a smile tugging at the corners of her mouth.

Charlie's eyes grew wide. "What?"

"I can't believe it." Jade grinned, shaking her head in the classic 'I can't believe it' shake. "I - me! - am sitting next to Charlie Richards." Forget bar fights, empires have contested over smiles like the one which graced her face. "Charlie Richards."

Charlie's mind was doing poorly orchestrated gymnastics. Who the hell was this woman? Why was she talking to him? How did she know who he was? How had she thrown big ass Sal like a peanut? How much was he going to have to drink to get over how awkward he felt? He decided to tackle the final question first and gulped down half his beer.

"What are you working on?" Jade asked.

"Huh?"

"Charlie, you're a genius. It wasn't a difficult question." Jade pointed down to the open notebook in front of him where the writing scrawled to the edge of the page and onto the bar napkin next to it. It was pure chaos on paper, zeroes and ones and dollar signs and such. It was the ramblings of a drunk man at the end of the bar.

Jade pointed to the end of the page and a bunch of text. "See, this is where it gets good." It read in part:

1.//Loop and create individuals

2.For ($i=0, $i<count($this.people); $i++) {

3.$new person = new individual ();

4.$new person > generateIndividual(count(fitnessscale;$solution) );

5.$individual = person ($new hybrid);

"It's nothing," Charlie deflected. "Just some random thoughts I had in my spare time."

"Those are some specific random thoughts," Jade said, the smile never leaving her face.

"I assure you, it's pretty random."

"Right now, yes, but just wait. It will be the most specific 4,282 characters ever written."

Charlie looked up from his beer. This was going from awkward to weird to what the fuck super-fast. "Excuse me?" he said, this time not timidly.

"I mean, I wish I could change a few characters, would have saved us a lot of heartbreak. And probably I could have been taller. But if I told you what to change it would have drastic effects. Still, all things considered, it's the most impressive 4,282 characters the world will ever see."

"Who are you?"

Jade finished off her beer and eyed him playfully. "No, Charlie. That's the wrong question."

Charlie didn't respond.

"The question, Charlie Richards of Topeka, Kansas," Jade continued, "is who are you?"

Chapter 2

Who was Charlie Richards of Topeka, Kansas? Well, he wasn't much of anything. Not yet, anyway. We could start with this fact, the most cliché trait of mid-30's loserdom, he lived in the basement of his mom's house. His life at this point had all the makings of a bad joke. A hot woman walks into a bar, beats up the rough and tough regular, and sits down next to guy who lives in the basement of his mom's house. Charlie wasn't sure what the exact punchline was, but he was sure it involved him.

He cringed as Jade looked at him. Could she tell he'd only had sex three times in his life and two of those times were historically awful, with crying involved... and the crying was him. The highlight of his life thus far was winning a free trip to the Grand Canyon to look at a giant hole in the earth. He even bought a fridge magnet to memorialize the trip.

But then there was this; he knew in his brain of brains that something was different about his mind. And he hated himself for it. He just wanted to be one of the cool kids. All through school he just wanted to throw a kegger and get laid, but instead all he could think about was building machines, or how to improve existing technology. In college, he'd invented a way to store information remotely on servers instead of individual computers, but he didn't do anything with the invention. Years later, of course, the term "cloud" was everywhere. Charlie could have made millions. But it wasn't who Charlie was meant to be. Charlie had studied genetics at Georgetown. One of his instructors, Professor Deakins, said he had the most brilliant medical mind he had ever known and he could be in the forefront of genetic engineering. This alone inspired Charlie to drop out. Charlie was not about to be at the forefront of anything.

Charlie took an online class in programming and became a Bandicoot employee. The company's ranking system helped ensure Charlie kept himself ranked close to last so that no one would bother him. It would be less stressful. This was his style.

And he wasn't about to change his style just because some kick ass demigoddess walked into his watering hole.

"Right," Charlie said, "Let's focus on my question. Asking who you are is quite valid. You seem to know things. You beat up Sal. You're talking to me at a bar. You're, um, quite pleasant looking."

They had downed about six beers each at this point and Charlie was getting loopy. Jade, on the other hand, was her same twinkling-eye, smiling self.

“You don’t seem the Lonely Tree type, if I do say. In fact, you don’t strike me as from Kansas at all.” Charlie shrugged.

Jade looked around at the dark walls and crooked frames of the Lonely Tree. “Well, Charlie, you don’t really seem the type either. Not from what I’ve seen in the museums.”

Charlie blinked blankly eleven times.

Before now, the oddest conversation Charlie had ever had was in a park. It had been with a duck. They had argued over Mr. Duck stealing a piece of bread out of Charlie’s lunch bag. The duck had quacked back, thus defining it as a conversation and not a lecture. They had earned some peculiar stares when Charlie starting quacking angrily back at him. It was an odd exchange. Still, it was roughly 1.2 lightyears behind the oddity of this conversation.

To be fair, Jadyn of Crowley was a bit surprised at the conversation herself. Here’s a tip: when one travels through time, leave your expectations in your present. Print out this fortune cookie wisdom and tape it to your time machine. Then highlight it. I will make this whole-hearted promise, that no matter how many Renaissance Festivals you’ve done research at; your expectations are wrong.

This was a lesson Jade should have heeded upon meeting Charlie Richards. Here was the god of hybrids. In a few centuries from now, monuments would be built to this man. Jade was from those centuries and knew it to be true. It would be said that Charlie was a mountain of intellect, an ocean of knowledge, a lightning bolt of invention. Also, that he had adequately large biceps. Upon meeting Charlie, however – suffice to say, leave your expectations in your present.

But she needed him. Her people needed him. And Jade of Crowley didn’t fail her missions. She didn’t fail her people. She didn’t fail herself.

Vooosh!

A loud rumble boomed through the air and shook the bar. Several bottles of liquor fell to the ground, crashing and sending liquid and Dan the Man across the floor. Jade held her fingers to her temple and closed her eyes tightly. Charlie regained his seating and looked around at the patrons in the bar, mumbling in wonderment of what caused the noise. When Charlie looked back at Jade, her face became anxious.

“What was that?” he asked.

In a flash, Jade’s face went back to its charming self. “Why don’t we get out of here, Charlie? I’ll tell you everything you want to know.”

“Why don’t you tell me right here?” Charlie said with a slight drunken slur.

“You will become the most important person in the world, Charlie.”

Charlie knew this woman was clearly insane. However, he didn’t seem to care at the moment. If she thought Charlie was someone else and, even better, that he was important, well who was he to argue? He didn’t get many chances at this, crazy girl or not.

“Come on, Charlie.” Jade continued with a mischievous grin. “I’ll show you everything you want to see.”

“Intrigued...”

Jade’s delightful smile came out in full force. “I’ll do things you’ll appreciate.”

“Dan the Man!” Charlie yelled to the bar drunkenly. “Close out my tab, good sir!”

They left quickly. Charlie sensed it was important to this woman, but he also knew he had to take the opportunity before she changed her mind.

They stepped out into cool Kansas night. It was late fall, Charlie’s favorite time of year, and the stars were particularly bright this evening. Ad astra per aspera, Charlie thought. To the stars through difficulty. His state motto was fitting tonight. The stars teamed up with the moon to cast significant blue light over the streets.

“Jade,” Charlie said, smiling. A drunken smile. This whole night had been fun. Mostly because it wasn’t ordinary. And all of Charlie’s nights for as long as he could remember had been ordinary. “Tell me, what do you want with me? I don’t think I’m who you think I am.”

“The code in your notebook says differently,” Jade pointed at the book with Marvin the Robot on the cover. “We need the code. You said so yourself, four pages before you wrote it.”

Charlie’s brows furrowed as he looked up at her aquiline features. What the hell was she on about? How could she know what he’d written four pages before what she saw? Had he even written that? He opened the book to his bookmark, then turned back four pages. This is the most important code ever in the history of codes and/or humanity.

Charlie looked up from the notebook to Jade. “I was probably drunk when I wrote that.”

Jade shrugged.

“Wait, how did you know that was there?” Charlie asked slowly. “Did Nate tell you about this? Did he send you? This is all a joke, isn’t it?” He motioned at the city, where he knew his co-worker Nate was probably off in the middle of some cosplay heaven. “Well played, sir.”

“Where I come from,” Jade spoke quietly in the dark evening air, “universities and hospitals are named after you.” A small smile warmed Charlie as she looked at him. “You know, there’s even a fish and chip restaurant on the corner of the street I grew up on named after you. Weird, right? Charlie’s F&C it’s called.”

“That’s my favorite food.”

“Everybody knows that.”

Charlie frowned but grabbed onto something that made sense. “I don’t think you’re from Kansas.”

“I need your help, Charlie.”

“Sure. But if it’s for a ride we should probably get an Uber. I’ve had a bit to drink.”

Jade grabbed Charlie by the shoulders and her left eye distorted while her dark right eye watched him closely.

Her left eye was clear as glass.

Charlie jumped back. He could see through her eye! He could see the blood vessels and mechanical parts behind it.

“Take a second to process this,” Charlie muttered. “Blood vessels and mechanical parts ... What the hell?”

“You invented my race, Charlie.”

Charlie wasn't quite freaking out, but it was safe to say he was on the edge of a cliff and ready to tumble. “A race to...?”

“To three centuries from now, Charlie,” Jade said. “Where we need your help.”

Good, Charlie thought. She's just insane. That's not so bad. “So, you're from the future,” he smiled.

Jade ignored him. “You're the only one who can help. The code linking genetics and computers, your code, needs you.”

Varooosh.

The roaring rumble returned with a vengeance. Charlie stumbled around as it shook the ground. Then two and a half blocks over, a white burning light shot into the air. It wasn't just light though, it was full of energy and fire. It was unlike anything Charlie had ever seen. Silhouetted in the light stood a giant figure. Its proportions were not human. It was like a mechanical Hercules.

Jade closed her eyes and touched her temples again. He could see the glass eye moving around under the lid. When she opened her eyes, there was a strain running through them. “I have to go, Charlie.”

“Um, yeah.” Charlie stammered. “You're right, it is getting late and I really should be going-”

“Charlie.” The twinkle in Jade's eyes dimmed. Her charming smile faded. Her eyes grew dark and serious, her lips strong yet desperate. “Charlie. You created us Charlie. And we're dying.”

“Enough,” Charlie's speech slurred and he reached towards Jade. He sucked with women and he was going to try and at least suck with this one, too. He was a little shocked when he let her catch him.

“It's the code, Charlie,” she said looking down at him. “It's evolved. It's changing us.”

“Shhhhh,” he murmured, reaching up to place a hand over her lips. Damn she was tall.

“We need someone who knows the code and can restore it. We need you. I need you!” Jade moved in for a passionate kiss. Charlie had to stand on his toes to kiss her. It made him wobbly and it made the brush of his lips just as much a fail as every other female encounter he'd had: epic. His pursed mouth stumbled across her cheek before they tripped on her lips and fell off.

She looked at him kindly but stepped away, her eyes looking warily at the light blowing up the sky. “Meet me here tomorrow night with all your research. Someone's followed us. I have to take care of that before we can go back.”

Before the words were even completely out of her mouth, Jade was gone into the night, rushing in the direction where the strange white light had been blowing up the horizon. Charlie stared after her, his fingers pressed against his lower lip. Then he did what any drunk loser would do... he puked all over his white sneakers.

Chapter 3

Charlie arrived at the family-owned rancher on MacVicar Avenue, full of tumultuous emotions. There was a gallon of elation, a pint of doubt, a dash of fear, and all sorts of anxiousness. Stirred with ice, it culminated in a general sense of bewilderment. It was unfathomable that the night had actually happened the way he was remembering it.

His brain stumbled over bits and pieces he didn't understand, selectively discarding them so he didn't have to check himself into a crazy ward. It started with everything Jade had said. He discounted those as crazy rantings. Forget the part where a giant white beam from some future world shot into the air and shook the ground. Doubly forget the lurking futuristic figure. The mind needed to focus on what was important; a very attractive woman threw away (literally) Sal Thompson and came over to him, HIM, and said he was important and she needed him. Focus on that, Charlie. Forget the crazy stuff.

"Well don't you have just the biggest smile on your face."

Charlie's mother sat on the couch watching Jeopardy and, more importantly, the love of her life, Jeopardy's host Sir Alex Trebeck (while not officially knighted by the King of Canada, Sir Alex should have been by now and thus deserved to be addressed with the appropriate title of honor.) This wasn't just Jeopardy airing after the evening news. Charlie's mother, Marie, had all four thousand hours of every single episode on tape. It was the only thing she ever watched, twelve hours a day. The entire run of the show ran on a 334-day loop. Ask the woman anything about a State Park or a Potent Potable and Charlie would bet all the money in his pockets she would know the answer.

"It's been an interesting night," Charlie said, chucking his notebook on the counter.

"How much did you drink?" Marie asked, muting the television.

"I dunno, a few?" He shrugged. "Seven?"

Marie shook her head. "We agreed, two beers at the most. You have a very delicate system."

Charlie rolled his eyes. "Yes, mom."

"What's got you drinking like a fish? It's only seven o'clock!"

"Well, I met this woman--"

Marie was up on her feet in a flash. She wasn't old, early sixties and in good shape despite all the Jeopardy watching, and quite nimble. Any signs of her being upset with Charlie vanished into thick air. “A woman?” She asked the question with glee.

“Settle down.” Charlie waved his hands. But clearly, he didn’t want her to settle down. He was enjoying seeing her excited. As excited as he was. Since he had already mentally blocked the craziness, leaving behind a kiss, he was already pondering where they would buy their house with the white picket fence. “I just met her.” He smiled knowingly. “So, we’ll see.”

“Well, I think it’s just great,” Marie said wrapping an arm around him in approval. “But” she wagged a finger at him, “you shouldn’t be drinking so much around a lady.”

“Alright, alright.”

The doorbell rang and they both turned to look at the door and then at each other. They had few visitors here, mostly just one, and that one was who Charlie feared had just rung the bell.

“Who is that?” Charlie asked hesitantly.

“Your sister. Invited the family over for dinner.” Marie said, bounding to the door.

Charlie sank into the stool by the kitchen island, lowered his head to the marble, and began to pound his head on it. This night had been going so well.

The dinner table was set with an ample-sized ham and steaming side dishes of peas and green beans and butternut squash. When it was just Charlie and his mom, dinners generally consisted of anything microwaved under three minutes. There was, after all, Jeopardy to be watched. But when his sister’s family came over, Mom went all out to impress.

Charlie sat next to his ten-year-old nephew, Alex, and across from his teenage niece, Autumn.

Autumn clicked away on her phone, clearly wishing she was somewhere else. At one end of the table sat Charlie’s mom facing an empty chair at the other end. This is because Charlie’s sister, Tabitha, was pacing in circles in the kitchen yelling into her cell phone. No doubt some assistant of hers was getting an earful over some minor infraction. Tabitha was the C.E.O. at Tradigital Blazer, the most successful, and profitable, marketing agency in Topeka. The city’s famous “To peek into Topeka is to peek into heaven” tagline was all her doing. The city had loved it. It made her the favored child of the whole damn town.

Charlie despised it.

Alex fidgeted in his seat, clearly uneasy about the yelling, but Autumn just tapped away at her phone, clearly a well-adjusted-to-chaos teenager. Conversation wasn’t going to be easy, but Charlie was going to attempt it.

“So, school’s almost out.” He nodded towards Autumn, even though she didn’t look up. “What are you doing for the summer, Autumn?”

She startled when he said her name and gave a half-shrug. Her eyes quickly flitted to her uncle before returning like a boomerang to her phone. “I dunno. Probably go to south of France or somewhere else boring like we always do.”

Oh, the humanity. “Poor thing,” Charlie muttered. “I hope you can survive the dreadful crepes and baguettes you’ll be forced to live off.” His sarcasm fell on deaf ears. Autumn was already deep into some random flicking of Snapchat.

“Uncle Charlie?” Alex tugged on Charlie’s shirt. “Did you hear how Taborlin did at Robofest?” Taborlin was Alex’s robot he’d been working on for years. He took it to all sorts of competitions. Taborlin was already a legendary robot on the youth robotic competition circuit. Taborlin was so great Alex had to compete with high school kids. “He won three golds and a silver. He even broke the Kansas record for clearing the Mount Doom course!”

“Whoa!” Charlie was genuinely impressed. “That course is nearly impossible!”

“I know!” Alex was beaming with pride. “The programming you helped me with was amazing. I even got my photo with the mayor!”

Charlie’s mom gave a proud gasp. “The mayor, Alex? Where’s the photo? I need to have the picture on the fridge.”

Tabitha finished her call and sat down with an audible sigh. “Seriously, I can’t believe building robots is part of the school curriculum. Whatever happened to getting a scholarship the old-fashioned way; throwing a football well.”

Alex sagged visibly and ran his fork through his mashed potatoes. Charlie looked from one to the other. Tabitha was oblivious to Alex’s dejection. He was obviously smart, but his sensitivity must be a trait he got from his dad. He just needed one person’s approval, and she was already back to checking work emails on her phone.

“Well, I think it’s amazing.” Charlie reassured Alex, who gave a weak smile.

“Humph.” Tabitha snorted. “You would think that,” she said.

Here we go again, Charlie thought. “It’s good to see you, sis. How’s work?”

Tabitha did not compute the sarcasm. She liked nothing more to go on about how important her job was. “Deadlines. So many deadlines. I’ve got three Fortune 500 companies who need material stat-” Charlie zoned her out for a while. She would talk all night about her work and her company. She was a C.E.O., which meant she was a chief, which meant responsibility, which meant she was important, which meant what she was saying was important. On and on it would go until it was time to leave. There was never a conversation with Tabitha. There was only ever listening. And Charlie would always let her. He never had anything to say. But Charlie was feeling different today. It had been an interesting night. He had met a girl unlike any he had ever met. There had been sparks, and energy shooting into the sky. Not real? He wasn’t sure. What Charlie Richards was sure about right now is he was tired of listening about his sister’s work.

“Hey Tabitha?”

She ignored him.

“Tabitha.”

She kept right on talking.

“Tabitha!” Charlie slammed his palm down on the table and everything stopped. Tabitha cut off mid-sentence, his mother took the glass away from her lips, Alex’s eyes grew wide and Autumn even looked up from her phone and stopped her incessant tapping. “Why don’t we let someone else talk tonight, shall we?”

All eyes turned to Tabitha. She was white hot with anger.

“Really, Charlie? You want to take over this meeting?” She asked.

“This is a family dinner.” Charlie pointed to the people and food on the table.

“You have some important experiences to bring to the table? Please, by all means, let’s hear them.” She threw out her hands widely, a classic boardroom meeting technique. “Let us all hear it. Did you, perhaps, go to work, stare at a screen, go to a bar, come home to eat dinner with your mother? Hopefully, if you play your card rights, later tonight you can watch Jeopardy and sneak in a few more beers? I mean, unless you’re drunk right now?”

Charlie gritted his teeth. This is why he never spoke up to her. It never went well. And, well, he was still a little drunk.

“Do tell, Charlie.” Tabitha continued. “I’m sure it was quite different then every other day for the last fifteen years.”

“Oh, shut up.” Charlie snapped. It was a snap. Not a great wood splintering rip, just a snap of a twig. But for Charlie Richards and the people in this room, it was loud. Tabitha’s faced danced between anger and amusement. “Nice balls, Charlie,” she drawled.

“Actually,” Charlie’s mom interrupted. “Charlie met a girl!” His mom beamed with pride.

Charlie did not beam with pride. Charlie cringed and sighed. This was not what he wanted brought up at this table. His sister would seize her greedy talons into this topic. His mom beamed with pride.

Tabitha’s face creased in glee. Well, this was going to be entertaining. “Realllly?” The word drawled out of Tabitha’s mouth with laughter. “Do tell.”

Charlie had been waiting for something to brag about to his younger sister since he was six years old. The then three-year-old Tabitha had already grasped a stronghold on the titles of Cutest, Most Worthy of Attention, and Consistent Overachiever. They were titles she went on to hold for the next thirty-one years. No one could deny, then or now, Charlie was the smarter one. It was the only title Charlie held over his sister (at least, the only positive one.) But that’s not to say his sister wasn’t extremely smart. This fact grated on Charlie’s nerves.

To add further insult, she always seemed to use every iota of her intelligence to get ahead in life. Charlie used his gifts to become very good at video games, both playing and making them. She was a born marketer, and even in childhood knew how to play the game. Charlie could solve the same puzzle Tabitha did in less time and it wouldn’t matter. Praise was lavished on her because of how charmingly she did it. Blasted marketing.

Except for his mom. She would always point out to Charlie how special he was and how he would change the world one day. She was the only one, though.

So, he had been looking forward to any chance to brag to his sister, and a hot girl on his arm fit the bill nicely. Problem was, the girl believed she was from the future and he could save the world. By legal definition, Statute 153B, that was grounds to declare her certifiable insane.

“Charlie?” Tabitha’s shrill voice cut through Charlie’s thoughts.

“Huh?”

“You’re staring into space again. I’ve asked you three times, what’s her name?”

He couldn’t let his sister get hold of the narrative. “It’s nothing, really.” He stared into his plate hoping the subject would be dropped.

“You don’t have to be embarrassed, Charlie.” Tabitha’s tone was as sincere as the day was long. “I’m sure she’s very nice.”

Trap! Charlie knew that tone. Marketing. Tabitha knew how to get what she wanted.

Trap!

Just don’t say anything.

“Her name is Jade!” Charlie blurted it out unnaturally loud. It startled the entire table.

“Jade’s a nice name,” Charlie’s mom chirped in.

Tabitha smiled just slightly. To others it surely looked charming. Charlie knew it was full of danger. “Where is Jade from?”

Charlie had to think. Where was she from? Oh, right, she was from the future! Of course, she was. That’s exactly what he should say. Oh sis, she’s quite nice. She from hundreds of years from now.

“Iowa,” Charlie mumbled instead. Charlie Richards was a smart man, but Tabitha always got to him and he had trouble thinking straight. It was hard to think straight and avoid verbal land mines at the same time. Where the hell did Iowa come from?

“Iowa?” Tabitha said, intrigued. “Interesting. What’s she doing in Topeka?”

Charlie knew he needed to stop lying. It never went well. A slippery slope, and all. “She’s hear to attend a convention.”

Whoops.

“What kind of convention?”

“Sci-fi.” Charlie chuckled at his own little lie. Good, if they ever did meet Charlie could just say she was role playing. Point Charlie.

“Charlie.” Tabitha paused dramatically, as if deciding what to say. “She sounds nice. I hope we get to meet her. You know, before she has to go home to Iowa.”

“Me too.” Charlie let out a deep sigh of relief. It could have gone worse. He lurched up from the table so fast a glass rattled against his plate. “I’ll get the dishes,” he muttered, reaching forward a trembling hand to steady the platter.

Tabitha Richards-Dunkin was one hell of a good younger sister.

Poor Charlie.

He was a good older brother and she loved him very much, but sheesh, he couldn't help but be a handful sometimes. I mean, he was so smart, how did he not know Tabitha was the most important marketing consultant to the city of Topkea? If there was a convention in town, Tabitha would know about it.

Poor Charlie.

This was bad even for him, making up meeting a girl. She had spent most of her life going out of her way to make Charlie a better person. She thought she was doing a good job at it. Apparently not. Her eyes slid to her daughter, Autumn. "Put your phone away." She was always on the phone. Good thing she was so pretty.

Poor Charlie.

She decided it was time to step up her game. It was time for her to set him up with somebody. Not her friends, of course, they were a bit out of his league. But she was a titan of marketing. She could sell anything. Surely, she could sell her own brother. Tabitha needed to save her brother from a life alone. Tabitha was one hell of a good sister.

The dishes were done, and Charlie sat on the outdated living room carpet with Alex. They were playing a card game involving magic and hit points and numbers. It was not an even match, Alex was clearly the superior player.

"You see this one here?" Alex pointed the character on the card. He was a knight, his lance roared with flames and his helmet glowed blue (apparently with magic ice powers.) "His name is Halidan. He is savior of the realm, like Taborlin the Great. If he is played when your city has been destroyed, he rebuilds it. He's my favorite."

"Seems like a pretty good card," Charlie smiled, leaning forward to gain a better view of the great but unrecognized by title, Halidan.

"He's totally hard to find. I had to trade my bike to get him." Alex stroked the card lovingly with his thumb.

"Your bike?!" Charlie nearly fell backwards. "For a card?"

"Of course," Alex gazed up at Charlie, his eyes full of worship. "He's the ultimate hero."

Charlie's shock melted. "You're a good kid, Alex." Alex flashed a huge smile, then blushed and looked down. He wasn't one to get compliments often, Charlie imagined. He knew who his mother was. The kid just wanted someone to notice him. To see how important a card was to him. Charlie could relate.

When Charlie went into the television room (as they named it), he discovered Tabitha had achieved the unthinkable; Jeopardy had been turned off. His mom was wringing her hands and chewing on her lower lip. Charlie frowned. Jeopardy wasn't about Jeopardy; it was about things being as they should be. If Jeopardy was on, life was fine. Ever since Charlie was five and his father disappeared, his mother had brought Alex Trebek into the home, making sure Charlie knew Scipio Africanus the Elder was the hero of the Second Punic War. Instead, the news was on. Charlie glared at Tabitha. In the news, life was never fine. People got into car accidents in the news. Food was poisonous in the news. Dogs bit people in the news. People killed each other for no real reason in the news.

But today in the news, there was a twist. Apparently, there had been sightings around town of some giant beam of light shooting into the sky.

"The city says they believe it was a blown power generator," Tabitha was apparently going to be the commentator.

"Absurd," Charlie muttered. "Generators don't make random giant beams of light shoot up into the sky.

"Shhhh," Tabitha said. But the news team was buying it hook, line and even sinker. They were interviewing a local man named Damian who swore he saw what he saw, and he wasn't lying. "I'm telling you what I saw!" Damian exclaimed. "There was a big flash of light. Then I saw a giant metal figure!"

Jillian Davids, the reporter, nodded along with her best "sure you did buddy" nod. Two years of journalism classes for this. "You think this person caused the generator to--"

Damian cut her off. "It wasn't a person. And it wasn't a generator. It was a robot, I tell you! And I think a killer one!"

Jillian sighed. Why did she always get the crazy ones? "Okay, we are going to head back to the studio--"

"I'm telling you what I saw!" Damian reiterated. "Then I looked down the street and there was another robot. A red one! Topeka is infested with robots now!"

Jillian stepped in front of Damian and tuned to the camera. "Up next, is your puppy eating enough protein? Stay tuned."

The newscast cut from the scene and showed some lovely video of puppies rolling around.

Charlie stared at the television a long time. If he was crazy, at least he wasn't the only one. He did see what he thought he saw.

Good, because he had started to doubt it.

Charlie looked back at the card of the knight. "I like the card."

"It's the best," Alex said proudly.

"Everyone needs a hero in their deck." Charlie nodded to himself. He was given a mission tonight, to gather his work and to meet the mysterious Jade. She was crazy, but so was the world. The news just proved that. What the hell, he thought. It at least made life interesting. It was worth a shot, in case there was truth in her words, and he could be the hero in the deck. Charlie was going to have a fun day at work tomorrow. There was a mission, and it needed a hero.

Chapter 4

The next day began for Charlie like every other Monday to Friday had (excluding holidays) for the last fifteen years; one seven-minute snooze from 6:08 to 6:15, one fifteen-minute shower, one six-minute tooth brushing session (say what you will about Charlie, but his teeth were spotless), one Star Wars branded shirt worn, a bowl of Pops cereal, and a nine-minute commuter to Bandicoot TechSmart, a mid-sized software company in Northwest Topeka.

It was a mid-sized office building, and Bandicoot took up the top floor. For Topeka, being on a sixth floor wasn't far from being atop a skyscraper. The office's views of downtown, through fifteen-foot-high floor to ceiling windows, were quite nice. It was one of the few things Charlie enjoyed about coming to work. Charlie lowered his head as he entered and made his way to the elevator. Another day...

The euphoria, and the alcohol, of the night before had worn off. Charlie felt anxious, which isn't completely negative since he was familiar with this emotion. After a good night's sleep, doubt about the truth had seeped back in. As he sat in his cubicle he realized what Jade had wanted wasn't him, it was the code he had been working on, a side hobby to this day job. Here's the thing, though. The code was rough, the ideas hadn't been fleshed out, but even one as humble as Charlie knew there was something unbelievable and groundbreaking in its concept. The future of technology was the intermeddling of human and machines, be it software or hardware. Biological intelligence and digital intelligence would one day be merged. It's how memory would one day be flawless and accessible, how we would expand the length of lives, and how, most importantly, we would listen to the space-age pop music without a stereo. This was already being worked on in Silicon Valley, but Charlie's code took it a step beyond. It was a draft of not just how body and machine would interact, but how they would evolve together.

"You dropped down to 88th."

Charlie turned to see Nate pointing to large digital signage on the walls displaying the ranking boards. It scrolled through the rankings of every programmer at the company, all eighty-nine of them. Charlie was now ranked only ahead of Matthew Weikers, who had only shown up for work one day in the last week, for a total of two hours. This company wasn't Charlie's dream job by a country mile, but there weren't many options in town if you were a programmer. Charlie had one goal while working here; he wanted to work alone. So, he took a job no one else wanted, fixing bugs in their accountant software (yes, it was as exciting as it sounded.) Charlie had written code to automate the entire process, but didn't bother to tell his superiors. So not working with anyone else on the team and looking like you aren't working much, is the perfect way to get ranked 88th out of 89th, right above Matthew Weiters.

"Well, it could be worse," Charlie shrugged.

"You looked stressed, Charlie." A tinge of concern flitted across Nate's face. While Nate, at least in his assessment, wasn't particularly close to Charlie, it was close enough a tinge was the proper amount of concern to have for him.

"How so?" Charlie stalled.

"You broke your pen in half."

Charlie hadn't even realized it, half a pen in his right, half a pen in his left, and ink dripped onto his desk.

"Also," Nate continued. "Your shirt's on inside out."

Charlie checked. Yes, indeed. It was true.

"Don't worry, they aren't going to fire you. No one else wants your job."

"Yeah," Charlie sighed, throwing the two halves of the pen on the table. "It's not that."

For Charlie, Nate was his best friend at the company. Which is to say he was his only friend at the company. Which is to say it was his only friend. And so, Charlie told Nate about meeting Jade. Well, he told him a story similar to what happened. He left out all parts about her super-human strength, her thinking she was from the future, her saying he was her people's messiah, you know, all the parts that made her sound crazy. Which was a lot of parts, roughly about eight parts out of ten.

"So, what's the problem?" Nate asked, properly inflecting the what's wrong with you in the words connotation. "She sounds hot. And amazing. You've never hooked up in the entire time I've met you. What's the problem?"

"Well...she's not from around here."

Nate stared blankly at Charlie. Finally, "What, are you already picturing getting married and a white picket fence?"

"No!" Charlie said a little too defensively.

"Then just meet up with her and have some fun."

"Yeah." Charlie gave a cool man shrug. "Well, I mean, of course I'm going to do that," Charlie laughed sincerely insincere. "Of course, I'll meet up and have some fun. Ha. I mean, yeah."

Nate shrugged. Charlie was his weird old self. Abby Chestnut walked through the corridor towards them. Abby was cute in the next-door neighbor kind of way. Not in the Hollywood girl-next-door way, but in a Topeka neighbor cute way. She was also incredibly intelligent and good with computers. There were a few guys at the office with crushes on Abby, she was quite the catch in the ninety-percent male dominated office. Put all those crushes together, roll in a giant ball, then double it three times, and it wouldn't be half the crush Charlie had on her. What was worse to Nate is he never admitted it. Which made it all the more painful, because Charlie would do all these little things to try and express it without being noticed by anyone and all it achieved was being noticed by everyone except Abby. Nate twisted Charlie's chair so he could see Abby coming their way. Charlie looked like a deer in the headlights and spun the chair back around.

"Hey," Nate said loudly to Charlie. "You should bring this girl around. Maybe it will make Abby jealous."

Charlie slouched lower in his chair avoiding Abby and the light laugh she made as she walked on by. Just another day at the office. Charlie's supervisor, Taylor Monahan was close on her heels. He had the look of a man who fifteen years ago was a good athlete, and fifteen years later he was still a good athlete who also enjoyed donuts and beer.

Taylor stopped when he reached Charlie and Nate. "Charlie, I need those four deadlines met today. Project approval is dependent on delivery and quality assurance."

Charlie eyed his supervisor with as much distaste as he could without it being noticed. Taylor had no idea what he was talking about when it came to I.T. It's like the guy had collected some key phrases and jumbled them together so he could kind of sound like he knew what he was talking about. Charlie's best defense was to use keywords back. Words intended for no other purpose than to confuse Taylor.

"I patched a series of nested divs rendering the server-side DOCTYPE to kern the analytics of the CSS framework in a hover state. Everything should be good to go." He threw in a submissive smile to really sell the package. Taylor eyed Charlie back a long time, his mind racing between knowing he was being toyed with and not knowing if Charlie was actually the genius some said he was. "Okay, then. Well, I'll pass the info along. But if it's not what we need..." He pointed a finger sternly at Charlie. "You'll be the first to know." His finger trailed to the big board of rankings, more precisely, at Charlie's ranking. "And, to go."

Charlie nodded his comprehension.

A ground-shaking rumble rumbled through the office. Fourteen pens, two coffee mugs and lots of paper fell from employees' desks. It had seemed as if Topeka had a very rare earthquake from the feel of it. Some of the employees, those not worried enough about their ranking to keep working, rushed to the windows. They began to mumble and point.

Charlie ignored it. He was so good at ignoring things, it was better described as an art. Nate was looking at the window but Charlie returned his attention back with a snap of his fingers. "Look, there was a reason I wanted to tell you."

Nate stood, trying to see past the mob and out the windows. "I think something is happening out there."

"Why I wanted to tell you about the girl, Nate," Charlie said, exasperated. "Stay with me." "Who?" Nate asked, his eyebrows knitted together as his head briefly swiveled to Charlie.

“The girl!” Charlie let out an exasperated breath. “The whole thing we’ve been talking about!”

“Oh, right.”

“There was one strange thing.” There were a lot of things strange, of course, but Charlie wasn’t going to say anything about most of them. However, he did need help understanding one thing. “She knew about my work.”

The whooping blades of helicopters rhythmically beat outside. Sirens blared in the background. Seven dogs began to bark. Nate again tried to see what was outside. Some coworkers were stabbing at Facebook on their phones trying to figure out what was going on. Some videoed the choppers.

“Your job?” Nate asked, half paying attention. “Great. It’s a good job. I wonder what...?”

“No.” Charlie said the next words with hushed importance. “My work.” “Your work?” Nate paused at Charlie’s serious expression. It dawned on him. “Ohhhhh!”

“S!” hissed Charlie. He had told him about the code before. Nate understood about 30% of what Charlie had told him. Charlie was many things, few of them impressive, but there was no denying somewhere in there lay a genius.

Or he was full of shit.

Regardless, it had sounded convincing. Nate’s area of expertise was hacking. He was a hacker and he stopped hackers. If someone random knew about his code, either Charlie had drunk too much one night or – “What did you tell her?”

“I didn’t tell her anything. She told me.”

“You sure?”

“Yes, I’m sure. I’ve never told anyone but you. She just...knew about it.”

“Let me guess, she wanted a copy of it.”

“Well, yes.” Charlie wondered where this was going.

“How many encryption levels do you have on those files?”

“Fourteen.”

“Are there other references to the code on anything besides your secure hard drive?”

“Maybe.”

“Sorry Charlie, but what’s the more likely scenario; this girl is really into you, or she knows about the code and wants access to it. She probably works for some billionaire-backed startup in Silicon Valley.”

Charlie thought on it for a moment and with each passing second his paranoia rose. If she knew about the code, and wanted the code, it was more likely she worked for some company with a dropped vowel from its name (Flickr, Tumblr, Scrbd, etc.) There were bits and pieces and references to it all over the place on his computer. Jade was just trying to get the whole thing. Her far-fetched story was overkill, but hey, you do what you gotta do. The beam of energy shooting into the sky and the weird robot looking figure was a nice touch too. Got to give those rich Silicon Valley people credit, they had creativity. There was no doubt though, she was trying to get the code.

The huge bolt of energy that shot through the air. The figures. For the first time, he looked around the office. Something was happening outside. In Topeka, Kansas, where nothing happened. There were helicopters; in Topeka, Kansas. This was not feeling right. Charlie took out the keys to his desk and opened the bottom drawer. There, amongst notes of random musings and numbers, notebooks, old library cards (not related, but they were there.) He threw it all into a backpack. He lifted the false bottom inside the drawer and removed a small box with a finger imprint. Charlie pushed his finger on it and the box popped open to reveal a small piece of quartz about the size of a dime. The inscription, in hologram form between the layers of quartz, was the word Pontus. He stuffed it into his bag.

The power to the building shut down, inspiring exasperated gasps from the people who hadn't hit control S in time. Charlie was gripped with fear. Through the left-most towering window closest to his cubicle, he saw a red figure; red as the sun. Said sun was reflected harshly off the metallic, long and slender being. He was hovering in the air, his feet aglow in a blue energy. The red as flame figure landed softly on the ledge outside the window and looked at Charlie. This straight-out-of-a-movie, sci-fi, Iron Man doppelganger looked at Charlie. His fingers were sharp as Ginsu knives (add deadly to the list). Charlie was right to be gripped with fear.

The figure swiped the window with its Ginsu knife fingers and the glass shattered into 639,253 pieces.

Chapter 5

Shards of glass slid across the floor with poetic grace. The employees of Bandicoot Computing greeted it with a collective gasp, which was followed by a larger collective gasp when the flying red robot blasted through the broken window. The room fell silent as with each step, the glass crunched with irrational intensity, echoing through the still office. Well, mostly still. Jim Zepeda, of course, was crying, “Oh my God! Oh my God!” But that’s just Jim Zepeda for you. He’d have the same response to a cockroach.

The red hunk of metal stopped, a blue light shining from its eyes.

Office workers scrambled away, clumping in a corner as the azure beam scanned over them. The robot’s appendages now ended in rounded, five-fingered, human shaped metal hands that still looked like they could crush four buses. All at the same time. The robot continued examining the group of humans until he stopped, locking onto Charlie's feet, which were glued to the floor with the strong adhesive of fear. So, when the figure approached with large, heavy steps that shook the floor, all other workers had the good sense to part while Charlie stood still. Almost still; he was shaking in his boots. He was actually wearing loafers, but the shaking part was thoroughly accurate. Charlie clutched his brown satchel bag, which held the code to the future tightly. He knew he should run, his legs just seemed to disagree. Besides, this robot was one athletic looking machine and Charlie had no doubt it could start as middle linebacker for the Chiefs, and even more easily, run him down.

The robot came so close to Charlie that had it been programmed to breathe, Charlie would have felt it. Charlie thought about crying, but even he knew it wasn’t a good look to go out on. He did find some solace, however, in his certain final moments. He was glad last night when he met Jade she wasn't just a crazy woman; this robot was proof of that. And if she hadn’t been crazy, what she said about needing him to save her wasn't crazy. Point Charlie.

The robot’s arms shot out in perfect 90-degree angle from its body. The crowd gasped. Charlie held his breath. The robot’s right hand shot down to its stomach, and he bent forward with a bow so textbook, a noble of any royal court would weep with jealousy.

“Charles Richards, of Topeka, Kansas?” His voice had a slight aristocratic accent and complete courteousness. “I am Angelo, and I am at your service.”

It is generally accepted in the 24th century that there are three distinct races: humans, hybrids, and bots. The argument could be made that a bot wasn't a race since it wasn't a living organism. But of course, Proposition 183-22B had passed. In truth, a rare fourth classification could be made between hybrids and bots. The Magnes PB EXX was not an official designation, but it was referred to as such in the dark top-secret hallways where it was developed. The reason Magnes were rare was because, except for only the most limited and significant circumstances, they were illegal. Blake Crowley himself, of course, had three of the six in existence. The two others were kept on lockdown in a secret location. The final one, Angelo, belonged to Jade Crowley.

While there is room for debate, Angelo didn't necessarily have feelings, but he understood them. He processed the feelings of fear, of love, of hatred, of loyalty. The third level of Angelo's programming was to be outrageously courteous and enormously charming. This was to hide who Angelo was, so to speak. The second level of programming was to be loyal to his owner. Not in a mere "do as commanded way," Angelo was much more sophisticated than that, he was a Magnes PB EXX after all. He was loyal in a deeper sense that transcended mere acts, and operated his own decision-making processes in her best interest. This is a major part why they were illegal; if everyone had such a powerful bot working this way, it would be chaos. Angelo's top level of programming was "all other programming must honor the common goal of protecting his owner's interests." This meant kill anything and everything in his way.

From outside the office down the hall came shouts. "Move, move, move!" The sounds of a SWAT team swept through the walls and closed in on the office.

A cacophony of shattering glass filled the air.

Charlie jumped as the window adjacent to the one Angelo came through was smashed into another 639,253 pieces and a formidable black figure burst into the room. Angelo was formidable himself, but what stood amidst the glass shards, its massive black head surveying the room, was an eight-foot-tall ebony pillar of a robot. Its arms and legs thick, its chest a tank. This robot looked like it hit the robotic gym at least ten hours per day. Its head was the shape of a sizable tear drop, its eyes a green strip of light. This must have been the figure Charlie had seen the night before.

Angelo, and the rest of the crowd, turned to face the intruder.

"Mister Genesis," Angelo said, maintaining all the charm and courteousness. "I dare say you could have used the window I just broke. It would have saved these poor people some cleanup."

Genesis's slit for an eye seem to glow with anger. "Mission objective: Charlie Theodore Richards.” Genesis' voice was deep and strong. It didn't sound robotic in tone, but it did in language.

The doors to the office burst open and a team of SWAT, police, and a few underpaid security guards stumbled through. They froze like everyone else at the site of the two killer robots facing off against each other. They did their best to yell and posture threatening poses to intimidate two killer robots. It didn't, on the surface, do any good, but it did turn Genesis's attention.

Angelo tilted his head to Charlie, who clutched his bag like a very useless shield. “I think it would be a good time to get out of here, sir. Please, if you wouldn't mind terribly, bring the bag.”

It was smart advice, considering all hell had broken loose.

Humans fled the room, urged by the cops who, like the actors in a Transformer's flick, had realized they were greatly out of their depth.

Angelo stared down the black-as-night bot across the room; Genesis. A destroyer bot of unmatched strength. Angelo crouched into a defensive pose. His fingers connected, split, and sharpened, creating hands of laser blades. His eyes glowed. He was programmed to be charming and unassuming for a reason. Angelo, ProtectoBot (P.B.) of Jady of Crowley, was one of the deadliest bots in existence.

Unfortunately, so was Genesis.

Opalum is hard material. That's a vast understatement, it is otherworldly hard. Literally. It is found and mined from Titan, one of Saturn's moons. It is roughly two-thousand times as hard as a diamond and can withstand heats up to twelve thousand degrees, or double the temperature of the center of the Earth. All of this makes the material an extremely expensive commodity in the 24th century. Otherworldly expensive. Leaders-of-the-world level expensive. Prince Jabir of the United Empire was said to have a yacht made of one, though rumor has it was just opalum plated.

Unless you happened to have a nuclear reactor and liquid oxygen, opalum was virtually indestructible.

The bot, Genesis, was made of this material. This was not usual. Genesis was the P.B. of someone very wealthy and powerful.

Charlie crouched as a beam of light shot from the slit across Genesis's face. Angelo's arm sprang up, instantly transforming into a pizza box shaped shield. (Charlie was hungry, which is why he associated the shape. Others may have thought it was merely a square shield.)

One never knows how they will handle the unexpected until it is happening and, well, it's never quite what you expect. Abby stood to one side, staring agape at the two robots, not moving a muscle. Nate was frowning at them as if they shouldn't have gotten past security. One guy wearing a Dr. Who t-shirt ran forward, his arms outstretched and screamed, “Chose me!” But as a whole, most people were screaming and making a mad rush towards the door.

The SWAT team wasn't really, well, SWATing. They weren't trained to combat killer robots from the future and, let's be honest, they were human, and humans get stunned sometimes. The Brick, that was what everyone on the team called him because he always hurled himself into the fray, knew this was his time to shine. He jumped up, yelling wildly, as if he was going to scare these programmed bots, and fired a round of bullets at Genesis. He fired a few shots at Angelo. Neither robot so much as looked at him. He threw his gun and it clattered harmlessly to the floor. It wasn't enough. He was a brave man and this was his moment. He ran screaming at the red bot. After all, when you're going to take on a killer robot, you should at least start with the smaller of your two choices.

Without taking his sensors off Genesis, Angelo held out a hand and a needle shot out of his palm. He stabbed it into the center of the Brick's forehead. The Brick fell like one.

Charlie stood quietly watching the entire scene as if it was just some event on the screen. Except for one small thing ... he felt no emotion. Often, he would laugh or tense up or even on the odd occasion get a slight tear in his eye during a movie, but standing here in front of these about-to-duel robots... he felt nothing. His feelings were completely gone. Unless, of course, you want to include complete denial as an emotion, then he was extremely emotional. Otherwise, nothing.

Angelo and Genesis returned facing each other old west style. Then, they attacked. Metal and metal collided in sparks of fury (fun fact: Sparks of Fury is the name of the comic book this event one day inspired.) Metal on metal, as discussed, wasn't accurate – nano-matter on opalum was correct. Angelo's shield-like arm glowed with a pulsating red energy. The energy pressed forward into the space between the two robots and pushed Genesis back, ever so slightly. The massive black robot lowered its head to charge. It was hard for Charlie to tell, glancing up at the shining red robot that protected him, if Angelo was worried or not. But Charlie most definitely was. His emotions had begun to return.

Angelo must be programmed to sense human emotions, because he noticed the shift in Charlie. His free arm shot out, grasping Charlie protectively. His eyes glowed fiercely red like the shield that protected them.

Genesis extended the thick, black columns of his arms on either side of Angelo's shield and began to squeeze the pulsating red light as if it was an enemy to be vanquished, which it was.

To Charlie's horror, the glowing red shield began to compress under Genesis' onslaught.

Angelo's eyes burned brighter, his chin lowering a bit as he focused all of his processors on keeping the shield between Genesis and Charlie.

But it wasn't enough. With a dying squeal, the glowing shield was extinguished. But it was worse than that. So much worse. With a resounding clangor, Angelo's forearm snapped off and plummeted to the ground, severed from his body.

"No!"

Charlie started at the familiar voice. Jade was by far the most badass woman he had ever seen yesterday, but today she was tenfold. In the near dark of the powerless room, he could just make out the outline (nice outline) of her body. The aquiline planes of her face were stunning, but her eyes... they were ice. She pointed a black device the size of cop's baton directly at Genesis. From one end, long lasers of white light sizzled and cracked like a dozen of electromagnetic whips.

Nate was the last to go. Backing up quickly towards the door, he screamed at his friend, “Charlie, I don’t think she’s from Silicon Valley!” As if that information was somehow useful in this situation.

The black pillar of Genesis stepped resolutely towards Angelo. Angelo jumped sharply to his left to Charlie. With a giant shove of his remaining hand, Angelo sent Charlie sprawling. He crashed into the corner of a cubicle on the far side of the room. But the action backfired. Charlie’s bag, with all the prize code in it, flew from his hands, landing with a resounding plop right in front of the steadily approaching Genesis. In an instant, a black beam came out of Genesis’s hand, scanning the contents, before he snatched the bag up.

Jade let rip the electromagnetic whips out of her black baton. They struck Genesis with a loud sizzle, seemingly dazing the giant machine and sending it crashing to the floor. Seizures captured the giant black robot’s body as electro sparks danced from his head.

Behind Genesis stood Jade, weapon in hand.

“Not so fast,” Jade said, reaching down and grabbing the bag out of the trembling robot’s hands. “C’mon.” She strode to Charlie as the sparks around Genesis’s head began to subside. “Get your hustle on. The stunner is brief.” She glanced at Angelo’s arm, a frown rolling over her face. Whipping a different device that looked a lot like a remote control for a television, she aimed it at Genesis’s head.

Angelo grabbed her arm and pushed it down.

“Don’t waste your power. It won’t work on him.”

For a brief second, Jade looked like she might do it anyway, but instead, she grabbed up Angelo’s severed arm and motioned for them to roll out. There was no way Charlie was going to be left behind. Then he saw it.

The notebook. His prized, most recent notebook... the one with the code in it that Jade had known about in the Lonely Tree Tavern... it had slid out of the bag and was lying, almost hidden, under the black monster’s armpit.

Without even stopping to think, Charlie was going in. He darted forward, snatched the notebook with a fierce tug and turned to flee. He made it half a step when his forward motion came to an abrupt halt and he cried out in agonizing pain. Genesis had regained some motion and had clamped a claw-like hand around Charlie’s ankle. Mostly likely he was squeezing very lightly for a destroyer robot, but it was shattering Charlie’s ankle.

“If you don’t mind, sir,” came a polite voice. “I request you to please let go.”

Charlie screamed louder as the black robot’s grip tightened. Angelo jumped roughly one high jump world record (21st century) into the air and smashed down on Genesis’ head. It did no damage, but it distracted the robot just enough that he loosened his grip.

Jade grabbed Charlie and slung him over her shoulder, a fact Charlie would forever deny and Jade would begrudgingly leave out. But the fact remains, he was bouncing unceremoniously over her shoulder as she sprinted towards the shattered windows.

Genesis had recovered. He hurled Angelo against the wall like a rag doll. Genesis's goal wasn't Angelo, though, it was Charlie's code. Genesis sprinted with lightning speed towards Jade and Charlie.

Jade knew there was no out-running an eight-foot opal bot. She was going to have to use the last power of her electro-whip. The bolts of electricity snapped out and snaked around Genesis. The power of her custom-made, top-the-line electro-whip, which was so experimental it hadn't even been branded yet – its code name was Jade's Whip – would have destroyed most bots, but it just pushed Genesis back a smidge.

That was all Angelo needed. He crashed into the bot's side and they went spiraling like a red and black tumbleweed over the shattered glass on the floor of the destroyed office space.

Jade dropped Charlie at the edge of the six-story open window and stared down. Charlie didn't like the hesitation. He had no idea what Jade was capable of, but the fact that she didn't seem to like the thought of a six-story jump meant Charlie didn't like the thought of a six-story jump, which he'd never even thought about before.

Jade glanced over her shoulder looking for Angelo. "No!" she cried. Genesis had Angelo pinned down and was crushing him, about to snap him like a wishbone.

"Don't worry, my lady." Angelo's voice was strong, but it trembled underneath with weakness and fear. "I insist you fulfill our mission. Please." He added the last word as Genesis snapped Angelo's remaining arm off.

"No!" Jade cried.

Charlie could see she was about to go back and take on the giant black bot again. The bot that was destroying their killer bot and, once he was done, would surely focus on killing them. Charlie placed a hand on Jade's arm as Genesis ripped off one of Angelo's legs. "We have to go!" he shouted at her. "He'll come for us next!"

Jade's ice-cold eyes turned on Charlie and he shrank back slightly, but he knew he was right. "We have to fulfill your mission!" Genesis tossed aside Angelo's body parts and riveted his deadly attention on Jade and Charlie. The sensory strip of his eyes seemed to glare in anger.

Jade glared back at him.

Charlie tugged at Jade's sleeve. "Your mission!"

Her eyes flitted to him and for a moment he snapped her out of the deadly duel she was about to engage in. It was enough. "Charlie," she said, as if she had known his name her whole life and it meant something. In a lightning-fast move she wrapped her arm around his waist and hurled them both over the six-story ledge as Genesis came blasting towards them.

Chapter 6

Charlie screamed all the way down. He was hoping she had some futuristic gadget buried somewhere in her tight black outfit, but as they hurtled forward towards the concrete, that seemed ever more unlikely.

“Shit! Shit! Shit!” Was the only expression Charlie could manage as he clung to Jade, acting as a dead weight to their fall. Charlie would object to the term dead weight. He didn’t deny he needed to lose twelve pounds, but hopefully it made him softer.

Only nothing was going to stop the bone-crushing impact they were about to have with the sidewalk.

At the last possible second, Jade pulled Charlie in tight and curled around him in a ball. She twisted herself, angling her body with precision so only her left side slammed into the concrete, taking the full impact as she rolled forward, the sound of metal still clanging in Charlie’s ear.

They rolled for what felt like forever until Jade unraveled, letting Charlie slide away until he was lying flat on his back waiting to see if his lungs would breathe again. When they did, the ripping ache of his rattling breath was almost too much for him to bear. A moan escaped with his gasp.

But he was alive.

How the hell had they survived the fall? It didn’t compute. And what was the metal cacophony he’d heard when Jade hit the concrete? His head twisted sideways. Despite the tension that ran through her face and the slight grimace she displayed as she walked towards him, Jade was already up and moving.

“Come on!” she yelled, not allowing him respite.

With a flash of understanding, he knew exactly why. The black monstrosity of a robot had not been defeated, he had merely slowed for a moment to tear apart their protector. Now he stood on the edge of the six-story building, looking over the ledge, preparing to jump. Had he been human, Charlie would have guessed his expression was something of a leering pleasure at the thought he would soon be tearing both apart.

Terrance Bantam was a fifteen-year-old sophomore at Topeka High (Go Bulldogs!) On this day when all the crazy explosions were happening around town and helicopters seemed to be the norm, he was not being a sophomore at Topeka High. He was cutting class. Who wouldn't? Something big was happening and he wanted to know what it was. He slipped behind police lines (it was surprisingly easy to do) and hid behind one of the police cars surrounding Bandicoot Techsmart's main headquarters.

Luck would have it, he was in the perfect place to capture with his cracked iPhone 5 a woman jumping out of a building with a man on her back. He wasn't happy it was an iPhone 5. Like his friends, he'd been saving for an 8, but anyway it was fine, he got the shot. Mostly, he was thrilled with the million views on YouTube he was totally about to get. Because the video was badass. I mean, a woman clutching this guy jumped from a six-story high building and landed in the neatest little tuck and roll on the concrete. That's badass! Stuck the landing too, 9.2 from the Russian judge. It was unreal. Sure, it would be the subject of CGI accusations, since it did look like a scene out of a movie (although it did not have the cool dust and smoke land the movie version would have had.) But who cares? The CGI controversy would drive up the hits. He was going to be a YouTube star (well, probably the woman who jumped out of the building would be, but he'd be able to do interviews on how daring he was to get the clip.) For sure. This was going to happen.

The police began to move in, attempting to corner the woman and the man who were now on the move, merely seconds after their death-defying jump. Terrance was being brushed by cops carrying loaded weapons and dressed in riot gear. His perfect spot was looking imperfect. He was in real world danger, not movie danger, and Terrance didn't like actual danger.

Ducking his head and tucking his phone deep in his front pocket, Terrance took off. He had what he needed to rock YouTube.

Unfortunately for Terrance, if YouTube hits were the goal, he had made a huge error. While his video would reach the million hit mark, had he kept filming when the eight-foot black-as-death robot jumped out of the window six-stories above ... he very possibly could have owned YouTube, for at least twenty minutes.

Jade and Charlie ran like a killer robot was behind them (note: there was a killer robot behind them.) Their problems included, but were not limited to: a gaggle of police barricaded behind their cars in riot gear intent on stopping Jade and Charlie while simultaneously being shit scared of the mammoth black robot pursuing them, Jade's injuries that became more apparent as she moved, the fact that Angelo was destroyed, and Charlie was devastatingly hungry.

Jade wasn't a stranger to being in tight spots. This wasn't near as bad as when she was sent to take care of the Chief Executive Leader (C.E.L.) of Paladin Group, a rival company stealing technology from her employer, Mr. Crowley. She and Angelo had been up against thirteen ProtectoBots (P.B.s). While they weren't as advanced as Genesis, they were incredibly dangerous. They were down enormous odds, 18 to 1 officially, and while Jade still had a scar from hip to neck that she wore proudly today, they came out the other side victorious. It wasn't all good news though, as Angelo had destroyed seven of the PBs' to Jade's six – a fact Angelo still mocked her with to this day.

Angelo.

He was gone.

One may have a difficult time understanding the connections humans and hybrids could have with their PBs'. There was a 21st century study conducted about human's connection to Roombas; how they would give them names, call it "he" or "she" rather than "it." They would worry when the Roomba made a distress call. They would treat them like a pet. Often when the Roomba would break, people would forego the cheaper option of simply replacing it. Instead they would prefer to fix "their" robot.

This basic connection, magnified over centuries, exhibits the deep connection humanity would embrace with bots. PBs' were expected to be at every to traditional family event; parties, graduations, marriages, even births. They were often by a person's side on their deathbed. And a surprising thing would happen in return. As technology developed emotional adaptor processors, bots would change from these interactions with their human counterparts. It was not uncommon for a bot to have to go to reprogramming from depression after losing their associated human. To magnify this even further, there was Jade and Angelo. Jade's profession made her trust of and dependence on Angelo not a luxury, but a necessity. She could do what she did because she had Angelo. She worked in a world where danger was around every corner, including her colleagues and friends. Often, she was isolated from her parents, the very people she was working so hard to support and save. But her life was essentially a dangerous game where the only thing she could rely on was Angelo.

Quite simply, she loved him.

Shards of glass rained down as Genesis smashed through a window above. (Seriously, why he didn't use an already broken window was one of his rare programming glitches.) The thought of Angelo roared through Jade.

"Charlie!" she screamed. Charlie was looking upwards in frozen disbelief.

"Momaw Nadon!" Charlie screamed. He had the habit of yelling random words when stressed to the nines.

Jade grabbed him and pushed him forward, not out of harm's way, but out of the way of being crushed by the black metal monster. Genesis landed hard on the concrete with movie-level dust and debris flying all around. He didn't need to worry about his foot hurting. He was too big. Too fast. Too strong. Bullets bounced off him like hail off cobblestone. His massive arm reached for Charlie.

Jade watched in horror.

Angelo, she thought, we have failed.

Alan Frasier didn't particularly like being a cop. He joined out of boredom. It also, in all fairness, was the best job prospect he had. His dream job was to be a landscaper, but he couldn't find work and didn't have whatever "it" was you had to have to start a successful business. (Pro-tip: don't mention that your dream job is to be a landscaper to the rest of the force.) But he did his job sufficiently, never less, or more, for that matter, than was asked. However, we all have limits. He soldiered through the methed up junkie who spit in his face. The pit bull that bit him in an unfortunate place, all part of the job. But he had limits. His, apparently, was a giant robot jumping out of a building.

He panicked like the dickens (devil, not Charles), reached for his holster and shot at the giant black figure. Except he hadn't reach for his gun. While his colleagues were firing assorted fire arms with bullets that bounced off the monstrous robot, Alan had mistakenly reached for his Taser. After firing, he turned and ran away from the police force. Forever. He headed to Greener Pastures (that was the name of the landscaping company he hoped would hire him.)

Because he never looked back, Alan missed the most amazing effect of his panicked taser attack and his one in a million shot.

Genesis lunged for Charlie Richards of Topeka, Kansas (known as Subject 1184 to Genesis.) Specifically, his neck. The intention was to squeeze it with unparalleled force. It worked really well on humans.

Two electrodes with Death Star destroying precision shot through the slit on his face. Genesis's world went black. It was a one in a million shot. Outdated technology he hadn't been bothered to be protected from hit his primary orbital chip, a direct shot, and the chip sizzled and fried and died.

Very unfortunate.

Still, Genesis had twenty-two backup systems. It quickly rebooted, bypassed Ctrl+Alt+Del, and Genesis was back online. Humans surrounded it, pointing almost laughable archaic weapons that made a lot of noise. There were helicopters, the predecessor to heliocrafts, overhead. There was fire and smoke and broken glass and shouting filled the air.

However, Genesis's target, Subject 1184, was nowhere to be found.

Chapter 7

“It travels through time, Charlie.” Jade flicked her shoulder-length black hair back behind her ear. “You need to find a way to be impressed.”

“It’s just...it looks like my mom’s refrigerator.” Indeed, it did. Just a simple, rectangular box about eight-feet in height. Very unimpressive for a time travel machine. “Where do we sit?”

“We don’t sit. This is just the container for the DarkM’attr™. You’ll see.”

They were at an old, abandoned warehouse. A dilapidated sign stood out front touting the owners as Crowley Industries. The sign had swung back and forth with a small groan as they’d entered the dusty building. This was the perfect setting for the gang of Scooby Doo to investigate a murder. Charlie eyed a few metal boxes near the wall, but besides these and the silver rectangular box that Charlie still thought was a refrigerator, the warehouse was empty. The boxes had a thick layer of dust on them, obviously they hadn’t been touched in years. But strange thing was, they didn’t look like old boxes, despite the dust. Under the dust, their metal sheen glowed and the boxes themselves, well, they strangely seemed to ... move. Not the entire box, but the metal that made up the box. It just sort of shifted around. Charlie stared for a moment before hopelessly shaking his head. He had to find something to tell himself that would make this all make sense and for now, the story that worked for him was that this was a psychological experiment with doctors watching him behind tinted windows, nodding and saying “interesting” a lot. The bruises he’d received from the daring jump from the window sure felt real, but he figured the best thing was just to play this out for the joke it was.

He nodded at the rectangular DarkM’attr holder. “How does it get to eighty-eight miles per hour?”

“Just so you know, where we are going we do still have roads.” It wasn’t quite a smile, but something torqued up the corner of her mouth.

Charlie’s eyes opened wide with surprised. “You got the reference!”

“We still watch Back to the Future,” Jade muttered, turning her attention to the metal box. Apparently, it had dials on the side that needed some turning. “It’s like the way you still watch Shakespeare.”

“Good. That makes me feel better about going there.”

twisting turned to slapping. “We can’t go without Angelo.”

Charlie blinked at Jade.

“Tall robot? Red? Very polite? Saved your life?”

“Ah.” Charlie nodded. “Yes, the red robot.” Charlie’s strategy of making light of the situation to stem off insanity had been working so far. But the sadness that filled Jade’s eyes at the mention of Angelo, gave him pause. “Look, I’m sorry about your robot friend,” he murmured.

“We can’t go without him,” Jade said simply.

“Look, I know he probably maybe meant something to you but-”

Jade rolled her eyes at Charlie. “I mean, we can’t go without him. Physically. The force of the DarkM’attr will tear us apart. Angelo is designed to protect us from that.” Jade kept touching her temple and throwing her arm down in frustration. It was a rather odd gesture.

Charlie was at a loss for words. He’d gotten himself all psyched up to go to the future and now, well, now he was traveling through time one second at a time, just like normal.

Shit.

What would happen if he stayed here? His phone was blowing up with news alerts and texts. They’d made it on CNN, Fox News and Topeka Channel 5. He wasn’t exactly a fugitive, but there would be questions he didn’t have answers for. There was a good chance he was going to lose his job. And he had just started thinking about getting a place of his own.

“So, um, what do we do?” He could see she was stressed, but flapping her arm around her ear wasn’t really going to solve the problem.

“Let me think,” Jade said dismissively.

Charlie complied for at least fifty-two seconds, but then he did what he did best; asked questions. He was in the legal right to do so. A lot of weird shit had just happened. Jade answered each with quick, measured responses; she was not really in the mood. Why didn’t she just take the code back with her? There’s more work to be done. All scientific questions were met with “I’m not a scientist or a programmer. I just follow orders.” Questions of how people in her time live (eat, politics, religion, play sports), who sent Jade and who sent Genesis were all met with the same “you’ll see.” She did have an answer for the first night. “Why Genesis didn’t just find Charlie at his house and do away with him? And the kiss. The kiss they’d kind of shared had provided a DNA trace, which gave Jade positive proof he was Charlie Richards. That was kind of deflating. While good intentioned, the kiss was nothing more than a ploy.”

“Why didn’t the black robot just destroy the machine?” Charlie asked, waving towards the fridge.

“Even Genesis isn’t strong enough.” Jade continued to stare straight ahead, not looking at Charlie. She would periodically bring her fingers to her temple.

“What if I just left right now? Would you mind?”

Jade stood up and stared Charlie straight in the eyes. Charlie took a step back. Jade’s David Bowie changing eyes were black and cold as ice. “Charlie, you aren’t going anywhere except with me.” Charlie gulped. “Now stop asking so many questions.”

Boards and metal rained down. Jade threw Charlie to the ground and covered him as debris showered onto her. When the debris settled, the reality only got worse. Genesis loomed above them.

The long day just got longer. Genesis’s massive arm swung through the air, clocking Jade upside the head. She flew a record breaking long jump distance in the air before plummeting down and crashing hard into the cracked concrete of the warehouse floor.

Charlie flinched. That’s gotta hurt. Blood streamed from the left side of Jade’s face where it had skidded along the jagged cement floor. Charlie peered closer.

What the hell?

The blood was flowing out the deep gash of her cheek and Charlie thought he could see down into the bone, only...as he leaned closer he saw, her bone wasn’t white like, well, like a normal human. The bone that structured her high cheeks and dangerously good looks wasn’t bone at all, it was some type of bright, shining metal.

She was some kind of robot, too.

Charlie lurched back, his hand slamming into the unforgiving, cold metal foot of Genesis. The killer black bot leaned forward, its hand outstretched, ready to grasp Charlie’s neck.

In seconds, this was going to be over. Charlie’s gaze darted to Jade, he wasn’t even going to be able to say goodbye to her, or anyone.

He squeezed his eyes shut, trying to drown out the sound of Alex from Jeopardy saying “Being choked in half a second by a killer robot from the future.”

What is the death of Charlie Richards? Charlie’s brain screamed at him.

But he couldn’t die right now, right? Hadn’t Jade said he was going to invent the future? Didn’t they need him? Or did they just need the code? What was it she had said?

And, suddenly, Charlie realized, he wasn’t being choked by the killer bot from the future. He opened one eye just in time to see a flash of a MagnoMetal-based fist thunder through the air and crash against Genesis’s face.

“Angelo!” Charlie screamed, never feeling more grateful to see anyone or anything in his entire life. “Jade!” he yelled at the woman who until this moment had been still. “He’s back! Angelo’s back!”

Jade stirred slowly, very, very slowly. Angelo was pretty beat up. He was missing an arm and a leg, but somehow, he had mastered balancing on a single leg and even developed some killer maneuvers. Having gotten Genesis’s attention with a swift punch to the head, he now crouched like a loaded coil of bright red fire. Genesis didn’t gauge the trap. As he accelerated against the polite yet deadly red bot, Angelo sprung into the air achieving impossible heights as he reached the beams of the warehouse ceiling. Genesis jumped too, but he was weighed down by his appendages and missed grasping Angelo’s foot by a fraction of an inch before gravity yanked him back to earth.

Jade, bloody and bruised, stumbled to her feet, holding up a small black box. Shooting from it was a red beam. When Genesis hit the beam, it was like he hit a wall; a wall that also pushed back. He shot across the dusty floor of the warehouse.

Angelo released from the ceiling and landed in perfect position right next to Jade. “Good to have you back, Angelo,” she said.

Angelo bowed, B-grade graceful, but he was forgiven seeing as he only had one leg. “The pleasure is most certainly mine.”

Genesis rose to his feet, pissed. Robots get mad, too (also the title of a country song in the 24th century.) His black armor pulsated. A rumble came from components inside him, sounding like a growl. Holes opened all over his chest and blue flakes of light shot out like bullets. Pop, pop, pop, pop, pop. The puffs of blue light shot through the warehouse to each corner. When they hit Angelo and Jade, the two of them seized up. It was like how people recounted being abducted by aliens, their chests stuck out, arms go limp and they are incapacitated. That was exactly what happened to Angelo and Jade right then.

Nothing happened to Charlie.

He frowned at Jade and Angelo. It must be their technology; technology Charlie didn’t have. Charlie took a deep breath and did what was best for all parties involved; he ran.

He made the door in world record Charlie time. This was going nowhere. He may be needed in the future, but he knew there was no future for him if he died. Period. And he still had a lot of living to do. There were games to be played with his nephew, a job to get fired from, a girl to not notice him, a bridge code to finishing building. Lots and lots of living to do.

He slowed down.

None of which sounded very appealing or as urgent as the problem in front of him right now.

He turned to face the warehouse and considered his options, his face shrouded in the blue light Genesis emitted. Genesis was approaching and he had one mission: to kill Charlie. Genesis would certainly be on the FBI’s most wanted list, but Charlie doubted he was going into hiding (glasses and a fake mustache probably wouldn’t make Genesis inconspicuous anyway.) But Charlie hadn’t seen anything that could stop him.

Still, what could he do? Besides the only thing he was good at. Charlie dropped to the ground and whipped out his laptop, still miraculously unbroken from today’s events. The advanced technology he was dealing with was surely well beyond his grasp, but outdated tricks can sometimes lead to surprising results.

The blue light had poured over Jade and Angelo and froze them in time. Whatever its technology was, it wasn’t a light Charlie cared to bask in. Genesis locked on Charlie. He advanced, ready for a kill.

Sweat poured from Charlie. His eyes bulged in fear as Genesis approached. He typed away frantically. He was into the Genesis content file. Genesis’s code poured in front of him with a complexity the likes the world had ever seen. Charlie didn’t always know how to build the best code, but he did know how to mess it up. He had been responsible for cleaning up a disgruntled ex-employee's last act of sabotage. Erase some database records, change some global variables, and you have an unstable system. However, since this programing was much more advanced, it wasn't quite as easy to locate such things. But thankfully, it was easier than that. An old trick the most basic of programmers could have solved. Simply add @echo off\Programs\virus.bat into the code and voila! This futuristic programming was so evolved they had moved on from worrying about such simple tricks.

Suddenly, the blue in the room dissipated and the warm light returned.

Charlie let out a victorious squeal.

"Ha! Take that!" Though, there wasn't much to take. It didn't slow down old Genesis in the slightest. He sprinted at Charlie, who had no time to react, fists joined and raised like an opalium sledgehammer. It rained destruction down on Charlie Richards.

Except, Charlie wasn't there. Jade, in a streak of unbelievable speed, had tackled Charlie out of the way just in time. Left behind was a five-foot-deep hole and a whole lot of dirt in the air.

Genesis turned to Jade and Charlie who lay on the ground mere feet away. Charlie grabbed his laptop and went back to work. As Genesis approached he suddenly veered to the left. Then more left. Then more. Until he completed a perfect circle.

"Ha!" Charlie cried.

Genesis continued left. Again, going around in a circle. The way to attack a computer in the 21st century was to make it go around and around in its code, create a hopeless cycle that it can't break free from. Apparently, this was still going to be the case in three hundred years.

Jade gave Charlie a brief nod. "Good work."

Angelo landed before Jade and Charlie, hard but perfectly balanced on his one leg, his single arm held forward. He bowed as Genesis circled around to face Angelo.

"Good to..." Angelo began. Genesis went around. "See you..." Genesis went around. "Again." Around. "Good sir."

As Genesis went around one last time Angelo's upper half began swirling around in a blazing tornado. Genesis came by and Angelo's fist struck Genesis with a huge clash. Part of Genesis's face dented slightly.

"No," Jade cried. "We gotta go."

Angelo crashed into Genesis with 328.854468 metric tons of pressure (max calibration in case Angelo ever needed to make a diamond.) Like a football punted by a mid-level NFL punter, Angelo flew into the air 47 meters, crashing through the side of the warehouse and out into the world beyond.

Angelo, for his part, was just north of being a scrap of sheet metal. His face was virtually flattened, he had one limb and it was a badly damaged leg, and wires sparked out of his stomach. Still, he crawled towards Charlie and Jade.

Jade could have cried seeing Angelo. But there wasn't time. There was a mission to fulfill.

Genesis would be back. They were needed back in the present (her present.) Jade and Charlie ran for the machine. Jade grabbed hold of a piece of dirt by the time travel fridge and lifted. The hatch flung back revealing a large, sterile white underground room. Two silver circles on rods outlined the room, slowly moving in opposite directions.

“See!” cried Charlie. “I knew there was more to it.”

Jade put her eyes up to a scanner on the DarkM’attr container. Below, the silver circles began to spin. Faster and faster.

Angelo crawled closer and closer. “I dare say, my Jade, I am ready to go home.”

Jade smiled at Angelo. “Me too, Angelo.”

Faster and faster the wheels spun. Energy filled the white room below, a white sheet of power spread across the room. Angelo began to glow, white as an angel. The white light from Angelo covered Jade and Charlie. Genesis lunged at the figures but he found nothing but air as Charlie, Jade and Angelo fell into the machine below and into the future.

Chapter 8

Blake Crowley - the pioneer in hybrid technology, the C.E.O. of C.I.A. (Crowley Innovativeness Acquisitions), the city founder - sat in a Telpher-skinned chair (quite rare, very expensive) watching a plethora of monitors. One would not guess that he was pushing seventy, due to a full black beard, strong jaw line and access to the best ageless drugs and cosmetics a man could buy.

Behind him, military orders were being shouted in the background; officers barked, scientists pleaded, Warren (we'll get to him in a minute) shouted at someone. Throughout the control center buzzed humans, hybrids and bots in frantic importance. The wall in front of Blake was covered with hundreds of monitors, showing every nook and cranny of the city of Crowley.

Blake crossed to the huge windows overlooked the bustling capital. Blake- controlled drone ProtectoBots raced around the air, watching the citizens below. (Humans and hybrids were allowed citizenship. Bots had to earn theirs, but since bots did whatever programmed to do... it never happened.) The drone PB's came in and out of the large man-made electric clouds covered the sky. The ominous dark clouds sparked by angry electric currents matched Blake's mood just perfectly.

Jade had been gone for an entire day. The scientists with their science had said they'd be gone no more than a few hours. Things were not looking good. Blake looked at Warren Relic and frowned. Warren was an impeccably dressed fellow with narrow cheeks and a slick air of power and ruthlessness. This was Blake's right-hand man (if you want titles, there are lots of C's for Chief: COO, COS, CAO, etc.) Warren didn't look worried at all. He was flanked by his PB Genesis, a black opalum bot. Blake looked at Genesis closely; something was off. The eye slit was slightly narrower.

Warren didn't look worried, and that worried Blake. He pushed the thought aside. There was a lot on his plate. A plague haunted his hybrids, the Lowsmiths (rebel human forces that weren't a fan of Blake or his company) kept invading the south walls, and Jade, a major player in his corporation/government and an expert at taking care of things Blake didn't want to, was lost in time. He didn't have time to start being paranoid about Warren.

A young nervous-twitching twenty-something marketing kid came up to Blake. "Sir," he said, "I have the latest copy you requested."

Blake took the marketing pamphlet and looked it over. They had a huge marketing campaign focused on converting the Lowsmiths to his side and avoiding an all-out war (note: he was going to go to war with them no matter what.) It was something to keep his mind off all the problems. He was just too rich to have so many problems. Life was unfair.

He read:

“Hope. Sanctity. Mechanical organs. A chance at a hybrid life with near immortality. All is possible in the city of Crowley. Its doors are open to any (please see rules, regulations, and fee structure below to qualify.) Come be part of our city. Our family.”

Blake looked up at the kid and nodded. “Not a bad start”. Blake read on.

“The age-old question of who the most important figure in human history was, or is, has led to age-old arguments. It has spawned wars, bar-fights, and pipe pointing in fancy libraries. It has beleaguered religions, historians, scholars and philosophers. In consideration were Gods, inventors of online commerce, the founder of the United Sea Nations, the discoverer of pain elimination medicine; the list goes on. But they are not in the same league as the one man who ends this argument for good: Blake Crowley.”

Explosions boomed through the control room. On one of the monitors, the South Wall had collapsed and Lowsmiths were filtering in. They were quickly met by a bot army and...dealt with. This was par for the course over the last few weeks.

Blake ignored it and finished the pamphlet.

“Blake Crowley - the man patented the code linking the languages of genetics and computers, creating the Hybrid technology enabled us to live on when the human body fails. He is the man who gave humanity hope. Blake Crowley – the man built this utopia of Crowley; a vast, beautiful city where humans and hybrids live together in peace. Best of all, the city is open to you. We are here to say, ‘Come in! Come in! Come to the majestic city of Crowley and its hope, sanctity, mechanical organs and hybrid life. Together we will live on for centuries in paradise.’”

Blake lowered the pamphlet. His eyes bored deeper into Mr. Marketing Guy’s soul. “This is a first draft, right? Tell me this is a first draft?”

“Um, actually, it’s the fourteenth. We tried to incorporate all your notes...”

“You didn’t even mention my impressive bot collection! You buried the lead!”

“I’m sorry, sir! We of course can do a fifteenth draft and really spice it up. you got it, an army of bots!”

“No, no, no. Don’t say army. I’m trying to defuse a situation, not incite a war!”

“I’m just not sure if this will get the Lowsmiths – it’s just, they don’t want to be hybrids.”

“That’s why we need to appeal to their intelligence,” Blake said. “They have a place here. We just need them to see it. They need to know a human did all this.” He gazed proudly out at the city. “If I can just get them on board, this whole rebel nonsense can stop.” The marketing kid looked at him blankly. “Never mind, you wouldn’t understand. Go on get out of here.”

The boy nodded and quickly scampered off, apparently happy to be out of the situation. Most of Blake's conversation ended this way, a fleeing scamper and the thrill to be gone.

Warren Relic made his way to Blake, his crisp patent boots clipping out a rapid pace on the metal floor. His P.B., Genesis, a sign of wealth, power and status even beyond the types of shoes one wore, followed behind.

"Sir," he addressed Blake. "We have a problem."

Blake's shoulders dropped. He had had it with problems. So many problems, lately. He was too rich to have so many problems.

A high-pitched scream echoed through the massive control room. One of Blake's hybrid workers who had been studying the monitors that covered the southeast outer walls, fell forward, landing on his knees, his hands clutching his head. All the humans and hybrids stood stock still, watching. Only the bots carried on with their work, happy and oblivious. Blake eyes narrowed. He didn't know the worker, but he knew the symptoms.

"Shit," he muttered, seeing the hybrid's eyes clearly, even at this reasonable distance. The symptom was there, staring back at him. The pupils and whites of the hybrid's eyes were melted away and only flashes of electrical current remained.

The hybrid suddenly lurched to his feet, twisting manically around before his gaze zeroed in on Blake. Blake didn't flinch. He knew exactly what was going to happen next. The screaming hybrid charged at breakneck speed towards Blake, but Blake planted his feet in the ground. He wasn't going to move. He didn't have to.

A flash of light filled the control room and he went motionless. The hybrid worker fell to the floor with a thud. Within moments two MediBots were there to cart the hybrid onto a steel table and take him away for urgent care and maintenance.

Blake turned to Warren. "My office, now," Blake clipped the words out.

Blake's office was elaborately decorated in a vintage 21st century style. It was the century of rapid technological growth that had created the foundation of his business, so he always had held a strong affinity towards it. A retro personal computer sat underneath his desk. On a cabinet near the wall what was known as an iPad played the melodic guitar riffs of a band named Muse. Blake went behind his desk and turned to Warren.

"The third time," Blake's voice was low, which was more dangerous than when he was yelling. Warren wasn't a naturally nervous man, but this tone always put him on edge. He folded his arms across his chest, gripping his biceps, making sure he remembered how strong he was. "The third time this week, Warren."

"We are working on it, sir."

Blake pointed to a monitor that was showing feeds from around the city. "And what is with all the trash again, Warren? I thought we solved this?" At first glance, the city of Crowley looked pristine, but the truth was in the smaller side streets, where random bits of metals and papers and waste was beginning to pile.

“The SBs are on the fritz again.”

Blake let out an exasperated sigh. The SB Warren was referring to the SaniBots, one of four classifications of bots legally allowed in Crowley. “I thought we had a backup plan for this. You had me buy all those 23rd century garbage trucks for a reason.”

“Yes, but finding humans to run them has not been easy.”

Blake eyed Warren. He knew what he was referring to. The Lowsmiths were turning more and more humans against his people. What mess. The problem is, Blake knew what Warren wanted to do about that. “We are not to that point, yet.”

Warren stepped forward. “Any human that is currently inside our city could be saved. We wouldn’t be wiping them out.”

Blake shook his head.

Warren stepped back. “Okay, I could just have Deltas do it.”

Blake shook his head even harder. “Don’t be ridiculous. We won’t stoop that low.” The Deltas may be the working class of hybrid’s, but they were still hybrids. He wouldn’t see his beloved race start picking up trash. “Just get the SBs fixed.”

Before Warren could answer, a hologram of a conservatively dressed male assistant appeared in the corner of the room. The entire group turned to look at it, but he addressed only Blake. “Sir. Message.” The hologram quickly disappeared.

“Not now,” Blake protested. He held a finger to his temple and the message appeared in front of Blake. As he read, he eyes went dark and dangerous. The message was not good news.

Blake turned back to Warren. “But back to the most pressing matter at hand. This plague infecting the Deltas. Hybrid technology is the centerpiece of this empire. They make up sixty-five percent of our population.” Blake motioned at the opalum bots standing guard, both his and Warren’s. “What do you think pays for your big-ticket bot standing outside this door?”

“I know the business we are in.” Warren remained void of emotion, more robotic than a bot.

“What happens if Jade doesn’t return with Charlie?”

“We will have a solution.” Warren’s voice was even and cold.

Blake ran his fingers through his hair. Becoming a hybrid was how the wealthy lived on for hundreds of years. It was the most profitable business in the known universe, and Blake controlled it.

“You better,” Blake said. “We’ve managed to keep reports of this virus to the ‘this really isn’t that big of a deal’ level. But if what just happened in that control room starts happening on a bigger scale, it will destroy everything I’ve built.”

We, thought Warren bitterly. We built. No one ever gave credit to the man behind the scenes, the one who kept the whole thing going even before they knew exactly what the whole thing was. It was Warren who should be running things. “Of course, sir.” Warren gave a slight nod and headed for the door. “Your bidding will be done.”

Blake's residence was on the one-hundred-eighty-first floor of the Crowley Tower, catching the dying rays of the sun daily as they faded behind Apex Hill. The red mountains were cast in a deeper shade of scarlet as light faded from the utopian walled city. Lights of the drone PBs hovered above the city walls, working to protect the perimeter. With the Lowsmiths being so bothersome lately, Blake had ordered an increase in security.

Blake's penthouse was white on white on white, with sharp white lights making the massive open space feel like a blank canvas. It helped Blake think. He stood in the quiet kitchen pouring himself a white wine. He used to hate the stuff, but Robin loved it and now, well, now he found himself having a few glasses every night. It was quiet. He had hoped it wouldn't have been so. He had hoped he would have been greeted with a human hello. He had hoped. A tall skinny ServBot on treadmill wheels swept into the open kitchen and took Blake's coat and shoes. It scooted away with nary a peep. As Blake approached the living room, a hologram of a pretty young lady popped up.

"Hello, Mr. Crowley. What would you like to do this evening? May I suggest some entertainment and dining for you and the missus?"

"Go away, Mira" Blake said bluntly.

"Certainly, sir." The hologram disappeared promptly.

"Actually, I'll take another glass of the Corsica wine," he said.

"Certainly, sir." Mira reappeared and signaled to the ServBot who quickly went to a cabinet and poured the drink. One small ice cube, as was his custom.

"And, Mira," Blake called. "Play some classical alt-rock."

"My pleasure!"

Music filled the room. It was a song from the late 20th century, called Ordinary World. That was a rather boring thought. An ordinary world? What would the point be? He still couldn't believe they had tried to send Jade back into the past. It's a shame it appeared to have failed. He liked Jade, but more importantly he could have made so much more money had it worked.

Blake collapsed into his Telfair couch as the ServBot brought him his wine. Blake held a finger to his temple and the wall in front of him transformed. On it now was another room, all in white. An old analogue clock was all that hung on the wall; an antique she cherished. White nursing MediBots sped around ushering medical supplies. Lying on the bed in the middle of the room was Robin.

Blake spoke. "Robin? I'm here Robin."

Robin's hand twitched. It was a sign she knew he was there. He and his wife built this empire. They defeated death. They were this city. They would not be defeated by some plague to the hybrids they created. The hybrid Robin was.

Blake, alone in his penthouse, began to silently cry. "It's alright, Robin." His voice was strained, dry. It held his heart. "Help is coming. I can feel it."

On cue, an urgent message came onto screen. Blake touched his temple again and the room where Robin lied vanished, replaced by the cold features of Warren Relic in the control room.

“This had better be important, Warren.” Blake sat up as he said it.

“It is.” Warren’s emotion never wavered.

“Tell me it’s good news.”

Warren nodded. “It is. Jade, she’s back. And she has company.”

Warren drank the rest of his wine in one big gulp. Considering Corsica wine costs as much as most houses, it’s not recommended you drink it in one gulp, but times dictated it needed to be done.

Jade was back. There was work to be done.

Chapter 9

Three bloody, bruised and damaged bodies fell from the center of spinning metallic circles onto a concrete floor. Charlie grasped his back in pain as he landed.

“Ahhhhhowww,” he cried. “Why did they put this so far off the ground?!”

Jade simply shrugged.

“Greetings!” The deep voice echoed through the sparse concrete room.

Collectively, the three figures’ five eyes (Angelo was short one) swiveled in the direction of the booming voice. A giant holograph of Blake Crowley’s head floated in the cavernous space as the speakers blared his voice. “Charlie Richards! In the flesh!” Blake wore a charismatic smile to end all charismatic smiles. “Your reputation precedes you. I assure you, you will be treated like a king among men while staying in my kingdom, so to speak. I mean this isn’t really a kingdom, though you probably don’t know much about this time period. But we, we know a lot about you.”

Charlie nodded dumbly. “Thanks.” Holy shit, he was in the future!

Blake turned his attention to Jade. She was one beat up woman, but Blake had seen her through worse. “Jade, would you be so kind to escort our guest to see me.”

Jade motioned over at Angelo. “I need to stop by the Pavilion first.”

A smile remained plastered on Blake’s face, but underneath it was something unpleasant. “Jade, surely you understand, there are more important issues to attend to first.”

Jade was about to say something, then nodded. Charlie glanced at her. In the short time that Charlie had known Jade thus far, he had concluded that she was not one to take to being told what to do. This guy Blake was obviously quite a big deal. Pretty hard to guess considering this entire city is named after him.

Blake’s gaze returned to Charlie. He smiled and nodded, “See you soon, Admiral Richards.” The transmission cut out.

Charlie puffed up with pride. “I’m an Admiral!”

Jade rolled her eyes. “Don’t let it go to your head. Just trying to impress you.”

“So, who is he? What’s his deal?”

The broad white wall to their left slid open to reveal a platoon of red and white ProtectoBots. They parted as the wall opened and through the gap stepped a tall man wearing a tight black uniform like Jade's. His face was grim as he offered a slight bow to the group. "I am here to see you make your next appointment."

Jade sighed. This was Monfils. Blake sending Monfils was not a good sign. It said "I trust you Jade, but I don't trust you." She didn't want Blake getting paranoid. Especially since she had literally just travelled through time to do his bidding. Still, she nodded respectfully back. You don't want to get on Monfils's bad side.

Jade motioned to Charlie to follow. "I'll tell you on the way."

"Mr. Monfils." Angelo bowed as best he could on one leg. "You look as deadly as ever, good sir."

Monfils laughed. "I know I do, Angelo."

"Where are the Lowsmiths?" Jade asked Monfils.

Monfils shrugged. "Scavenging outside the walls like usual, is my guess."

"It's just, when we left, they were overtaking the city."

"Pft." Monfils waved at a hand at that. "No Lowsmiths can overtake this great city of ours. We beat them back handily soon after you left."

Jade nodded. She didn't share in his confidence. She had seen the truth of things, and they had been close to breaking through.

The group stepped onto a patio overlooking the city of Crowley. Charlie's mouth went agape at the city of the future. "Jade?" he asked cautiously.

"Yes, Charlie?"

"I've a feeling we're not in Kansas anymore."

"Wizard of Oz?"

Charlie looked at her, impressed. "Good pull. If there is ever a time to use that line in life, this would be it."

Charlie had returned, not to the state of Kansas, but to a state he felt comfortable in nonetheless: disbelief. This place was only recognizable by the surrounding red mountains, the Luxor Pyramid and Caesar's Palace (renamed Crowley's Palace, but he recognized the building.) He knew where he was. "Are we in Vegas?"

Jade smiled. "It used to be."

Charlie looked out over futuristic Vegas approvingly. When Charlie had won his free trip to the Grand Canyon, he got to spend a day in Vegas. He lost three hands in blackjack, went to a club because they told him he was a V.I.P., stood in a corner awkwardly for ten minutes and left, then went to his hotel room and read some Carl Sagan. The Grand Canyon was much better. But the city had changed, as one might suspect to happen over centuries. The city skyline was a series of glass buildings (he assumed it was glass, but wasn't technically correct) towered high into the sky. The sky – something was off. He couldn't put his finger on it at first, but it didn't feel real. Finally, he realized it was because the clouds weren't real. They looked convincing, but when he saw hatches open and drones coming and going from inside, he took a closer look. The clouds were a collection of white receptor panels.

Charlie felt a shove from behind and spun to look.

“Please, sir,” Monfils said, waving his hand like he was scooting a dog along. “I imagine you must need time to soak this in, but time is short.” The push and words in themselves were not threatening, but all the same, it was a clear Monfils expected Charlie to pay heed. Charlie caught Jade’s eye. She gave him a slight nod. It said, it was best to listen.

Monfils was joined by his two PB’s, Felix 1 and Felix 2 (no relation.) The group made their way to a platform of the ConleyTransit (VIP line, no waiting). Angelo hopped on one leg. Monfils wanted Felix 2 to carry Angelo, afraid he would slow them down.

“Good sir,” Angelo said politely. “If they touch me, I will have to destroy them quickly and effortlessly.”

Monfils looked at Angelo, then at Jade.

Jade nodded. “Pick your battles wisely, Monfils.”

Monfils dropped the subject. And, as beat up and broken Angelo was, he did not slow them down one bit.

On the platform, a small yellow pod awaited. It was attached to overhead tracks that ran throughout the city. They all got in, and went for a ride through the town.

Charlie had 348 questions off the top of his head, and another several thousand off the bottom. But he recognized the situation for what it was. The man who he had seen when they first arrived was who summoned him, and he wanted Charlie fast. All he knew was that his code played a role in this, and they needed Charlie. He liked it better when he thought he was needed, but not actually needed. Charlie’s breathing shortened as he remembered he was sent here to save the world.

“Who was the guy who summoned us?” Charlie asked.

Jade shot a quick look at Monfils, confirming they were on shaky ground to reveal too much. “We are in the city of Crowley. The guy talking was Blake Crowley, which kinda says it all on how powerful a man he is. And he’s my boss. And he made his trillions off the code in your notebook.”

Charlie slowly nodded. “Do I get any royalties, at least?”

“I’m not going to tell you your future. I will say, your brilliance was, unfortunately, not realized until well after you were gone. I will give you some good news.”

“Yes, please.”

“You do eventually move out of your mom’s house.” Jade gave Charlie a small smile.

Charlie wasn’t sure to be embarrassed or happy, so he changed the subject.

“The clouds. What’s their purpose?”

“To be a beautiful beacon of hope that blends technology and nature.” Jade said it with a rehearsed cadence.

“Oh, come now.”

“Just reciting the pitch. It’s what powers the world. Not only does it give us wireless power, it’s what powers 42% of the world. Crowley controls more power, literally and figuratively, than any other corporation.”

They turned on to what was once upon a time, in the 21st century, known as The Strip. It was now called The Crowley Strip. Not that creative, if you asked Charlie. Where once mammoth casinos stood now sat even more mammoth not-glass buildings. On the outside of the buildings, nanobots raced around their windows. At the end of Crowley Strip, there was one building that rose above the rest. Written across it, in fabulous black opal letters, was the name “Crowley.”

“I’m just wondering,” Charlie mused. “You think this Crowley guy has an ego?”

Jade laughed. Charlie was glad for this, he wasn’t sure how humor translated to the future. Monfils, however, did not laugh. In fact, a scowl was presented.

Below them on the streets Charlie watched the figures come and go. Some were robots, some were people, and they seemed to move effortlessly between each other. “So, there are humans living here and robots? And hybrids? Sounds complicated.”

Jade shrugged. “I suppose so. Yes, it is.”

“Who outranks whom?”

“It’s complicated.” Jade paused a moment before continuing. “Crowley is the only predominantly hybrid city in the world. To the east, are all-human cities. To the west are robot cities controlled by the man we are going to see. But Mr. Crowley is rapidly expanding hybrid technology worldwide as, obviously, there is a market for extending your lifespan. Which is why this plague is not good news for his bottom line. Not to mention our lives.”

“And all the hybrids are being infected with a virus in their code.” Charlie left that as a statement, not a question. He knew why he was here.

“No.”

Or maybe he didn’t.

“There are two types of hybrids,” Jade continued. “Gammas, the leading class of hybrids. They are hybrids that have been mechanized but keep their brain clean and intact. There is only a select class of Gammas.”

“If that’s the leading class, then why aren’t more hybrids Gammas?”

Monfils looked up at Jade. This questioning was walking on thin ice. Still, Monfils knew that Charlie needed to know what he needed to know to fix the issue. Plus, Blake was surely listening and would stop it if need be. He had eyes and ears everywhere.

Jade did indeed know this, and not being stopped, continued. “The approval process to be a Gamma is...very stringent. The rest of us are Deltas. We are various levels of percentage human-to-machine but what we have in common is that our neurosystems are mechanized. This, generally, is a requirement to become a hybrid.”

Charlie nodded in understanding. “And that’s the code being affected?”

“Yes. Just some of us, so far. But it is spreading.”

“Are there humans here?”

“Yes. Bots have taken most of the duties in the city. There are four legal categories of bots. The PB’s, ProtectoBots. All personal protection and city protection.” Jade waved at the three bots in the pod with them as an example. “There are ServBots you will find meet all your service needs. Repairs, waiters, sex, you name it.” Jade looked at Charlie at the last example but he didn’t react. “There are SaniBots for all cleaning. And MediBots for health. All are patented by Crowley.”

“Is anyone purely human here?”

“Besides you?”

Charlie nodded apprehensively.

“Yes,” Jade confirmed. “The city has six boroughs. One of those, Trenchtown, is where the humans live. There are many jobs that still require humans to perform, and that are below the class of Deltas to do.”

Jade’s voice sounded even, but Charlie picked up on resentment when she said it.

Monfils shifted uncomfortably. “For now, anyway.” His voice was full of anger. “We are working on that.”

Charlie took Monfils’s tone to mean this discussion was over. He was a genius after all, or so they say, so he could at least read that correctly. He looked out the window of the passing city. Between the buildings, Charlie could see to the vast edges of the city. Everything looked pristine and upscale. Police PBs walked the streets bringing a feeling of safety. At the edges of town arose a colossal metallic wall. Above it, the drone PBs shined down their lights just beyond the wall. The entire wall glowed a faint blue light, as if powered in some way. The city had obviously gone to great lengths to keep someone out.

Charlie couldn’t help but say as much. “Who’s the big bad wolf beyond those walls?”

Jade moved to answer but was cut off by Monfils. “Some people, Mr. Richards, can’t accept progress.”

Jade smirked. “You mean, can’t afford it.”

“I mean,” Monfils said with a sneer, “they not only don’t accept it, but they want to stop it. And you, Jadyne, should know better than anyone how important progress is.”

Monfils’s and Jade’s eyes met each other with force. Tensions were high. Angelo seemed to sense this too and was crouching slightly.

Finally, it was Charlie who relieved the situation. “What’s the pizza situation in this century? What’s popular?”

Monfils continued to stare at Jade for a moment, before finally breaking eye contact. “Pepperoni,” he said, relaxing slightly. “You’re right, not all progress is needed.”

Monfils was a hybrid. His father, Simon, was a first-generation hybrid. His father was beyond reproach. He fought in the Pacific Wars and was a decorated hero. A lot of ornaments on that man's tree. He was injured badly, critically, and what was then new technology saved his father's life. Progress. Progress should always progress.

Thanks to progress, his father was still alive and could expect to live on another hundred years or so. Thanks to hybrid technology, he had his father. Thanks to hybrid technology, his father, whom had invested heavily in the industry and Crowley Enterprises, was rich and, by extension, so was Monfils.

He was fine with pure humans (he used to be one.) They lived in this city beside hybrids and bots. Though inferior, it wasn't their fault. Most strived to make enough money and/or influence to become a hybrid, for it to even be a possibility, and that helped make the city run smoother. Motivation.

Yes, there were those, outside those walls, who aimed to destroy progress; the Lowsmiths. The human rebels' pathetic excuse as to why they revolted was hybrid technology should be available to everyone, not just the rich.

Because that's how the world has ever worked.

Sure, there was a bit of an issue right now with some hybrids getting sick, going insane, or both. But progress always had such problems, and progress always makes it through to the other side.

He just hoped this human in front of him was the one they could count on. Before the Lowsmiths broke into the city and tried to ruin everything.

On cue, the electroshield on the southeast wall went down.

"Quickly, let's go." Monfils moved the group along as he looked back at the southeast perimeter. The wall would still hold without the electroshield. Probably. Still, these attacks were increasing. Warren Relic, who oversaw defense and was his father Simon's direct supervisor (and his indirect,) wouldn't be bested by any Lowsmiths.

Still, this wasn't progress.

"We are stopping here." Jade said it strongly, ready for a fight.

"We are going to see Blake immediately," Monfils shot back. "Orders."

Jade turned aggressively towards Monfils. "We are stopping here. Angelo needs help." Monfils met her gaze.

Jade's expression softened. "Besides, it's a short walk to headquarters after."

Monfils looked at her a good long moment. "Fine. But make it quick."

The pod opened and they stepped out onto the platform. Charlie looked up at the sign: Richards's Circle. Reality continued to be unreal. Richards's Circle.

The group walked down the street towards the circle and the surreal nature of the universe kept getting more surreal. They walked past towers of glass buildings. It began with a few people leaning out windows. Then a few people came down to the street. Then some followed, with awed whispers. They were looking at Charlie.

Charlie was not a fan of this attention. He just didn't quite understand it. He became very self-conscious of his clothes. It must be what they were laughing at, his 21st century wardrobe. Guess he stuck out rather poorly to have all these people come down to the street and gawk so.

But then he heard an "It's him." And then, "Is that Charlie Richards?" He remembered what Jade had said. In the future, he was a hero. He was a revolutionary thinker. He was a god.

Charlie Richards put his shoulder up and walked with more confidence than he ever had before. He walked liked a god (for the record, Jade gave a significant eye roll at this, but luckily for Charlie he didn't notice.)

If Charlie had reason to have his ego inflated, he hadn't seen nothin' yet. When he rounded the Sinatra Tower, which opened to Richards Square, his ego blew up to almost the size of the city. There stood Charlie looking at Charlie, or rather a thirty-foot statue of his likeness. At least, there were similar traits, but this Charlie was one handsome devil. He lost some weight, pumped some iron, and his hair went from shabby to flowing. In his hands, he held a scroll of code, Charlie's Code, and on his face a giant smile. The code was wrong, but beyond this it was a very nice statue.

By now, a substantial crowd had formed and chants of Charlie! Charlie! echoed through the square. Charlie drank it in like a draft of Amstel Light.

Jade turned to Charlie. "I'll be back in a minute. Stay by Monfils. He's a bastard but he'll take care of you."

Monfils nodded at Charlie, confirming. Jade left with Angelo towards the Pavilion. The medical center for bots and hybrids was behind Charlie's statue. It was impressive, an entire city block. As Jade and Angelo reached the front of it, MediBots came to Angelo's side to help him in to see the "doctor." But Angelo shrugged them aside. Angelo, PB of Jadyne, was going in on his own one foot.

Charlie noticed another building in the square that caught his attention. The Hybrid Technology Museum of Technology (terrible name.) Charlie crossed to its windows and starred inside. Inside he saw his image and work everywhere. There were the inside of hybrids and how the technology was making a better place. There was even a picture of Nate, who apparently provided Charlie with help on the code at some point he hadn't gotten to in his present day. A young kid with his mother was looking at a hologram of Charlie writing his famous code. The kid turned to see the real Charlie standing at the window. Then he turned back to the hologram. Then back to look at the real Charlie.

Then he freaked the fuck out.

Charlie stepped back, both amused and overwhelmed.

Unfortunately, things were about to take a turn for the worse.

Chapter 10

With a rebel yell, thousands of the red-shirted humans, flooded into the city. All the drone PBs in the sky made a beeline for the breached wall. They numbered in the thousands, like a globular cluster of stars. The clouds themselves began to shift direction, moving towards the breach.

The skies opened and destruction rained down upon the Lowsmiths. The drone PBs fired HEL (high energy lasers) through the masses. The clouds hatches opened and streams of black ShinobiBots darted to the ground in front of the Lowsmiths offering their deadly defenses.

Hundreds of Lowsmiths died in minutes. But they weren't done for yet. Not by half. Lowsmith ballads were written about this day. The day that would be known as The Eruption was in fact the first day of what would come to be known as Trekon's Revolt.

Charlie Richards, of Topeka, Kansas in the 21st century, knew nothing of the political reasons why any of this was happening. All he knew was he came to a future that was in the middle of the war. He didn't want to be in the middle of the war. He liked being at the ends of things, like the end of long days, the end of several brews, or the end of the rankings in at Bandicoot SmartTech.

"Get behind me." The ruffled voice of Monfils floated down to Charlie. He stared intently at the battle scene before him. They were a good distance off, a few miles, but Charlie wasn't well versed in the technology of the age yet. They probably had inventions to wipe out planets by now, considering the rate they were going even back in the 21st century.

Monfils turned to look again at Charlie, this time with more intent. "I said, get behind me. I may not be as smitten with your legacy as most, but you may be the man we need to save our race. As such, I have no intention of letting you die."

"I appreciate that. Please, let me buy you a beer when this is over." Charlie stopped himself before Monfils rolled his eyes.

The biggest indication of how big an issue the battle was, was how citizens were reacting. It wasn't good, as many were panicked. That said, they didn't run around in fear, they ran around in preparation. Bots had shown up and were handing out weapons of some sort. Charlie cursed at Jade's timing to leave his side. He couldn't trust anyone in this world, including Jade, but still she was the closest shot at it.

As more bots filled the streets and with the citizens moved towards the battle scene, Monfils and Charlie stayed back. Monfils said it was because Charlie was too important to risk, but didn't seem thrilled at not fighting. Above them, there were no drone PBs to be seen. Everything was engaged in the battle on the south wall. Monfils needed to get Charlie to Crowley tower. He looked around, figuring out the best course of action.

Charlie took the moment to also check his surroundings. Things had been chaotic, to say the least, and he was still processing. To the east, a large pristine river cut through the city, an unnaturally bright shade of turquoise. Fish and sea life of all sorts could be seen underneath, but they didn't act quite natural. They swam faster than they should, were bigger and stronger. Perhaps his technology was even used on Mr. Duck. He had no doubt he would have lost the argument back in his day with Mr. Duck had he been a hybrid duck.

To the east were hangar-sized buildings (he wasn't sure he wanted to know what was inside.)

Something caught Charlie's eye. Figures were coming over the walls. "Mr. Monfils?" Charlie did his best to keep his voice calm.

"Not now, Mr. Richards."

"I know. I'm just askin', would people storming the castle be of interest to you?" Monfils turned to Charlie. "What are you-?" Monfils stopped, seeing Charlie looking the opposite direction. He followed Charlie's gaze to the figures coming over the walls. They were not in red like the others, these were dressed in black shirts with leather bands around their arms. Monfils whispered, "The Yakuza."

"The Japanese mafia is here?"

"What?" Monfils said, annoyed. "No. I think they just liked the name. All the same, they are the elite of the Lowsmiths." Monfils turned his attention back at the war raging to the south. The battle continued, but clearly the bots and hybrids had the upper hand. The human Lowsmiths were taking heavy casualties. "The attack. It's a ruse. Should have known. Typical."

Charlie looked back to the east. "You know, they seem to be moving closer quite quickly. Should we be doing something?"

Monfils sighed. "Unfortunately, your survival is the most important thing."

"How unfortunate," Charlie agreed.

Monfils ignored him. "Let's get you to safety."

Monfils touched his fingers to this temple. He looked out to the east, concentrating.

There was a rumble in the city. Up above him the Crowley building started to shake. The outside of the building began to transform, darkening in color. An armored shell began to melt over the building. One of the clouds above them began moving back towards the Crowley building. A few dozen of the drones engaged in the battle to the south came back to the east.

Charlie was impressed. "You did all that by touching your temple?"

Monfils didn't answer. He took Charlie by the arm and they were on the move. As they headed up the non-yellow-brick-road yellow brick road, several more GuardBots joined the group.

“Don’t you think we should wait for Jade?”

Monfils scoffed. “Don’t worry about her.”

“I thought humans live in this city, too? Why are some humans trying to destroy it?”

“Let’s save the questions.”

They quickly made their way up towards the Crowley Tower. However, it was about to become a more difficult trip.

A ship landed in the middle of the street ahead of him. Charlie wanted it badly to look like the Millennium Falcon. He had hoped in the future when such technology existed, designers would pay homage and throw in an Enterprise or Battlestar Galactica look to their ships. Instead, this looked like a propeller-less oversized News Channel 13 (Dedicated, Determined, Dependable) helicopter. Charlie doubted this thing could even make it to space. Lame. Out poured dozens of redshirted Lowsmiths from the craft. To the west, the black-shirted special forces Lowsmiths advanced. They were about to be attacked on two sides.

A hatch in low cloud above Charlie opened, sending down samurai-looking ProtectoBots towards the ground. Six bots immediately encircled Charlie and began ushering him to the side of the street and towards a large arched opening to a nearby building. Several people were there at the doors waving Charlie to hurry in.

The Lowsmith army advanced and clashed with thunderous results.

Monfils was just behind Charlie and the bots as the Lowsmiths closed the gap.

Charlie was ushered inside the building but Monfils stayed just outside. He shouted at the bots. “Get him to Crowley at all costs.” The bots blinked affirmative. Then Monfils considered the command and reconsidered. “Not at all costs. He needs to be alive.”

The room began to darken; it was the glass of the building, being covered by the same material as the Crowley building. But before it went totally dark, Charlie watched through the darkening glass as Monfils took out five red shirts with three succinct moves. The black shirts looked to be more difficult, but Monfils knew how to hold his own.

The room was dark, except for the flashing lights coming from the surrounding ProtectoBots. Slowly, light began to grow from huge chandeliers above (though no bulbs, they just glowed.) They were in a huge concrete terminal and the architecture brought him comfort. It was in the style of a 1920’s capital city train station. Though that was the only thing 1920’s about it, robotic workers ran around frantically. This was a factory of some sort, though he had no idea what was being manufactured.

“So,” he asked to any of the six bots surrounding him. “What do we do now?”

One of the six, apparently the leader, answered. “We take you to Mr. Crowley. When it is clear to do so.”

“When will that be?”

“Calculations: sixteen minutes.”

“So, we just stand here until then?”

“If this is too boring for your human brain, I could sing or play any game from your generation’s time.”

“Uno!”

They never got to play because suddenly, every bot in the entire place fell to the floor. All one hundred and thirty-eight of them. Several flying bots crashed near him with a thud. Slowly, the light dimmed.

“Charlie Richards?” The voice was deep and booming. He turned to peer through the dimming light of a burly man, about six-foot and most likely pushing three hundred pounds, stood with some sort of weapon raised. He wore the black shirt of the elite Lowsmiths he had learned of. This wasn’t good.

“That depends. What are you going to do if I am? Because my answer is probably I’m not.”

The man shook his head in disbelief. “I can’t believe they did it. It works.”

“Question. If you guys have technology to incapacitate these robots, why don’t you just use it on the whole city?”

“You have a few trillion in gold we can borrow? It works for a very limited time. We have to go.”

“I don’t think I should be going with the enemy.”

“I don’t think you know who the enemy is. And it wasn’t a request.” The man held up his weapon at Charlie.

“Will that thing kill me?”

“If you’re lucky.”

The man lumbered towards Charlie.

From the shadows, or rather just a dark corner, a figure lunged. Jade. As the man fired, Jade knocked it from his hands. It hit one of the ProtectoBots on the ground and created a huge hole in the bot’s stomach (so, yes, it would have killed Charlie.)

Jade subdued the man with ease and had his hands behind his back in seconds. She quickly strapped a wiry band around his wrists that locked up immediately.

The man looked up at Charlie. “Know your enemies, Charlie. Don’t help them.”

Jade kicked the man and turned to Charlie. “Don’t listen to the human, Charlie.”

Charlie nodded. The bots began to stir. Soon, they had their escort back. The windows of the building began to clear and Charlie could see out over the bots and hybrids and bodies of Lowsmiths. The winner was indeed clear, and it wasn’t the humans. It was time for them to go see Blake Crowley.

Don’t listen to the human, Jade had said. Easier said than done, Charlie thought. I am human.

Chapter 11

In the early 24th century, the Global Nations (G.N.) voted on the Innovative7Wonders of the World. Four of those were around in Charlie Richards's era (Great Pyramid of Giza, Machu Picchu, Taj Mahal and significant parts of The Great Wall of China.) The other three newest members joined this elusive club in the year since.

One was a machine proposed back in the 21st century (at least, the first model), the Clock of the Long Now 5. It was a clock built to last for ten millennia with minimal maintenance and interruption. It was built inside a manmade titanium pyramid on the site of what once was a seventh wonder in its own time, the Mayan pyramid of Chichen Itza (it's being built at site had led to plenty of controversy.)

Another wonder was Atlantibot Island, a ninety-two-mile man-made floating island. The 23rd century island was the first to be staffed entirely by bots. It catered to the world's elite as the ultimate getaway. The island itself would drift with enormous speed, but with advanced turbulent cancelling technology even the roughest waves and at top speeds, guests could feel virtually no roughness at sea. So, if you could afford it, every morning its guests would be greeted with a new sunrise at a new location around the world (it could do Hawaii to Italy in three hours flat if it had to.)

Finally, there was the Crowley Tower.

It wasn't its sheer size; at 3,500 ft. it was merely the eleventh tallest building in the world (at the time it was built, it came in at 3rd.) The building was a blend of what Charlie would consider futuristic, modern and classical architecture rolled into one. Blocks and blocks wide, the building was full of parts. The building was a city unto itself, with high parts where hanging gardens descended to the lower parts, there were majestic archways, and sections resembling a medieval castle. Some areas looked like a 21st century NYC skyscraper, yet another area had a space-age shuttle landing pad and juice bar. The cherry on the top was not a cherry but a laser beam of light shooting up into the heavens. It was a mess of different periods design, but it was no doubt a wonder.

Charlie, flanked by Monfils and Jade once again, as well as a handful of ProtectoBots, reached the building with awe. The sheer vastness of the building up close was one to behold. Charlie wasn't the most material of people, but if his work helped this Crowley guy build this building, well that just wasn't fair at all. He had better be getting at least a luxury spacecraft out of the deal.

The rest of the trip to Crowley Towers had gone rather smooth, at least in comparison to the battle. The Lowsmiths had been neutralized, the majority having retreated through the breach in the walls. Already ServBots were working on repairs. There were the remains of destroyed bots through the streets as well and SaniBots were clearing the streets of the debris. Many Lowsmiths had been captured on the day of The Eruption. Groups of prisoners were being lead, hands bound, through the streets and off to the huge buildings to the east. Charlie had watched as the big burly man had cornered him not long before joined the group and was led away.

Charlie wasn't sure what to think about what the man had said. Clearly, everyone was not getting along smashingly. He just had no context yet, the world still too new. Fortunately, he was about to get plenty of context as he was to meet the leader of the city.

They were lead into the control room by two hulking red and white ProtectoBots. Charlie was greeted to the sight of a man bordered by many other men (or hybrids, he wasn't sure.) The man in the middle, presumably Mr. Crowley, smiled generously as Charlie entered the room. The room was high up in the building and full of glass. Monitors were everywhere; eyes around the city.

Blake was a strong looking man, but his age was hard to guess. Looked like the type of man who could buy his good looks, if he needed. He wore a suit that smelled of money.

"Charlie Richards!" he cried, throwing up his arms. "The man. They myth. The hero!"

Blake was flanked by roughly thirty people who looked important. Among them were many in military uniform, appearing to be high ranking generals. There were scientists, politicians, advisors, advisors to advisors, associate advisors to advisors, right hand men and left-hand men. Many smiled at Charlie, but those smiles looked forced. The ones who didn't looked tired and stressed. It was only Blake who played the part well. The man to the right of Blake, an impeccably dressed man with sharp features, held a slight grin but not a warm one.

Charlie and the group approached. Blake stepped forward, his hand extended. Charlie looked over at Jade, whose face was twisted with anger. It was an anger he had never seen in her, and that was saying something considered they had almost been killed three times in their short time knowing each other. It worried him. But he looked back at Blake and they shook hands.

"Charlie." Blake gestured to the world around him. "All of this can be traced back to your work. I owe you gratitude that can't possibly be repaid."

Charlie nodded. "But you can try, right?"

Blake laughed a deep, honest laugh. "Oh, I will. I will. In this world, you'll be able to have anything you desire."

Charlie again nodded.

"We just need your help with one little thing. I am not sure how much you've been told," Blake shot a quick glance at Jade. The first signs of Blake being uneasy flashed across his face for an instance, upon seeing Jade's rage, but was gone just as quick. "The future of humanity, what it has evolved into, you helped create. But it has a problem. One we think you might be able to fix."

Charlie's eyes darted around the room. The uneasy faces peered back at him. They had, after all, just been attacked. It would make anyone uneasy. But there was something else. They were scared. Jade had said there was something wrong with the original code, and whatever that was doing to them was making them scared.

"What do you say, Charlie?" Blake turned Charlie's attention back to him. "Can you help us out?"

There was only one answer. Even if there was another, this would not be the time to try it out. "Of course."

Blake smiled wider and leaned back. "Good!" He patted Charlie on the shoulder (hard.) "Trust me, when this is all over, I will make sure your dreams come true. I will make sure you will live for hundreds of years and with unlimited money. You will be able to do as you please."

Okay, Charlie thought, that was the best pitch yet.

Blake turned to the sharply dressed man. "Mr. Relic here will fill you in on all the details. Warren, see to it."

Warren nodded. He would see it done.

Charlie winced at a sudden movement. Jade's anger boiled over. It was hot, and it was fierce. She moved in whirlwind speed at Warren. "You bastard!"

Monfils, who had stood on the other side, had seen this coming and was in front of Warren in a flash. Warren, for his part, did not react one iota.

It was Charlie and Blake who reacted the most. Both jumped back from the fray as fast as they could.

Jade pushed Monfils's hands aside, freeing up Warren. "You sent Genesis to kill us! To kill Charlie!"

Warren looked on in (mock) shock at the accusation. It was convincing.

Jade swung hard at Warren. Monfils moved to protect him from the blow but it was too late. Her fist flew at his face and...mere inches away it was stopped by a strong black hand. Jade turned to see an eight-foot robot of sheer black beside her.

Genesis.

"Whatever do you mean, Jade?" Warren said evenly and coldly. "Genesis is right here by my side, where he belongs."

Jade struggled to get free from his grasp but was unable to. She looked at the robot again. It looked like Genesis, but she knew it wasn't. The eye slit was slightly wider, his arms slightly skinnier. "That's not Genesis."

"Come now, Jade." Warren gave a pitying smile. "You know how many opalium PBs exist in this world."

"Enough!" Blake stopped everyone in their tracks. "In front of our honored guest, no less. We will discuss this later!”

Genesis (if it was indeed Genesis) let go and Jade relaxed slightly. But only slightly.

Blake turned to Charlie. “I do apologize.” He waved to the city, the monitors and the destruction from the battle of the day. “It’s been a long day for us, so you’ll have to excuse us. We are generally much more cordial.” He said “cordial” with a sneer, directed at both Jade and Warren.”

Charlie nodded, unsure. “Of course, I understand.”

Blake nodded back. “Good,” he said with a small grin. “I just knew you would.”

Charlie looked one more time at all the faces in front of him, thick with tension. No one seemed to be having a good time. The future was not looking good.

Warren stepped into the Situation Room, eyeing the men across the table. He sat down easily in Blake’s exotic leather chair. He pushed a button and out came a glass of 22nd century Corsica. The wine’s bubbles rapidly rose to the top. It was, by accounts from eight of the thirteen most respected wine journals in the city, the finest drink in existence.

Warren took a small sip. “Would you like a drink?” When he didn’t get an answer, he shrugged. “You don’t get an opportunity to try a Corsica unless, well unless you are me, really.” He took another small sip.

Across from Warren sat Monfils and a young-looking kid with long hair, Dustin. He had the classic young-hot-shot-programming-genius-that-didn’t-care-how-smart-he-was-just-about-his-angst look.

Dustin spoke up. “I’ll have a shot.”

Warren didn’t respond. “You know how I got to where I am today? I’m a human, yet I recognize my own race’s worst enemy is succumbing to emotions. That’s the problem with these rebels. Bots don’t have emotions, but they also aren’t good at adapting to the moment. That’s why hybridization is such a good solution. If only we can perfect it.”

Monfils looked up at Warren and nodded. “I don’t like doing business with you any more than I have to. But this disease is killing my people. We have over five million infected and we both need this to stop.”

“Agreed,” Warren nodded. “We all know just Charlie isn’t the answer. There were problems with the hybrid technology from the get-go. Now is the time to perfect it, not take a technological leap backwards.”

“So, what do we do now?”

“I have been working on that for quite some time, Monfils. I just need you to keep Jade out of my way. And keep this Charlie fellow from messing with the code we are creating. Keep Blake focused on the rebel Lowsmiths. We have more important wars to be fighting.”

Monfils nodded. “In return?”

“In return, I save your people.”

Monfils nodded. But he wanted more.

“And,” Warren conceded. “And when I am a member of the newly perfected hybrid race, you will have a seat at the table. You will no longer be indentured to the House of Crowley, I promise you that.”

Monfils nodded. Hesitant, but agreeing. “Anything else?”

“No.” Warren nodded to the doorway. Monfils looked around suspiciously, rose, and headed for the door.

Dustin lifted an eyebrow to Warren. “You trust him?”

“Of course not,” Warren laughed. He poured a glass of Corsica and handed it to the boy. “But I don’t trust anyone.”

Dustin was taken aback. “Moi?!” They laughed.

“You asked for a shot of Corsica, the most expensive liquor in the world.” Warren took a small sip of the wine as Dustin stopped short. The kid was about to drink it all in one gulp before the comment.

Warren stood and went to one of the hundreds of monitors in the small room. He gazed at the ruined south wall, the bodies of the Lowsmiths in the streets, and the bodies of sick hybrids in the quarantine wings of the medical center. Things were proceeding nicely.

Warren Relic, currently the second most powerful man in the city of Crowley, and 48th worldwide, was moving up fast. Warren Relic, who was once born to simple parents who surely never tasted Corsica or resided in the walls of the richest city in the world. The city where hybrid technology was at the forefront of reinventing the world.

A world he would one day control.

“So, Dustin, how close are you to being the prodigy everyone says you are?”

“I am that prodigy. And lest you forget that you are asking me to solve the most complicated code ever written.”

“And you will be paid royally for it. Don’t let me down.”

Warren motioned for Dustin to leave. Dustin downed his drink in one giant expensive gulp.

Dustin slowed as he reached the door. “Still,” he said to Warren. “I need what Charlie has in his bag.”

Warren didn’t turn. “I know. Don’t worry.”

Dustin exited the Warren pushed a button and another bottle of Corsica sprang up. Everything was working out nicely. He had tried to thwart the mission to bring Charlie back, but in a fortunate turn of events, he failed. Now the original code, the missing pieces he could fit into the gaps of his improved version, came to him wrapped nicely in a backpack.

Now the code was going to be his to control.

Now the hybrids would be his to control. With one simple command.

Now the city was going to be his to control. The Lowsmiths would be no more. Blake, no more.

Warren Relic was about to

Chapter 12

Charlie was tired. It had been a long few days/centuries. He also realized that when he left it was night, and when he got to this day of age it was morning so.... he lost his train of thought.

He was exhausted.

Still, there were things to do before he could mercifully sleep. With Jade by his side, they made their way into the lobby of a sleek, state of the art building; The Advanced Health, Mechanical and Hybrid Sciences Pavilion.

Jade needed to see Angelo. To get Angelo back. But also, she needed to see the effects of the hybrid plague. More importantly, she needed Charlie to see it. It wasn't so easy, though. There was very tight restriction on hybrid contact these days.

A receptionist bot came to greet them, almost human in appearance, but with the distinct diamond-shaped metallic brand on her cheek all bots were required to have. She held up a hand and out came a holographic info sheet. The first requirement for any visitor was to scan your finger chip to identify which of the three races they were. "Input data, please" said the robot. The voice was kind, but there was no room for small talk.

"I need to speak to someone in charge," Jade replied. There was strict restriction on access these days, with the hybrid plague going about. Jade might be able to throw her name around, but it didn't work well with a robot.

"Input data, please," the robot replied.

Jade looked at the robot's nametag. "Elaine 4618, I suggest you let us speak to someone in charge."

"Input data, please." Apparently, ServBot Elaine was a stubborn one.

Jade eyed an ashen-faced man in a suit, staring at her with one-part anger, one-part horror, and one-part annoyance. He scampered over quickly, practically knocking Elaine Bot out of the way (not really, Elaine Bot was significantly stronger of the two.) "Thank you, Elaine, I will take it from here."

Elaine Bot blinked unnaturally, once. "Yes. Sir." The timing of the two words were oddly spaced out. Jade thought she must be a very old model. Budget cuts were no friends to the healthcare community. Elaine turned and rolled away.

“I’m Mr. Birmingham,” the man said with a slight nod and extension of his clammy hand. “How may I be of assistance?”

“My name is Jade—”

“Of course, you are,” Mr. Birmingham cut her off, bowing his head slightly and holding his hands up. Everyone knew who Jade was. “Whatever can I do for you?”

“I was hoping to get a tour.”

“I see. Tours are general scheduled months out through the proper channels. What, may I ask, were you hoping to get a tour of?”

“The Hybrid Center.”

“Well, surely you have seen. You are a hybrid, ergo you have been there for your procedure.”

“I’m not looking for the normal tour.”

Mr. Birmingham looked around nervously. He didn’t like where this was going. There had been special instructions from the Office of Crowley himself, certain patients were to be quarantined and no one, unless cleared by Blake himself, was to be allowed entrance.

Mr. Birmingham’s gaze shot around the building, as if he had received a literal shock. A moment later, a small ding chimed from his processor. He touched the side of his temple. His eyes glazed over for a moment as he looked at an incoming message. Releasing his fingers, a smile spread across his face. “Of course,” he said cheerily. “Right this way.”

Jade knew there was no sneaking around this city. It was a little-known fact, like less than a dozen people in the world knew, that the Crowley Clouds installed worldwide for power were also equipped with millions of microscopic cameras. As was every inch of every building built in this city. With an I.D. chip in every human, hybrid and bot, all Blake had to do was input a name, sit back and watch.

She was sure he was watching them now.

First, they went to get Angelo. The Melinda and David Briskin Center for Bot Therapy (The Bot Center) was bustling with MediBots racing around with programmed urgency. The majority of bot operations were done by other bots, as such there were only select hybrid humans working there, distinguishable by a small chip on the right earlobe.

Mr. Birmingham went over to one of the hybrids in a white coat. Charlie couldn’t tell what was said, but it seemed like a small argument ensued. Mr. Birmingham eventually got his way and the doctor, Milligram (not his real name, it was a nickname he got in med school and it stuck,) came over to Jade. “He’s not ready yet. But come with me.”

Jade nodded and she and Charlie were lead to an urgent care room. When the door opened and they peered inside, Charlie caught a tinge, just a tinge, of emotion come to Jade.

Angelo was in bad shape. He was hooked to monitors and monitors to monitor the monitors and all sorts of noisy machines. He was suspended by two poles that hung from the ceiling, and sparks flew into the air as bots worked on him. His smashed face was thankfully repaired (though one eye was bigger than the rest.) His limbs, however, were replaced by a gray metal that didn't match the rest of his body.

Dr. Milligram stepped next to Jade. "Angelo is made of a very rare nitrate mineral, one we don't have access to readily. We have temporarily given him titanium arm and leg replacements."

"Is he operational?" Jade asked, her face stony.

"His circuits were badly damaged. We've manage to do basic maintenance that will allow him to operate, but he has so many complicated and advanced features--"

Jade cut him off. "I need him now. If he can operate, it's time for him to go."

"Now? I'm afraid it's impossible. It will take months to--"

"Now," Jade cut him off again. The word left for no argument. "Boot him up."

Dr. Milligram turned around to Mr. Birmingham, who nodded. Dr. Milligram shrugged. "Suit yourself, I get paid the same either way." He barked out orders to the MedicalBots to boot up Angelo.

Charlie had to give his important few cents in. "Can you at least spray paint his arms and legs red to match?"

"I'm sorry," Dr. Milligram said with a head shake. "I'm afraid it's not covered by insurance."

Charlie rolled his eyes. Some things never change.

Angelo was released from the Mechopedic Medical Poles (they were just poles but you could charge more for them with a fancy name) and booted up. His eyes blinked on and off quickly. Charlie could hear Jade holding her breath. Would it be the same Angelo?

Angelo came to life and spun quickly to Jade. It wasn't the same Angelo, his eyes seemed to not recognize her. He stepped forward. Charlie was worried he may attack her.

But Jade remained calm. "Angelo," she said quietly. "It's Jade."

Angelo's eyes blink rapidly again. Then, they seemed to grow softer as they recognized the face in front of them. Angelo made a grand, beautiful, legendary bow. "Of course. It is, my Jadyn of Crowley. I am, as always, at your service.

Jade let out a deep breath. As did Charlie, who didn't even realize he had held his own.

Angelo was back.

The Hybrid Center was like a vast town unto itself. Each district was made up of the different disciplines required to provide Hybrid medicine; human medical care, mechanical engineering, electrical repair, computer programming, and on and on. The usual patients filled the medical ward, but wasn't what Jade was here to investigate. She wanted to know how bad the code defect was, what happened to the victims once they had their outburst and were brought here.

She wanted to see what could possibly happen to her.

Mr. Birmingham personally escorted our heroes through a total of nine security doors. At each one, ProtectoBot guards of varying impressiveness stood watch, from small darting ones to ones that could crush a tank between their hands. As they went on, it wasn't just bots that stood guard. Hybrid warriors, many mostly machine, stood watch. They all seemed to eye Charlie with a mix of hope and distaste. He guessed they didn't care for humans, but they did care for someone to fix the problem.

Finally, they passed the last massive portal and entered a vast hall of chaos.

A sea of sick hybrids lay before them, filling a gigantic, sealed chamber. There weren't just cots covering the floor, there were five-story bunk beds lined in tight rows as far as the eye could see. In each bunk was a moaning hybrid in various stages of illness, but many had the burnt-out eyes Jade had seen before. A complicated array of machinery, scientists, doctors, computer programmers, nurses, assistants and caregivers frantically ran up and down the aisles, up and down ladders, trying to provide relief and help to the hybrids. Even though hybrids contained so many different parts, the people who helped them understood what the hybrids themselves knew: they were still human.

"This is the ward for hybrids within their first two hours of illness," Mr. Birmingham said.

"All these hybrids became sick in the last two hours?" Jade asked in disbelief.

"Well, in this district," Mr. Birmingham nodded. "There are four other primary response units in other districts."

"How many are sick?" Jade asked slowly. If these hybrids all became sick in the last two hours, the numbers must far outweigh what she'd heard in the situation room.

"We don't know exactly," Mr. Birmingham said. "The numbers have tripled in the last eight hours. All types of hybrids have been infected."

Jade was rarely at a loss for words, but this was one of those moments. If this was spreading fast, and mutating with each victim, this would be apocalyptic for her species. This plague wouldn't just lower their numbers, it would wipe out every single one of them. It was just a matter of time.

Time.

Jade closed her eyes, blocking out the cacophony of the ward.

Their only hope was time.

Chapter 13

“Paris, what’s the last time the Royals won the World Series?” Charlie looked at the attractive brunette hologram he named Paris with a mix of amusement, fascination and, if he were to be honest, desire. Sure, she was 60% transparent but the other 40%...

“The Royals have won once since the 21st century, in the year 2,245. It was a magical run. Shall I play game 7 for you?”

“Paris, you know me. You don’t even have to ask. Put it on!”

The entire wall in front of Charlie lit and transformed into a baseball game. Charlie was happy to see that despite all the advances in this world, baseball was still pretty much the same. It comforted him watching it. Some things don’t change, the Royals’ royal blue uniforms, the lazy pace of the game (though there was a pitch clock now), how boring and perfect baseball was. Some things don’t change.

But pretty much everything else had. A prime example was the room around him. He was in a lovely suite on the 87th floor of the Crowley building. Mr. Crowley had seen to it he would get a very nice room. Jade and Angelo had dropped him off about an hour ago and told him to get some rest, tomorrow was a big day.

Seriously? Tomorrow was a big day?

Today he had been attacked by a killer bot at work, travelled through time, been part of a war, witness to a plague, and told he had to help fix it. No, today was a big day. Tomorrow had to be nanometers in comparison.

Tired, he was. Like he had never been in his life. Except for that one time his sister demanded he run a 10k in the middle of a Topeka heat wave. But no. Not even then was he as tired as he was now.

Still, he couldn’t go right to sleep after he met the lovely girl hologram, Paris. The suite he was in had all sorts of usefulness. There was a ServBot butler who had gotten him a very nice tasting beer. Unfortunately, it had appeared that Amstel Light didn’t exist any longer, but the Crowley-brand lager was quite good. Spectacular windows let him look out over the city. It was still buzzing with life, as thousands of PatrolBots did what they did best, patrolled. He imagined that with the attack today, they were more numerous than usual.

Paris was a wealth of information, and Charlie was in the dark about the three-hundred-year gap in between his time and now.

“Paris, why are there no more restaurants?”

Paris began explaining the demise of brick and mortar restaurants in the city as Charlie watched a player named Telmond hit a 500-foot home run. Royals 3, Pirates 1. The first thing Charlie had asked Paris when he first arrived was an obvious one. Tell me about Charlie Richards. He was pleased to find history thought of him fondly. The realization of the capabilities of hybrid technology was a recent one, in the last century or so. His code had been theorized throughout the centuries, but it was Blake Crowley, already a self-made billionaire as the leading supplier of wireless power worldwide, who developed it into a business and made himself a self-made trillionaire.

“Paris,” Charlie mused, “any wars happen in the last century?” Paris told Charlie about the Damascus Wars in the 23rd century that had changed the global landscape as Charlie sipped his beer and watched a double play.

Positive things had happened as well. Apparently, we had attempted a colony on Mars (an epic fail it turned out, so maybe not positive, but we had made a serious attempt at it-yay,) cured pain, admitted global warming was real and solved it, and had been greeted by an alien race, gotten along, and even exchanged citizens as part of a complex galactic exchange student program. Apparently, some of these aliens still lived here today, though their numbers had dropped significantly due to some political difference between the civilizations.

It was clear these were trying times. Hybrids, people, were dying and war was knocking on the door. He didn’t want to do it, but he had to. He told Paris to turn off the game and tell him about the plague.

“Rumors of the Hybrid Plague, also known as Devolve, or Richards Disease, are unsubstantiated. We assure you, it doesn’t exist.” While Paris’ expression hadn’t changed, it felt like it did. Her tone felt colder, and flat. It was unfortunate, they had been getting together so well.

Charlie, of course, knew better. They might be denying it to avoid a panic, but Charlie had seen it with his own two eyes. It had been a lot harder on Charlie than he would have thought possible. Charlie was no god. While he didn’t feel responsible for what was happening to hybrid race, he did. Kind of. There seemed to be a feeling that hybrids and humans were separated not just by race, but by being different beings altogether. He didn’t know how it had happened, but he knew the shape of the world, and this just wasn’t true. Just because one has mechanical parts doesn’t mean they aren’t human. Humanity is in the soul and no mechanics would replace that.

Charlie hadn’t done anything, yet this was all his doing. He had to have the power to change it. They hybrids were dying which meant, to him, humanity was. He remembered playing a card game with his nephew, Alex. Holy crap, that was yesterday! The hero, Haladin, could rebuild the city. This was exactly what this century needed right now, someone to rebuild.

Charlie said good night to Paris and headed for bed. Jade had been right about one thing, tomorrow was going to be a long day.

Chapter 14

Ding dong.

Charlie's eyes flittered open with regret. He had no idea where he was, and felt like he could sleep another three centuries. His eyes burned like he had drunk eleven beers (only two, he promised.) Charlie stared up at the ceiling. The room was white as snow. Where was he? When was he?

Ding dong.

Relief came to him. Everything had just been a dream. There were no robots trying to kill him and traveling through time. All a dream. His proof? The doorbell went ding dong. Do you really think in the 24th century doorbells would still go ding dong?

Ding dong.

Above Charlie appeared a figure, and Charlie's stomach dropped. "Hello, Paris."

"Good morning, Mr. Richards. There is a lady by the name of Jadyne of Crowley at your front door. She is accompanied by a mostly red robot. Shall I have them go away?"

Charlie let out a deep sigh. It wasn't a dream and he wasn't going to be allowed to go back to sleep. "No," Charlie said dejectedly. "Let them in."

Charlie got into the turbo shower (not the real name of it, but he called it that because it took ten seconds.) After, he shuttered at the thought of putting back on the clothes he just travelled through time with, and so went to the closet. As miniature ServBots gave him a shave, cut his hair, and did other manly grooming things, Charlie opened the closet to find a surprisingly full wardrobe. He expected futuristic type shirts, or sterile all-white ones, but what he found was very 21st century and very expensive looking. They were Armani suits, fourteen of them virtually identical, save for hue, fourteen ties, fourteen dress shirts, and fourteen black shoes. The suit looked very much like the one Mr. Crowley was wearing when they had met. He wondered if he had this stocked for him or if this was just another room he owned.

Well, if Charlie Richards was going to play the part of hero, he was going to have to look the part. To his pleasant surprise, they fit like they were tailored to every inch of his body.

“Whoa.” Even Jade couldn’t hide her surprise.

“Not bad, eh?” Not bad indeed. He had chosen the ash grey suit and a nice light blue (go Royals!) tie. He looked like a new, GQ-cover-worthy man.

“I do say, good sir.” Angelo nodded approvingly. “You look simply dapper.”

“Thank you, Angelo. So!” Charlie clasped his hands together. “I figured it was going to be a pretty light day. Was thinking of catching a movie?”

“Huh?” Jade said stupidly. A combination of not getting what he was talking about and still being surprised to see Charlie.

“Okay, then.” Charlie said seriously. “No movie.”

They took the elevators (yup, elevators were still the most widely used technology for traveling between floors) down to the fourth floor. It turns out Blake Crowley was a huge fan of classical 21st century architecture and design. Signs of it were in the hallways, the design of the elevators. It also explained his suit and why the doorbell in his room went ding dong.

The elevator came to a stop at some unmarked floor. As the door slid opened, Charlie was greeted with a thousand audible gasps.

Charlie saw Blake waiting for him first. He had a huge charming smile like usual. Then he looked out beyond him at a sea of people staring at him in amazement. The technology had changed, but he knew a room full of programmers when he saw it. “My people.”

Jade smiled. “Your work is now their work.”

“Charlie!” Blake exclaimed excitedly. “Good to see you again. And my, don’t you look the part in that fine suit. I’m glad you found it. Now, you ready to get to work?”

Blake led the way, prompting the group to follow him through the programmers towards a huge main control bank at the far end. Treating him like a god is indeed how the people he passed reacted. He heard whispers of excitement and pointing and oh my god, it’s him. One person even reached out to touch him and looked like he was going to faint after doing so.

It was a mammoth programming room. There were the thousand or so programmers in the room, as well as hundreds of bots running around doing various tasks (they did not stop to gawk at Charlie.) There weren’t computers or keyboards he could see, just pieces of glass for the programmers to swipe at. It all seemed to feed into the large main control bank, code projected across it like the New York Stock Exchange. Within the room was doors to another room that was guarded by colossal ProtectoBots. Out of that room came a kid, early twenties, impeccably dressed and walking with a planet’s worth of ego. He came up to meet them.

“Dustin,” Blake said to the kid. “Meet Charlie.”

Dustin held out his hand. “It is an absolute honor,” though his face betrayed the words. All the other programmers in the room had a look of awe upon seeing Charlie, but not this kid. And Charlie knew that look, he worked with programmers all the time. It was the look when they thought they knew everything and others knew nothing. It was not a rare look in the programming world. Charlie hated this type more than anyone. Anytime one was hired at Bandicoot in management level, they threw out the current ways of doing things and declared themselves the smartest person in company.

Charlie was quite sure they weren't going to get along.

Dustin was quite sure he and Charlie were not going to get along.

Look, Dustin wasn't an asshole. Just ask Dustin. He appreciated Charlie's work. It was pioneering stuff at the time.

But come on, Blake! What the hell was he thinking? Charlie's knowledge base is from centuries ago! You think some guy with a three-century old knowledge base and intelligence was going to come here and show him what to do? The current code was billions of lines long, they were written in a program that didn't even exist in Charlie's time, they involved genetic sequencing and an evolutionary user interface design. Come now, Blake. You're the most powerful man in the world, but not the smartest. That's why he had hitched his wagon (very antiquated phrase but he liked it) to Warren. Warren could see the way of things. Even now, hybrid technology's possibilities were being vastly underutilized. Basically, it was there to make rich man Crowley even richer. Yeah, people could live hundreds of years, but it could be so much more. People could be stronger. Smarter. Run faster. They were just scratching the surface of possibilities. The plague was what it was, just a bug they were working on, which they would soon fix. If some hybrids die, it is what it is. Just think of the future. Not think "let's go back hundreds of years" and use that code. Forward, not backward.

Warren would be running things one day. Dustin was sure he was one of the five smartest people on the planet, and he knew where to put his chips. If Warren was going to be the most powerful man, he was going to be the second. And with the possibilities of hybrid technology opened, they could rule and live nearly forever.

He wasn't about to have some 21st century digitally-aged man ruin it.

"Alright," Dustin said with a large grin. "Let's begin."

They were in the inner core room that belonged to Dustin. Just Blake, Charlie and Dustin. Jade was left behind in the main room.

Dustin began to explain as fast and as complicated as possible. Charlie wasn't sure if it was intentional or not, he imagined it was, but he was completely and utterly lost. It was overwhelming, to say the least. The code he one day began was only slightly recognizable. Panic gripped him. He needed a beer at The Lonely Tavern. He needed to sit alone and think. Dustin was going on and on about how the code evolves using hereditary PLNA links...blah blah blah. There was absolutely no way he would be able to do this.

The panic elevated. No one seemed to notice the cold sweat forming at his brow. But maybe they did notice. Dustin talked faster and faster and seemed to be enjoying every minute of it. Numbers and characters flew across the screen at lightning speed.

What would happen when he told them he couldn't help? Would they send him back to the past? Was he still in the past or is he just a missing person now? Does his work continue if he's not there? Would Blake even let him go or would they send Genesis, the sequel, after him? His head was swimming. It was too much to take.

"Charlie?" Blake asked, concerned.

"Huh?"

"I said, do you think you could help us?"

He felt Blake's eyes on him. If he said no, then what? Would they just send him back in time? Was he just stuck here? Was he...useless to Blake?

"Of course," he said with a shaking voice.

Blake nodded.

"Excuse me." Charlie turned and ran out the door. He ran into out into the main room past the eyes of thousands of programmers. He rushed past Jade and Angelo and out into the hallway. He didn't know where he was going, he didn't care. He just needed to get out of there.

Chapter 15

The Hanging Gardens of Babylon were on the 23rd floor of the Crowley building. Charlie couldn't find his way out of the Tower, but at least he found some fresh air. The gardens were designed just as he had seen of artist renditions of the original gardens three thousand years ago. He lay in the perfect grass and looked up into the sky.

The clouds were indeed amazing. They were manmade structures, but they still changed like real clouds. They were slightly transparent like real clouds, which was amazing considering he knew there were bots inside. How did they do that? And they took shape more succinctly than real clouds. But what happened to all the real ones? Maybe they just modified the real ones instead of replaced them. That was it, they were hybrid clouds! Everything here was becoming integrated.

Charlie watched a cat-shaped cloud float on by. Its catlike resemblance was astounding. It even had whiskers.

"That's Moses." Charlie took a quick glance at Jade standing beside him as he lay in the grass. "Every day at eleven, Moses floats by." She nodded at the cat.

Charlie turned back to stare up into the sky. He didn't want to talk to her. He wasn't in the mood to talk to anyone. He wanted to go home.

Jade turned to Angelo and told him to give them a moment. Angelo happily strolled off to find some garden wanderers to compliment. "Madam," he said to a woman passing. "Colors seem brighter when you are around!"

Jade lay down beside him. Charlie sighed. Couldn't she just go away?

"Next up comes Blade." Jade shifted in the grass uncomfortably. "He looks like a cow, but is actually supposed to be a Beefalo."

Charlie chuckled. "A cow and a buffalo? Of course, a hybrid animal."

Jade gave a small grass filled shrug. "Blake insists. And Moses is no ordinary cat."

Soon enough, Charlie watched as a Beefalo came floating by.

Jade proceeded with caution. She didn't know if Charlie could help, but she needed him to try. Her life was depending on it. "I can't even imagine this, Charlie. I took you from your home, you were given an impossible mission. Three centuries have passed, how could you possibly know- "

Charlie cut her off. "What is your official job title?" He wasn't in the mood to hear about all the difficult things he was going through and supposed to do.

“I don’t have one.” She said it calmly, because she could tell he was upset. If she said the wrong thing, Charlie would probably just shut down. “I do as I’m told.”

“What if Blake asked you to kill someone?”

Jade remained emotionless. “How truthful do you want me to be?”

“So, you have? You’re an assassin?”

“I am many things.”

Charlie took a deep breath, remembering the dangerous game he was playing. He didn’t really know Jade, he trusted her more than the others out of necessity. He was a stranger in a strange land. But if Blake saw there was no need for Charlie, and he asked Jade to do what she’s told... “What happens if I tell you I can’t help?”

“Then, unless the programmers come up with something, hybrids are going to die. I’m going to die.”

Charlie paused a second. He didn’t want her making it about that, he wanted to know what happens to him. Can’t he even be selfish for one sec?! “Yeah, but what happens to me? You’re an assassin. An assassin! I’m having a hard time coming to terms with everything right now.”

“Charlie, if you weren’t, I’d be worried. Because then you’d be crazy.”

“Oh, I’m pretty sure I’m crazy.”

“It’s a crazy world. And you’ve been put in the worst of it. Trust me, these are all long shots. You were a long shot. Getting you here was a long shot.”

“Then what’s the point?”

Jade stayed quiet for a good minute. A zonkey (zebra + monkey) cloud floated by. Finally, she turned her head to Charlie. “It’s been a long few days. Come on, let’s take a trip.”

“Long? Pft. I’m just laying here looking at messed-up animal clouds.”

“Come on. Let’s go.”

“Where to?”

Jade got up and brushed the grass off her clothes. “To Trenchtown.”

Trenchtown was a well-hidden part of Crowley. It was in the southwest sector, out of sight behind large, solid black buildings. Despite the name, to say it was a slum, in 21st century standards, was not at all accurate. In fact, it was a decent looking neighborhood, rows of brick condos. It made Charlie feel very much at home, as it felt not unfamiliar. But it certainly wasn’t on par with the decadence and technology of the rest of the city.

Jade had explained on the way this was an entirely human neighborhood. It had, just a few years earlier, been double in size. People here generally couldn’t afford transitioning into hybrids, but they were skilled enough to warrant jobs within the city. Those who weren’t skilled enough had been kicked out beyond the cities walls (understandably disgruntled, thus creating more Lowsmiths.) The grunt work of the city had all been taken care of by bots (cleaning, maintenance, farming.) The high-end jobs were all taking by hybrids (synergy, corporate overtaking, public relations.) Left in the middle were jobs where bots were not the best solution, but didn't pay particularly well (there were a lot of teachers.) But as bots continued to become more advanced, the numbers of the humans in the city kept shrinking.

But then, the plague had hit. Hybrids were getting extremely sick. In some instances, companies were even hiring people from Trenchtown to meet their needs.

The result: resentment all around. Tensions had never been higher between humans and hybrids. The humans in the city of Crowley were generally not like the Lowsmiths, hating the hybrid race, but knowing they had to live in harmony. But recently, many had begun to change their mind. Tensions were at an all-time high.

The reaction to Jade walking through the streets of Trenchtown was mixed. Jade was well known, for two reasons.

One, she was Jade. She was known throughout the city as a dangerous and mysterious person in Blake's small inner circle. Few would have the guts to mess with her in the best of circumstances.

The second reason, Charlie was about to find out when they arrived at 615 Memorial Avenue, a small brick "townhouse".

"Alright." Jade took a deep breath and headed for the door. "Finally bringing a boy home to meet my parents."

Petra Wendigo, father of the girl who was once Jadynd Wendigo, was showing Charlie a polaroid photo album. Yes, a polaroid photo, circa 1970.

The house was a mix of futuristic and 1970's décor. The family had a maid ServBot roaming around, and streams of content showed on monitors around the room. But the couch looked outdated, even to Charlie. Same with the chairs, and a table at the far end of the living room. It was like his grandmother and future great-great-great-great-grandchild got together and decorated the house.

At the far end of the room was Jade's mother, Tella Wendigo. She did not seem to be particularly happy about the present company. Charlie would have to tread lightly.

"I can't believe it," Petra said with a shake of the head. "I had heard rumors, but...they actually brought Charlie Richards back from the past."

"I'm still confused." Charlie was. "How did Jade become a hybrid if only wealthy people become hybrids?"

Jade shifted uncomfortably.

Petra flipped through the album. When he flipped the page, it was just a swipe of a hand in the air, the book was meant to look like an old photo album, and the pictures like old polaroid photos, but wasn't the case. At closer inspection, the pages were digital pages, and the pages turned by motion sensors. It was a futuristic polaroid scrapbook.

The page turned to a photo of a small run-down town. Petra explained, "This is Coyote Springs. About sixty miles from here."

Charlie eyed Jade. She kept her gaze glued on the photo. He couldn't quite get a read on her, but the photos seemed difficult for her to look at.

Petra carried on. "Tella and I grew up there. Met there. Had a daughter there. It was a nice place. I worked as a teacher, Tella, a baker."

Petra flipped the page with the swipe of his hand. A young girl of six stood on the front porch of a house flanked by two adults. He swiped it again and there was a photo of a girl, smiling and happy, in a hospital bed with bots by her side.

Jade turned and looked away.

"She was eight when she got sick." Petra kept it together. Tella, in the back of the room, stirred.

Her face a mixture of anger and sadness. “We were told Jade was going to die. There was nothing they could do. Her heart just wasn’t strong. Then, a man came to me. He said his name was Monfils and said there was an experimental treatment in Vegas. This was just before the city was changed to Crowley.” Petra swiped again. A photo of the family, their things packed, and headed in a bullet car to the desert. “So, we packed our things and went. Put our lives behind us, but that’s what anyone would have done for their child.”

Tella broke down at this. She quickly exited the room.

The outburst caused Jade to teeter the edge as well. She turned from Charlie and Petra and buried her face in her hands.

Petra took notice, but he didn’t react, just flipped the page. It was a picture of Jade inside the Hybrid Center. There were surgeons and bots and all kinds of things there. Her chest was open. A mechanical heart was at the ready to replace.

Jade stood and left the room.

Jade stood in the kitchen (very futuristic, no 70’s style here. The food distributor made Charlie hungry for an In and Out burger.) Jade, who was once a full human named Jade Wendigo, and is currently in special operations at the Crowley Enterprises Corporation. She looked out the window at a small backyard. She remembered the sterile white walls and surgical bots before the virtual reality glasses would sweep her away to tropical islands. The truth of what had happened was slowly revealed to her over the years. Her parents spent all the money they had in this world to make her into a hybrid, with three mechanical organs, and saved her life. The money they paid still was not enough, and that’s why she was forced into a job with the corporation to repay her debts. But she couldn’t blame anyone. She had to be thankful, right? Her boss (and practically everyone’s boss) had some unquestionably marginal ethics, but she was alive because of him.

As she grew older, the jobs she was instructed to do had become increasingly, shall we say, more serious. From cleaning floors (not fun) to internal audits (not fun), to bot repair (sorta fun) to media production (sounds more fun than it was) to police enforcement (she was a natural) to Blake’s person security force (great fun, just stand behind the bots); then last year she was instructed, and carried out, the assassination of Victor Depoza, an executive at a competing technology company. Things had gotten real. An assassination was a hard thing to deal with, but this was the price she paid to still be here. She would do what Blake asked of her.

“You alright?” Charlie had finished getting the rest of the story from Petra, at least his version, and came in to check on Jade.

“No.” Jade took a deep breath and turned to Charlie. “Yes.” She crossed over to the food distribution unit (FDU) and got a hot cup of tea. “My mother is upset because I haven’t been here in over two years.”

“I’m sorry.”

“And after everything they did for me...they don’t know the wars I fight for them is to pay them back. That I need to live on for them. That hybrid technology is a way for them to live on. Blake has told me, if I help fix this plague, he will make them hybrids. They can live on for hundreds of years.” Jade turned to look Charlie in the eye. “I even killed for him once. For them. I will kill for my parents. They have given everything for me.”

The look in Jade’s eyes said it all. He knew what she had said to be true. Regardless of what she felt for anyone, her true devotion was to her parents. This relieved him a bit, it was something he could relate to. He thought of his own mother. Guilt filled him. He never told her what she meant to her. He lived in her house because he was afraid not to. That was the truth. “Okay,” he said with a nod.

Jade took a deep breath and downed her tea. Okay. Charlie Richards, whom she went through time to get, who was the god of her race, was her only hope, responded to her last-ditch effort, an effort that was very, very difficult for her, responded with okay.

Hope was lost.

Charlie was at a loss for words. He crossed to the FDU. It could give him virtually any food he wanted. He was starving for fish ‘n chips. Yet, he had no appetite. It was gone. It was replaced by a heavy burden.

Beside the FDU was a rice cooker. Odd. They had a unit that could give any food in all the world, what was the point of an old rice cooker? “Why do you guys have this?”

Jade wasn’t in the mood. “I don’t know, Charlie. Why does it matter?”

He picked it up and examined it. It was antique in this age but it was still futuristic to him. While it looked like a rice cooker from his day for the most part, it had a processing unit on the top of it. “How old is this?”

“I don’t know,” Jade said with frustration. “I think it’s from your time. Or just after. Your century.”

Charlie took out his iPhone. It didn’t work as a phone in this day of age, but if this cooker was old. He checked the Bluetooth and, indeed, the cooker popped up. He opened his HackALot app. The simple little cooker showed up as a connected device. From there he could download the programming.

The code was quite simplistic. The device was basically designed to track when you left work (or a desired location) to start the rice so it was fresh when you arrived home. The code told the microwave sensors to start. It gave Charlie an idea.

“Jade.” Charlie turned to Jade sharply

Chapter 17

In the low-lying hills a good distance from Crowley, under the cover of the red earth, in dark passages, the rebel Lowsmiths gathered in the underground chapel that had once served as the training ground for a potential mission to Mars. However, they would object strongly to being labeled as Lowsmiths. The Crowley brass came up with that name, since before the revolt, many of the humans had primarily worked as smiths in the low plateaus, mining alluvium fan deposits. Crowley had, over the years, upped the demands on the smiths while offering less and less pay. When they were destitute and on the brink of starvation, Blake Crowley replaced all of them with bots. No, they did not become Lowsmiths like the greedy corporate king Blake said. Technically they were HOPE – The Human Operations for Permanent Existence- though most just referred to it as The Allegiance. They were going to make damn sure humans weren't going to go extinct to this invasive hybrid species. That's why they were gathered here today, in church. While not attending a service, the group of a hundred or so rebels were as quiet as a congregation as they stood and watched their leader pace the dais at the front of the room.

Trekon's presence alone demanded respect. He was six foot seven, and looked like he could've played in the NFL back in the day, when it existed. He had gray hair, closely cropped over his ears, but the back was a little longer and pulled up in the short ponytail. His gray beard was precisely trimmed and he wore a white flowing robe that made him look very much not like a rebel leader fighting against a militant army.

He looked almost like a messiah.

"This is our greatest opportunity." Trekon stood at the front of the Allegiance in the red rock underground chapel that was a central meeting space for the rebels. "We have broken through the Northern Wall and made significant incursions into Crowley."

A holler rose from the crowd of brown-clad warriors which filled the chapel.

Trekon raised his hands to quiet the crowd. "We have lost many, but its success is monumental. It is the spearhead by which we will overtake Crowley and stop Blake Crowley's insistence that humans become hybrids."

Applause rippled through the room.

"My brother was killed!" A large man from the back called out. "There is no way we can win without hybrids and bots on our side!”

“We all lost someone,” Trekon said, “but forward momentum is imperative. We have word from intelligence that Crowley has brought Charlie Richards from the past to write code to strengthen the hybrids.”

A gasp went up from the dusty group in front of him.

“That’s impossible!” A voice rang out.

“We have seen many impossible things happen under Crowley’s leadership,” Trekon’s grey head bowed sagely to the crowd. Many heads bobbed in unison, each remembering an unexpected development with Blake Crowley at the helm.

The inseparable duo of Zeke and Tallahassee exchanged a look. They’d been through the trenches together. A couple of Outliers, whose families had been early victims to some of Blake’s less savory skirmishes, when he’d sent out the early hybrids to see if he could round up more humans to live in Crowley. When some families had refused to leave their settlements, and move into the protection of the city, Blake had decided to show the Outliers what could happen if they didn’t have protection.

Bad things happened.

He hadn’t just sent the hybrids, he had sent bots. It had been no contest. Zeke and Tallahassee’s settlement was in the remnants of St. George. Far enough away from Las Vegas that it wouldn’t make too much of a ripple. Their people had been wiped out, all except for the two little boys hiding in the metal water trough out by the cows. They’d held their breaths and ducked under, lasers flying overhead, the algae infested water washing away their tears as they huddled together.

When the battle had died down, they’d risen from the cold water, shivering in the dark night. There was no trace of their parents or the other settlers. The bodies were all gone, as if they’d never existed. Even at six and seven they had realized the raids from Crowley weren’t trying to get resources. The stores of food hadn’t been touched.

Tallahassee and Zeke had lived alone for thirty-three days before Trekon and the Allegiance had found them. The boys had been taken in, raised and trained by the rebels. The only thing they didn’t have to be taught was their hatred of Crowley and the technology that was developed there. The technology that had destroyed their families.

“They’re going to turn every human into a damn machine,” Tallahassee muttered, his hand resting on the hilt of his gun.

“Over my dead body,” hissed Zeke, spitting on the ground and tucking his hair behind his ear.

“Exactly how they’ll do it, too,” Tallahassee muttered.

The two of them were beside the lone non-human in the group, an Enceladusian in fact. “You jump conclusions,” Gunk said, his fluorescent skin glowing in the dim chapel lights.

“Jump to conclusions,” Zeke corrected the seven-foot-tall alien without even thinking about it.

A holographic map projected up from a small sphere on the table in front of Trekon.

“We will lose everything if we do not continue our fight against Crowley and their eager dissemination of the human species. Each loss has made a difference. Either we have weakened their defenses, or we have strengthened our resolve. Now is the time to continue the attack. We have breached their walls and can enter through Northeast Sector 42 and make our way to Trenchtown.”

“That’s a human community!” Tallahassee called out.

“Exactly,” Trekon nodded. “It’s the least guarded. We can also set up a barricade to protect the humans, and who knows, we may win over some more recruits.”

Zeke nodded. “Not a bad idea. We could use the help.”

Tallahassee snorted “We’ll be lucky. What’re we going to say? Fight or die?”

Trekon swiped at the hologram map and it changed to Trenchtown and the surrounding quadrants. “This is where our people are being held,” he said, pointing to a tall metal building adjacent to Trenchtown. “We need to free those people and strengthen our forces on the Northern Wall. We must strengthen our forces in Crowley to hold our ground and stand against the hybrids. Without us, humans will cease to exist.”

The light in the Lowsmith transport passage was low, but Gunk’s fluorescent yellow skin still stood out. Vividly.

“I go with you,” Gunk said. “I want be part of next rebel attack on city.”

“How long you been living with us?” Tallahassee asked the tall fluorescent creature walking in front of him, trying to deflect the conversation from his inevitable no.

“75.63 years. Plus or minus four hours. I can’t remember exactly what time I landed.”

“Well, your English still sucks. “

Gunk’s laugh was like a series of small chirps, like something you might hear from three or four baby birds. They came out of the side valves on his neck.

“I can be a hybrid. Or you can let me run the garbage truck.”

“How the hell are you going to pull off being a bot or a hybrid? There’s no way you can pull off a hybrid. And you would make one weird-ass bot.”

Tallahassee had always felt kind of bad for the guy. Gunk’s ship had landed seventy-five years ago. Long before the Allegiance had even started rebelling. Before the plague, before hybrids were created. At first, Gunk worked with the top-tier technologists in the Crowley Corporation, but he eventually got super bored of that when they started focusing solely on hybrid technology, and started doing tests trying to learn about his planet and how he got here in a spaceship. But soon they started talking about doing stuff to his body. He slipped away one night and never went back. He’d been with the original Allegiance since they first started. The Crowley Corporation had let him go, thinking they had everything they needed out of him. But they didn’t know he could take on the form of a human.

“I go,” Gunk insisted.

“No, and that’s final,” Tallahassee said as he loaded up his weapons and headed to the transport. He had enough problems with the potential loss of the human race. He wasn’t going to take responsibility for Gunk’s people dying out in one attack. It was better that Gunk just stuck to driving the Crowley garbage incinerator.

Zeke shrugged his shoulders towards Gunk. “I can’t say I want to argue with him,” he said. “You are the last of your kind.”

Gunk flitted into human form and shook his head. “One day I help,” he said to the rebels’ retreating backs.

Chapter 18

Charlie's fingers had shooting pains and cramps right underneath his knuckles, the same pains he always got when he was typing furiously. Only this time he wasn't typing. He was trying to work the computer system with his eyes and mind, and his fingers were twitching in time as if he was typing. But he wasn't paying much attention. He was hunched over, shoulders drawn together, and if the shooting pains in his knuckles were noticeable, it was three times as bad in his shoulders. He had always had bad posture, even as a kid he was the slouchy slump. Miss Reynolds had yelled at him every day of his third-grade year to sit up straight. Though, to be fair, she would yell at him not matter what. Miss Reynolds was not a Charlie fan, much like the programmers in this room. His slouching was especially bad when he went to visit his sister. Something about her made him want to shrink away and not be noticed. But right now, he wasn't trying to hide.

He was just trying to fix the code, which would have been hard enough had he been home alone or in the quiet of the Lonely Tree Tavern. But right now, he was locked in the mammoth programming room with bots zinging around the air.

And still, he wasn't unnoticed.

In fact, everybody was watching Charlie, staring over his shoulder and analyzing every single piece of work he did, their lips pressed together and eyes narrowed. Even the programmers in the farthest corner of the room were squinting towards his monitor, many looking as if they were going to ask him any moment for his autograph.

Good thing for Charlie he didn't give a damn. Well, except for the fact they might try to steal his ideas. He shook the thought off. They had been using this code for three hundred years. If anyone wanted to steal anything in it, they could've done it a long time ago. In fact, they must have. How else did they get a hold of it? Charlie certainly didn't give it to them. Jade had said something about Blake buying the company that had bought the company that had bought the company, etc....

Dustin tumbled two metal spheres around and around in his hand, producing an annoying clinking sound. He eyed Charlie with the contempt he felt whenever looking at someone with inferior intelligence (virtually everyone in this city, from his point of view.)

Except for Warren.

He even had to hide his contempt when looking at Blake, because you don't want to look with contempt at a man who can make you disappear forever. Intelligent thinking on Dustin's part.

“Can you help, Mr. Richards, or not?” Of course, Dustin knew Charlie couldn't help. He was a man from simpler days. Still, he had been given orders. “I certainly don't mean to rush you.” He did. “But I have important work to do.”

“Shhh.” Charlie's eyes scanned the screens without looking at Dustin. If he had, he would have seen murder in the man's (kid's, he was just a kid) eyes. Charlie was lost in the numbers and symbols in front of him. He had agreed to fix the code and he was going to do his best. But he wasn't an idiot. When he finished fixing the code and went back to his time, he was going to watch his code a lot more carefully and he was pretty sure he wasn't going to give it over to the company who had him slated at the very bottom of a team of programmers.

Charlie's face pulled up into a tight-lipped grin as his eyes scanned the dark screen looking for the corrupted strings of numbers and letters.

Here was the problem with Charlie trying to fix the code.

Ho-ly shit!

His conceptual code was two hundred and forty-eight letters long. What he saw in front of him was seemingly infinite. The main screen displaying the master code was the size of the USS Enterprise. Beneath that was thousands of smaller screens, each showing one specific part of the code and controlled by the eyes of one of the programmers. Charlie was given control of the main screen. These monitors were like clear boards floating two-inches above a silver background that looked like it was made of something like mercury. Everything ran in black on top of the glass screen and was controlled by the eyes. If you look to the corners of the screen you could control scrolling. Double blinking moved the entire page up. Apparently, this floating glass screen over the moving backdrop of mercury was supposed to be easier on the eyes.

Honestly, it just put Charlie to sleep.

Charlie had been looking at this code for the past eight hours and was completely lost. It wasn't just the vast size of the code, but its complexity that was astounding. The code was like looking out at the universe, complete with all its galaxies and internal solar systems. The Big Bang (Charlie's original code as it apparently came to be known) may be easy to identify, but how everything was connected became murky. Every little solar system was living in a pocket, but the rules of the galaxy applied to that pocket. While there were similarities in different solar systems, they all really functioned on their own. Yet they were completely connected by the universe. To further complicate matters, the planets in each solar system had different races speaking different languages.

This code had all that and more.

The complex hierarchy, the odd exceptions to the rules, the different programming languages. It was impossible to navigate ten galaxies looking for the problem. And this universe had over two hundred.

To top it off, it was constantly evolving right before Charlie's eyes. He just wanted to sleep.

Maybe that was what everybody was watching for. Charlie could feel Dustin's eyes on him and knew without a doubt that was what he was waiting for. The moment the great creator, the hero from the future, just face-planted the keyboard. Fast asleep while trying to save the world.

Charlie couldn't even blink himself awake. Blink too much, you get hopelessly lost in the code as the connected solar systems moved all over the place.

This learning curve sucked.

He had learned that to move his eyes away from the screen, he had to gently close them and then turn his head so the computer stopped tracking his eye movement. He did so now to look up at Dustin. His slick look gave Charlie the heebie-jeebies.

"Can we take a break?" Charlie asked, his voice low, but he couldn't stop his eyes from sweeping around the room for a moment at all the people still staring at him. Like they have nothing better to do all day? "Or maybe I should say, can I take a break? Because none of the rest of you are really doing anything. Did you notice that?" He asked.

But his glance around the room wasn't met with any hostility or judgment. In fact, everyone other than Dustin was staring at him like he was the guy who created everything. Charlie was still trying to get used to which ones were hybrids and which were just humans, but the easiest way for him to tell is the hybrids looked at him like he was God. Like he was the guy who invented the iPhone or the Microsoft Office suite or Facebook. Only, Facebook and the iPhone and Microsoft Office are vague blips in history to these people. Some point on a timeline of technological progression.

It's amazing, Charlie thought. Steve Jobs, Bill Gates, Mark Zuckerberg... they're like Galileo and Newton to these people. Shit. I am, for that matter.

There was no way Charlie could stop the face-splitting grin erupting across his face. Bigger than Zuckerberg. When he got home, he was going to have T-shirts made for sure. It would be his little inside joke. No one back in 2017 was ever going to know what he was talking about, but it was good enough for him.

"No," Dustin said. "You cannot take a break." Charlie's attention was jolted back. Dustin snapped his fingers. They gave a strange metallic click that rang hollowly in Charlie's ears. Charlie glanced over. Of course, Dustin was a Gamma hybrid. That should have been obvious. Sleek, simple, yet crushing. "I'll have some food and drink brought to you."

"Well, could you at least clear the room a little bit?" Charlie asked.

The corner of Dustin's mouth lifted in the tiniest hint of a smile, or maybe it was a sneer. "A little nervous?" Dustin asked.

Charlie's brows knit together. Dustin knew who Zuckerberg was. He knew Jobs and Gates. And he sure as shit didn't think Charlie was bigger than them.

Always callous, even though Charlie wrote the code to save human life. What have the other three ever done? Zuckerberg created a marketing website where people could share photos of lasagna. Gates created something people could type into then spent his career shutting down small start-ups. If you can't beat them, buy them. And okay, Jobs was cool. But still, his company developed a new system of communication so we could hail a cab with a single finger. How is that impressive, having to use a finger? You could order pizza at the touch the button and check the weather in Chesapeake. Seriously, how important was all that stuff? Charlie had written code to save lives. But from the look on Dustin's face, well, Dustin really didn't give a damn.

"Fine," Charlie said. "I don't need a break. I need some space."

"Fine," Dustin deadpanned back. "Team, get yourselves the hell out of here." Dustin circled his pointer finger in the air, encompassing all the other programmers who were standing around and then pointed at the door. They all filed out in a single row, throwing frowns at Charlie.

Charlie looked at Dustin expectantly.

"I'm not going anywhere," said Dustin, sitting himself comfortably in a chair and putting his feet up on the desk. "I know there's nothing special about you. And I'm going to sit here and watch you prove it."

Charlie rolled his eyes. This isn't exactly what he had had in mind when he heard he was going to the future to be a hero. He took a deep breath. Every hero has an enemy. Every hero must battle against a naysayer, a jerk face. Dustin was just Charlie's jerk face. Charlie turned back towards the machine.

He needed to simplify things. When looking at a complex structure, the first rule was to simplify. He needed to get back to what he knew. What he knew was the Big Bang, because the big bang was his code. Charlie zoomed in on what most closely resembled his original code. It had been edited and had evolved, but he recognized it. As Jade had once told him in a tavern, the most important two hundred and forty-eight characters in human history, and they were thanks to him. In there, he could recognize Charlie, because he knew Charlie's code when he saw it (being Charlie.)

Dustin began to cough uncontrollably. He grabbed his stomach. Charlie stood up thinking it might be useful to pat Dustin on the back. It sounded like he was choking. But Dustin waved him off. "It's nothing." He hacked out the words.

Charlie could see a different side of Dustin, though. His eyes were losing color, literally becoming transparent, and they portrayed fear.

"Did...did you find anything yet?" Dustin murmured.

Charlie returned to the screen and his portion of the code. In there, maybe he could find a solution.

Chapter 19

A clock ticked quietly on the wall as MediBots whizzed around Robin's room. Blake thought of it as Robin's now. It was no longer his room. Robin almost never left it. This was her place and he desperately wanted her out of here. As desperately as he had ever wanted anything before.

"I feel like I am a desert," Robin moaned. "I can't stand it. I hate the desert, I hate the heat. But I can't get away from it! It's inside me, it's drying me up and turning me onto parchment."

"Your skin is holding up well," Blake said. "Nothing is going to happen to you."

"It already did," she said.

"Don't worry. We're going to solve the hybrid problem," Blake said, turning her face towards him. He hated looking into those dark and hollow eyes, but if there was any way she could see him, she had to see his face. She had to know he believed there was a cure and he was doing everything in his power to cure the disease.

"I don't think you get it, Blake," she said. "The hybrids don't have a problem." Her eyes were dark and blind, but her lips trembled as she spoke the words that she'd clearly been pondering for a while. "Blake, the hybrids are the problem. We shouldn't exist. We are an affront to the order of things, where people get sick and die; but we have re-engineered them, you have re-engineered us into this." Her fingers clawed mechanically in the air, motioning towards her eyes.

"Don't say that," Blake said, bowing until his broad forehead pressed against her bony shoulder. "Don't say hybrids are the problem." His voice was tense, straining against the cords in his throat.

His body began to shake. And the little metal wires inside his wife's eyes whirled in circles as she tried to tilt her head towards him. Her hand grappling, their fingers uncontrollably clutching at nothing. "I'm dying, Blake," she said. "And I don't mind."

"You will not die," Blake said, his words muffled against the white linen of her nightgown.

Monfils stood with Jade in command central watching the lights as they moved through the complicated fields floating in the air before them. He pressed his fingers against his temple. "They are breaching the barricade by the Northern Wall.”

Jade pressed her lips together. What the hell were the Lowsmiths thinking? Just because they’d had a bit of success, they thought it was a good idea to try and break into Crowley. Were they idiots? Had they no idea what they were up against?

“It looks like they’re heading towards Trenchtown,” Monfils glanced sideways at Jade. He didn’t want her to go, but telling Jade what to do was the last thing that had ever worked in his life.

Jade frowned at the dots moving across the map. “Why the hell would they want to go to Trenchtown,” she muttered. “Angelo?”

The giant red monster ran the data. “They have prisoners in Roedwane Tower,” he said moments later.

“That’s their target,” Jade said, already heading towards the door.

“Jade,” Monfils said. “You don’t have to be the first responder to every tiny issue.” But he knew his word were falling on deaf ears. Jade always did what she wanted, which was rarely what Monfils would have liked. It was one of the things he loved about her. One of the things that made her such a challenge. “Keep an eye on her,” he muttered at Angelo, who dutifully followed Jade out of the room.

Tallahassee and Zeke ran through the streets trying to get out of the way of the HEL blasts that kept coming for them. They were outmanned and outgunned. The Lowsmith efforts to infiltrate Trenchtown had gone alright, except they were nowhere near getting into the tower that housed Frank. Their squad had been separated, and now Zeke and Tallahassee were on the run on the edge of Trenchtown with no backup. They turned a corner and came to a screeching halt. A dead end. They dove behind a metal air vent rising out of the ground. Three Delta hybrids were hot on their trail. A HEL blasted the metal they were hiding behind.

“We’re never going to make it out,” Zeke said.

“Just keep firing,” Tallahassee growled, sweat beading across his furrowed brow as he threw himself out from behind the shelter and fired at the three hybrids who had them cornered like rats in the cellar.

“I’m telling you, we got to come up with another plan. My HEL is giving out and they’re going to keep coming.” Zeke’s eyes flew wildly around the dead-end where he and Tallahassee had ended up. How could they have been so stupid as to not divert their location before they ended up so completely and utterly trapped?

Novitza, a young Delta hybrid, stared down the dead end. “I think we have them,” she said, her HELs trained towards where the rebels were hiding. One of her eyes was going a bit blurry, but the scanner in her other was still doing okay. She wiped sweat off her brow and glanced over at Goran. “Do you see them?” she asked shakily.

Goran didn't respond.

"Goran?" Novitza turned her head, trying to locate Goran with her good eye. She gasped when she saw him lying out in the alley, out of cover and twitching. "Manya?" she hissed. Manya was supposed to be behind her. Manya was Goran's fiancée. Novitza's eye was going dark, but she could just make out the dark figure of Manya crawling along the alley, her breath coming in deep sharp squeaks until it stopped as she threw herself on Goran's body and both lay still.

Novitza crouched low and felt her way out to the bodies of her partners. Each breath she took felt like her body was being ripped in two, like her innards were being torn apart.

She was supposed to live forever. They all were. All the hybrids were going to be the future gods of the planet. That's what they'd been told.

Her hands fumbled in the dark world. It was all that was left to her now that her eyes had gone. Novitza's cold fingers pressed against Manya's wrist, but there was no pulse. Novitza gasped as she slumped forward. Even if she'd wanted to check Goran's pulse, she wasn't able to. Her body was growing cold as Novitza rolled onto her back, blind face to the heavens, her last breath sliced through her body and left her dead.

"What do you want to do? Attack them?" Tallahassee asked.

"Maybe we should," Zeke said, hitting his laser gun against the wall trying to reboot the generator. "It's got to be better than waiting here to get picked off.

"You're an asshole," Tallahassee spat the words out. "Who the hell thinks they can take an 80% hybrid? We're only human, dumbass."

"Just cover me, shithead." Zeke said. Before Tallahassee could do anything else, Zeke ran out from their cover. screaming into the air and getting ready to wreak havoc on the three hybrids who were...

Lying on a pile on the ground?

"What the fuck?" Tallahassee stood up from behind the rusty metal barrel where they had been hiding.

"Take this," Zeke said, kicking the hybrid nearest him.

"You didn't do that," Tallahassee said.

"They were so scared of me they just fell over dead," Zeke said.

"That's not what I saw."

"How the hell do you know? You were hiding like a little bitch behind the barrel." Zeke gloated.

Tallahassee shook his head. "Come on, let's get the fuck out of here." Without a backward glance as to whether Zeke was following him or not, he ducked out into the shadows of the burning city and headed back to safety of the rebel lines.

Jade pushed open the door and stepped into the alley. She'd just been about to break up the fight between the hybrids and the rebels when the hybrids started falling over. The rebels had escaped, mostly because Jade had let them. She had a soft spot for the Lowsmiths and had often wondered if she just shouldn't get her parents to join them and live as humans off the grid, out of Crowley. She'd even gone so far as to research their location, something she'd been uber careful to not share with Blake or Warren. She didn't like killing humans because they were human, even if they were fighting against Blake.

She crouched slowly, tucking her DC15s pistol into its holster where the HEL could re-charge. She had something the rebels certainly didn't; a fusion charger in her belt.

Her long white fingers went to the necks of each hybrid in turn. They were stone cold dead. And their bodies were growing cold faster than a human corpse would. But these guys were extreme Deltas, practically all synthetic. They were barely hybrid at all. More like droids.

Jade chewed her lip. Her eyes caught the distant tower of Blake Enterprises, where she knew Charlie was trying to fix the code.

The only thing she didn't know was if he was going to do it in time.

A massive cramp moved through her stomach, convulsing her body forward. She lost her balance, falling on top of the hybrids' corpses in front of her. She stifled the yelp of pain coming up through her throat. There might still be rebels around. There was no need to let them know she was here.

Exhaling slowly through her teeth, she pressed her hand against the fleshy stomach of a dead hybrid and raised herself slowly to her knees. Beads of sweat appeared all over her body and a raging heat wave washed through her.

"Holy shit." Her breath came slow as she tried to gain control of her body and let the searing pain of the heat waves roll over her. Her body hunched forward over the vacant eyes of the hybrids' corpses.

"Charlie, you better hurry the fuck up," she whispered.

"What the fuck is going on out there?" Warren asked Monfils as he entered Command Central. "I was in the middle of my mineral spa. I thought you had this whole thing under control."

"It is under control," Monfils stopped himself before he rolled his eyes. One didn't roll their eyes at Warren. "The breach in the Northern Wall saw an influx of Lowsmiths. The Deltas are in their clearing them out."

He didn't bother to tell Warren that a few of the Deltas were dropping like flies out on the field. A fact more troubling to Monfils than a few Lowsmiths out and about in Crowley. Jade had buzzed him and told him she'd seen three fall stone-dead practically from an upright position.

"How many breached?" Warren asked.

“We’re not quite-,” Monfils began.

“You’re not quite sure!” Warren exploded, his black brooding ProtectoBot, Genesis II, looming darkly over his shoulder.

But Monfils didn’t scare easily. “They don’t wear chips like the rest of us,” he said. “So, we think about twenty made it in.”

“How many do we have locked up from the attacks earlier?” Warren asked.

“Ten.” Monfils quickly calculated the number in his head.

“You only have ten prisoners?” Warren was incredulous. “Who is handling this?”

“I am.” Monfils fixed Warren with a steely gaze. “And the hybrids are the ones out there getting their hands dirty. Unfortunately for us, we seem to have contracted a disease, at least the Deltas have, and they are literally out there dying. So, forgive me if we’re not catching every little rat that seems to be getting away from your killer bots.”

Warren scowled at Monfils, but he hadn’t gotten into his position by pissing everyone off. “I understand, and we are trying our hardest to get the disease under control. In the meantime, have one of your people select a Lowsmith prisoner from the tower and have them on standby.”

Monfils frowned, but nodded. He never liked Warren’s tactics, but he wasn’t going to go against a direct order from Blake’s second in command. He pressed a finger against his temple to relay the order.

Chapter 20

Charlie's eyes glared into the moving sea of code, the CodeSwarm, as he took a massive bite of sandwich a ServBot had placed before him. He quickly grabbed the thermos in front of him and slugged back its contents before glaring at Dustin. "What the hell is this?" He held up the remains of the ham sandwich.

"Ham sandwich," Dustin said. "Isn't that what you said you wanted?"

"Salty as all get out," Charlie frowned. "I can't get the salt out of my mouth."

"My bad," and Dustin said. "I didn't realize you needed haute cuisine to code."

"It's not real, is it?" Charlie asked.

"The chemical compounds that made it are real," Dustin shrugged. "But last I checked we're not farming pigs. We're saving humanity."

"I sit here coding for ten hours and you feed me a computer chip." Charlie stood up. The chair he had been sitting in rolled slowly backwards as he stretched his aching muscles. "I have to pee."

"Why do people ever feel the need to share that information with anyone?" Dustin's lip curled in distaste.

"I think I've got it," Charlie ignored him. "I just I got to take a piss before I check the numbers again. Then I'm going to check it one last time before we flip the switch. I don't want anything in there to be wrong."

"You sure as hell don't," Dustin said. "You'll lose the demigod status you've earned over the last three hundred years."

"You're a piece of work, man," Charlie said, shaking his head. "I'm really just here trying to help people out. I don't want your job. I don't want anything, so why don't you get off my ass?"

Before Dustin could say anything, Charlie walked out of the room.

Dustin stared at the door as it slid shut. This was a complete and utter waste of his time. He held his hand up in the air and counted down from five, pointing at the door when he got to one.

The door slid open. Charlie stared at Dustin, who sat in exactly the same place, his arms folded over his chest.

"Take a left, then another left, then a right, go way down the hall. You'll find a ProtectoBot there who will scan your retinas to check your clearance. Then pass through the ionized pressure vapor —" “What’s an ionized pressure vapor?” Charlie frowned.

Dustin rolled his eyes. “It’s like a face steam. It’ll clean off the sludge that could be lingering on you from this area.”

“Fine. Left. Left. Right. Retina scan. Ionized pressure vapor pass. Then what?”

Dustin was a bit taken aback he’d followed all that. He nodded begrudgingly. “Fifth door on the right to the toilet.” He held up five fingers and cocked his head to the right.

“Thanks.” Charlie didn’t really mean it, but his mother had raised him right.

Dustin waited until the doors slipped quietly shut. He counted to ten and carefully pressed the button. The doors were locked and he was sure to be uninterrupted. He’d given Charlie the wrong directions. But despite how much he did not like Charlie, Dustin knew he wasn’t an idiot. He was just a 21st century guy in the 24th century. Eventually he would find the bathroom and make his way back here to the control room.

Dustin touched his temple to connect to Warren. “Are you still awake?”

“Of course,” Warren mutters. “That is my upgrade. I don’t need to sleep.”

Dustin rolled his eyes. Must be nice to pick and choose exactly the way you want to be without having to fill out any paperwork.

“Look, I only have a few minutes,” Dustin said, making sure to control his voice just enough. Warren hated insolence and he was about to get on his bad side. Not when they were so close to completing this task.

“Fine. Do it. I’ll watch,” Warren said, as if he wasn’t always watching already.

Dustin only had a few minutes.

But it was all he needed. He blinked in Morse code at the computer. An archaic language nobody else knew. He had programmed it into the machine a long time ago so he could quickly access his and the corporation’s files in nanoseconds. Using a combination of deft finger moves and eye blinks, he opened up multiple screens, moved over code from a file deeply wrapped and protected tightly on his computer to one he had spent the last eighteen months agonizing over. This one was going to make his name. It would make him bigger than Charlie. He was going to be the name people remembered in the future. His name wouldn’t just live three hundred years, it would live forever. Where Charlie had a gold statue, Dustin would have a platinum building with his likeness at the top of it. All he had to do was carefully get his code and stick it in the middle of Charlie’s.

He blinked at the file. Unraveled it like a tightly wound spring. Two fingers swishes to the left. Engage it. Blink. Blink. Blink. Wrap it back up. Triple twitch with the right hand. And shove it into the background in a place where Charlie with all of his 21st century knowledge wouldn’t even know where to find it.

And nobody else would care.

Because Dustin and Warren would have all the power in Crowley.

Graham Chattaway had thought he was living the dream.

As a young aspiring programmer, he had dreamed of being accepted into Crowley Academy for Hybrids (CAH). He was born with a potentially fatal birth defect, but if he graduated in the top five percent of his class he would automatically be eligible for government assisted hybrid reassignment procedure.

He studied every moment of his life. Programming was the most elite field in the 24th century, and his goal was to be the elite of the elite. To get in the room where it happened, working on the hybrid code to help better the evolution of the human race.

By fifteen, he knew everything there was to know about modern programming. He knew everything there was to know about the history of the code and the birth of hybrid technology. He knew nothing there was to know about virtually everything else. But that didn't matter when he got accepted into CAH, and graduated second in his class. He would have been first had it not been for the fact they made them take a class in political obedience. That was BS. Still, second was good enough to get him a completely funded hybrid reassessment.

After that, at the young age of twenty-two, he achieved his life-long dream. He excelled in programming and rose through the ranks. Graham was relocated to work in the big room itself. The Big Room! Where the Malcom code, the brain and heart code of hybrid technology, was written. There he got to work on vital parts of the code, and even got to work with Dustin Bovey himself!

He was living the dream.

So, he thought. It was mere peanuts compared to whom he met in the hallway that day. The man he had read every book on, watched every movie, downloaded every Wiki file into his internal neurodrive.

Charlie. Fucking. Richards.

Charlie Richards had gotten hopelessly lost. All the hallways were sterile white and having any sense of direction was impossible. He thought he found a cafeteria at one point, but all the machines required a retina scan that obviously didn't register. He was quite ready to take a piss on them if this went on much longer. But now he was in some other white hallway that looked like the last ten he had been in.

“Oh. My. God.”

Charlie turned to look at the voice. It was a young kid, he looked fifteen with his wiry build. His eyes were wide as plates.

“You’re...” It slid out of the kid’s mouth like spitting up oatmeal. Then, a long silence.

Charlie didn’t have time for the rest of the sentence. “Hey. You know where I can find a bathroom in this place?”

Mumble mumble came the reply.

“Okay, thanks. Appreciate it.” Charlie turned to continue down the endless hallways. Why was everything so weird in this world? He just wanted to eat fish ‘n chips at a restaurant named after him.

“You’re him!”

Charlie turned to the voice of the kid. His eyes were still wide as plates. He blinked once and came racing up to Charlie.

“I’m sorry. Hi. Sorry to bug you. Hi!” The words came spitting out at a ludicrous speed. “I’m Graham. I’m a fan. I mean, I know your work. You’re Charlie Richards! I studied your work.”

“Great!” Charlie said with mock excitement. He wasn’t in the mood. “So, that bathroom...”

Graham looked like he was going to start jumping up and down. “I mean, the Big Bang code was, I mean, it was the most beautiful thing ever created.”

“Appreciate that. Now, that bathroom?”

“One. Forward slash forward slash loop and create individuals. Two. For parenthesis, dollar sign I equals zero, dollar sign I is less than count, parenthesis dollar sign this period people parenthesis...” Graham continued on. He recited the whole damn original code verbatim. “Mr. Richards, I am your number one fan.”

“You know what, Graham? I believe you.”

“The Big Bang code is the most important discovery this world has ever known!”

“The Big Bang?”

“Sorry, that what it’s known as now. Your initial code. Centuries of programmers have come and gone and advanced your work, but your code was the beginning of it all.”

Charlie took a step back towards the kid. What he said had started wheels turning. “How many iterations of the code had there been?”

Graham laughed. “How much time do you have?”

“Very little.” Charlie’s face was not amiable.

The smile left Graham’s face. He was reminded why Charlie was here. He was reminded that a plague was hitting hybrids. He was reminded that he was hybrid. “It’s been three centuries of programmers working on this. Well, two. No one really knew what you had stumbled upon for a long time. Then came a French programmer named Enzo. Enzo’s code helped create the first hybrid mouse. It didn’t come without problems; the mouse became incredibly angry when cheese was withheld. But it did live unnaturally long for a mouse, and that got noticed. Companies began investing heavily in the technology. The competition became fierce. Each company wanted to have their own improvement on the technology, and it became a wild west showdown to produce hybrid prototypes.”

As Charlie listened, his thoughts turned to his own code and what the effects of people using it to build technology upon were. Graham continued about the evolution of the code, and how it was that Blake Crowley cornered the market on it eventually, but Charlie's mind was back with his original code. What was tricky is he didn't know the end product his code had become in the 21st century since he wasn't done his work when Jade had come. Perhaps he worked on it another fifteen years, who knew? (Besides Graham, who seemed to know everything about it.) There was one thing that Charlie Richards did know about the code that no one else knew. Not Blake or Jade or even this kid.

Charlie Richards kept secrets in all his codes. The only person that could ever decipher it was him. It wasn't complex, or for security reasons, it was because Charlie had created ways to fix his own mistakes he knew he was making later. What if he hadn't fixed it and they were still there? No one would have known where to look except for Charlie.

Jade was right. The only person who could fix this code was Charlie Richards.

Chapter 21

“The door is stuck,” Charlie’s voice reverberated through the metal doors as he beat against it with his fist.

Dustin twitched a couple of fingers on top of the desk and the door slid open. He was sitting right where Charlie left him, leaning casually back in his chair as if he’d spent the entire time staring up at the ceiling.

Only, Charlie wasn’t alone when he had gone to the bathroom. In the end, he had found not just Graham, but all the programmers. They had been sent out of the room at the final moment but hadn’t gone very far. In fact, they were just outside in the hallway waiting for the opportunity to come back in.

And in they had come, filing directly behind Charlie. Only they had multiplied. It wasn’t just ten or fifteen programmers, it was thirty-five or forty squeezed into every space of the room watching his final moments. The message had gotten around that they thought Charlie had figured something out. And everyone wanted to be there at his side the moment the new code was downloaded and the death and destruction wreaking havoc on Crowley’s hybrids was ended.

“All right, this is it,” Charlie rubbed his hands together as he walked with purpose towards the CodeSwarm. He was refreshed, relieved, and ready to go.

Here’s what Charlie Richards remembered while talking to Graham. Charlie had a habit of corrupting his code at an alarming rate. It was what evened him out as a programmer back in his 21st century life; why he was ranked 86th of 89th at his mid-sized Topeka, Kansas computer company. His programming was innovative, but almost always filled with bugs. The bugs tended to be unusual but common mistakes only he would make. The positive from that was he wrote code to fix his own code. This, in truth, was the real genius behind Charlie Richards’s work. Not just the work himself, but the code that fixes code was years ahead of what MIT coders were working on with their “Helium” project.

The thing was, he knew his code fixes that he put at the end of every coding block worked in very particular ways. In essence, they worked backwards to the start of the coding block before leapfrogging the programming fix to the next block. It couldn’t be a simple repeat of the coding block, because if it ran the programming fix again, then was prompted to go the beginning, it would be stuck in an endless loop.

On top of that, his code had been bridged with new genetic code.

Now, surely programmers that came years, even centuries, after him would notice the point of the code. But programming errors are like when chromosomes are off in the human body, they manifest themselves in brutal ways. And generations of minute errors built upon by the next lead to corruption over time. Like the 19th century family of the Fugates in Kentucky where inbreeding over generations eventually lead to them being blue.

The thing was, there were simple fixes that no one other than Charlie Richards could make, no matter how brilliant the computer scientists to come were. Because they were idiotic mistakes. The future contributors to the code made their biggest mistake thinking Charlie Richards was an unrecognized genius.

The key was in the code that fixed the code. Charlie would hide a hidden link in the fixer code that referenced a third-party application his friend wrote. If that link was obsolete, it would break the fixer code. He always hyperlinked the same word when he did this; Trebek.

Charlie needed to fix Trebek, then the code would fix itself.

Easier said than done with trillions of lines of code. But Charlie was happy to see talking computers did wonders for navigating this. As did computer chip ham sandwiches. As did the throngs of admirers looking over his shoulder.

Charlie worked. And he worked. And he worked.

The problem for Dustin was Charlie really was a genius. The fact he wrote the Big Bang code centuries earlier that was still the foundation for the most important project in history was impressive. And equally as impressive was that the fixing he did on the code now was so simple. He never would of think hyperlinks were the issue, it was too archaic of a solution. Neither had anyone else. There was a simplistic brilliance to it all.

But he couldn't let Charlie know that. He needed Charlie on edge. But he also needed to code to be fixed for Warren's plan to work.

Things were going along smashingly.

Charlie stared at the swirling world of the code universe. He didn't dare blink or look in any direction. He prayed he wouldn't do anything to throw the machines off, because the code looked perfect. It was all carefully back in place, and riding together in a way to stop the problems everybody was having. The Malcom code was bridged.

He was sure of it now. Like healthy blood lines moving throughout a body, lights were moving from his code out to the greater universe of code that governed the Hybrids.

Charlie took a deep breath and let it out slowly. He blinked his eyes even slower and slid his face away from the screen.

“The hybrids are fixed,” he said. “It’s done.”

Chapter 22

Dustin looked sideways at Charlie's face. God, he hated the simplicity with which Charlie said that the code was fixed. It wasn't because Charlie was cocky. He wasn't. It was because Charlie knew he was right. And every damn programmer in the room believed him, too. Not just because he was Charlie Richards, Godfather of all hybrids, but because, well, he believed in himself.

Now, as the crowd exploded in cheers accented by some whoops and hollers, Dustin felt a grudging respect for Charlie, a respect he would never admit to.

One of the guys let out some sort of loud trilling sound that stood out above the others. Charlie wasn't sure what the hell it was about, but he felt his heart swell at his success.

Dustin sat there and eyed the raucous crowd, the corners of his mouth pulled up in the tiniest smirk. He raised a single black-gloved hand and silenced everyone.

"You don't even know if it works yet," he said. "Don't be fools. Some guy stares at a code swarm for hours and now you're all caterwauling like some tomcat in heat because you think he's solved all the problems of this little town."

Truth be told, Dustin was torn. Eighteen months' worth of his work was wrapped up inside Charlie's code. He needed Charlie's plan to work. Not just because he was a hybrid and would succumb to the disease like every other hybrid was falling, but he needed Charlie's code to work so that he could live forever through the work he had just implemented in the code.

But he still hated sitting here listening to these idiots cheering on some guy just because he turned around and said he deserved to be cheered on.

"Push the code through," Charlie said, his voice even quieter than the stillness that had descended upon all of the programmers.

Dustin sputtered and considered losing his shit for a second, but all eyes had turned on him and he wasn't going to let them see he was feeling outclassed. He ran a hand over his smooth hair as if it needed it.

"Who do you think you are?" he whispered. "You don't just push things through around here. You don't just make decisions that will affect more than half the population of Crowley without getting the approval from the man himself."

“You don’t know how to do it?” Charlie asked.

“Of course, I know how to do it,” Dustin responded, irritation deep to his toes. “But I don’t have to. It’s already in their system and the system will automatically push it out to the hybrids. This is not the point. The point is, you don’t own this town. This town owns you. The only reason why you’re here is to fix this problem.”

Charlie’s eyebrows knit together.

“Well, I have fixed the problem,” he said.

And before Dustin realized exactly what Charlie was doing, Charlie pressed the fail-safe button on the surface of the desk, which would ensure they could always do a manual reboot. The very button that would reset the computer with the core hybrid code on it. Upon rebooting, it would push the new code out to all the hybrids.

“No!” Dustin cried, lunging forward, but it was too late. Charlie’s finger was already pressed deep into the button. The machine was already shutting off. The room held its breath, save for one guy in the corner who seemed to have a cold and sneezed into the silence.

“Bless you,” Charlie said as the whirs and beeps of the CompuVerse behind him started up again and the code was pushed out to every hybrid of Crowley.

Dustin sagged against the glass desk, his arms holding himself up weakly, then fell forward. What if it was wrong? What if the code was wrong? What if Charlie’s code was wrong? What if something terrible happened? He wasn’t afraid of losing people. Warren, though, Warren was somebody to be afraid of. It wasn’t just the power behind the throne, he was the one who wielded the ax. And Warren would never do anything publicly to Charlie, he couldn’t. But now that he had Dustin’s code... if there was anything wrong with Charlie’s fix or Dustin’s code, Dustin knew exactly who was going to take the blame.

It would be him.

“Screens on,” Dustin said, pushing himself off the desk. There was still time, they just needed to figure out if the code worked. If the code didn’t work, he was going to have to do something about it, or at least disappear. If the code did work, he was going to have to make sure he stayed as close to Charlie as possible so maybe some of the gold would rub off on him.

The room descended into silence with a bit of whispering, everyone’s eyes on the screens lining the walls.

Charlie scanned them along with everyone else. He was looking for Jade, but buried in the random screens, he didn’t see her. It troubled him how much that worried him. What if the code didn’t work? He had no idea exactly how long it would take for the code to travel from the CompuVerse in to the hybrids. The problem was, all the cameras were centered on various spaces in Crowley headquarters and random street scenes. Every programmer was trying to find a sick hybrid who maybe wasn’t quite as sick anymore.

But like everything else, the screens were set to focus on whatever they were told. And not many people knew the code to reset them. Except, Dustin did. He thought for a moment.

“Josie-968,” he said. At first it didn’t seem like anything had happened.

Then a couple of screens blinked as cameras synced to a different network and the scenes switched from random street scenes to the hybrid hospital. All the screens in the room switched until all ten were connected to a different camera viewing the patient floor. Delta hybrids lay everywhere. The cameras were surprisingly close in some areas, but still not close enough. Dustin scanned the screens and focused on one that seemed to have a decent angle.

“Niko X5, zoom in,” Dustin commanded. Charlie glanced over at him. The kid was a snot, but he sure seemed to have a lot of information stored in his brain. How do you randomly remember a camera name... and get it right? The camera, which initially scanning the entire room, suddenly stopped and zoomed in so quickly they were suddenly staring at a black screen.

“Back up,” Charlie said.

Dustin glared at him, but didn’t say anything as the camera obeyed Charlie’s command.

“Zoom to face.” Dustin took control. The camera focused on the flesh and bone that signified this was, indeed, a face. The gore took up the entire screen. The Delta hybrid lay there, its eyes open, staring at the ceiling. Its head rolled to the side and everyone could see the burnt-out eyes rolling back in its head. Its body started twitching.

“The code is downloading,” someone in the room whispered, and everybody leaned forward ever so slightly to see what the hybrid’s next breath would bring.

Except for Charlie, he was staring at another screen, a screen looking at a street in Trenchtown as a lithe, dark haired woman stepped into view. She held her gun cocked and straight out, aimed at nothing, her eyes wide and staring.

A cool breeze caressed Jade and soothed the lines of her face. She raised her chin into it, hoping to cool down. Her body was heating up.

New code, she thought.

The new code was clicking into place. Her other hand flexed with a sharp intake of breath.

Charlie, I hope you got this right. She looked up at the camera that she knew was there, cameras were always there, scanning her and everyone in Crowley. Everyone that wasn’t above the line, which was everyone except for two people.

Her eyes flickered back in her head and she leaned against the wall waiting for the code to update completely. The world closed in, dark and ominous around her. Breath came shallow. Was this the right code? Or was this something else?

She bowed her head, body sagging. The code had given her a longer life. She’d be dead right now if it wasn’t for this hybrid extension to her life, but as a Delta... she was powerless. Code updated at the will of Blake. It wasn't Charlie who was like a god, he was an angel, the hands of the god.

Still, she needed this. If she was ever to save her parents and give them what they deserved, she needed to live, whatever the cost.

Her eyes closed and though she didn't believe in a single god, in that moment, Jade prayed it worked.

Charlie leaned towards the screen, barely stopping his hand from reaching out towards it. Had he gotten it wrong? Jade was sagging against the wall, her eyes closed and it looked like she was about to slump to the ground. His eyes flicked to the screen showing the hospital.

The hybrid's eyes closed and still its eyeballs twitched under the skin. His mouth opened, his jaw moved in time to his jerking eyeballs.

The room of programmers held their collective breaths. Charlie held his breath, his muscles, and every atom in his body barely together.

Beads of sweat poured out of the gray skin of the sick Delta hybrid's face. The camera lurched to not lose sight of the pitiful figure, and the whole room moved with the camera, every person trying to maintain the balance and keep eyes on the hybrid. The hybrid's eyes shot open, only to turn away from the camera.

Jade's head lolled back, her mouth open and gasping for air. The download was complete and she felt... possibly better than she'd felt in the long time.

Charlie tilted forward in his chair. He couldn't tell from the screen how Jade was feeling. The camera was too far away.

He whipped around to look at the hybrid in the hospital, who was scanning the rest of the room before slowly turning its gaze directly towards the camera.

A mammoth round of cheers and screams went up from the programmers. The hybrid's eyes were perfectly bright and clear. The burnt-out shells were gone. Whatever code Charlie had installed in the CompuVerse had super powers to heal. Now with the new code, healing was possible.

Jade stared directly at the camera, smiling. She gave it the thumbs-up, hoping Charlie was watching. He was. His thumb lifted in response, even though she couldn't see him. The camera switched off, but Charlie, beside himself with delight, threw his arms around Dustin and gave the CIO a very uncool, non-programmer hug.

Blake's hand flew, swatting a MediBot away from his wife. Her eyes had closed and her lids were twitching. Why the hell hadn't they told him they were ready to do it? He should have been warned. This was his experiment, bringing Charlie here and having him work on the code.

He gripped Robin's hand. She was getting the update. He knew he should call Warren and give him a ration of shit, but it was the last thing Blake wanted to do right now. His heart hammered in his chest in a way that he would never admit to as he stared down at Robin's tremulous body accepting new code.

For a second she stopped breathing.

Then suddenly, her eyes sprang open and she gasped for a breath.

Blake stared down into the bright blue eyes of his wife.

Robin was healed.

And for the first time in what seemed like months, Blake Crowley felt like he could finally breathe again.

If Dustin went to Warren expecting any level of accolades, he was sorely mistaken as he walked into Command Central. In fact, Warren looked incredibly annoyed.

"It better be right," he muttered to the young CTO.

Dustin didn't need to be told that, but he was far too smooth to let Warren see him sweat. "Oh, it's right."

"Prove it," Warren said.

Dustin was a little taken aback. "You want me to give you control over all of them, right now?" he asked.

Warren shook his head. "No. Let's do a test case."

"Okay, I have this Delta down in -"

"Go big or get the fuck out," Warren said. "Push it through to Jadyn of Crowley."

Dustin's eyes widened as he stared at Warren, almost choking on the words. "Ja-Jade?" He hated the way he couldn't get her name fully out. But he knew better than to say the other two thoughts that were running through his head. You gotta be fucking kidding me and I'd like to have her under my control for even just an hour.

"Do it," Warren said. "I want to see if this code you wrote works."

Dustin nodded silently and moved over to a CodeSwarm in the corner where he could privately access the CompuVerse. In less than two minutes he was isolating and opening the package he'd placed in the computer code of one Jadyn of Crowley.

Zeke and Tallahassee heard the trumpets before they knew what was happening, but it didn't matter. All they knew is that something big was going on in Crowley and they needed to find out what it was.

"Let's get up there," Zeke pointed to a high rise that overlooked the Pavilion. "Whatever is going on, we need to report on it."

“I’ll check in with base,” Tallahassee said, pressing a patch on his brown vest.

Zeke nodded. It was always risky to use comms, which could be tracked. But under the circumstances, they were alone in enemy territory. No rescue would be on hand, but perhaps there was more they could do to help the Lowsmiths. After all, the trumpets of Crowley blaring meant Blake had an announcement to make, and an announcement from

Blake knew something about making a spectacle of things. He knew something about getting people's attention and ensuring the masses all felt good. Early on, he and his wife had chosen the color platinum as their family brand. They felt it was a valued medal, slightly darker than its cheaper cousin, silver, yet it still sparkled. It didn't look cheap and tawdry like yellow gold.

Today, the Pavilion of Crowley was streaming reflective platinum flags from the highest pinnacles, all the way down to the smallest wooden stick in each child's hand. They hadn't even had to buy them. Crowley had made sure the pennants were handed out to every guest who entered the Pavilion. He knew it was crucial for everyone to feel involved in the celebration. The new code was a win for all of them.

Blake placed his arm around Robin, who was seated next to him on the platform overlooking the crowds. The masses were orderly groups in marked off sections set up in such a way so people would feel unified, but not crowded. He wanted them to feel part of the throng, yet also safely separate. The Pavilion was a masterful plan of control, designed in the early days when rebellion was still a possibility. But today the people were nowhere near rebellious. They were grinning up at Blake and Robin, who sat in the golden glow of the magic hour, just before the sun would rise to scorching temperatures that would heat up the landscape and practically melt the city.

But right now, it was perfect.

He clutched Robin's fingers in his. She was weak, but she was still his wife. Still the woman who built this city with him; built this society. She was much loved by the people and knew exactly how important it was for her to be out here on this momentous occasion.

Blake had overcome the barriers of time itself to find a cure for his people. The thought astounded him. Its implications were limitless. They had been so worried about the hybrid danger, the rebels attacking, and the crumbling of their entire society, that overcoming the boundaries of time and space had almost been an afterthought. But now...his fingers traced the delicate skin of the back of Robin's hand. Now, he would have the opportunity to explore the space-time continuum. Once he got through this awards ceremony and stopped the rebellion. Then he would really sit down with Warren and start to figure out what they could do with this technology.

Warren stepped up to the podium, a platinum metal tripod, which held a single, powerful mic.

Microphones had been obsolete for a century, but for somethings, they were really useful. Appearances was one thing. It didn't just connect to the implants of the people here in the Pavilion, it was connected to all the citizens of the entire city. Still, he had everyone's implants blocked while they were here. Even though he could access them directly, there was something powerful and majestic about a voice booming all around you.

Anything said from this microphone would be heard by everyone and this was exactly the way Blake wanted it; in their ears and executed perfectly. There wasn't a squeak or hiss or anything. Blake's eyes flipped over to the AV guy standing off to the side, who looked visibly relieved the microphone seemed to work without a hitch. Blake nodded and smiled at him. It was important for the people to know someone as high up as himself, though there was no one higher, paid attention to them occasionally. It's good for morale when the word gets out. So, when he gave the AV guy a slight nod and smile, he knew his acknowledgement would be carried back to the AV guy's home, to the warrens and communities of Trenchtown. Bots could do almost anything in this day and age, but you still had to give people jobs and recognition. Every single gesture Blake ever made was done with marketing and appearances in mind. It was crucial to spread the message that he was a great guy. This event was going to be one of his greatest yet.

Warren hated being at the microphone. He preferred to be in the darker, seedier side of things, Blake knew. But Blake couldn't very well walk up to the microphone on his own. He had to be introduced. Obviously.

Warren executed the introduction quite simply. "Ladies and gentlemen. Citizens of Crowley. I give you the man who founded the city. The man who overcame death for many of you. The man we call our founder, Blake Crowley."

The crowd went wild. Or at least they probably did. Blake hoped so. With the wind blowing in the opposite direction, he wasn't sure how much of what he was hearing was real cheering or pumped in through the loudspeakers. But it was okay. Their soundtrack of cheering could make him feel just as good. Everyone around the city would hear the thunderous applause that greeted Blake when he stood in front of his people.

"Ladies and gentlemen of Crowley," Blake gripped the podium and leaned towards the mic. Not too far in, though. He knew he couldn't be too close to the mic but he wanted to give the impression he was leaning towards them, he was one of the people, he could connect with them.

"It is no secret that, recently, hard times have fallen upon Crowley." Blake's voice carried through the entire city named after him. "I will not deny the fact rebels have been more active in trying to destroy our promised land, even though we have welcomed them into it with open arms. And our first line of defense, the hybrids, of which I know many of you are." He paused here, his head swaying across the crowd, letting them know he could see each and every one. "You were sick and unable to fulfill your duties as protectors of Crowley. A great malice came up on you. But today I am proud to announce something of which every single one of you is so acutely aware. We have found and implemented the cure. How do you know this? Look around those of you in this crowd. Just days ago, you were sick in the hospital. And now you stand among us, ready, willing, and able to serve your duty as a hybrid protector of Crowley.”

Blake paused for two reasons. One, he wanted the words to sink in so the people remembered their duty to protect his city. He knew the rebels weren't giving up anytime soon, in fact, some of their attacks had gotten worse, but the hybrids were an integral part of the defense. And Blake knew that some in this very crowd were going to die protecting the city from the rebels. However, he also wanted to give the audience a chance to connect to each other. It was something many of the historical leaders had, in fact, failed to do. A community is strengthened by the individual connections within the masses. Blake discovered this technique of connecting people by reading about the old churches. Hundreds of people reaching out to shake their neighbors hand and bless them could really draw people into the crowd, give them a sense of belonging and build community.

“Take a moment to greet your neighbor.” Blake’s voice was omnipotent. “Congratulate them on overcoming their illness. Thank them for standing vigil while you were sick. Whatever it was, reach out and let your neighbor know we are all part of this community. And I will tell you this: in the same way we welcome you here, we will also welcome the rebels, should they choose to join us.”

The words rang out across all of Crowley. And they were heard by Tallahassee, who glanced over at Zeke, who was muttering as he sat on the ledge hidden behind a monstrous decorative piece at the top of the high rise, his RR9xi sniper rifle aimed down at the crowd.

“Blake probably would just as soon shit on us as welcome us to the city. He’ll try every chance he gets to kill us and wipe humans off the face of the earth,” Zeke growled. “One asshole to rule them all.”

“Shut it,” Tallahassee said. “I’m not hanging out on this ledge to listen to you bitch about Crowley. You heard the message I got from Trekon, we need to be on our toes if we’re going to save Frank’s hide.”

“Today, ladies and gentlemen,” Blake’s voice boomed. “We are gathered to recognize the men who did this great and brave act. Now, I might’ve had a small part in bringing these gentlemen together, but they are with the ones who did the heavy lifting. They slaved away, dug into the problem, and came up with a most effective solution. Ladies, gentlemen, I give you the newest members of Order of the Accolade, Sir Dustin Bovey and Sir Charles Richards.”

Pompous music filled the square and all of the town as Dustin and Charlie stepped out of the recess at the end transit to the town square. Charlie couldn’t believe it. It was just like the final scene in Star Wars, after Luke Skywalker had destroyed the Death Star and they were getting medals with Han Solo.

He glanced over at Dustin. Dustin was nowhere near as unpretentious as Han Solo, but he was cocky and self-assured. Charlie wondered for a second if maybe he was going to be nice today. Probably not.

Charlie walked slowly to match Dustin's pace. Neither was really in a hurry to pass all the cheering residents who were reaching out to shake their hands and waving from a distance. He almost felt like doing a few victory laps and giving everyone high-fives, but you know, there was an image to uphold as the coolest programmer in the history of the known world, and victory laps and high-fives probably weren't a part of it.

He still had very little idea how Dustin got in on the accolade action, but it was probably Warren. Glancing up he saw the two make eye contact and Dustin give Warren a nod. Charlie shrugged. Whatever. Execs were always taking credit for their team's work. Guess some things don't change. It didn't matter. Everybody knew Charlie was the hero from the past who stepped forward and solved the problem of the future. Dustin wasn't solving the problem. If he had, they wouldn't have had to go get Charlie.

They finally got to the front of the crowd and mounted the stairs to the platform, which Charlie thought was a little higher than it probably needed to be, and the stairs were a little steeper than he would've liked. But, of course, he wasn't the master planner of ceremonies. Blake was, and from everything he'd seen, Blake knew a thing or two about managing crowds, and expectations. By the time Charlie got to the tenth step he realized why the stairs were so steep. It made him rise higher with each step and the crowd cheered louder as if he was scaling a mountain. Finally, when they got to the top of the platform, the entire square was encased in a deafening roar, ten times louder than anything going on in the ceremony before this.

Charlie had to hand it to Blake, he knew what he was doing, for sure.

When Robin stood up, the loud cheering of the crowd softened and fell into the adoring cadence of a child looking at his mother, the bubbling sound of hope and joy filling the space. Clearly, she was someone they appreciated. When she stood in front of Charlie and Dustin, Charlie understood why they were told to stay on the lower step. It made it easier for Robin to take the opalum medals from the hand of a ServBot and slip one, first over Dustin's neck, and then another over Charlie's. She reached out to each one then and raised them up onto the platform next to her, as if it were some carefully orchestrated step onto a dance floor. She took them lightly by their shoulders so they would turn and face the crowd.

And if Charlie had thought the crowd loved them before, they were twenty times more deafening as he turned around grinning and smiling as they received their medals.

But the medal felt heavy around Charlie's neck. Not just heavy-heavy, but like internally-settling-in-his-stomach-heavy. Very uncomfortable. Why was Dustin smiling so much? He hadn't smiled at all until they saw the code worked, now Dustin was just elated. Even more than Charlie was. And this made Charlie just a tad suspicious. His gaze went to Warren, who was also grinning from ear-to-ear with a smile that didn't reach his eyes. Dustin might be the scorpion, but Warren was the snake.

And where the hell was Jade? He expected to see her up on stage next to Blake, but she wasn't there and he hadn't seen her at all since the rebel attack. Of course, he had been in the dungeon trying to solve the problem of the code, but... well, it would have been nice to see her in this, his moment of triumph.

She must have gone to stop some of the rebel attacks in the city. And he'd seen she was okay. But well, he kind of thought she would've checked in on him. They didn't exactly have a thing but, you know, maybe they could.

Charlie frowned.

The adoration of the unknown masses was great. The appreciation of the city executive was nice. But it was just a little sad, really, not to have anyone to share it with. Yes, some would say he didn't have much, but he had connections. You could say living at home with your mom was sad, but it wasn't. Some people have no one. And he had his nephew, and niece. Even his sister. She could be a bitch, but he did think she tried to do what was best for him. Now he didn't have any of them. Not his sister, or her kids, not his mom, and now it looked like not even Jade, the only friend he actually had in this town. And suddenly there was a slight emptiness and Charlie realized he kind of wanted to go home.

"Everybody knows I've never been one to sweep things under the carpet." Blake stepped back to the mic, his metal-toed shoes ringing out. Charlie was taken aback. He thought they were done. This is all they had done in rehearsal. Stand up and get the awards and sit in one of the chairs. Weren't they done?

Apparently not.

"But at these times of joy and celebration, it's always good to remember the struggle going on around us. And why hybrids are so helpful to us. You may have heard when we were working so hard to save our hybrids, the rebels saw this as a moment of weakness. They attacked the very area where we had the machinery needed to heal the hybrids."

Charlie frowned, well... that wasn't quite true, what Blake was saying.

"While we defeated the rebels, we took many losses. But we also took one prisoner. Today we bring him before you to send a message to all rebels. They are more than welcome to join us, but if they stand against us there is one simple conclusion."

What the heck is he talking about, thought Charlie. He had been staring at Blake so long, he still didn't really notice the commotion over by the side gate. Everybody was looking in that direction.

"What are you doing?" Monfils asked Jade as he rushed up to the side gate of the Pavilion. He'd only just gotten the message from his Deltas that she had shown up to take the prisoner onto the stage. Knowing Warren, Monfils knew this couldn't be good.

"Following Warren's orders," Jade stared at Monfils as if it was the most normal thing in the world.

"Since when do you follow his orders?" Monfils gripped her elbow.

Jade looked slowly down at his hand on her elbow and then up at him. "Since when do you question my actions?" she asked quietly.

Monfils let her elbow go, a worried expression settling on his face. Whatever was about to happen couldn't be undone. He was sure of that.

Jade didn't say another word, she gripped Frank by the elbow and pushed him out the door and into the Pavilion. Monfils, with a sinking feeling in his stomach, followed close behind.

Charlie's eyes followed the crowds' and Jade stepped through a door, pushing in front of her the big guy who had spared Charlie's life when they first arrived because he was human.

"There he is," said Zeke, elbowing Tallahassee in the ribs.

"The girl," Tallahassee said, shoving Zeke's arm back at him. "I'm not an idiot, I see him, too. Fire on the girl."

Zeke shifted his RR9xi GPS sniper rifle, ignoring Tallahassee's snort. Sure, it was hundred-year-old technology, but that was all Zeke had access to and he'd supped this thing up something wicked. He barely needed to aim it at Jade and pull the trigger and the GPS in the opalum bullet would do the rest. She walked slowly toward the stage with Frank ahead of her, but Zeke paused. "I don't have a clear shot," he said. "There's too many humans in the audience. I can't take it."

"Shit," Tallahassee swore. Humans lived in Crowley and worked for Crowley, and Tallahassee thought he did this as a bit of an insurance policy. Lowsmiths didn't kill humans. Tallahassee wasn't about to tell Zeke to take that chance. "Wait 'til she gets on stage. It'll be cutting it close, but it's going to be the best chance to get a clean shot." He squinted above the stage where a shimmer in the air was all that gave way the presence of a GX Silon hovering in silence, ready to take its one shot at retrieving Frank. The shielded bot-driven transport couldn't take more than one passenger, but Tallahassee and Zeke had agreed: Frank was worth it. They'd figure a way out of here. Like rats in the sewer, they were pretty good at squeaking out of tight spots.

Charlie's jaw went slack as Jade, dressed in her black slick bodysuit, came up the side stairs. She didn't look at him, she didn't smile, she kept her hands on the cuffs of the prisoner she pushed forward to the center of the stage. He grimaced as he saw Monfils wasn't far behind. Why did those two always have to be together. Did they have a thing?

Robin gently tugged on Dustin's and Charlie's wrists, pulling them back and giving center stage to Jade and the rebel prisoner.

A flash of light movement, a reflection in the awnings overlooking the platform grabbed Charlie's attention for minute. He glanced up and that's when he saw them, two weird looking guys with guns, tucked up in the eaves, trying to get a good shot.

And now they had it. Perfectly.

"Jade!" Charlie called, just as Jade was raising her blaster directly to the rebel's temple.

She looked up at Charlie, her eyes black, as she fired the laser directly into the head of the rebel. The large man's brain exploded in a flood of gore and blood out the side of his head. Charlie's mouth screamed in horror, but he was already moving as he leapt to stop the sniper round coming directly at Jade.

It missed her and punched Charlie hard in the chest, knocking him backwards.

He lay on the stage, his hand landing in some of the rebel brain splattered on the ground. His scream drained away, as he realized he'd been hit.

But Charlie Richards was used to being wrong. This time, he was the happiest he had ever been about being wrong. The opal bullet had managed, by some miracle, to hit the dense medal hanging from his neck. The impact had knocked the wind out of him and destroyed the inscription, but Charlie was very much alive and unhurt.

Jade been expecting there would be a sniper. She knew she should kill the rebel quickly and effectively. Faster than a sniper could pull a trigger. And she'd done just that.

But now, she knew where they were. She glanced down at Charlie without saying a word, without a friendly smile, without so much as a "Thanks for saving my life." She wiped off her DC15s HEL and quickly pulled at the scope. She sent off a quick round and clipped Zeke in the left shoulder before shifting her aim to Tallahassee. Zeke tumbled off the side of the building as Tallahassee disappeared down the other side.

Jade raced off the stage, leaving Charlie alone on the platform, gasping for breath, the dented opal medal weighing down his neck.

Chapter 24

“What was that?” Robin cried, ripping the shawl off her head and throwing it on the couch as they entered their suite. The lights of Crowley glistened below them, but it was nothing Robin wanted to look at right now. She just wanted to close her eyes and forget everything she had just seen.

“Calm down, honey,” Blake said, picking up the scarf and carefully folding it and placing it on the back of the seat.

A ServBot popped up next to her. “May I fix you a drink, Madam?” it beeped.

“Get the hell away from me,” Robin said, shoving the bot in the chest.

“What is wrong with you?” Blake grabbed her shoulders and turned her to him. “Are you okay?” He peered into her eyes, making every effort to discern what was causing the anger and rage inside of her. But her eyes look normal. Everything looked fine.

“Since when are we killing humans?” She asked, pulling her shoulders away and stepping back from her husband. “Is this what we’ve become? We are suddenly a dictatorship.”

“We are not a dictatorship,” Blake said, slowly sitting down again. He realized he wasn’t going to be able to strong-arm his wife into calming down, so he was going to have to lead by example. He was going to have to show her nothing was wrong. Everything was just fine.

“However, there are laws that govern this corporation. And those laws dictate we do not suffer other people killing our people. That rebel killed our hybrids.”

Confusion struggled on Robin’s face. “Jade just executed him,” she said. “She blew his brains out on public display. I’ve never known her to do anything like that.”

Blake held up his hand as the bot brought over his evening mixed drink.

“What part of hybrid assassin don’t you understand?” Blake asked. He loved his wife and he honored her and he respected her. But there was only so much he was going to take. This was not the time for weakness.

“I just- I just thought you had the sense do things discretely.”

“We had to make an example of him! We need to show them they can’t just break into our city and kill people. It’s not okay. And if we had a bot kill him, well, it just wouldn’t work.”

“But how did you get Jade to do it?” Robin asked.

Blake looked at her like she was a little bit crazy. “Do what? She kills people for a living.”

“There was something different about this,” Robin said, the confusion settling on her face as she sat down on the sofa opposite her husband. When the bot brought over her drink she automatically raised her hand to take it.

“You’ve been under a lot of pressure lately, my dear,” Blake said. “But all that’s going to change now. You’re not sick anymore, you’ve been made better. You’ve been made whole by the great science that is this colony. You may not agree with some of the things we must do, but we must protect the population. The needs of the many outweigh the needs of the few, just like Spock said.”

“I don’t think Spock said that,” his wife grumbled.

“Suddenly you know the classics?” Blake asked her with a smile. “Remember, I’m the one who was valedictorian with my early 21st-century doctoral degree. It’s how we even discovered this code existed.”

“I’m well aware of what your degree is in,” Robin said. And suddenly she felt very, very tired, her shoulders drooped and she made her way to the couch where she fell and closed her eyes. “How did we even get here?” She asked. “You know, back then, all I wanted to do, all I wanted was to marry you and have a family. What happened to that dream? You asked me to help build the city. I did that, but it wasn’t the only dream I ever had.”

Blake’s heart clenched at her words. A family. He could keep people alive through almost any disease by extracting the parts that didn’t work and replacing them with hardware and computerized software pieces that would work. But he couldn’t get his own wife pregnant.

“I’m sorry,” he whispered.

But his voice was soft and Robin wasn’t listening anyhow. She was thinking the same thought she’d been thinking for the last few years. She wondered when she would be allowed to die. Or was a hybrid truly meant to live forever?

Charlie was back in his penthouse, looking down on the city. What the hell was he doing? He tried reaching Jade through the ServBot system at least a dozen times since the end of that stupid event. The ceremony he had dreamed of his entire life. Finally getting the recognition he deserved. And it all seemed like a sham, orchestrated by Crowley simply to give them the opportunity to murder the rebel; make an example of him. And when they had escorted Charlie back to this penthouse, well he’d heard the lock in the door when Monfils left. He was pretty sure he wasn’t getting out tonight. He scratched thoughtfully at his wrist.

Charlie was a hell of a programmer and he was good at getting things working. He hoped so. He was so good, Blake had gone to the past to bring him here. But now that was done, well, the cold hard truth was settling in. There was no way Blake or Warren were going to let Charlie go back. Why would they risk Charlie changing the code, making alterations, or even taking the code for himself? Charlie's brain worked overtime on this problem. But the answer was always the same. There was no way in hell Charlie was going home.

Charlie reached into his pocket and pulled out the card his nephew, Alex, had given him. Alex's voice rang clearly in Charlie's head.

"His name is Halidan. He is savior of the realm, like Taborlin the Great. If he is played when your city has been destroyed, he rebuilds it. He's my favorite."

Suddenly, the full import of the choice he had made slapped him in the face. Charlie was never going to be able to see his nephew again.

Ever.

He could maybe look up his nephew's records, find out what became of him, try to trace his family line, but Charlie from 2017? Wiped off the face of the earth. He had become one of those missing persons. He thought about his mother, about his sister. How long would they be thinking about him, wondering where he went, what happened to him? His nephew would grow up always wondering what happened to his uncle and why he abandoned him.

"I left because I wanted to make a difference," Charlie said aloud to the empty room.

But what had he really done? He could've made a difference in his nephew's life, but he sacrificed that. And for what? From everything he saw going on here, it mostly felt he had just been used. Blake Crowley had a lot of problems and the hybrid disease had only been one of them. He had rebels attacking, and even his wife as a hybrid, it didn't look so good.

What if it was worse, though? Blake was a pretty ruthless guy. He just killed another human right in front of everybody. Just to make a point. Charlie figured his own status was high enough that he wouldn't be killed, but Blake was the kind of a guy who could create an accident and make it believable. Charlie's eyes went to the northern quadrant of town where the DarkM'attr machine was housed. It was overrun by Lowsmiths when he arrived, but he was sure Blake had it back under control now. He had to get back to it. He wasn't safe here, he wasn't a hero, he was just the next guy, probably in a long line of guys, that Blake used to protect his assets. Charlie turned the card over and over in his fingers and looked back out the window. How the hell was he going to get across town? Hell, he didn't even know how he was going to get out of this apartment, but for the sake of his mother, his niece and nephew, and hell, even his sister, he knew he had to try.

Monfils had tried everything. Blake was not answering. Jade was not answering. The only person he could get to was Warren. And he had to be careful about that. You don't just walk up to a cobra and punch it in the nose.

Monfils needed a flute.

He walked into Command Central humming a tune.

Warren glanced up as Monfils entered, but didn't take much more notice of him. Monfils walked over to the hybrid pod to have a quick look at his units and see if there was anything that needed his attention.

As he passed Dustin, he clapped him on the shoulder. "Congratulations," he said. "Good work helping Charlie Richards. Glad you guys got the problem fixed and I can get my hybrids, well, those that are still alive, back in service."

An involuntary snort came out of Dustin.

Monfils's eyes narrowed. "You are planning to have my hybrids back in business. I mean, you gave me back Jade. She carried out my orders perfectly."

And that's when Monfils saw it; Dustin's face fell.

"Your orders?" Dustin asked, his eyes flitting between Warren and Monfils for the briefest of seconds.

Monfils stepped in close, towering over Dustin. "You filthy little rat shit bastard. You can't lead people in any real way, so you wrote code to control them."

Dustin relaxed. He had slid into Monfils's little trap, but it wasn't going to hold him back. "I did write the code," he grinned. "But Warren controls it. I don't think you want to challenge him on that, do you?"

A dark storm crossed Monfils's face as he turned and strode out of Command Central.

Chapter 25

Charlie called out to the ServBot. “I need to speak with Blake Crowley,” he said, donning his best voice of authority. He didn’t think it was an option or that the bot was going to make it happen, but he wanted to test the system.

“I am most sorry,” the ServBot said. “This is not a possibility.”

“I’m not feeling very well,” Charlie murmured, slumping into the couch. It was a classic 21st century “when you’re in prison and on lockdown” sick act. He wasn’t sure if it was going to get him out of the apartment, but he was going to give it a shot.

“One moment please,” the ServBot said.

And it was truly only a moment before a MediBot rolled into the living room.

“How might I be of service?” it asked, opening its side panel showing a huge dispensary of drugs. “What sort of medicine do you need? These are all suitable for human consumption but I recommend letting me choose for you based on your symptoms.”

Charlie was a bit taken aback, but couldn’t stop himself from perusing the goods. Everything, apparently, was done in liquid form these days and only required a single drop on a small slip of paper. Seriously, it looked a little bit like acid you’d take in the 90’s. Charlie wasn’t going near any of it with a ten-foot pole.

“I just need to get out of here,” he said. “Get some fresh air.”

Its eyes rolled back in its head as it processed the request. “You are not at liberty to travel outside of this apartment,” the MediBot said. “But now I’m quite sure you are relegated article 350 CX. Anything you do needs to be reported. And you’re not allowed to do anything.”

“Right,” Charlie said glaring at the MediBot, who stared back with an impossibly disinterested gaze.

Charlie realized a couple of things. The first was that you couldn’t get out on a sick charge, you couldn’t talk to Blake... and even Jade didn’t seem to care about his plight anymore.

He could try the “I’m going to kill myself” shtick, but it didn’t seem like anyone was going to care about that either. If they wanted him dead, it might just get the job done sooner.

A loud explosion across the city made the glass window shake. Huge lights and explosions blew up the skyline. This time it wasn’t in the area where the DarkM’attr machine was, it was all along the outer perimeter. Every single wall along half the city was being bombarded with explosions.

“Holy shit,” Charlie murmured. “What’s going on?” he asked the ServBot.

The ServBot reached into whatever system plugged it into the main network. “It appears there is a demonstration being conducted. Nothing to be alarmed about.”

“Where the hell are you reading that?” Charlie asked. “The Good Crowley Times? You’ve got to realize it’s bullshit. Unless Blake has decided he wants to destroy half of his precious city, I guarantee you this is no demonstration.”

“There is nothing to be alarmed about,” repeated the bot.

Charlie was trying to figure out how he was going to use the situation to his advantage. The first thing he needed to do was get out of the apartment.

His mind flashed to the awards ceremony. To the look Warren and Dustin had exchanged. Dustin was Warren’s man. Warren would be the one who didn’t want Charlie around. He’d be the only one who cared about what Charlie could do. There’s a reason they hadn’t killed Charlie yet and he was pretty sure it had to do with Dustin and Warren. The code worked, he knew it worked. So, why were they still letting him live? Charlie had the feeling he was losing in a game he didn’t even know the rules of, one he had no power over. He was supposed to be the mastermind. The one who had created the technology that made the hybrids. But now he was being kept in the dark, seemingly in the lap of luxury. But he had no idea what his future was.

Unless... Unless he had made a mistake. Or they thought he had made a mistake. Now that he understood more about the system, maybe there was some way for him to gain a little ground.

“I need to see Warren,” Charlie said.

The ServBot just blinked at him.

“Warren Relic,” Charlie said.

“Just one moment, we will check his availability,” the ServBot said.

“While you’re checking his availability,” Charlie said, leaning into whatever camera the bot stored its vision receptors in, “I need you to transmit this information back to headquarters. Tell Warren I made a mistake. There is a problem in the code that will disrupt what I programmed. It’ll work for now but I set a variable wrong. It’s really wrong. Like it’s only going to work for another hour. You need to get me back to headquarters so I can double-check it.”

It seemed to take forever for the bot to come back with an answer. Charlie was extremely frustrated by the basic inhumanity of them. They couldn’t even see his frustration or irritation; they simply did as they were programmed. There was no connection, nothing. But he knew he got him something right. He knew there was only one thing Warren truly cared about, and that was the hybrid code. Charlie wasn’t quite sure why, but he knew it would get his attention.

“You will be collected and taken to Mr. Relic,” the ServBot finally said.

“Good,” Charlie said. “That’s great.” He tried to look enthusiastic and happy as if he really cared about the code getting corrected, which he didn’t. He just cared about getting out of here, getting to the DarkM'attr machine, and getting back to his time. To his people.

You could've knocked Charlie over with a feather when his escort showed up to take him to see Warren.

"Good job," Jade said as the door slid open, the black shadow of Genesis II looming behind her.

Charlie wasn't sure if he should hug her or hide from her. He wanted to do both. Though, truth be told, mostly just hug her. He compromised by sticking out his hand. He just wanted to touch her, he wanted human contact. She stared down at it as if it was the strangest thing she'd ever seen. Her arms remained at her sides.

"I'm here to escort you to Warren," she said.

As much as Charlie wanted to ask questions, he knew he could not miss this opportunity to get out of the apartment. But he also knew with Jade as his escort, he had no hope in hell of escaping, or surviving if he attempted it.

They walked in silence down the hallway into the transport lift.

"Headquarters," Jade said, sliding her finger through a vapor portal that apparently recognized her. A dual chair slid into the tube and the gate slipped open allowing them entry.

Charlie glanced at the sleek chair that would take them a few blocks away. This was the future.

Man, if he could get back in time he could make a killing either inventing some of this stuff or, probably more realistically, writing crazy science fiction. Because he had no idea how half the stuff worked. I mean... what sort of vapor bath does one put a finger in so it can identify exactly who you are and what permissions you have? No idea.

He rubbed his hand over the smooth surface of the chair as he sat down. There were no belts. The chair suctioned them in with a great intake of breath.

"Why did you kill him?" The question came out of Charlie's mouth before he could stop himself.

Jade's slanted eyes tilted towards Charlie. "It had to be done."

"But he was just some guy," Charlie said. His words trailed off. How could he explain that Frank reminded him of the kind of guys he sat in the bar with back home. "Just some guy caught up in a crazy rebellion."

Charlie's heart clenched at the truth. It could just as easily have been him. Would Jade kill him if Blake commanded it? He glanced over at her. There was no telling. She stared straight ahead as the chair whizzed soundlessly through the air.

"That guy let me live. He could've killed me when we came out of the DarkM'attr machine and you were taking me into headquarters, but he didn't. He let me live."

"He got caught." Jade's tone was flat.

"But he shouldn't have died, and-"

"I don't know if you realize this," Jade interrupted, "But I don't exactly make the rules around here.”

“Yeah, but come on, I know you’ve got power. I see how everybody looks at you. You don’t just have to cave and follow the rules like everybody else. I may be new around here, but I see that much. I’m not an imbecile,” Charlie said.

“You might be coding-smart, and handy with hardware, but you don’t have an ounce of emotional intelligence. If you did, you would shut up and just do what you’re told.”

Her words stung. Charlie tried to scoot away from her a bit, but the airlock on the seats wouldn’t let him move.

“Something is wrong with you,” he said. “You’re different.”

“You don’t know me,” she said. “You showed up in my life three days ago. And you are nothing like the documentaries they made about you.”

Charlie raised his eyebrows. “Did you watch them all?”

Jade rolled her eyes and looked out the window. The tube opened up and they slid to a halt in the lustrous lobby of the Crowley headquarters. She grabbed his arm before he could step out of the tube. Her grip was stronger than the airlock that had held him into his chair.

“Is it true?” She asked. “Are you going to Warren to tell him there’s something wrong with the code you gave me? I mean, you gave all the hybrids?”

Charlie knew she was highly trained to measure any imperceptible muscle twitch or eye motion. Anything that would let her know he was lying. He held himself as steadily as possible and stared her straight in the eye.

“It’s true,” he said. “I made a mistake. I am human.” He shrugged his shoulders and use the opportunity to look away from her concentrated gaze.

The sound Jade made wasn’t quite a snort, but it wasn’t just an exhale. It was something in between the two and told Charlie he might’ve given something away. He pulled his arm loose from her as the transport doors swished closed behind them and they stepped forward into the bustling hive that was headquarters.

“Restrain her!” Blake yelled at the ProtectoBots as they stormed into the room. “Gently,” he added, which is not something he had ever commanded a ProtectoBot to be in his entire career as master of the universe.

He turned his back as Robin, screaming at him, was held down by the ProtectoBots, her wrists bond with H-Con cuffs.

Blake pressed his finger to his temple so hard it hurt. “What the fuck is going on, Warren?” he asked.

“Nothing,” Warren says smoothly. “How are things with you?”

Blake listened to Robin screaming in the other room and closed his eyes. There was no way he could tell Warren his wife was going crazy. Still, he should...

“Good,” Blake said smoothly. “Just wondering if there have been any reports of strangeness among the Deltas at all.”

“Strangeness?” Warren asked, trying hard to keep the smile out of his voice.

“You know, aggressiveness from the update or something?” Blake tried to sound real, real casual.

Warren bit his lip to keep from chortling out loud. “Nope,” he finally managed. “All’s quiet on the western front. How’s Robin?”

“Oh, fine, fine,” Blake muttered, but his eyes closed. There was no way he could show weakness to Warren.

“Great,” Warren finally smiled into the comm. “Why don’t you spend some time with her this evening. I know it’s been hard with her being so sick and all.” He had to stop himself before he laid it on too thick.

“Yeah, yeah,” Blake nodded. “That sounds like a good idea.”

“Oh, but look, there is one more thing. Monfils has managed to capture a few extra Lowsmiths from the latest attacks and I was thinking we should have them and some prisoners and make a real gesture to the people, like accept them into our city as citizens. It’s not enough to do any real harm, but we can make us look bigger and better if we can do this. It’ll be a good marketing move,” he finished with a carrot that he knew Blake couldn’t refuse.

“What time?” Blake asked.

“I’m thinking it’ll be in about an hour or so,” Warren said. “Does that work for you?”

“I don’t see why not,” Blake shrugged, relieved to have a marketing challenge to think about rather than his enraged wife.

Warren disconnected and found he had an earsplitting smile on his face. Clearly the code he’d had Dustin unwrap in Robin, well, that code was working, too.

Warren glared at them as they walked into command central. Charlie had noticed earlier the interactions between Warren and Jade, so it was a surprise, but by the glare, this time it wasn’t at Jade, it was at him.

“What’s wrong with the code?” He asked

“I forgot a string,” Charlie said.

Warren narrowed his eyes.

“And a wrapper. The time wrapper.” He didn’t think Warren knew anything about code, at least he hoped he didn’t.

“It seems to be working just fine.” Warren exchanged glances with Dustin. Dustin nodded, Warren shrugged.

“Oh yeah, it’s working fine now but, you know, any minute…” Charlie made a symbolic explosion motion with his hands, trying to let them know exactly how bad it was going to be.

Warren and Dustin both looked at Jade.

“He’s lying,” she said.

“I thought as much,” said Dustin. “I checked the code myself.”

“I’m not lying,” Charlie said. “I’m telling you, I messed up the code.”

“You might’ve messed up the code,” Jade said. “But you don’t actually think you did.”

“Why are you doing this?” Charlie hissed at her.

“Because, Charlie,” Warren said, his lip lifting weirdly in the light. “Jade works for me.” He waved his hand towards Jade dismissively. “Report to the Pavilion so you can protect Blake as he meets the rebels.”

“You’re having Blake meet the rebels?” Charlie started.

“Yes. I think it’s rather clever mastermind effort,” Warren said, turning back to the screens that lined the walls from floor to ceiling. “It’s a way to bring the rebels and the citizens of Crowley together.”

Charlie looked at them in horror as Jade slipped out the side door. Warren had masterminded Blake to meet some of the Lowsmiths in the Pavilion.

“The rebels were just attacking the city not more than an hour ago,” Charlie frowned. There was something really wrong about this. He could say they were doing it for peace, but Charlie didn’t buy it. Only one thing was going to happen in the Pavilion today. Someone was going to die.

He stared at the closest screen as it monitored the Pavilion. Rebels grouped on one side of the barricade and hybrids and bots filled up the other side of the square. Charlie hoped beyond any hope he ever had before that the person or the people who were going to die today would not include Jade. He saw Monfils on the side of the Crowley citizens. Maybe this would be a good place for Monfils. Maybe he would protect Jade.

“Why don’t you stay and watch.” Warren invited with a snide smile.

Charlie glanced at the door where Warren’s newest Genesis stood, looking a hell of a lot like the big black genesis monster he had seen when he first met Jade. He certainly wasn’t going to get out of here that way.

His plan was to get to the DarkM’attr machine, but that wasn’t really working so far.

“Are you ready?” Warner asked Dustin.

Charlie look between them. What the hell were they getting ready for? Dustin had a gleeful look on his face that Charlie didn’t like in the slightest. A high-pitched giggle came out of the back of his throat, but he clamped his lips down on it after just a small amount came out.

What the fuck was going on?

Dustin nodded his ponytail bobbed at the back of his head. He and Warren gazed at the screens like it was Christmas morning and they were about to get the best presents ever. Charlie turned to look, too, with the most sickening sinking feeling way down in his stomach. Jade stepped on the platform to one side of Blake. Robin stood to his left, her lips pressed together in a single thin line.

“Why do you have Blake out there on the platform in front of the rebels? Are you crazy?” Charlie asked.

“Don’t you believe Jade can protect him?” Warren asked, with wry amusement slathered all over his face.

“Well of course she can, but what if she gets –”

“Hurt?” Warren asked.

Charlie didn’t respond. His eyes were wide with the realization that this was exactly what Warren was trying to do. They all knew that Jade would stop at nothing to protect Blake.

“You’re trying to get her killed, you bastard.”

Warren tilted his head at Charlie.

“For a genius,” he said, “you sure think small. Why the hell would I care about Jade in the slightest?”

“Because she’s more powerful than you,” Charlie said.

Warren and Dustin both laughed out loud. It kind of creeped Charlie out, but not as much as it made him nervous. These two have done something, something worse than setting up Jade and Blake. But all Charlie’s thoughts came to a standstill as the loudspeakers blared trumpets, of all ludicrous things, across the Pavilion. A representative of the Lowsmiths walked towards Blake.

The Lowsmith had no guns. Blake had no guns. But they both had someone with them. For Blake, it was Jade. For the Lowsmith, it was a massive dark-skinned man who looked like he could crush anyone with a single blow. The guy wasn’t carrying guns, at least not any that were apparent.

As the trumpets died down, Blake spoke loudly and clearly to the gathered masses.

“We welcome you into Crowley. The city my dear wife and I developed and built. We used blood, sweat, and tears, along with technology to improve the life of mankind, and today we want to welcome you as citizens to our fair city.”

“God, I cannot stand it,” Warren said. He looked over at Dustin. “Flip the switch.”

Charlie backed slowly away from them. Everyone was so intent on the screen, this was going to be the best chance to get out of here. Whatever was going on, it was not his problem. Whatever happened in the Pavilion was none of his concern. His had to get the hell back to the DarkM’attr machine. Clearly Warren was trying to create some kind of revolution and there was no way Charlie was going to be able to stop it. There was no way he was going to stand here and watch as Jade died. He needed to get out of here. Get back to the time machine and get home.

Tallahassee and Zeke sat in the shadows of one of Crowley's high rises, looking down at the Pavilion. They were up on a ledge, which they found was often the safest place to hide from the bots, who seemed programmed to think of the Lowsmiths as being low to the ground and in hiding. For some reason, they always underestimated their ability to escape at a height above ground level.

"They have the prisoners," Zeke said, pointing at the gray-clad, bedraggled Lowsmiths that were being led into the square.

"There's no way they're just going to welcome them in as citizens," Tallahassee said as he spat over the edge.

They watched the prisoners being lined up with the twenty or so Lowsmiths that had been cornered in the attack on Trenchtown.

"This isn't going to end well," Zeke muttered. "How can anyone think Blake is going to welcome them with open arms?"

Charlie slid casually towards the door that lead to the central coding rooms. They had to be still open, and since he made it this far he was sure he could make it all the way down there, and figure a way out of this mess.

Nobody was paying any attention to him now. But as he was about to slip out the door, he realized there was no way he could leave without watching what would happen. Dustin reached his finger toward a CompuVerse of code swirling around in the air. Dustin did a movement Charlie didn't understand. He had seen the galaxies and solar systems of code that made up the CompuVerse could be manipulated with blinks and eye directions, but that is not what Dustin did now. Instead, he raised his hand into the swirling code and tapped the air in a sequence with three of his fingers.

"Fingerprints approved," a woman's voice spoke into the room. "Code recognized."

"Is it done?" Warren asked.

Charlie leaned towards the screen, trying to see what they were doing, what changes they were making in the lives of everybody in the Pavilion.

"Sequence complete. Updating code."

It seemed like everybody in the command center was holding their breath. Charlie didn't even notice that he was too.

"Update complete." The mechanical woman's voice said.

"It is now," smiled Dustin.

And for a second it seemed like nothing happened. Blake was still going on about how he welcomed the rebels and no harm would come to them and what a great step this was towards peace.

But then Charlie saw it. There was a shift in the crowd. Then, about a third of the people on the Crowley side, all of them hybrids, suddenly pulled out weapons and in seconds they were firing on the unarmed rebels.

Charlie stumbled back against the wall as Warren and Dustin together let out a whoop of excitement, as if this was a good thing. As if human massacre was the right thing to do in a situation like this.

Charlie scanned the screens for Jade. She wasn't hard to find. She was still standing, her body in front of Blake, firing into the crowd of unarmed humans. And standing right next to her, firing with as much focus and determination as Charlie could see on Jade's face, was Robin, the wife of Blake and the mother of Crowley.

Chapter 26

Charlie slipped into the shadows of the hallway. It took a moment for his eyes to adjust. The lights in the hall seemed to have powered on the moment he entered. He scanned the lights that looked a hell of a lot like the HEL in their guns. Charlie slowed down a bit and bent low, creeping along the wall. The last thing he needed was for all the sconces to turn into blasters and fire at him.

He remembered the way to the code room easily. It was something he was always good at, directions. But even as he went he kept trying to figure out, why the hell am I doing this? I should be heading out the first side door I find but... but... Jade and all the other hybrids, Robin. They were being controlled by Warren. It was starting to make sense to Charlie. Dustin's glee, his excitement as he was engaging the code. Even the way Dustin was given a medal at the same time Charlie was. Dustin had written some crazy-ass code and he must've stuck it in the middle of what Charlie was doing.

Charlie had to fix this.

It was his fault this was happening. And he was sure no one else here knew what to do. Nobody would know how to get into the middle of this code and rip out whatever demonic assassin nonsense Dustin had put in there. If Charlie just left, the future was over. It would become a dictatorship ruled by hybrids and Warren with his hybrid assassins. I mean, he always knew Jade was a bodyguard, but she was no cold-blooded assassin. He was sure of that.

There were surprisingly few hybrids and bots in the hallway leading up to the coding room. Charlie was relieved. There was no way he would be able to hide in this world. He was a public figure. A piece of information that still seems rather strange to him. He turned a corner and froze; there were two bots standing outside the door that lead to the core code room.

Charlie hid in the shadows for a moment, analyzing the situation. These guys probably had lasers that shot out of their eyeballs and could kill him with a single glance. Charlie's legs trembled.

Save the world. Save the world. Save the world.

He took a deep breath. He had to do this. Even though so much of him wanted to run the other direction and hide under a rock. This wasn't his RPG. This wasn't the imaginary world where he could just go in guns blazing and blow up all the robots. He had to sneak by these bots and try not to get killed in the process.

No time like the present. He thought of the words his dad used to tell him. Way back in the day.

Charlie stepped forward and walked slowly out of the shadows as if he was on an afternoon stroll. He walked up to the bots who held their arms across the door as he approached.

“I left my lucky charm in there,” Charlie said. “I just need to get in and grab it. It’ll just take a second.”

Shit. If Jade could tell he was lying, wouldn’t the bots be able to also?

“We are instructed to grant entry to no one,” the silver bot said, its mechanical voice stilted.

Charlie frowned at the bot.

“Is there something wrong with your voice?” He asked

“My voice?” The gray bot repeated. “I don’t think so.” He looked over at the other bot.

The other bot had an orange V on its chest. “You know, I have been thinking it sounded a little bit off lately,” the V-Bot said.

“You see there,” Charlie said pointing at VBot as he glanced over at the silver bot. “You see how his voice has a bit of a trail at the end? How it kind of rolls as if off a tongue? Your voice, not so much.”

“But I thought I had a perfectly fine voice-”

And suddenly the gray bot’s hand flew over where its mouth might’ve been; where the speaker was projecting its voice.

“You heard it,” Charlie said. He desperately wanted to glance at his watch. This was taking too long. But he had to hold cool and steady.

“I can fix it for you,” he said. “No problem.”

“You can?” the silver bot asked.

“Absolutely. I just need to access your control panel.” Charlie stepped forward.

“We’re not allowed to let anyone access our panels,” the bot said doubtfully.

“Of course!” Charlie raised his hands and took a step back. “When I first got here, you know, I’m Charlie Richards, that’s what they told me.”

V-Bot whirred excitedly. “You could get him to work on your code! Can you imagine how awesome that’s going to sound?”

The silver bot tilted sideways as if considering.

But the V-Bot was already sold. “Hey Charlie, could you do something in my code?” he asked.

Charlie smiled. “Absolutely,” he said. Some programmer had given these robots a little bit too much humanity. They were rolling in ego.

“Let me just get behind you guys. Can you pop your panels open for me?” He asked.

“No problem,” V-Bot said, turning around instantly and popping his panel open. Charlie’s eyes widened as he looked at the panel. He had no idea what the hell he was doing, but he now had the opportunity to stop this.

“You, too,” he said casually to the silver bot, not taking his eyes off V-Bot’s panel.

The silver bot paused for a moment before slowly turning his back to Charlie and opening his panel. Charlie now had them both in the palm of his hand. He simply needed to figure out what to do with that. Which he most certainly did not.

Charlie looked at both panels. The glass sheen reflected the sweat that was beading on his forehead. He blinked twice at the panel and the series of numbers glaring on it flickered.

This was his chance. Charlie closed his eyes for a moment and he remembered watching Dustin as he had gotten into the master computer. A series of three blinks, two blinks, and five blinks, with the swipe of his pinky finger to the right. Charlie copied the memory. It worked on the third try and accessed the core bot code. Now all he had to do was shut it down.

He glanced at the silver bot’s panel and got to its core text as well. All he had to do was dive into the duodenary world of 24th century code and switch the damn thing off for good. They would never reboot.

“Hey guys, can you just hug it out?” Charlie asked.

The bots exchanged a glance, but shrugged and clashed against each other in a metal embrace.

“Hold each other tight now,” Charlie said. He knew the second he shut one down, if the other could move, he’d be a goner. The silver bot gripped tightly so Charlie moved to the back of the V-Bot. He counted rapidly, then moved over and blinked update.

“Hey, what’s happening to him?” asked V-Bot. The silver bot shut down and held its grip firmly around V-Bot. The massive orange bot began to push against him.

“Calm down,” Charlie soothed. “He’s just rebooting.” Charlie slipped behind V-Bot as fast as he could and counted through the system until he could move over to the sixty-fifth galaxy. V-Bot still struggled against the grip of silver bot, but then fell silent. The dead bots hugging looked like some strange modern sculpture ready to be placed in the center of a park.

Charlie turned back towards the doors of the computer lab and did the only thing that made sense to him when they didn’t slide open. He knocked.

The door slid open and there stood the young-programming-Charlie-super-fan, Graham. His face lit up when he saw Charlie.

Charlie was glad to see him as well. Finally, somebody on his side. “Something’s wrong with the hybrids,” he said, moving past the kid and straight towards the master computer. He was desperately trying to remember the kid’s name. “Dustin sent me down here to make some quick repairs. You alone?”

“The others are about to turn up,” the kid said, “but we’ve been, um, told not to not to let you in to do anything.”

Charlie stopped touching the keyboards and turned to look at the kid. Great, even he was against him now. He just couldn’t catch a break.

Graham stumbled when Charlie looked at him, clearly uncomfortable with having to tell his hero

no. “I mean, that was the one instruction they gave me, it was to, like, not let you touch the computers.”

Charlie raised his finger in the air. He had signed the kid’s shirt! “The only problem with that, Graham,” he mused, trying to appear as effortless as Graham saw him, “is how else am I going to fix the hybrids if I can’t get into the computer?”

Graham looked at him with slight confusion on his face. “Are you sure Dustin sent you?” he asked. “He doesn’t really seem to like you.”

“Well, really, it was Blake,” Charlie shrugged, sidestepping the kid as much as possible and slowly inching closer to the computer. “But you know, I don’t like to name-drop Blake everywhere I go. People start to get the wrong idea about you, if you’re a name dropper.”

Charlie’s interpersonal skills were crap, and he knew it, but he had to pour it on for this kid. He had to get access to the CompuVerse. “Why don’t you show me what you were working on there,” he squinted at the boy. “Graham.”

“Oh, well, you know, I noticed there was a delay in the passing of information between-” Graham stopped, looking a little self-conscious. “Look, you’re going to think this is really dumb and I don’t think anybody else ever noticed, but you know, I just really thought the bots, that they should have a little more empathy with humans. You know how when you talk to a bot and it just stares at you and it doesn’t look away? Well it’s not very human, is it? It’s like, humans don’t do that. I’m looking at you, but our eyes kind of dart to the side and things and then- then it’s like, normal. So, I was thinking if a bot could do that maybe it would make them seem, you know, less...”

Charlie had his arms folded over his chest and one finger placed carefully on his lower lip his eyebrows drawn together. He was the very picture of a concerned and interested individual.

“Scary?” He suggested. He didn’t let it show, but he was completely chuffed to have found Graham’s weakness and it was a weakness he could help him with.

“Yeah,” Graham said, shrugging and staring down at his feet.

“No problem.” Charlie said. “They kind of scare me too,” he said. “So, did you work it out? Do you know how to change the code? And do you even have permission to?”

“Can you believe it?” Graham’s voice came out with a slight chuckle. “You know, I got this internship and it’s like, wow I thought they would have me like, cleaning the garbage bins, but well, you know, I scored like the highest gig of all at the programming school – like in all of Crowley. I mean like I’m number one.”

Charlie was actually starting to like this kid.

It was a pity the kid was going to get in trouble for what Charlie was going to do.

“I never got any programming award,” Charlie said. “You must be pretty good.” And to his surprise, Charlie found he meant it.

“Thanks!” Graham blushed.

Charlie rolled up his sleeves. “So, I think this is going to be a great problem to fix, and you might want to start with just a small timer on the visual tics so it doesn't have to be directly in response to a conversation the bot is having with the human," Charlie suggested. If he could just get this kid refocused on his own work, Charlie would be able to get into his.

"I might be able to, you know, do it at intervals," Graham nodded. "But I'd need to experimentally time it out naturally. Not now, because we're too aware of it, you know, like right now, if I started looking away every couple of seconds, it would be, you know, forced. But maybe tonight when I'm home with my parents, I should look at a conversation with my mom and dad and see how many times they look away from me and count that interval. If I could program twenty different random intervals and feed the code out across everybody and have it select the interval randomly for each bot and then they won't all be doing exactly the same thing at the same time too." Graham took a breath.

"Yeah, could you imagine Dustin or Warren out there talking to the bots and every five seconds all the bots start shifting their eyes to the upper right-hand corner and seven seconds later they're all shifting their eyes to the lower left-hand corner?" Charlie chuckled at the idea. "Actually, that'd be kind of funny."

Graham laughed, too. "So, what was the problem you came down here to fix?" That were just a couple of buds discussing some coding issues.

Charlie glanced around. The monitors weren't on. Clearly Graham had been focused more on the changes he wanted to make in the bots rather than anything going on in the real world.

"Well-" Charlie started.

"There is no problem we need Charlie to fix," Dustin's voice echoed as the doors slid open and he walked in, his patent shoes making a soft, rhythmic tapping as he moved aside to let two massive ProtectoBots into the room.

"This area is off limits, Charlie," Dustin said. "Everywhere is off-limits to you." He turned to Graham. "You disappoint me, kid."

The bot stepped forward and flanked Charlie, gripping his arms in a way he was sure he would never get free from. In fact, if they gripped any harder he wasn't sure he would ever be able to program again.

"Get him out of here," Dustin said.

Chapter 27

Charlie had no choice but to go with the bots. He might've been a genius programmer, but he was nowhere near anything impressive in terms of martial arts or physicality. The bots were so capable, Dustin hadn't even chosen to join them. He just left them to do their work, which was apparently taking him and Graham down to the nether regions of headquarters into what can only be described as a warren of passages leading to a dark metal cell. Graham was tossed into a cell on a higher level than Charlie. A single red light blinked in the corner as the doors slid shut behind the exiting bots. A pale blue light flickered on in the cell.

Monfils didn't want to do it, but he had to. He opened the case and pulled out the small black disc that fit snugly in the palm of his hand. There was just no way he was going to lose her this easily. Not to an asshole like Warren.

"Jade, may I speak to you a moment?" He said into his comm. He'd already identified her location and placed himself within a few blocks of her.

"I'm busy," Jade said.

Monfils didn't even want to know what she was doing. "I'll meet you at 36b and Theta," he said. "If you're not there in five minutes, I'll come and find you."

She was there. Monfils was so relieved, he could have kissed her. But last time he'd tried that, well, it hadn't gone down so well, so he wasn't about to try it again. Not yet anyway.

Jade looked like crap. He grimaced as he saw the blood on her uniform and the crazed look in her eye. She turned on him and he hit the button in the black disc before he could stop himself. Every Delta had an override button and they were all in his possession. Jade was one of the few Deltas who knew about them. He'd promised Jade he would never use hers. But he had always kept it. It didn't work for long, but hopefully it would work for long enough.

Her eyes rolled back in her head and he grabbed her as she slumped forward.

Monfils slapped her awake as Angelo stepped forward, grabbing his wrist from a second slap. "My good sir, I do not think that is the best way to wake a lady," he stated.

Monfils rolled his eyes. “I don’t know what she sees in you, lard can. Jade! Wake up!”

Jade’s eyes opened. “What is going on...?”

“Warren has done something to the code. Not just your code, but every Delta’s code.”

Jade pulled herself away from Monfils. “No,” she murmured with horror as she looked down at her blood-stained uniform. “I don’t remember anything.”

“Warren has all the Deltas under his control,” Monfils said. “We don’t have much time. You’ll be back under his control as soon as the spike wears off. We have about ninety seconds.”

“Charlie...” Jade murmured.

“Warren has him, too.” Monfils said.

Jade blinked as she tried to compute the problem and come up with a solution. “Angelo,” she finally said, “protect Charlie Richards. Take him to the rebel base in Holbrook.”

“Why, the rebels will try to destroy me on sight,” Angelo said politely. “That’s not a very sensible plan.”

“Surrender to them, you big red dufus,” Jade said. “And get out to Holbrook. Maverick and Charlie can help me. They can help all of us.”

Monfils nodded and Angelo bowed as darkness settled over Jade’s eyes and the disease of Dustin’s code returned.

Charlie wasn’t sure how long he’d been in the cell. The pale blue light never changed. The blinking red light never changed, nobody ever came, but when his stomach growled he realized he must’ve been in here for quite a while. Who knows what was going on up above. Were hybrids killing everyone? No one was going to have time to take care of Charlie or decide what to do with him. In fact, they might even just leave him here. Maybe this was his coffin and he just didn’t realize it yet. Surely, they couldn’t just let a time-travelling celebrity starve to death. Could they? This couldn’t be the end of his epic journey through time and his history of creating the hybrid species, the link between man and machine. But as the hours dragged on and Charlie’s stomach growled longer and harder he realized it might very well be the case.

A slight whirring sound woke him from the twilight slumber. He sat up and looked up at the camera in the corner. The little red light was gone. If anybody had been watching, they couldn’t do it now. He heard another noise. He had no idea where it was coming from, until finally a slight metal shaving floated down from above him and brushed against his forehead. He looked up as more metal shavings fell. Someone or something was drilling through the ceiling above him. And quickly. Charlie stepped aside as an avalanche of metal shavings came down. There was no place to hide, whoever was trying to get into his cell was coming in. Charlie didn’t have too many friends, not in this time. Well, in any time really, so he had no idea what was about to come through.

“I thought you might like a sandwich, Mr. Richards.”

It was probably the last thing Charlie expected to hear. When the metallic red arm descended through the hole and presented him with the most perfect pastrami sandwich Charlie had ever seen in his entire life.

“Angelo!” Charlie leapt forward and grabbed the pastrami sandwich. He took four big bites before even bothering to look up. By that time Angelo had managed to make the hole in the ceiling larger and was waving Charlie over.

“Come stand here.” Angelo pointed at the space directly beneath the hole.

Charlie did exactly as he was told; he felt the metal grip on the back of his shirt and he was instantly lifted into the tight metal crawl space in between split levels of headquarters.

“How the hell did you get a sandwich in here?” Charlie asked.

“I’m equipped with a lunch container,” Angelo said. “I am well aware humans get hungry. They eat so much, you would never believe it.”

Charlie could, in fact, believe it.

“Now we’re going to have to shimmy down this path until we get to the outlet,” Angelo said.

“Shimmy?” Charlie said. It was the last thing he ever expected to hear a 24th century robot say or do.

The lights on each one of Angelo’s shoulders created a pale pink glow in the cramped space and wiggled as he moved his shoulders.

“Where the hell did you learn to shimmy?” Charlie asked.

“Why, you are speaking to Crowley’s very own five-time Bot Salsa Champion,” he said with what Charlie was pretty sure was a hint of pride.

“Well I sure as hell wasn’t,” Charlie said as he reached forward and began dragging his ass after the perfect robot.

The Massacre in the Pavilion, as it would come to be known, was, not surprisingly, a massacre. Hybrids leaped, dodged and danced through the rebels, all while firing at the panic-filled rebel human alliance.

“Tal!” Zeke shrieked at Tallahassee. They were hiding around the corner of a brownstone home at the edge of Trenchtown. “What are we going to do, Tal?”

“We’ve been in tighter spots than this, Zeke. We will be fine.” Tallahassee did his best to reassure Zeke, but he wasn’t so sure himself. Things were bad. He peaked around the corner to look back the battlefield. Scores of rebels were being cornered and slaughtered. His brothers. He wanted to run out there and save them. But they were vastly outnumbered and weren’t prepared for a war.

One of his Allegiance brothers, kid named Milan, was cornered by tall hybrid. He shot backwards as he ran away, but the hybrid was too fast. Tallahassee took aim, fired a HEL. It was a long shot, at two hundred meters, but it found its intended target. “Oh, hell yeah!” Tallahassee yelled.

“You get one, Tal?” Zeke let out a nervous chuckle.

“Damn right I did.” Tallahassee turned back to Zeke and gave a thumbs-up. “See, I told you we’d be fine.”

Tallahassee turned back around the corner to view the scene. He scanned the crowd and then he saw her. Their eyes locked. Jadyn of Crowley’s gaze bore into his soul. The disease had washed back over her and she had returned to the battle. Slowly and methodically she walked through the battlefield, directly towards them. In her hand the electromagnetic whip blazed.

“Shit!” Tallahassee cried as he hid back behind the corner and slammed into the brownstone. His breaths were deep and labored.

“Tal?” Zeke, sensing Tallahassee’s panic, let it seep into his voice as well. “What is it, Tal?”

Tallahassee didn’t answer. He just needed to think. There was always a way out. He just had to think. And he had about fifteen seconds to do it.

“Come now!” came the thick, unmistakable accent of Gunk.

Zeke and Tallahassee turned to see a welcomed sight. Gunk sat behind the controls of his Sanitation Truck at the far end of Trenchtown.

“Gunk!” Zeke yelled exultantly.

They ran.

The sanitation incinerator hovered closer.

And around the corner came Jade, her eyes glazed over in a foggy sickness. She snapped her electromagnetic whip against the side of the building and brick and mortar crumbled to the crowd. She sprinted after Tallahassee and Zeke. But they had a good head start.

Tallahassee and Zeke reached the sanitation hovercraft and leaped into the side bay door. Zeke let out a long, relieved sigh. “Damn that was close!”

Before they could get the door closed, a flash of white lit up the inside of the craft. Zeke screamed in pain as a white electromagnetic tail of a whip latched around his ankle. It burned deeply into his skin, all the way down to the tendons in mere seconds.

Tallahassee ripped off his metal shin guard and crashed it down hard on the white beams. They melted the front plate, but contact was broken. The white beam slithered away as Tallahassee slammed the door shut. Zeke rolled around in pain as the sanitation incinerator flew away from the battlefield. A battlefield where they lost so many of their brothers and sisters today.

“God dammit, Angelo!” Charlie exclaimed as he pressed against the metal wall the killer red bot had just slipped through. “Help me get out of this thing!”

A moment earlier Angelo had lifted the metal and slipped outside. Charlie had expected him to lift the metal wall and help him out, but the bot hadn't done anything. Charlie pushed all his weight against the wall. A small sliver of an opening cracked in the dark metal that scraped against his skin as he tumbled out of the crawl space and to the ground below.

And it was immediately apparent why Angelo had been no help whatsoever. Charlie realized why the minute he fell unceremoniously through the tiniest crack between the metal plate in the building.

Angelo was shockingly sitting on the ground with three rebels standing around him like he was the trophy of a prize hunt. Like they bagged a coon or something.

They didn't even have their weapons pointed at the killer red robot, who was just sitting there staring up at Charlie as if this was his plan all along.

The rebels, on the other hand, were completely startled by Charlie slipping out of the building and immediately raised their weapons, the crisp clicking of metal and the high-pitched sound of the HEL charging filled the air.

"What the hell are you doing?" Charlie waved his arms with exasperation at Angelo.

"It appears," Angelo said, "I'm resting." He seemed not in the least bit bothered by this circumstance.

"Attack them!" Charlie exclaimed. "They're holding guns on me."

"Those are not guns," Angelo explained. "They are in fact high-powered Gx548 laser centric HEL fusion adjusters. When they're fully charged and the energy is expelled, it slips into your body through the space in your cells, not harming the outside shell in the slightest, but when it gets inside it solidifies and creates a huge chunk of sother crystal inside your body, which immediately starts to reach out and absorb all the other parts of your body until you become--"

"Dead," Tallahassee finished. His eyes squinted over at Charlie. "Your robot always this chatty?"

"He's not my robot," Charlie said. "And yes, he is chatty. But when his owner finds him and whatever you've done to him... What have you done to him?"

Angelo held up his hands. They were bound together but each wrist had a partial metal ring on it that looked something like a horseshoe with large flat discs on either side. They seemed to be pumping some sort of an energy through his wrists. "They are hyperspatial defractor cuffs," Angelo said. "Quite remarkable really, don't you think?"

"I might think so if I knew what the hell they were," Charlie said.

Zeke stepped forward. "It short circuits every attack command at the source."

"Great," Charlie said.

"And what it means for you," Tallahassee added, "is that you should really raise your hands in the air."

Charlie slowly did as he was told, turning to face his three captors. His eyes nearly fell out of his head as he finally noticed the lanky fluorescent being that stood casually with the other two rebels. "What the hell is that?" he exclaimed.

“My people and my name is unpronounceable in any language on this planet,” Gunk said.

“An alien?” Charlie stated the obvious.

“I am a visitor to this fine place,” Gunk nodded, the gills on the side of his neck letting out a fine trill.

“A visitor who can’t get home,” Tallahassee said.
