“You can call him Gunk,” Zeke interjected.

Charlie just shook his head. Mind overload. “Let me get this straight, you three guys with powerful weapons have rendered Angelo useless and you’re worried about me doing what? Scratching my butt? I don’t have any weapons.”

“Angelo?” Zeke drawled.

“Well, god damn,” Tallahassee slowly walked around the massive red bot. “I thought he looked familiar. Must have been in too much shock, I didn’t realize.”

Charlie frowned. “You guys know each other?”

“Everyone knows the most famous Crowley bot,” Gunk said.

“Well, we’ve got ourselves a winner,” Tallahassee grinned. “We best get him home.” He nodded towards Charlie and spoke to Zeke. “Pat him down.”

Zeke rolled his eyes. “Why do I get all the crap jobs?”

Charlie stood as Zeke ran his hands over his shirt and down his legs and checked his boots. They listen to the sound of the battle in the distance, but it was getting louder and closer.

“Don’t you think we ought to be moving?” he asked. “I don’t know about you guys, but the last time I saw hybrids they were killing humans.”

“He has a point,” Angelo said.

“Get up,” Tallahassee motioned towards Angelo, as if he were a bauble on a string instead of a red killing machine, Angelo stood up and fell in line with Charlie.

“Seriously?” Charlie looked up at Angelo. “You can’t do anything? Not a laser? Not a karate chop? Not a little dagger? Nothing?”

“I can serve coffee,” Angelo said with a certain amount of a surety that pissed Charlie off. A lot of good it did him having the world’s deadliest bot by his side when he had been diminished to nothing more than a barista.

“Come on, let’s go.” Zeke muttered. He and Gunk were behind Angelo and Charlie, but they didn’t have to prod them forward. At that moment, a loud explosion blew something up two streets away. Everyone took off running, following Tallahassee as he stooped low and headed down the alley like a rat looking for food.

Blake Crowley was not sure what to think. He rolled around two metallic spheres in his hand as he watched the bank of monitors in his office. On the screens, he scanned the aftermath of the battlefield. On one hand, the Lowsmith problem appeared to have been dealt with. That was good, because that was an annoying problem he didn't need in his life. But how it had happened was troubling. He had not given the order for the attack. More troubling; Robin. Robin had just given him a lecture on the sanctity of life, and now she was opening fire on humans? It didn't add up.

"Excuse me sir," Blake's hologram assistant popped up. "Warren Relic is here to see you."

Blake nodded. In came Warren, calm and emotionless as always. But Blake had been around him enough to read hints in his demeanor. Warren was in high spirits. Blake rolled the spheres around and around in his hand. "Is the fighting over?"

Warren gave a shrug of his left shoulder. "Practically. Just a few skirmishes here and there."

"Did we kill all of the Lowsmiths?"

"Not all. A few dozen escaped into the desert mountains." Warren hit a button and out popped a fresh glass onto the desk. The wondrous liquid that was Corsica flowed into the glass. "But I'm not worried about it. Their infrastructure will be decimated." Warren picked up the glass of Corsica. He tipped it to Blake. "To stopping a revolution." Warren took a small, measured sip.

Blake looked at Warren a long time, but eventually took his glass, tipped to Warren, and took a big sip. "Did you order the Deltas to attack?"

"Well, that's complicated. The important thing is the end result is what we wanted."

"Don't play that way with me, Warren."

"There had been some coding issues with the Deltas. Something Charlie Richards did to them. Made them more aggressive than usual. But it's nothing we haven't been able to handle. Dustin has been reprogramming them so we are in control."

"Are they sick again?"

"No, not at all. In fact, he assures me they will be back to normal with the next few days. In the meantime, we had a lucky side effect where they took care of a problem for us."

Blake leaned back in his chair. Warren had been wanting to kill the Lowsmiths all along. He didn't trust him one bit. But if he called him out now it would be a mistake. Whatever happened to the hybrids, they were a deadly bunch. "This isn't good, Warren."

"It's ok. It's all taken care of. The most important thing now is we can go back to doing what we do best, making money. You've been doing this a long time, Blake. You need to relax, and enjoy what you've build. This city. This empire. Your fortune. You don't have to interfere with anything, just enjoy what you have created."

Blake took a long sip of Corsica. What was Warren implying, not interfering? Blake took another sip. "Okay, Warren. What's next?"

Warren smiled.

Charlie was exhausted as they ran through the streets of Crowley, but there was no letting up. They had to get there. It wasn't just the hybrids, there were ProtectoBots out patrolling the streets looking for rebels and finishing off the work at the hybrids started.

Charlie was amazed he wasn't disoriented as they raced to escape the city. He had been looking down at it from the top of a high-rise and had a pretty good feel for the different quadrants. Trenchtown was off to their left about five miles. Crowley headquarters was behind them, which meant...his heart gave a surge of hope...they were headed towards the quadrant that housed the DarkM'attr machine. He bit his inner cheek trying to figure out how he was going to escape the rebels and get to the machine. This might be his only chance. And he had Angelo with him. Angelo would help him get the thing running again. If only he could get Angelo's help. But the two metal rings around Angelo's wrists had rendered him useless. And with a simple glance Charlie recognized they would be impossible to simply pry off. In fact, they looked like if you touched them they might fry off one of your fingers.

"Hurry up," Tallahassee urged them forward. "We haven't survived this long to lose our asses to some bright red target and some slow ass human."

As much as he desperately wanted to get to the DarkM'attr machine, the truth was he needed Angelo. So, he was going to have to stick this out until he could find a way to get Angelo either away from these guys or figure out how to get those rings off his wrists. Regardless, one thing was apparent as they dodged and dove their way through the shining streets of Crowley: sticking with the rebels was going to be Charlie's best chance of survival. The hybrids were on the attack and if Charlie had any money to bet on it he to say Warren was taking over Crowley.

They slipped through the gate right by the DarkM'attr machine. But Charlie kept his head low and kept running. At least he knew exactly where it was even if the monstrous machine looked dormant, almost like it hadn't been used in years, even though Charlie knew it had been. And, with a bit of luck it would be used pretty quickly again.

The walls of Crowley were massive, but they were breached and Tallahassee knew just the path to take over the rubble to get outside of the city. In moments, they were past the DarkM'attr machine, outside the wall and racing across a dark wilderness. Charlie couldn't make much out, but the ground was hard as they ran and they looped around what looked like a massive structure. On the other side of the hulking black space, hidden in its shadows, was a dark foreboding disc that seemed perched on top of a capsule.

"Get in," Tallahassee said as a door slid open in the side of the capsule. They entered a long metal tube that had no windows and helmets attached to the side of the wall as if it was some sort of freakish hair salon with a row of old lady hair dryers.

Zeke grabbed Charlie, pressed him down in a seat under one of the helmet hair dryers and manacled him to the side of the ship.

"For goodness sake, do you think this is really necessary?" Charlie asked. "It's not like I'm about to attack any of you. You're probably saving my life."

"You can never be too sure," Tallahassee grumbled, strapping himself into a chair.

"He's right," Zeke said. "Heck, I attacked Gunk just the other night."

"Shut up," Tallahassee said.

"You had every right to," said Gunk. "I had after all beat you soundly in a game you take great pride in."

Note to self, thought Charlie, Zeke is a poor loser.

And then he suddenly realized. "Do you guys know who I am?" he asked. In the 21st century this would've seemed like the most ridiculous and comical thing to say. But here in the 24th century, Charlie was somebody. He was Charlie Richards, the inventor of the code connecting biology and machines. He practically invented the hybrids, except hybrids didn't actually exist in the 21st century, they were a figment of his imagination. But it didn't change the fact that Charlie Richard's today actually invented the code making hybrids possible.

"I am Charlie Richards," he said.

But nobody was listening to him. They were strapping in and preparing for lift off.

"I'm not sure right now is the best time to bring that up," Angelo said.

"Why not?" Charlie asked. "Don't you think they won't keep me locked up if they know who I am?"

"You invented the code that has created the race that is destroying their race," Angelo said. "They might want you locked up. However, this transport is about to take off and I believe it can be quite difficult on the human body. And perhaps you should be—" Angelo's words were cut off by a sudden loud whirring sound that enveloped the vehicle. Charlie realized he was the only human who had not pulled a large metal hood over his head. The rest had and were leaning forward and gripping it tight.

Charlie was not.

The whirring sound grew louder and in a millisecond the vehicle jumped straight up in the air and Charlie's stomach plunged down to the base of his spine and his arms flailed in the air, hitting metal as they grappled to find something to hold him against.

"You should have the hood over your head!" Angelo's voice rang out over the loud whirring sound that seemed to create a vortex inside Charlie's head. The vehicle came to a sudden stop in the air and Charlie's stomach rose rapidly, flying out of his mouth. The pastrami sandwich came hurtling out of his throat and splattered in chunks all over his boots.

Laughter rang out around the transport vehicle as Tallahassee and Zeke pushed their metal helmets back.

"Haven't you ever been in one of these?" Zeke asked. "Every idiot knows you've got to put on the puke hood, or else you puke."

"Even Zeke knows," Gunk said. Clipping his hood back against the metal wall behind him.

"Why?" Charlie gasped the word out, still doubled over trying to regain control of his senses as the vehicle started to move forward through the air. There were no windows so he was locked in his body trying to figure out which direction it was moving in as it sped through the air.

“The hoods?” Tallahassee asked. “They have droms that go inside your ears.” He twisted his head showing there was something sticking out of it. “They engage when the machine starts up, disengage when we go to land. They balance out our equilibrium and help our bodies to adjust to the speed we’re moving at.”

“How could you not know?” Zeke asked.

“I’m not from around here,” Charlie said, starting to feel like his words were a replay of some bad 70s movie. “I’m Charlie Richards. I’m from the 21st century.”

“Yeah, and I’m Blake Crowley,” Tallahassee growled as he stood up and went to check some gauges on the control panel to the side. “We got slammed,” he muttered as he read the screen.

Charlie was still exceptionally queasy but the emptiness of his stomach made it slightly more tolerable. He raised his head trying to stop the capsule from spinning and his eyes looked on a black screen where green numbers played out in long columns, some bright green and some dim green.

“What is it?” he mumbled. Trying to keep his mind off of his reeling stomach.

“Serial numbers,” Tallahassee said.

Zeke held out his wrist showing a number tattooed on the inside of it the series of numbers and letters.

“You have serial numbers?” Charlie murdered.

“Everyone has a serial number.” Zeke said. “Everyone human.”

All eyes in the transport vessel turned to Charlie.

“I’m human,” Charlie said.

“Where is your serial number?” Zeke asked.

“I don’t have one,” Charlie articulated. “In the 21st century we don’t stamp numbers on people unless we’re going to put them all in a gas chamber.”

“The dark ages,” Zeke muttered.

“What happened?” Charlie asked.

“To the humans. Why do they all have serial numbers?”

“It was during the plague,” Zeke said. “People were dying everywhere and the government started to become afraid they wouldn’t be able to recognize the people or keep track of them, so they gave everybody serial numbers. After that, even when the plague was over, it didn’t seem to be such a bad thing having everybody with serial numbers on them. So now any human born is given a number.”

“But doesn’t that mean the hybrids have serial numbers also?” Charlie asked.

“They do,” Zeke said. “It’s just, when you become part machine, letters are added to the front of your serial number. It’s part of the first procedure: HYB.”

Charlie wondered why he hadn’t noticed before, but there had been a lot going on in the short time he'd been here. "So, everybody has serial numbers on them?"

"Everyone except for the bots and the Outliers." Zeke nodded.

Charlie knew the bots had a code in the middle of their forehead. But... "What the hell is an Outlier?"

"When the plague hit, it wiped everyone out, mostly," Zeke said. "The survivors started pooling into large cities, hoping there would be resources there to save them. But then the cities started collapsing and it seemed like more people were dying in the cities, so everyone started escaping those and set up small settlements, but it was really too late. The major cities died out. All except for Crowley."

"Crowley is all there is of civilization?" Charlie blinked at Zeke. He knew it was desolate, but could Crowley really be the only city?

"On this side of the Rockies," Zeke nodded.

"Los Angeles? San Francisco? Seattle?" Charlie asked.

"They've been gone for seventy years," Zeke said.

"There's nothing between here and Alaska? Or here and Mexico City? Or here and New York?" Charlie couldn't hide his shocked. It seeped out of every pore of his body as he blinked at Zeke.

"Crowley is incredibly isolated. But there are little pockets of outliers," Zeke shrugged. "Village communities that scrape food out of the earth to survive. But most people go to the comfort of Crowley."

"How did Crowley survive?" Charlie asked, but he thought he might already know the answer.

"Hybrid technology," Zeke said. "Crowley was able to do stuff. He'd been using nanotechnology and neuroscience ever since anyone can remember."

"He's not a hybrid at all?" Charlie said. "I find that really hard to believe. How does the man who glorifies the hybrids not tap into some of those capabilities himself?"

"They say he's working on bigger things," Zeke said. "Like accessing the two-thirds of the human brain nobody ever uses. That's how he was able to build Crowley, using technology he's not willing to share with anyone, he uses it only for himself."

"He accesses the hidden region of the brain?" Charlie asked.

"You're going to have to ask your robot about that," Zeke shrugged. "Only time I've seen Crowley is on a pamphlet and the screen. He was a lot more public before his wife got sick. Heck, there was a while when we all thought he might be dead."

"What about cities on the other side? What still exists? New York?" Charlie asked.

"Yeah, New York exists, but we don't know anything about them," Zeke said.

"How they survive? Nothing?"

"We hear that sometimes Crowley sends recon through the Rocky Mountains, but that space is controlled by the Dervish and ain't nobody getting through no-man's land."

Charlie sat back against the metal wall of the transport, feeling it grate against his spine. What sort of world had Earth become? What sort of place was this? Charlie had been so caught up in being the hero of Crowley, he had never wondered where the city itself fit into the scheme of things.

Chapter 28

The transport landed quickly, swooping down over the yellow and red dirt at the base of a large red mountain. It launched the capsule-like a projectile into a large tunnel that looked like it had been carved by one of the worms from Dune. But in solid rock, not sand.

“Welcome to Holbrook,” Zeke said as Charlie stumbled out of the transport. “Or as we like to call it, Hellbreak.”

Holbrook was a decent distance from Las Vegas and the transport had gotten them there in about fifteen minutes. Insane. This was hundred-year-old machinery. Imagine how fast the 24th century stuff must be able to travel.

The Lowsmiths lived in bunkers. Apparently, this region was too far for Crowley to patrol, but not far enough for a few rebels with fast enough transports to slip in and slip out of the city.

They were greeted in the tunnel by a couple of Allegiance members dressed in their trademark dark brown body suits and carrying HEL fusions came to the electric gates of the cell. They took one look at the large red bot standing next to Charlie and let out a low whistle.

“Big Red,” one muttered.

Charlie glanced at Angelo, but there wasn’t time to ask questions.

“Trekon will see you,” the first guard said.

“Who’s Trekon?” Charlie asked Zeke as he was ushered down a tunnel that lead between the different premises of the Lowsmiths.

The rebel behind him pushed Charlie in the back with the butt of his weapon. “He’s in charge around here, and I suggest you treat him with a little respect.”

He wasn’t about to do anything else. There was nowhere to go even if he did escape. The only place he wanted to go was back to the DarkM’attr machine and get the hell out of this crazy place. Then he could figure out what he could do in the past to stop this horrible future from happening.

When Charlie saw Trekon, he thought he would’ve treated him with respect even if he hadn’t gotten hit in the back with a blunt object. Charlie frowned at the gray-haired man as he walked up. The man looked almost kindly.

But he was perfunctory. “Maverick, have you tested them?”

A short round man stepped forward from the shadows of the cavern. He had thick glasses and different contraptions and digital devices strapped to various parts of his body. He looked like he been rushing to get there and had only just stepped into the room. He wiped the sweat off his top lip as he stepped forward, pulling a device off of his upper left arm and aiming it directly at Charlie's face.

Charlie ducked immediately. "What the hell?"

"Identity device," Maverick said, looking fondly at the tool in his hand. "You can relax, it's not gonna hurt. You know we are not barbaric like they are in Crowley. There they put all those numbers on people but there are so many better ways to identify people and-"

"Stand up for identification," one of the guards said, yanking at Charlie's arm.

Trekon raised a hand towards the guard to get him to stand down. "He has been in Crowley, he may not be used to our ways here. The identification device tests the neuron map of your brain to create identification for you."

Charlie looked warily at the machine. "I don't get it. Like fingerprinting?"

Maverick laughed. "Fingerprinting only works when you have a library of fingerprints to compare it to. No, no, no, this is much more advanced technology and it has to do with your real experiences. Fingerprints must be mapped to a library, much like serial numbers."

"We invest everything we have in technology," Trekon said. "And we have worked to bring some of the greatest minds of our times into the Human Allegiance."

"That's what they call themselves," Angelo leaned over and whispered to Charlie.

"The beam from this device is going to go through your eyes and do a quick neural map of your brain. All the information will be fed through the device and into the machine." He pointed to a screen glowing pale green that Charlie hadn't noticed in the time he'd been in the room.

"Using the map, it will reconstruct your life and tell us exactly who you are. This uses your cellular information to tell us when and where you were born and everything that has happened to you from birth up until this moment. This can access memories you don't even know you have and deliver to us a complete physical and psychological profile of your existence."

"You've got to be shitting me," Charlie said. And suddenly he wished he'd done some more exciting things in his life because he was suddenly terrified that what was going to come up on the screen was him sitting at the bar drinking beer.

"I don't want to do it. I told you, I'm Charlie Richards, and-"

A snicker went up through the room, but it was mainly from the guards. Maverick and Trekon simply looked at Charlie.

"We shall see," Trekon said. "Run the test."

"Hold his head," Maverick said.

Charlie warily eyed the guards who grabbed his shoulders, each one placing a hand on either side of his head.

"I thought you said this wasn't going to hurt," he said to Maverick.

“It doesn’t, but sometimes the memories it draws out have an impact on you and can cause you to jerk a little bit. Now, they’re also going to need to hold your eyes open. Just one.” He nodded towards the guards as both reached towards his eyes.

Charlie immediately realized resisting the invasion of his brain was going to be futile, but he struggled anyway, whipping his head right and left, until he heard the cool tones of Trekon fill the cavern.

“Charlie, we’re going to do this regardless of whether you want us to or not. The device works whether you are awake or in a coma, whether you are alive or-” he paused to make sure everybody in the room was listening, “-dead.”

“You should’ve killed him before you got on the transport,” one of the guards said to Zeke.

“Shut up,” Zeke grumbled.

“We do not waste human life if we feel we can win them over,” Trekon said from the front of the room. “The more allegiance we have, the better. We are particularly interested in you because you say you are Charlie Richards. If you, by some bizarre chance, do happen to be Charlie Richards, this is the way we are going to discover the truth.”

“I just got a public award!” Charlie exclaimed. “I’m an Order of the Apothecary!”

“Accolade,” Angelo corrected.

“Right,” Charlie said.

“Just because Blake Crowley says you are Charlie Richards and holds some big pompous ceremony proclaiming such, well, it doesn’t mean it’s true,” Trekon said. “If you do not submit to this test then we will assume you are not interested in becoming an Allegiant, and then we will have no further use for you. Is my meaning clear?”

Shit, Charlie thought, no wonder this guy leads the rebels. His tone was so mesmerizing that Charlie had relaxed and just stood there like an idiot, listening. But Trekon had made his point perfectly clear: submit or die.

“What about him?” Charlie deflected the attention towards Angelo. “Why don’t you run it on him? You should be able to tap into his neural brain and access the same type of information.”

Everyone in the room looked at Angelo for a minute and a slow smile slid across Trekon’s face.

“There is not a human, hybrid, or bot this side of the Dervish who doesn’t know who Angelo is.”

Charlie frowned and for a moment, it looked like Angelo actually swelled with a little bit of pride.

“You’re famous?” Charlie asked.

“He’s the only one like him,” Maverick said, his eyes almost gleaming with anticipation and excitement. “I’m going to have so much fun studying him.”

“But not before we study you a bit,” Trekon brought his hand forward to let Maverick know it was time to take care of business.

Judging by the facts, Angelo was disempowered and they were outnumbered and at the center of the rebel stronghold in the middle of nowhere with no other city but Crowley within a 3,000-mile radius, Charlie weighed his options and decided to stand still and open his eyes. Maybe, just maybe, the damn thing would work, they would find out he really was Charlie Richards, and it would buy him some level of appreciation that up until now, they didn't seem to have. He was just hoping the screen didn't show too much about the pathetic life he had been leading back in the 21st century.

Ten-year-old Charlie Richards of Topeka, Kansas sat in the sunroom of his childhood home. He was only vaguely aware he was in a memory, that he was currently Past Charlie. Present Charlie existed but he wasn't concerned with him at the moment. What he was concerned about was the project that lay before him.

His Nintendo (NES) sat with its top off as he carefully installed a Zotac motherboard and RAM card.

Charlie looked up to see a futuristic man he didn't know was named Trekon. If ten-year-old Charlie was surprised he didn't show it. He simply returned to his work. “It's a Nintendo,” Charlie said. “Everyone knows Nintendo. It's Nintendo.”

“Eh,” Trekon shrugged. “Some of the guys are into this retro stuff, not me. This doesn't prove you are who you are. Maybe you're into that stuff too.”

“Yeah, well do you have Mountain Dew?” Charlie took a big swig of Dew from his cup.

“What are you doing, anyway?”

“My Nintendo just plays Nintendo games,” Charlie said as he inserted the motherboard. “My Atari just plays Atari games. My Sega just plays Sega games. My Nintendo just plays Nintendo games. Inconceivable. But a Linux-based emulator should solve that problem.”

“So, you were always quite the fanster?”

Charlie looked at him blankly. “What's a fanster?”

“A boffing,” Trekon said to no response. “Geek?”

“Ah!” Charlie said in recognition. “If wanting to play Sonic the Hedgehog on my Nintendo is geeky, then I guess I am.”

Trekon blinked at that.

The air rippled and the scene changed. Charlie was now a mid-30's Charlie in a waiting room of a doctor's office with his sister, Tabitha, and her kids Alexa and Alex. Tabitha was on the phone yelling at some poor soul. Alexa punched away on her phone. And Alex sat alone on the other side of the room. Charlie crossed over and took a seat next to him.

Alex just stared down at the floor, worrying away on his bottom lip. Finally, he mumbled out, “Taborlin.”

“Yes, Taborlin. I knew that.”

Alex was quiet a long time.

Trekon entered the vision of the memory and took a seat across from them.

Alex fidgeted and at last went on. “I’m going to have him try Mount Doom.”

“Wow!” Charlie said with honest excitement. This memory was from a few months ago, at least in the 21st century. A few months before he met a woman at a bar who dragged him into a futuristic mess.

“Is grandpa going to be okay?” Alex asked softly without looking up.

Charlie didn’t answer. The air rippled, and the memory dissipated away, back to the future.

“Are you all right Charlie?” Angelo leaned over and lifted Charlie off the ground.

A groan escaped Charlie’s lips, his head was ringing with pain. He couldn’t believe, as he stared around the curious faces looking at him. It had just been a memory. It was so deep and so real and so visceral, like everything he had ever experienced was still there in his brain, and if he could just access it he could touch it and taste it and feel it. It wasn’t a memory that had slipped away and been lost in time, it was there, but in the normal scheme of his daily life, he had no access to it. But now it was raw and present and burning against his skin.

And he had just fainted in a room full of bad-ass rebel allegiants.

Shit.

They were all staring at him.

Trekon’s voice, curious and soothing, filled the cavern. “So, you really are Charlie Richards.”

Charlie’s eyes glanced at the screen. And blazing there for everybody in the cavern to see, more pictures of his mother, of his nephew, of his sister, of his friends, of the pub, smiles and laughter and moments captured in a million tiny fragments, pulled out of his brain and plastered in 3-D up on the wall.

Charlie had never felt so exposed in his entire life.

“Remarkable,” Maverick ran his fingers along the edge of his glasses rapidly, as if it would help him compute the reality that Charlie had stepped out of the pages of history and now stood in front of them. “And... And incredibly dangerous. I mean... You do realize don’t you–” His wide eyes magnified by the thick glasses moved from Charlie to Trekon.

“What the hell did you do to the hybrids?” Tallahassee stepped in front of Charlie and punched him in the gut with a resounding force that knocked the already sterile wind out of Charlie.

Angelo caught Charlie as he slumped forward. “Nothing,” Charlie gasped.

“Stop,” Trekon said.

“He’s a god damn liar,” Tallahassee pulled back his arm to blast Charlie again. “I was there. I saw them die. All of them.” He let fly his arm, but Gunk caught it, stopping Tallahassee from landing the punch that might have just knocked Charlie out.

“I was there, too,” Zeke growled.

Trekon’s voice came down from the podium. “We lost twenty good men and women today. Punching Charlie Richards isn’t going to solve anything.”

“The hybrids turned on us,” Tallahassee said to the room. “Exactly like we’ve feared all along they would or could.”

“All of them?” Charlie asked.

“No,” Gunk said. “It was the Deltas. The ones with the delta insignia on their necks.”

“The dumbasses,” muttered Tallahassee.

“They’re not dumbasses,” Charlie said.

“I’m going to kill them all,” Tallahassee said, spitting on the ground for effect.

“No,” Charlie pulled himself upright and glared at Tallahassee. “No, you’re not. These people are some of the finest around. They just haven’t been as lucky as you to be healthy and intact, so they’ve elongated their lives with hardware and software.”

“They are machines,” Tallahassee said. “I saw it in their eyes.”

Zeke nodded in agreement. “He’s right. Something came over them.”

“They are not machines. They’re people with software in them,” Charlie insisted. “They have feelings.”

“They didn’t have too many feelings when they were gunning us down.” Tallahassee stepped forward and glared into Charlie’s eyes. “What did you do to them?”

Charlie stepped back, focusing on Trekon. “I didn’t do anything. But someone did.”

“You’re trying to tell me it’s some coincidence Crowley drags your ass out of the dark ages and brings you here, and all of a sudden all the hybrids go from dying to killing machines?” Tallahassee asked.

“It does seem like the two incidences would be connected,” Trekon nodded.

“They are!” Charlie exclaimed as Tallahassee bristled. “But I didn’t write that code! They were updated with two batches of code. One that I did and one that someone else did. The code I did cured them of the disease. The other code turned them into controlled killers!”

“He’s lying!” Tallahassee yelled as Gunk restrained him.

“Silence,” Trekon’s voice was low but all eyes of the Lowsmiths in the room swung from Charlie to Trekon. “We can validate this truth, but so far he has not lied.”

“Damn convenient if you ask me,” Tallahassee said.

“They needed me to fix the hybrids,” Charlie said. “That’s all.”

“You realize there’s no way they would let you live,” Trekon said, and then, as if he could see into Charlie’s heart and understand his deepest desires, he added, “Or let you return to your own time.”

Charlie nodded. “Yeah. That’s why I was trying to get out of there when your people were killed.

I had no idea that was going to happen.”

Monfils glanced over his shoulder. Warren and Dustin were analyzing Delta movements. He had to figure out what was wrong with Jade’s tracking device. He had tried to switch it off remotely but it wouldn’t work. Something was jammed.

Damn their new code.

And where the hell was Blake? Monfils wondered. Okay, so his wife was a crazy Delta, that was no reason to just abandon the rest of them. Was he just going to let Warren get away with whatever he wanted to do? Was he going to lose Crowley? Monfils’ stomach buckled. How could this be happening? How could he have lost the Deltas? And to an asshole like Dustin, too.

Monfils slammed his fingers into the CodeSwarm spinning in front of him. He didn’t need much effort to find Jade’s tracking code, he had it memorized. Had had it memorized for years. At first, he’d pretended it was all about knowing where the prime player on his team was, but this idea only lasted so long. After hours, he would sit and look at her numbers just to see if she was at her parents or in her apartment. That’s when he realized he needed to try his luck with her. It hadn’t been hard to arrange some time alone, he’d invited her to the shooting range. She’d seemed to like that, especially because she could beat him hands down. From there he’d enticed her to grab a bite to eat and, a couple of weeks later, he’d managed to get her into his bed.

But it had always felt like she was doing him a favor.

Which, frankly, really pissed him off. He was Monfils. Any woman, hybrid or not, would be happy with his attentions. Jade, well, she was a bit different. She was dynamic and sexy and happy enough to be in his bed, but she definitely wasn’t falling for him in any meaningful way. They laughed together. Did target practice together. Had sex together. But then, well, she was done and she’d take off. They weren’t really together.

But he couldn’t get her out of his head. She made him crazy. To pressure her, though, or to let him know how obsessed he was with her, there’d be no chance.

When she’d called it off, whatever ‘it’ was, he’d gone insane. His staring at her numbers tracking her had felt like it was something a lot more stalkerish than it should be. Totally more stalkerish.

But now, at Command Central, he was going to turn that capability off completely and irrevocably. In fact, maybe that was just what he should have done a long time ago for his own sake.

He closed his eyes. All he needed to do was pull the code. His heart wrenched. He’d never know where she was again. Not unless she told him, which, based on the fact that she was currently insane, might never happen.

“Where the hell is Jade, anyway?” Warren asked Dustin.

Monfils’ eyes opened wide. With a quick glance towards them he turned resolutely to the CodeSwarm and ripped out the contents of Jade's tracker. He might not know where she was at any given time, but neither would those assholes.

Chapter 30

“Where’s the programmer?” Jade’s voice rang crisp and clear through the cathedral-like cavern as she stepped out of the tunnel and into the rocky red space where they were all standing. Her eyes were demonic red, and blood from the Pavilion was still splashed thick and heavy across her black uniform.

“Jade,” Angelo said, and you could almost hear the grin in his robotic voice. “It’s so lovely to see you.”

Jade raised her gun and shot the guard holding Charlie. Shot him dead.

“Jade, no!” Charlie shouted, jerking away and watching as the man hit the ground.

Lowsmiths dove in every direction behind pews as they took aim. Two ran to Trekon and ushered him out a back door. Maverick disappeared behind a glowing green protective field that suddenly appeared around them.

“I will have Charlie Richards.” Jade’s voice barely sounded her own. Her DC15s glowing blue and pointed directly at Charlie’s forehead. “You betrayed me.”

“No.” Angelo stepped between Charlie and Jade. Lowsmiths began firing at Jade. She jumped up, flipping in the air, aiming her gun precisely at each of the rebels in turn as she began pulling the trigger. But this wasn’t the first time they’d been fired at. Despite a couple of nicks from the HELs, most ducked low. They didn’t call them Lowsmiths for nothing.

“I would recommend you clear the room of humans,” Angelo directed his words at Maverick.

“Right, so you three can take off back to Crowley,” Maverick yelled, the green force field of green dimming just enough for him to see out.

“It’s more because she’s going to kill everyone, I think,” Charlie pointed out. Jade moved so quickly the naked human eye couldn’t track her.

But Angelo wasn’t human. He grabbed Charlie, whipped him back from her onslaught and plowed through Maverick’s protective energy shield.

Maverick whimpered. “She’s going to kill us all just to get him,” he murmured.

Charlie was pretty sure Maverick was right. Whatever was happening inside Jade’s programming was malicious and deadly. Unless they did something quick, no one was getting out of here alive. Anyone exposed in the room was subject to death.

“Free Angelo!” Charlie yelled at Maverick. “He’s the only one able to stop her. Don’t you see, he’s our only hope.”

“But- but then I won’t be able to study him,” Maverick said, crestfallen.

“You won’t be able to study him if you’re dead either,” Charlie said, ducking low as a laser bolt fired right over the top of his head. He could smell the singed hair as the blast erupted against the wall.

“But what if he turns on us?” Maverick asked.

“It can’t be any worse than the problem we’ve got right now,” Charlie insisted, huddling behind Angelo.

Jade was exchanging fire with the Lowsmiths, but quickly working her way through them and towards where Charlie and Angelo were hiding.

“I won’t turn on you,” Angelo said. “I am programmed to protect Charlie.”

“Really?” Charlie’s eyes opened wide.

“Why yes,” Angelo nodded. “My good lady Jade requested this of me. She said, and I quote, kill me if you have to, but don’t let anything happen to Charlie.”

“Wow.” Charlie let out a low whistle. “Do you think she likes me?”

Lasers blasted the walls of the chapel as Lowsmiths began to retreat.

“Perhaps this isn’t the most opportune time to discuss matters of the heart,” Angelo suggested.

Jade turned on them. The room was empty of all others.

“Angelo, you’re supposed to be loyal to me,” Jade hissed.

“Why indeed I am,” Angelo said. “Your primary directive is to obtain and protect Charlie Richards.”

“Not anymore it isn’t,” Jade said, her eyes glowing red as she fired towards the protective field, which blinked and stuttered against her onslaught.

“It really would be in everyone’s best interest if you allow me to disable Jade,” Angelo nodded in agreement. “I will submit to whatever testing you desire.”

Jade slammed shots towards the force field, which gave a dying flash before disappearing. Lasers shot glaring blue through the enclosed space.

“I can fix her!” Charlie screamed. “Let him stop her.”

Maverick’s hands shook as he reached into one of the many pockets of his lab coat. He brought out something that looked a lot like a ballpoint pen and aimed it directly at Angelo. He pressed a trigger on the side and a laser shot out and into the whirring center of the cuffs. They made a quick high pitch squeal and then the cuffs’ energy went black and they fell harmlessly to the floor.

“Thank you, my dear sir,” Angelo gave a swift nod to Maverick, before he sprang up and walked fearlessly towards Jade, his hand outstretched towards her.

“I am free Jade. Stand down,” he said. “I do not want to hurt you.”

Jade’s eyes blinked dark red and confused. “You can’t hurt me. Unless- unless they reprogrammed you.”

“My task is to protect Charlie Richards,” Angelo said. “And you, Jady of Crowley, are his biggest threat.”

Jade’s eyes narrowed. The lone Lowsmith still in the chapel ducked up from behind a pew. Jade spun and shot him in the knee. He fell screaming to the floor.

“Jade, stop,” Angelo said.

“They are the human rebels.” Jade’s voice was monotone. “My task is to eradicate them.”

“You are confused,” Angelo said.

Jade frowned at him and turned her guns on Angelo. “They have reprogrammed you,” she said.

“I don’t want to hurt you,” Angelo said, the plates of his arms slowly rising and guns coming out of his biceps.

“Don’t you dare,” Jade said and she fired directly into the heart of Angelo.

Angelo was the world’s deadliest robot. He could not return fire without considerable damage to Jade. He ducked and rolled to the side, working closer to try to engage her in hand-to-hand combat. Suddenly, Jade realized the predicament she was in. Being the lone warrior never concerned her. If it was just her against humans or even her against a hybrid or a few bots, she would gladly take the fight on her own. But a battle against Angelo? It was unfathomable.

Still, she had to do it.

“I can fix you,” she said, but she wasn’t stupid.

She moved behind the cover of a pew as she fired at the weakest point of Angelo’s metal, the joints. Jade was trying to destroy the wires connecting his legs to the rest of his body. The filaments that kept him standing. Her aim was almost on point. Almost, but not quite. It only succeeded in creating a black scar against his calf.

“I am not the one who needs fixing, Jade,” Angelo said, his movements bringing him directly in front of her. He stood in the open, his guns trained directly on her, waiting for the moment when she would rise and take another shot at him.

The only question remaining was who was the better shot?

Jade or Angelo?

It happened quickly. So quickly, the two humans in the room almost didn’t see it.

Jade flicked her wrist above her hiding space and took a shot at Angelo before ducking down.

Angelo fired also, slamming the pew and the wall behind Jade.

But only one hit was apparent.

Jade’s.

Angelo fell to the ground, the wires in his legs severed. Charlie gasped as the metal clanging of Angelo’s falling body echoed on the cavern walls.

“No.” Charlie’s voice caught in his throat as he waited for Jade to rise from behind the pew like a vengeful demon to kill him.

But nothing happened.

The room sat in silence until a single voice rose from the ground to fill the chamber.

“She’s a damn fine shot, don’t you think, Charlie?”

A raspy gasp came out of Charlie’s mouth. “Angelo?” He wanted to run to the bot and embrace him, but didn’t dare move.

“She is stunned,” Angelo’s voice carried like a victory cry, at least, that’s how Charlie heard it. He rushed forward.

“But is she okay?” he asked.

“Yes.” Angelo said. “You have approximately ninety seconds to secure her.”

“Give me something!” Charlie yelled.

Maverick produced another set of cuffs as he and Charlie hastened to Jade’s side.

“Will they hurt her?” Charlie asked as he turned Jade’s limp body over and pulled her wrists carefully together. Her skin was so soft. How could she be so dangerous?

“These are H-Con cuffs,” Maverick explained. They work specifically for hybrids providing a quantity of the restraining capabilities they need, as well as short-circuiting some level of their programming.”

Some call must have gone up to the Lowsmiths because they flooded the room and two grabbed Jade, placing her on a floating plate rather roughly; at least, that’s how Charlie saw it.

“The cuffs will help her sleep,” Maverick said.

Charlie stroked her forehead and adjusted her hands so she at least looked comfortable.

Chapter 31

The city was bursting with wonderful, sweet, melodic chaos. Warren Relic, soon to be most powerful man in Crowley (he would decide a bit later what he was going to rename the city) stared out the main control room's vast windows; over oceans of armies, both hybrid and bot, who listened to his every command. The outskirts of town, where Trenchtown once bred human disease, was now just smoke and ashes.

He smiled. His work was good.

Standing beside Warren was his ProtectoBot, Genesis II, programmed to be emotionless. Had he been programmed differently, he would have felt quite proud of his owner. Warren was sure of that.

"Approaching" Genesis II said in a low mechanical voice.

It was Dustin, impeccably dressed like the Warren-in-training he was.

Warren nodded at the slick CTO. "Things are coming along nicely." His words were drenched in smugness, like an artist prideful in their craft.

"Yes, it is, sir." Dustin straightened his suit, which didn't actually need any more straightening. "I mean, if civil war could be considered a nice-"

"There is nothing civil about the rebels," Warren's words cut him off as he stood silhouetted against the giant Death Star-esque windows.

"I still don't understand though, this is the city of Crowley. It was founded by Crowley. Wouldn't he be able to stop any sort of takeover-"

"Blake Crowley has a sick wife to take care of," Warren interrupted. "One who is probably trying to kill him right now." Warren gave a textbook movie villain laugh. Not really, it wasn't as loud and as head throwing back as that, but it did the trick.

Dustin eyed the screens. Around the city, hybrids lurked looking for human prey. This was the code he had installed in hybrids everywhere, and it was vicious. His hands were figuratively coated in blood. There was a twinge of regret, but it was small and remote. He was a Gamma hybrid, protected from the corruption he'd installed in the Deltas. He was safe, and just one glance at Warren's nice suit and his own nice suit... well, the regret faded quickly. He was a hybrid who would ultimately live hundreds of years. He was also about a hair away from being the second most powerful man in Crowley, probably in the top one hundred worldwide.

“Why don’t we just...take care of him now.” Dustin eyes flicked to the giant black bot lurking next to Warren. “Genesis could rip Blake into forty-eight pieces without breaking a drop of sweat.”

Warren was aghast. “This is a civil, corporate takeover, Dustin! Where are your manners?” Warren’s finger tapped his temple and his eyes glossed over with an incoming message.

“I’ve been called to the principal’s office,” he smirked when the message completed. “Time to finish what I’ve started.” Without another word, Warren, with Gemini II flanking him, swept by Dustin and headed to Blake’s office.

What the hell was this made of?
“Bonded quartz titanium,” Angelo’s voice carried loudly in the long corridor. Charlie let his fingers drop off the wall.

“What is that?” He asked.

“The strongest material in the known world, at least a hundred years ago it was, before opalum,” Angelo said.

“It’s still pretty damn good,” Zeke said. “If anything happens to this mountain, nothing’s going to happen to this tunnel. It will still be standing when the mountain comes down. As well as all of the rooms inside. It’s indestructible.”

“Seriously?” Charlie asked. “Indestructible? So, setting a bomb off in here wouldn’t make a scratch?”

“Hell yeah,” Zeke crooned.

“And the rebels built this?” Charlie said as they continued down the corridor.

“Of course not. This was DogStar 368,” Zeke said, as if it was something everybody should know.

“21st century over here,” Charlie said, pointing at himself. “If there is something I’m supposed to know about, I don’t. I’m missing about three-hundred years of history that every second grader around here has.”

The Lowsmiths guiding Jade’s gurney turned left. Angelo, Zeke and Charlie followed, though Charlie worried that if he had to find his way out of here it was going to be a bit tricky. The tunnels seemed endless.

“DogStar 368 was the project name for the Mars colony.”

“We have people living on Mars?” Charlie asked. “I mean, you know, I kinda figured that was going to happen soon, even back in my time, but it’s still kinda weird to hear it. You know, I went to the Kennedy Space Center once and they were talking about how they were planning a mission to Mars, but it was still so unrealistic. Wait, when did we make it to Mars? How many people live there? How big is the settlement?”

The idea was fascinating. He had leapt into the future and suddenly it was an exciting place full of questions that could be answered.

“The first mission to land on Mars launched in 2037,” Maverick chimed in as they turned down yet another corridor. “They went up intermittently for about fifty years, different humans trying to build a colony, but then the Great Peace came, and the refinement of the Earth, and it didn’t seem like we really needed to go anywhere else.”

“How long did it last?” Charlie asked. He never thought peace would reign anywhere on Earth.

“About a hundred and fifty years,” Zeke hooted. “Then they realized there were too many people on the damn planet, so they started an initiative to return to Mars and DogStar 368 started.”

Charlie reached out and touched the slick surface of the glass. “This has been here how long?”

“One hundred and nineteen years, three months and sixteen days,” Angelo said.

“How big is the Mars colony now?” Charlie asked.

“It doesn’t exist,” Zeke said.

“They built the bunker and people lived down here,” Maverick said. “They were supposed to live here for five years to show it was possible. It took twenty years to build and some people had just started living down here for like a year or so when the Plextor struck.”

“Plextor?” asked Charlie.

“The pox. The plague,” Zeke muttered.

“There was no more overpopulation of Earth,” Maverick shrugged. “The Great Depopulation had begun. Between Alaska and Mexico City on this side of the Rockies, there’s only about two million people.”

Charlie glanced over his shoulder for a moment. “And by people, do you mean humans of any kind? The hybrids also?”

“He means any biological being of Homo Sapien descent,” Maverick said.

“I am a bot, I do not count,” Angelo added. “But humans with mechanical and software implants, they think on their own. We have logic, we can have emotional programs running inside of us to make us appear very human, but we are not biologically functioning beings. Of those there are another two million.”

The numbers were hard for Charlie to fully fathom. Two million left in the entire region, in the places where a single city alone used to have twenty million people.

“So, this area was vacated and left abandoned when the rebels moved in?” He asked.

“Precisely,” Angelo said.

“Wouldn’t Blake or Warren know about this place?” Charlie asked.

“Crowley is very strong, inside of Crowley,” Angelo said. “They have great defenses, but they are not so powerful outside the walls. And they do not know exactly where to look, so if they send out a group of seekers they have to go many different directions to try to find this.”

The elevator seemed to go down forever in endless shifts of dark and light. For a moment Charlie was a bit concerned. It seemed high-quality enough that it wasn't going to break, but what if it did and they were trapped down here in the middle of this rocky outpost? Then again, with every step he was getting further away from home, his friends, his real life.

He tried not to think about it. The task right now was to fix Jade. If he could fix Jade, she would help him get back to the DarkM'attr machine. She would help him go back in time, he was sure. He glanced over at her lying there on the floating slab, her black hair fanning against the board, her chest slowly rising and falling. The smooth lines of her face were clear and at peace, a look you'd rarely see on her face during her waking hours. He wondered what she must've been like before she became a hybrid. Before she became so desperate for a cure for her parents. When she was just Jade, the human. He knew it was totally crazy, but he imagined what it would be like to take her out on a date. Like a normal date. A date without the black outfit. Maybe she'd wear a sundress. They'd walking along a boulevard and...

But she wasn't a sundress kind of girl. He needed to not be thinking about white picket fences. She was never going to be a floral print, spaghetti strap girl. Still, he felt part of him could see a little bit of that in her.

Even if she couldn't see it herself.

He thought about how she had been at her parents' house. How sweet and generous and how lovingly she'd served the tea. And now she was this. A vassal to Blake in order to provide for her parents' future, for the opportunity for them to become hybrids. A sharp pain worked its way through his body. What was she going to do when she found out her parents were dead? Or possibly dead, he corrected himself. He didn't know for sure, but it didn't look like there were going to be any other options, not from the footage he'd seen. It didn't look like anyone in the entire quadrant could survive. Charlie frowned. He could fix Jade's code, but if her parents were dead... there was no way he was going to be able to fix her heart. There was a good chance she would just go dark for good.

The elevator doors opened to a long square tunnel. Orange sconces lit the hallway for as far as Charlie could see.

Although the chapel of the rebel base had been fairly rudimentary, essentially just a cave carved out of the red mountain, it was clear the main complex of the Mars project was sophisticated. Passages led in every direction and as they moved through the polished, reflective and impenetrable tunnels, Charlie got glimpses of a running track, swimming pool, a theatre, and a dining hall. All the necessary requirements for healthy, safe underground living.

And then they came to Maverick's lab.

"This is where you make your inventions?" Charlie asked, nodding at the various devices and strange tools that filled the lab.

"Welcome to my palace," Maverick said, waving his hand with to the room where hologram charts and graphs floated in the air, shelves were lined with gadgets, and in one corner was a clear slab where the Lowsmiths brought Jade.

“Place her over there,” Maverick said, motioned to what Charlie was starting to realize was a triage unit of sorts.

“She needs new code,” Charlie said.

“We’ve had hybrids here before,” Maverick said.

Charlie looked around suspiciously, trying to determine exactly what happened to the hybrids who had been brought into the rebel unit.

“Of course, they’re not here anymore,” Maverick said with a slight chuckle.

“Did you experiment on them?” Charlie asked, his stomach tightening a bit as bile rose in his throat.

“We were doing investigative analysis and research on the enemy,” Maverick said.

“So, you were just hooking them up and looking at how they worked?” Charlie asked.

“That’s a very crude way to describe an autopsy,” Maverick said. “These hybrids were dead already.”

Maverick’s words did nothing to relax the turmoil in Charlie’s stomach. But he realized now it was not the time to deal with it. Something had to be done for Jade before she woke up again.

“How did you do it?” Charlie asked. “How did you get into the hybrid code?”

Maverick spun the table around and waved his hand over a small sphere that projected a fully lit three-dimensional hologram. He blinked three times at it and a beam came out to scan his retina. A scanner descended from the ceiling and sent out a wide fan-like beam of light as it moved from Jade’s head, down to her feet and back again. A 3-D image of Jade began to appear in the air. It built, layer upon layer, until it had created a scanned image of every part of Jade’s body. From the hard bones of her spine and skull through to the soft tissue of her lungs and guts. Shining in silver were the bionic additions.

“The colors identify the different type of flesh, bone, soft tissue, or bionic factors, which comprise the hybrid,” Maverick said.

“She has fake organs,” he said.

“She is a masterpiece.” Maverick agreed. His fingers reached out towards the hologram turning it over to look at all sides of Jade. “No expense has been spared on her. Look at that liver.”

Charlie couldn’t quite see the liver from where he was standing, but he ducked underneath the 3-D image and he could see a part of it. He looked back over his shoulder at the real Jade. It was so strange to see her there in real life and here in 3-D, with all of her guts on display. “That’s not a real liver?” he asked.

“No, it’s synthetic material. Do you know how expensive a synthetic liver is? They make it out of a combination of nanobots and flesh, the perfect meld. And it'll last forever, with nanobots able to replenish dying cells. It's incredible. We are long past the age of just replacing an arm or a leg. To replace her spine, they would've replaced her entire nervous system. She probably doesn't feel any pain or at least, she can probably control it at the touch of a button, so to speak."

"Couldn't they have kept most of her nervous system?" Charlie asked.

"Potentially," Maverick said. "They would've taken her spinal column. There will be a synthetic nervous system running through the center of this and then they would've attached it to her actual nervous system if there was no damage. But as you can see here, along her arms, that is only the synthetic nervous system connected to her spine. Since she already has the implant of the spine the minute one of her legs or arms gives out, she'll be able to have those parts replaced and connected to the spine very quickly. It's quite genius."

"So, ultimately," Charlie said as the reality started to dawn on him, "Jade could be completely made of synthetic material?"

"Yes," Maverick said. "Because you see," his fingers curled up the length of the hologram's spine to the base of her skull. "This one, Jade," he said catching Charlie's eye, "she is 80% hybrid. You see this little part here?"

He pointed to a small silver circle at the base of her skull. "Her cerebellum has been replaced," he said. "So software controls her major bodily functions."

"She is like a bot?" Charlie asked.

"Well, this is the problem with hybrids," Maverick said, his hand resting on his chin as he inspected the rest of the hologram. "Until you look at it this way, you don't really know what you're dealing with. Humans are much simpler. You look in the eye and you can start to figure out our behavior and how we work. You may not know exactly what motivates us, you know, your childhood programming and all, but you don't have to wonder what part of us is human and if our brain is being run by software or by our own logic and feelings."

Charlie looked down and shook his head.

"How do I access her software?" Charlie asked, his mouth dry. Even though he had gotten a little bit used to the bots and the programming, the thought that Jade was run by software alone was horrifying. What made her any different than the big red giant in the corner, who was standing by ready to subdue her if she woke up?

"Do you know what you're doing?" Maverick asked.

Charlie frowned. He didn't dare tell the complete truth. "Sure," he lied. It was close enough. "The code that's controlling her is wrapped up in some code I wrote."

"Ok," Maverick bowed his head. "In that case, you need to start here." He pointed to the silver sphere at the base of her skull. "I can give you access."

Maverick turned to a table and pressed a series of levers, he popped open a drawer holding a set of carefully filed needles of varying lengths. Charlie hated needles but somehow, these didn't look like the kind to draw blood. These were thinner. They were like the delicate stitching needles his mother used. Very fine, very thin, and very long. Maverick withdrew one needle. He placed it inside a small black disk and then he attached a thin cable to the other side of it. He walked over to Jade, lifted her black hair, and placed the needle above her neck. Clearly it was aimed at a lower cortex.

“Shouldn’t you swab her or get some gloves or something?” Charlie asked as Maverick brushed his fingers against Jade’s neck.

“Why?” Maverick asked.

“Well you know, like germs and things?” Charlie shrugged.

“Hybrids don’t host harmful bacteria or viruses,” Maverick said. “Especially not a hybrid of this status. Their antibodies and immune system are constantly regenerated through what is pumping into their body. They can’t get sick and they can’t carry dangerous germs. Everything is immediately expelled. It’s one of the things which makes being a hybrid so fascinating. Not only do they live very, very, very, very long time, but you are never sick.”

Charlie thought about the colds, the flus, the stomach aches. All the illness he had experienced at any point in his entire life. He thought what a miracle it would be if he never had to experience that again. Being a hybrid might not be so bad after all. Except the vulnerability of running on software, well, that was much more dangerous. If someone knew where to look, if someone knew where to get into you, they could control everything you did. Charlie knew the key question wasn’t just “how do you fix the problem now,” the key question was “how do you stop it from ever happening again?”

Blake sat in his office and fiddled with his reissued iPod. It was very frustrating. This was no 21st century iPod, this was a 24th century reissued throwback, but the Apple Classics (an offshoot company of Apple Inc.) decided to be authentic and keep the same capabilities. He could listen to any song with a thought through his cochlear chip, but he liked to listen to his music through a speaker. Music in one's head, while the rage of the time, was convenient, but Blake didn't like voices in his head. That's what crazy people had. And Blake didn't want to be crazy, he wanted to relax. He needed relaxing right now.

It was understandable.

His business's main product, hybrid humans, was having a bad day. The fear of robots turning on humans was a consistent dread for hundreds of years. Great lengths, laws and regulations had been set to stop this happening. He knew it well, he regulated against many such laws to build his empire. The bribes he had to pay to lawmakers back East in order to build his business and city were mind boggling.

Now, his hybrids were killing people. Blake was an expert at spinning the truth. Expert wasn't strong enough, not by half. He had twisted his previous corporate takeovers, his (some would say illegal) monopoly on wireless power, his bot gentrification of certain regions. Blake had sold it all to the public with pizzazz.

But killer hybrids? Tough spin.

His best chance would be to ensure they were only killing rebels until they fixed the problem. But hybrids weren't his only problem. Robin was sick again.

A hologram of a conservatively dressed male assistant appeared in the corner of the room. "Sir, Warren Relic to see you."

Blake nodded and the door hissed open. Warren strolled in. Gemini II took up station by the door with Blake's personal ProtectoBots. None of them could come any closer. Blake had a BotBorder installed in his office. He was grateful for that today. Some days it was harder to read Warren than others. He was as ruthless as the day was long. Blake preferred that on his side, but he wondered how much Warren really was on his side. Even though Warren had never failed him, Blake was not one to trust anyone.

“Luvian.” Warren’s words were slow and eloquent, just like Luvian liquor. A glass popped up in front of Warren. He took a slow and eloquent drink. Everything was going so eloquently.

“What’s the latest?” Blake was not going slow and eloquent, he wanted answers now.

“We can now say with a hundred percent certainty it was something Charlie Richards did to the code.”

Blake nodded, expecting this. Why did he ever agree to such an insane plan? He had been desperate, and Blake didn’t like being desperate. Now it was worse. This was why bad plans happened.

“What’s more,” Warren continued, “We think he has joined the Lowsmiths.”

“What?” Blake asked taken aback. “Why would he do that? Did you see the nice Penthouse we gave him? And that suit?”

“I know, I know.” Warren leaned back in his chair. He was enjoying this immensely. “You are nothing, if not giving. And they just want to take.” Blake wasn’t the only one who could spin a situation.

Blake sat back in his chair with a huff. What a mess. He stood and crossed to the far wall, touching it so it went transparent. Small fires glowed in the dusk all around the city of Crowley. His and Robin’s city.

Warren could tell Blake was heading down to the pits of despair and he seized the opportunity. “Blake, my friend, we will fix this. I personally will see it is fixed. This isn’t like before. We know where the problem is now and we don’t have to rely on some old technology to fix it.”

“Then why hasn’t it been fixed?” Blake’s finger streaked down the window.

“It’s a bit more complicated, Blake, but we will. I know the empire you built and I will not, under any circumstances, see it destroyed.” That was a true statement, Warren thought, but keeping the empire meant getting rid of Blake. “I will handle this. I know you have a lot on your mind.”

Blake swung around. “What, pray tell, are you suggesting?”

“Nothing. Whatever you need. I just hate to see this stress weighing on you. Of course, every decision is yours to make, I’m just suggesting you spend time with your wife.”

“What do you know about my wife? You know she’s a Delta. She’s infected like the rest of them!”

“Which we will fix by the end of tomorrow. And when we do, you should enjoy every second with her you can.”

Blake eyed Warren a long time, sizing him up. Finally, he turned back to stare out the window. His wife was sick again, and just after it looked like everything would be better. Blake had made a staggering amount of money in his life, and every dime went into this city. Every second he was in this city. He spent a fortune making sure his wife would live forever. That’s all he wanted.

And all that was compromised.

Blake needed a solution. He needed the code fixed and his wife better. No matter what it took.

And right now, he was too tired and emotionally exhausted to deal with it. He turned from the fires of Crowley and nodded Warren to the door. “Fix the problem.”

Warren nodded and left the room, leaving half of his Luvian on the desk.

Blake turned and looked at Crowley again. His and Robin’s city. He didn’t want to leave this city. He just wanted Robin to be Robin again. He just wanted Robin to be whole.

Charlie's hair lay in damp curls around the edges of his forehead. The air conditioning in the room still buzzed with the lightest frequency of chill air being pumped in, but it didn't do anything for the heat that ran, pulsating and oppressive, through Charlie's body. He'd been standing at the hologram of Jade for ten hours as he fought through the code and back to the cerebellum.

It wasn't hard to find the wrapper text with Dustin's code in it. With a series of quick blinks and twitches he was able to pull the bug out and get rid of it. In fact, it was really quite a ridiculous solution Dustin had come up with. Dustin's code had succeeded, but it had been shoved in there as if no one would ever try to get it out again. What a cocky son of a bitch.

But perhaps nobody else could. But Charlie had found a way using Maverick's tool to access at least one hybrid. It had only taken him an hour to clean up the code and delete the corruption. He had spent the last nine hours anxiously trying to figure out what he could do to the hybrid code so this would never happen again. How do you make code inaccessible and indestructible? How do you lock it up and how could he test his theory before he made it live in Jade?

Unfortunately, there was no way to do it. He had asked them to bring a pen and paper, but it was akin to asking a 21st century person for chalk and tablet. The truth is, Charlie still worked best on paper and pen. Maverick had brought over a hologram tablet, which Charlie could draw on with his finger. Charlie knew it would have to do. So, he had spent much of his time doodling in the air and processing every idea he could think of that would seal away Jade's code. He knew if he built a wall, eventually someone would go in and find it and be able to dismantle it, brick by brick.

He rubbed his hands against his weary eyes.

"You haven't got much longer," Angelo said. "The sedative we gave her will wear off soon, and we can't give her another. Hybrids can't be sedated more than eleven hours. It affects their programming and the synthetic organs."

Charlie stared up at the ceiling, sweat dripping from his forehead.

"This place feels like an Egyptian tomb," he grumbled. "Why the hell would anyone want to go to Mars just to live in a place like this?"

"Well, I suppose it's better than dying," Angelo said.

Charlie looked around. Everybody was long gone, it was just the two of them and Jade's body, strapped down and waiting for the moment she woke up.

Over the last few hours Charlie had paced around the room trying to figure out what to do. Now as he sat there staring at the ceiling, he realized it was hopeless. There was no way he was going to figure out a solution to protect Jade. He might be able to fix her for now, but the minute they did another update on her system, she could go right back to the killing machine she was when she showed up here.

“Have you fixed the hybrid?” Maverick chirped as the sliding glass doors opened and he walked into the room.

“Watch out!” Angelo called.

Charlie’s head whipped around just in time to see Maverick stumble against the tray Charlie had left standing near the doorway during one of his pacing sessions. Maverick tumbled to the ground, rolling on his pronounced belly until he came to a standstill on his back.

“Are you trying to booby-trap the place?” Maverick asked.

Angelo was there in a second to help Maverick stand up and move the cart out of the way. Charlie stared at them for a moment, but he wasn’t seeing them at all.

Traps...

“What do you know about the ancient Egyptians?” he asked Angelo, his eyes suddenly alive with excitement.

“What is commonly referred to as the ancient Egyptian era began in 4000 or 6000 BC—”

“The most famous tombs of the ancient Egyptians reside in the Valley of the Kings in Luxor, Egypt,” Angelo said.

Charlie spun his finger in the air as if fast-forwarding Angelo’s speech. “Booby traps,” he said. “Booby traps! Look at this place. All it needs is booby traps to be perfectly impenetrable. Right now, it seems impenetrable, but the moment somebody gets in they are free to access the entire place because there are no booby traps.”

Maverick was rubbing his lower back. “I just fell from a booby-trap.”

“This place needs booby-traps,” Charlie said, “And so do the hybrids.”

“Please explain,” Angelo said.

“Well, in ancient Egypt, if you made it in the door there would be something like a pit with painted stars overhead, so you get distracted by the stars and you’d look up and then fall into the pit. It was by far the most common booby trap, but there were others like double thick walls, false entryways, doors sliding down behind you. Tons of them. We cannot stop the hybrids from having code inside them, it’s what keeps them alive. We can’t remove Jade’s cerebellum, but we have to find a way so nobody who gets in there can interfere with who she really is. So, if we write some reroute code that traps alien code in a windowless room and didn’t allow it in, the code would be caught in an endless loop like a booby trap dropping you in a bottomless pit with no way out.”

“So, you can fix the code and then leave booby traps for anyone who tries to get in with malicious code after you?” Maverick asked.

“I’m going to write the chamber at the front of the hybrid code,” and even as Charlie spoke he scribbled in the air.

“Anybody who enters this space will be triggered into this maze,” Charlie said. “Only it’s a complete loop and there’s no way around it, because nobody in this time knows MS-DOS. And it is so old and so clunky that even if they could see behind it, they won’t be able to see the pattern.”

It was done just like that, without even much more thinking. Charlie reached into his childhood and pulled out a code nobody in 2325 knew. He built a hallway and a booby trap that would keep them trapped there forever, never allowing them access to Jade’s code.

“What happens though when she needs a software update?” Angelo asked. “in one, five, ten years, maybe everyone will need an updated technology to survive.”

Charlie shook his head. “Not this technology. She won’t be able to get a software update,” Charlie said. “But nobody will be able to control her ever again.”

Maverick nodded approvingly. “She will die like the rest of us. Only slightly different. Her hardware will get older, her software will become outdated, and slowly some of her organs will run down. It’ll be like she’s human again.”

“And she won’t be able to get any more synthetic organs. If they’re meant to be run from the cerebellum, it won’t be possible anymore.”

“Never?” Angelo said, tilting his head to the side as he computed. “I’m not quite sure how she’s going to absorb that piece of information.

Charlie shook his head. “The world inside the code is set to grow itself in an endless cycle. There will be an endless series of doors and trolls and pointlessly repetitive quests and even I won’t be able to find my way out of the world inside Jade’s brain.

Chapter 35

Blake looked through the glass pane at Robin. What the hell was wrong with her? What had been done to make this happen? He had his suspicions and Warren was at the top of the list. Who else would have access to the CompuVerse that could make this possible? A ravenous mental disease to infect all Deltas. Only Warren. Well, he supposed Dustin had that capability, too, but that sniveling idiot didn't have two brain cells to rub together. Not the kind of brain cells you needed to pull something like this off.

Malicious. Selfish. Powerful.

The kind of brain cells that, well... Blake had.

That's why he needed Robin. Without her, he was just a narcissistic megalomaniac. He needed her to keep him humble, well, as humble as he could ever be.

Blake pressed his hand against the glass. He'd hadn't dared move Robin out of her room, but he'd removed the wall. He needed to see her, but he couldn't bear to have her see him. The way she looked at him, like she wanted to kill him. It was impossible to fathom.

The woman who had always loved him, always supported him, always guided him...she wasn't dying anymore, but she was gone. Her brain was gone and she was a killer.

Blake bowed his head. In the deepest briefest part of himself a horrifying, quiet thought was emerging... Maybe it was better for Robin if she was dead.

Charlie was sleeping when Jade woke up. Right after he finished the self-expanding DOS world that would act as the booby trap inside Jade's code, he had fallen asleep right in the chair. Angelo had stayed to watch over Charlie and Jade as they both rested and he watch with curiosity and excitement, or as much excitement as a bot could have, as Jade woke up. He watched her eyes open and look around the lab.

"Angelo," Jade said. "Angelo, why am I tied down?"

It was all Angelo needed to hear to know Jade was fine. He reached over and with the simple movement of his fingers he freed the bonds holding her against the table. She sat up rubbing her wrists.

“I feel... I feel strange,” she said. She sat there staring at her hands for a moment, turning them over. She rubbed her neck where the needle had been. She looked up at Angelo.

“I – I killed people,” she said. “Humans. Rebels... What happened?” Her voice choked up and her throat was raspy. Angelo could see delicate puddles of water forming in her eyes

“It’s not your fault, Jade,” he said, reaching out and carefully moving a strand of loose hair behind her ear.

“I was standing on the stage. They brought rebels in and we were going to welcome them into the city. They were going to become part of Crowley, but suddenly it was a bloodbath.” She stared in confusion at her hands and back at Angelo. “Even Robin was a part of it.”

“Warren changed the code,” Angelo said. “He and Dustin created code that allowed him to control you.”

Jade’s eyes slid over to where Charlie was snoring slightly in the chair. “Charlie fixed it?” she asked.

“He did more than fix it,” Angelo said. “He made it so it can never happen again.”

Jade smiled a warm and lovely smile as she stood and moved over to Charlie. He was slowly waking up in the chair listening to Angelo and Jade talk.

“Well, I don’t know what he did to the code,” Jade said, “But I feel so much better. I feel... Like there’s something more inside me now. Whatever was there before felt like a black circle but now there’s something pure and warm in there.”

“There is something you should know,” Angelo said.

“What?” Jade asked, turning to a giant red robot.

“Your code can never be updated again,” Charlie said, sitting up.

“Never updated?” Jade asked.

“I’m sorry, don’t be mad,” Charlie said. “But I had to protect you. All the hybrids are out running around under the control of Warren. If I didn’t find a way to clear out the whole system, it doesn’t really matter. Anybody could go in and change whatever they wanted.”

“And the problem would keep happening and who knows what would become of you.”

“I’ll die?” Jade asked.

Charlie nodded. “I’m sorry, Jade. It was the only way to protect you.”

Jade stared down at her hands. “My parents went through so much to save me.”

“You are still saved. You will just live a normal life span. Sort of. I think.” Charlie said. “I didn’t know what else to do, Jade. I needed to make sure that never happened again.”

Jade took a deep breath. “It’s okay.” And suddenly, a huge smile burst across her face, like it was a ridiculously warm summer day and she was the sun, shining down on everybody. Charlie’s heart filled with warmth. But then...

“You do realize what it means, right?” he said.

“Yes,” she said. “They cannot upgrade me. I will degrade and die.” And she looked so happy about this piece of information, Charlie was a bit surprised.

“It doesn’t bother you?” he asked.

“No,” she said. “I never wanted to live forever, I just wanted to live long enough.”

She pulled Charlie up into a standing position.

“That’s my girl,” Angelo said.

The hall was silent as Charlie, Jade and Angelo were escorted into the room, everyone stared at the hybrid, the bot and the man from the past. Charlie looked around at the people in the chapel. There were a lot less rebels than he would’ve thought, but maybe they were out attacking Crowley or something. They walked up to the front of the room where Trekon stood.

“So, this is Jade of Crowley,” he said looking at her less warmly than usual.

“Thank you for saving me,” she said. “I do not deserve it.”

“I agree,” Trekon said. “But I did not save you. He did.” His long thin finger pointed towards Charlie.

Charlie looked down at his feet. He didn’t need any recognition for fixing the code that had turned Jade into a killer. He was just happy it was over.

“I would like to return to Crowley,” Jade said. “I will get Charlie into the central control unit so he can fix the hybrid code.”

“And the shot from your gun started it. When you executed Frank.”

“She wasn’t herself!” Charlie exclaimed.

“That’s the problem with hybrids,” Tallahassee growled. “You never know who they are.”

Trekon held up his hand to Tallahassee. “Reparations may be made.”

“Nothing is going to bring back Frank,” Tallahassee muttered.

“The city still burns and humans still die.” Trekon’s hand swept through the air highlighting the screens lining one end of the cavern well. Crowley was ablaze.

Jade’s eyes narrowed as she looked from screen to screen to screen. Now that Charlie knew exactly which parts of her were human and which parts were machine, he kept a close look on her left eye. He could see it was lens scanning the screens and reading information that there was no way he was going to be able to see.

“Quadrant two,” she barely breathed the words out, but Charlie could tell by the movement of her lips what she was saying. The quadrant she grew up in. Trenchtown. He sucked his breath in through his teeth and fought the urge to reach out and take her hand. The last thing in the world one would want to do was take Jade of Crowley by surprise with a sweet gesture. But he knew exactly what she was seeing: the decimation of the town she grew up in.

Her gaze flew to Charlie. “My parents?” she asked.

“We don’t know,” he said.

She turned on her heel and strode towards the door. Two Lowsmiths stepped in front of her. Jade stopped in her tracks, hands moving to her holsters, but they were empty.

“We can’t let you return to the city,” Trekon said.

“Am I a prisoner?” Jade asked.

Charlie frowned.

“We do not know whose side you are on,” Trekon said. “I think this is an understandable situation. If we were to let you go back to the city, you may simply become a killing machine again, attacking our people.”

“Enough,” Charlie said, stepping forward. He looked around the room. “You’re standing here with the deadliest bot and hybrid in all of Crowley. Neither one is doing anything.”

“She would have just shot our guards if she had her guns on her,” Tallahassee said.

“I wouldn’t have,” said Jade. “But I need to get in there. I will help the Lowsmiths, but I must go to Crowley. My parents are there and they are human.”

Chapter 36

The buzzer startled Blake. He pressed his forehead against the glass. No one was allowed to ring the buzzer to his private apartment. It was completely not allowed. If he ignored it they would go away. They would have to or else his ProtectoBots would make it go away.

Come to think of it, where were his ProtectoBots?

Blake lifted his head and looked curiously over his shoulder as the buzzer rang again, sending a grating shrill down his spine. He pressed his finger to his temple, activating his x-ray eye.

Monfils hit the buzzer. He hit it again and again and again.

It was totally against protocol, but he needed help and he needed help from the top of the food chain. Fortunately, he was close enough to the top, he'd been able to gain access to Blake's private suite.

"There's something wrong with the Deltas," Monfils called through the door. "They need your help, Blake."

Monfils was one of the few in all of Crowley who could call Blake by his first name. They'd been through some things together, back when Monfils was young. When his mother, Blake's sister, was dying. The fact that Blake was Monfils' uncle was something no one in Crowley knew. Both of them had wanted it that way. Monfils had wanted to work his way up and Blake hadn't wanted to show favoritism. But now, well, it was time for Monfils to use his relationship to help Jade. And, if he understood the situation correctly, his Aunt Robin, too. She was a Delta. Whatever was going on in Blake's penthouse couldn't be good.

"Blake!" he shouted, as the door slid open and Blake stood there, frowning.

"Monfils," he said quietly.

"It's Warren," Monfils said. "He's changed the code in the Deltas."

But even as Monfils said the words, he realized it was too late. The look on Blake's face was so discouraged, so down, he wasn't sure he had the strength to bring him up.

"I know." Blake nodded stepping back and motioning towards the window, which overlooked Robin's sick bed.

"We have to do something," Monfils said as he stepped towards the window.

Blake cringed. "Even if we can find a solution," he muttered. "I'm not sure Robin will want to know what she has done.”

Monfils pushed against the thought that Blake was right. He had lost contact with Jade after she left for the rebel stronghold. There was no telling what havoc she had wreaked out there. There was no telling if she had killed rebels or saved Charlie or killed Charlie.

“I need your BSA, Blake,” he said.

“Huh?” Blake gazed over at Monfils. “You know I don’t let anyone ride it.”

“If there is any hope of saving Helen or Jade, I need the BSA.”

“It’s a dangerous prototype, Monfils,” Blake shook his head. “You don’t even have that much experience on it.”

“I’ll take my chances,” Monfils held out his finger for the code. He could feel his uncle was going to give in. Blake’s BSA was a prototype single man transport that would get him out to Holbrook in fifteen minutes. He needed to get out there as quickly as possible and he needed to get out there with no one knowing about it. He couldn’t risk Warren finding out where the rebel stronghold was. Especially not with Jade and Charlie out there. “Please,” Monfils said.

Blake sighed, staring at his wife, who was grinding her teeth angrily. He reached his finger forward and pressed it against Monfils, transferring the BSA code to his nephew. “Don’t let this get any worse,” he said as he turned back to the window looking in on Robin’s room.

Everybody was staring at Trekon, whose brow was furrowed as he stared at Jade’s one human eye. Silence filled the stone chamber as the fires of Crowley glowed, blinking orange on the screens.

“I give you my word.” Jade’s voice was low. “I will get him into the CompuVerse where he can access the hybrids.”

Trekon’s eyes were dark, his face a stone wall.

“I will leave you Angelo,” Jade said. “If I do not fulfill my promise, you may have him. He will be loyal to you.”

“Why, well, I do not think that is quite appropriate,” Angelo said, tilting his head to stare at Jade. “I am your bot.”

“You can’t get in there without him!” Charlie exclaimed.

Trekon eyes squinted. “You may go,” he said.

“No,” said Charlie. “Without Angelo, it’s a suicide mission.”

“Then take Angelo with you. I trust you,” Trekon said with a nod.

“You can’t trust a hybrid,” Tallahassee said.

“We shall see,” Trekon said. “So much is already lost. This is our only hope of saving humanity.”

Jade looked around the room. “I could use some extra hands to get us into the CompuVerse. There are a lot of barriers to get past.”

“Let me get this straight,” Zeke chimed in. “The hybrids are being controlled by a program that makes them rampaging killing machines. They’re destroying and killing all the humans in Crowley and you want a few humans to go in there and solve the problem.”

“You don’t have to battle them,” Charlie said.

“We just have to get Charlie into the CompuVerse so he can alter the code.”

“It’ll stop the hybrids,” Charlie said. “Once we update the code, we’ll be safe.”

“Dustin and Warren will just go back in there and replace the code again,” a burly guy at the front of the room said.

Charlie shook his head. “No, they won’t. I wrote new code. I used it on Jade. It’s in front of all her ops code. It creates a failsafe trap. They won’t be able to touch a single hybrid ever again. And they won’t be able to create another hybrid, not with that code. They’ll never be able to access it.”

“You think she’ll do it, Charlie?” Zeke asked.

Charlie glanced over at Jade. “Yes,” he said loudly. “She doesn’t need to be here right now. Even without guns she could take almost all of us out and get out of here.”

“All of us except for the big red guy,” Tallahassee said grudgingly.

“And he is her ProtectoBot,” Charlie said. “Face it, we don’t need to be standing here talking to you at all.”

“We kind of do,” Jade hissed at Charlie. “We need a ride.”

“Right,” Charlie said. “However, we do need a ride.” He looked around the room seeing if anyone would volunteer to help.

“You can’t trust a hybrid,” Tallahassee said.

“Seriously?” Charlie asked. “This is the 24th century and humans haven’t gotten over bigotry?”

“She is human,” Charlie said. He hadn’t even really thought about the fact that they may not be.

“You didn’t see any humans out there tearing at each other when Blake’s boy flipped the switch,” Zeke said.

“We don’t make a habit of helping hybrids,” Tallahassee said.

“How about helping humans?” Jade snarled. “Because last time I checked, all the humans are going to die if we don’t go in and do something about the code that’s chewing up the hybrids’ brains.”

“We’re not fighting against the hybrids,” Charlie said. “We’re fighting against control. We’re fighting for equality. Human and hybrid. We’re fighting for a future where everybody can live together in peace. Where one man isn’t turned against another man because somebody can get inside his brain and twist the way he thinks and sees things. I’ve written the code to do that. All we need is a ride back to Crowley.”

“It’s a dangerous mission,” Jade said. “I don’t think anybody should come with us because there’s little to no chance we will even survive. But we need to get to the city.”

“Where is the CompuVerse?” Tallahassee asked.

“In the heart of headquarters,” Jade said. “Past all the hybrids, past all the bots, and if they know they’ve been breached, the whole place will shut down and the bots will sweep through killing everything that isn’t legally there.”

“I’ll go with you,” Zeke said.

Tallahassee rounded on him with a snort. “You’re going with them?”

“Yeah,” Zeke shrugged. “Impossible odds. Little chance of survival. But the opportunity to save the world. I’m in.”

“Well shit. You’re useless without me,” Tallahassee said. “And someone is going to have to keep an eye on her.”

Jade smiled. “We could use anyone. But do either one of you have a vehicle?”

“I do,” said Gunk, stepping forward out of the crowd.

“Who the hell are you?” Jade asked, looking him up and down. “You’re not from around here.”

“No, but I do drive the garbage lorry and I can take you into Crowley,” he smiled.

“That’s all we need,” Jade said. She turned to Trekon. “Do I have your permission to leave to stop the slaughter?”

“Bring Jade her guns,” Trekon said. “It will be of great use to us if she survives.”

“Where is she?” Warren glowered, staring at the images of the streets of Crowley. “Why can’t you find her?”

Dustin blinked ferociously at the CodeSwarm that showed the map of Crowley. Where the hell was Jade? She’d completely disappeared off the map and try as he might he hadn’t been able to find her. Maybe he shouldn’t have gone drinking the night before, but it had seemed like such a good evening to take a victory lap through The Cross. High five the regulars in all his haunts and grab a few of the girls’ asses just to remind them that he was the man.

Shit.

How could he have forgotten Jade and Warren’s fear of her? And why the hell didn’t Warren keep track of the bitch himself if she was such a nemesis. He sighed as he realized the truth in the code. Warren wasn’t going to take this well.

“She’s gone dark,” he said quietly.

Warren heard every word. “What do you mean, dark?” he asked, even more softly.

“We lost her,” Dustin said.

“She’s out of our control or you don’t know where she is?” Warren asked in the same deadly low tone.

“Both,” Dustin said, his voice ringing out too loudly in the quiet control center.

Warren’s metal fist slammed down against a consol. Sparks flew as metal crumbled. “Genesis, go and find her,” he said. “I will tell you one thing. If she is not in this city now, she will be and she’ll be headed for the CompuVerse.”

“Perhaps she’s dead,” Dustin said hopefully.

“She would register in the system if she were dead,” Warren muttered. What the hell was wrong with Dustin? He was being an idiot. Some men couldn’t handle when they came close to greatness. Warren was pretty sure Dustin was one of those men.

Dustin scowled back at the CodeSwarm in front of him. He was going to show Warren and all of them how you stop a rogue Delta. His fingers worked the code furiously as he rerouted all the Deltas so their primary objective was to discover and annihilate Jadyn of Crowley. His frown tipped towards a smirk as he added the zinger code. The discovery of the unique scent of every being on the planet had only happened because of the invention of hybrids and the enhanced olfactory capabilities. Dustin pushed Jade's unique scent out to all the Deltas in Crowley so they would be able to smell her and they would swarm all over her, HELs blazing.

“We are going in this?” Jade looked at the hunk of metal. They had taken the transport back to about thirty minutes out of Crowley, not noticing the BSA that had streaked past them at the same time.

The garbage incinerator they now stood in front of was the height of a three-story building and almost as wide. It looked like a great big metal box with floating pods around its base and some sort of a glass dome at the top. The sides, which at one point might've been shiny metal, were now tarnished black with stains. But what was worse was the stench. It stank like nothing Charlie had ever smelled before. It reeked, not like yesterday's garbage, but like a landfill of all the city's rubbish had been dumped in it for a week and left under the burning sun and rapidly decomposing.

Angelo walked towards the big black box and clanged his metal fingers along the side. “Did you know, my fine man,” he said, “bots do not have a sense of smell? We have sensors to allow us to know something might smell, but we can't actually smell. I can see this is an F398 garbage incinerator, so I know it will be,” he paused as he searched for a word, “horrific to the human nostrils.”

Jade shrugged and started walking up the gangway into the big black box. “I've never had a good sense of smell. Been punched in the nose a few too many times. My septum is off.”

Angelo followed Jade into the vehicle.

“It can't seriously fly,” Charlie murmured again. “Why can't we use the transport from before?”

“It's in the shop for repairs.” Gunk patted Charlie on the shoulder as he moved past him. “Besides, we have to get close to headquarters and the transport can only take us just outside the city walls.” He gave a wheezing, twittering chuckle through his gills.

“Come on,” Tallahassee said following Gunk. “It's the only way we're going to get in there.”

“You guys run garbage collection for Crowley?” Charlie asked.

“There was a major malfunction with the city's SaniBots a few years ago,” Zeke explained. “Garbage piled up for weeks. So, the head dog insisted on a human collection group to service key areas. Apparently when humans malfunction, they're easier to get back online than bots.”

Gunk walked up and handed Charlie a small white tablet. “You may want to take this. It'll help with the smell.”

Charlie swallowed the tablet without even thinking about it. The stench was so horrid it left an acrid taste in his mouth that made him want to puke. The effect of the pill was almost instantaneous.

“Okay,” he said, nodding as the sharp, fragrant scent of oranges filled his nostrils. “I think I can work with this.” Charlie inhaled deeply and followed Tallahassee and Gunk up the gangway.

Gunk took the helm as Tallahassee, Zeke, Jade, and Angelo sat in the cramped space right behind the driver’s seat in the glass dome at the top of the collector.

“Our only objective is,” Jade said, pointing at Charlie, “to get him into the CompuVerse room.”

“I don’t think that’s going to do it,” Charlie said. “There’s too much risk. I’m a marked man. Everyone knows exactly who I am. When we get in there, if there’s one of us that has a target on his back, it’s me.”

“That’s why we’re going to escort you like a prisoner towards the dungeon and then veer towards Grand Central,” Jade said.

“Hm, not a bad plan,” Charlie said. “But I think it’s only going to work so far. You need someone better or more resilient than me to make sure the code gets into the system.” His eyes were on the giant red bot sitting casually next to Jade.

“You’ve given him the code?” Jade us.

Charlie nodded. “I also have it here.” He held up his wrist. There was a small metal band placed around his wrist with a black shiny strip on it. “It’s a Maverick invention. Apparently, if I press my wrist against the ports, the code will go straight into the system.” Charlie shook his head. He had no idea how it even worked but from everything he saw, Maverick’s stuff worked pretty well.

“In case Charlie doesn’t make it to the CompuVerse,” Angelo said, “I will step in.”

Jade’s eyes widened as she glanced between Angelo and Charlie. “He’s going to make it.”

“There’s also one for you, Jade.” Charlie handed her a bracelet, but couldn’t make eye contact. He was under no delusions. This was a suicide mission, not a Star Wars film. Well, except for Rogue One. That was a suicide mission, too. But they were going into the heart of enemy headquarters, and even though they had Jade and Angelo on their side, they were grossly outgunned. “This will give us three chances to get past Warren and Blake.”

“You’re going to make it,” Jade said, not touching the bracelet. “I’m going to make sure of that.”

“We don’t know what’s going to happen.” Charlie looked Jade straight in her right eye as he shoved the band holding the code in her hand. “Take the bracelet. We need to override Warren’s control.”

Charlie took a deep breath, but he wasn’t about to hide the answer. “And then I want to go home,” he said.

He didn’t look at Jade when he said that. He didn’t want to know what she thought. Jade was a hybrid from the 24th century. She was bad-ass, she was beautiful, and there was no way she would ever be interested in a coding nerd like Charlie Richards. He wasn’t even going to pretend to hope there might be a chance. No, he was going to go back to the 21st century and get on with his life and see if there was some way he could change the future. That was where he belonged; in the past. Maybe if he simply never invented the code, none of this would ever happen.

“You know, there is empirical evidence thoughts are transient things,” Jade said. “And by transient, I don’t just mean they go in and out of your own head, but they go from your head to somebody else’s to another person. They say that a single thought can be shared by at least thirty-two people at the same time and it expands exponentially until it finds root in one person’s brain and they make it happen. This may not be common knowledge in the 21st century, but it is known here.”

“You’re not the only one to think of that code,” she stated.

“Great,” Charlie said.

“My point is, if you go back and, let’s say, uninvent the code or don’t share it with the right people at the right time or don’t write it down or burn the piece of paper or whatever it is you think you’re going to do that’s going to change the world, you have to understand your actions don’t matter. Somebody else will invent the code.”

“Geniuses are not the people that are smarter than other people. Successful people aren’t better than anybody else. The people that have an idea... Everybody has an idea. Everybody has genius thoughts. Everybody has a great story, a great invention, a great solution, a great master plan. They can’t help it. These things exist outside of the individual. What makes someone unique is not what they think. What makes people unique is what they do about it.”

The sanitation incinerator got to the gates of Crowley at twilight. The sun was setting on the desert horizon, but Crowley itself was still lit up. They been gone over twenty-four hours, and while the explosions had died down, the remnants of the burning fires had not.

Getting through the checkpoint was surprisingly easy. It seems like each garbage transport had a regular routine of collecting the garbage in the city and bringing it out, and right now was exactly the right time for Gunk's garbage truck to get back into Crowley. So, although they were stopped briefly at the gate, no one hindered them. Apparently, sanitation liked to keep a schedule, riots, rebellion, or not.

Charlie watched the lines of Jade's face tense, her eyes fixed on some random point on the other side of the cabin. Jade lived for her parents. Every choice she ever made was to protect them, to ensure their long life, to afford for them to become hybrids. And maybe some miracle allowed her parents to escape the demolition of their quadrant. Maybe they wouldn't be dead.

"We approach headquarters," Gunk said.

Jade gazed up at Charlie. "Are you ready for this?"

"If I'm going to be honest," Charlie said, a smile lifting one corner of his mouth. "It's a little out of my comfort zone."

Jade smiled in response. "Just remember, you are prisoners until something happens."

"Check," Charlie said, but trembles ran through his fingers.

"It's go time," Tallahassee said, opening the side of the garbage incinerator.

They stepped onto the burning streets of Crowley.

Katerina had always loved to bake when she was human. Her parents had owned a bakery in Trenchtown and she'd woken every morning to the fresh scent of bread and cupcakes filling the air and wafting up to her tiny bedroom at the top of the steep stairs. They never had much money, but she'd always felt rich. People lined up around the block every morning to fill up on their pastries. Had she not been the daughter of the baker, she would have lined up, too.

But she didn't have to.

Every morning her father set her muffin and glass of milk out on the tiny kitchen table where she would eat and fill her senses with the soft sweet smells of her father's baking.

When her father had grown sick, Katerina had been too young to take over the bakery, but he had written an air-tight will. Although she was being taken care of by her second cousin once removed, when she finally reached eighteen years of age, the entire cash value of the bakery was, in trust, to turn her into a hybrid.

The surgery however, had not gone well and before it was done, Katerina had been turned not into a Gamma, but a Delta.

Now, she stood in the streets of Crowley sniffing at the night air. Something was wafting towards her. Something that smelled almost as good as her father's baking. It was the scent of her primary target.

Jadyn of Crowley.

Katerina let out a blood curdling howl that filled the evening sky and, thanks to the great acoustics that were the streets of Crowley, drew the attention of every Delta within a two-mile radius. The lifted their noses in the air, caught the scent of Jade and turned their full, blood-thirsty attention towards Headquarters, where Jade was entering the complex.

"You guys are going to have to wear these." Jade held up three pairs of H-con cuffs. Zeke, Tallahassee, and Charlie all look down at the black cuffs with glowing green lights. None reached out to take them.

"That's going to be a little hard to do," Tallahassee said.

"They won't be bound," Jade said. She could see the fear in Tallahassee's eyes and for a moment, she wondered what had happened to him, but now wasn't the time to figure that out. Now they needed to get in the building. "You just need to hold one in one hand and one in the other. Like so." She demonstrated holding her hands behind her back. "If you hold these wires together, they'll conduct a small wave so it'll look like they're actually working, but if you open your hand it'll fizzle out."

Zeke grabbed a set of cuffs. "Okay."

Tallahassee frowned and nodded, grabbing the other two pairs and handing one to Charlie. The three of them put on the cuffs and wrapped the buzzing live wire around their wrists, squeezed them in their fingers, and felt them light up. They then let go to make sure they could lose the cuffs at a moment's notice.

"If we get separated," Jade said, as the three stood together, "we'll meet back here at 1430 when Gunk finishes his sanitation rounds."

But even as Charlie looked at Jade, he knew she wouldn't be meeting them back here. She wasn't a rebel, not really. She wanted to help the Lowsmiths, but mainly because they had a common goal. Jade belonged to Crowley, the city and Blake. She would help them get in and solve the hybrid problem, which was also a problem for Blake, but she wasn't coming back with them to the outpost. And in all truthfulness, Charlie wasn't either. As soon as this code was in the system, he was headed to the DarkM'attr machine. He was going home after this.

But for now, the five of them were together and on a single mission. And for the most part he thought they might actually get away with it. Who is going to question Jade and Angelo?

"We're going in through 39C," Jade said. "I know the guard there, he won't ask any questions. Just make sure you look defeated." She glared at Tallahassee as she said this.

They stepped out of the garbage incinerator, Jade and Angelo walking stiffly behind their "prisoners." Not only did the hulking hybrid guard not ask any questions, but he grinned and sprang to attention when he saw Jade.

Charlie watched the whirring of one of his eyes. Were Gamma hybrids the only ones actually left?

"I found these rebels," Jade said. "Got to bring them down for lock up."

Charlie kept his head down. He was still getting used to the idea everybody knew who he was, but regardless of whether this guy cared or not, it was better if he wasn't recognized. Blake and Warren didn't need to know he was in Crowley. Warren might be a jerk, but he wasn't an idiot. He would know exactly what Charlie was doing there.

Soon they were walking down the small narrow tunnels that lead into the prisons. It didn't look like they were the first humans to be brought down here today. Bots and hybrids moved all up and down the corridors with humans being shoved screaming into cells. A frown creased Jade's face.

"Why are they locking up humans?" Charlie hissed over his shoulder.

Jade pressed a finger against her temple briefly. Her scowl deepening. "To fulfill the prime directive of Crowley Enterprises. That's all it says."

Charlie shuddered involuntarily. Sounded a lot like human experimentation.

"I need to take these humans to cell 586 DL." Jade said to the massive guard who blocked the entrance to the cell block they were aiming for. The cell block that stood directly beneath the CompuVerse.

He looked up at some numbers floating in the air between them, blinked a few times and moved his finger through the glowing hologram. "That cell's taken. Put them up to 373GK," The guard said.

"I can't do that," Jade sounded almost bored. "I've been told to take him to cell 586DL."

The guard stopped looking at the numbers floating in the air and cocked his head to the side as he looked at Jade. "What are you even doing down here?" he asked.

Charlie raised his eyebrows. They might've just found the only person in all of Crowley who wasn't intimidated by Jade. Or who, at least, was going to pretend he wasn't.

"Excuse me?" Jade's back straightened even more and her chin lowered as she gave the guard the "don't you know who I am" look.

The Gamma hybrid guard smiled slowly. It was clear he knew who she was and he was going to enjoy this moment of power. "I'm not moving prisoners just to satisfy your requirements."

Charlie raised his eyebrows and snuck a glance at Jade. Her face was impassive and he could see a slight curl on the corner of her mouth. Charlie was pretty sure she was going to enjoy either beating the crap out of him or watching Angelo do it. However, before any of them could make a move or say another word, a loud rumbling came from up the corridor. The sound of an army of footsteps hurdled up the hall.

"What the hell is that?" The guard asked as another Gamma hybrid came careening around the corner.

Katerina entered the warren of passageways that made their way under Crowley.

"Identification?" A Gamma stood guarding the hallway, his eyes wide as he saw the influx of raging Deltas.

"How's this?" Katerina asked, pointing her laser at his head.

"What the fuck?" The Gamma asked. "Stand down, Delta."

Katerina lowered the laser to his arm, firing it. The Gamma wasn't her primary target, but she would take him out if she had to. The laser sizzled his foot and the smell of charred flesh filled the hallway. The Deltas let out an angry roar as the Gamma screamed in pain and pulled his weapon as he ran down the hall and deeper into the underground prison.

"The Deltas! They've gone crazy," he screamed as he ran up to Jade. "They're attacking everybody! They didn't just stop at the humans, they're starting to attack the rest of us, even the twenty-percenters!"

A look of fear washed over the guard's face. Charlie and Jade exchanged a look. We've got to get to the computer room.

"Plan B," Angelo said, picking up the guard and hurling him out of the way.

They all gazed up the hallway at the raging Deltas. "We won't be able to stop them," the guard said.

"We need firearms," the Gamma with the bleeding arm said.

"Go!" Tallahassee said to Charlie and Jade.

"We'll stay," Zeke nodded at the belligerent guard who lay dazed on the floor of the hall.

"You'll die!" Charlie said.

"We'll only be able to hold them off so long," Tallahassee nodded

"There's a way out," the Gamma said, pointing towards a smaller passageway. "We can hold them off for a bit and if we're lucky, we'll make it out there."

"We need you to hold them back for five minutes," Jade said. "Can you do that?"

"We'll try," Tallahassee said.

A look of sincere gratitude washed over Jade's face. "Thank you," she said.

"You can thank us by stopping them," Zeke nodded at the Deltas.

“Just make sure you meet us on time,” Charlie said.

“Come on!” Jade exclaimed. She and Angelo were already moving down the hall. Charlie hastened to keep up.

“What’s Plan B?” He asked as they raced down the hallway.

“We’re going to burn the wall down,” Jade said.

They sprinted through the hallways. Anytime they met a bot or a hybrid, Angelo took them out in about half a second. Charlie cringed at the sound of bones cracking against the walls, or metal scraping as a bot went flying.

“They’re going to know you’re doing it,” Charlie said.

“I have a feeling they already do,” Jade muttered.

Charlie’s lungs burned and his legs ached by the time they rounded the final corner and came to the main door of the computer room. But where there had been two bots earlier, now there were ten. Clearly Warren was onto them and not about to risk them getting into the CompuVerse.

But this time, Charlie wasn’t on his own. He had Angelo and Jade. Two of the bots went down without a fight, though Charlie presumed they would’ve fought had they been given a little more warning before Angelo blasted their heads off.

Another bot was too close to Jade when Angelo went in. He couldn’t hit him with a bullet, but he did rip his legs out from under him. The bot fell to the ground as Jade swung out at the bot.

“Get the hell in there,” Jade yelled at Charlie.

“I don’t have access!” Charlie said.

Jade smacked her head as if that was obvious. She kicked the bot in the abdomen so hard with her robotic leg, that it went flying backwards and right into a headlock from Angelo.

Jade stepped to the side and put her face against the retinal scanner, letting it scan quickly first her right eye and then her left eye. Charlie heard the sickening snap of metal being torn apart and glanced over his shoulder to watch Angelo rip the head off of the last remaining bot.

Angelo moved down the hallway. “Duck!” he cried as he popped a HEL charger out of his pocket, punched a hole in the wall and stuck the laser explosive in it.

The reverberation of the detonation stunned everyone and everything in the hallway. Human, hybrid and bot alike. The world spun and the space throbbed as Charlie lifted his head from the ground. A gaping hole was ripped in the side of the CompuVerse room and Dustin and Graham stood there, mouths agape as Jade picked up Charlie and carried him inside.

“You can’t be in here!” Dustin screamed.

“I have to be here,” Charlie said. “If anything is going to stop this nasty code you submitted, it’ll be me. How many people have you killed?”

Jade grabbed Dustin, pinning him down against the desk. He let out a pitiful whimper. But Charlie didn’t care. The door to the computer room was stuck open and they could hear the thunderous rain of hybrids coming up the hall. Charlie had a flash of a zombie apocalypse, but he turned away from the door. He had one task to do here.

He turned to the CompuVerse.

“What is wrong with you?”

“Nothing now,” Jade said. “Thanks to Charlie. You’re a filthy scumbag, Dustin.”

“I made you a powerful part of a machine,” Dustin exclaimed.

“You made me powerless.” Jade punched him in the head.

“It doesn’t matter,” Dustin gave a hoarse laugh. “The Delta army will be here in thirty seconds. That’s not enough time for you to hack into the system. You’ve been locked out for days.”

“But you haven’t been,” Jade said, hefting him off of the desk and pushing his face forward towards the scanner. “Now, if you don’t get your fingers in there and get that damn thing up and running, I will rip your fingers off myself and use them to get in there. And after that, I will shove them up your ass.” Dustin trembled and his eyes teared up. Jade’s reputation was known throughout Crowley. She would do what she said. His hands quivered as he reached for the access field.

Charlie’s eyes were wide as he watched. He was pretty sure Jade was bluffing, but he was glad Dustin was following her instructions. He wouldn’t want to test Jade.

In seconds, Charlie was in the system. Jade handed Dustin off to Angelo.

“Stun him,” she said as guns fired and lasers ricocheted off the walls in the hallway.

Sweat beaded on Charlie’s upper lip, but his hands were steady. He sucked in his cheeks and grabbed the bracelet with the code out of his pocket. He did exactly what Maverick had shown him, he rubbed the bead in four circles and then punched it towards the drive as hard as he could. The code he was looking for appeared in the air and with the wave of a hand, he pushed the hologram into the computer field to exactly the spot he needed.

Sometimes it takes a while to switch operating systems. To learn the tricks and ways that one system is different from the other. And Charlie wanted time to ramp up, but he didn’t have it. He went into deep thought in an instant, allowing his muscle memory to bind up the code and prepare to send it out to the hybrids. He shut off his brain and went into auto pilot. Ignoring the rampage and shouts of the hybrids as they burst into the room, ignoring Angelo’s rapid-fire response and Jade screaming at him to duck. It was as if the world was moving in slow motion, and he was not in charge.

And just like that, it was done. The code was signed, sealed, and delivered into the computer field. Charlie reached forward and hit the button to send the code to the Delta hybrids. But, as he turned around and saw the hybrids swarming into the room, he realized it wasn’t going to happen soon enough to save Angelo, Jade, and himself. They were stuck in the thick of battle, with Deltas surrounding them.

And the hybrids were trying to get through them so they could kill him.

Jade gave a brief nod, letting him know she'd heard. Angelo crouched low and with the single burst upwards, he scattered hybrids as he somersaulted backwards towards the back wall. Holding out his hand, a white laser beam blew a hole in the side of the wall.

"Go!" Jade pointed to the hole. Charlie took one look at Angelo and Jade, and knew he had to run. He was great on the computer, but he would suck in real life battle.

He darted to the hole in the wall and Jade was close on his heels. Angelo covered their backs as they ran out of the computer room.

Angelo had to blast through three more walls until they finally made it outside of headquarters, but the hybrids did not give them any respite.

"Why isn't it working?" Charlie asked.

"Updates take time," Jade said.

"We don't have time," Charlie said.

Hybrids poured out of the building, advancing on them. Angelo and Jade exchanged a look.

"You can't kill the Deltas. They don't know what they're doing," Jade said.

"We're cornered," Angelo said. "If I don't eradicate them, they will execute you and Charlie."

"Give it another twenty seconds," Charlie said, his voice hoarse. "Just give it another twenty seconds."

He couldn't quite figure out why he was telling Angelo not to kill the Deltas, except it was what Jade wanted, and these were Jade's people. They weren't just some machines that should be blown away. These were people, people who had been given a disease of hatred and mania; a desire to kill.

"What is going on?" Warren screamed as screen after screen went black in the control room. He pressed his finger against his temple. "Dustin!"

Dustin didn't answer. He wished to everything in the world that he could pull the comm system out of his head. The last thing he needed was for Warren to be screaming at him.

They were losing the Deltas. The code he had slaved away on for eighteen months was destroyed. That damn Charlie had gotten in there and done something, something horrible. Dustin squeezed his eyes shut. How was he ever going to recover from this? Another eighteen months of work?

Eighteen months of Warren screaming in his ear.

It was going to drive Dustin crazy.

And suddenly, the Deltas stopped exactly where they were, their eyes flipped back in their heads, the lids closing, their eyeballs fluttering backwards.

“The update!” Charlie cried. “It’s happening.”

“Marvelous!” Angelo agreed.

“That’s an understatement,” Jade muttered, her shoulders visibly sagging with relief as the garbage incinerator pulled up behind the updating Deltas. “Let’s go!”

Blake pushed open the door and ran into Robin’s room. Her teeth had stopped gnashing, her eyes had stopped roving the room in anguish. Whatever Monfils or Jade or the powers that be had been doing, it had worked.

Robin was saved.

Blake grabbed her up in his arms and held her tight against his chest. She was going to live. She was going to be in her normal mind. But when she found out what she had done, he knew she would never be the same again. Crowley was never going to be the same again.

“We have to rebuild, Robin,” Blake murmured as Robin began to sob, seeing her memories clearly and her part in the brutal attack on the rebels. “We have to rebuild everything,” he said.

Even you, he thought.

“Where are Zeke and Tallahassee?” Charlie asked looking around as the door opened and the gang plank came down.

“You can’t wait,” Jade said, pushing him up the gang plank

Charlie looked at Jade. “You’re not coming,” he said. It wasn’t really a question, even though he tried to make it sound like one.

Jade ducked her head. “No. I need to see about my parents.”

“Of course,” Charlie said. “I need to see about mine.”

“Gunk will drop you at the DarkM’attr machine,” Jade said. “You just press the big green button and it’ll take you back home.”

Charlie nodded. “If you ever need help again, you know where to find me.” He let out a slight chuckle. And Jade nodded.

“I do,” she said.

“Keep an eye on her,” Charlie said to Angelo.

“That’s my job,” Angelo said.

“Angelo, you’ll stay with Charlie until he’s safe,” Jade said to Angelo. “Without you, he’s not going to be able to get the DarkM’attr machine to work.”

Angelo gave a deep, low bow. “I will return to you shortly.”

Jade nodded, her face serious. “Be careful. Both of you.”

Charlie wanted to hug Jade. She was the closest friend he had here. He stared into her human eye still wanting to ask her on that sundress date. But that didn’t make any sense. They were about to say goodbye.

Forever.

Jade stared at Charlie. He was so...human. Nothing like the god she’d been raised to think of him as. It seemed strange that he was going back to his world and yet would still remain a strong public presence in her time. But she would never look at his statues the same again. He would always just be, well, Charlie to her.

She thought about holding out her hand to shake his but that seemed so...not the right choice. A frown creased her face as he stared into her eyes. Could he tell she wanted to hug him? They both stood straight and tall.

This was goodbye.

With a brief nod Charlie turned and entered the garbage incinerator, climbing up into the glass dome. He’d barely been seated a second when the garbage truck thrust forward, moving quickly through the streets.

“Well, that turned out just fine,” Angelo said.

Charlie stared at the spaces where Jade, Zeke and Tallahassee had been when they’d entered the city.

“Right. It’s just- I hadn’t thought it should be, you know...people I know.” Charlie starred out at the burning city, his face aglow in the orange light. His eyes pricked a bit. Zeke and Tallahassee had been his friends, too. Or, kind of his friends. The kind of guys he’d go and have a drink with if they were back home. Now they were gone. He thought they were gone. But he’d never really know what happened to them.

The Dark M’attr Machine rose in the distance. They were almost there.

Charlie was going to miss this world. He’d have to visit Las Vegas when he got home. Home was going to be weird.

He stared at the streets as an explosion rang out around the corner. Two dark figures careened around it racing towards the garbage incinerators.

“Gunk!” Charlie yelled. “Stop!”

Zeke and Tallahassee, blackened and bleeding, were running towards them, three ProtectoBots on their tails.

The garbage incinerator slid to a halt as Gunk dropped the gangway and Charlie ran down to haul the injured rebels in. “Shut it!” he screamed at Gunk and the gangway came up, closing just fast enough to stop the bots from getting at them.

Gunk slammed the garbage vehicle into overdrive and they careened around a corner and away from the bots.

“You’re alive!” Charlie had never been so relieved in his life.

“No bot’s going to get us,” Zeke laughed.

“What’s going on?” Charlie asked as he dropped down next to Zeke.

“The honchos must have figured out we stopped their hybrid onslaught. They’ve turned the bots on everyone,” Zeke said.

Tallahassee groaned, holding his side in agony. “Gunk, you gotta get us out of the city.”

Charlie stared out at the DarkM’attr machine quadrant that was right in front of them. This was his moment. He was finally going home. To his sister, his nephew, to no crazy robots or confusing foods.

Gunk looked over his shoulder at Charlie.

“Get us out of here,” Charlie nodded. There was no way he was going to risk everyone’s lives just so he could get home. He’d rather everyone was alive here, than he was alive there and they were all dead.

Gunk nodded and spun the machine towards the nearest exit.

Then suddenly, a gut-wrenching blast rocked the earth, and before Charlie’s nearly blinded eyes, the warehouse that held the DarkM’attr machine exploded in a burst of fragmented white light. Charlie shielded his eyes as bits of the machine sailed through the air, littering the sky with all hope he had ever had of returning to his own time.

Monfils pulled the BSA up in Trenchtown. He’d followed the raging Deltas on the comm system and discovered too late that Jade had left the rebels and was back in Crowley. He’d watched the DarkM’attr Machine blow up in the distance as he’d landed outside the house that used to be hers.

Jade stood there, head bowed, staring at the blackened foundations.

“How could this happen?” she murmured.

Monfils placed his hands on her shoulders. They’d been lovers once and it was all he could do not embrace her and kiss away the tears he knew were buried deep within her. But she’d ended it before and never given him any indication she wanted to rekindle their romantic relationship. Monfils always missed her, but he didn’t pressure her.

It’s not like she ever dated anyone else. It was just a matter of time before she came back to him.

“I should have moved them when I saw what was happening,” Monfils murmured.

“Yes, you should have.” Jade yanked herself away from Monfils, even though she knew she was being unfair. It’s just, the rage driving inside her wasn’t the Delta coding anger she’d felt before. The blind turmoil that had clouded her judgement. Now her judgement was crystal clear and stone cold.

Without looking back at Monfils, she walked away down the darkened, deserted streets of Trenchtown.

Charlie stepped out of the garbage incinerator in Holbrook. A crowd of Lowsmiths stood dark and dusty, watching them come out. Zeke helped Tallahassee, who was limping. They stood with Gunk at the top of the gangway, Angelo shadowing them from behind.

Applause started at the back of the crowd and slowly moved its way forward. The Delta hybrids had been stopped. They may not have turned into bright and shining Lowsmith lovers, and they might still like their elite lifestyle in the city, but at least they would never be controlled by Warren or Blake or anyone anymore. They would always have their own thoughts and feelings.

Charlie's heart was dragging into his shoes. The DarkM'attr machine was destroyed. Jade was gone, back to her life in the city. He was never getting Jade. And he was never getting home. The thought wasn't completely devastating, but it made him lonely and homesick and... wispy. Very, very wispy. Like a dry desert wind would blow right through him and carry him away.

Tallahassee, Zeke and Gunk raised their arms to the applause, but Charlie couldn't do it. He didn't want recognition for doing the right thing. He didn't want any of it.

Apparently, neither did Zeke. "Hey, you want to go get a drink?" Zeke hissed at Charlie.

Charlie was surprised, not only by the invitation- where the hell did someone get a drink around here? But also, because he found he most certainly did want to do just that. "Uh, why yes I do," he nodded to Zeke.

"Come on, there's an Outliers' village just over the ridge there." Zeke motioned to a red dirt pile in the distance.

"Really? We can just go?" Charlie asked.

"Sure. Come on, I got a little four-seater we can take." He nodded Gunk and Tallahassee away from the crowd and they slipped to the side, letting the crowd get lost in itself.

The four-seater looked a lot like a golf cart covered in dirt. It was only floating a little bit above the ground.

"Jump on," Zeke launched himself into the driver's seat.

"I can't ride backwards." Charlie shook his head.

Gunk and Tallahassee took the rear-facing seats. Angelo turned on his hover ops and took to the air next to them.

“Cool.” Zeke nodded, admiring the bot’s ability to fly. “Don’t let Maverick see you do that. He’ll dissect that out of you for sure.”

Before long, the four of them were zipping along in the evening. The sun was setting over the red horizon. The wind lifted Charlie’s hair and he thought it was really quite an amazing feeling. It was a miracle he was here and this was America, but it wasn’t America, it was such a different place. Something he never even dreamed of. And he was cruising along in this open vehicle, whatever it was, feeling a certain amount of camaraderie with his new friends.

Friends.

Charlie had friends. Sort of.

For all the nights he sat in the Lonely Tree Tavern, he’d never sat with anyone. He always sat alone. And now he was getting a ride with people he’d been through something with. They had survived and they had each other’s backs. These were good people and he was good people and they were hanging out together.

As the small floater slid over the crest, Charlie was amazed to see the ramshackle town in front of them. There was metal and a few other interesting things around, but in general the Outliers’ village didn’t look much different from the small villages dotting the 21st century American landscape. There was only one street here and everything was on it.

Zeke pulled the floater up in front of a dimly lit doorway. He jumped out and was in the building before Charlie had even gotten off the vehicle. He was too busy looking around at how much things had changed in some parts of the world and stayed the same in others. This was clearly a watering hole. He would have known that even if he hadn’t been taken there for a drink. Small, single-story brick building, small metal door... The building wouldn’t be out of place in the 21st century. When he pushed open the door, he found himself grinning. Dirty corners, crooked frames. This place looked a hell of a lot like the Lonely Tree Tavern. He knew it wasn’t, but it looked and felt a lot like it. He realized he probably shouldn’t have been surprised. Buildings in England stuck around for five, six, seven hundred years. Just because three hundred have passed doesn’t mean everything is just wiped off the face of the earth.

His friends sat at a table in the corner, already waving the cute bartender over. Definitely not Dan the Man, this was a curvy, busty young woman. However, from the look in her eye and the blade on her hip, Charlie thought she might give Jade a run for her money.

“I ordered you a beer,” Zeke said as Charlie sat down.

“You guys still drink beer?” he asked.

Tallahassee and Zeke exchanged a look. “What did you think we were drinking?” Tallahassee asked.

“I don’t know, freaking something distilled from something. But I guess beer’s been around six thousand years, no reason why it would disappear in three hundred. And I am damn happy about that.” He grinned as the woman came back and placed four beers on the table.

He took a sip of the beer. “Amstel Light!” he grinned, suddenly at ease. “Amazing.” Maybe things weren’t going to be so different here in the future.

The door to the tavern opened, shedding light inside the dim recesses. Tallahassee grinned as he lowered his glass, his eyes going over Charlie’s shoulder. “That’s one hell of a hybrid friend you got there,” he said.

“She’s pretty amazing.” Charlie stared down at his beer. “I hope she’s okay.”

“Well, she looks okay to me,” Zeke said.

Through the light of the open door a silhouette walked straight towards them. The way her hips moved, the way her hair fell, and the shape of the DC15s pistol in its holster...the silhouette could only be one person.

“Jade!” Charlie sprang to his feet, grabbing her hands in a kind of awkward trembling greeting. He dropped her fingers like she was on fire and motioned to the table.

“Grab a beer, come over. I mean sit down, I’ll grab you a beer,” he corrected himself. He looked up at the red hulking bot. “Angelo, you want anything?” He asked, giddy with delight.

“No, I am quite all right, thank you.”

Angelo stared down at the flimsy chairs encircling the leaning wooden table. “I think I’ll just stand over here by the wall,” he decided.

“Your parents?” Charlie had to ask even though he wasn’t sure he wanted to know the answer.

Jade looked Charlie in the eye. “There was nothing I could do.”

Charlie nodded solemnly. It was exactly what he expected, but he knew it had to be tearing her apart. “I’m really sorry, Jade.”

The barmaid arrived with Jade’s beer.

“You know,” she said after taking a sip, “their whole lives, they told me they wanted to do one thing; die together.” Her voice choked a little bit at the words. “They got to do that. And they didn’t want me to feel obligated to keep them alive. And now...now I don’t have to do that. I’m truly free. Nobody can get in my head, nobody can control me, I have nothing I need to think about. Except what I want to do now.”

Charlie looked awkwardly at his hands. “How did you find us?”

“I asked around,” Jade said. “You know the DarkM’attr machine is destroyed?”

Charlie nodded. “Yeah, yeah, I saw that explosion right before we escaped. But somehow, the pain of the DarkM’attr machine being destroyed doesn’t feel quite so bad anymore. I don’t feel quite so hopeless.”

He looked around at his smiling friends, the bot fiddling with his knife, then he looked at Jade, and he raised a glass. “To the Allegiance,” he said, the corners of his mouth lifting just enough as he looked into Jade’s deep brown eye.

“To the Allegiance. To HOPE.” The others agreed, raising their glasses.

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

MELLE AMADE is a bestselling science fiction and fantasy author whose debut YA urban fantasy Shifter Chronicles series launched in 2016. Her books weave a tapestry of hidden worlds, ancient power, deep passions, international locations, and heroines who dare to risk their lives and sometimes... even their hearts. BOUND TO THE ALPHA

No name. No memory. Nowhere left to run...

She awakes in a forest, dressed only in a traveling cloak and with no memory of who she is or why she's run her feet bloody. Worse, she seems to have woken up in shifter territory, under the noses of two huge wolves. One shifter is fierce and cold, the other warm and comforting. But her enemy is after her, getting closer every day. And he has nothing to fear from shifters...

There was nothing but the sound of her ragged breath in her ears, the pounding of her bare feet against the earth. Her lungs ached, her legs burned, but she couldn't stop. Not now. Not ever.

The stitch in her side flared. Crying out, she stumbled and fell. Ignoring her scraped hands, she rose, gulping in deep, shuddering breaths of air.

She looked back over her shoulder, dread in the pit of her stomach. She couldn't name what was behind her, but she knew one thing.

He is coming.

Far off in the inky night, a scream of rage split the air. Backing away, she began to run again. It felt like an icy hand had seized her heart. The words pulsed through her mind like a chant, her feet lending a frenzied beat.

He is coming. He is coming. He is coming.

She raced toward the mountains, wind clawing at her stolen cloak. Branches whipped her face, thorns tore at her legs, but she forced herself onward.

She just wished she knew what she was running from.

Chapter 2

“*M*aybe you could take a minute to calm down—”

“Calm down?” Jet whirled on his brother. “They’ve ruined everything!”

“Stop,” Jasper said, using that annoyingly serene tone of his. “Think for a while. I’m sure there’s still some way to salvage this.”

Jasper caught up, neatly stepping in front of him. “Brother...”

“Don’t try to slow me down.” Jet pushed past him. “And don’t ‘brother’ me. I have to do what’s best for the pack.”

“And what’s best for the pack?” Jasper was jogging beside him now. “Seeking revenge on our sister, and on our neighboring pack?”

Jet stopped, giving him a cold stare. “Which one of us is Alpha?”

“You are.” Jasper lowered his eyes.

“At least someone recognizes that.” Jet marched through the main cavern, making heads turn. Most of the pack was still eating breakfast, but some of them rose as he passed. No doubt they’d already heard.

“As you were,” Jet snapped.

Fable and Rowan remained standing. Jet bristled. They might be his sister’s best friends, but they did not get a say in her punishment.

Rowan opened her mouth to speak. Out of the corner of his eye, Jet saw Jasper raise his hand slightly in a quelling gesture. Still glaring, Rowan sat.

Stifling a snarl, Jet stalked toward the entrance. He wasn’t going to stay inside this den any longer if no one was going to listen to him.

He refused to look back at Jasper, or any of his pack. None of them understood the burden of his position, the responsibility. None of them had sat through five and a half long months of negotiations, trying to forge an alliance with the pack to their south. None of them were kept up at night, wondering if their numbers were too thin or their borders strong enough.

Only Jet knew. And no one seemed to care what he thought.

He stepped through the gauntlet of hanging roots, batting them away from his face. Jet remembered looking up at them as a wide-eyed pup, his father telling him how the towering oak shielded them, connected them to the earth, and how he should remember that every time he passed beneath. But his father had never told him how to deal with a sister who scorned him, a neighboring Alpha who couldn't keep his word, or a pack who didn't respect him.

Jet marched through the canyon, not bothering to look back at the oak that grew at the far end, lending shelter to traitors who didn't deserve it. He would demand respect, by force if necessary.

"Slow down, will you?"

Jasper was a few paces behind him, as relentless as a flea.

Jet would give him as much attention as a flea deserved.

"At least tell me where you're going," Jasper said.

He was Alpha. He answered to no one.

Jet left the canyon behind, continuing his straight, determined path. He would not be turned from his mission. Trees and boulders should move out of his way, lest they meet the same fate that awaited Ash.

"You're going with stony silence?" Jasper asked. "Very Alpha. But we're headed due south, so it's obvious you're going to face Ash. Are you really planning on fighting him alone?"

"I would only be alone if you stopped pestering me," Jet growled as he leapt over a mossy log. "I doubt I'll be so lucky."

"You think you'll face just the Ember pack's Alpha?" Snarling, Jasper blocked his path.

Jet tried to remember the last time he'd heard his brother snarl.

"You think Ash's brother wouldn't defend him? Blaze is a formidable foe. And they'd have their entire pack to back them. What if they tear you to shreds?"

"Thanks for the vote of confidence." Shoving his shoulder into his brother's chest, Jet forced him aside.

"So that's your big plan?" Jasper shouted after him. "You're going to fight the Ember pack alone? You want to leave Oak Canyon without its Alpha?"

His brother's words grated. Jasper wasn't Alpha. Who was Jasper to tell him what to do?

"Fine," Jasper called. "Ignore my counsel. That worked out so well with Locke."

Jet stopped, turned. He saw Jasper's face whiten, but nothing could quell the rage building inside him.

"You dare speak his name?" Jet clenched his jaw. "The name of that mangy beast that stole our sister, that ruined my alliance?"

Jasper held up his hands. "You're right. I'm sorry. You're Alpha, and you make the decisions. I won't question you again." Backing away, he veered east.

"Don't walk away from me!" Jet shuddered, trying not to let rage overcome him. Fur rippled over his arms, but he forced it back. He needed to stay coherent. There were things he needed to say, and Jasper would damn well hear them.

“I’ll leave you alone,” Jasper said, still retreating. “It’s for the best.”

Jet bared his teeth. He was tired of being questioned at every turn. “Let’s see how you like being followed, brother.”

Jasper shifted, turning into a gray wolf, his head low and his tail tucked as he slunk away. Jet strode after him, determined to stay on two legs. How dare his brother throw Locke in his face? The shifter had entered Oak Canyon territory a few days after another audacious encroachment from the Wind Runner pack. Jet had taken him for a Wind Runner at first, but the wolf bore wounds that proved he was no friend of that pack.

Normally, Jet’s first instinct would have been to send a rival male on his way—and though Locke’s wolf wasn’t quite as large as Jet’s, it was still large enough to pose a threat. But it was also large enough to be an asset to the pack’s defenses.

He’s too much of an Alpha, Jasper had warned. He’ll never fit in here. Besides, how do you think he got those injuries? Did he challenge the Wind Runner Alphas?

Jet had scoffed at him. He still wanted to scoff at Jasper’s retreating tail. “Turn and shift,” he said. “Face me as a man.”

But Jasper continued silently, slowly leading Jet east.

Glaring at his brother, Jet ground his teeth. He had thought having another fighter in Locke would make Ash think twice before turning down a chance at an alliance. Instead, his brilliant new fighter had run off with his sister. A growl bubbled in his throat as he thought of the indignity afresh. Locke hadn’t even faced Jet, fought for the right of his sister like an Alpha. He and Juniper had simply fled.

“Juniper,” he growled, his jaw stiff. He would deal with her soon enough. She would pay for turning his plans to dust.

“It’s not her fault, you know.” Ahead of him, Jasper had shifted. “She’s only ever wanted to please our father, and then you. You might have noticed if you ever looked past the end of your nose.”

Jet laughed derisively. “When has our sister ever cared what I thought?”

His brother’s face was stony. “She’s only ever cared about the good of the pack. She’s cooked our meals, cared for our sick, patrolled our borders, brought down more deer than anyone—but you asked too much of her, dear brother.”

Jet’s lip curled. “I asked her to act for the good of the pack.”

“You asked her to bind herself to someone who wasn’t her mate.”

Jet laughed. “You don’t believe that, do you? Fated mates, destiny? What a load of—”

“I didn’t know our sister was so simple.”

Jasper stopped short, glaring. “Don’t insult our sister,” he snapped.

Strolling up to him, Jet tried to hide how pleased he was. Jasper always pretended that he was so calm, so collected. But he could get as angry as anyone could, and Jet loved being able to prove it.

Taking a breath, Jasper seemed to compose himself. “She found her fated mate, Jet. Your plan was never going to work.”

Fury boiled through him. “You knew she was going to run off with Locke, didn’t you? She told you her little secret, and you thought you’d keep it from me.”

“I can’t help if our sister confides in me. Maybe if you’d actually listen to her for a change—”

“Listen to what? Her plans to betray our pack?” Rage pulsed through his veins. Black fur rippled over his arms again. His wolf was clawing its way to the surface, and Jet wouldn’t be able to hold it back much longer. He felt his canines lengthen as he bared his teeth at his brother. “What other secrets have you been keeping from me?”

Jasper stepped away warily, not daring to turn his back. Good. He shouldn’t.

“You were so suspicious of Locke’s intentions,” Jet said. “You thought he would want my place as Alpha, but you were wrong, weren’t you?”

“I was wrong.” Jasper lowered his head. “I’m sorry, Jet. I don’t like that Juniper’s gone either.”

“Don’t try to distract me,” Jet snarled. “I see your game.”

“You want to be Alpha, don’t you? You didn’t want Locke to steal my place before you could.”

A growl tore from Jasper’s throat. “Think hard before accusing me of betrayal, Jet. I’m your brother, and the wolf at your right paw. I know you’re furious about your dead alliance, about Locke and Juniper, but don’t turn your anger on the ones most loyal to you.”

“Like you?” Jet laughed. “You would have had me believe that Juniper was loyal. If you’re as loyal as her, that’s worth as much as dirt.”

Jasper straightened, ready to fight. “I would die before betraying our pack.”

“You should die before betraying me!”

“Stop this!” Jasper’s teeth turned into fangs.

He was losing control. Good.

“We need to salvage what we can from this,” Jasper said, voice tight, “not waste time squabbling. Let’s get back to the den.”

His brother planned to betray him, like they had all betrayed him. Ash, Locke, Juniper. What was one more? He should have seen it sooner. Jasper wanted to drop the final blow, be Alpha himself.

Jet lunged, shifting in midair. For a split second, Jasper looked like he didn’t believe what he was seeing. Then he shifted too, leaping out of the way of Jet’s teeth.

Rolling to his feet, Jasper fled. The white tip of his tail flashed through the trees, goading Jet to follow. He was going to snatch that tail in his teeth and tear it off. Let Jasper try to be Alpha when he was a tailless laughingstock.

His paws beat against the earth. He would not let Jasper out of his sight. His brother veered right, and Jet’s claws dug into the dirt as he switched directions to follow the traitor. Jasper was fast, and nimbler than Jet would have liked. He needed to catch his brother soon. Jasper wanted to tire him out —he knew Jet was stronger in battle.

Jet was done playing games.

His brother leapt over logs, wove through pines. Jet got close enough to swipe at his back paw, but Jasper recovered without stumbling. Snarling, Jet pushed himself onward. He needed to protect his pack at all costs, even if it was from the brother he thought he loved.

Jasper veered again, heading for a clearing. Jet needed to end this. He had to do it while his vision was still clouded with redness, his blood still boiling. If he calmed, he didn't know if he'd have the strength to do what must be done.

Ahead of him, Jasper slowed. Jet set his jaw. His brother was finished.

In the clearing, Jasper stopped short, then shifted. It was enough to make Jet pause. Why would his brother shift into his vulnerable human form, with his back to him? Was he surrendering?

Jasper knelt down as Jet reached him. Jet blinked, confused. Was this some sort of trick?

Then he saw what his brother had, and all his rage evaporated.

A woman lay on the leafy ground, dressed in nothing but a traveling cloak. It had fallen open, revealing smooth, pale skin. The soft curves of her breasts and hips lay exposed to the mountain air, and Jet had to tear his eyes away from them.

He pulled back his lips, scenting blood. Was she hurt? Jet shook his head. Why did it matter? She was a stranger, and a trespasser.

Sniffing the air, he circled her. The coppery scent was strongest near her feet. Leaning closer, he inspected them. Her soles were caked with blood, strips of flesh missing. She had run herself ragged. But why?

Jasper was looking down at her, the strangest expression on his face. For some reason, Jet didn't like it that much.

The woman didn't stir. He couldn't even hear if she was breathing. Carefully, he touched his nose to one of her cupped hands.

She gasped, gazing at them. Her eyes met Jet's, and she lurched backwards.

"Shift, Jet," Jasper said. "She's terrified."

He didn't see what was so terrifying about one measly wolf, but he shifted. The sight of his human form didn't seem to bring her any relief. She looked from one of them to the other, pulling her cloak around her.

"We're sorry," Jasper said in a low voice. "We didn't mean to scare you. We won't hurt you."

Jet scoffed. They couldn't guarantee that. Jasper glared at him.

The woman glanced around, looking fearful.

Jasper opened his mouth, most likely to reassure her, but Jet cut him off.

"You're in Oak Canyon territory. Why have you come here?"

She stared at him, but didn't speak.

"What's wrong with you?" Jasper stood to face him. "She's hurt, maybe lost. Can you drop the tough Alpha act for a minute?”

“Act?” Jet snarled. “Who was on sentry duty last night?”

“Sentry duty? Who cares? Jet, she’s hurt.”

“She’s trespassing. Why did no one catch this?”

“She’s alone and hurt. She’s not a threat, Alpha.”

Jet’s hackles raised at the mocking tone. What did Jasper know about threats to their pack? That was why he wasn’t Alpha.

The woman was watching them, her hazel eyes moving from Jasper to Jet.

Jasper moved closer to her. Jet was perversely pleased that she began to back away. His brother wasn’t as charming as he thought.

“What’s your name?” he asked. “Mine’s Jasper.”

She stared at him for a long moment, putting her hand on her forehead. “I... don’t remember.”

Her voice was like music.

“You don’t remember your name?” Jet asked.

Drawing her knees to her chest, she put her hands on her head. “Not anymore.” The woman rocked back, biting her lip so hard Jet feared it might bleed.

“Maybe we can help you remember,” Jasper said. “What letter did it start with?”

She closed her eyes, breathing hard. “S. S...”

“Sarah?” Jet guessed.

“Sasha?” Jasper suggested. “Saffron? Sophie?”

Clapping her hands to her ears, she screamed.

“All right, all right,” Jet said. “No more guessing.”

Slowly, she lowered her hands. The look she gave him was slightly accusing, which he found unfair—Jasper was the one making all the suggestions.

“She’s hurt,” Jasper murmured. “We need to get her back to the den.”

“Why?” Jet blurted out.

Jasper looked furious, but Jet stood by his words. This woman might be pretty, but she was a stranger to them. He had a pack to look after.

“Are you serious?” his brother asked in a low voice.

“We can’t take in every lost lamb and expect to make it through the winter.”

“We have plenty of stores, Jet. What are you so afraid of?”

Jet crouched, meeting those hazel eyes. Part of him was pleased that she didn’t flinch away from him.

“What are you running from?” he asked.

Her eyes went oddly blank. “Can’t...”

“Let me guess, she can’t remember that, either.” Jet got to his feet. “How surprising.”

“Can you stop being an asshole for five seconds?” Jasper hissed.

Across from them, the woman stumbled to her feet. Her face went white, and she swayed slightly. Jasper bounded to her side. "Can you walk?" he asked.

She shied away from him. Hurt flitted over his face, but he took a step back.

The woman looked at both of them again, as if checking that they were keeping their distance. Carefully, she placed one foot in front of the other.

There was a sharp intake of breath, and the scent of blood filled the clearing. She lifted her foot to reveal a bloody footprint.

"Jet, she's bleeding. We need to take her back to the den."

"To your home?" The woman collapsed.

They both rushed to her side. Jet scowled at his feet, which seemed to have moved of their own accord.

She sat up, pushing away from both of them, slithering back on dry leaves. "I can't go to your home. He will follow."

"Who will follow?" Jasper asked.

The woman frowned, then buried her face in her hands. "I don't know! But he's dangerous. Too dangerous."

"Right," Jet said, "we're taking you back to our den."

Jasper whipped around. "What?"

"She's in trouble. We have to help her."

"What about all that talk about protecting the den?"

"You don't believe I can do that?" Jet drew himself up regally. "What kind of Alpha do you think I am?"

Jasper narrowed his eyes, but didn't respond.

"I don't think you should walk," Jet said to the woman, "but I can carry you."

She looked up at him, a glint of fire in her hazel eyes.

"You aren't scared of me, are you?"

She shook her head. "You're not like him."

Jet and Jasper exchanged a look as she rose to her unsteady feet, but neither of them pressed her on that statement.

Her pulse jumped visibly in her neck as she limped toward Jet. Her jaw was set, and she seemed determined not to appear afraid. All that betrayed her fear was her slightly shaking hands.

"You'll be safe with us," Jet said.

She seemed deeply skeptical.

Slowly, as if she was a fawn that he might startle, Jet reached out to her. When she didn't flinch or flee, he put one hand behind her back, one behind her knees, and scooped her up.

She closed her eyes, shuddering, but didn't fight him. She was so light, despite the heavy traveling cloak. How did she manage to seem so vulnerable and so defiant at the same time?

Jasper cleared his throat. “We should get to the den.”

“Right.” Jet strode forward, wondering what was happening to him. Just because his right hand brushed the creamy skin of her thigh and her hair smelled slightly like vanilla, why did that distract him so? For once, he had no room in his head for alliances, plans, or strategies. This woman was dangerous.

Jasper cleared his throat again. “The den is this way, Alpha.”

“Of course.” Jet looked down at his burden, but she seemed to have fallen asleep.

He made his way toward the canyon, stumbling occasionally. His footing would have been surer if he hadn’t kept looking down. He didn’t like the dark circles under the woman’s eyes, but they couldn’t hide her radiant beauty. Her long, dark eyelashes twitched every few seconds. She might be getting sleep, but it wasn’t restful.

“I’m sorry,” Jet said as they stepped through the pines.

Jasper quickly took his eyes off the woman. “What for?”

“For accusing you of wanting to betray me. I shouldn’t have done that.”

“You know I’d never do anything to hurt the pack. But neither would Juniper. I hope you can apologize to her too, someday.”

His brother was infuriating as ever.

Through the trees, the canyon came into view. The woman sat up in his arms with a start. She stared at him, eyes huge, and for a moment Jet was afraid she wouldn’t remember him.

“Are we here?” she asked.

“Almost.” Jet’s heart was pounding abnormally hard. “We’re about to enter the canyon. It isn’t easy for outsiders to find.”

This news didn’t make her relax. She began looking over his shoulder every few seconds, as if expecting someone to pop out from behind a tree.

Jet hoped she would stop once they entered the canyon. He always felt safer, surrounded by the rock walls.

She didn’t.

“Are you looking for someone?” Jasper asked.

“He could be here already,” she said feverishly. “He’s very powerful.”

“Who’s very powerful?”

Her only answer was to look back once more.

Jet had never been happier to see the towering oak that guarded their den. Maybe being out of the elements would help the woman feel more secure. Jet bit back a sigh. He wished he knew her name.

On the canyon’s rim, Clay let out a yip. It echoed down the rock walls, and Jet felt the woman freeze in his arms. He scowled up at Clay, though he knew the sentry was only doing his duty.

The end of the canyon and the oak were in sight. Shifters poured from the den, responding to the signal of a visitor and curious to see who it was. Jet’s scowl deepened. The woman needed rest and healing, not a load of gawkers.

There was something he had to do. He was loath to leave her here, alone and without his protection, but one last glance of hers over his shoulder decided him.

“I’m going to hand you over to Jasper,” he said.

Jasper seemed confused, but her hazel eyes were steady as he transferred her into his brother’s arms. Jet’s chest clenched. This felt all wrong.

“Look after her, won’t you?” he asked his brother.

“And where are you going?”

Jet looked down the canyon. “To cover her tracks.”

He had taken a single step when someone grabbed his arm.

“Wait.” Her touch was light, but strong. “Sylvia. That’s my name.”

“Oh.” Something about her hazel eyes made him feel like he’d been clubbed over the head. “Nice to meet you, Sylvia.”

Her fingers fell from his arm, releasing him. He had to go now, or he’d never be able to bear the thought of leaving her side again. Jet shook himself and shifted, racing down the canyon and back into the woods. All the while, his paws seemed to drum out the only word that mattered.

Sylvia. Sylvia. Sylvia.

Chapter 3

There were stone walls, a towering tree. A man with large muscles—Jasper—clutched her to his chest. She felt a twinge of fear that the other man—shifter—had gone. It felt safer with two. There were more now, but she didn't know them. They crowded around, and she didn't have enough air.

"Yes, yes," Jasper was saying. "She's hurt, though. Give her some room. Everett, could you get some hot water? Rowan, bandages?" His voice sounded like it was coming from down a long tunnel.

Sylvia. She was Sylvia. She clung to the knowledge. He had tried so hard, but he hadn't been able to take it from her.

Who had tried?

She shuddered as a door seemed to slam shut in her mind. She couldn't think of him. Couldn't let him back in, even for a second. He had tried to take everything from her...

Sylvia let out the breath she'd been holding. Jasper was moving, carrying her through a curtain of dangling roots. This was nothing like the other place. Maybe he couldn't find her here.

No matter where you hide, how far you run, I'll always find you, my dove.

She couldn't help the sob that escaped her.

"What is it?" Jasper's arms tightened around her.

"My... my feet hurt."

"I'll have someone see to them. Just hold on a little longer."

It felt wrong to lie to him, but the twinge of guilt passed. After him, she couldn't trust anyone. There truly were monsters abroad in the world.

Don't think of him. Don't think of him.

Her heart beat frantically as she tried to think of something else. Jasper looked down at her, concern in his eyes. He seemed like a good man. But so had the other one. He had fooled her—it had been so easy.

"Put her down here." The voice was calm, but commanding. Unravelling a bandage, a woman with black hair flicked her eyes over Sylvia. "She doesn't look too good. What happened?"

"Not sure." Jasper laid her on a makeshift cot. "I figured I'd ask again once she's rested."

Sylvia wrapped the cloak around her. No one else was wearing clothes, but she felt naked in front of these people. From the way they strode about, confident and bare, she wondered if they thought her odd for covering herself.

The woman gasped. “What did she do to her feet?”

“Ran her soles off, I think.” Jasper put a hand on the back of his head. “Is there anything I can do, Rowan?”

“Get her some water. And food. She looks like she could use it.”

Jasper knelt down next to her cot. “I’ll be back soon,” he said. “Don’t worry.”

He left the room with a worried backward glance. Sylvia watched him go, feeling like she might be sick to her stomach. The woman—Rowan—was still here. So why did she feel so alone?

A shifter popped into the room. “Here’s your hot water,” he said.

“Thanks, Everett.” Rowan turned to Sylvia as he left. “Can you sit up for me?”

She sat abruptly, wondering why the question made her throat tighten.

“You can soak your feet in this bucket for a few minutes,” Rowan said. “Once the dirt’s off, I can see what the damage is.”

Slowly, Sylvia slid her feet into the water. It stung horribly. She gritted her teeth, determined not to cry out.

“That should be good,” Rowan said finally.

Gasping, Sylvia lifted her feet.

“Not as bad as they looked.” Rowan inspected her soles as she dabbed them with a piece of hide. “Hopefully we can get them healed up fast.”

That was good. She needed to heal as quickly as possible. She needed to keep moving, to get out of here before he found her, like he had promised. He always kept his promises...

“This is the best lotion we have,” Rowan said, uncorking a jar. “For healing, anyway. Just don’t ask what’s in it. Or why it smells so bad.”

Gently but thoroughly, she smeared it over Sylvia’s soles. A pungent smell filled the room until it made her eyes water. But the horrible stinging began to fade from her feet, so she didn’t complain.

She hadn’t realized how much her feet had hurt. As the lotion seeped in, she felt her shoulders relax.

“Let me get you bandaged up.” Rowan deftly wrapped her feet, which had started to throb.

Sylvia closed her eyes. She hoped Rowan would finish soon. She could already feel herself drifting off...

“What’s this?” Rowan asked sharply.

Sylvia jerked awake. Rowan was staring at the two punctures near her inner elbow. Feeling self-conscious, Sylvia drew it into her cloak.

“I think it was an animal,” she mumbled.

“That must have been a large animal. Can I clean the wound for you?”

Hating herself for not resisting, Sylvia stuck out her arm. Rowan wrapped a bandage around it, taking one last look at the bite marks.

“How’s it going?” Jasper appeared in the doorway. “I brought a tray of food up to my quarters. I figured it might be quieter up there. Is it all right if I move her?”

“Fine, fine.” Rowan spooled and unspooled the bandages. “Let me just talk to you for a moment, Jasper.”

They went into the hall, but snippets of their hushed conversation echoed off the stone.

“...mostly healthy... needs rest and food... but bite marks... vampire?”

“Vampire?”

“On her arm, though... Is it safe?”

“Safe? She’s not a vampire, is she?” Jasper’s voice had risen.

“No, but is it wise—”

“Wise be damned! She’s hurt, and she needs our help.” Jasper stormed back into the room. “If there’s nothing further, that will be all. Thank you for your help, Rowan.”

“Are you besotted already? Really, Jasper?” She tried to keep her voice low, but it didn’t matter. “Last time I checked, you weren’t Alpha.”

“So everyone keeps reminding me.”

“You don’t have final say in this.”

“And neither do you, Rowan. Now go.”

Rowan’s eyes narrowed, but she left without further argument.

Sylvia watched as Jasper sank to the cot beside her, making the hide groan.

“Sorry about that. I know you need rest, not yelling.”

She ran a finger over the bandage on her arm. Unlike the ones on her feet, it felt uncomfortably tight. “I did get bitten, though. But I’m not... I’m not one of—”

Her throat closed, and she couldn’t finish her sentence. She shut her eyes, trying not to think of the fangs, the searing heat of them, the horrible sucking sound...

Her stomach growled.

“You’re hungry.” He smiled. “And in luck. Come with me.”

Picking her up easily, he took her into the hall and through a maze of stone.

“My brother and I sleep up here.” He was carrying her up steps carved into the inner trunk of the tree. “It’s quieter, if nothing else.”

At the top of the stairs were two doorways. Jasper took her through the one on the right.

“This is my room. It’s not much, but it’s home.”

A platform had been hewn from the stone floor. It was piled with furs, which he placed her on.

“How about we let in some light?” He pushed on part of the trunk, and a piece of it swung open like a window. Clouds rolled past in the blue sky outside.

“Eat, if you’re not too tired.” He laid a tray beside her. “There’s some rabbit, and some greens. I wasn’t sure what you preferred.”

Sylvia was suddenly ravenous. When had she last eaten? From the way her stomach was twisting, it could have been days. She snatched up the meat, tearing off pieces and gulping them down. Juice dribbled down her chin.

She looked up, remembering that Jasper was there, and froze. He must think her so rude. He would punish her, just like—

Slowly, she relaxed. She took a cautious bite of rabbit, still watching him in case he had lied and was just waiting until she was off guard to punish her.

But as the rabbit disappeared, he only seemed focused on her appetite.

“Was that enough?” he asked. “I can get more if you want it.”

She shook her head, hoping he couldn’t hear her stomach growl again. What if this was all a trick, a tease? Her eyelids drooped. She was so tired. She had to remember not to trust him, not even for a second...

Don’t trust who?

She remembered the cold green eyes, the cruel laugh. Sylvia shivered, feeling like nothing could warm her.

“Are you cold?”

She jumped. “I’m fine. Thank you.”

Lies, lies, lies. She hated lying to Jasper. His eyes were light gold, and there was warmth and humanity behind them. But it was still so dangerous to trust anyone. So, so dangerous...

“You look tired,” Jasper said as she stifled a yawn. “Please rest. I’ll make sure no one bothers you up here.”

He moved toward the doorway as if he planned to leave.

“No!”

Jasper stopped.

“Please don’t... Don’t go.” The words came out choked and frantic. He couldn’t leave her. Not alone, when he was after her, and had promised to find her. She might be at the top of a tree in a hidden canyon on a remote mountain, but that wouldn’t stop him.

Her lungs ached at the thought of being left alone.

“I’ll stay.” Jasper sat down on the edge of the bed, as though afraid she’d take off running.

Sylvia clenched her eyelids shut. He must think her a freak.

“I’m here,” he said, and somehow his voice calmed her. “Just tell me what you need me to do.”

Cautiously, she lay down on the bed. She wanted so badly to trust him. Part of her already did, but she couldn’t trust herself. She was stupid enough to have been tricked before.

Sylvia let out a long breath. She was too tired right now to think of lies, betrayal, torture.

She buried herself in the furs to hide the shudder that crawled over her shoulder blades and down her spine. All she left uncovered was her face.

“Will you hold my hand?” she asked at last, reaching out from under the fur.

“Of course,” Jasper said quietly.

Something about the warmth of his callused palm and the gentle pressure made her breathing slow and even. She was safe here, in this second. That had to be enough.

“Why won’t you eat?”

She sat in an ornate chair, her heart pounding in her ears. It was a trap—there was no acceptable answer to the question.

A sigh. “Being difficult again, aren’t you, Sophie?”

She opened her mouth to scream, but nothing came out. He had taken her voice again. But worse was coming. He only used that name when he was about to punish or reward her. And since she hadn’t answered his question, a reward wouldn’t be forthcoming.

A cold hand brushed her shoulder. She would have sobbed if she could.

“You know what I have to do now. It’s for your own good.”

She screamed.

She sat bolt upright, tangled in furs, sweat dripping down her back. It was pitch black. Where was she?

“What’s wrong?”

Someone was beside her. She crossed her arms before her, mad with fright, trying to ward him off.

She glanced around the room, blinking as her eyes adjusted to the dim light. The window in the tree’s trunk was still open, and she could make out the stars winking in the night. Letting out a soft moan, she collapsed into the furs.

“Jasper?” she asked.

“No. It’s Jet.”

The knot in her shoulders loosened, despite the annoyance she caught in his voice. “I remember you.”

“Do you need anything?” His voice was slightly softer now. “Food, water?”

She hesitated. “Could I maybe have some food?”

“Sure.” He stood in the darkness. “I’ll be right back.”

Sylvia watched him go, feeling torn. She wasn’t hungry at all.

Once his footsteps faded, she stepped out of bed. Groping through the darkness, she headed for the stairs. She took them as fast as she could, trying not to stumble. Though she wished she could have gotten more food, clothes, or even a pair of boots, she had to leave.

The man from her dreams would be stalking her. He would be coming after her, even as he haunted her dreams. Jet and Jasper were good men. And that was why she had to leave.

She couldn't let danger find them too.

Finally, she reached the main level. Keeping one hand on the stone wall, she made her way through the depths of the den. Her heart thudded, and she worried about bumping into someone at any turn. But she met no one.

Pale moonlight showed her the exit, and she walked through the canopy of hanging roots. They clung to her shoulders, as if begging her to stay.

But she couldn't. To stay would be to doom everyone in this canyon.

Bracing herself, she stepped into the moonlight.

"Where are you going?"

Jet stood behind her, looking perplexed.

She leapt backward, almost tripping on her cloak. "I was just... taking a walk." Trying not to panic, she continued into the canyon. He wouldn't try to stop her, would he?

"Taking a walk? On bandaged feet and an empty stomach?" He sighed. "You're running away, aren't you?"

She didn't have an answer for him.

"Will you please come inside? At least wait until it's light out before you go."

Her feet had begun to throb, but she couldn't back down. "I'm sorry. I have to leave."

"Why?" The question was like a small explosion. Jet sighed. "I'm no good at this. I told Jasper not to go on patrol. He's much more persuasive than I am."

She looked into his eyes, which glowed faintly gold in the light. "You knew I would run away?"

Jet shrugged. "You're running from something. Why would you stop?"

The question made her ache. Jet, Jasper... Both of them made her want to stop. To cease running. To have a home. But she had him to think about. And he would never let that happen.

She drew the cloak around her, trying to steel herself. "It's for your own good."

"And what about your own good? You're going to hobble off into the mountains, to face your foe alone?"

"And? So what if I do?" She quivered with anger. He wasn't her commander.

Was that a smile that played around his lips? "You're braver than some wolves I know. But even Alphas know not to fight when they're injured."

"I don't want to fight."

"But a fight is coming to you. Isn't that what you fear?"

The wind rose, howling down the canyon. It clawed at her bare legs, raising goose bumps.

Jet held out a hand. "Come inside. Rest. Heal. Let us help you."

"Will you teach me how to fight?" The words tumbled from her mouth.

"Will that make you stay?"

She was glad for the darkness. Hopefully he couldn't see her blush. "I'll try."

"That's all I ask."

Carefully, Sylvia took his hand. Jet guided her back into the safety of the oak. Before she passed through the curtain of roots, she looked back down the canyon. Darkness swallowed its mouth, but she couldn't help but feel like something was watching her.

Chapter 4

“Fists up.”

Sylvia eyed him warily, putting up her hands defensively like he'd taught her.

“Not like that. Like you mean it.” Jet put up his own fists, biceps bulging. It was slightly distracting. “Plant your feet. You don't want a mild wind to knock you over.”

Shuffling her feet, she tried not to scowl. Did he think this was easy?

The meadow was strewn with late summer wildflowers, and morning sun made their colors shine. It didn't really match the mood of the lesson.

Jet scrutinized her feet. “That's better. Now hit me.”

“What?” She couldn't remember ever hitting anyone in her life.

“You said you wanted to learn to fight, didn't you? You're going to need to hit someone some time.”

Honestly, she thought he'd have forgotten his late-night promise. And even still, she never dreamed that her first lesson would be to hit her rescuer.

“But why would I hit you?” she asked.

“I don't know. Pretend I want to steal your cloak.”

“You could have it if you wanted.”

“Sylvia!” He sighed. “You're the one who wanted to learn. You won't hurt me, I promise. Go on, hit me.”

“Where?”

“How about my arm?”

Leaning forward, she jabbed at him, her fist meeting solid muscle. From the look Jet gave her, she suspected that he'd hardly felt it.

“You're pulling away at the last second,” he said. “You need to follow through. Hit me like you plan to punch all the way through me.”

Sylvia swallowed, her throat dry. Maybe she should have thought this through more. Maybe she shouldn't have tried to learn to fight at all. It would have been far better to just keep running.

“Hit me,” Jet said. “You can do it.”

She screwed her eyes shut, preparing to punch him, when a voice cut through the calmness of the meadow.

“What’s going on here?”

Sylvia opened her eyes. It was Rowan, who had been so upset over the marks on her arm. Slowly, Sylvia pulled her sleeve down past her hand.

“It’s not any of your business, is it, Rowan?” Jet’s eyes flashed. “You should leave, unless you want private lessons yourself.”

“So hostile.” Rowan shook her head in distaste. “I was just passing through, but I might be able to help.”

Sylvia narrowed her eyes. Why would Rowan want to help her?

“Look,” Rowan said, addressing Sylvia directly, “it’s obvious that something terrible is after you, isn’t it? I’m sorry that I assumed the worst happened, but... that’s what tends to happen with them, isn’t it?”

“What are you talking about?” Jet asked sharply.

This didn’t look like it was going to end well, but it wasn’t like she could hide. Face burning, Sylvia pulled up her sleeve and fumbled with the bandage.

“No, don’t take it off,” Rowan said gently. “It needs to heal.”

“What needs to heal?” Jet sounded like he was at the edge of his patience.

“Vampire bite. On her arm.”

Slowly, Jet turned to stare at her. Sylvia felt her face heat. It must be crimson by now. Would he command her to leave?

“Why didn’t you tell me?” he asked softly.

Looking into his eyes, she found only concern. It would have been much less strange to find anger.

“And what do you think I’m trying to do?”

Rowan moved closer. “You’re teaching her how to punch. You think that’s going to be effective against vampires, or anything else trying to come after her? She’s a stick. Her punches wouldn’t hurt a rabbit.”

“I’m not afraid to fight.” Sylvia faced her, in the stance Jet had taught her. She wasn’t going to let Rowan keep her from being able to make a stand.

“You should be, if there’s a vampire hunting you.” Rowan glanced over as Jet growled darkly. “It’ll do no good to pretend she’s not in danger. And the pack is only as strong as our weakest member—is that not one of your favorite sayings, Alpha?”

Jet glowered at her.

“I’m not part of your pack, though.” Sylvia could see she was causing trouble. “I’ll go soon enough.”

“While you sleep in our den, you’re part of our pack,” Rowan said firmly. “And don’t think I’m insulting you by calling you a stick. You won’t be forever, but muscles aren’t built in one season. And the first lesson in fighting is to stick to your strengths.”

Sylvia couldn't help the words from tumbling out. “I don't have any strengths.”

“Wrong.” Rowan strode up to her. “I'm shorter than Jet, and much lighter. Would you like to fight me, Jet?”

“Not particularly.”

“He would win, of course,” Rowan continued. “He's Alpha for a reason. But it would be at great cost to him. I can't beat him on strength alone, but I've built up other talents. And that's what you need to do.”

Sylvia could only stare at her. What talents could Rowan think she possibly possessed that would compare to those of shifters, vampires, and worse creatures?

“Don't look at me like that. You're not talentless. How else would you have made it all the way out here in the first place?” Flipping her hair over her shoulders, Rowan tied it back. “You have wits and speed, and those count for a lot. But I'm going to teach you some things you might not know.”

Rowan turned. “Jet, hold out your knife.”

“Now I'm the practice dummy?” He pulled out his weapon. “Try not to draw blood. Some of us need to lead a pack.”

“You'll survive. Stop your whining.” She stood in front of him. “Now, this is my favorite move, though it may take some practice.” Her hand whipped out to grab and twist Jet's wrist. He yelled, and the knife fell to the ground.

“See? Easy.” Rowan kicked the blade up and handed it back to him. “This time I'll do it slower.”

Jet rubbed his arm. “As long as you don't break my wrist.”

“I'm not promising anything.” Rowan winked. “All right, so you want to grab the wrist like this.” She showed Sylvia. “Then twist, but really dig into the tendons. That's the secret.”

Jet swore, dropping the knife again. “It's even worse slowed down.”

Picking up the knife, Rowan brandished it. “You try,” she said, facing Sylvia. “Put your hand around my wrist.”

Tentatively, she obeyed.

“Now dig your fingernails in. Don't be afraid to hurt me—we heal fast.”

She pressed her nails to Rowan's skin, but she didn't want to hurt her.

“Come on, harder. We're not leaving until you make me drop it.”

Sylvia tried, but each attempt felt feebler than the last. She started to worry that Jet and Rowan were growing impatient.

“One more,” Jet said, “then let's move on to something new.”

“Focus,” Rowan said. “If it helps, pretend that I'm someone who you really hate.”

Like me, Sophie?

The voice in her head made her pulse surge. Her hand shot out, wrapping around Rowan's wrist. Fiercely, she shoved her nails into Rowan's tendons. The shifter gasped in pain, dropping the knife.

"I'm so sorry," Sylvia said, rocking back. "I don't know what happened."

"You did great!" Rowan beamed, still massaging her wrist. "Maybe a little too well, but then again, I must just be a great teacher, right?"

"Sure." Jet snorted. "Is that enough for the day?"

"Maybe for you. She needs a few more lessons."

Quickly, using Jet as a model, Rowan walked her through the best places to target an assailant.

"Strike the soft spots of the body," Rowan said. "Eyes, nose, throat, groin. Those are the only ones you'll need to remember. And no matter how many powers anyone possesses, their eyes are still going to water when you pop them in the nose."

She immediately proved this using Jet, who didn't seem too pleased.

"I won't give a full demonstration of the groin attacks, since I'm guessing our Alpha will want pups someday."

"I appreciate that," Jet groaned.

"But your knee and shin work wonders there," Rowan continued like she hadn't heard him. "In close quarters, an elbow's great, too—it's one of the strongest points on your body."

"Can we wrap this up?" Jet asked, still rubbing his nose.

"All right, one last thing. I'm going to show you how to break out of a hold. This won't take long." Reaching out, Rowan put her fingers around Sylvia's wrist.

The world went dark. It felt like she was drowning.

There was steel around her wrist, cold and unforgiving. She tugged at it, but it was bolted to the table—there was no escape.

"I don't know why you won't eat," a soft voice said. "It's almost like you're unhappy here. And after all I've done for you. You're disappointing me, Sophie."

She strained to get away from the table, sobbing as the manacle bit into her wrist. "Please, let me go!"

"But I can't let you go. Not until you love me. Do you love me, Sophie?"

He moved behind her. He was going to punish her, she knew it. She screamed for help, knowing that no one would hear.

"Why must you carry on so?" He set a plate in front of her, covered with a silver lid. "I'm only trying to be hospitable. You're my guest, after all."

The manacle glinted in the light of the chandelier, belying his words. But a dinner wasn't a punishment.

He laid a hand on her shoulder. She jumped, but he merely stroked her arm. "You have much to learn, Sophie. But don't worry. I'll teach you everything you need to know."

Would there be no punishment this time? She breathed deeply, her heart rate slowing. Maybe tonight he would be merciful.

"I have only one request tonight, Sophie. I want you to dine with me." He whipped off the lid, revealing a plate teeming with a mass of snakes. They writhed and slithered, just as desperate as her for escape. She still couldn't help but scream as some fell into her lap, winding down her legs. The manacle kept her bolted to the table, forced to endure the horror.

He slid a fork and knife across the table. "Aren't you hungry?"

"Sylvia? Sylvia!" Someone was shaking her.

She gasped, sitting upright. Jet was crouched beside her. Rowan stood behind him, looking pale.

"What happened?" Her mouth felt like cotton.

"You fell." Jet's voice shook. "You weren't breathing. Are you okay?"

She didn't answer him. She could still feel the snakes crawling up her arm.

Jet helped her up. "That's definitely enough for the day."

"I can try again," she said. "I'm not afraid."

"But I am."

"Alpha," Rowan said, "if she wants to try again, I wouldn't mind—"

"No more today. That's final."

"Well, if you have the time, maybe we can talk about Juniper."

His eyes narrowed. "Is that why you really came down here?" He slipped an arm around Sylvia's waist. "Come on. Let's get you back to the den."

Sylvia did her best to limp alongside him. Her feet were throbbing.

"It won't go away just because you won't talk about it." Rowan followed them, supporting Sylvia on her other side. Another time, Sylvia might have protested, but she wasn't sure she could make it back to the canyon without the help.

"What happened?" Sylvia asked. "Who's Juniper?"

Jet's mouth tightened.

"His sister," Rowan said.

"She doesn't need to know about that," Jet snapped.

"So, what, you're just going to pretend you don't have a sister for the rest of your life?" Rowan bared her teeth. "Or you're secretly going to go after her and punish her? Neither of those is a good solution, Jet."

Between them, Sylvia sagged. Her heart was hammering. "You're going to punish her?" she asked weakly. "Your own sister?"

Jet frowned. "I can't do nothing. I was her brother and her Alpha, and she betrayed me."

"What did she do?" Something was wrong with her lungs. She wasn't getting enough air.

"Jet wanted her to be bound to a neighboring Alpha," Rowan said. "She refused, and ran off with a shifter she actually loved."

"Bound?" Bile rose in her throat. "You were going to make your sister a prisoner?" She stumbled. She wanted to run again, away from Jet, the canyon, his pack, but she was too weak.

"What? No!" Jet sounded alarmed. "Binding is... a commitment. An oath of loyalty to your mate."

“Which is like imprisonment if you don’t agree to it,” Rowan said.

“It’s not like that at all,” Jet growled. “It was supposed to be an alliance. The commitment would go both ways—Ash would be loyal to her, and she would be loyal to him. It would have made both our packs stronger.”

“At the expense of Juniper’s sanity, once she’d found her fated mate.” Rowan tightened her grip on Sylvia’s arm. “But I forgot—you don’t believe in silly things like that, do you, Alpha?”

In the silence that followed, Sylvia fell.

“Hey.” Jet was by her side again. “Stay with me, please. We’re almost to the den.”

“Do you want me to go ahead?” Rowan asked. “I can get cold water ready, a cot made up...”

“Yes, go. I’ll carry her.”

Rowan took off. From the way her footsteps changed, she must have shifted.

Jet scooped her up. “Talk to me. Sylvia, say something.”

There was a note of fear in his voice. What did he have to fear?

“Sylvia, please!”

“I was bound,” she said dully. “How could you think of forcing that on anyone?”

“You were bound?” He stopped. “To a shifter?”

“No.” She tugged off her bandage. “Blood bound.”

“What does that mean?” He traced a finger over the marks. “A vampire did that to you?”

“They bite you. They drink. But they also make you docile. Make you forget.” She had to admit, it had been easy to give in. She had so much she wanted to forget...

“Sylvia, I’m sorry. That’s not the kind of binding I’m talking about. That’s not what we do—” Jet cut himself off as his voice rose in anger. “Don’t worry.” He was moving again. “I won’t let anyone hurt you again.”

She wished he wouldn’t make promises he couldn’t keep.

At the den, Rowan was waiting. She had Jet sit Sylvia at a table where she was plied with cold water and a disgusting tea that Rowan swore would help clear her head. Sylvia drank it, miserable. Clearing her head was the last thing she wanted right now, though the tea only seemed to clear her sinuses.

“Let me change your bandages,” Rowan said, “and put on some fresh lotion. That should dull any pain you’re feeling.”

Sylvia stuck out her legs while Rowan completed her ministrations. Once the bandages were in place, she pushed a pair of fur-lined slippers onto Sylvia’s feet.

“Now remember, it would be better if you didn’t have to use these slippers too often. You should try and stay off your feet as much as possible, even if only for a few days.”

“You don’t mind resting for a while, do you?” Jet asked.

The very question made cold sweat form on her spine. Could she really stay in one place for that long? The hair on the back of her neck prickled as she watched a group of shifters file into the den.

Her mere presence was putting them all in grave danger.

“Sylvia! There you are.” Jasper slid onto the bench opposite her.

“Hi, Jasper.” She smiled.

“You remember me!”

“Of course I do.”

“What have you been up to?”

She didn’t want to trouble him with tales of her losing consciousness. “Oh, I just watched Rowan beat up Jet.”

Jasper laughed. “And I missed it? What a shame.”

“Is there any news?” Jet sounded annoyed.

“We did three sweeps, and scoured the eastern border. No signs of life, save for a few big bucks that were begging to be chased.”

Jet looked toward the entrance. “I don’t want to take any chances. Assign someone to patrol the eastern line. I don’t want a grasshopper to enter without us knowing.”

For some reason, Jet seemed to sour at this news. “Thanks,” he muttered.

“Unless you don’t trust Dakota and Hawke?” Jasper raised an eyebrow.

“They’ll be fine.” Jet turned away from him.

“Great.” Jasper clapped his hands. “Then I think it’s time for a hunt. Are you coming, Sylvia?”

“I can come?” She sat up straighter.

“I don’t see why not.”

Jet rose, grabbing Jasper’s shoulder. “She’s had a rough day. Even Rowan said she needs to rest...”

“She can rest after the hunt.” Jasper brushed him off. “I’m not going to tell her she can’t come if she wants to. Do you want to?”

“Yes!” Tottering a little, Sylvia got to her feet. She probably shouldn’t run on them, but they felt fine.

“Rowan,” Jet barked as she was clearly trying to slip away, “back me up here. Doesn’t Sylvia need to rest?”

Rowan shrugged. “That’s just my recommendation. If Sylvia feels up to it...” She put a hand to her ear. “Oh, I think I hear Fable calling for help in the kitchen.” Before Jet could say anything else, she dashed off.

“Looks like you’re outnumbered.” Jasper winked.

“I’m still Alpha.”

“Yeah, and Sylvia’s not a pack member for you to boss around. Come on.” He held out a hand to her. “Let’s round up the hunters.”

It felt like she was walking on air as she accompanied him out of the den. The slippers were like tiny clouds. She might even be able to run in them.

Jet blocked the exit. “Can’t you wait a couple days?” he asked Jasper. “It’s not safe.”

“She can watch us, though. It’s not like I’m asking her to face a charging buck. Nothing will happen, so stop worrying like a mother turkey.”

Jasper guided Sylvia into the canyon.

“I’ll be fine,” she said to Jet. “I just want to see the hunt.” She waved as they left him behind, but he simply watched them go, seething.

Chapter 5

“This will be a small hunting party,” Jasper said, “just you, me, Gwen, and West. But if you help us flush some game, we might be able to hunt more efficiently.”

“So I can help?” She would love to be able to give something back to the pack that had given her refuge, healing, and amazing slippers.

“Yep. You have the most important job—without someone to guide our prey to us, the job is much more taxing.”

She doubted that startling animals was more difficult than bringing them down, but she wouldn’t argue.

As they journeyed down the canyon, they were joined by two other shifters.

“This is Gwen”—Jasper nodded to her—“and West.”

“Sylvia,” she said, drawing her cloak around her. Gwen was beautiful, with blue eyes and curves that Sylvia could never hope to attain. West had a chiseled face and body that any man would envy, and most women would want. How were all the shifters so inhumanly gorgeous? Beside them, she felt no prettier than a block of wood.

“You’re going up there.” Jasper pointed to the left rim of the canyon. “It’s a perfect spot. There’s a thicket filled with sweet summer berries that the deer love. But there’s a drop on one side, and a ridge on the other. If you make a racket at one end, the herd will be forced into a funnel that leads them directly to where we’ll be waiting, over there.” He pointed to the other end of the canyon. “And then to our dinner table.”

That sounded like a good plan. Sylvia craned her neck to look up at the place where he had first pointed. “And how do I get up there?”

“I’m glad you asked.” Jasper slowed. “Can you see our secret staircase?”

She turned to face the direction he was looking in. A narrow ledge led up the canyon wall, roughly hewn handholds dotting the way.

“You can’t be serious. In what world is that a staircase?”

Gwen laughed. “That’s what I said.”

“Hardly anyone ever uses it,” West said. “And never humans.”

“What, you don’t trust me?” Jasper frowned. “You can make it up there, can’t you, Sylvia?”

“Sure.” Her throat felt very dry, but she didn’t want to let him down.

“I’ll go up with you,” he said. “Every step of the way.”

“He won’t let you fall,” Gwen said.

“Probably,” West added.

Jasper glared at him. “Don’t listen to him, Sylvia. He’s just jealous that he doesn’t get to be your escort.”

He led her to the edge of the canyon wall. Looking up, she tried not to let dizziness overcome her. It seemed so high.

“Try not to think about heights, or the ground,” Jasper said. “Look.” He stepped onto the ledge. “Do exactly what I do. Let the handholds guide you.”

Pushing her fear aside, she put her foot on the ledge. She trusted him. And he wouldn’t let anything happen to her... right?

“You won’t let me fall?” she asked.

“We’re only two inches from the ground.”

“You’re safe with me.” Changing handholds, he moved up the ledge.

Letting out a breath, Sylvia copied him. They moved inch by agonizing inch. It took all the willpower she possessed not to look down. She just focused on moving from handhold to handhold exactly as Jasper did, her feet skating along the ledge.

The wind pulled at her cloak and her hair, but she kept creeping upward. If Jasper thought she could do it, she wouldn’t disappoint him. He moved with a languid ease, his muscles standing out as he secured his position. He never took his eyes off her. Sylvia hoped she didn’t look too frightened.

The canyon rim edged closer. She tried not to think about how the ground must be receding at the same pace. Somewhere below, Gwen and West were shouting encouragement, but Sylvia could barely hear them over her own simple thoughts. Handhold. Handhold. Shuffle feet. All she had to do was not lose her grip...

And then Jasper was up and over, crouching on the canyon rim. He put a hand down, and easily pulled her up.

It felt like she was on top of the world.

Cheers erupted from below. Sylvia grinned weakly, surveying the world from this new height.

“We made it,” Jasper whispered. “And I told you I wouldn’t let you fall. Now is the easy part.” He pointed to a tangle of plants that seemed to swallow the densely packed trees. “There’s bound to be something in that thicket. The summer berries are far too tempting.”

“So I just need to run in there shouting?” Sylvia asked, her voice low.

“Yes, but not until we’re in position. We’ll be fast—the sun should hardly move. When we’re ready, West will caw three times like a crow. That's your signal to start making a racket up here."

"I think I can do that." Her heart was jumping.

"Good. Don't be afraid to scare whatever's in there. Just tell yourself you're ten times as scary."

His light gold eyes were laughing. "This will all be over soon, and we can return to the den in triumph." He squeezed her hand lightly, then leapt onto the ledge.

Sylvia gasped. He didn't seem to walk back down so much as fall. His feet only appeared to touch the ledge about three times before he was back on the ground. Jasper looked up at her, waved, then shifted into a huge gray wolf. Gwen and West, brown and white wolves, followed him as he raced down the canyon.

Her heart thumped as she watched them go. She wasn't sure she'd ever get used to people turning into wolves.

She kept still as wind whistled through the thicket. It made it hard to hear whether there were signs of life inside. She'd feel pretty stupid running screaming into an empty thicket, but she had already agreed to do it. And she would like a nice meal tonight.

Her stomach rumbled. She put a hand over it, hoping to quiet it. She hoped she hadn't made Jet too mad, going on the hunt with Jasper. He hadn't looked at all pleased when they left. But she hadn't wanted to stay cooped up inside all day, and she felt much more useful up here. Still, she should probably apologize to Jet when they got back. He'd spent all morning being used as a practice dummy for her benefit, and she'd immediately turned around and disregarded his wishes.

Sylvia sighed. The pack seemed complicated. Living alone would be so much simpler. Though alone, she'd never be able to catch and bring down deer herself...

Ahead, in the thicket, something whuffled. Sylvia crouched down, hoping it hadn't noticed her. She didn't want to scare it too soon.

Stock still, she waited to see if it would make the sound again. She hadn't just imagined it, had she? Based on what Jasper had said, it must be a deer. Sylvia licked her lips. She was hungry for some venison.

The creature whuffled again, moving through the thicket. She couldn't see it, but she was certain she could scare it. Sylvia looked at the sun impatiently. Were the others ready yet?

Down the canyon, a crow cawed once, then twice more. She was startled by how real it sounded. If she were a deer, she would definitely think that a bird had made that sound, not West.

It was time. Rising to her feet, she charged into the thicket.

"Get out!" she yelled. "This way, please! I'm going to need you for dinner."

She crashed deeper into the thicket, crushing berries under her slippers. There was indeed a creature inside. It scrambled back, fearful. But it was no deer.

It was a black bear cub.

"Oh no." Sylvia lowered her voice, backing away immediately. "I scared you, didn't I? I'm sorry. I don't want you for dinner. Just don't—"

Sitting back, the bear cub let out a cry.

“No, no,” she whispered. “Please don’t. I’m leaving, see?”

The little cub cried again, louder this time.

From behind her came an answering call. It was deeper, and angrier.

Sylvia turned, hardly daring to breathe.

A mother bear thundered into the thicket. It took one glance at her and roared. Sylvia was distinctly aware that she was between a bear and her cub. She had suspected that she might die soon, but she never would have guessed a bear would get her before her captor could catch up. She could only laugh.

“I’m sorry, Mama.” She stepped aside, stumbling over tangled vines. “I didn’t mean to scare your baby.”

The cub raced to its mother, ducking behind her legs. It peered back out at Sylvia, as if curious to see her fate.

“Your baby’s safe, Mama. Can I go?”

The bear lowered its head, its eyes locked on hers. Heart in her throat, Sylvia backed away. Her slipper caught on a thorny vine, tripping her.

She fell on her ass with a gasp. The mother bear didn’t seem to like that at all. Grunting, she lumbered forward. Sylvia tried to rise, but her slipper was caught. Abandoning it, she rolled aside just as the bear swiped a paw at her.

“Hey!” She struggled to her feet, ignoring the brambles underfoot. “You have your baby. Leave me alone!”

The bear’s black eyes were still fixed on her. Sylvia swallowed. She wasn’t intimidating enough... She needed to look bigger.

Sylvia stared the bear down. “I refuse to get eaten by a bear. You hear me?” Opening her cloak, she let it billow in the wind. The bear sat back, alarmed.

Behind them, the cub cried again. That seemed to settle the mother’s mind. Turning tail, she trundled out of the thicket, pushing her cub ahead of her with her nose.

Her knees trembling, Sylvia sank to the ground just as a gray wolf exploded into the thicket. She jumped up, fists ready. It took her a second to realize that the huge wolf was Jasper.

“Sylvia!” He shifted. “Are you all right? Was that a bear?”

She fell into his arms, which had never felt better. “Just a bear and her cub.”

“We heard you,” Jasper said, “near the end. I didn’t think we’d get here in time.” He looked stricken.

Gwen and West appeared behind him, their faces pale.

“She’s alive!” West said.

Gwen gaped. “And without a scratch.”

“Did you really tell the bear that you refused to let it eat you?” Jasper asked. “I thought I might have been dreaming.”

Sylvia blushed. “That was stupid of me...”

“Not at all. It worked, didn’t it? You scared a bear away.” He sounded awed.

“I was just lucky.”

“Lucky that you have a warrior’s spirit,” Gwen said. “You’re a bear maiden.”

Sylvia couldn’t help but laugh. It had been such a surreal day.

After retrieving her slipper from the brambles, Jasper declared their hunt to be over. He wouldn’t hear any of her protestations as he carried her back toward the den.

“I could try flushing something else,” Sylvia said as they entered the canyon. “Maybe even a deer this time.”

“We’re not taking any chances. Gwen and West can have fun chasing rabbits, but I’m taking you back. I know you’re eager for a second round, but that’s the only bear you’ll be facing today.”

By the time they reached the towering oak, the whole pack seemed to know the story. Details buzzed all around them, and shifters were eager for more details.

“How big was the bear?” Rowan asked. “Four hundred pounds? Five?”

“Were you scared at all?” Everett butted in. “You don’t even seem shaken.”

“That’s because she’s a bear maiden now,” Gwen said. “Nothing could rattle her.”

Rowan grinned. “Would you like me to wash your cloak, bear maiden? The hem is covered in berry juice.”

It felt easy to hand the cloak over. She had been using it like a shield, but there was nothing to shield herself from anymore. It was a warm and sunny afternoon, with no need for thick cloaks. None of the shifters batted an eye at her naked body, for they were all nude themselves. And after conquering a ledge and facing a bear, what did she have to fear from being naked?

“I’ll get this back to you tonight,” Rowan said. “Do you need me to find you something to wear until then? I’m sure I could dig up an outfit somewhere.”

“I’ll be fine.” Sylvia smiled. “I’m already mostly covered in bandages, anyway.”

“Bandages? Are you hurt?” Jet strode up, and the shifters dispersed. Jasper remained by her side, looking uncomfortable.

“I’m fine,” she said. “Just got a little too familiar with a bear.”

“A mother bear, I heard.” Jet frowned, turning to Jasper. “And where were you?”

“On the other end of the canyon.” Jasper met his brother’s eyes, almost defiantly.

“And you thought it’d be funny to let Sylvia waltz into a bear family’s picnic?”

“I never thought there’d be anything bigger than a buck in there. We haven’t had bears around the canyon in months.”

“And did you think to use your nose, ears, or eyes before sending someone totally green into that thicket?”

“The wind was wrong, Alpha. And I didn’t see—”

“You didn’t check!”

“That would flush the game and defeat the entire purpose.” Jasper sounded strained. “You know that, Jet. It was an accident that could have happened to anyone—”

“Nothing would have happened if you’d been more careful. Or if you’d obeyed my wishes as Alpha.” Jet glared at both of them. “You’re both lucky she’s not dead.”

“But I’m fine,” Sylvia said, almost surprised at herself for speaking up. The tension in the air was palpable, and with Jet this forcefully furious, she could see how he could command a pack as Alpha. “It wasn’t Jasper’s fault—the bear was just protecting her cub.”

He gave her the strangest look, surprise mixed with anger, then swept out of the room.

Sylvia looked at Jasper, bewildered. “Did I say something wrong?”

He gave a soft laugh. “I’m not sure our Alpha quite knows what to do with you—despite his protests, he’s not used to anyone cutting him off mid-tirade.”

She looked at the doorway Jet had disappeared into. “Should I apologize?”

“Give it a while. Let him cool down.” He motioned for her to follow him. “Come on.”

“Are we going out to find more bears?”

He tried to hide a smile. “Not exactly.”

Jasper led her out of the den, stooping to grab a small bundle. But they didn’t go far once they’d passed through the curtain of roots—Jasper sat in a patch of shade, unfurling his bundle. A handful of thin knives with wooden handles rolled out.

“What are those for?” she asked.

“I’ll show you.” He pulled out three cubes of wood. “Which do you like best?”

She wondered if it was some kind of test. Was she supposed to be able to tell a difference between them? She pointed to the one in the middle.

“Good choice. It’s got a nice grain.” Jasper stowed the other two. Picking up a knife, he began to shave pieces from the wood.

“You’re a wood carver?”

“I wouldn’t go that far. I’m not hopeless, but I’m nowhere near mastery, either.” He nodded toward the knives. “These were my grandfather’s. He’s the one who carved out our den.”

She watched, fascinated, as pieces of wood fell to the ground. For all his modesty, his strokes were quick and sure. “What are you making?”

“I cut where the wood tells me. You can’t force anything out. But whatever’s inside, I’ll find it.”

“So you don’t know what you’re carving?”

They sat for a moment, silent except for the sound of Jasper’s knives eating away the wood. A soft breeze kept them cool, swirling over the stone walls. She sat back, lazily letting time pass by, for once not worried about much at all. A beetle trundled over the wood shavings, then over Jasper’s foot. He didn't seem to notice, lost in his carving.

Sylvia smiled. She felt just as lost in Jasper's determined expression, the muscles rippling in his arms. His golden eyes were focused on his work, but she still felt like he was fully present with her, as no one had been before.

She wondered if she would ever see his brother so calm.

"Is Jet mad at me?" she asked.

Jasper didn't look up from his work. "I think he's mad at me—he usually is. And I never should have let a mother bear get that close to you."

"What happened wasn't your fault."

"It was." He sighed, putting down his knife. "I should have listened to Jet. He's right most of the time, or he wouldn't be Alpha. It's just that, when he's wrong..." Jasper trailed off.

"Don't blame yourself. That bear was just protecting her cub."

"But I should have been protecting you."

Sylvia bit her lip. She shouldn't have said anything.

"Of course," Jasper said, "I'm not sure I could have scared off a bear with quite so much style." He set the knife back against the wood, carving out another chunk. "I guess both of us need to come to terms with the fact that you can save yourself." He pulled the knife over the wood, removing long, curling shavings. "Just give Jet some time. He'll come around eventually, don't worry."

She felt like she barely had time to blink before he made three more sweeping cuts, and was done.

"Here you go." He handed her the carving. A mother bear stood over her cub, one wooden paw raised protectively.

She turned it over, marveling. "How did you do that?"

Jasper shrugged. "That's what was inside."

Sylvia didn't want to take her eyes off the incredible carving. Reluctantly, she held it out to its creator.

"Keep it," he said.

"Are you sure?"

"Who else could it be for?"

She clutched the bears to her chest, astonished. "I wish I had something to thank you with."

"I don't need anything." Jasper put his tools away. "I just want you to be—"

But she never found out what he wanted her to be, because she leaned over and kissed him. His eyes were wide with shock, but his lips were soft, inviting. She grinned. His lips felt so right against hers. Having overcome his initial surprise, he leaned into the kiss, and put an arm around her.

This was bliss. This was where she was supposed to be.

There was a crash behind them. They both whirled. Jet stood there, a tray on the ground and broken plates at his feet. He stared at them for a long moment, then turned, retreating into the den.

Sylvia stared after him, her stomach sinking. If he hadn't been mad before, he definitely was now.

Chapter 6

Jet flew up the stairs, then out a hidden door and into the sunshine. The puffy clouds seemed to be mocking him. Shifting, he raced through the forest, away from the canyon. Jasper had put Sylvia in harm's way. Jasper hadn't listened to him. And Jasper got a kiss.

He dug his claws into the earth, determined to put some good distance between him and the den. He didn't want anyone coming after him, especially not Jasper, bringing fake concern and false pity.

But why should he care? Sylvia was free to do what she wished, and it wasn't like Jasper would listen to him, Alpha or no. The two of them could do as they pleased. They could kiss, until it led to more, then find a quiet spot—

A growl tore from his throat. Why was he so upset? He had never been this annoyed with his brother, and he couldn't put his paw on the reason. Sylvia fascinated and infuriated him. She was the most beautiful human he had ever met, but she seemed oblivious to real danger. And in the end, she was nothing more than human, as weak and frail as the rest of them. She was no match for a bear, a vampire, or even an angry sparrow.

He pushed himself onward, faster and faster. She was only human. So why couldn't he stop thinking about her?

A doe burst out of the trees in front of him, alarmed by his scent. Her tail flashed white, like a flag of surrender. She leapt away, hooves throwing dirt and moss.

Well, he wouldn't let her surrender. Where had she been earlier? The doe should have been in the thicket, not a bear. Sylvia never should have been in danger. Snarling, Jet bounded after the doe.

She kicked at him, sharp hooves flying by his ear. He ducked, making sure to keep his footing. The doe stared at him, eyes rolling, before surging away again. Jet followed, unwavering. The doe would be his.

All it took was a single misstep, like it always did, like he kept warning them about. The doe faltered, and he was on her. Latching onto her hind leg, he brought her down. The motion was practiced, and her neck snapped as she fell. It was quick and clean, the way he liked it.

Jet stood over the carcass, breathing heavily. He would not fail in his hunts. He needed to put no one else in danger.

And yet... It flashed into his mind again, the sight of Sylvia, her lips locked with his traitorous brother's. Jet shifted, putting his hands over his eyes. None of it mattered—his hunting prowess, his commands, his title of Alpha. It had taken him too long to realize that the woman might mean something to him, and another shifter had taken her.

It was just salt in the wound that the other shifter happened to be his younger brother.

Gritting his teeth, he pulled the deer onto his shoulders. Jet shifted again, not caring about the hot blood that stained his fur. Turning, he padded back toward the den.

What should he do now? What could he do? Kick Jasper out of the pack? That would be a great way to lose Sylvia as well, just like he'd lost Juniper.

Jet closed his eyes. Why was he so miserable at this? Should he leave the pack to their own devices? Were they all better off without him?

He sighed. It had always been so easy for him to do what was needed, to lead the pack despite the occasional objections and complaints. He had thought that nothing mattered compared to being Alpha. He thought that he had achieved everything he'd ever wanted, that nothing else could make him happier than his position.

He had been wrong.

Jet took the long way back to the den, dragging the doe through the canyon. He braced himself as the oak came into view, preparing for the sight of Jasper and Sylvia locked together again. But they were gone.

"A doe?" Rowan, accompanied by Fable, walked out to meet him. "But you weren't even on hunting duty today."

Jet shifted. "I do my duty to the pack, no matter what day it is."

As he dumped the doe off his back, he saw Rowan and Fable exchange a worried look.

"Let us take care of this, Alpha," Fable said.

"Yeah," Rowan added. "Why don't you go get washed up? Otherwise you'll drip blood into the den."

They took the doe aside and began to dress it. Jet watched them, annoyed. They were both treating him like he was a quail egg, fragile and breakable. It wasn't like Rowan to let such a perfect opportunity pass to hound him about Juniper, how it was all his fault and why he shouldn't chase after her. Instead, she had taken a burden off his paws.

Because she knew. Jet looked into the den and saw other shifters watching him from the shadows. They all knew that he had wanted Sylvia, that she had chosen another. And they pitied him. They all did. Like he was weak.

Biting back a snarl, Jet shifted again. He would go to the river to wash, but not because Rowan told him to. He needed some time away from everyone.

Loping back out of the canyon, Jet made his way toward the water. Warblers called from among the reeds, and the wind whispered through the rushes. Jet felt himself breathe easier. This was exactly what he needed. Taking a flying leap, he splashed into the river.

Someone let out a gasp. “Jet?”

It was Sylvia, hidden among the reeds.

“You scared me. For a second I thought an actual wolf was jumping in here with me.”

She swam over to him, her body hidden under the water. Her hair was damp, and she was looking radiant.

Jet shifted, trying to hide his annoyance. He couldn’t even bathe without having what he’d lost rubbed in his face? “I didn’t mean to startle you. I can go.”

“Don’t.” She reached out to grab his arm.

He felt himself flush. This was all just ridiculous. An Alpha should have more control.

By the way things were going under the waterline, all control had been lost. He bent his knees, hoping the darker water would conceal his growing ardor.

“I won’t bother you. I’m sure you want to be alone.” Or with Jasper.

“I want to be with you.” She swam over to him, her hazel eyes unbearably close. They reflected the greens and browns of the river, and he had never seen anything more stunning.

“Rowan gave me this.” Sylvia held up an oilcloth bag. “She said it’s full of soap sand, but I’m not sure how to use it. Can you help me?”

She held the bag out to him. How could he refuse? She was entrancing. It was hard to forget that she had chosen someone else, that he couldn’t have her... She swept her wet hair over her shoulders, droplets of river water dotting her arms.

Jet poured some sand into his palm, struggling to remember how to speak. Somehow, she had completely transformed from the moment they’d met. She’d been afraid, meek, quiet. But she stood before him self-assured and vibrant, seeming to know exactly what she wanted, which was for Jet to help wash her naked body. But hadn’t she chosen Jasper? He was so confused.

“Are you sure you want my help?” he asked. “I could tell you how to do it yourself.”

She smiled over her shoulder. “You aren’t going to make me ask again, are you?”

Jet swallowed, his throat suddenly dry, then rubbed the sand into her shoulder. She exhaled, leaning into his touch. Jet hoped she wouldn’t lean too far, or she’d discover more than she might bargain for under the water.

He dipped his hand into the water, wetting the sand, and started massaging it into her arms. Sylvia’s eyes were closed, and she seemed totally at peace.

Jet’s mind was raging. Should he be doing this? What if she was soon to be bound to Jasper? He wished he could have her, but he would never betray his brother, not even for his fated mate.

She is, you know, his wolf said inside him.

Jet froze.

“Is everything okay?” Sylvia asked.

“Yes. Just getting more sand.” He upended the bag, dumping half of the sand into the water before he could stem the flow. Had his wolf gone mad? There was no such thing as fate.

You don't have to believe it. She's still our mate, though.

"Can you put that stuff in my hair?" Sylvia asked. Her voice was like music. He had noticed when they'd met, but he hadn't realized how much he needed to hear it.

"Sure." He remembered that she'd asked a question. "Just keep your eyes closed. You don't want any to get in there."

Jet brought his sandy hands up, running them through her hair. She smiled, moving closer to him. His heart beat in his throat. What was she thinking? Did she not know how much he needed her? How much his wolf needed her?

Inside, he felt nothing but a glow of contentment from his wolf.

The creature must be mad. She wasn't theirs!

Stop worrying. Our mate knows us.

Jet rubbed his face with a wet hand. There was no talking to the beast. He'd just concentrate on Sylvia. It wasn't like it was hard.

The afternoon sun made her creamy skin glow, and her hair glinted with strands of bronze and gold. Jet sighed. She was gorgeous. But not for him.

"If you lie back, you can rinse the sand out," he heard himself saying.

She brought up her feet, letting herself float on the water. Droplets cascaded down the curves of her breasts, and he tried not to stare.

"Did I rinse it all out?" Sylvia's hair formed a cloud around her head.

"Mostly. You might have to dive under to get it all."

"Will you come with me?" She reached out to grasp his hand.

Jet hoped she couldn't feel his racing pulse. "On three," he said. "One... Two... Three."

They both ducked under the water.

She shook out her hair, the lazy current playing with it. Opening her eyes, she looked at him. She was totally naked before him, the river lending her a greenish tinge. Her hair was wild, her eyes alight. She had never looked more beautiful. A string of bubbles escaped from her mouth. He had never wanted to kiss anyone more in his life.

But he couldn't.

Sylvia kicked up, breaking the surface, and he followed.

"Why were you looking at me like that?" Her wet hair dripped down her back, and water clung to her every curve.

He wished he weren't grinning so stupidly. He couldn't think of anything to say, so he plucked a flower from a nearby waterlily and placed it in her hair.

Sylvia put a hand up to it. Jet held his breath. He'd never been compelled to do anything like that before.

Turning to him, she gave him a gorgeous smile.

He could feel his resolve melting. How was this human holding such sway over him?

She swam closer, right into his arms. Jet held her close. She felt so perfect there, so right. Tilting her head up, she kissed him.

She was air and light. An eagle on the wind. A cool breeze on a sweltering day. And her lips were the sweetest thing he'd ever tasted.

His hands traced her back, her shoulder blades. His fingers ran through her damp hair of their own accord. He wanted to draw her closer, closer, until she was part of him.

Jet forced himself to break away. He gazed at her, panting.

"I thought you liked Jasper."

"I do."

Damn those bewitching hazel eyes. "You can't like me too. You have to choose."

"Why?"

On the bank, the rushes parted. Jasper stood there, the absolute last person Jet wanted to see in this moment. He stepped away from Sylvia, letting the river flow between them. He felt like a pup that had been caught sneaking meat before dinner, and he resented that it was his little brother making him feel that way.

Jasper waved to them both, then hopped in. Cutting gracefully through the water, he swam over to them. Jet scowled. He didn't have to show off.

"Did you see that?" Jet asked warily.

"Your kiss? I did." Jasper grinned. "Nice, wasn't it?"

He would have preferred his brother to be angry. Was Jasper planning to try and drown him if he turned his back?

"All right." It was best to lay everything out in the open. "I know you're mad, Jasper. There's no need to pretend otherwise."

"I'm not mad."

Jet stared at him. What was his game here?

"I'm serious, Jet. Sylvia and I have already talked about it. She likes both of us. We'll both just have to accept it."

"What?" He couldn't be hearing right. Had he gotten water in his ears?

"You both found me," Sylvia said. "You both make me feel safe. I want both of you."

The thought of sharing her made annoyance flare within him. "You can't have both of us. You have to choose."

"Come on, Jet," his brother said. "Tell me, does your wolf really have a problem with it?"

As long as we have our mate, nothing else matters.

They were insane, all of them. He turned to Sylvia. "How would this even work?"

She took him by the hand. "Let me show you..."

When Sylvia reached out to take his brother's hand, Jet's wolf barely stirred. Jet found himself caring less that she wanted both of them. He wanted her, needed her. Nothing else mattered.

She made them follow her onto the bank, had them lie with her in the tall grass. Rolling onto her side, she laid a hand over her hip. The motion seemed to put a spell over him. He rose to his knees beside her, hardly daring to believe she could be his. Bending low, he put his lips on her shoulder.

He was going to claim his mate.

Chapter 7

Sylvia lay back in the long grass, her damp hair heavy around her shoulders. Jet knelt at her right, Jasper at her left, their eyes molten gold. With them beside her, she feared nothing.

The sky above was a deep blue that could only be held by a summer afternoon. Birds called, insects hummed, and her men bent to kiss her.

A shiver ran through her, from her toes all the way to her crown. In this moment, she was the luckiest woman on earth.

Jet put gentle fingers near her face, softly pushing her hair away so he could kiss her neck. Jasper's lips roved over her belly and thighs, making her laugh with delight.

She knew one thing—today was going to be unforgettable.

Slipping a hand behind her head, Jet put his lips to hers. She responded greedily, wanting more of him. With her tongue, she traced the line of his lips, making him shudder. She suppressed a smile. He was hers. They were both hers.

Farther down, Jasper slid a hand beneath her ass, giving it a light squeeze. Sylvia was pleasantly powerless as he straddled her, putting a finger between her legs. She moaned as he felt the wetness within, wetness that had been called forth by him and Jet, not left by the river.

Jasper moved his finger back and forth, lightly stroking her. His touch sent ripples of delight through her, ripples that she was sure Jet could feel. He gripped her more tightly, kissed her more fervently. And she could see them both growing harder. Closing her eyes, she leaned her head back.

Jasper's breath was growing ragged. He slid a finger into her, then two. Sylvia moaned into Jet's mouth. It still wasn't enough, not quite enough... She wanted more.

Seeming to sense her needs, Jasper bent over her. Spreading her legs, he lay in the space between them. As he set his tongue to her flesh, Sylvia cried out. It felt like she would never be the same.

Jet moved down her body, his tongue flickering over her breasts, forming whorls as he moved closer to their center. His tongue and Jasper's seemed to work in time, both sending waves of sensation through her that crashed when they met, melding into a paroxysms of pleasure.

Sylvia tried to keep herself still and under control, but they continued until she could no longer feel the grass beneath her. Jasper's strong hands grabbed her hips, holding them tight to keep her from bucking. His tongue ran over her like a flame, and she loved the heat. It seared her, branded her, and she wordlessly cried out for more.

He knew what she needed—he'd always known what she needed. Jasper mounted her, easing his hard cock deep into her wetness. Jet ran his hands through her hair, tethering her to the earth as Jasper pushed deeper, so deliciously tight inside her. Jet's lips brushed her neck, her collarbones. He whispered in her ear, telling her what he was going to do to her, the descriptions so lush and detailed that she had to remember to breathe.

Jasper clutched her waist, his fingers spasming over her skin as he buried himself in her. Sylvia wrapped her legs around him, pulling him closer, urging him deeper. He looked up at her, his golden eyes locking with hers, his gaze somehow even more erotic than his touch. He stared at her like she was an oasis in the desert, a ship to one lost at sea.

Sylvia pulled him closer, her thigh muscles burning. She would give him and Jet everything, mind, body, and soul.

His eyes never leaving hers, Jasper pumped in and out. His every thrust sent her spiraling higher as bliss surged through her. She never wanted him to stop.

But he did, shuddering. "I'm sorry, my love," he said, kissing her above the ear, "but I want to last longer for you."

Before she could ask what he meant, Jet had picked her up and set her on all fours. "Are you ready for more?" he murmured.

She could only moan in response.

Jet positioned himself behind her, his cock brushing the backs of her thighs. Sylvia tingled with anticipation as Jasper gathered her hair and draped it down her back.

Then Jet grabbed her hips, and thrust.

Stars burst behind her eyelids. He seemed to drive all the breath from her body, all the power from her limbs. Leaning in to kiss her, Jasper helped her remain upright. He cupped her breasts in his hands, stroking them, as Jet plunged into her. Jasper's hands traveled over her, his touch electric. Jet's hands were firm on her hips, pulling her forever closer.

Bending her head, she moaned, their caresses blurring together until she couldn't tell where one man ended and the other began. And it didn't matter, because they both belonged to her, and she to them. They filled her with strength, and she had the power to face any foe with them by her side.

Sylvia opened her eyes to find Jasper kneeling in front of her. His cock was hard, and at eye level. Reaching out with one hand, she drew him closer. He had taken good care of her, and she needed to return the favor.

Jet was still pulsing into her as she licked the long length of Jasper's shaft. He closed his eyes, and his cock throbbed under her tongue. She grinned. He needed her now. Opening her mouth, she took him in.

Jasper groaned as Sylvia's lips traveled down his shaft, until he was deep in her throat. He pulled back, then plunged in again, and she reveled in how she could make his abs jump, make the muscles in his legs twitch. Putting her hands on his waist, she drew him in closer, urging him to thrust faster, faster.

Jasper groaned again, and Jet let out an answering moan. Their peaking arousal made her shudder, and all three of them felt it. On either side, her men thrust harder. Sylvia held tight to Jasper, wanting to anchor to something as the world dissolved around her in a kaleidoscope of colors. She was full of her mates, full of life. She never wanted this feeling to end. She wanted it to go on, unbroken, this perfect day by the river.

They thrust into her at the same time, and it was too much. Crying out, they emptied into her. Sylvia reached down to grip the grass, determined to hang on to the world as she was rocked by more pleasure than she'd ever felt before. It rolled through her like an ocean wave, and she was powerless before it. All she could do was hold fast and not get swept out to sea.

She came back to earth, gasping, her knuckles white as she clutched the long grasses. Her shaking limbs gave way, and she collapsed. Jet and Jasper lay on either side of her, draping their arms over her shoulders and waist.

"Sylvia," Jet murmured.

"Our mate," Jasper said.

Sylvia closed her eyes, completely content, warm in their embrace as the river meandered past.

"Alpha. Alpha!"

Sylvia sat, feeling slightly groggy. When had they fallen asleep?

"Hawke?" Beside her, Jasper rubbed his eyes.

Jet looked up at the shifter who stood over them. "I thought you were supposed to be patrolling the eastern border."

"I was." The shifter, lean with straw-colored hair, seemed agitated. "Dakota told me to find you. Someone wants to cross into our territory."

Jet stood with a snarl. "Who is it?"

"A man... we're not entirely sure. He wouldn't give his name." Hawke hesitated, glancing at Sylvia. "He's asking for her."

She felt her stomach drop, her heart go cold.

"He asked for her?" Jasper repeated. "By name?"

"Not exactly." Hawke glanced back over his shoulder, as if he feared someone might be following him. "He asked if a woman on the run had been through here. He didn't believe us when we said no." Hawke bit his lip. "I don't think he's human."

Sylvia put her head between her knees, the waterlily falling from her hair. She left it where it fell, her heart racing. This was it. Everything was over. It was time to run.

"Breathe." Jasper grabbed her hand, but his voice seemed to come from the bottom of the river. "We're here. We won't let him hurt you."

She knelt, putting her forehead to the grass, agony washing over her. He spoke like he had a choice, like he could prevent anything. She had been so selfish. She had wanted someone to protect her, someone to keep her safe. But no one would be able to. All she had succeeded in doing was dooming their pack.

Steeling herself, she took in a gulp of air. “I’m going.” She stood, not allowing Jet or Jasper to help her up. “I’m leaving. Don’t stall him, it’s too dangerous.”

“Stop talking like that.” Jet gripped her by the shoulders. “You’re part of our pack. We’re not leaving you to fend for yourself.”

“We can face him,” Jasper said, “together. We’re not afraid, Sylvia.”

They should be. Oh, they should.

Her mouth felt like it was filled with sawdust. Her lungs didn’t seem to be working. She had to make a decision. They wouldn’t let her run, and she couldn’t let them die for her.

But there was another choice.

“We’ll face him,” she said. “Tell him of your pack, and that may make him turn away.”

“Are you sure?” Jasper asked.

Jet looked at her, his eyes narrowed. She tried to keep her face expressionless. He had to believe her.

“I’m sure.” She looked into Jet’s golden eyes. “Are you, Alpha?”

He gazed at her for a long moment. “Let’s get this over with,” he said. “Dakota’s still at the border, right?”

Hawke nodded. “If she’s held him.”

Sylvia tried not to shudder.

“All right,” Jet said. “If all of us go, then that’s four shifters against one. I’d like to turn him away without getting the entire pack involved. Does that sound good, Jasper?”

He nodded. “I’m ready. We’ll face him together, Sylvia.”

Jet knelt down. “Get on my back,” he said.

Sylvia swung a leg over him and had barely settled herself when he shifted. She surveyed the land astride a great black wolf. But she didn’t feel strong, or powerful. She felt like they were about to walk into a trap.

In a way, they were. But it would be a trap of her choosing. She would bargain with him, make him agree to spare Jet, Jasper, and the pack if she went quietly. He would agree—after all, how many times had he told her not to make a scene? Jet and Jasper would not agree, but they would have no other choice. If he was merciful, he might leave them with no memory of her at all.

Like I never happened. Sylvia clutched two handfuls of Jet’s fur to keep herself from shaking. She must let him think that everything was okay, that they could beat the man who hunted her. If she gave the game away, everyone in the Oak Canyon pack could die.

She would save them all. Even if it cost her everything.

Jasper and Hawke had shifted too, and the three wolves sprang forward. Jet led them toward the eastern border. Her heart pounded as they raced through the trees. The sun was sinking, light fading from the world. It felt like her hope was waning with it, waiting to be extinguished by the night.

There would be no more sunrises for her.

She closed her eyes as they got closer, not bothering to duck as branches whipped at her face. They didn't hurt her. Not compared to what he would do.

Jet slowed, and the others followed suit. They must be near the border. Sylvia slid off his back.

He turned, observing her with golden eyes. Jet made a magnificent wolf, black but for a white patch on his chest. Her heart tightened. Would this be the last time she'd see him?

Jet shifted. "I know what you plan to do."

She crossed her arms.

"You can't give yourself up, Sylvia. We'll fight for you. The whole pack will."

"It won't be enough," she whispered.

"Give us a chance?" He clutched her hand. "I can't lose you."

"Jet?" The call came through the woods. "Is that you?"

Despite the distance, they could hear Dakota's voice tremble.

"We're coming," Jet shouted. He gripped Sylvia's hand, eyes like steel. "You can run," he said. "Jasper can take you away."

She shook her head. "I'll face him."

Her mates exchanged a worried glance, like they both feared she'd break down. And she would. Just not yet.

Clenching her fists, she walked forward.

Jet, Jasper, and Hawke hurried to catch up.

They came to the edge of a small rise. Below, Dakota stood facing a man in a dark cloak. His face was covered by a hood, and no skin showed.

"Vampire," Jasper muttered.

Sylvia's legs almost gave way.

"I've got you." Jet grabbed her arm. "Don't be afraid."

"I'm not." The relief that flooded through her made her feel lightheaded. "That's not him."

"What?" Jasper stared. "I thought a vampire was after you."

"He is. But I'm not afraid of him. He's a kitten compared to his master."

"There you are." The vampire's voice had a whining edge. "Are you done playing your little game yet?"

"Hello, Dario."

The sun sank behind the mountains, and Dario pulled off his hood. Red eyes gleamed in his pale face. "There may still be time to return before the master finds out you were missing. Come back with me, and you can spare us both."

"She's not coming with you!" Jet barreled down the hill, halting right in front of Dario.

The vampire didn't blink. "Your furry friends can't save you. But you already know that."

"You think I can't fight you?" Jet snarled. "Sylvia is under our protection now."

"Very nice." Dario sounded bored. "I can't wait all night for an answer. We need to leave now to hope to beat him back."

Sylvia walked forward.

"Don't go," Jasper whispered, glued to her side. "We'll think of something. We'll make a plan."

She put a hand over the inside of her elbow, remembering the agony Dario had put her through. The fangs weren't the worst part—they stung, but only for an instant. It was the paralysis, the helplessness. And then the sucking, the insatiable sucking, and the fear that he might not ever stop, might leave her a carcass drained of blood.

Sylvia bit the inside of her cheek, willing herself not to shudder, not to show weakness. Stopping beside Jet, she stood before her former captor. Now that she was faced with the prospect of walking alone through the woods with him, letting him return her to his master, she couldn't go through with it. Her best hope would be that he bled her out on the journey back.

"Are you ready?" Dario asked. "Don't make me ask again."

"I'm never going back."

On either side of her, her mates stood straighter, daring Dario to protest.

"So that's what you want to do, you want to anger him?" The vampire arched an eyebrow. "You know as well as I how he'll react. Are these your new friends?" He swept a scathing glance over the shifters. "If you want us all to remain alive to see the autumn, I suggest you come with me."

She swallowed hard. "No."

"Fine." He inspected his fingernails. "It won't be my funeral." Dario turned to go.

"Wait," Jet said. "Who is he? Your master?"

The vampire shivered. "Pray you never learn his name. But he will break you. All of you. Easily."

Silence descended over the clearing. It was as if the forest itself held its breath.

"I'll be going now." Dario put his hood back up. "It was nice meeting you." With one last look at Sylvia, he walked into the trees and vanished.

Jet watched him go, looking like he wanted to follow and rip him apart. Finally, he tore his gaze away. "Let's get back to the den."

The five of them strode back, Dakota and Hawke occasionally throwing furtive glances over their shoulders. Sylvia wasn't afraid. She knew Dario wouldn't bother following them. He had bigger things to worry about.

"Why must you carry on so?" The voice was like a snake in her mind. She shook her head, willing it to go away. They must be able to outrun or outsmart him somehow. Together, they could think of a plan. How many days had it been since she'd escaped? Surely they had a little more time...

"You were my guest once. You will be my guest again. Forever, this time."

She clapped her hands over her ears. She couldn't let his voice inside her head, not even for a second. That was how it started, right after he pulled you under with those bright green eyes. With those eyes, and that voice, he could convince a mouse to climb into a hungry lion's mouth.

She felt her steely resolve crumble. This was all a mistake, one huge, terrible mistake. She felt herself losing control, little by little, then all at once. She couldn't breathe enough air, she was drowning, her legs were folding under her—

“Sylvia, what's wrong?” Jet and Jasper were kneeling beside her.

“Bring him back.” She clutched Jet's arm, her words reaching a hysterical pitch. “Find Dario, and tell him I'll go. If I don't go, it'll be all my fault.”

Jasper smoothed her hair. “It'll be okay,” he said. “Don't worry.”

“I won't worry. I won't worry when you bring Dario back.”

Jet looked at Jasper, who nodded. Quickly, the Alpha scooped her up.

“No,” she begged, reaching back the way they'd come. “I need him. We all need him. It's the only way you'll be safe.”

“We want you to be safe,” Jet said.

“Put me down!” Furiously, she tried to wriggle out of his arms. “You don't know who you're dealing with.”

“Sylvia, no!”

She twisted from his grip, and fell to the ground. Jumping to her feet, she set off running. She didn't expect Jasper to tackle her. They both hit the forest floor, sprawling in the dirt.

“Come back to the den,” Jasper pleaded. “Just for tonight. You're tired, stressed—in no condition to make grand plans. We'll figure out what to do tomorrow.”

Sylvia sobbed.

Jet put a hand on her knee. “Let us help you,” he said.

“Help me?” She rubbed a hand under her running nose. “How?”

“Let us Bite you—you can be one of the pack, a shifter. Stronger, faster. He won't be able to hurt you.”

Tears welled again. “But he will.”

“How? How is he so bad? Tell me.”

She could see it so clearly, the snakes writhing and twisting. “He can... he can make you do things.”

“Like what?”

Sylvia closed her eyes. “Whatever he wants.”

Chapter 8

They sat around the fire eating venison, but Sylvia could barely taste the meat. The pack was all gathered, and the meal was a quiet, tense affair. She wanted to leap onto the table, to shout at them, to demand to know why they were even bothering. He was coming, and there was nothing they could do to stop him.

“Stop it,” Jet murmured. “I know you’re thinking of running, or giving yourself up. Neither of those is an option.”

She bit back a laugh. He was right. When the time came, she wouldn’t have a choice at all.

“The Bite will solve everything,” Jet said. “What could hurt you as a wolf?”

Sylvia set her venison down. She couldn’t stomach any more.

“That’s a terrible idea,” Jasper said. “What if she doesn’t survive the Turn?”

She bit her lip to keep from blurting out that it didn’t matter either way.

“She’s strong,” Jet insisted. “She’d survive.”

Compared to what was after her, a shifter’s Bite wasn’t scary at all.

On the canyon rim, Clay yipped. But the sentry’s bark was cut short.

Within seconds, everyone was on their feet. Sylvia stood slowly, not bothering to reach for weapons as the others had. They’d find out soon enough that resisting was useless.

They waited long minutes, staring into the darkness. Icy dread seeped through her. It was all over.

There was a scuffling of pebbles over rock. Clay appeared around a bend, leading a tall man. The pack seemed to relax, but they hadn’t yet noticed that Clay’s arms were slack and his eyes blank, that he was responding to other orders now.

A wave of despair washed over her. He was here.

Jasper peered at the man who walked behind Clay. He didn’t like how Clay had abandoned his post, or how the man seemed to be using him as a shield. Something about the situation set his teeth on edge.

Beside him, Sylvia had gone rigid. Her hands shook, and she didn’t seem to be breathing. She stared down the canyon, naked fear in her gaze.

She took in a shuddering breath. “You should have let me run.”

Jasper shifted, hoping his wolf form could comfort her, and intimidate their visitor. But the man hardly seemed to notice him, or care that he was walking into a den of angry shifters. He was tall and lanky, his long hair was drawn back, and he moved with a swagger that indicated he had little need to fear much at all.

The stranger stopped ten paces from the fire, and Clay halted too. The sentry looked straight ahead, as if he didn’t recognize any of his fellow packmates.

Jet tensed, letting out a snarl. The stranger didn’t even glance at him. He merely rolled up the sleeves of his blue robe, which was strewn with stars and could have been made of night. He only had eyes for one person.

“Hello, Sophie,” he said softly.

She screamed, a terrible sound that seemed to rend the air around them.

“Hush,” the stranger said.

Sylvia did, instantly, sending chills down Jasper’s spine.

“I leave you for a week,” the man said, “in the best of care, and this is how you repay me? After all I’ve done for you, Sophie?”

She let out a dry sob. “You left me with D-Dario. You knew what he’d d-do to me.”

“He kept you safe. And for a tiny payment. What’s a little blood loss compared to your safety, my dear?” His words were like caramel, soothing and sweet. Jasper shook himself to keep from being lulled by them.

“But you ran away.” The stranger advanced. “From me, after everything I’ve given you. I’m not done with you, Sophie, and your desertion just proves that. I promised you that I was going to break you. You won’t make me break my promise too, will you?”

Rowan stepped forward, growling. “Leave this place while you still can.”

He whipped around to look at her, the fire seeming to grow in his eyes. “This does not concern you.”

She stepped back, and sat calmly. Around her, the rest of the pack relaxed.

Jasper felt queasy. This was an extremely powerful sorcerer. Could he make them do whatever he wanted? Had Sophie been right?

Sylvia! He snarled to himself. Her name is Sylvia. Don’t let his words poison your mind.

“What was our one rule?” The sorcerer’s words echoed off the canyon walls. “The only rule you needed to follow to guarantee that I would never irreparably harm you?”

She stared into his green eyes, like she couldn’t help herself. “Never run away.”

“And so... it’s time to surrender to me once more.”

She held out a hand to him, and he moved forward to seize it.

“No!” Roaring, Jet leapt at him.

The sorcerer raised a hand. “Halt!”

Jet stood frozen, his face caught in a silent scream.

The sorcerer wanted Jasper’s mate. But he couldn’t have her. He wouldn’t. Surging forward, Jasper lunged at him.

“Stop. Stop!”

For a second, he saw fear in the sorcerer’s eyes. Jasper wondered if his commands had ever failed before. He hit him with his front paws, and they both went sprawling to the ground. Jasper put his jaws on his throat, determined to bite down before his foe could pull out another kind of weapon.

The man glared up at him. “I wouldn’t recommend that,” he croaked.

Jasper’s anger flared. He bared his fangs, daring him to speak again.

The sorcerer pointed toward the fire.

Against his better judgment, Jasper looked. What he saw made his blood run cold. Sylvia was holding a knife to her throat.

“If this mutt spills my blood,” the sorcerer said, “you will spill yours.”

Her eyes were blank as she nodded. The knife was steady in her hand.

Jasper whimpered.

The sorcerer pushed him aside. “What will it be, wolf?”

He looked between his foe and his mate. There had to be something he could do, something to fix this. If only Jet had shifted. But his brother was slumped against a canyon wall, looking completely docile.

“Do I need to have her give herself an interesting scar before I can persuade you?” The sorcerer raised his hand, and Sylvia pressed the point to her throat. “I’d hate to ruin such a pretty neck, but if that’s what you want...”

She pressed too hard, and a droplet of blood gleamed on the blade’s tip. Sylvia didn’t seem to notice.

Jasper backed away, his head low to the ground. He had never felt so helpless.

The sorcerer moved forward to grab Sylvia’s hand, but didn’t let her remove the knife from her throat.

“That’s better,” he said, pulling her away. “I don’t normally negotiate with animals. Next time, I won’t. Stay in your pathetic little playground and I won’t have your pack put themselves down.”

All around him, shifters raised their dinner knives to their stomachs.

The sorcerer, Sylvia’s hand in his, backed out of the canyon until he was untouched by the fire’s light. Jasper looked anxiously between the retreating figures and his pack, who all still held their weapons at the ready. He had the terrible feeling that the sorcerer would make them all slaughter themselves at the last second.

Jasper couldn’t take it anymore. He shifted. “Let them go!” he called.

A sinister chuckle crept out of the night. "They can stay."

Around him, the pack slowly lowered their weapons. Jasper let out a breath.

"You will come."

Darkness descended as he stepped toward the sorcerer.

Sylvia woke in a familiar high-backed chair. She tried to rise, but her limbs were manacled to its arms and legs.

"No," she said. "No, no, NO!"

"Awake again?"

She wanted to weep, because it was his voice, the one sound she never wanted to hear again. And he was here, his hand on her shoulder once more. He'd dressed her in fine silks, but she wanted nothing more than to fling the finery off and burn it.

"Did you have a pleasant dream?"

Sylvia threw herself against her bonds, making the chair swing around. She didn't plan to sit here and let him play his sick little games. She would face him.

He gazed down at her, delight in his green eyes. "You must have had a very good dream indeed. Dario said you tried to misbehave while I was away. Is it because you missed me?"

No. Oh no. He was going to make her forget. He was going to take Jet, Jasper, Rowan, all the others, all of Oak Canyon, and tell her that they'd never existed.

She clenched her fists. "I won't!"

He laughed coldly, tracing her arm. "You'll have to be more specific. There's so much you try to refuse me, my dove."

Sylvia wanted to reach up and slap that smirk off his face. "I won't forget them. Not ever. They mean too much to me."

"They do, do they?" He didn't seem angered by her defiance, only mildly amused. "You poor idiot." The sorcerer moved behind her chair, gripping its back. "Don't you know why you entrance me?"

She swallowed. She didn't want to know the answer.

"You're the only one who can resist me, even a little. And I love a good fight." He chuckled. "You won't forget them. Such innocence... What makes you think I'd ever want you to forget your friends?"

He clapped his hands, and Dario opened the doors to the chamber. The vampire walked in, followed by Jet and Jasper. They stopped in the center of the stone room, which was empty except for her chair. Bowing, Dario left.

"You should bow to me too," the sorcerer said to them. "Do so."

Obediently, they bowed.

Silent tears ran down Sylvia's face. Why did he have to take them too? Couldn't he have spared them? She had never wanted anyone else to get hurt.

This was her fault. All her fault.

She closed her eyes against what felt like an ocean of tears.

"Oh, Sophie, but you must watch. You won't want to miss this."

She turned her head away. He couldn't make her watch.

A rough hand grabbed her by the chin. "I feel like you aren't appreciating my hospitality, Sophie. You know what I do to ungrateful guests."

Sylvia looked at him, tears spilling down her cheeks. She hated how easily he could do this to her, how much he was reveling in her weakness. He was lucky the manacles held strong, because otherwise she would scratch out his eyes.

The sorcerer knelt beside her chair. "You see my new toys?"

Sensing his gaze, Jet and Jasper bowed again. Their glazed eyes made her want to weep anew.

"You know how generous I am, Sophie. Show her your presents, toys!"

Jet and Jasper held up gleaming silver daggers.

"The hilt is covered in leather," he said, "but it still must be agony for a shifter just to hold. Funny, don't you think?"

She closed her eyes again, unable to help the sob that escaped.

"I said, don't you think it's funny?" His hand was back on her chin, tighter this time. He gave her a firm shake. "If you're displeased, I can have them kill themselves now."

"No," she said, trying to keep the fear out of her words. "It's very funny."

"Good, good. I wouldn't want you to be having a bad time. That wouldn't make me a very considerate host, now would it?" He draped an arm over hers. "Now tell me, I'm having a hard time remembering—what's your name?"

The question made her stomach flip. She squeezed her eyes shut. She couldn't let him take that from her again. The last time he'd done it, he'd almost taken everything.

But if she answered wrong, Jet and Jasper would die.

Sylvia. Sylvia. You're Sylvia.

"Sophie," she said.

"Very good." He stroked her cheek, and it took everything she had not to shudder. "And what's my name, dove?"

She couldn't contain her overwhelming revulsion. A dry heave rolled through her at the thought of saying his name again. But she had to. "Ammon."

"Master Ammon." He sighed. "Are you even trying, Sophie? Do I need to give you a little more persuasion?"

He waved a hand, and Jasper knelt on the stone floor. Splaying his fingers, he pressed the knife to his pinky.

“No!” she screamed.

“Then who am I?” There was a dangerous edge to the sorcerer’s voice.

“Master Ammon,” she sobbed.

“And what’s your name?”

“Sophie.”

“Say it like you believe it.”

“Sophie!”

He smiled at her as she cried. “That’s better. You’ll get there, dove.”

Slowly, Jasper rose.

Sophie—Sylvia sniffled, wiping her nose on her silken sleeve. All around, candles flickered on the walls, looking perversely cheerful. Ammon sounded more gleeful than she’d ever heard him before. It was like he was pleased she had escaped, reveling in the fact that he got to break her again.

This time, she knew, he planned to extinguish all hope.

She looked at Jet and Jasper, trying to catch their eyes. They weren’t bound, except in their own minds. If they could just snap out of it, they could run. They needed to flee, to leave her behind. Ammon might even grow bored with them, and let them live. That was all she cared about—her mates living through this.

Run! She wanted to scream it at them. But their eyes never left Ammon’s face.

“Oh, my dove.” He took her hand, despite how she tried to scrabble away. With the manacle, she didn’t get far. “I’m so glad you’re back with me. You need to learn a lesson, though.” His bony fingers tightened around hers. “It’s partially my fault, because I never would have left if I thought I hadn’t broken you. So this time, you won’t be punished.”

Releasing her, he patted her hand. “I still want the lesson to stick. This should be a good reminder of why you will never run away again. I can’t bear the thought of you leaving me, Sophie darling.”

He leaned closer. “We’re about to have some fun,” he whispered. “But first, tell me again, what’s your name?”

“S-Sophie.”

“Sophie.”

“Louder.”

“Sophie!”

“That’s good, Sophie. I’ll check in again later.” He stroked her hair like she was some kind of dog. “We wouldn’t want you to forget your own name, now would we? That would be embarrassing.”

Sophie—Sylvia—Sophie watched him move closer to the center of the stone room. She leaned forward, straining against her bonds as he circled Jet and Jasper. They simply stood there, compliant and still.

Holding the rest of her body perfectly rigid, she tried to pull her hand from the manacle. It bit into her wrist, the slight looseness taunting her. She needed to protect her mates, needed to do something. How did Ammon intend to torture them?

The one thing she knew was that whatever he devised would be beyond her worst imagining.

“Look at these two.” Ammon held out his hands. “They were so eager to defend you.”

She forced herself to meet his gaze. They had defended her, done their best to protect her. But there was no protecting anyone from Ammon, and so they would die for her. She looked at the sorcerer, hatred welling inside her.

“What did you even see in these two?” He laughed, prodding the shifters toward her. “Did you think they loved you? Poor, deluded Sophie. No one could ever love someone as broken as you. No one but me.” He kissed her on the forehead, his lips cold as ice.

But his words weren’t true. They had loved her. And she had loved them. With her mates beside her, she didn’t feel broken at all.

Biting her lip, she looked into Jet and Jasper’s dead eyes, pretending that they were looking at her, not at Ammon. The sorcerer’s face shouldn’t be the last thing they saw. It wasn’t fair.

“Jet?” she whispered. “Jasper?” They had loved her—hadn’t they?

They didn’t even bother to turn their heads.

Ammon sniggered. “You still think they cared for you? Oh, Sophie. You’re too dear.” He turned to the shifters. “Did you love her, at all, ever?”

As one, Jet and Jasper turned to face her. Expressions impassive, they took three steps toward her. They were so close, yet so far. The total lack of recognition in their eyes made her heart ache.

“No.” They shook their heads. “We never loved you, Sophie.”

Her nails bit into the wooden arm of the chair. It wasn’t real. It couldn’t be real. They knew her name wasn’t Sophie.

But what was her name?

She thought frantically. Samantha. Sasha. Susan...

What other names were there? She could only remember Sophie. But that wasn’t hers.

She looked into Jet’s eyes. For a second, she thought she saw a spark of recognition.

Sylvia! Sylvia, Sylvia, Sylvia. She chanted it in her mind. Jet looked away. It must have just been a trick of the candlelight.

She might forget her name, but she’d never forget theirs. Not in a hundred years. Sylvia gritted her teeth. She’d give anything to be able to grab one of those knives, just for one second. Chained or not, she’d take care of Ammon.

Until he spoke one word. She slumped back in her chair. What could she do? All she knew was that she couldn’t let him kill her mates, couldn’t let him take her sanity.

What choice do you have?

Bitterly, she had to admit she had none.

“You seem so sad, Sophie.”

Sylvia, she corrected in her mind.

The sorcerer tilted her chin, making her look up at him. “I only want to entertain you. How about a game, Sophie?”

He clapped his hands, and the shifters returned to the center of the room. Ammon made a show of repositioning her chair so she had a full view of them.

“That’s perfect. Now, Sophie, what shall we have our toys do for us?”

“You’re going to make them kill each other,” she said dully. “Why don’t you get it over with?”

“Oh, Sophie.” He stroked the side of her face. “That’s not sporting at all, is it? I’ll give them a chance—whoever is left alive after thirty minutes can leave with his life and his memory.” He turned to the shifters. “Are you ready to fight?”

Silently, they lifted their weapons. From the way they looked at each other, it was clear that neither recognized themselves as brothers.

“Don’t do this!” she shouted. Ammon could punish her all he liked, but he couldn’t kill her mates. “Jet! Jasper! Listen to me!”

“Oh, don’t shout, my dove. You’ll go hoarse.” Ammon moved toward the door. “I won’t stay—I can’t stand the sight of blood. But I’ll be back to check on the winner.”

She knew that her eyes were red from crying, that she looked disheveled and not at all intimidating, but she glared at him all the same.

“Oh, I almost forgot.” Ambling back to her, he kissed the edge of her mouth. “Have fun, Sophie.”

Ammon walked out of the doors, letting the outer bar drop with a clang. She was locked inside with her murderous mates, left to watch as they circled each other, knives raised.

Chapter 9

“Jet,” she pleaded. “Jet!”
They ignored her, continuing to circle.
“Jasper! Stop!”

He stabbed toward Jet, testing his defenses. Jet growled, leaping back. For the attention they paid her, she might as well save her breath.

Sylvia refused to give up. She had absolutely nothing to work with, but she wouldn't let them kill each other. That was how Ammon intended this to end, with her beloved mates dead by each other's hands. He never intended for there to be one victor, just three losers.

Gritting her teeth, Sylvia threw her weight against one side of the chair. It swung forward an inch, scraping against the stone floor.

She looked forward, setting her jaw. All she had was her body. If she had to throw it between them to stop them, she would.

Sylvia threw herself against the other side of the chair, pain flaring in her ribs. But the chair rasped forward another inch. She pushed on, knowing that bruises must be blooming on her sides. She didn't care—all she cared about was getting to Jet and Jasper in time.

In the center of the room, Jasper charged. Jet brought up his knife, and their blades clashed. Sylvia winced. If she didn't move fast, it wouldn't matter that the chair would budge—Jet and Jasper were both attacking to kill.

Jet pounced on his brother, pinning him on the floor. Snarling, Jasper grabbed Jet's wrist, trying to keep the knife away from his throat.

The blade was so close—it touched skin, and Jasper shouted. Sylvia forced herself not to shut her eyes. She didn't want to topple over. She wouldn't be able to lift the heavy chair with all her limbs chained down. Once on the ground, she'd be completely useless.

Jasper kicked out, catching his brother in the stomach. Jet went flying, his blade leaving his hand. It clattered to the floor, far out of reach. Jasper looked between his brother and the fallen knife, an empty grin spreading over his face.

“Stop!” she cried. “Jasper, I love you. Put down your weapon!”

He moved toward Jet, looking more like a predator than she'd ever seen him.

“Jet, I love you. Please, stop this!”

Jet looked around, confusion in his eyes. For a second, their eyes met, and her heart soared. Jasper sprang forward, taking advantage of Jet’s momentary inattention to slash at his eyes. Jet ducked, the blade narrowly missing his face.

“Jasper, please! Stop!” She hurled herself against her chair, gaining another inch.

But Jasper didn’t stop, and the tenuous thread she’d established with Jet evaporated. Had it ever even existed, or had she only seen something she wished was there?

Jet charged at his brother, teeth bared, as if he forgot he didn’t have fangs. Jasper leapt out of the way, slicing as Jet passed. Jet fell, letting out a howl. He rose, clutching his arm. He’d been sliced from shoulder to elbow, and blood dripped from between his fingers.

“Jet,” she called, “come over here. Don’t fight him, just stay away from him.”

He looked down, found the knife by his feet. Bending low, he picked it up, then turned to Jasper.

“No!” Sylvia flung herself against the chair again and again, but it felt pointless. They were so far away. Even if she got closer, how could she ever reach them? By their expressions, neither would be satisfied until the other lay dead.

Sweat shone on their skin, and they both panted, but neither backed down. Jasper slashed, and Jet parried. Sylvia lurched closer. She could smell the sweat of the fighters. She just wished there was any way to make them stop.

Jet and Jasper faced each other, chests heaving, as Sylvia’s chair thudded into place between them.

“Stop this,” she said. “If any part of you can hear me, drop your weapons.”

They didn’t seem to see her. Jasper’s knife whistled by her ear, and Jet only dodged it at the last second. Snarling, Jet threw his own knife. It soared by her, sticking into Jasper’s shoulder. He stared at it as he collapsed on the stone.

Eyes gleaming, Jet moved in for the kill.

“No!” Sylvia threw herself and the chair in front of him. The chair partially shielded Jasper. “If you want to kill him, you’ll have to kill me too.”

Rage darkened his face as he approached. He leaned down, moving in for the kill, though she wasn’t sure if he intended to slay Jasper, her, or both of them.

Sylvia squeezed her eyes shut. She didn’t want to see Jet murder anyone.

You cannot kill our mate. The voice blazed in her mind. I will kill us first.

Gathering her courage, she cracked open one eye. Fur burst from Jet’s skin, his muscles swelling and transforming, until he stood before her as the huge black wolf. His golden eyes met hers, full of recognition, and she almost wept. Her Alpha was back.

“Jet?”

Lowering his head, he licked away her tears.

“Jet, what about Jasper?”

He shook his head. Carefully, he took the limbs of her chair in his jaws and crushed them, one by one.

Grimacing, Jet kicked Jasper's knife toward her. Sylvia picked it up and chopped at the chains. The silver blade made short work of them.

They both turned to look at Jasper, unconscious on the floor. Sylvia ran to his side. "He must have hit his head." Laying a hand on his fevered brow, she willed him to wake.

Jet leaned down, nuzzling his brother's head.

"Wake up, Jasper. You have to wake up."

He didn't stir.

Jet shifted, his face stricken. "I did this." With a trembling hand, he touched the knife that sprouted from his brother's shoulder. "This is my fault."

"It isn't your fault—no one could resist a command from Ammon."

Jet's eyes were unusually bright. "I'm not going to let him die with that sorcerer's blade in him." Grasping the knife, he pulled it out.

Jasper sat, gasping.

Jet immediately turned the knife on him. "Who are you?" he demanded.

Glaring, Jasper swatted at the knife. "Put that away. You know perfectly well who I am."

Jet relaxed as Jasper clutched his shoulder.

"That hurt worse coming out than it did going in." He glared at Jet. "Thanks a lot."

"Well, you got me, too." Jet showed off his arm. "Let's call it even."

"We can call it even when I stick you with a knife." Jasper stood with a groan, fingers running over his wound. "Silver. That's going to take forever to heal."

Jet grimaced. "I'm truly sorry."

"I know it wasn't really you." Jasper shuddered. "Part of me—I think it was my wolf—knew what was going on, but I couldn't stop myself. I had no control, and I almost—I almost killed you, Jet."

"I think you got off worse." Jet put an arm around Jasper as he swayed precariously. "How do we get out of here?" he asked Sylvia.

"Ammon will be close, if not right outside the door. Dario may be with him."

"Two against three," Jet said. "Our odds aren't bad."

"More like two against two and a half." Jasper winced. "Or less, if that damned sorcerer opens his mouth."

Sylvia tore a candle off the wall. "Maybe this will help."

Jet raised a skeptical eyebrow. "I think the knives would be better—"

"No. The wax." She scooped some out, letting it cool only for a moment before she stuffed it in her ear. "It will block any sound." She handed blobs of warm wax to Jet and Jasper.

"You're brilliant," Jasper said.

She shrugged. “We’re not out of here yet.”

“We need to leave fast,” Jet said. “Run, and keep running.”

“His voice is bad, but he can also do damage with his eyes,” Sylvia said, putting the wax into her other ear. “Don’t look at him, no matter what. I’ll point the way out. Got it?”

The two of them nodded, stuffing the wax in their own ears.

Sylvia gave them a thumbs up. “Ready?” she asked, unable to hear herself.

They nodded.

The three of them strode to the doors. Jet looked at Jasper, counting down from three. On his mark, they slammed against the wood.

The bar gave way, and splinters flew.

Sylvia threw her hands over her head, but the three of them pressed forward. Ammon stood ahead of them in the passageway, dust covering his majestic blue robe. She looked away as his mouth opened, issuing a command they couldn’t hear.

Jasper charged, punching the sorcerer full in the face. Ammon hadn’t expected that. He crumpled to the floor.

Chest heaving, Jasper stood over him. It seemed like he wanted to finish his foe, but Jet grabbed his shoulder. Dario had appeared in front of them.

Jet stepped forward, and the vampire backed away, his hands raised in surrender. Sylvia pointed down the hall toward the exit.

“Go!” Jet mouthed.

The three of them sprinted down the hall. Sylvia guided them through the maze of corridors, hoping she remembered them right. At last, they smelled a breath of cool night air. They raced into the darkness, hope renewed.

Together, they stumbled out a set of large front doors, down the drive of what looked to be a decrepit castle. Ivy clawed at the bricks, and seemed to be pulling them down an inch at a time. Half the windows were missing. But all they cared about was the sweet taste of freedom, the freshness of the night wind, and the splendid stars above.

Sylvia pointed. The mountains lay to the west. As one, her mates shifted. Jet bent low, the white patch on his chest bright against the dark. She swung onto his back, glad she could save her feet this time.

The wolves whirled, and the three of them raced toward home.

Chapter 10

They made it to the canyon just before dawn. Jet slowed as Jasper had begun to limp. Jet shifted, still carrying Sylvia on his back. “Does your arm hurt from the knife, or from the punch?” he joked.

The gray wolf whined, transforming into Jasper, who looked more weary than Sylvia had ever seen him.

Stumbling forward, Jasper put a hand on his wound. “I wish I had done more than punch him. I should have killed him when I had the chance.”

“We got out of there,” Jet said. “That’s what matters.”

Sylvia rubbed her ears. The wax had fallen out miles back, and she felt nervous without it. “He’s going to come back, you know.”

“We know.” There was steel in Jet’s voice. “But we’ll be ready.”

She slid off Jet’s back, striding into the comfort of the canyon walls. She needed to make sure the rest of the pack was safe. There was no telling what Ammon might have done to them. She couldn’t remember more than the sorcerer ordering her to surrender.

“You’re different, aren’t you?” Jet was asking Jasper. “After defending our mate.”

“Yes.” Jasper’s voice was slightly wary. “I can feel the change.”

“You’re an Alpha now.”

She turned back to look at them. They stood still, facing each other, like they had in Ammon’s lair. She felt a chill race up her spine. They wouldn’t challenge each other again, would they?

Jasper let out a long breath. “I can leave the pack, if you want. I won’t betray you.”

“No.” Jet clasped his brother’s uninjured shoulder. “Stay, and lead the pack with me. Share our mate. With two Alphas, we’ll be twice as strong.”

“Two?” Jasper glanced at Sylvia. “Don’t you mean three?”

Jet grinned. “Three Alphas—even two and a half—against one sorcerer? He won’t stand a chance.”

Sylvia wished she were as confident.

On the canyon rim, someone barked. She looked up to see Everett streaking back toward the den. Breaking into a run, Sylvia raced after him. She needed to know that Rowan, Gwen, West, and the others were all right.

She rounded the bend in the canyon and found the pack pouring out of the den. Half of them were shifted, and the rest bristled with weapons.

“Who goes there?” Rowan shouted.

“Your Alphas,” Jet called.

The pack didn’t stand down or lower their weapons.

“How do we know you aren’t being controlled?” Rowan growled.

Jet sighed. “We don’t have time for this.”

“Oh, yes we do.” She raised her bow, pulling the drawstring taut. “What’s something you would only know if you were in full control of your brain?”

“That you’re annoying?”

She glared at him. “I mean, that is really convincing. But I’m still the one with a nocked arrow.”

“There’s something you told me that you kept secret from everyone else,” Jasper said.

“And what’s that?” She turned the bow toward him.

“That you once had a crush on Ash.”

“Ash?” Jet stared. “The Ember pack Alpha? No way.”

Rowan’s ears were turning red. “He wasn’t Alpha then. We were practically still pups.”

“Rowan and Ash?” Jet grinned. “I should have sent you south instead of Juniper.”

She loosed the arrow, and it sailed by his ear. “That’s the last I’d better hear about it, Alpha!”

The pack broke into laughter, tension ebbing away. Rowan strode forward and embraced Sylvia.

“I’m glad you took care of yourself, and got those overgrown coyotes back okay.” Rowan showed her the stockpiles of weapons and shields that they’d accumulated at the den’s entrance. “Ever since you left, we’ve been preparing for your return. Just in case you needed some help sorting out that maggoty magician.”

Sylvia stared around her, stunned. “You didn’t doubt we’d come back?”

“Of course not.”

She had to look away before her happy tears spilled over. The Oak Canyon pack was too good to her.

Jasper waded into their midst, bombarding Rowan and the others with questions of exactly how many arrows they had, and how their food supplies were holding up. Slipping away, Sylvia found Jet.

“Ammon will come after us,” she said.

“I know. But we will finish this.”

Sylvia grabbed his hands. “I want you to Bite me.”

“Now?” Jet looked taken aback. “He could be here any moment.”

“That’s why you have to Bite me now—I’m not strong enough as a human.”

He squeezed her hands. “You’ve escaped him, twice. Without you, I couldn’t have done it once. You’re stronger than me.”

“Not strong enough.” She set her mouth in a stubborn line. “I want to be a shifter when I face him. I’m done running.”

Jasper passed by, and Jet grabbed his arm.

“She wants to be Bitten,” he told his brother. “Help me talk some sense into her.”

Jasper gazed at Sylvia, his eyes lingering on hers. “Bite her. She won’t change her mind.”

“What? You’re the one who said she might not survive the Turn!”

“And you’re the one who said she was strong enough.” Jasper faced his brother. “It’s the best chance we all have of surviving the sorcerer.”

“So this is your first act as Alpha?” Jet asked accusingly. “Disagreeing with me?”

“No. My first act is protecting our mate.” Jasper lowered his voice. “I can Bite her if you’re too afraid...”

“Thrashes?” Sylvia asked. “Will it hurt?”

“I’ve heard it’s very painful,” Jet said. “Maybe your Bite can wait until after we defeat the sorcerer—”

“No. Let’s do it now.” She pulled him through the curtain of roots and up the stairs, before he could say anything else to try and change her mind.

Sylvia lay on the furs, her heart pounding. Jasper and Jet stood on either side of her.

“Are you sure about this?” Jet asked.

“Positive.”

The sun rose over the trees, blood-red light spilling into the room. She stared out the window, hoping this wasn’t the last sunrise she’d see.

“Fine...” Jet leaned over, fangs ready. Lovingly, he Bit her at the base of her neck.

Fire shot through her veins.

“Sylvia?” Jet grabbed her hand.

She screamed, and everything went dark.

Jet and Jasper faced each other, knives ready. Their eyes were blank.

“No!” Anguish surged through her like a physical pain. “You can’t!”

They didn’t recognize her voice, or each other. They would fight to kill.

“Such a fun game, isn’t it?” Ammon stood beside her, barely containing his glee. “Once they’re gone, you’ll be mine again.”

“I’ll never be yours.”

He laughed, his green eyes cold. “You’ll have no choice, my dove.”

She glared at him, her limbs chained to the chair. “You’re wrong. I’ll always have a choice.”

“And what would you do?” His haughty words rang out over the stone. “You’re a lowly human, with barely enough strength to defy my weakest command. You’ll never defeat me.”

“We’ll see about that.” She felt different this time, fiercer and more powerful. Something swelled inside her, leaving no room for fear.

Sylvia flexed her limbs, and brown fur sprouted over them. Her muscles grew, breaking the chains. She threw off the chair, heard it crash against the wall. She dropped to all fours, stalking toward Ammon. Her teeth had lengthened, and she licked them with her new tongue. She wondered what sorcerer would taste like.

Ammon backed away, toward Jet and Jasper. The blankness slid from their eyes, and they turned their knives toward him.

“Please, Sophie—Sylvia. I’ll do anything. Just don’t—”

With a snarl, she pounced.

“Sylvia. Sylvia!”

Jasper’s room swam into view. Hazy at first, the details began to fill in. She was wrapped in sweat-drenched furs, and she seemed to have pinned Rowan to the floor.

Sorry, she wanted to say, but she barked instead.

“You have to shift back,” Rowan said. “Just think about what it’s like to be human. Two arms, two legs, fingers and toes... it’ll come.”

There was a lessening feeling as her beautiful brown fur receded. Sylvia rolled off of Rowan, stumbling as she tried to rise.

“You’ll get used to it,” Rowan said. “The first few shifts are the hardest. But your wolf will know what to do.”

Staggering to the bed, Sylvia rubbed her eyes. The sky was still the same red color, and it felt like she’d been running for hours. “What time is it?”

“Dusk.”

“So I’ve been out for less than a day?”

Rowan shook her head. “You were Bitten yesterday.”

Leaping up, she raced to the window. “Ammon. He hasn’t come yet, has he?”

“No. But if he does, you’ll be ready.”

She bit her lip. Should she go out and find Ammon herself? She never wanted him to return to the canyon to threaten her pack. But she was so tired from Turning. She couldn’t go tonight.

“Sophie...”

The call was magnified by the canyon walls, and his voice made her hair stand on end.

“Time to come home, Sophie.”

Rowan gripped her shoulder. “Rip him apart.” Grabbing her bow and quiver, she raced down the stairs.

Sylvia followed, as if in a dream.

“Don’t keep me waiting, Sophie.” Ammon’s voice echoed through the oak. “I’m losing patience.”

Once down the stairs, she turned toward the entrance. It was time to see what Ammon made of her claws and teeth.

I still want to know what sorcerer tastes like, her wolf said.

It was time for Ammon to meet his fate.

Jet and Jasper were waiting for her by the curtain of roots.

“I told the pack to put beeswax in their ears,” Jet said. “Do you want any?”

She shook her head. “I want to hear his dying breath.”

“Are you ready?” Jasper asked.

“Yes. I just hope Ammon is.”

The three of them shifted. Sylvia walked out of the den, flanked by her mates.

Ammon stood before her, in a robe of silken gold. “It’s time, Sophie. Time to give in.”

Snarling, Jet and Jasper charged. Ammon flicked his fingers at them, and they both slowed, ambling past him like they’d forgotten why they’d been angry.

Her ears swiveled back as she caught the noise of footsteps behind her. She turned, growling at Rowan, Gwen, and Fable, forcing them to retreat. No one else would be hurt on her behalf.

Ammon laughed. “So you’re a shifter now? Aren’t you the clever one. I just hope you don’t catch fleas.”

She could feel them, biting her all over. Closing her eyes, she resisted the urge to scratch.

They aren’t real. They aren’t real. They aren’t real.

Ammon snapped his fingers, and the sensation vanished. “I must confess, I grow weary of our little game, Sophie. Your defiance amused me for a time, but my patience has reached its end.”

Reaching into his robe, he drew out an amulet on a silver chain. “See this?” He touched a finger to the pendant, a purple stone carved into a snake devouring itself. “I’ve concentrated my power. As soon as I slip this around your neck, you’ll be mine forever.”

She eyed the purple snake, her hackles raised. Even from here, she could feel the ominous pulse of power.

“Soon, I’ll command you to do as I please. But I need to tell you how it works now, because once it’s around your neck, you won’t be able to think of anything but me.” His eyes were the color of a storm at sea. “It won’t matter if you’re shifted or not—I’ll bind you to me once and for all. Now come here.”

With horror, she felt her paws move forward to obey him.

No!

She focused all her thoughts on two legs, and shifted. Though she stood naked before him, she had control of her limbs again.

He grinned. "I have you now!" Leaping forward, he grabbed her wrist. With his free hand, he tried to force the amulet over her head.

"Let go!" She tried to twist away, but his grip was like iron. A move Rowan had showed her popped into her mind, and she slammed her palm into his nose.

Ammon shrieked. Blood ran down his face, his nose a ruin.

"You bitch! I'll make you my slave for all time!" Grabbing her hair with a bloody hand, he pulled her toward him.

Sylvia scratched at him, her mind frantic. The amulet brushed her skin, and for a moment she felt deadened. She couldn't let him put that on her. If he did, it would all be over. Sylvia would be over.

He reached toward her, the amulet gripped in his hand.

Sylvia's hand shot out, seizing his wrist and digging her nails into his tendons. Rowan had made her practice enough times, but never before had Sylvia been prepared to dig all the way to the bone.

Ammon shrieked again, his fingers jerking apart. He dropped to his knees as the amulet fell.

She caught it. Wrenching it away, she forced it around his neck.

His shriek was cut short, and silence reigned in the canyon. Sylvia stood over him, panting. Ammon's muscles had gone slack. He looked up at her, smiling, as if waiting for a command.

"Raise your right hand," she said.

He obeyed, content and docile.

"Lower it."

Ammon did without question.

"You can tell him to do anything?" Jet appeared beside her. "Tell him to kill himself."

Jasper nodded. "Not a bad idea."

"No." Sylvia looked down at the defeated sorcerer. "That's too good for him."

She knelt to face her former captor. "Here is what you must do."

Ammon smiled, waiting patiently for his orders.

"Go to the farthest reaches of the earth. Speak to no one. Eat only enough to survive. Find a deep, dark cave, and spend the rest of your miserable days there. Think only of the victims you've hurt, and feel their pain as yours. Do not take off the amulet. If someone else attempts to take it off, you must kill yourself before you let that happen.

"Forget me. Forget my name. Forget this place, and this pack. Go now, and never return."

Ammon rose, walking out of the canyon. He didn't pause, didn't turn, and the falling night soon swallowed him.

Sylvia's knees felt weak. He was vanquished. She was free.

Jet put an arm around her waist. "Want some venison?"

"I hope so," Jasper said, slipping his hand into hers. "We saved you some prime pieces."

Grateful to her Alphas, her mates, she headed back toward the den. There was a fire to light, and stories to tell. She already knew she would eat and drink long into the evening with Rowan, Everett, Fable, and the others. She had found her pack at last. She was safe, and she was home.

Holding tightly to Jet and Jasper, she walked through the protective curtain of roots.

Chapter 11

SIX WEEKS LATER

That morning had dawned cool and crisp, and even at midday a chill still hung in the air. Sylvia stood in the den entrance with her Alphas, under the roots that swayed in a breeze that promised autumn.

She looked out over the faces that were ringed around them. Juniper caught her eye, and winked. Sylvia grinned back. Juniper had insisted on returning to the canyon and helping with feast preparations. She had only arrived four days ago, but Sylvia felt like they had always been sisters. It was endlessly entertaining to see Juniper joke with Jasper, or goad Jet.

Beside her, Locke took her arm. Juniper gazed up at him, practically radiating with happiness. The two of them made an excellent pair, and even better hunting partners.

To their left stood the Ember pack Alphas. Val, Ash, and Blaze had just arrived that morning, and the pack had seemed to hold its breath as Jet and Ash met. But the Alphas had clasped hands—any enmity that had once existed could not survive an occasion as happy as a binding day.

Sylvia took a breath. The word could still make her shiver, but she couldn't wait to be bound to her Alphas. She wanted to be one with them, one with their pack. She could search the world and not find a man or shifter half as wonderful as either of her mates. How had she gotten so lucky as to have both of them?

Turning to look at her Alphas, she felt a fierce pride wash over her. Her heart was so full of joy that it was hard not to leap into their arms and shower them with kisses.

But Rowan said that had to wait, so Sylvia would do her best to control herself.

Val's eyes shone with unshed tears, but her smile was brimming over. She glanced at her own Alphas, and Sylvia grinned. She must be remembering her own binding day.

Rowan stepped forward. "Are we ready? Is everyone here?"

A hush fell over them all. The pack seemed to draw closer to her. Sylvia felt like her heart might burst. They were the shifters who had taken her in, who had defended her from a sorcerer. She would never forget that, and she would do anything for them.

"All right, then," Rowan said. "Alphas?"

The three of them stood in a circle around her, like they'd practiced.

"A pack is only as strong as its Alphas," Rowan said, "and the Oak Canyon Alphas are as strong as the earth. May your love grow into the towering tree that holds our pack together.”

Jet’s fingers twitched as if they longed to twine with hers.

“Not yet,” Jasper whispered, though it was clear he couldn’t wait either.

“Everyone, please take a root,” Rowan said, clasping the longest one that hung from the oak above.

All around them, their attendants grabbed roots.

Rowan stepped out of their circle. “Alphas, please take each other’s hands.”

Sylvia felt a sharp relief at finally being able to hold her Alphas again. Both of their hands felt so warm, so right in hers.

“Your roots are as strong as your pack, and your friends.” Rowan looped her root around Jet and Sylvia’s clasped hands, then over Sylvia and Jasper’s. “Let them be the foundation you grow from, and let them strengthen you in times of need.”

One by one, their packmates, relatives, and friends stepped forward to lay down their roots. Some pulled them around Sylvia and Jet’s hands, others around Sylvia and Jasper’s, or even between the two brothers. Some began to weave between the roots that were already in place, crisscrossing into a lattice that locked them together.

Jasper met her eyes, squeezing her hand reassuringly.

Once the last root was put in place by Juniper, Rowan stepped forward. “You are now bound, our Oak Canyon Alphas.”

Everyone around them clapped and cheered, but Sylvia only had eyes for Jet and Jasper. Her mates were everything she could have ever asked for, everything she could have ever wanted. She wouldn’t mind if they never untangled these roots.

Jet and Jasper both leaned in to kiss her, to whistles from the crowd. Sylvia couldn’t help the laugh that escaped her. It was a beautiful, perfect day, here in her den. There was no need to run ever again. She had been found. She had been bound to her Alphas.

All she needed now was to spend forever with them.

APPROACHING NIGHT: BOOK I OF SELUNA

Silver Hill Asylum holds a deadly secret. But Seluna may not live long enough to uncover it.

Almost everyone is convinced I'm mad. But I'm not sure I believe them.

Seventeen-year-old Seluna doesn't know why she was admitted to an all-female insane asylum called Silver Hill. She doesn't know exactly how she makes inanimate objects come to life. And she can't figure out the reason for the sadistic and brutal experiments on girls here—many of whom are never heard from again.

When Seluna sneaks out to the moonlit, forbidden garden behind Silver Hill, she meets a mysterious boy swimming in a pond. She senses there's a connection between him and what's happening at the asylum, but he's not telling what. Then there are the screams from down long halls and the constant absence of light. No doubt they're all part of the scheme concocted by the merciless head of the facility, Dr. Catron. He's growing more and more frantic and violent in an attempt to find the person—or thing—he's looking for.

Yes, there's a lot Seluna doesn't know about Silver Hill. About why moonlight, madness, and murder are following her. But she needs to find out fast . . . before she becomes the next victim.

(Set in the nineteenth century of an alternate world called Hartlandia, APPROACHING NIGHT is a YA gothic fantasy).

AUTHOR'S NOTE

This story takes place in an alternate world called Hartlandia, which shares characteristics with our world. You'll also find that many characteristics are different. The story's time period reflects our own late Victorian era. However, anachronisms and other strange occurrences are left in on purpose for you to enjoy.

PROLOGUE

In the beginning, there were the vines. They'd been there as long as anyone could remember, plastered against the decaying back walls of Silver Hill. Eventually, they took over what had once been the garden. The vines strangled dead trees, tripped the unwary, and gnashed ugly patterns on the hard, gray stones. They were everywhere, inescapable, black as tar. Unlike living vines, the ones surrounding the insane asylum were hard and unforgiving. They were so hateful that sunlight shunned them. Only the moon cared enough to shine down.

The vines didn't have thorns—they didn't need to. Parts of them were sharp as razors.

The only place they did not touch was the moat around the asylum, or the garden's forgotten pond. Their lengths reached right up and over the water, but somehow were prevented from entering it. Instead, they lay on the pond's desolate shores in mourning. Then they ripped even more fiercely at any mortal they could find.

Many attempts had been made to cut them back over the years, or burn them. But the vines were too hard to cut. They refused to burn. They continued their angry, endless existence. Unable to go where they pleased, they made sure no one else did either. They would never be welcome or at home anywhere.

The vines were not content to stay this way.

“Try, Seluna. Just try.”

“I am trying! But it’s like I told you, Laura: nothing’s happening.”

“Well, now is not one of those times.”

I leaned my head against the bottom of the flimsy bed frame. Sitting with my back perpendicular to the center of the mattress, I continued looking at the wooden horse. I didn’t know why I couldn’t animate it. A glint of moonlight shone through the narrow room’s high window onto the horse. As I stared at the toy, I thought I saw it move.

Then a cloud must have passed over the moon, because suddenly, there was very little light in the room. The only other illumination came from the dimmed gas lamps behind both beds, and the tiny window on the door, the one with bars on it. Most of Silver Hill’s windows had bars on them.

“Maybe the horse is defective,” said Rose. She was on Laura’s bed, lying sideways, and leaned over to get a closer look. She brushed curly red hair out of her eyes. It wasn’t truly red; I could see the dark roots peeking out from beneath. “Where’d you get it, anyway?” she asked.

“It’s my little brother’s. He said I could have it to keep me company while . . . while I was away.” Tears welled in Laura’s eyes. “He really believed it would, too. Of course, he’s only three. It was his favorite toy, too.”

“Then I’m sure it’s not defective,” I said firmly. I reached over to where Laura was sitting on the floor, legs crossed, against the other bed. With a reassuring squeeze of her knee, I repeated what I’d told them both before.

“It’s true I can animate objects, and temporarily make dead things come to life. But that doesn’t mean I can always do it. And when I can’t, I’m sure it says more about me than the object itself. So don’t fret over it.”

“I know.” Laura took the horse and moved it up and down with her hand, making it prance on the nightstand between beds. “It’s just . . . that’s so magical, you know? I’m really keen to see more of it.”

I shrugged and adjusted my skirts. I didn’t really think of my ability as magic. It wasn’t even particularly useful, so I rarely thought about it at all. Although I would have liked to use it to make Laura smile more. When she smiled, it was one of the few times her pale hair and skin didn't make her look like she never saw the sun. Rose's complexion was darker, almost tawny brown. But there was a sallowness there as well, like she could use a holiday.

"Eh, Laura, you're fourteen years old," Rose said. "Isn't it time you quit playing with toys?"

Laura made a face and stopped moving the horse back and forth. "I'm not playing. I was just . . . demonstrating what Seluna could do with it. Besides, you're sixteen. Shouldn't you be able to tell when someone is playing and when they're not?"

"Hey, have some respect for your elders," Rose said. "After all, I'm the oldest one here."

"Ahem." I coughed.

Rose scrunched up her nose. "Oh, right. I forgot you're seventeen, Seluna. Well, old lady, astound us with your wisdom and experience. Do more you know what." She indicated the wooden horse.

"Do more of what? What are you girls doin'?" A low, matronly voice boomed through the door's tiny window, and two piggish eyes appeared behind the glass. Nurse Cutter.

All of us gave a start, and Laura quickly hid the wooden horse behind her back. One didn't know if it was strictly forbidden, but then again, precious objects could be confiscated here for any reason. Or for no reason at all.

"Nothing!" called Rose. "Just . . . playing jacks."

"Jacks." We saw the tiny eyes squint into even smaller slits in the woman's doughy face. "Ain't that a form of gamblin'? Like card playin'?"

Rose and Laura looked at each other with wide, fearful eyes. They had no idea what to say.

"Not the way we're playing," I replied smoothly. "We're playing the, ah . . . the boring way."

"Well, all right, then," said Nurse Cutter. "But nothin' too overstimulatin'. It's almost time for lights-out."

"Yes, Nurse Cutter," we chorused, and heard her footsteps grow fainter down the hall.

"That was a close one." Rose took a cigarette out of a secret pocket in her bodice and patted a different pocket, looking for a match. Silver Hill allowed patients to wear their own clothing most of the time, but did not permit skirts with pockets.

"Rose!" Laura's big blue eyes grew even bigger when she saw the cigarette. "You know you can't smoke that in here!"

"Or anywhere at Silver Hill," I reminded her.

Rose gave an exasperated sigh and let her head flop back on Laura's pillow. "I know, I know! But if I don't do something I'm not supposed to, I'm going to go mad!"

"They say we're mad," Laura said softly. She held her brother's horse in her lap, stroking its head. "That's why we're here." She put the toy on the comforter and continued watching it. Suddenly, we heard the sounds of squeaking gurney wheels and pained groaning. Rose jumped off Laura's bed and went to the door's window. She stood on her tiptoes and tried to look out.

"What's happening?" Laura asked. She and I got up and stood next to Rose, but there was only room at the window for one.

Rose hopped up and down, trying to get a better view. “Ugh, I can’t see anything! Seluna, you look. You’re the only one tall enough.”

Although I had only a few inches on these girls, it was just enough to allow me to peek over the bottom of the window. I squinted. I could typically see better in the dark than others, but it was still difficult to see anything in the shadowy hallway. I could just make out a girl strapped to a gurney, struggling to regain consciousness. The head of the asylum—Dr. Catron—was walking alongside her.

“What’s going on? Who’s out there?” Laura’s voice trembled.

“Hush!” chided Rose. After a brief pause, she asked, “Yeah, Seluna. Who’s there?”

I turned to face them both. “If you two don’t be quiet, we may be the next ones out there!” I hated to be so harsh, but it did shut them up fast. I turned back to the window.

“What shall I put down as the diagnosis, Doctor?” It was a nurse speaking this time, but not Cutter. I didn’t recognize this one.

“Early-onset nervous disposition with vague hysterical tendencies.” Dr. Catron’s melodic voice was assured and condescending as always. “She’ll soon be feeling much better. Won’t you, my dear?”

His tone was anything but caring, and the returning moans were anything but sounds of someone about to feel better. The gurney’s wheels continued squeaking, growing softer and softer until they disappeared entirely behind the echo of a slamming door.

I backed away from the window. Frowning, I sat on Rose’s bed and told both girls what I’d seen. They sat on the opposite bed, and the room was silent for a few minutes.

“What do you think they did to her?” Rose asked grimly.

“Don’t know,” I replied.

“I shouldn’t ask,” Rose sighed. “Ought to know better.” She found a match and lit her cigarette.

“Maybe she . . . needed it?” Laura clutched a pillow to her chest and rested her chin on the top.

“Doubtful,” I muttered. “You know, Rose, smoking can kill you.”

Rose took a long drag and blew a ring of smoke while looking at the ceiling. “Being here can kill you.” Another long silence. It wasn’t as if any of us could disagree.

Rose took a few more puffs, and her bangs fell into her eyes. “Ugh! These stupid curls!” she snapped. “And they won’t let us have hairpins. Wish they’d at least let us get a bloomin’ haircut in this place.”

“Doubt they’d trust us around sharps, like scissors, even if someone else were doing the cutting.” I absentmindedly examined my own waist-length, coarse black hair.

“You can use my ribbon, if you like.” Laura motioned to the ribbon, tied into a large bow at the back of her head. It held back her long, wispy hair from her face while the rest draped over her shoulders.

“Nah.” Rose waved away the offer. “Then what will you use to keep the hair out of your face, Laura-lie? Hey, why don’t you try that reanimation thing again, Seluna?” She stuck the cigarette in one side of her mouth and grabbed the wooden horse from where Laura had left it on the comforter. “Just one more time?”

“Ooo, yes! Please do!” Laura nodded and seemed to perk up, setting the pillow aside and clasping her hands in her lap.

I shrugged. “All right, if you want. Though I don’t know why this time would be any different.” I took the horse from Rose and put it in my own lap, staring at it.

Rose rooted around inside a different pocket in her bodice and finally found what she was looking for: a compact mirror. The outside was ornate silver filigree; it must have been a gift. Perhaps a gift from Rose’s family before she came here. No one ever saw their families once they were admitted.

“Rose!” Laura exclaimed, her mouth making a little O. “You know we’re not allowed to have those!”

“She’s not allowed to have cigarettes either.” I smirked at Rose. She took the cig from her mouth just long enough to mouth “sod off.” Then she rolled her eyes and looked in the compact’s mirror to fix her bangs.

“What a couple of ninnies you two are,” she said. “Now, are you going to move that thing or aren’t you, Luna?”

I sighed and looked at the wooden horse again. I tried to concentrate, but the truth was, I didn’t really know how I was able to do what I did. Sometimes, things moved, sometimes, they didn’t. It had been that way ever since I was a little girl.

Laura’s eyes were glued to her brother’s toy. Rose glanced over every so often, but mostly kept looking at the compact and adjusting her bangs. She sighed and turned the mirror this way and that, trying to get them just right.

That was when it happened. A bit of light reflected off the compact, and in the glint, I saw the horse give a jump, as if someone had startled it. Animation would be much easier now that I had some momentum. I smiled and made the horse canter and kick, back and forth along my legs. Laura drew in a sharp breath and tugged Rose’s sleeve. Annoyed, Rose turned and opened her mouth to protest. Then she saw the horse moving, and let out a low whistle.

“You did it, Seluna! You did it! That is so neat!” Laura squealed. I made the horse paw at my knee the way they pawed at the ground in real life.

“Not so loud, Laura,” Rose whispered. “You want Nurse Cutter to hear us?”

Cutter’s voice came again as if on cue. “Did what, ladies? What did Seluna do?”

How had Cutter snuck up on us? We hadn’t even heard her heavy footsteps come down the hall. My concentration on the horse broke, and it fell lifeless once again in my lap.

“Er, she won,” Rose said quickly. “Seluna won the game. Good show, Seluna.” Laura chimed in with mock congratulations as she grabbed the horse and shoved it under her pillow. Rose quickly put the compact away and snuffed her cigarette out on the floor. Then she hid the butt under her mattress and waved both hands in front of her to dissipate the smoke.

“Bedtime, ladies.” Cutter’s voice was firm. We heard the heavy clink of keys unlocking the door as she entered the room.

Any way you looked at it, Nurse Cutter was an intimidating figure. She was at least six feet tall, with hair pulled back in a low, tight bun. It was bad enough she could bellow like a sea captain. But the woman weighed three hundred pounds if she weighed an ounce. She could subdue the most uncooperative patient in seconds, not that many were foolish enough to be uncooperative. Her starched white uniform and nurse’s cap never looked comfortable. Maybe that was why she was always in such a foul mood.

We all stood quickly when Cutter came in. “Seluna,” she pointed at me, “time to go back to your room.” Rose rotated the heel of her left boot on the ground behind her to erase the stain where she’d put out her cigarette. She and Laura looked at me sympathetically.

“Sorry, Seluna,” Rose whispered as I turned to leave. “We’ll see you tomorrow. Hopefully.” Laura nodded and tried to give an encouraging smile.

“We’ll see what Dr. Catron says about that,” barked Cutter. The woman had ears like a bat’s. “Personally, I think you three girls ’ave ’ad quite enough socializin’ for one week. ’Alf an hour each day for the past two days. It’s enough to overstimulate anyone, much less a bunch of lunatics.” Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Laura wince. One never got used to hearing oneself referred to like that. Cutter put a large hand on my back and led me into the hall. Her enormous set of keys jangled as she locked Rose and Laura inside their room.

“Ten more minutes, ladies,” she called to them, gruffly. “Enough time for you to get washed and dressed for bed. Then it’s lights-out.”

We walked the long, dark hallway and up the stairs to where I slept. Despite the girls’ sympathy, I didn’t really mind my room. Cutter said I was put in the attic garret because of overcrowding. But more girls came in every day, and there were plenty of empty rooms. I often wondered if there was another reason the staff kept me separate from everyone.

I remember when I first saw the garret, the day I arrived at Silver Hill. The unfinished attic was no match for the biting winds of late winter, although it did have a crude fireplace in the chimney that ran through its center. I learned quickly that it didn’t work, most likely because of a blocked flue. There was a thin, stained mattress on an iron cot, just below slanted and rotted wooden beams. A mountain of dust and cobwebs greeted me when I arrived. They covered the assorted junk that had piled up over the years: small pieces of bric-a-brac, extra washbasins, broken stools. I’d made a cursory attempt at cleaning, but it did little good. Staff wouldn’t let girls near anything that could be used as a weapon, like a broom.

No place like home, I thought tonight, as Cutter turned to leave.

“Far too nice a place for a lunatic,” she muttered, but not so low that I couldn’t hear. “I know staff in other ’ospitals that don’t ’ave rooms as nice. Not this one, of course. Dr. Catron is very good to us nurses.”

I'll bet he is. Needs someone to do his dirty work for him, after all.

"Evenin', child." Cutter shut the heavy wooden door behind her as she left. This one didn't have a window where one could see out. I heard her keys jangle again as I was locked in.

"Evening, Nurse Cutter," I replied. I didn't know why she made a pretense of politeness. It was clear she didn't care what kind of evening we girls had, or what kind of lives, for that matter.

I groped around till I found my candle and matches; there were no gas lamps in the attic. The staff must have forgotten there were matches up here, or they would certainly have removed them as another potential weapon. I dearly wished I could light a real fire; it was freezing. I wondered if it ever occurred to the nurses that "lunatics" got cold the same as other people.

In the end, I just put my dark lace shawl over my shoulders. It didn't offer much protection from the chill, but it was all I had in terms of outerwear. I didn't bother getting into my nightdress; it was warmer in my day clothes. With the candle lit, I gazed out the small, round window that overlooked the asylum entrance. It had been only a week since I'd walked up the broken steps to see the following letters etched in stone:

Silver Hill: Lunatic Asylum for Unmanageable Females.

The asylum was a large, imposing structure. It was daunting just to look at, let alone go inside. Set deep in the rolling moors of the Westernlands, Silver Hill was like a fortress. It was even surrounded by a moat. And once you were inside, there was no getting out. Girls who managed to run away were quickly caught, lost in the miles and miles of woods that grew past the moors. Ghostly, snow-tipped trees stood around the back and sides of the asylum. The edifice rose high above the land and seemed to glare down, as if challenging one's right to be there. Truly, it lived up to the name "Silver Hill."

I recalled how I'd had to tilt my head back to get a complete view of the building. It was at least six stories, with stone turrets and crumbling chimneys. I tried to pretend it was a castle, but it wasn't like the friendly kind in fairy tales. For one thing, it was covered in ivy and moss, as if nature were trying to take back what was hers. For another, outside it was eerily quiet. There weren't any birds singing, or squirrels scampering about. It seemed even the animals were too frightened to venture near.

As I walked up the entrance steps with Nurse Cutter that day, I couldn't help but marvel at how magnificent Silver Hill must have once been. We came into the main hall, and I gaped at the balconies supported by a dozen enormous Corinthian columns. Then there was the sweeping, semicircular staircase that was the room's only way to the second floor. And my jaw nearly dropped at the long walls of mirrors in gilded frames on either side.

This part of Silver Hill was said to have been modeled after a similar room in the royal Palace of Versailles. I wondered if the mirrors there had the same effect. The ones here made the space seem much larger than it really was, as if it went on forever. As if there was no escape. Unless one could fly, of course.

That was because the hall's shining glory was a large, circular stained glass window. It stood high on the wall opposite the entrance and just above the top of the staircase. In stunning detail, it showed the Greek goddess of the moon in her chariot, pulled by silver-winged horses. There was a chandelier in the center of the hall, but without many candles. I didn't know where the money from asylum admissions was going, but it certainly wasn't towards the lighting. The only real illumination was from the moonlight shafting through the stained glass window. It was one of the only ones without bars.

Actually, the near absence of light didn't bother me. I felt more comfortable in the dark anyway. More alive. My senses tingled, the blackness draped around me like a warm cloak. I wouldn't mind if it were always night.

But from what I could see of the inside of Silver Hill, it wasn't much better than the outside. All had fallen into decay and ruin. Paint was peeling from the walls and gilding on the mirrors, falling off in chips and flakes. Some of the stairs and railings were broken; many places were mildewed. As Nurse Cutter and I traversed the asylum, it was clear that numerous windowpanes had been smashed, maybe from girls trying to escape before the bars were put in.

"Ave to get that swept up," Cutter said the first time we passed one window. "Bad enough patients try to get out. But them big shards of glass on the floor is just an invitation to slice themselves open." My eyes widened. "Miserable mess to clean up it is, too." I wondered if she meant the glass or the blood.

On our way to my room for the first time, we went by the cafeteria, where I saw another broken window. It had to lead to the back of Silver Hill. I surmised this because the cafeteria was right next to the kitchen, and most kitchens were near the backs of large residences. It was then that I saw a long, dark vine coming through one pane where the glass was missing.

"Are they going to clean that up as well?" I stopped and nodded at the vine. Gods only knew what kind of animals could crawl up the vine and right into the cafeteria. Not that I had anything against animals, if any were eventually brave enough to come to Silver Hill. I just wanted the wild ones outside, where they belonged.

Nurse Cutter turned around and glared at me. "You just mind your business. Them vines is part of Silver 'ill's old gardens is all, and Dr. Catron will do whatever 'e sees fit with them. We don't 'ave money to waste clearin' away all them tangled, thorny dead leaves and things. Which is forbidden to the likes of you, anyways. You ain't allowed to go out there. Now keep walkin'."

Forbidden. Just like sharp objects, cosmetic supplies, and too much socializing. Apparently, gardens were bad for a person's health as well. Whatever happened to the curative powers of fresh air?

A deep yawn brought me back to the present, and the image of my first impression of Silver Hill dissolved. I moved away from the garret window. It was definitely time to go to sleep. I wondered what kind of day Dr. Catron had planned for us tomorrow. I crawled under the covers—nothing more than an old horse blanket—and shivered. As I drifted off, I could have sworn I heard another long, low moan that ended in a scream.

Chapter 2

I dreamed of the day I arrived at Silver Hill. After a rudimentary meal of coarse bread, turnips, and something I think was porridge, I was put in Rose and Laura's room for a bit of "socialization." Apparently, this was something lunatics needed, though not in great quantities. I silently questioned how helpful socialization could be inside a narrow room with two people I'd never met. It wasn't as if there was anything for us to do. No games, no books. All were too "stimulating."

But it turned out Rose and Laura were quite nice. Laura seemed like a slip of a girl, fairly terrified at being admitted to an insane asylum. I could tell Rose was nervous, too, but being Rose, she hid it behind a curtain of bravado.

"New girl, eh?" She whipped out a cigarette and matches after we'd been introduced. She offered one to Laura and me. I gave a little smile and shook my head. Laura's jaw dropped as she stared at the contraband, and when she didn't close it for a few moments, Rose withdrew the offer. Shrugging, she lit her cigarette and took a drag, but her hands were trembling. "What they got you in for?" she asked me.

New girl. It was a strange phrase. I later learned that Rose and Laura only arrived a few days before I did. But perhaps it made Rose feel better tagging someone else as the newbie.

"You first," I said boldly.

I expected resistance, but Rose just shrugged again. "When I graduate, my family said I have two choices." She took the cigarette out of her mouth and held it between two fingers. With her thumb, she pushed down on one finger of her opposite hand, then another. "I could either go into the family business—import/export—or I could get married and have children. But I don't want to do either of those things. I want to start my own business. I'm not sure what kind yet. Something different. Maybe textiles. As for marriage and kids, phew! I'm only sixteen. I mean, what's the rush? Can't I decide all that later?"

She put her cigarette back in her mouth and took another drag. "Anyway, my family acted like I was totally crazy for not following the path they'd mapped out." She put her hands out to either side of her shoulders. "And so, welcome to Silver Hill."

I shook my head. "That is utterly ridiculous." Then I looked at Laura. "Why'd they bring you here?”

Laura gave the impression of a startled deer and stammered: “I-I . . . ah, well . . .”

“ ‘Disobedience,’ ” Rose piped up. “Laura here refused to marry the bad-tempered lout her father picked out for her.”

“Rose!” Laura’s entire face turned red. “You don’t have to go around telling everybody.”

“I didn’t tell everybody. Just her.” Rose jutted her chin at me. “Besides, why shouldn’t people know? It’s not like you did anything wrong.”

“You should have seen that man,” Laura whispered, tugging at a thread in her skirt. “He locked his own dogs in the cellar for two weeks and refused to feed them. I don’t even know why.”

“No doubt you feared the same treatment once you married him,” I said. “And at fourteen, you’re far too young to wed, anyway. At least you got out of it.”

“Yes, but then, I ended up . . . here.” Laura looked fearfully around the small room.

“Well, you’ve got us now, so that’s something,” I said. I didn’t know why I was practically vowing eternal friendship with two girls I’d just met. But there was something about seeing them treated like animals that roused my protective instincts. Besides, these girls clearly weren’t crazy. They didn’t belong in an asylum.

Though I couldn’t help but notice that both Rose’s and Laura’s families were thinking of marriage for them already. At seventeen, I was almost of marriageable age, but no one in my family had said anything to me about it. I had a feeling it was because I wasn’t as pretty as these girls. My hair, for instance, was untamable. Unlike Rose’s curls, no ribbon or pin could hold it, even if I had one. It would abide no attempts at restriction. I was told I had eyes the color of steel, but not the favored baby blue, like Laura’s.

To make matters worse, my eyebrows were as thick and dark as my hair. Frankly, I liked the way they framed my eyes. People said they made me look angry, but I didn’t feel angry often. Mostly, I just felt . . . thoughtful. Since I hated wearing makeup, I made no effort to alter my naturally pale face. No wonder most people who met me thought I was plain. It was just as well that makeup wasn’t allowed at Silver Hill. And although I was slightly taller than average, I once heard my figure described as “sinewy.” Not exactly the voluptuous beauty it was assumed I should be.

I tolerated the current fashions by wearing long skirts, though they were rather cumbersome. Mine were always blue black (my favorite color), but with silver thread that I wove in myself. I refused to wear a crinoline or bustle like other girls, and so my skirts fell down in a straight line. I think they looked much chicer this way. But I did have the typical high collar, the long row of buttons down my bodice, the pointy leather boots. The only light-colored part of my outfits was my kidskin gloves, which I always removed at the first opportunity.

“So, what’s your story, morning glory?” Rose asked again. “What indescribable act of utter lunacy did you commit?”

I hesitated for a moment. I wasn’t sure I wanted to answer just yet—or how I would do so. “Why don't I tell you later? What I'd really love to do right now is tell ghost stories. Do either of you know any?"

"Ah, I don't know." Laura twisted the thread from her skirt around her finger until it broke off. "I'm scared of ghost stories."

"I know one that's not too scary," I assured her. "If Rose is game, that is."

Rose squinted at me and turned her head to the side. She must have been wondering why I wouldn't give the reason I was admitted to Silver Hill. She took a final drag on her cigarette before stubbing it out on the floor and sticking the butt under the mattress.

"Of course I'm game." She didn't press the issue of my admission for now. "I'm not scared of a silly little story. Lay on, MacDuff." She nodded at me.

"Okay, then." I leaned in closer so both girls could hear me better. "There's kind of a story that goes with my name. My parents first wanted to call me Selene, after the goddess of the moon." I paused for effect. "But I don't believe her story. It's just a fairy tale."

"The Greek Titans—Hyperion and Theia—had three children. Helios, god of the sun, Aurora, goddess of the dawn, and the youngest was Selene, who ruled over the moon. When the Romans defeated the Greeks, they changed Selene's name to Luna. Anyway, it was said that Hyperion and Theia's children were meant to bring all manner of light to the world. Together, the three siblings ruled the hours of the day, shedding light wherever it was most needed by mortals."

"Selene traversed the heavens in a chariot led by silver steeds. One night, she was riding across the sky when she saw a handsome shepherd below on Earth. His name was Endymion, and he had closed his eyes momentarily to rest from his labors. Seeing Endymion lying on the soft grass, Selene couldn't help but notice how peaceful and beautiful he looked as he slept. She fell in love with him. Selene went to the king of the gods, Zeus, and begged that Endymion be granted eternal life. She could not bear the thought of him growing old and dying."

"But what Selene did not know was that Zeus was in love with her. He had no desire to see her in the arms of another man. But so great was his love that he couldn't bear not to grant her wish, because he knew how unhappy she would be. So he compromised. He gave Endymion eternal life, but only if he slept. That way, he would not be able to see Endymion's happiness at being with Selene, and would not grow heartsick and jealous."

"Selene accepted this arrangement, and so her shepherd sleeps for all eternity. But Endymion is not sad, for each night he dreams of holding the moon in his arms, of kissing the goddess herself." I put out my own arms to indicate the story was finished.

Laura sat rapt, her hands clasped. "That is so romantic! I wish I could meet a boy like Endymion."

"Pretty neat," agreed Rose. "But um, Seluna? That's not really a ghost story."

"What? Oh." I scratched my head and laughed. "I guess you're right. I don't know why I always thought of it that way. Maybe because I only remember that story at night."

"I still thought it was lovely, though," Rose said.

“Yeah, and that Endymion sounds dreamy,” Laura sighed.

“Literally!” I said, and we all giggled. But the giggling stopped when we heard shrieks in the hall outside, and what sounded like someone struggling.

“Hold her down, for gods’ sakes!” barked a man. “What am I paying you orderlies for, anyway?”

“Sorry, sir, but this one’s a fighter, she is,” a different man replied. “Be still, girlie; you ain’t going nowhere. Be good now, or we’ll sic Nurse Cutter on you!” There were more shrieks, and the clicking, pulling sounds of straps and buckles. Rose put her ear to the door, and Laura and I leaned closer as well.

“Who’s that?” I whispered.

“It sounds like Dr. Catron,” Rose whispered back.

“Who’s Dr. Catron?”

“The owner and head of the facility. You haven’t met him?”

“I got in late last night,” I explained.

“You’ll probably meet him today.” Rose looked at me with pity in her eyes. “Good luck to you.”

We heard the first man—Dr. Catron—sigh. “Her condition is worse than I thought. It could be deteriorating, despite all my noble efforts.” Then he spoke at a slower pace, and there were scratching noises, as if he was writing on a pad.

“Power cravings and critical thinking leading to brain overstimulation. Refuses to submit to those in authority.”

“I am not power hungry!” the girl wailed. “My whole family treats me like a maid, and now they want me to have a career as a maid, too? I just want a say in what happens to me. Is that so wrong?”

“Miss, that is the very kind of rebelliousness that can lead to hysteria,” Dr. Catron said severely. “Your belief that you know what is best for your life is a perfect example of hallucination.”

“Hallucination?” asked Laura. “I thought that was when you saw things that weren’t there.”

“Hallucinations are when you think things are real, but they’re not,” I clarified. “They certainly have nothing to do with disagreeing with someone. This sounds like they want the girl to act like a cog in a wheel and be happy about it. And Dr. Catron seems like a nut himself.”

Speak of the devil. “I think solitary confinement is the best treatment for this case,” Dr. Catron said.

“NO!” the girl shouted, and there were more scuffling sounds. Clearly, the orderlies were still having a hard time holding her down.

Rose sucked in her breath. “Solitary. That’s bad.”

“How bad?” I asked.

“Really bad,” Laura said. “Have you seen the Hold? That’s where they put you for solitary confinement. I’ve never been there myself, but I heard about it from other girls. It’s a tiny, windowless room with padded walls. No light at all. They chain you up and leave you there, and come in only once a day to feed you. If they remember to feed you.”

“What if you have to use the toilet? Or bathe?” I asked.

“Then you’re on your own,” Rose answered.

I felt bile rise in my throat. “That’s revolting! It’s a miracle girls don’t die of infections.”

“Some do,” Rose said quietly.

I was stunned, though perhaps I shouldn’t have been. I knew the first thing despots often did to break a person’s mind was to isolate them. I just didn’t know how often it ended in the victim’s death. But the conversation in the hallway wasn’t over.

“Perhaps she’s a good candidate for a more rigorous treatment, Doctor.” For the first time, I recognized one of the voices.

“Quite right, Nurse Cutter, quite right. We’ll have to look into that if the present treatment is ineffective. And it would certainly help us find out if she was . . . the one.”

“Precisely. I don’t think she is.” Dr. Catron sniffed, and the girl gave a little sob. “Though one never knows. Not until one performs the ultimate treatment, that is. But for now, just put her in the Hold. I think a month should do it.”

“No, please!” the girl begged. “Not for a whole month. Please!”

“Do you really think that’s wise, Doctor?” Cutter asked. “After all,” she lowered her voice, “ain’t that when the Event is supposed to ’appen?”

“Not so loud, Cutter!” Catron snapped. “There’s no need to discuss asylum business in public. I’m sure there’s plenty of time before the Event to find who we’re looking for.”

“What’s the Event?” I asked the girls. Laura shrugged and shook her head, but Rose knew something.

“I overheard Nurse Cutter talking to an orderly the other day,” she whispered. “Even though he’s supposed to be an educated man, Dr. Catron is very superstitious. He regularly employs a fortune-teller, who lately predicted that an inauspicious event will happen at the asylum in about a month. He says it is ‘written in the stars.’ ”

“What does ‘inauspicious’ mean?” Laura asked fearfully.

“Ah, it means bad, I’m afraid,” I replied. “Really bad.”

“Don’t fret about it, Laury-kins.” Rose put her arm around her roommate’s shoulder. “You can never trust what fortune-tellers say, anyway.”

“Who’s this person they’re looking for, then?” I asked. But neither Rose nor Laura knew anything about it.

“I only hope it isn’t me,” was all Laura would say.

We listened at the door for a few more minutes, but all we heard was the girl sobbing, and Catron and Cutter talking about ordering supplies. Eventually, their voices faded away, and we went back to sitting on the beds. We were silent for a while until Laura finally said:

“I don’t think I want to tell ghost stories anymore.”

I hadn't lied when I told Rose and Laura about arriving late at Silver Hill the previous night. Everyone but Nurse Cutter and I had been asleep, so there'd been no time to introduce me to the other staff. Which was why, shortly after my attempt at a "ghost story," I was brought to meet the head physician at the asylum. The only physician at the asylum, as a matter of fact: Dr. Catron DeKay. Following a lunch that bore a remarkable resemblance to the intolerable breakfast, Cutter escorted me to Dr. DeKay's office.

"Sit," she instructed, pointing to a hard oak bench.

Sit? Just like that? What am I, a dog? I sat.

"Doctor'll be with you shortly," she sniffed. "'E's in with someone else at the moment. Behave, now." And she walked away without another word.

Behave. As if I were going to run amuck in the hallway for no reason. I folded my hands in my lap and examined the dark, wooden wainscoting on the opposite wall. At the time, I wondered why no one stayed with this "lunatic" if they felt she was at such risk for misbehaving. I would later learn that Silver Hill was notoriously understaffed. But the door to the office was open a crack, and it gave me an opportunity to listen to the conversation taking place inside.

"It's like I was telling you, Dr. DeKay," said a man. He sounded very aggravated, though his tone with the doctor was respectful. "Geraldine here has become completely unmanageable." There were some crying and sniffing sounds from a girl who couldn't have been more than twelve.

"Please, Mr. Wexler, call me Dr. Catron. Everyone does."

"Thank you, Dr. Catron. As I was saying, Geraldine is unmanageable. She cries and mopes all the time if she doesn't get what she wants."

"That's not true!" Geraldine protested through wet sobs. "All I want is to be an artist. And I only cried when you threw out all my brushes and paints and tore up the canvases I'd finished."

"You see?" Mr. Wexler said. "This is the kind of behavior my whole family has to put up with. She makes life miserable for the rest of us who are content to lead normal lives."

"You mean boring lives," Geraldine said. I'd never met this girl, but I liked her already. There was a determination, a fierceness in her voice despite her obvious distress. "I don't want to be like you and Ma. You can both draw and paint, but you scrape by, painting other people's houses. You never try to paint anything of your own. And I know you hate your jobs, because you come home unhappy every night."

"That's quite enough out of you, young lady!" Mr. Wexler raised his voice. From the sound of chair springs, it seemed he had stood up as well. "Painting for fun was all well and good when I was a kid, but I grew up. This is real life, not a fairy tale. You need to be able to make your way in this world. Soon, you'll be old enough to graduate, and you'll have to get a job. What are you going to do then? Live on air? Give a painting to your landlord in exchange for a month's rent? Surely you must see how insane all that sounds. I don't know; what do you think, Dr. Catron? Is there any hope for her?"

"Oh dear, dear, dear." Catron spoke slowly, his voice low. "I can see we have a very difficult case on our hands. Chronic depression bordering on psychosis. No doubt brought on by an inflammation of the female brain. It tends to aggravate the more emotional, irrational faculties. But don't worry, Mr. Wexler. We specialize in treating the most willful, disobedient, and unmanageable girls in the entire kingdom."

Emotional is irrational? Catron spoke as if emotions did not have logic behind them. As if sympathy, compassion, and love were not designed to bind the species together and help it survive. Were they really going to lock up Geraldine because she wanted to use her gifts instead of deny them? Because she wanted to try? Being forced to live a tedious, unsatisfying life would make anyone depressed. Her reaction seemed perfectly rational to me.

"Well, Hartlandia certainly owes you a great debt of gratitude, Dr. Catron. Heaven only knows what life would be like if every daughter acted like Geraldine." Mr. Wexler snorted and Geraldine hiccuped, her bitter tears returning.

"It's no trouble at all, sir," Catron replied smoothly. "The disturbances of the female psyche have always been a specialty of mine."

"Well, as we agreed, I'll leave her in your care, and you can bill me at home." Geraldine's father sounded very relieved. "I do appreciate all you're doing. The country needs more good doctors like you."

"Indeed, Mr. Wexler. Indeed," said Catron. "I assure you, we'll do our very best to take care of your problem. I'm confident we can work with your daughter until she takes a more practical view of life. Believe me, when you see Geraldine again, you won't even recognize her."

"That's all I ask. Good day to you, Dr. Catron." Then Mr. Wexler's voice darkened. "Geraldine."

"Good day as well, Mr. Wexler." Catron's voice was pleasant and cheerful.

A stout, tired-looking man walked out of the office, putting on his hat as he left. I peeked around the corner and saw a girl on a chair in front of Catron's mahogany desk. I'd guessed correctly; she looked only about twelve, and terrified. But she sat rigidly, staring straight ahead. Doubtless it was an attempt to be brave. I saw the man who must have been Catron lean over his desk towards a collection of speakers and wires. He pressed a button and began giving directions into one of the speakers.

"Nurse Cutter? Would you mind sending an orderly up here for our new patient, Ms. Wexler? I believe we'll start with the standard treatment. Be sure to have the syringes ready." I heard Geraldine give a little squeal.

Standard treatment? I swallowed hard. Is that what they'll start me on as well?

I didn't have time to wonder long, because an orderly appeared almost immediately with a wheelchair—leather straps on the armrests—to take Geraldine. I quickly turned away from the door and folded my hands in my lap. It wouldn't do to have them catch me spying.

"Now, Geraldine," Catron said as I heard the orderly bind her to the chair, "everything will be just fine. A key part of treatment is to submit to the will of the physician. To surrender all your thoughts and feelings to my control. But I need you to trust me. Do you think you can do that?" Geraldine made no reply, but did give a little grunt as the orderly tightened the straps. Probably too tightly.

"You don't have to answer right now," Catron continued. "But it's something to think about as we begin the first phase." His next words were to the orderly. "Take her to Cutter. She'll know what to do."

I didn't dare look at Geraldine as she was wheeled out of the office. Although in retrospect, perhaps I should have. Even a momentary glance into her eyes might have given her strength, let her know she wasn't alone.

"Seluna, isn't it?" My heart gave a jump as Dr. Catron called my name, and his head appeared from around the door frame. "Won't you come inside?"

I stood up, brushed off my skirts, and vowed not to let my apprehension show as I walked into the office. I wasn't sure if handshaking was acceptable for women at Silver Hill. Still, I didn't want to risk giving offense, so I stuck out my palm. "Dr.—"

"Catron. Please." Ignoring my hand, he indicated I should take the seat opposite the desk where I was guessing Geraldine had been.

"Dr. Catron, then." I sat down. He did the same, leaning back in his chair, never taking his eyes off me. I kept to the edge of the seat, my back ramrod straight.

He was a slim man in his mid-fifties, with silver hair not unlike the color of my eyes. It was kept carefully in place with pomade, which only increased the shine. Everything about him spoke of elegant refinement. The cut of his suit, his manicured nails, the crisp lab coat . . . right down to the flawless silk handkerchief in his pocket. His voice was soft, his movements graceful.

With a quick glance around the office, I saw a cozy fire burning in the grate. It seemed this was the only room in the asylum where one wasn't allowed to freeze to death. There was a chaise lounge covered in red velvet, as well as a comfortable armchair where Catron sat. Across from his desk were two other chairs, including the one I was in. These were decidedly less comfortable.

The walls were lined with bookshelves holding medical texts. Framed certificates showed Catron's degrees from all over Hartlandia. The University of Dryden in the Northernlands, Windley medical school in the Easternlands . . . there was even a certificate for first place in a rifle competition at Dartport.

Certainly gets around, doesn't he? I thought to myself.

"Satisfied with my credentials?" There was a hint of amusement in Catron's voice.

"Sorry? Oh, yes." I worked to keep my own voice steady. "It's just that . . ." I tried to think of another reason a person might glance around an office. "I noticed there aren't any windows in here."

“Right you are.” Catron smiled. “Can’t have patients looking out the windows too much. They might see something that upsets them, or makes them overexcited.”

What would that be? I wondered. The sky? Air? We sat in silence for a few moments. I couldn’t help but think Catron was expecting me to do something.

“Not overly chatty, are we?”

Talk? He expects me to talk? He didn’t expect that from Geraldine. Maybe because her father was with her.

“I was taught only to speak if I felt the need,” I said hesitantly. “And only things worth saying, naturally.” To those worth saying them to, I felt like adding.

“Naturally.” Catron leaned forward and looked at a pile of papers in a folder on his desk. He said my name again. “Se-lu-na.” But this time, it was as he’d known me for years. As if I were returning to him from some long journey.

“Quite an interesting case, aren’t you?” He flipped through the papers, which I assumed were my records. “Seems there’s a history of, shall we say, odd behavior in your family?”

“Now, Seluna, I know this can’t be easy for you, but do try to cooperate.” I blinked a few times. Cooperate? I haven’t done anything uncooperative yet.

“Sorry?”

“It’s a pity your family couldn’t be here to see you admitted personally, so I know you must be disappointed. I understand you were dropped off at the train station, and then accompanied on the rail by Nurse Cutter.”

“That’s right.” I’m not disappointed. And it’s not a pity they couldn’t be here to admit me. It’s a travesty they had me admitted at all! A travesty . . . and a mystery.

I had considered running away after my family brought me to the station and put me in the care of Nurse Cutter. But one look at Cutter, and I knew she was the kind of person who’d hunt me to the ends of the earth. Also, at that point, I was more bewildered than anything else. As I sat on the train, I couldn’t fathom why my parents felt the need to send me to Silver Hill. Of course, I had no idea what this hospital was really like. If I had, maybe I would’ve taken my chances and tried to lose Cutter at the station. But if I didn’t know about conditions at the asylum, maybe there was a chance my family hadn’t, either.

“I’m only sorry you arrived so late that I could not see you.” Catron closed the folder and looked at me again. “You must have been very tired.”

“Ah, yes. Yes, I was.” I didn’t want to tell him how much more alive I became at night. It was as if I could feel myself getting stronger, my senses sharper, after the sun set. Even my vision was better, and I could get through the day with less sleep than others. But when the sun was up, as it was now, I felt drowsy. Almost like I was walking around in a fog compared to my nighttime awareness.

“Well, I’m glad you’ve had a chance to rest since then. It will make it much easier to begin our program.”

I raised my eyebrows. “Program?”

Catron leaned over the intercom again and pressed a button.

“Nurse Cutter? I think we’re ready to start with that other new admission.” He looked at me and smiled.

“The standard treatment.”

Chapter 3

I awoke from the dream of my first day at Silver Hill to a loud banging on my door. “Rise and shine!” shouted Nurse Cutter. “Breakfast in ten minutes.”

I groaned and sat up. Breakfast in ten minutes, stomachache in thirty. Damn the ungodly food here.

But the cuisine wasn’t the worst thing about Silver Hill. I remembered all too well waking up from my first “treatment” with Dr. Catron.

It took a while for my vision to clear, and for the grogginess to dissipate so I could understand where I was. I lay in a bed on wheels at the recovery station—a high-ceilinged room with windows (barred, of course) reaching to the top. My mouth was so dry, it felt like it was full of cotton. I had a pounding headache accompanied by waves of nausea, and my forearm was sore and bruised where they’d inserted a needle. It bled slightly, but no one bothered to bandage it. I was still strapped down.

I didn’t remember if I’d fought, or if they’d injected me before I even realized what was happening. All I knew was that like every other girl here, I’d been drugged—poisoned—in the name of medicine.

I lifted my head and saw long rows of beds on either side and across from me. Girls my age and younger lay in them, not too doing well by the looks of it. Some were crying, others were asking panicked questions. Nurses and orderlies milled about, checking patients, making notes on clipboards. None of them seemed to be doing anything to relieve their charges’ discomfort, confusion, or fear.

I ran my tongue along the inside of my mouth to combat the dryness, and heard other girls whimper, their beds squeaking as they tried to move. There were a few brusque words: “Stop that!” and “Hush, now.” Out of the corner of my eye, I spotted Geraldine being wheeled out, moaning. Then I heard heavy, determined footsteps walk up to the left side of my bed. I quickly put my head back down and shut my eyes.

“It didn’t go as well as I’d hoped with this one.” It was Dr. Catron. I made my chest rise and fall more slowly with each breath to maintain the illusion of sleep.

“Her answers were too vague,” he continued. “They could mean anything. We may have to accelerate treatment if we’re going to get to the bottom of this.”

Bottom of what? Accelerate treatment? My head still felt like someone was hitting the side of it with a mallet. I didn't know how much more of this I could take. Then I began remembering other details of the past few hours.

They'd given me sodium pentothal, or what was more commonly known as "truth serum." They'd asked all kinds of questions. My full name, where I was from, what year I was born. But there had been other inquiries as well. Stranger ones. What did I like to do at night? Did I look up at the sky a lot? Did I ever get the feeling I was different than other people?

My heart began beating a little faster, but I tried not to take deep breaths. Remember, Seluna, everyone in the recovery room thinks you're still asleep.

In my drugged state, had I accidentally told them something about my reanimation abilities? I don't know why, but it felt important to keep it a secret, at least from the staff. Even though it was a harmless trick, I didn't trust them with it. They might misconstrue anything out of the ordinary as a form of madness.

But it was doubtful I'd divulged anything. Catron said my answers had been vague. Saying one could make things come to life was pretty specific. Still, it was a disturbing thought. Did the people here have the power to make me reveal information whenever they liked?

"Don't be too 'ard on yourself, Doctor." Nurse Cutter's voice yanked me back to the conversation. "You can't win them all."

"True," Dr. Catron agreed. "At least I got a lot farther with the Wexler girl. A few more treatments and she'll have this artist nonsense out of her head. Her father will be very pleased. But I doubt she's the one. Too young. Still, it does help to take in extra patients, if only to pay the bills.

More talk of 'the one' again. Who on earth could they be looking for?

"Quite right, Doctor. Quite right," said Nurse Cutter. "In the meantime, what do you want us to do with Seluna?" From her tone, one would have thought she was asking what to do with leftover fishing worms.

Catron didn't answer for a few seconds, and it took all I had just to keep my breathing even. "For now, I just want to . . . observe her. If she is the one, then in time, she may reveal herself without us having to do anything."

"Always the optimist, Dr. Catron." I could tell by Cutter's voice she was smiling.

"Yes, well, if one doesn't have optimism, what else is left?" I could tell he was smiling, too. "Now, about those other patients we were discussing . . ." I heard their footsteps grow fainter as they walked away. Later, I learned that not only were most girls drugged upon admission to the asylum, but some were subjected to it more than once.

One would think that after such horror, the mind-numbing routine at Silver Hill would be a welcome respite. But even though I'd been here only a week, I was already tired of it. After an inedible breakfast, we performed a sort of catechism, though this one had nothing to do with religion.

"All right, ladies, pay attention, now," a nurse called out. This one was male; short, scrawny, and giving off a sort of intellectual dimness. But he was one of the only other professional men at Silver Hill besides Dr. Catron, so he got a lot of attention from the female nurses. Apparently, they thought the orderlies—most of whom were men—beneath them. Never so much as gave them the time of day.

We were in the solarium, whose barred windows hardly let in any light. We sat on hard, uncomfortable chairs like the ones in Catron's office. As always, the nurse asked silly questions, which we were expected to answer.

“Who is our doctor?”

“What does he know?”

“He knows how to help us.” Rose, on my right, rolled her eyes.

“And what does he do?”

“He does what's best.”

It usually went on like this for an hour, during which time I was sure I'd go hoarse. Then we had writing exercises (two hours), where we copied over and over from a textbook describing the “perfect” female. Apparently, this was one who did whatever she was told without question. I failed to see how writing the description till our hands cramped would ever make it true.

Afterwards, we had lunch, and two hours of exercising. Exercising consisted of walking in circles around the main entrance of Silver Hill. It was by far the largest space except for the cafeteria, which wasn't suitable for walking due to the tables and chairs. Of course, I hardly thought the main entrance was an appropriate gymnasium either, owing to its state of disrepair. It was a wonder more girls didn't trip over the cracked floors, or get brained by the occasional piece of falling plaster.

The only thing that relieved the tedium, at least for me, was the occasional glance at the stained glass window. And even though I didn't believe her legend, sometimes, I'd pretend that the goddess Selene was following me with her eyes. That she was my friend, watching over me. At least until I was caught.

“You!” a nurse would bellow, though sometimes, they had an orderly watch us, if the nurses were too busy. “Eyes on the girl in front of you!” And the tedium would continue. I sincerely believed the only reason for this so-called exercise was to exhaust us. That way, we'd have no energy left to do anything remotely subversive.

I couldn't even practice my animation abilities because we were in constant motion. Typically, I needed to be stationary and concentrating pretty hard to make anything move. And even then, I wasn't able to do it all the time. I always thought it would be amusing to raise a nurse's skirt a few feet. When the nurse realized everyone could see her knickers, it surely would've been good for a laugh. And it might have gotten us out of going around in circles for five minutes.

I don't remember exactly when I told Rose and Laura I could animate. It must have been in the first few days after I was admitted. I just felt like I had to tell someone. My family already knew, of course. Was that part of the reason they sent me here? I didn't see how that could be. What difference did my ability make? It was charming, to be sure, but that was all. A parlor trick, something to break out at Winter Solstice fetes for the guests' amusement. Nothing more.

After our exercise, we were tutored in womanly arts for the rest of the afternoon. This involved helping in the kitchen and laundry room. Though I didn't really see why one had to be female in order to peel potatoes and scrub shirts. After dinner, we returned to the solarium for fifteen minutes of supervised socialization. Just fifty or so girls milling around awkwardly, unsure of what to say to one another. Occasionally, we were allowed unsupervised socialization in our rooms. However, I suspected this had more to do with the staff's desire to sneak a cigarette or tryst than concern over our mental welfare.

Although I'd met a few other patients, I spent time mostly with Rose and Laura. We were enjoying a particularly long session of socializing today in the solarium, courtesy of a pipe that burst in the hallway of the girls' dormitories. Patients were unable to return until staff finished mopping up all the water. I hoped it would take at least half an hour. I saw Geraldine a few yards away, sitting by herself. Her shoulders were slumped, and she stared dejectedly at the floor. I considered going over and introducing myself, but then, Rose said something alarming.

"These treatments are getting worse and worse." Rose scrunched and un-scrunched the curls on the side of her head with one hand. We were standing by a set of windows overlooking the moors. There wasn't much to see; the overcast March skies put the gray hills in a state of perpetual mourning. "Tell Seluna what Dr. Catron did to you the other day, Laura." Laura looked down at the cracked floors and said nothing. "Tell her," Rose urged.

"He asked who some famous people were that I admired," Laura finally said. "I told him, Daisy Cartigad, the explorer, and Pearl Luxembourg, the animal rights activist. And then he shocked me!"

"Shocked you?" I asked.

"She means electrocuted," Rose explained. "Catron had her hooked up to this crazy machine, with plugs and wires all over. Every time she said something he didn't like, he gave her a shock."

"And that hurts?" Electricity was a new and exciting area of science, but I'd never heard of it being used this way before.

"Of course it hurts! It feels like . . . I don't know." Rose blew a curl away from her forehead. "Sort of like being burned, but worse."

My eyes widened. "You've had it, too?"

"No, I heard about it from a few other girls. But I'm definitely due." Rose swallowed. "Apparently, my 'condition' is even worse than Laura's. I'm sure that's the next step in my treatment."

I closed my eyes for a moment. Then it's only a matter of time till they start electrocuting me. Although I had a decent pain tolerance, how did I know they wouldn't accidentally turn up the voltage too high and kill me?

"Oh, Rose, I hope not!" Laura's voice grew higher, and she started to cry. "It's positively horrid. He—Dr. Catron—asked what kind of man I wanted to marry. I said, 'Before Papa told me I had to get married, I hadn't really thought about it.' So he shocked me again! He said the only people I should admire are those my father approves of, and that's the kind of man I should want to marry, too. Oh, how I wish Aunt Mae were here!" Her cries threatened to turn into wails. Rose put her arm around Laura, partially to comfort her, and partially to calm her crying so she didn't draw attention to us.

I frowned. "Aunt Mae?"

"My mother's sister." Laura ran a sleeve across her eyes. "She divorced her husband the first time he hit her. She'd understand why I don't want to marry the man Papa picked out."

I wasn't surprised that one of Catron's favorite pastimes was to convince us our ideas were crazy. But his most recent method left me flabbergasted. You may not have a family you can run to, Seluna, but that doesn't mean others have to suffer. I'd come to a decision.

"This is unacceptable," I said. "Laura, I've got an idea. This aunt of yours, is she nearby?"

Laura shook her head, and tears ran off her face. "No. She lives in Suxby."

"Where in Suxby?"

Laura squeezed her eyes shut, trying to remember. "Twenty-Two Harrow Way. Why?"

"Does she know your parents sent you to the asylum?"

Laura sniffed. "I don't think so. She and Mum aren't that close. But she sends me Solstice cards, and packages. She always said I could come to her for help with anything."

There was little hope of writing Aunt Mae a letter, or getting one from her in return. No patient communication with the outside world was allowed at Silver Hill. No visitors either, not that I ever heard of family members who wanted to visit. I grimaced at the very thought of it. As if my family would want to see how I was, or send me anything. I might as well be dead to them. But perhaps Laura's aunt was different.

"Maybe we can get a telegram to her," I said.

"But where would we find a telegraph machine in here?" Rose stopped holding Laura and put her arms out to either side, but kept her voice low.

I thought of the intercom in Catron's office. I bet if he had an intercom, there was a telegraph machine in there somewhere. There had to be, if only to order supplies for the asylum.

"I'm almost sure Dr. Catron has one in his office," I said. "I figure we have at least twenty more minutes until they finish mopping the hallway by the dorms. One of us can sneak into the office and send Laura's aunt a message." Maybe, if we're lucky, she can help Rose and me get out of here, too. But I didn't want to get Rose's hopes up by saying that.

"I'll go," said Rose.

"No, I will." My reply was firm. "The halls aren't well lit and I can . . . I can see better in the dark than most people."

"You can?" the girls said in unison.

I rubbed my temples. I still wasn't sure how much of my strangeness I wanted to reveal, but there seemed no way to avoid it. Doing anything else at the moment might put Rose and Laura in danger.

“Yes. It’ll be easier for me to get around, so don’t even think about arguing.” Rose opened her mouth to protest, then closed it.

I glanced at the corner of the room opposite the door, where a female nurse was flirting with Scrawny Male Nurse. The rest of the girls were facing the windows. This was my golden opportunity. I leaned in closer to my friends.

“Okay, I’m going to sneak away. Just act natural. Hopefully, I’ll be gone and back so fast that no one will notice I’m missing.”

“Good luck!” Laura’s voice was trembling.

“Ugh. This is so nerve-racking!” Rose ran her fingers through her bangs. “I’d kill for a cig.”

“Do not try to sneak a cigarette.” I pointed at her. With one last look over my shoulder at the nurses, I was still pointing as I backed away towards the exit.

The heavy door creaked loudly. I cringed, wondering what excuse I could invent to explain why I was opening it. But just at that moment, Scrawny Male Nurse must have said something funny, because Flirty Nurse laughed so loudly she snorted. The sound covered the door’s creaking. I slipped out, silently thanking the gods for whatever passed as wit from the mouth of that dull, skinny man.

It felt so good to walk the dark halls with no one watching, no prying eyes. It was almost as good as going outdoors, which we weren’t allowed to do either. Too “stimulating,” even if weather permitted. Though it was still cold and windy, I had the unbearable urge to run across the moors. But all the doors were locked, and only nurses had keys.

And I didn’t just want to be outdoors because it would let me run away from Silver Hill.

I think it was because being indoors all the time was driving me mad, if I wasn’t already. I wanted to run across fields and rivers and through forests until my heart burst, maybe with a dog or two by my side. I had fairly good stamina for a teenage girl. Funny, but I often thought there was no way I could ever run enough. Sometimes, it seemed I could go on forever.

Though the asylum was labyrinthine, I remembered the route to Dr. Catron’s office from the day Nurse Cutter took me there. And even if I hadn’t been able to see well, I could feel things in the darkness. I rarely bumped into objects or tripped, even when I was at home. The walls, the furniture . . . they seemed to speak to me somehow. It was as if they told me where they were.

But these hallways were dark even by my standards, and the few gas lamps set on low cast lengthy shadows on the walls and floors. I almost thought I saw things moving in them. I could have sworn one shadow was in the shape of a tall man.

I whirled my head around, my hair spinning over my shoulder. There was no man. Nothing was there except a long hall that ended in a pool of black. But it would be easy for a person to flatten themselves against the wall and disappear into the darkness. I knew that was what I planned to do if I met any staff on this little quest. I waited several seconds and listened hard, just in case someone was following me. But I didn’t want to take too much time; if I did, Nurses Flirty and Scrawny were sure to notice my absence. I walked on.

Catron certainly has a lot of strange artifacts in his hallways, I thought as I looked around. In addition to the typical solemn portraits lining the walls, there was a lot of Viking and medieval weaponry. I wondered if it wasn't Catron's at all, but left by the previous owners of the asylum. After all, the building had stood for centuries. I passed an armored knight that was at least a thousand years old. He stood next to one of the few windows in the hall, his shield and breastplate gleaming.

And then he moved. Out of the corner of my eye, I distinctly saw the knight bend his arm down an inch and swivel his head towards me. I nearly jumped out of my skin, then covered my mouth, laughing. I made him move, I realized. Pretty keen. Don't think I've ever animated anything that large before. Though I knew I had to hurry, I wanted to see if I could move him again. A ray of moonlight from the window passed over the knight, and I made him bow and salute me before returning to his previous position.

Hmmm. Reflecting light makes moving things easier. Don't know why I never realized that before. I picked up my skirts and walked faster down the hall. Now, I really had to make up for lost time. Soon, I saw the wooden bench that I'd been instructed to sit on by Nurse Cutter. There was no light coming from underneath Catron's door, so that meant he wasn't there. I wondered if the door was locked. I cursed myself for not thinking to steal a hairpin.

The floorboards—did I just hear them creak behind me? I turned around and squinted, but saw nothing. I reached out to put my hand on the clear-glass doorknob when someone's strong fingers clamped down on my wrist.

I gasped, and looked up to find myself staring into the face of Dr. Catron.

Chapter 4

“Seluna! How unusual to see you here.” He brought my wrist up to the level of his chest, then slowly lowered and released it. “Is there something I can help you with, that you are so eager to enter my office?”

I blinked rapidly. Hellfire. How did he manage to sneak up on me like that? Then again, the signs had been there all along. I’d simply chosen to ignore them. I had to think fast.

“Oh, is this your office?” I asked innocently. “I thought this was the utility closet. Nurse Sommers sent me to get some more mops for the dormitory hall. It seems they’re having a pretty rough time getting those floors dry.”

“Really.” It was a statement, not a question. “I find that hard to believe for two reasons. One, my name is on the door.”

I looked up, and sure enough, “Office of Dr. Catron DeKay” was carved into a gilded plate fastened to the wood.

“Oh, well, it’s awfully dark around here, you know. Hard to see which door is which—”

“And two, the excess water in the dormitory hall was mopped up ten minutes ago.”

Perdition. I was caught. Utterly and completely caught. Catron looked at me with eyes that seemed to want to pierce my soul.

“I think it’s time we faced the facts of the matter, Se-lu-na. You’re deteriorating, and quite rapidly. I think more . . . drastic measures are called for.”

“Drastic?” I swallowed. “What do you mean by ‘drastic’?”

I pounded on the inside door of my room, though my wrists and arms hurt from where orderlies had dragged me. “Hey! When are you going to let me out?”

“When Dr. Catron decides you’re ready.” The sound of Nurse Cutter’s voice was as final as the click of the key as it turned in the lock.

“When will that be?” I yelled. “A week? A month? The rest of my life?” Is this like putting me in the Hold? “Hey, where are you going?” I could hear her footsteps getting fainter and fainter as she went down the stairs. "Answer me!"

But she didn't. I had a feeling neither she nor anyone else would be back, unless it was to give me meals the following day. Or perhaps not, if what Rose said about treatment in the Hold was true.

Except for the fact that I might starve, it was hard to consider isolation a punishment. Catron probably didn't know it, but I often got my best ideas when I was alone. Then again, I had always been odd. But I didn't really think I'd starve. Just as I'd always been able to see with less light, I could usually get by on less food, though it was unpleasant.

Still, this was a complete injustice. Who the hell does Catron think he is? I hadn't done anything wrong, not really. I only wanted to stop people from getting hurt. I found my chamberstick candleholder and matches, lit a taper, and tried to think.

I had to get out of here. Not just out of my room, but out of the asylum. However, the more I thought about escape, the more I realized the inevitability of failure. Even if I could get past the locked doors and barred windows, then into the forest that surrounded the moors, I had no way of getting out of the forest. I'd been raised in civilization; I'd no idea how to survive alone in the woods in winter. And unless my reanimation abilities included raising my own dead corpse, I was would likely be made a meal of by some wild animal.

And where would I go? Home wasn't an option, even if I could make it there. After all, the people at home were the ones who sent me here. I wasn't entirely sure they didn't suspect the things Dr. Catron and his staff were capable of. I had no other family or friends who lived close by, and no way to travel to the few I did have.

Friends. Even if I made it out, what about the other girls? What about Rose and Laura? It was true I hadn't known them long, but what would they think of my abandoning them? As long as I stayed, there was a possibility I could figure out a way for us all to escape.

Fat chance of that happening, I thought bitterly. I'd already failed Laura once. What would they think once they heard I'd been locked in my room? They'd probably be more frightened and distraught than ever. And the staff would probably keep a closer watch on me than ever. I wouldn't have another opportunity to sneak into Catron's office and find his telegraph. Hopefully, once word of my imprisonment got to Rose, she wouldn't dare try either. It wasn't worth the risk of her suffering the same fate as me. Or worse.

Cursing, I watched as the candlelight made shadows around the garret. Still cursing, I walked back and forth across the floor. I kicked the wall in one corner. I expected it to give at least a little, to crumble like the rest of the rotting wood in here. But it held firm. Annoyed, I kicked the wall again, harder.

Ow! Dammit, that really hurt. Even with the thick tip of my boot, I could feel the pain vibrating through my toes. And the second kick had made a dull, thudding sound. Not what you'd hear from an old piece of wood. Whatever I'd kicked felt more solid. Substantial.

Slowly, I moved my hands over the bottom of the wall, sweeping away a thick blanket of dust and cobwebs. It was disgusting work, and I had to wipe my fingers off on my skirts several times; the mess was that bad. But I was so irritated that I didn't care. As I cleaned the debris away, the wall felt colder. This part of the attic wasn't made of wood, it seemed, but stone. That was why my foot hurt when I kicked it. But the wall was so dirty—and the attic so often dark—that I'd never noticed it before.

I found a large crack between the wall and the floor. There was a draft coming from underneath it; that was why the wall seemed colder. As my hands made their way up, and I paused to wipe them every few feet, I realized it wasn't a wall at all. I felt a large iron ring on the right side. The wall was actually a door.

Anticipating the door would be heavy, I put my boot against the wall next to the door and pulled the ring with both hands. The door didn't budge. I stood on my tiptoes and brushed the rest of the dust and cobwebs off it. Now, I could see its outline clearly. But no matter how much I pulled and pulled, the door wouldn't move an inch.

Blast. I really wanted to see what was behind it. Was it a secret room? Could it be . . . a dead body? I had to admit, I found the latter thought more thrilling than horrifying. It would certainly be a creepy and exciting find.

Gods, maybe I really am as loony as they say. Normal girls didn't think like this. Regardless, I had to know what was behind that door, even if it was only storage.

I pulled so hard on the ring that I lost my balance and fell on my tailbone. I swore, rubbed my backside, and stood up again. I gave the door a hard thwack with my palm. Damn this wretched thing! But then, I heard a click, and the door began gently swinging into the room.

What? You had to push the door to get it open? Perhaps the ring was just for show.

"Clever, aren't we?" I said to the door. "Getting me to hit you like that and all." I backed up a few feet, just in case the dead bodies behind the door weren't quite so dead.

The door swung open all the way. And although there was a draft, which I expected, there was nothing dead. But there wasn't a place for storage either. I peered inside. I couldn't glimpse much from the light of the candle, even with my keen vision. But it seemed to be the top of a stairwell. I stepped into the doorway and looked down a winding staircase, one whose bottom I could not see.

You have two choices, Seluna, I thought. Stay here, bemoaning your fate, or go down the stairs and see where they lead.

I was no coward, and staying up here was pointless. It was an easy choice. I debated whether to bring the candle. If someone—or something—dangerous was in the stairwell, I didn't want to call attention to myself. I may not have been a coward, but I wasn't a fool either. Still, no creature—including me—could see in total darkness.

Creature. I smiled a little. Exactly what was I expecting to find in the secret passage?

It was an intriguing question.

I picked up the candleholder and grabbed a small matchbox. Undoing a few collar buttons, I stuck the matchbox down the front of my bodice. For the first time, I wondered if it might be a good idea to sew in secret pockets, the way Rose had. I'd no idea how she'd gotten the needle and thread to do so, but if she could sneak in cigarettes, she could do damn near anything. Wrapping my shawl about my neck and shoulders, I cupped one hand around the candle flame so it wouldn't be killed by the draft. I took a deep breath and stepped over the door's threshold.

No sooner had I done so than the door closed behind me with a resounding thud. It nearly blew out the candle, but I hunched over it just in time. Now it was the only light in the cramped space.

Well, you're the one who wanted to go down the stairs, Seluna, I thought to myself. Now you've got your wish. I picked up my skirts and walked slowly, trying not to trip on the tiny, steep steps. I couldn't see that far in front of me.

In medieval times, twisting stairs like these were built to give castle owners an advantage in the event of an attack. They would have been able to sword-fight more effectively going down the stairs than an intruder would be able to do going up. Then again, I had no sword. I didn't have so much as a letter opener to use as a weapon if I needed it.

Bugger all. Should've thought of that before. Why didn't I bring something? Oh well. Too late now.

I tried to tell myself there was nothing to worry about. From the looks of the cobwebs in here, no one had gone up or down this staircase in quite a while. I wondered if Catron knew about it. Unlikely. He owned the asylum, but he wasn't the original builder. I'd never seen Silver Hill's blueprints, but if the staircase wasn't on them, Catron probably had no idea it existed. He never would've put me in the garret if he had.

The steps seemed to go on forever. How far down do they reach, anyway? Am I underground? Perhaps the staircase wound into the very center of the earth. I remembered a story where several men once ventured there, but I believe they did it by means of an inactive volcano.

I was still racking my brain for the name of the story when I came to the last step. Before me stood a stone door, roughly the same size as the one in my room. There was no need to try and open this one. I could already see moonlight shining through the large slit on one side where someone had failed to shut it completely.

I pushed the door open and peered around it. I wasn't at the center of the earth. I wasn't even underground. Instead, I was tentatively walking into the forbidden gardens of Silver Hill.

Chapter 5

It wasn't quite cold enough to see my breath, but it was still chilly. I re-buttoned my collar, flipped it up, and tightened my shawl. As soon as I cleared the door's threshold, it shut behind me. I whirled around, but couldn't see it any longer. The door's outline was covered by black, angry-looking vines. I felt around where I thought the door should be. Finally, I found an iron ring similar to the one on the secret door in my room. Not wishing to be fooled a second time, I gave the door a push. It creaked open, as I suspected it would. I pushed a second time and it shut tight. At least now, I knew how to open this one when I needed to get back.

It was late. No light from candle or gas lamp shone in the asylum windows; everyone must have been asleep. I could see where the formal entrance to the garden was: through several pairs of French doors with barred windows. Quietly, I tried opening each of them, but they were all locked.

Of course they're locked. I peered through the dirty glass, but couldn't see much inside. I did glimpse vast marble floors, however. Perhaps this was once a ballroom?

But the gardens certainly weren't fit for dancing, or even for a pleasant stroll. All around me were dead, stunted trees, about half the size that trees should be. They drooped and curled on themselves as if doubled over in pain. And they were black. In fact, everything that should be green or brown was black. Not the comforting, familiar black I loved. This was different. This was the black of dead things, of burned pencils and choking soot.

It looked like a forest had tried to overtake a graveyard. Not that there were headstones, but the entire landscape had a desolate feeling to it. The most noticeable part of this was the vines. They were as black and dead as everything else here, yet they seemed worse somehow. Like the rest of the place had given up, but the vines had just enough life left in them to do malice. It reminded me of a fairy tale where a prince had to hack his way through evil vines to rescue a sleeping princess. I looked around. Little risk of that happening here. I'd have to make my way through the garden on my own.

As if on cue, the vines tightened in front of me, growing thicker and more impenetrable before my eyes. They grew so thick that they weren't a wall of vines, but a wall of sheer darkness. Unlike most darkness, I could not find my way around this one. A particularly large vine began lashing out at me, twisting this way and that in front of my face. Even though it had no thorns, it sliced into my upper cheek. I felt a warm drop of blood drip down my face.

“Ugh!” I held my candle in front of me for protection. The flame lit the vine, but only for a moment. They don’t burn? What kind of demon plants are these? “Get away!” I cried.

Then the most bizarre thing happened. The vine actually seemed to listen. It stopped whipping back and forth and withdrew slowly, its sharpness no longer at risk of touching my skin. I could have sworn it was looking me up and down, weighing and measuring me.

It retreated into the black vine wall, which pulled apart to let me pass. I walked through slowly, expecting a trap. But the vines did not try to attack me, nor did they close behind me as I moved forward. And it might have been my imagination, but they seemed to turn a little greener as well.

Maybe I really am going mad. In fact, maybe I’m imagining this entire scenario. The hidden staircase, the garden, all of it. Then I saw the pond.

It must have been twenty-five feet in diameter, possibly man-made—the culmination of the moat that encircled Silver Hill. You could see where it tapered off into two outlets that wound back around the front of the asylum. It was still half-frozen; large sheets of ice covered part of it. And although dead trees surrounded the pond, the vines did not go near.

What’s so special about the pond? I wondered. Though there could be no doubt it was beautiful. The pond was so clear, and the night so dark, I could actually see stars reflected in the water. For once, it was not overcast or raining, and the stars shone as if someone had flung an armful of diamonds into the sky.

Written in the stars. Although a sinister phrase employed by Catron’s fortune-teller, I couldn’t help thinking it sounded rather pretty. I looked up. The stars seemed so far away, and yet, I could swear they were close to me somehow. As near as my own heartbeat. The moon, full and round, shone down as well. Its mirror image was in the pond, making it look as if the world held two moons. I momentarily imagined them as lovers, reaching out to one another across the universe.

Suddenly, out of the corner of my eye, I saw the water move. I don’t mean flow, the way water often does. Nor was this a tiny ripple beneath the waves. It seemed like something larger under the water was moving. Moving, and coming closer.

It couldn’t be a fish; it was far too big. An air pocket, perhaps? Do ponds even have air pockets? I didn’t have to wonder for very long. A brunet head appeared in the pond. It rose straight out of the water as if something was lifting it from below. Next came a dark, sinewy chest and a smooth, glistening stomach. It had a sharp face and bright, penetrating eyes. They were green eyes, the color of sea glass. Whatever it was, it was definitely male. Without knowing why, I leaped back and pointed at the thing with my index finger. I nearly lost my balance and dropped my candle.

“Don’t come any closer!” I shouted.

When I turned back, I saw that the “thing” was just a boy. He looked about my age. It was hard to tell, because when he spoke, he seemed much older. There was a weight to his voice; a low, resonant quality that sent shivers through me. Shivers that weren’t exactly unpleasant.

“Why not?” he asked, raising his eyebrows and bringing his hands out of the water. The tight curls of his shoulder-length hair dripped water down his chest. I couldn’t stop staring at it. He put his palms out to either side, as if to indicate he had no weapons. “Do you think I’m going to hurt you?” His tone was teasing, and a smile played at the corners of his mouth.

I was still standing there, pointing at him. I looked ridiculous. A boy had snuck into Silver Hill, and here I was with a finger in his face. What was that going to accomplish? I didn’t even know why I did it. As far as defensive reflexes went, most people would have at least put up their fists. Maybe I really am strange. I put my hand down and turned my head for a fraction of a second towards the asylum, praying my shouts hadn’t woken anyone up.

The boy squinted at me and cocked his head. His mouth made a little O, and his smile became one of surprise and awe.

“It’s you,” he whispered, staring at me as though seeing the sun for the first time. “At least, I think it’s you.”

“Of course it’s me,” I said very slowly, as if talking to a small child. “Who else would it be?”

“No, I mean, it’s just . . . never mind. I thought you’d be more . . . no matter.”

“Were you expecting someone else?”

“I . . . I’m not sure.”

The trespasser was clearly an idiot. Even more irritating, when I looked into his eyes, I felt like I was swaying. I don’t mean dizzy. I mean moving subtly back and forth, as if I were underwater.

“What are you doing here?” I asked impatiently. “There are no boys allowed. There’s hardly anything allowed, but certainly not boys.” And you wouldn’t want to be here even if you were allowed, I thought. Trust me.

“I’m not exactly a boy,” he answered.

Did the trespasser think I was an idiot? “You’re naked from the waist up.” I paused, then continued quickly when I realized I was staring at his chest again. “So, as far as I can tell, you look an awful lot like a boy. And if you’re not a boy, then what exactly are you?”

The not-boy swam to the edge of the pond closest to me and leaned his palms on it. This time, I did not back away or point my finger at him. I couldn’t help but notice the light blue veins and sinewy muscles of his forearms. He must do a lot of swimming.

“Some things are best kept below the surface, as it were,” he replied. “For now, let’s just say I’m Dym.”

“Dim?” I raised my eyebrows. “As in ‘stupid’?” His name would be the first thing about him that made sense.

The not-boy rolled his eyes. “No. As in short for ‘Endymion.’ ” He cleared his throat and quoted the first part of the poem to me.

“A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:

Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness; but still will keep

A bower quiet for us, and a sleep

Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.

Therefore, on every morrow, are we wreathing

A flowery band to bind us to the earth,

Spite of despondence, of the inhuman dearth

Of noble natures, of the gloomy days,

Of all the unhealthy and o’er-darkened ways

Made for our searching.”

“That’s John Keats’s ‘Endymion,’ ” he added.

“I know who John Keats is.” I glared at him. “What I don’t know is what you’re doing in a pond in the back of an insane asylum.”

“Oh? Is this an insane asylum?” The playful tone returned, and he clasped his hands behind his head and looked up at me. “I hadn’t noticed. I’m, ah . . . a shepherd. Have a flock nearby. Come to swim in the pond every once in a while at night.”

I pursed my lips. “That’s funny. I’ve been to the tallest tower of the asylum, and I’ve never seen a flock of sheep. Not for miles. You must come from a very long way off.”

Another annoying smile, and the swaying feeling. “Well, I definitely wasn’t born of your land, let’s say that.”

I didn’t smile back. “Aren’t you afraid you’ll freeze to death in there?” I jutted my chin at the pond.

“Not at all.” He made circles in the water with his arms in a leisurely fashion. “In fact, I find it quite invigorating.”

“The prospect of freezing to death?”

“I assure you, my body is made to endure all manner of temperatures.” Despite his suggestive tone, I rolled my eyes. Boys always think they’re invincible. That’s why they often die young.

“Aren’t you at least getting tired?” I asked. “You’ve been treading water the entire time we’ve been talking. You must be a strong swimmer.”

“I get by.” Then, out of nowhere: “I couldn’t help but notice you admiring the moon.”

“Oh really?” This Dym fellow was beyond forward, and bizarre. He must have been referring to the moment I glanced at the sky before he arrived. “How would you know? Can you see underwater?”

Dym tried to stifle a laugh. “Something like that,” he replied. Infuriating. “I’m rather obsessed with the moon myself, as a matter of fact.” Indeed, his eyes rose to the heavens, an enchanted smile on his face. “Here in Hartlandia, it’s always big and round. I’ve heard in other places it changes. You can actually see it get slimmer and slimmer as it goes from new moon to full moon and back again. I always thought that would be beautiful to look at.”

“Fascinating.” I gritted my teeth. “But you haven’t even asked my name yet.” I didn’t really see why I should tell him. Yet, for some reason, it bothered me that he hadn’t asked.

Dym stopped looking at the sky and set his penetrating gaze on me.

“What’s your name, then?” His voice was softer than I expected, and coupled with the way he looked into my eyes, made my heart beat a little faster.

Blast. I didn’t really think he’d care about my name. I’d have to tell him now. Well, I didn’t have to, but he clearly wasn’t a threat, so there was no excuse to be rude. “It’s Seluna,” I said.

“Se-lu-na.” He closed his eyes and let the name roll over his tongue, but not in the ugly way Dr. Catron did. It was more like he wanted to savor the taste of my name. This boy was even stranger than I was. And still, I enjoyed watching his full lips form the word, hearing it echo from his throat again and again. “Seluna,” he whispered. “Seluna.”

I waited a moment, but he didn’t say anything else. “Would you mind telling me what you’re doing here?” I asked. “What you’re really doing here?”

Dym shrugged and did a few backstrokes away from the pond’s edge. He must have been kicking his legs underwater, because I didn’t see them. “I told you,” he said. “I come here for midnight swims. Although, to be completely honest—”

“Aaahhh.” I folded my free arm beneath my elbow. “Now we get to it.”

“—I did have a feeling something important was going to happen here tonight. Most of my people have some measure of psychic ability.”

“Your people? Like, other shepherds?” I chuckled. “Does being psychic help them find lost sheep?”

Dym gave me a withering look. “It’s not a shepherd thing; it’s a family thing. Sometimes, it’s not so much a distinct message. More like a feeling you get. That you should be in a certain place at a certain time. Or that you’re going to meet someone.” His eyes lingered on my shape. “We’re also pretty good at reading body language, and knowing how other people are feeling.” This time, he peered at me intently, and I worried he was scanning my thoughts. Are such things possible? “For instance, right now, I can tell you’re deeply troubled about something.”

“You don’t have to be psychic to guess that,” I said. “Most folks admitted to insane asylums are pretty troubled.” I didn’t mention that Silver Hill seemed to be an exception. The only troubled people here were Catron and his minions.

“Riiight,” Dym said. “Say, you never told me what you were doing in an insane asylum anyway. And here I thought you were trespassing, like me.”

Should I tell him the truth? I didn’t know what I was doing, having such a frank conversation with a boy I’d only just met—one who went for midnight swims in winter, no less. And yet, there was something so familiar about him, it was as if we'd known each other for years. I shouldn't have been ready to trust him, but for some reason, I was sure I could tell him anything.

"My parents put me in here," I said finally. "I think they were afraid I'd end up like my sister."

"What happened to your sister?"

"Well, she's only a year older than me, but she started talking to animals. I don't mean the way people talk to their cats and dogs in those baby voices. I mean really talking to them."

Dym nodded as if this sort of thing happened every day. "Do you miss her?"

"I don't know. I mean, by the time I left, she was spending most of her time in the fields 'conversing' with the cattle."

"Not an easy person to get close to."

"Definitely not." I didn't actually know what happened to Aurora after I left for Silver Hill. For all I knew, my parents had her admitted to a completely different asylum.

"Is she the only sister you have?"

"Yes. I have an older brother too, but I haven't seen him in years. Last I heard, he was raising horses on a ranch somewhere. He's been kind of depressed since his son died."

"You had a nephew?"

I nodded. "But he had an accident riding one of my brother's horses. There was a barn, and a fire . . . anyway, they were both killed. The horse and my nephew, I mean."

"Sweet Sophia," Dym said, and let out a low whistle. "Sorry to hear it. But why was your family afraid you'd go crazy? Were you acting crazy?"

"That's what I can't figure out." A stiff breeze blew, and I tightened my shawl around my shoulders. A few of Dym's hairs blew back as well, but otherwise, he didn't seem to notice the cold. I had to stop myself from looking over his body for goosebumps. "I wasn't doing anything crazy. At least I don't think I was. Maybe they worried that with my sister's behavior, madness ran in the family. Maybe sending me to Silver Hill was a precaution. That's the only explanation I can think of."

I took a deep breath and tried to collect my thoughts. There was one thing I hadn't told Dym. Something I felt compelled to.

"And there's something else weird about me." I bit my lip.

"Oh? What might that be?" He cocked his head to one side.

"I can . . . I can sort of make things come to life. At least temporarily."

"I imagine any boy feels his heart go pitter-pat whenever you're near."

I quickly disguised my flattered smile with a smirk. "Very funny. What I mean is, well, here. Let me see if I can show you."

I stepped back a few feet so I could get my hands on some vines. Dym leaned forward on the pond's edge. I took one of the vines from a dead tree in my hand and concentrated very, very hard. For some reason, the vine let me pull it away from the rest. I knew it couldn't be alive, but somehow, I got the feeling it was sentient. I let the moonlight shine on it.

For a moment, it worked. The stem plumped up, and the leaves on the vine turned dark green, then light green as they began to unfurl. I could even see tiny plant veins beneath the surface of the leaves. But then, just as quickly, the vine twisted on itself and shriveled into blackness again. I let it drop from my hand and looked back at Dym, whose face bore no expression.

“You don’t seem surprised,” I said.

Now, he smiled, as if a girl reanimating objects was the most commonplace thing in the world. “I think you’ll find I’m very open-minded,” he said. “Believe it or not, I’ve seen stranger phenomena than that.”

“Really? Like what?”

“I’ll tell you some other time.”

“Presuming there will be some other time, or that we’ll see each other again.” I walked back to the pond’s edge.

“Oh, I’m certain I’ll be back. It’s very relaxing in the garden.”

“It’s not quite as relaxing on the inside,” I said darkly. “Do you even know what it’s like there?”

“How could I? Unless of course, you tell me about it.” Dym looked as if he had all the time in the world just to tread water and listen to me.

I explained the routine at the asylum, the restrictive rules. “It’s bad enough for me, and I’m fairly hearty. But for the other girls . . .”

“What other girls?” Dym asked.

I hesitated. Do I tell him about Rose and Laura? Best to keep it vague.

“The other patients,” I finally said. I detailed some of our treatments, including drugging, isolation, and electrocution.

Dym’s eyes widened. “Sounds ghastly. Why don’t you run away?”

I briefly explained the reasons why that wouldn’t work. Reasons I’d gone over in my mind just before I found the secret door to the garden.

“Well, I can’t think of a solution to your problem, except to do what you’re told until you’re released.” Dym splashed some water onto his face and ran his fingers through his hair. Why would he do that? I wondered. The water must be freezing. “Not believe what this Dr. Catron and his ilk are selling, mind you,” he continued. “Just go along till you fool them into thinking you’ve bought it. Hopefully, that’ll be enough to get you and the others out of the bulk of those horrific ‘treatments.’ You can always work on the family situation when you get home.”

“That was my conclusion as well,” I said. “I only managed to sneak away tonight because everyone else was asleep.” No need to tell him about the secret passage yet, if at all. “I’m not actually supposed to be here.” I indicated the garden. “It’s forbidden to patients. And to trespassers, obviously.” I looked down at him.

Dym grinned and floated on his back, showing only his torso. It made it look like he had half a body. A very nice half, to be sure.

I sighed. “So you’re just going to swim in and out of here whenever you feel like it?”

Dym stopped floating and bobbed up and down in the water. “Pretty much.”

I stole a glance back at the asylum. “Well, I won’t say anything. But make sure you don’t get caught.”

“Don’t worry, I won’t get caught. But you take care as well.” His voice deepened with concern. “I have a feeling that in a few weeks’ time, something will . . . happen.”

“ ‘In a few weeks’ time, something will happen.’ Could you possibly be a little more specific?”

“I’m sorry, but I don’t think I can.” Dym rubbed his eyes as if doing so would allow him to discern more, to truly see the future. “Again, it’s just a feeling. In nearly a month, a very important event will happen here.”

One month. An important event. Just like Catron’s psychic predicted. Was it a coincidence? Unless Dym was Catron’s psychic. But the idea of Catron trusting the word of a mere boy was preposterous.

I wondered if the girls and I would even last a month in this place. Should I ask Dym to get a message to Laura’s aunt? I barely knew him. Sure, he was fascinating, in an exasperating sort of way. But could I trust him? I decided I’d better wait. If he didn’t have the girls’ best interests at heart, requesting help could lead to disaster.

“Well, I’ll certainly be on the lookout for important things.” One month since I learned about the prediction, minus the week I’ve been here. That leaves about three weeks, if the psychic and Dym are right.

“Important things like me?” Dym grinned in that maddening fashion of his.

“My, aren’t we adept at self-flattery? Actually, I don’t know if I should make a habit of coming here.” Although it doesn’t seem like an entirely bad idea, given the alternative of staying upstairs. “But either way, it was, ah, nice meeting you, Dym.”

His cheekbones. Why hadn’t I noticed how high and sharp they were before? I forced myself to look away, but not before nodding politely. Then I turned to go.

“Nice meeting you, Seluna.” I glanced over my shoulder; he was swimming backwards, never taking his eyes from me. “Again,” he said softly as I walked towards the asylum.

Again? What does he mean by “again”? I turned back, but Dym had disappeared into the water. I peered closer. Had he drowned? Unlikely, given his superior aquatic abilities. But he couldn’t have swum around to the front of Silver Hill that fast either. I waited, looking at the pond for a few moments. Still no sign of him. Not even the bubbles on the surface of the water that a drowning person would make. I guess he really had swum off.

Quite the athlete, that Dym. Perhaps he’s training for the Titanympics.

I put my hand to my head. Ugh. That swaying feeling. The longer I stayed in Dym’s company, the worse it got. I felt like I was being drawn into a whirlpool, a body of water with only him and me. I imagined it making a funnel around us. I felt the heat of his skin touching mine, our bodies pressed together. I closed my eyes for a few seconds, and the feeling went away.

Others might have had a hard time finding the door to get back, but I knew to look for the iron ring. It was the kind of thing you wouldn't really see unless you were looking for it. I pushed on the door, opening it, and went back inside. I had only gone up a few steps when my skirt caught on a loose, rusty nail.

"Aaah!" I cried out as I fell, almost face-first, into a step. Cursing, I tore the edge of my skirt off the nail and steadied my candle, which had almost fallen as well. That was when I saw it.

Out of the corner of my eye, the candlelight glinted off something. At first, I thought it was a piece of gold jewelry. But when I brought the candle closer, it turned out to be the gilded writing on the spine of a very old book. The book rested on a step against the wall. With my taper held high as I walked up and down the steps, there was no way I would've looked down to see it.

Maybe it's lucky that I tripped, then. I tried picking the book up with my free hand, but it was too thick and heavy. Parts of the leather were flaking away. Pieces of loose paper had been stuffed inside, and were sticking out in various places. It looked bloated and waterlogged, as if it had been dumped in a bath.

Or a pond, I thought.

But the ink was still legible. Magical ink, no doubt. And the inscription on the cover hadn't been done by a machine. You could tell someone had lovingly hand-tooled it. The hinges on the book weren't modern by any means; I wouldn't have been surprised if they were medieval. All in all, it looked like an artifact that had been there for hundreds of years.

" 'Property of Queen Sophia Rose Delphi Del . . . something,' " I read aloud. I couldn't make out the rest; it was too worn and faded. I sat on the steps for a moment and gently turned the pages by candlelight. It seemed like a diary, or a scrapbook. Some of it was in Old Hartlandian, which would take me a while to translate. Thank heavens for that class on ancient languages I'd aced last year.

I gave a loud, wide yawn. I was too tired to look at the book anymore tonight. At least it would give me something to do tomorrow during my confinement, which I assumed would still be in effect. I climbed the rest of the stairs with the book under my arm and pushed on the secret door. Nothing. I pushed a bit harder, but it still didn't open.

I tried not to panic. I would not die of starvation in a secret staircase in an insane asylum. I took deep breaths. Worst-case scenario, I could just turn back around and get out through the door that led to the garden. But I'd have a devil of a time explaining to the staff how I got there once they found me. I put down the book and candle down and pushed on the door with both hands. Nothing. I leaned my entire body into it, but still nothing.

Damn it all. I gritted my teeth. I know the door swings open into the attic. That's how it worked the last time. Doors couldn't change the way they worked, could they? Was the iron ring on this side just for show as well? I gave it a quick tug, not expecting anything to happen.

My expectations were not met, which turned out to be a good thing. I heard the same click as before, and the door fell open into my room.

“Tricky, tricky,” I said to the door. “One would almost think you were magic. Or just sneaky engineering.” I picked up my candle and book and went inside, closing the door behind me.

I snuffed out the flame and lay down on my cot. I wasn’t thinking of how long I’d be in solitary confinement anymore. Instead, my thoughts wandered to the secret passage and its mysterious book. The unearthly garden. And the boy in the pond who I couldn’t get out of my mind.

It wasn't until one week later that I was let out of my own personal Hold. I was dirtier, not to mention thinner from reduced rations. They'd only given me one meal per day. I supposed I should consider myself lucky they remembered to feed me at all.

I managed to wash what few clothes I had in the pond. I even dragged a bucket full of water upstairs to bathe myself. It didn't work as well as an actual bath, but what choice did I have? I guessed I could have bathed in the pond, but it would have been even more freezing than the bucket water. And I didn't relish the thought of Dym coming upon me stark naked. Not really. I tried to tell myself that it didn't matter if he was there or not, that I didn't care if I saw him again. But I knew it was a lie.

Yet, what I'd told Dym about my admission was the truth: that sending me here as a precaution was the only plausible explanation. Oh, I never doubted that Mother and Father loved me, at least not until now. They'd always treated me and my siblings equally. And aside from the usual squabbles, I couldn't say my parents and I got along poorly. But I was keenly aware they never knew what to make of their odd, dark daughter. Unlike Helios and Aurora, who seemed to fit in wherever they went, I always felt out of place in society. I was more comfortable in the shadows.

Maybe that was why, sometimes, I'd catch Mother and Father exchanging worried glances over me. Or they'd have hushed, late-night conversations where I'd overhear my name. They never did such things when it came to my brother or sister. But I never thought I'd done anything that warranted being hauled off to an asylum.

I could only assume they knew something I didn't. Was my strangeness destined to morph into madness, or worse? If it was, why hadn't they at least told me, so I could prepare for or prevent it? Was it because there was no way of doing so? The uncertainty only made it all the more dreadful. Maybe when Aurora started talking to animals, they decided something had to be done about me before it was too late.

Anyway, it was pointless to ruminate on it too much. I had more pressing matters of survival at hand, like eating. Pity the garden wasn't alive; otherwise, I might have found something edible in it. But nothing grew there that I could put in my mouth, unless I wished to feast on dead vines. Though they did look a little greener every time I visited, which was odd. I'd heard of gardens blooming again in the spring, but not dead plants coming back to life. Unless, of course, I was reanimating them.

There were other odd occurrences during the week of my confinement. For instance, I had the strangest dreams imaginable. I mean, I'd always had vivid dreams. Some I dreaded, and some were so beautiful I dreaded waking. But recently, my dreams were no longer of my earlier days at the asylum. Instead, they showed me the moon, the ocean, and the tides. I couldn't remember the dreams exactly, but they seemed to consist of places I'd been, past lives I'd had.

It was funny; though most people described their dreams as being illogical, incoherent, I always felt there was an order below the chaos. I rarely had nightmares. Although some of my dreams were unpleasant, I always knew they were nothing to be afraid of. Sometimes, I dreamed of Dym swimming underwater, all wavy dark hair and supple limbs. It was terribly vexing. By slipping just underneath my awareness, he'd found a way to irritate me even when he wasn't there.

I managed to disguise the door to the secret staircase by hanging an old sheet over it. It was a good thing, too, because one of the junior nurses almost discovered the door when she came to end my isolation.

"What's this bedspread doin' 'angin' up 'ere?" She went to pull it aside.

"I wouldn't do that if I were you!" I blurted out. "There's a hole in the roof. You never know when a wild animal might get in and bite you."

The nurse yanked her hand back and stepped away from the sheet. "I don't fancy bein' bitten, I don't. But tsk! Puttin' an 'ole in the roof? That's destruction of property, that is. Dr. Catron's property."

"I didn't put the hole in the roof," I said indignantly. "It was there when I got here. Why would I put a hole in the roof?"

The nurse tsked again. "You askin' the wrong nurse, girlie. Why would you loonies do anythin'?"

I was fairly certain the staff wouldn't be interested in repairing the fictional hole, and I was right. As I dutifully followed the nurse down the garret steps for the first time in a week, I knew my secret was safe, at least for a while. Unfortunately, things hadn't changed for the better at Silver Hill while I'd been "gone." Not that I expected them to.

I met up with Rose and Laura in time for late-morning lessons. "Seluna!" Laura cried hoarsely when she saw me. She waved her hand hard back and forth. Rose broke into a smile and accidentally kicked the empty wooden chair in front of her. Fortunately, they were both sitting at the back, so Nurse Cutter at the head of the classroom didn't notice their outbursts.

As I slid next to Rose on the triple row of seats, I noticed that both she and Laura looked a bit paler, their hair duller. Even Rose's curls seemed limper. I pushed my satchel full of lessons under my part of the seat. I'd put the book I found in the stairwell in with them, hoping to have a free moment later to sneak a look at it.

"We were so worried for you!" Rose whispered.

"We thought they put you in the Hold," Laura said.

I leaned my head towards her. “No, they just locked me in my room.”

“In that freezing attic?” Rose asked. “Crikey, that’s nearly as bad!”

“And all on account of me,” said Laura. Now, she looked as if she was about to cry.

“Don’t.” I took a handkerchief out of my satchel and handed it to her. “It was not your fault. I’m only sorry I got caught and couldn’t reach your aunt. I don’t think we should try that again. It’s too big a risk.” The comment was intended for both of them, but I was looking at Rose. “Say, why didn’t they put me in the Hold?”

“Many girls, only a few rooms in the Hold,” Rose explained. “I suppose those rooms were occupied. Sad to say, but they usually are.”

I was very tempted to tell the girls about the secret staircase, Dym, and the garden. But it was probably a bad idea. They might try to sneak into the passage, or out to see Dym. It was safer if they didn’t know. Another part of me—a more selfish one—wanted to keep it all my own little secret, especially Dym. And there he is in my thoughts again.

Nurse Cutter was writing something on the blackboard. From the sharp, forceful way she moved the chalk, I presumed she wasn’t happy about it. Staff here often had to pull double duty, fulfilling whatever roles Dr. Catron saw fit to assign. I doubted Cutter had any real teaching credentials. I wasn’t even sure she had nursing credentials. The chalk made a terrible screeching sound as her hand went up and down.

“Did you move anything while you were in your room?” Laura whispered.

“Move anything?” I squinted to see what Cutter was writing, but her large body blocked my view. “No, I keep the furniture where it is. There really isn’t that much of it.” I stopped trying to see the board and turned my head to Rose, who was giving me a look.

“No, she means move anything.” Rose lowered her voice. “Like, you know . . .”

It finally dawned on me. Curse this daytime mental fog. “Oh, as in . . . no.” I didn’t mention reanimating the vine, because it would have involved mentioning the garden, and possibly Dym.

“Maybe you can do it for us later,” Laura said breathlessly. Her eyes shone, and she looked more excited than I’d seen her in a while. “If we get some time to ourselves.”

“Yeah. Did you ever think your powers might be our ticket out of here, Seluna?” Rose asked. “You could use them to pick a lock or something.”

“Rose, even if I managed to work that trick long enough to unlock the front door, we’d step out into nothing but a frozen wasteland. How would we get from there to someplace livable? Trust me, I’ve thought about it enough to—”

“Pay attention, Seluna!” I hadn’t even noticed Nurse Cutter staring darkly at me. “No extraneous conversation! Out of solitary for all of one ’our and already you’re makin’ trouble. You’d better start shapin’ up, unless you want to go crazy the way your sister did.”

There were a few giggles around the room, and I willed myself not to blush. Why did Cutter have to say that? And how does she know? Maybe she saw it in my file. She gave me one last glare and went back to writing on the board.

“Is that why you were admitted?” Laura asked, her voice even softer than before. “Because of hereditary madness?”

I closed my eyes. “I think so. Or something like that.”

“Well, I don’t think you’re mad.” Rose’s voice was barely above a whisper. “Though I can see now why you didn’t tell us the reason you’re here. Family reputation and all.”

“Ah, yes.” I nodded quickly, opening my eyes. “That’s it exactly. Family reputation.”

“It’s nothing to be ashamed of.” Laura reached across Rose, slipped her hand into mine, and gave it a squeeze. “Every family has problems.”

But not every family uses them as excuses to banish their daughter, I thought. But I said nothing of this, and just squeezed Laura’s hand back. “You are too kind,” I murmured. She really was.

“All right, everyone, eyes to the front.” Cutter put down her chalk. “We ’ave a treat for you today. We’re goin’ to read and discuss books.” She indicated the blackboard, where she had written “Appropriate Lessons for Young Ladies.”

“Not just textbooks, mind you, but actual fiction. These books was all written by Dr. Catron ’imself,” she said reverently. “So you know they’s going to be very, very special.”

The girls broke into excited titters. Books! We hadn’t been allowed to bring or read books during our entire stay at Silver Hill. But our enthusiasm was quickly squashed when we realized the type of books Cutter had in mind. Each short story we went over was about a different girl who bucked convention and did what she wanted with her life. In the end, each met with ruin and disgrace. I wondered if Catron spent a long time writing these volumes, or just dashed them off in his spare time for the joy of it.

We were done reviewing the stories and were starting to pack up for lunch when one girl raised her hand. I didn’t recognize her; she must have been a new admission who arrived while I was in isolation.

“Excuse me, Nurse Cutter, but when is music class?”

There were a few murmurs from the others, and I saw Rose frown. This girl was definitely new.

“Music class?” Cutter’s eyebrows shot up. “There’s no music class at Silver ’ill!”

“But when will I practice my violin . . .?” The girl’s voice trailed off.

Cutter stared at her. “We cannot ’ave you girls listenin’ to or performin’ music. It might lead to your feelin’ things, or gettin’ ideas.”

“What a Greek tragedy that would be,” I muttered.

“I’ll ’ave to make a note of this in your case file for Dr. Catron.” Cutter shook her head. “Now, all of you—line up for lunch. Quickly!” she barked, and everyone rushed to collect their things.

As I hurried to put papers in my satchel, the book I’d found slid out and onto the floor. I managed to jam it back in, but not before Rose and Laura spotted it.

“What’s that, Seluna?” Laura asked.

“Seluna, do you have a book?” Rose’s eyes darted back and forth, watching for Nurse Cutter.

“A real book?” Laura’s jaw dropped.

“Let’s see it!” Rose breathed.

Blast. I was caught. There’d be no hiding it from them now.

“I’ll tell you at lunchtime,” I said, then put my finger to my lips.

“Where did you find it?” Laura sat hunched over the circular wooden table where the three of us had gathered to eat. Rose was on my other side. She was also hunched over to obscure the view of the contraband in my lap. With its tiny windows and dark, paneled walls, the room resembled a tavern—or even a dungeon—more than an asylum cafeteria.

“Ah, near the garret,” I replied. It was half-true, at least. And although I’d gone back over the stairs thoroughly on my hands and knees with a candle, I still hadn’t found anything other than the mysterious book.

“It says ‘Property of Queen . . .’” Rose squinted at the faded inscription, but had as much trouble reading it as I did. “‘Queen Sophia,’ et cetera. Who’s Queen Sophia?”

I shrugged. “Don’t know.” I couldn’t remember if we’d studied Queen Sophia in history class. Looking over my shoulder, I could see the nurse/cafeteria monitor directing girls to bring their empty trays up to the lunch window. Mealtime was nearly over. We’d already deposited our trays, so hopefully the monitor wouldn’t be back this way.

“Wow, a queen?” murmured Laura. “Like a real queen?”

Rose bent her head to get closer to Laura, making her curls bob up and down. “No, like a fake queen.”

Laura ignored Rose, running her fingers over the book’s cover. “I heard Silver Hill used to be the royal palace,” she mused. “It was where Hartlandia’s kings and queens lived in ancient times.”

“I think that’s just a myth,” I said. Like the story about my name.

“Who cares who it’s by?” said Rose excitedly. “What’s in it? Is it a diary?” She carefully pulled back the cover, but couldn’t read the first few pages.

“Hey, is this Old Hartlandian?”

“Some of it is,” I explained. Then, after another moment, “I know a little.”

“What does it say?” the girls asked in unison.

I kept turning the pages, trying to find something Rose or Laura might recognize. “Well, my Old Hartlandian isn’t the best, and there are a lot of pages missing. So, it’s hard to tell exactly what the book contains. But I think it’s a grimoire.”

Rose’s brow furrowed. “A grim what?”

“That sounds scary,” Laura said.

“A recipe book?” Laura cocked her head. “What do witches cook?”

Rose made a fist and lightly bopped Laura on the head. “She means spells, silly. Witches cook up spells.”

I told them a bit of what I’d found and managed to translate during the past week.

“Interesting? That doesn’t sound interesting,” said Rose. “I think you meant boring.”

I continued explaining. “The new moon is for success, blessings, and planting. Waxing moon is for working hard on projects you hope to see completed by the full moon. Full moon is for fortune-telling, protection, and banishing. Waning moon is for healing, breaking habits, and releasing negative emotions.”

“Dr. Catron and his foot soldiers need a waning moon,” Laura snorted. “They’re full of negative emotions.”

“I think they’re just full of it,” said Rose.

I looked over my shoulder again and put my fingers to my lips. The cafeteria monitor was still several tables away, but her eyes were moving back and forth, looking for the slightest sign of trouble.

“Say, what moon cycle are we in now?” asked Laura.

I tried to remember the date. “I think we’re in the waxing moon.” I wondered if what Dym said about the moon in other places was true. Did it really change shape as it went from waxing to new to waning to full? It must have been convenient to look at the sky and know the moon phase. In Hartlandia, if one lost track of phases, one had to go to an almanac.

“ ‘Drawing Down the Moon. Must be done with a full moon,’ ” I read slowly. It was part Old Hartlandian, part New. Oddly enough, this made it harder to translate than if it had just been Old Hartlandian. “ ‘Done to honor the Moon Goddess or employ her power. Results in a trance state combined with a power surge that radiates through the body. Make . . . ’ some kind of circle.”

“I don’t know. It just says ‘make a circle.’ Open your chakras—”

“What’s a chakra?” Laura asked.

“Take your wand—”

“You’re supposed to have a wand?” Rose asked.

“—in your . . . something hand, and point it at the moon. Say . . . damn. This part’s been nearly rubbed out. I think it was a rhyming incantation. Wait—there’s more. ‘You should feel the moon being absorbed into you. Slowly lower your wand. You now have the power of the goddess.’”

“Pretty wild stuff,” said Rose.

“I wonder if we could draw down the moon, Seluna,” said Laura. “Maybe then we could get out of here.”

I shook my head sadly. “I don’t think that would work. We’re not witches. We don’t have wands, we don’t know the incantation, and so on.”

“Too many don’ts,” Rose agreed, frowning.

“I did look in the book for something that might help us get away from here, or incapacitate the staff,” I said. “I thought at the very least, I might find a way to immobilize Catron so he’d stop torturing us.”

Rose’s frown disappeared, replaced with an eager smile. “And did you find anything?”

I shook my head again. I hated to keep disappointing them. “I haven’t translated the whole thing, but most of the spells are for those with advanced skill in the Craft. Witchcraft, I mean.”

“Then what good is this stupid book, anyway?” snapped Laura.

Rose and I looked at one another. It wasn’t like Laura to be so angry. “Well, it was a fun diversion, right?” Rose put her hand on Laura’s arm, but Laura turned her head away. “And it’s really old, which is kind of neat.” Rose fingered the spine, glancing down where gold leaf flaked off on her hand. Then there was the terrific noise of a tray hitting the floor and several plates and bowls smashing.

“Dammit to ’ell, you imbecile!” the cafeteria monitor screamed in the face of a terrified girl. “I told you she needs ’elp. She can’t feed ’erself no more. She sure as anythin’ can’t bring up a tray on ’er own! You have to do it for ’er!” The girl was trembling, her hands clasped so tightly in front of her I could see them turning white.

The patient she was supposed to be helping stared at the ceiling, mumbling. Her eyes looked almost as white as the other girl’s hands, and filmy, as if someone had poured milk over them. Her dress and hair were askew, as if she’d had trouble getting ready in the morning. Or perhaps someone had trouble helping her, if they’d even bothered.

“I know that girl!” hissed Rose. “That’s Thomasina. She was admitted the same day I was.”

“Which one?” I leaned forward to get a closer look. The entire cafeteria had come to a standstill, with everybody staring at the monitor and her victims.

“What did they do to her?” Laura’s voice quivered.

Rose grimaced. “Don’t know. But I do know she spends a lot of time alone with Dr. Catron in his office. More time than anyone I’ve seen here.”

“I’ve ’ad enough of your antics!” The cafeteria monitor was screaming again at the petrified girl. “All you brainless loonies are alike. I think they should just get rid of the ’ole cursed lot of you. You can bet Dr. Catron will ’ear about this! Now, clean up this mess and line up at the door. It’s nearly time for your daily exercises.”

The girls formed a line. Thomasina’s friend hastily wiped the floor with several napkins, then gently guided Thomasina into place with shaking hands. Rose, Laura, and I got up slowly to join them.

“Why is Thomasina spending so much time with Dr. Catron?” I asked Rose. It was astounding how much I’d missed in only a week. The cafeteria monitor glared at me for reasons I couldn’t discern. I gave her a tight smile. She glared for a few more seconds, then began scolding the other girls for not lining up straight enough.

“All I know is she said she had a problem with the light,” answered Rose. She pulled the flap down tighter over my satchel to make sure no one saw the Book.

“The light? What’s wrong with the light?” I asked. We stayed close together, moving forward inch by inch.

“There isn’t enough of it, for one thing,” Laura said. “Haven’t you noticed? Sometimes, it shines down from the high windows, but other than that, you can hardly see it. At night, they never turn the lamps up high enough. I’ve got bruises on my shins just from trying to walk straight after dusk. Even in the solarium, it’s always so gray and cloudy. Oh, how I wish spring would come!”

“There’s something unnerving about it always being dark, about never getting enough sunlight,” agreed Rose as we went behind the other girls. Now, we waited for Nurse Cutter to arrive, like always, to take us to the main entrance. “It does terrible things to the mind, or so I’ve heard. I’m starting to believe it’s true.”

I stood in line, feeling awful for Thomasina, Laura, and the rest of the so-called patients here. With my acute vision, I actually hadn’t noticed the lack of light as much.

It’s a shame they can’t feel the darkness the way I can. Its comforting arms, its tenderness.

“Well, it’ll be spring soon enough,” I said brightly. “Just a few more weeks, right? Then maybe we’ll all be home, and there’ll be plenty of sunlight.”

“You mean if we go home,” muttered Rose. “And it’s not like we have the greatest families to return to.” The cafeteria monitor passed by, giving us the once-over. Rose smiled widely at her. Satisfied that our part of the line was straight, the monitor went and stood by the door.

“It’s not only the lack of sunlight that’s creepy around here. Did you notice the last few rooms at the end of the dormitory?” Rose asked. “The ones marked ‘Reserved’?”

“The ones with the horrid screams coming from them?” Laura shivered. “Or sometimes, the girls inside make no noise at all. Not even normal sounds, like talking or moving about. I don’t know which is worse.”

“What rooms?” I asked. I had to talk out of the corner of my mouth; turning towards Rose and Laura would mar the line’s perfection, but I didn’t dare speak louder. Staying in the garret was really starting to become a liability. I was all but cut off from the rest of Silver Hill, from things everyone else knew.

“Those rooms are reserved for permanent residents. You know—girls who never go home,” Rose said darkly.

Laura's eyes bulged. "Never?"

Rose nodded. "The ones Dr. Catron decides are the sickest stay here forever. If you manage to do what he says, or act the way he wants, you're considered 'cured.' In other words, you're sent home." She patted the hidden pocket in her bodice. I knew she was waiting for our toilet break so she could sneak a cigarette. "Sometimes, I think a few of them—especially the younger girls—actually believe what he says is true. That they really are crazy."

"Do you ever wonder why there are only young girls here?" asked Laura. "I mean, it says 'Lunatic Asylum for Unmanageable Females,' but you never see any older women."

"I don't think anyone stays here long enough to grow up," Rose said.

Or lives long enough. I thought of the patients Rose mentioned who died from infections after being in the Hold.

"That's true," Laura said softly. "Then there are girls you don't see anymore, not even in the rooms at the end of the hall."

"Yeah, like Geraldine." Rose pulled her bangs all the way back over her head, then let them flop forward. Laura peeked around the front of the line, but Nurse Cutter still hadn't arrived. One look from the cafeteria monitor and Laura jerked herself back into position again.

"What happened to Geraldine?" I asked. I recalled the spirited girl I almost met on my first day at Silver Hill, when I'd listened to her argue with her father and Catron. "Did she go home?"

Laura shook her head. "I only talked to her a few times, but she told me Dr. Catron said she was one of the worst cases. At first, he thought she'd be easy to treat, but it didn't work out like that. There's no way they'd send her home."

"Maybe her family came and picked her up?" I said hopefully.

Rose raised her eyebrows. "Have you seen anybody's family here since we arrived?"

"I know they're not allowed, except when the girls are admitted. I guess I thought . . . maybe to pick someone up . . ." My voice drifted off. We were all silent again for a moment. We hadn't known her well, but Geraldine had disappeared, and no one knew what had happened to her. It put a bad feeling in the pit of one's stomach.

"I wonder if they shocked her." My voice was barely audible. I didn't want to finish with the words "to death."

"I was shocked just the other day." Rose shuddered and rubbed her upper arms.

"Rose, no!" I had to fight not to gasp.

Laura nodded. "We didn't want to tell you right after you came out of solitary. We thought it might upset you."

"It was horrible." For once, there wasn't even a hint of sarcasm in Rose's voice.

I gave a lightning-quick glance towards the cafeteria monitor, but fortune favored us, and her back was turned. I took the opportunity to wrap both arms around Rose.

“I’m so, so sorry,” I said. She leaned her head against my arm, and I felt her shoulders give a little heave. Then I saw the monitor’s head swiveling in our direction, and quickly stopped hugging Rose.

“I think we just have to go along with them, like so many of the girls do,” I said, realizing how much my thinking echoed Dym’s. “Just pretend we’re getting better.”

“And what happens after that?” asked Laura.

“I’m not sure. If you’re sent home,” I pointed at her, “you may be able to contact your aunt Mae, for one thing. Perhaps she wouldn’t mind taking you and Rose in for a bit.”

“But what about you, Seluna? When I get home, do you want me to ask Aunt Mae if you can stay with us, too?”

“That’s okay, Laura. I can look out for myself.”

“But what about your family?” Rose patted her bodice again. She must have really been dying for that cigarette. “How can you go back to live with them if they think you’re crazy?”

I had absolutely no idea. I still hadn’t sorted out my feelings about my family, or confirmed the real reason they sent me here. All I had were conjectures and speculations. “I’ll figure that out when the time comes,” I said. “Don’t either of you worry about me.”

Nurse Cutter had finally arrived to take us to the main hall for exercise. We left the cafeteria in single file, with Cutter at the door. I was the last one to go out, but before I could do so, the enormous woman put her arm in front of my chest.

“Not you,” she said. “You come with me. Dr. Catron wants a word with you.”

Chapter 7

“Se-lu-na, how are you? Did we enjoy solitary confinement?” Dr. Catron’s demeanor was positively congenial. “Did we learn our lesson?”

I sat on the uncomfortable chair facing Catron’s desk and tried to resist the urge to strangle him. “If the lesson was how to survive on one bowl of porridge a day and no baths, then consider it learned,” I said.

Catron shook his head and placed his long, elegant fingers on either side of his armchair. “I expected better of you, Seluna. I thought a brief spell alone might clear your mind. Now,” his voice hardened, “would you care to tell me what you were really doing in my office last week?”

I looked him straight in the eye. “I wasn’t in your office. I was just at the door. And like I said, I thought it was the broom closet.”

“Where you were looking for supplies to mop up a spill that had already been dealt with?”

I gritted my teeth. “Obviously, that news had not yet reached me.”

For a few moments, Catron said nothing. Finally, he sighed. “You’re really sticking with that story, aren’t you?”

“I told you, it’s not a story.”

“As you wish. You are certainly one of the most fascinating cases of my career. I can see now that I’ll have to find more . . . appropriate strategies to address your condition.”

My condition? Which was what, exactly?

“I’m surprised you didn’t try to shock me like you did Rose and Laura,” I said boldly. “What with my condition being so horrendous and all.”

“That remains an option for the future.” Catron returned my stare. “Though such therapy is not effective for everyone. Sometimes, we don’t use it on cases we feel are too advanced.”

“Advanced?”

“It’s like trying to staunch blood flow from a gunshot wound with a napkin.” He put his palms out in a gesture of helplessness. “But don’t think I don’t notice your hesitation, your resistance to treatment. I was so hoping you’d be different than the other patients here.” He looked at me and stroked his smooth chin. “Special, somehow. But regardless, everything we do at Silver Hill has a purpose. I promise that if you cooperate, someday, this pain will be useful.”

“Maybe to you,” I retorted.

Catron smiled, but the smile did not reach his eyes. “You’re a fiery girl, Seluna. We’ll have to see what we can do about that.” He pressed a button on his intercom, but continued looking at me while leaning over it. “Come to my office,” he said. “It’s time to take her back.” Not three minutes later, Nurse Cutter arrived.

“Dr. Catron, I—”

“Not now.” Catron was riffling through papers on his desk. Occasionally, he would glance at me and make notes. We hadn’t spoken a word to each other since he called Cutter on the intercom.

“But I can’t be takin’ ’er back now, sir.” It was the first time I’d ever seen Cutter look frazzled. “We got trouble with that girl who dropped ’er tray in the cafeteria today. Now she’s walkin’ into walls, and a few of them other ones, too.”

“Thomasina,” I said. “Her name is Thomasina.” Both of them ignored me.

“They ain’t listenin’ to us no more. I don’t know if they don’t understand, or they’re just bein’ willful. But either way, the staff is havin’ a devil of a time corrallin’ them, cleanin’ up after them—”

“I don’t want to hear excuses, Cutter!” Catron snapped. The burly woman took a step back. “I don’t care what you do with her.” He indicated me. “Just get her out of here.”

I expected Cutter to make a few more remarks. But to my surprise, she simply nodded and said, “Yes, sir.” Then she grabbed me roughly by the upper arm. “C’mon, you!” She yanked me out of the chair and into the hall. I only just managed to grab my satchel as we left.

Before I knew what was happening, she pushed me onto the bench outside Catron’s office. I felt cold metal on my wrist, and realized she was handcuffing me to the armrest.

“What’s this?” I asked in disbelief.

“A precaution. Can’t ’ave you go runnin’ off on your own. Not after you almost broke into Dr. Catron’s office.”

“I’d hardly call attempting to turn a doorknob ‘breaking in.’ ” And since when does Nurse Cutter carry handcuffs? Perhaps she always has them on her, and I just never noticed.

“See?” snapped Cutter. “It’s that kind of thinkin’ that gets girls like you in trouble. Now, the good doctor don’t need to know you’re ’ere. Don’t make a peep—just pray he don’t come out. I’ll be back for you as soon as I’m done dealin’ with them other sickos. If you know what’s good for you, you’ll stay right there on that bench.”

I looked at the handcuff. I looked at Nurse Cutter.

“Do I have a choice?”

She glared at me with her beady, animal eyes. “Just. Stay. Put.” Then she walked away down the hall, heavy shoes echoing.

I jerked at the handcuff, then examined it. Maybe I can animate it and make it open. I stared at the cuff and concentrated very hard. Although I managed to bend the metal back and forth, I couldn’t enlarge the opening around my wrist enough to wriggle out. And my abilities did nothing to trigger the locking device inside the handcuff. I definitely needed a key.

With nothing to do except wait for Cutter to return and “rescue” me, I listened to what was going on in Catron’s office. He was speaking to someone on the intercom, but I couldn’t make out what the other party was saying.

I saw a stout, perspiring orderly walk towards me from the other end of the hall. He had on stained overalls instead of his usual orderly’s uniform, but I recognized him from my previous weeks at the asylum. He carried an open, metal toolbox with various hammers, wrenches, and pliers spilling out.

If he thought it was odd that a patient was handcuffed to a bench, he said nothing about it. For all I knew, he saw girls at Silver Hill in similar situations all the time. It was a disturbing thought. He walked right up to Catron’s office, then stopped and leaned his head towards me.

“Psst—’ey, you there. Girlie. ’Ow’s the doctor feelin’ today?”

“Feeling?”

The orderly rolled his eyes. “Don’t tell me you’re one o’ them loonies who can’t even understand a sentence. I really need to know, see. Is ’e feelin’ all right?”

“All right?”

The man rolled his eyes again.

“He seemed like his usual self when I was just in there,” I finally said. His usual self just happens to be a sadistic nut bag.

“I can’t risk goin’ in there if ’e’s not ’imself, see? ’E’s in an especially funny mood these days because of that new girl, Seluna.” He squinted at me. “What they call you, by the way?”

“Mary,” I answered quickly. Why would Catron be in a funny mood because of me? Is it because I tried to break into his office?

The orderly nodded slowly. “Well, you just do what the good doctor tells you, you ’ear? And there won’t be no trouble.”

“Yes, sir. Absolutely, sir.”

Satisfied, he gave a sharp nod and a grunt, then walked into Catron’s office.

“’Ello, Dr. Catron.” I could tell by the orderly’s voice he was smiling with artificial cheer. “’Ow are you today?”

“Fairly well. And yourself?”

“Oh, splendid. Splendid I am, thank you, sir. Accounts going well, then?”

“What? Oh, yes. Lunacy is a lucrative business, after all.” Catron definitely didn’t know I was in the hall; he’d never speak so freely if he did. At least I didn’t think he would. And it seemed he wasn’t on the intercom anymore. I tried to twist my neck and look in the office to see what he was doing. But the bench was too far away, and my prisoner status limited my mobility.

“Good, good. Glad to ’ear it. I did like you asked and took a look at them pipes. Now, you didn’t ’ire me to be a plumber—not that I’m complainin’, mind you—but I tightened everythin’ that could be tightened. Took me over a week, but I think it's safe to say the dormitories will be 'igh and dry from now on."

"Excellent," replied Catron. "Mr. . . ."

"Flack," the orderly said. "Flack's the name, sir. Remember?"

"Ah, yes. Flack. Fine work there. You may go now." There was a pause, and then I heard Flack say:

"Beggin' your pardon, Doctor, but you 'ad any luck findin' . . . the creature?"

The creature? Is that "the one" Catron mentioned seeking before?

"Mmmm?" I got the impression Catron was looking at something else, only half-listening to Flack.

"You know," Flack lowered his voice, "the creature. You said if only you could locate one, you might be able to open up its brain and find out where the goddess is."

Is "the one" the same person as the goddess they're talking about? It would make sense, since Catron had said whomever they were looking for was female. But that would mean the creature was something else. Were they using goddess as a metaphor? Maybe it was an ancient artifact, like a statue. But if that were true, why search for it at an asylum? One would need to host an archeological dig or something. Silver Hill was getting more bizarre by the minute.

"Possibly," replied Catron. There was the sound of a fountain pen scratching paper. "Rumor has it one was seen not far from here—a young male with dark skin."

My heart froze. Dym had dark skin. He was the only male anything within miles that did. Were they talking about him? What kind of creature was he? I always thought he was just a boy. A strange boy, yes, but still a boy.

"Splendid! P'raps it'll save us all a lot o' trouble." Then the orderly's voice became more serious. "I 'ate to bring it up, sir, but what about Seluna? Should we move 'er to a regular room? Nurse Cutter was sayin' it might be best. Better to keep an eye on 'er that way and all."

A regular room? Would that be better or worse? No more freezing garret, but more pairs of eyes on me. And I'd lose access to the secret passage, as well as any chance of seeing Dym.

Catron paused in thought. "No," he said finally. "Let her stay where she is. She may stir things up if we put her nearer to the general population. That one seems like trouble, if my instincts are correct."

The orderly snorted. "Don't need instincts to see that. Breakin' into people's offices. What's the world comin' to, eh?"

"Indeed." The sound of shuffling papers indicated Catron wasn't that engaged in the conversation.

"I know it's not my place, sir, but wouldn't it just be easier to, you know, perform that there final procedure on the patients straight off?"

Another pause, then Catron spoke very slowly. "If we performed it on them straight off, it wouldn't be the final procedure, now, would it? And no, it's not your place." It was the tone of a man trying very hard to keep his patience.

“I know, sir, I know. It’s just an awful lot of ’ard work, this is. Them shock treatments is bad enough. Bringin’ these girls in and out, then ’avin’ to take care of ’em when they can’t wash themselves no more. Doin’ that final procedure first could save us a lot o’ time.”

I could only envision the withering look Catron was giving Flack. “Don’t be stupid. Can you imagine the public outcry if I had an asylum full of patients who received the final procedure? Most of my clients want their girls cured, or at least compliant. The final procedure is only for the very worst cases. And she would certainly be one of the worst. The most power hungry, the most unpredictable. As for taking care of patients, that’s your job. So, I suggest you do it. Now, if you will leave me in peace, I have a great deal of work ahead of me. Work which does not involve explaining my methods to simpletons like you.”

“Beggin’ your pardon, Doctor. I didn’t mean to put you off.”

Catron sighed. “I must say, the thought of it is tempting. In the best-case scenarios, those who survive the procedure become remarkably calm and docile. You’d hardly know they had feelings or emotions at all. It would mean fewer willful females in the world. We’d be doing all of Hartlandia a great service.”

“You said ‘best-case scenarios,’ sir. Just curious, what ’appens in them worst ones?”

“What can I say?” Dr. Catron replied. “Not all patients’ bodies are meant to withstand the procedure. Then there are those who succumb to complications. Even with all the advents of modern medicine, it can’t be helped. But none of that matters. All that matters is finding her. We must find her!” His voice grew louder, more adamant than I’d ever heard him. The floorboards in the office creaked; I thought Flack must have taken a wide step back.

“We cannot let her mission in this world come to pass!” Catron continued. “We must find and remove the source of her power.”

“Are you sure she’d be only seventeen or so, Dr. Catron?” Flack asked in a quieter voice. I imagined he didn’t want to upset his employer any more than he accidentally had. “We could expand the search, admit them females much older—or much younger.”

“No. All my prognostications indicate she arrived roughly seventeen years ago. Yet, we keep trying and trying, with no luck.” Catron’s voice grew tighter. “It’s beyond frustrating.”

“Don’t worry, Doctor,” said Flack soothingly. “We’ve got an asylum full of—what do you call ’em—‘viable candidates’? And new admissions every day, too. She’s sure to be ’ere somewhere.”

There was a long pause before Catron finally replied. “You’re right, Mr. Flack. With enough diligence and hard work, we’ll find her.” He repeated his final thought:

Later that night, I sat on my bed, making charcoal sketches in the few blank pages in the back of the Book. I hated to despoil what might be a sacred text, but it would have been too hard to steal sheets of loose-leaf from the schoolroom. The staff's eyes were vigilant, especially around me. At least I'd managed to get some charcoal out of my otherwise useless fire grate.

After Flack left Catron's office, Nurse Cutter came to pick me up. I managed to leave with her before Catron discovered I was eavesdropping, but only just. As Cutter and I turned a corner, I heard Catron's door click shut, and his footsteps echo down the opposite corridor. I ruminated about what I had overheard for the rest of the day.

So the goddess Catron seeks is an actual person? Can a goddess even be a person? What's her mission and the source of her power? I drew a picture of Rose, Laura, and the front hall's stained glass window. Could she really be somewhere at Silver Hill?

What might it be like to meet a goddess? I drew some more detail on the image of the stained glass. Pity I couldn't do it in color. She must be very beautiful. I added some length to the hair of the figure in the window. But what if she was a dark goddess? I might not be so keen on meeting her, then.

Then there was the matter of the "creature" the two men had mentioned. I had no evidence they were talking about Dym, and no reason to feel frightened for his safety if I did. Yet, I felt I had a duty—or more like a compulsion—to warn him.

Most sinister of all was the "final procedure" they'd gone on about. I put down my charcoal and looked out at the cloudy night. What could they be doing to girls that would leave them in worse shape than Thomasina? That might possibly end in their deaths? I wished I had some way to find out.

Although I wasn't much for writing poetry, I'd found the afternoon's events perversely inspiring. For some reason, they reminded me of a neighbor's garden near my home that I watched every spring for signs of life. Will life ever return to Silver Hill? Or will all that ever takes place here revolve around pain and death? I scribbled the following in the back of the Book:

“Growing”

‘Someday this pain
will be useful’?
I hope to the gods
that’s true;
because I am heartsick and discontent to watch the undeserving make off with my happiness.

A neighbor’s trellis vine every year the same—turns bare brown to green to rose, yet I never expect the flowers.
I pray hard that all the good of my life will suddenly burst forth into bloom.

It might not have been Keats’s “Endymion,” but that was all right. No one would see it but me.

Then, out of the corner of my eye, I glimpsed something white and fluttering. My heart skipped a beat. Could it be a ghost? A real, live ghost right here in my room? Well, it wouldn’t be a live ghost, of course. That would be contradictory. Still, meeting a ghost would certainly be interesting.

I sighed and went to investigate. Why couldn’t I be afraid of things like normal girls? As I got closer, I realized it was just the sheet I’d placed over the entrance to the secret staircase. But there was no wind in the room, so I couldn’t tell what had made it move. I pulled the sheet back, pushed the door in slightly, and watched as it swung out. I held my candle in the stairwell, but it didn’t flutter. The breeze hadn’t come from inside the staircase either.

I hesitated only a moment before grabbing my shawl, closing the door, and heading down the stairs. Maybe the moving sheet was the garden's way of beckoning to me. Or Dym's, I thought.

Either way, I decided it was a call I had to answer.

It had been over a week since I visited the garden. Not much had changed, though the dead vines did seem greener than I remembered. The pond was less frozen, but the water couldn't be suitable for swimming yet. Still, it felt good to be outside instead of trapped indoors all day. Especially after overhearing Dr. Catron and Mr. Flack. Apparently, the inside of Silver Hill was even more dangerous than I had imagined.

I walked towards the pond; I knew the way now. The vines gave me no more trouble and parted easily, almost as if they were bowing to me. I walked over the gray, cracked pavement stones, stopping only to move the errant branch out of my way. Then I felt something small and soft beneath my foot. I looked down to find a dead rat lying on its side.

Most other girls would have shuddered with revulsion, but I just cocked my head and looked at the rodent. I was surprised to find anything living (well, formerly living) in the garden. The moon peeked out from between gray clouds, and I focused very hard on my discovery.

It worked. The rat slowly got off its side and stood on all fours. It yawned, as if awakened from a long sleep. Then it took a few wobbling steps towards a large, dead tree. It tottered several more inches and fell on its side again. Try as I might, I could not reanimate it a second time. I went over and nudged it with my boot. It was definitely—permanently—dead.

Incredible. Even though my second attempt failed, I couldn't help but be a little giddy. I'd never reanimated anything as big as a rat before. A few insects and a mouse or two, yes. But never a rat. It was grotesquely impressive. I smiled as I walked the last few yards to the pond.

I looked all around, but didn't see Dym. I even peered towards the far ends of the moat on either side of the garden. Nothing.

It was silly to come, to think he'd be here. I walked the perimeter of the pond twice, just to enjoy the night. Not because I was hoping he'd show or anything. I was about to turn back to the asylum when I heard a splash . . . and a voice.

"Well, well, well. If it isn't the goddess herself." Dym smiled and swam to the edge of the pond where I stood. Once again, his body was only visible from the waist up. Why he swam shirtless in freezing water, I'd never know. But he looked as beautiful as I'd ever seen him, though I'd only seen him once.

"Goddess?" For some reason, hearing him say that made my heart leap. But I wasn't sure if it was in a good way or a bad way. "What did you mean by that?"

Dym shrugged. "It was just a figure of speech. Beautiful girl, moonlit night." He raised his eyes to the heavens. "Almost ethereal, don't you agree?" Then he said:

“Yes, in spite of all,
Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
From our dark spirits. Such the sun, the moon,
Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils
With the green world they live in; and clear rills
That for themselves a cooling covert make
'Gainst the hot season; the mid forest brake,
Rich with a sprinkling of fair musk-rose blooms:
And such too is the grandeur of the dooms.”

“More Keats?” I asked, and he nodded. I had to admit, Dym had a fine voice for poetry. It seemed to reach inside and reverberate within. And he put just the right emphasis on the words, drawing the listener into Keats’s world. If Dym was looking for a career, he could easily be an orator.

The swaying feeling wasn’t quite as bad this time when I was near him. It was distant, like the sounds of the sea one would hear walking along a beach. I wondered if the swaying had served its purpose. Was it trying to tell me something about Dym the first time I’d met him?

“You know, I still can’t understand how you keep getting into Silver Hill’s garden,” I said. “Even if you used the moat to swim around back, you’d have to get through the forest and across the moors. That’s an awfully long way through some very wild country just to go for a swim.”

“What can I say?” Dym did the backstroke towards the center of the pond and stayed there for a few moments. “I’m fanatical about fitness.”

“Riiight,” I said. Then I tilted my head. Though Dym was now in the middle of the water, he wasn’t moving his arms to keep afloat. It almost looked like he was standing in the water. But the pond couldn’t be that shallow if it was the same depth as the moat. Moats often went down as far as thirty feet to discourage intruders. So, unless he was over thirty feet tall, Dym would sink to the bottom.

Curiouser and curiouser.

“Why do you swim all the time?” I asked. “I mean, truly. Are you training for something?”

“You seem to think swimming is awfully hard work. I, on the other hand, find it relaxing.” He floated back towards the edge of the pond where I stood, hardly moving his arms at all. He must have some very powerful legs underneath there. I tried not to think about them too much.

Instead, I shrugged. “When I was in school back home, some of the girls used to sneak out to the Crazy Raven in town to relax.”

"I'm afraid I don't frequent pubs," Dym replied. The moonlight seemed to play on the waves in his hair, making them shimmer and shine.

"You don't drink?" Most boys I knew liked to brag about how much liquor they could hold, whether it was true or not.

"Oh, I drink, all right." He smiled wryly. "Like a fish."

"But you don't get your spirits from a pub. Do you raid your parents' liquor cabinet, then?"

"No, no." Dym's shoulders shook in silent laughter. Whatever private joke he was having at my expense was grating. "Where else do you go with your friends to have fun?" he finally asked. "When you're not sneaking out to the Crazy Raven, that is."

"Friends? Fun? I, ah . . ." I couldn't think of an answer that didn't make me sound like a recluse. "I like to be by myself a lot." Good one, Seluna. Nothing reclusive about that.

But somehow, Dym seemed to understand. "I assumed as much. I'm a bit of a loner, too. That's why I like it here. Nice and quiet."

"But you don't come every night," I said. "You mentioned last time it was only 'once in a while.'"

"No, I don't come every night. Only when I feel . . . the need." He held my gaze for several long moments.

"The need? Oh." I hastily looked away. "Because you think something's going to happen. The intuition thing again."

"And it appears I was right." Dym smiled. "For here I am again, conveniently on the same night as you." I didn't mention to Dym all the nights I was down here during my solitary confinement. I didn't want him to think I'd been seeking him out.

"I'm actually glad you returned," he continued. "I wasn't sure you would. I've been thinking about you, wondering how you were."

"Really? I've been thinking about you, too," I said, perhaps too quickly.

"Ooohhh?" Dym drew the word out, making it several syllables long.

I blushed, hoping the darkness would hide my reddening cheeks. "Not that often," I said. "More like your swims. Just every once in a while."

Dym slowly closed and then opened his eyes. With my keen vision, I couldn't help but notice how green they were. Not a drab, diluted green. This was a fierce, deep, wild green. How could I have missed it?

"I'm flattered to be in your thoughts at all," he murmured. Then, louder: "But something's got you troubled again. I can tell."

"More intuition?"

"Maybe. Or it could be the fact that you're frowning. Either way, why don't you tell me what's on your mind?"

Damn. Dym's a hard boy to stay annoyed at. And why didn't I realize I was frowning?

I felt a crick in the back of my neck. I'd been leaning over my sketches for at least an hour before coming here. Now, I was leaning down to look at Dym. It was too much leaning. I knelt by the edge of the pond so that we were nearly face-to-face, and the feeling in my neck eased. Our heads were so close, they were almost touching. I could see the veins around his temples, the water droplets coming off his eyelashes. I forced myself to focus on the conversation.

"I found . . . something," I confessed.

"Something?" Dym propped his chin up on his palms, putting his elbows on the edge of the pond. Now, our heads were even closer. "My, how very interesting, and specific." I resisted the urge to stick my tongue out at him like a child. I secretly wanted to, just so it could accidentally land on his lips.

"I found what I think is a witch's grimoire, some of it in Old Hartlandian. It had to have been written several hundred years ago."

"Really? What's in it?"

"Lots of different things. Like a spell for something called 'Drawing Down the Moon.' "

A smile played at the corner of Dym's mouth. "Sounds intriguing. Anything that can help defend you against this Catron fellow you mentioned?"

"Nothing that I can see so far."

"Hmmm. That's not good. Any luck getting a release date, then?"

"Unfortunately, no. If anything, the situation at the asylum's gotten worse." I explained what had happened since we last spoke. I started with Rose and Laura, how they'd been shocked. Then I moved on to Thomasina, and how it seemed some girls weren't ever leaving Silver Hill.

Dym looked alarmed. "Not leaving Silver Hill? What do you mean?"

"Some are staying on as permanent residents. I don't think they have much choice in the matter. Others . . ." I briefly went over the disappearance of Geraldine, then the conversation between Dr. Catron and Mr. Flack.

"It seems Catron is looking for a 'creature' of some sort. He didn't say exactly what kind. All I could find out was that one had been spotted near here—a male with dark skin." I waited a moment to see if Dym had any strong reactions. But all he did was nod slowly.

Maybe I'm wrong about the creature being mortal-like at all. For all I know, it could be a brown bear or something.

"Did he say anything else about this creature?" Dym asked.

"I have to warn you, it's rather disgusting." I put down my candle. "He said if he could just open up the creature's head, he might be able to find some kind of goddess."

The muscles in Dym's face went slack.

"Now, I know this is going to sound silly," I continued, "but when he said 'creature,' I thought of you. I mean, I know you're a person, not a creature, but maybe he was just using a figure of speech? Anyway, you're male, you're dark . . ." I rubbed my temples. "I don't know. It seems crazy when I say it out loud. But if you're the person they spotted, and they think you're this creature, you might want to lie low for a while.”

Dym grimaced. “I’m afraid I can’t do that, Seluna.”

“What do you mean? Why not?”

“I don’t see how. Can’t you take your midnight swims some other place? Some other time? It might do you a world of good to go swimming in warmer weather. You know, like normal people. Or is it just a bizarre thrill, sneaking in here?”

Dym gave a weak smile. “Something like that.”

I shook my head and looked at him in disbelief. “Do your feelings of excitement increase or decrease, knowing you might get killed?”

“Both. Neither. I . . . I don’t know.” Dym put his hands to the sides of his head and looked at me with pained eyes. “It’s not thrilling for the reason you think it is. What worries me more is this goddess you said they were looking for.”

“Really? Why would that worry you?”

“I don’t know. Again, it’s hard to explain. But don’t you agree it’s a strange thing to be looking for?”

“I guess. If goddesses even exist.”

Dym’s smile was wider, stronger now as he looked at me. “Oh, I know they exist.”

I blushed again. And they say girls are the moody ones. One minute, Dym is all mysterious, the next, he’s flirting like crazy. At least, I think that’s what he’s doing.

“Did Catron and Flack say anything else?” he asked.

“They said that they had to find the goddess, that they couldn’t let her mission in this world come to pass. Whatever that means. Catron seems to think it’s one of the girls at Silver Hill.”

“Meaning you?”

“I don’t know. You’d think if he were looking for me, he’d have found me by now. I mean, I’ve been at the asylum for weeks. Yet I can’t help but feel he’s waiting for proof of something. Proof that the person he’s found is the person he’s looking for.”

Dym ran his long fingers through his hair. “This reasoning is more circular than the inside of a seashell. Regardless, Seluna, you have to get out of there.”

“I know, I know. But how?”

“Try page one thirty-six.” Dym coughed.

“What?”

“Why one thirty-six?”

“Oh, I don’t know.” Dym scratched his head. “I mean, it’s just a random number. Something I pulled out of the air. You know, page ninety-seven. Page two eighty-five. Page . . . one thirty-six.” He looked at the dead trees that surrounded the pond, and wouldn’t meet my gaze.

I narrowed my eyes at Dym. Had he seen the Book before? It was waterlogged when I found it. Still, I decided to give him an out.

“Is this more of your intuition at work?”

Dym snapped his fingers, flinging several droplets of water onto the front of my dress. “Yes, intuition! That’s it exactly.”

“Okay, Dym, this fish will bite. I’ll look at page one thirty-six. But maybe there’s something you can do for me in the meantime.” I decided I had to ask Dym for help. Although I was hesitant before, the situation was clearly becoming dire. I’d have to trust him, because obviously, I couldn’t trust anyone in authority at Silver Hill.

I took a deep breath. “If there’s any way possible, can you hide me and a few other girls? Maybe just the ones I mentioned: Rose and Laura.” I saw Dym’s face fall. “Or if not,” I said quickly, “can you get a message to Laura’s aunt Mae? She might be able to help us.”

Dym bit his lip. “Seluna, I am so, so sorry. But I’m afraid I can’t do either of those things.” My heart turned to ice. “Can’t . . . do them?” I sat back so that my face wasn’t quite so close to Dym’s. “Why on earth not? Or do you just mean you won’t do them?”

“It’s definitely ‘can’t.’ I don’t have a place I can hide you—”

“You have a home, presumably?” Now, my voice was ice as well. Why would you act all charming with a girl, seemingly to win her affections, then refuse to help?

“I do, but it’s not exactly one you can visit.”

“Fine. Your home situation’s a mess. I get it; my family’s not exactly normal either. But why can’t you get a message to Laura’s aunt Mae?”

“Because there would be . . . questions. People—like Aunt Mae—would wonder how I got here, what I was doing at Silver Hill.”

“Funny, those are the same questions I have.” I glared at him.

“And how would I explain it to Aunt Mae, or anyone else who asks? Those are the types of inquiries that lead to trouble. Believe me, the trouble would be greater for you.”

“Would you mind telling me precisely how?” It was taking all my self-control not to reach out and strangle Dym around his wet, ropy neck.

Dym shook his head. “All I can tell you is that I wouldn’t mind if the harm only involved me. I wouldn’t mind dying even, Seluna. Not for you. But to have my death cause you harm? That I don’t think I could bear.”

He wouldn’t mind dying for me? We barely know each other. And yet, I agreed it didn’t seem that way. Something about Dym felt familiar, like coming home. But that didn’t mean he couldn’t explain himself.

“You know, Endymion, for a person who cares so deeply, you sure know how to play it cool,” I said through gritted teeth.

Dym smiled weakly. “It’s part of my charm.”

I collected my candle and stood up. “This is the furthest thing from charming that there is. In fact, it’s ridiculous. You’re just a selfish, lazy coward. A coward who can go to hell.” I started walking away without looking back.

So much for the prince who fights his way through evil vines to rescue the damsel, I thought. Monster.

“Wait!” I heard the sound of sloshing water, coupled with near panic in Dym’s voice. The latter was so sharp and pleading I almost turned around.

“Please, Seluna!” he begged. “Please believe me when I say that if I could help you, I would. I care more about you than anything. Truly.”

I stopped and looked down at him over my shoulder. “I find that very hard to believe,” I said. “Why would you care so much about a crazy girl like me? And if you cared about me, you’d help me. You’d at least come out of the water after me.”

“I, ah . . .” Dym sighed. “All right, this is rather embarrassing. But about coming out of the water, there’s a reason I can’t. It’s because I’m not fully dressed under here.”

My jaw dropped. “Wait a minute. You’re telling me not only do you go swimming in frigid water in the middle of winter, but you do it completely naked?”

“I’m afraid so.”

“That’s the most senseless thing I ever heard.” I rolled my eyes and was about to head back towards the asylum. “You just don’t give a damn about me.”

“Wait—I’ll prove it,” Dym said. “Just don’t say I didn’t warn you.” He lifted himself a few inches up on the shore of the pond. The moonlight shone down on his biceps and forearms, highlighting every muscle and sinew. As he began pulling himself out, I could see the hairline of his stomach traveling down his abdomen, lower . . . lower . . .

“All right!” I turned away and covered my eyes.” Is he really going to come out of the water without anything on? “I believe you! Stay where you are. I have no desire to see more.”

Which was a lie. I desperately wanted to see more. But this really wasn’t the time or the place. I turned around, and just before Dym sank back down, I thought I spotted something green and shimmery at the bottom of his stomach. But it could have just been moonlight on the water, or a piece of moss. We looked at each other in silence for a few moments.

“I don’t blame you for being angry, Seluna,” Dym said. “Really, I don’t. I want nothing more than to tell you the whole truth right now. But until the day comes when I can, you’ll just have to trust me.”

I set my jaw, but said nothing.

“I do hope you’ll come back,” he continued. “I’d love to see you again.”

“If you think I’m coming back here for a boy who won’t lift a finger to help me, you’ve got another think coming. I’ll return if and when I choose.” But probably when. Because no matter how much I want to hate you right now, I want to be close to you just a little bit more.

“Very well.” Dym’s green eyes locked on mine. “I hope it’s soon.”

I walked away again without saying good-bye. That bloke has a lot of nerve. I was muttering angrily, going almost too fast for the vines to part. I wondered if I would survive captivity long enough to come back, or if the inauspicious Event that Catron mentioned—

The Event! I stopped in my tracks. I should have asked Dym about that cataclysmic occurrence or whatever it was Catron was so afraid of. Maybe it wasn't too late. I picked up my skirts and hurried back to the pond.

Of course, it's going to be awkward asking him for a favor, seeing as how I left so abruptly. Still, it's the least he can do. Maybe I can make him feel guilty for not helping me more. Then, if he knows anything about the Event, he'll have to tell me.

But when I got back to the pond, Dym wasn't there. I looked all around, even in the dead trees along the shore. Still no sign of him.

"Dym. Dym! Where in blazes are you?" I hissed. I called for several minutes, but he didn't reappear. He couldn't have swum out of the pond that fast without my hearing him. I began to worry. Not that I ought to be worried, because I shouldn't care what happens to him. And yet, I did.

Suddenly, there was a gigantic splash, and Dym's head and torso popped back up out of the water. I gasped and put my hand to my heart, nearly dropping my candle.

"Dammit, Dym, you frightened me! I thought you disappeared. Or drowned."

Dym burst out laughing. How can he be so callous? "Me, drown? That's too funny."

"You shouldn't laugh. It happens to strong swimmers all the time."

"Well, it won't happen to me."

"I'm sure that's what the other swimmers thought directly before they drowned. Just be careful, all right? I'd hate it if something happened to you." Uh-oh. I said that last part out loud.

I half-expected Dym to start teasing me. Instead, he stopped laughing, and his whole face softened. "And you know I'd hate it if something happened to you as well."

Although I had good reason to doubt that, I didn't want to argue the point anymore tonight. "Right. So you say." I cleared my throat. "Look, the reason I came back is that I forgot to ask if your intuition said anything about the Event that's supposed to happen soon. According to Catron's psychic, it's going to be bad, and I'd really love not to be at Silver Hill when it happens." If that's even possible.

"So Catron has a psychic that saw it as well? Can't say I'm surprised. My gift is rarely wrong." Dym closed his eyes in concentration. "Sorry, but I'm not getting anything more on the Event. My intuition doesn't often work on command like that."

I couldn't tell if he was being truthful or not. It was exasperating not to be able to get anything out of Dym. "Kind of a useless gift, then, isn't it?" I snarled.

"It tells me what I need to know."

"I wish it would tell you to get out of here. Why do you keep coming back to Silver Hill if it's so dangerous for you? Tell me the whole story this time."

"I can only tell you part of it. It's that the moon has its own gravitational pull on the tides, just as you pull me towards you. You are like a magnet, a form of gravity.” I waited, but Dym said nothing more.

“That’s it? You keep returning because I’m your gravity magnet?” I narrowed my eyes at him. “You know, one minute, you act like you don’t care, and the next, you’re practically swearing eternal devotion. That’s kind of crazy.”

“Good night, then,” I said curtly. “I’ll go back to being crazy, and you can enjoy the rest of your midnight swim.”

“Good night, Seluna,” Dym said, his eyes never leaving mine. Then he sank down into the water like he did before. It was almost as if he were being tugged by an invisible string beneath the waves. Why doesn’t he kick off like other swimmers? I’ll bet he just enjoyed giving me the shivers, pretending to be mysterious.

I walked back through the garden and up the narrow stairs to the garret. Maybe I really am insane, and Dym’s just a figment of my imagination. A beautiful, hair-tearing figment, to be sure. I sighed.

He was almost worth the price of madness.

Chapter 9

In the nights after I met with Dym for the second time, I had more strange dreams. These dreams were so realistic, it was almost as if I were still awake. In one of them, I was floating in outer space, far above the earth. I remember not wanting to leave Earth, reaching with outstretched fingers as it grew smaller and smaller in my sight. Then I was spinning, but not quickly. More like rotating, turning over and over towards the moon, where I landed safely.

I sat there, looking at Earth, which I no longer missed because I could still see it. I waved to the stars that sparkled above, and to the planets orbiting all around. I fit nicely into a particularly shallow crater, and so I used it as a seat. Beside me was a second crater of similar size. There were no others like them on the moon. I kept thinking, Is someone else supposed to be here? I searched the entire moon, but didn't see another soul. Then I woke up.

My daytime endeavors were no less confusing. For one thing, I was having a lot of trouble with page 136 of the Book. Although it looked intriguing (it seemed to be for a hypnosis or sleeping spell), much of it was in Old Hartlandian. To make matters worse, it was written in a regional dialect, my knowledge of which was scarce. I wonder if Dym or his intuition had known that. In any event, the translation process was becoming long and tedious.

I needed more time. But time was running out; there was only a little over a week left before the Event. And I was no closer to finding what it was, why Catron feared it, or how to avoid it. Rose and Laura had all but stopped discussing the matter. I guessed that with the daily atrocities happening at the asylum, they had more pressing things on their minds. Like Dr. Catron's electrodes. Animal.

But I couldn't stop thinking about it. I usually didn't hold with soothsayers, but I did believe Dym was somewhat psychic. Since both he and Catron's fortune-teller said the same thing without either knowing about the other, it had to be more than a coincidence. I'd kept my eyes open for a creature with dark skin, or a girl who might resemble a goddess. But so far, I hadn't seen anyone who fit either description. It wasn't until a few evenings later that fate gave me another chance to learn about the spell Dym suggested.

One or two girls were admitted to Silver Hill each day, as Mr. Flack had said. But sometimes, it seemed like more than one or two went missing each day, so the patient population was actually dwindling. There were fervid whispers amongst the remaining girls about what was happening, who might be next. Catron seemed more frantic than ever to find whatever—or whomever—he was looking for, and it was taking its toll on the staff. Like the new nurse who was supposed to bring me back to the garret after ten minutes of socialization with Rose and Laura. That one looked especially nervous.

“What’s your name again?” she asked as she locked my friends into their room for the night. “Mabel? Margaret?”

“Er, something like that,” I replied.

“They told me to keep special watch on this one girl, Selena or Sekuna or whatever it was.” She fumbled with the keys, trying to determine which would imprison Rose and Laura for the next eight hours. “I can never tell you nutcases apart nohow.” Suddenly, there was a terrific smashing sound in the next hall, and noises like metal hitting the floors.

“Bonnie! BONNIE!” I heard Nurse Cutter scream. “Get over ’ere, s! This thunderin’ loony is tryin’ to overturn the equipment cart.”

The nurse I was with turned white as a sheet. I guessed this was Bonnie. Hurriedly, she found the correct key and locked Rose and Laura in. Then she turned and pointed to me.

“You stay put now, you ’ear?” she said. “I ’ave to go ’elp Nurse Cutter. Don’t know what I was thinkin’, takin’ a job in this blighted place.” She gathered her skirts in her hands and scuttled off down the hall.

I could hardly believe my luck. I’d been left alone in the asylum, and for once, I wasn’t handcuffed to a bench. This is my chance. I’d sneak away, maybe to the secret staircase. I could gather a few supplies and hide there for a while with the Book, translating and seeing if it held anything useful.

The Book. Which I left in the locked garret. I groaned and put my forehead in my hand. Maybe I could get a hairpin or something to unlock it with before they found me—

“Psst. Psst! Hey, you!”

Is someone calling me?

“Yeah, you with the long black hair!”

Blast it—a nurse. I’d been caught. Should I stay where I was or try to run? And where’s that voice coming from, anyway?

“Psst—come on. Get over here! Haven’t got all night; who knows when that Bonnie twit will be back.”

I turned around. The voice was coming from the other end of the hall, opposite where Nurse Bonnie had gone. I tiptoed over to the last door. Peeking through the window was a girl with messy brown hair and big, brown eyes. I looked at the sign above the window. It said “Reserved.” I swallowed hard.

Aren’t those the rooms for permanent residents? Where Laura said she heard horrid screams coming from?

But what if the girl inside needed help? I couldn't just turn my back. Curse it all. Maybe I could see what she wanted very quickly and then sneak away.

I didn't have time to make a decision. In a few swift movements, the girl opened the door, grabbed my arm, pulled me into the room, and slammed the door shut. Then she spun me around and stood in front of the door, hair matted, eyes wild. Her clothing was torn, her fingernails long and dirty. I put my finger up to point in my usual senseless, defensive gesture. Was she the creature Dr. Catron wanted so badly?

But as I squinted and looked closer, I realized she couldn't be. For one thing, she didn't have dark skin. I also saw that no one had bothered to brush her hair, or let her near a comb. They hadn't bothered to change or mend her clothing either. No wonder she looked like hell. To top it all off, she had scars all around her fingers, palms, wrists, and forearms. As if she'd had a lot of experience trying to fight people off.

She was just a girl, like me. An unkempt, forgotten girl, but a girl nonetheless.

By the looks of things, she had no roommate. Her room was smaller than Rose and Laura's; what they called a single, not a double. There was only one bed. I guessed most of the reserved quarters were private ones. Catron probably didn't want the "advanced cases" rooming with the general population, the same way he didn't want me doing so.

But I was still trapped by the girl standing in front of the door. Maybe if I convinced her I was friendly, she wouldn't hurt me. I lowered my finger. It was bizarre; I'd never gestured with it before I came to the asylum. I really had to stop this pointless pointing.

"What's your name?" I asked gently.

"Francine." She cocked her head to get a better look at me.

"Great. Ah, nice to meet you, Francine. I'm . . ." While I was debating whether or not to tell her my real name, she said it for me.

"Se-lu-na." She grinned and drew the word out the same way Catron did, but it didn't sound as frightening coming from her. "I know who you are. We all know who you are."

"We? We who?"

"Lunatics. You have quite a lot of influence over us." Before I could ask Francine what she meant, she spoke on. "It's a good thing dear old Bonnie didn't lock my door right. Honestly, it's a wonder that woman can tie her bootlaces in the morning."

"If your door's unlocked, why don't you try to get out of here?" If you're not dangerous, maybe we can hide together, I thought.

"For the same reason you don't. How long do you think we'd last on the wild moors, or in the daaark, forbidden forest?" She wiggled her fingers at me. "How long before they find us and drag us back?" I couldn't deny it was true. This girl might have been crazy, but she was also savvy.

"Not to mention the fact that my family just up and left me here," she said. "So I don't have anywhere else to go. Do you?" She looked at me pointedly, as if she already knew the answer.

"I suppose not," I replied.

"Just as I thought. No, I'm here for the duration." Her eyes took on a dull, dead quality, and she looked at the floor. "I've resigned myself to fate." Her head snapped back up. "But that doesn't mean you have to. There's something strong about you. Special."

"I . . . I don't think so. I'm flattered, though."

She laughed a little too loudly. "Oh, it's not just flattery, dear. You're going to need all your strength for what's coming." As if on cue, a loud wind swooped through the trees around Silver Hill, rattling the windows. Francine gave a jump and crouched down to the bed's footboard. She laughed again and motioned for me to get on the bed. Then she wrapped her dirty hands around the footboard's thin metal rails. Now, it looked as if we were gazing at one another through the bars of a prison cell.

"The earth, the moon, they can feel it." She glanced around the room, then looked at me with penetrating eyes. "Can you feel it? It won't be long now. Not more than seven nights or so, I'd say."

I shivered. That was the third person to mention the Event. Well, not mention it specifically, but it had to be what Francine was talking about.

Francine took my shivering to mean I agreed with her. "Ah, so you do feel it! Splendid. I'm glad you know."

"Know what?"

She ignored my question. "This makes it so much easier. I mean, sometimes, I actually think you have trouble remembering." She almost seemed to be talking to herself.

"Trouble remembering what? Why did you pull me in here? Are you in trouble?"

"Oh, I'm in trouble, all right," she said bitterly. "But not the kind you can help with. As for why I pulled you in here, well, I just wanted to make sure it was you. After all, I might not have another chance to meet you. It's quite an honor."

"Ah, thanks. Honored to make your acquaintance as well." I had no idea what Francine was going on about, but this encounter reminded me of my first time meeting Dym. "It's you!" he'd said, even though he'd never met me before. Likewise, I was certain I'd never met Francine.

"Mind if I ask why you're in a room marked 'Reserved'?" I ventured.

"Because I'm crazy," Francine said simply, as if I were already aware.

"Right, got that. We're all crazy here." I rolled my eyes.

Francine didn't. "No, I mean I'm really crazy," she said. "As crazy as they come. I've got schizophrenia."

I sucked in my breath. "What's that?" It didn't sound good. I hope it didn't mean she was dangerous.

"It means sometimes I see things that aren't there, hear things that aren't real. At least, other people say they're not real." She took a thick piece of her hair and waved it back and forth.

"What kinds of things?" I asked.

Francine shrugged. "Shapes, shadows. Sometimes people. I hear them telling me to do things."

She looked to the left and right, then leaned closer to me, as if trying not to be overheard. “But I’ll tell you a secret.” She put a hand over her mouth to stifle her giggles. “I don’t always listen!” She giggled again, and continued waving her chunk of hair.

This girl is all over the place, I thought. “When did it start? Your hearing and seeing things, I mean?”

“A few years ago.” I didn’t ask how old Francine was, but she looked about my age, maybe a year or two older.

“Do you . . . do you hurt people?” I leaned back slightly.

Francine stopped waving her hair back and forth. Instead, she shook it at me. “Now, why would I do a thing like that? Sure, some crazy people are dangerous. But not all of them. Some are only a danger to themselves. And there are plenty of people who aren’t crazy—or who the world thinks are just fine—who hurt folks every day.”

I thought briefly of Dr. Catron and his staff. “I agree with you there. But is there anything they can do for your, um, type of crazy? Like a treatment?”

“There are medicines that might help. But I fear Dr. Catron and his cronies have other methods they enjoy using far more.”

I nodded sadly. “Right you are again.” Incredible. There really is someone who needs mental help in this insane asylum. Knowing Silver Hill as I did, it seemed ironic. This was the last place such a person should be. The last place any person should be.

Could this be the goddess they were talking about? I wondered. But I quickly realized it was impossible. By the state of her, Francine had been here quite a while—long before I overheard Catron and Flack’s conversation. If they were still looking for a goddess after Francine was admitted, she couldn’t be “the one.” Or could she? Maybe Catron suspected she was, but needed proof. As I’d said to Dym, I felt Catron was waiting for proof of something. I just didn’t know what.

“But you know the most twisted thing of all?” Francine asked, interrupting my thoughts.

“No, what?”

“My family didn’t send me to Silver Hill because I see and hear things.” She put down her hair and folded her arms across her chest.

I frowned. “Really? Then why did they send you here?”

“Because I didn’t want to be part of the façade anymore, the lie they were telling the world. I wanted to live a different life.”

“I’m afraid I don’t understand.”

“My family occupies a particular social position. But I want to break out of it. They want me to stay by their side, to never change. They see anything else as a betrayal.”

“I think I know of someone like that,” I said, with Geraldine in mind. “This person wanted to be an artist instead of following her parents into jobs they hated. I think they were convinced she was betraying them by being true to her heart.”

Francine snorted and uncrossed her arms, digging one fist into the opposite palm. “I wonder if it ever occurred to her parents that they betrayed her. We all have a responsibility to encourage each other to be the best versions of ourselves. They failed to do that.

“And there’s more to me than just a crazy person, you know.” Francine suddenly stood straight up, agitated. “Before they pulled me out of school, I wanted to be a union organizer. You know, one of those people who fight for workers’ rights. They call us mad because we want to blow the whistle on exploitation and hypocrisy, to advocate for change.”

“I know there’s more to you than crazy,” I said quietly. My tone was partly to avoid upsetting Francine, and partly because I believed what she was saying. “Sometimes, I think madness is just the name our enemies give us. It symbolizes everything they’re not ready to face. Instead of admitting they have a huge problem on their hands, it’s easier to focus on a single person, to call them mad. Then they never have to address the real issue, which is usually much more complicated.”

“You know what beats it all?” Francine sat down on the bed and exhaled loudly, as if all the fight had gone out of her. “The worst part of being crazy isn’t the crazy. It’s the loneliness. Being in a world that exists only to you—some parts grand, some ghastly—but one others can’t experience. It’s the most horrific way of being alone. Because you aren’t, really. People may be sitting right beside you.” I was sitting right beside Francine, but she stared straight ahead without looking at me. “And yet, it doesn’t matter. For all you have in common, you may as well be on separate planets.”

Now, she did look at me. “Do you have any idea what that’s like? To be completely isolated in a universe that is perhaps of your own making, perhaps not? And it’s not the kind of place where you can just find a door and leave.” She threw out her hands in exasperation. “It follows you, envelopes you wherever you go. You can’t escape, and no one can pound their way through to rescue you, even if they wanted to. Which they never do. On the contrary: people are so repulsed and frightened by me that they usually run far and fast in the other direction.” Her voice hung heavy with agony and despair. “And there’s no relief, no relief at all.” Her throat caught on the last word, and I feared she was about to cry.

I longed to reach out to her. To take her hand and tell her that I did understand. But Francine didn’t seem like the kind of girl who appreciated being touched. Besides, she was unpredictable. She might just decide to grab my hand and spin me around again. Instead, I replied:

“It’s funny, isn’t it? I have strange dreams—one might say they’re a world of madness. But they’re not what scare me so. It’s the hellacious realm that exists just outside.” I raised my hands to indicate the room, the asylum. “It’s full of frantic and cowardly people, more willing to run each other over than contemplate a new idea, much less help a soul in need. I don’t know about you, but more often than not, my imaginary world is peaceful, calm. Idyllic.”

The corners of Francine’s mouth lifted into a smile. “If only these fools could see your world. Then they’d be running towards it, not away, eh? But they never will.” Her smile faded, and she sighed. “In reality, they’re the ones who are trapped, not us. Trapped under a siren-spell of madness, unable to escape the tiny world they've bricked themselves up in." She looked at her dirty hands and nails, turning them over and over. "Stupid people."

Suddenly, we heard the sound of footsteps coming down the hall.

"She's here!" Francine's eyes went wide. She grabbed my hands, pulling me up and spinning me towards the door. As she shoved me through it, she said, "You have to get out before she sees you in my company!"

"But what about you?" I pressed.

"Don't worry about me. It's more important that you fulfill your mission."

"What mission?"

"Go!" she hissed, and pushed me so hard it left a bruise on my shoulder that I only found the next day. I closed the door to Francine's room just in time to see Nurse Bonnie walking towards me, muttering to herself.

"Well, that wasn't a boatload of giggles, I can tell you." She came briskly down the hall, wiping her palms together. "Thank heavens they got that there patient sedated. She won't be causin' no more trouble till she wakes up, if she wakes up." She pressed her damp palms against her uniform in a final effort to clean them, then looked up and saw me.

"You! There you are. Didn't I tell you to stay put?"

"I did."

"No, you didn't. You was over there." She pointed to Rose and Laura's door. "Now you's over there." She pointed to Francine's door.

I had to think quickly. "You told me to stand over here. Don't you remember?"

"No, I don't remember tellin' you to stand—"

"You said I should look in them—I meant, these—rooms and see what happens to patients who don't do as they're told."

"I . . . I did?" Nurse Bonnie looked confused.

"That's what I heard. Good thing, too. One peek in those windows . . ." I shuddered. "I won't be misbehaving if that's what happens to them that do. I mean, those who do."

"I did tell you to stand there, didn't I? Clever of me, wasn't it?" She straightened her skirt. "Right, then. Time for us to run along. Quick-quick, now!"

Bloody hell, I thought. My one chance to hide and I completely fumbled it. As Nurse Bonnie brusquely escorted me to the garret, I tried to think of how to get another opportunity to be alone with the Book. I needed more undisturbed time to translate page 136. Even with my reduced need for sleep, which let me translate into the midnight hours, it was slow going. Or perhaps I could gain another audience with Francine. She seemed to know more about the Event than she let on. Maybe she knew about the creature and the goddess, too.

But I was never to see Francine again.

Laura was going downhill fast.

She was getting shocked more and more often, and had started forgetting things. Every time I saw her, her eyes looked a lighter shade of blue than I remembered. She'd also taken to mouthing words to herself when she thought Rose and I weren't looking. I wondered if she was beginning to see and hear things the way Francine did.

"I can't give the answers fast enough," she whispered when we asked after her. "Or I think they're the right answers, the ones he wants to hear. But it turns out they're not. I don't know what to do anymore." Then she'd wring her hands back and forth so hard I thought they'd fly off.

Rose's predicament was also rapidly turning sour. Although she managed to get out of additional shock treatments, she said it was because Dr. Catron wanted to try something different with her.

" 'Different'?" I asked one day while we were in the solarium. Evening socialization here had dwindled from fifteen minutes to hardly more than five. "Different as in better or worse?"

"I don't know." As Rose pushed the hair off her forehead, I could see her hands were shaking. Whether it was from nerves or nicotine cravings, I couldn't tell. "Better for him, maybe. I don't know how it could mean better for me. They caught me smoking a few times."

"Rose!" I gasped.

"I know, I know." She squeezed her eyes shut and pulled at her curls. "But I couldn't help it. Now, Catron says I'm one of his 'difficult cases.' He says he'll have to accelerate treatment, whatever that means."

"Just try not to get into any more trouble," I begged. "Laura and I couldn't bear it if something happened to you. Right, Laura?" But Laura was gazing out the barred window, shaking her head and mumbling. Rose and I exchanged a glance, then looked away from one another and Laura.

Absorbed in their own troubles, my friends had completely stopped asking about my reanimation abilities. It was just another sign of how bad things were getting at Silver Hill. I desperately wished I had more than a parlor trick to help them. And the other patients were disappearing at a faster rate than ever. Catron wasn't even bothering to hide the fact that the remaining ones were restrained far more than necessary. We frequently passed girls in the hall strapped to chairs and beds. I didn't get too close a look, but I could've sworn one had been tied down so long the skin of her wrists was growing around the leather straps.

My visits to Rose and Laura in their room were becoming less and less frequent as well. And when we were together, we often heard screams and pleadings coming from down dark corridors. Once, we even heard something like chains being dragged over stone floors.

“Ooo, that gives me the shivers!” said Rose, remarking on the chain noises. She rubbed her arms and huddled close to Laura, who was sitting on one of the beds, knees drawn to her chest. I felt a chill run through me as well, as if I’d been showered with ice.

“But not like your ghost story, Seluna,” Laura whispered. She’d stopped mumbling for a few moments, and was almost like her old self. “This is like the bad ones. Where people end up dying.”

“In order for there to be ghosts, Laura, people pretty much have to die,” Rose said.

But that doesn’t mean we have to die, I wanted to say.

We didn’t actually know what was happening to the girls who disappeared. Some came back after a while, but much altered. Several shrieked when anyone tried to touch them. A few were catatonic, or muttered to themselves like Laura. Others were unable to dress or feed themselves, like Thomasina. Clearly, Catron was torturing these girls to find the creature, or the goddess he so desperately wanted.

Could they possibly be the same person? No, Catron said he was looking for the creature in order to find the goddess. They must be two separate things. Whenever I thought about it, I had to rub my temples. All these circling thoughts were giving me migraines.

I wrestled back and forth with whether or not to tell Rose and Laura about my meeting with Francine. In the end, I decided against it. I didn’t want to scare them. It might make them worry they were the next ones headed for the reserved rooms. Besides, explaining Francine would mean trying to explain more about the Event and the goddess’s mission. I wasn’t sure I understood either of them myself.

Then there was the part where Francine mentioned my mission. Was it in line with the goddess’s, or opposed? There was also the possibility—and I hated to think it—that these were just Francine’s mad ramblings. But they were too similar to what Catron and Dym had said. There had to be a connection. If only I could figure out what it was!

In a macabre case of silver lining, Catron’s treatment of the other girls gave me additional time alone. Whatever he was doing took more and more staff to accomplish, so there were fewer people to supervise us. After being locked in the garret far too early for several nights, I’d finally finished translating page 136.

As I’d originally surmised, it was a sleep spell. An odd thing for Dym to suggest, unless he had just picked page 136 randomly. I had my doubts about that, but it hardly mattered now. The spell purported to put the desired object to sleep for a good while. But that was where it got vague. It didn’t mention hours, days, or any specific time frame for how long the spell lasted. It just said “as long as necessary.” Maybe the intent of the spell’s caster determined the length, which was fine with me. If it were within my power, I’d put the entire staff of Silver Hill to sleep for the rest of their lives.

But that seemed unlikely: one of the spell’s drawbacks was that it could only be performed on one person at a time. One had to wait till the spell finished with the first person before moving on to a second. Although my main focus was Catron, it would have been nice to knock out his workers, too. But hopefully, with their leader absent, Nurse Cutter and the rest would be far less of a threat. Confusion and chaos were sure to result from his sudden, prolonged unconsciousness. It would be the perfect opportunity to try and get to the telegraph machine again. Then I could contact Laura’s aunt Mae, or whoever else might be willing to get us out of here.

The magic was relatively simple to perform. It didn’t require complicated herbs or tools; just chanting. I could do that when I was alone in my room. But I still needed something personal from the object of the spell.

That was going to be the hard part. Where was I going to get something personal of Catron’s? I certainly wouldn’t be able to get into his office again. His private sleeping quarters were out of the question. I couldn’t imagine being able to steal something off his person; I wasn’t a skilled pickpocket.

The next day, I tried to think of objects I could pinch easily. The girls and I were finishing our daily walk around the main entrance. We’d been exercised more than usual, probably because staff members were increasingly busy with whatever Dr. Catron had them doing. There couldn’t be more than ten girls here now, with no new admissions for over a week. And as surely as the number of patients was dwindling, the staff seemed to be as well.

“I hear it’s because Dr. Catron is sending them away,” Rose whispered while we waited to be taken to afternoon lessons. We stood single file, all of us so tired and perspiring we looked like wilted flowers. “Doesn’t want too many employees around in case they cause that Event. He’s growing more suspicious and paranoid by the day.”

“The only person he seems to trust anymore is Nurse Cutter,” Laura said, looking at Rose and me. Then she abruptly stared off into the distance, and kept staring.

“Speak of the devil,” I muttered. Cutter was coming down the hall, wheeling a cart, when she stopped to talk to the orderly who’d been leading our exercises. She turned her back on the cart and walked a few feet over to the orderly. On the edge of the cart, next to a set of surgical supplies, was a clipboard with a form on it. At the very bottom was Catron’s signature.

His signature.

What could be more personal than someone writing their name? That was it! That was what I could use for the sleep spell. But how was I going to get it?

Cutter and the orderly were still talking. Cutter looked more harrowed than usual. Her uniform was wrinkled, her complexion like a bedsheet that had faded in the sun. And whatever she was telling the orderly, he didn’t appear to like it. I inched myself out of the line, nearer to the cart.

“Seluna, what are you doing?” Rose hissed. She tried to grab my sleeve, but I pulled away. Keeping my eyes on Cutter, I moved sideways towards my target.

When I reached the cart, I glanced down at the form. It was mundane, but unnerving. An order for scalpels, with an angry note at the bottom from Catron. Something to do with the previous ones wearing out too quickly, or not being sharp enough.

What’s he doing with that many scalpels in the first place?

It was a disconcerting question, but I didn’t have time to speculate. I had to get my hands on that signature. I looked up; the conversation between Cutter and the orderly was more animated than ever. But they were deliberately keeping their voices low, so I couldn’t hear what they were saying. Finally, Cutter looked at the orderly and pointed towards the front door. The orderly threw up his hands and stomped off towards the staff quarters, presumably to collect his things.

“Did he just get sacked?” I heard Rose whisper to Laura. But Laura was still staring at things unseen, and did not answer. Cutter was coming back for the cart. At the last second, I managed to tear off the part of the form with Catron’s name on it.

What could I do with the signature? I didn’t have any pockets. I folded the paper into the smallest piece I could manage and slipped it between my fingers just before Cutter spotted me.

“Oy! What’re you doin’ there?” she barked. “You’d better not be messin’ around with Dr. Catron’s supplies. Let’s see them ’ands.”

I put both my hands out, palms up.

“Other side now,” Cutter snapped.

I flipped my hands over. A tiny piece of the white form was sticking up between my fingers. I looked Cutter in the eye and let out a loud cough to distract her while I wriggled the paper back down. She wrinkled her nose and pulled her face back, probably thinking my cough was contagious. Then she glared at me for a few seconds.

“Back in line where you belong! If there’s so much as a single thing missin’ from them supplies, I’ll ’ave your ’ead!” Cutter peered over the cart and silently mouthed the number and types of items. Satisfied that everything was accounted for, she pushed me towards the line of girls. “You all come with me, now, you ’ear?” She never even looked at the form and its lack of signature.

“But what about that man who was here before?” asked one girl.

“Yeah, Mr. Mavis, wasn’t it?” called another. “He was leading our exercises.”

“Don’t you worry about Mr. Mavis.” Cutter put her hands on the cart and began wheeling it down the hall again, indicating we should follow. “I told ’im ’is services was no longer necessary. You won’t be seein’ ’im from now on.” The girls started whispering among themselves, but Cutter silenced them with a look.

“Seluna, what were you thinking?” Rose gave me a hard jab with her finger as we trailed after Cutter. “You keep telling me to stay out of trouble. What have you got there in your hand?”

“Nothing. I just wanted to see what was on the cart, that’s all.”

“Liar. I saw you take something off.”

Blast. I really hated to do this. But I couldn’t risk having Rose or anyone else know what I was up to. It might get them hurt.

“Are you sure, Rose?” I asked gently. “You know Laura’s been a bit . . . confused lately as well.” I nodded towards Laura, who was staring at a piece of her hair as if she’d never seen it before. “Maybe you just thought you saw me take something.”

“That’s ridiculous!” Rose huffed. “I know I saw you tear something off that clipboard.” She swallowed hard. “At least, I thought I did . . .”

I gave her shoulder a rub. “It’s okay, Rose. I understand.” Gods, I’m a terrible person. Rose just held her hand to her head and looked alarmed. But my deception worked, because Rose didn’t say anything more about the scrap of paper. Perhaps I could apologize and tell her the truth later, when the spell worked. When it helped all of us get out of here.

That night, I performed the ritual that would put Catron to sleep. I couldn’t help but smile as I chanted his name and waved my candle over and over the signature. With Catron incapacitated, this whole nightmare might soon be over. For all of us.

I was positively glowing the next morning when Nurse Cutter came to collect me from the garret. I thought she might say something about Dr. Catron sleeping in, or being “taken ill.” But she didn’t.

No doubt she doesn’t want it getting out that something’s amiss, I thought as I nearly skipped down the stairs. But it’s only a matter of time till they realize they can’t rouse him. I couldn’t wait to see what happened then.

What few staff members were left didn’t seem concerned about Catron’s well-being during exercise, lessons, or any other activities we did that day. Or if they were concerned, they didn’t mention it. They did seem worried about who would be fired next, or what they would do once their employment at Silver Hill ended.

“I’m thinkin’ of goin’ to work at that new ’ospital in Ballifor,” I heard one nurse say. “Almost as much pay, and they give you two days off a week!”

It wasn’t till nearly the end of the day that I found out exactly how Catron was doing. We were all being led back to our rooms; at this point, private socialization had been completely canceled. I said good-bye to Rose and Laura at their door. Looking back, I wish I’d lingered a while longer. But instead, I was accompanied by a nurse towards the hall that led to the garret. That was when I nearly walked straight into Dr. Catron.

What? How can Catron still be awake? He was supposed to be unconscious. I couldn’t stop staring, my jaw slack. The spell should have worked right away. I didn’t remember reading anything about a delay in the magic.

His hair was a bit disheveled, as if he hadn't combed it that morning. Like Cutter's uniform yesterday, his once impeccable clothing hadn't seen an iron recently. His eyes had dark shadows under them, as if he hadn't slept.

How ironic, since he was supposed to be asleep for a good, long while.

"Better watch where you're going!" Catron snapped when we almost collided. I was still staring at him in shock. He looked down. "Something amiss, Se-lu-na?"

I shook my head rapidly. "No, sir, not at all. Just glad to see you looking so well."

"Is there any reason I shouldn't be?" He narrowed his eyes.

Yes, because my spell should have worked. "Absolutely not, sir. Everything's in perfect order."
Except the part where you should be knocked out.

I was screaming curses inside my head as the nurse locked me in the garret. I went around kicking every wall, including the one in front of the hidden staircase, though I knew it would hurt my foot. But I barely felt the pain as I paced the floor, gnashing my teeth and cursing some more.

Why didn't it work? What did I do wrong? I knew most of the spells in the Book were difficult, and of course, I wasn't a witch. But you didn't have to be a witch to perform simple spells, and the one I'd used on Catron had to be the simplest in there.

The Event was only two or so days away. Clearly, Catron and the others were preparing for it; the feeling of alarm was palpable throughout the asylum. I had no way to get myself or anyone else out of here before it happened. I still had no idea who this goddess and creature were, or what havoc they might wreak at Silver Hill.

That meant I had no choice but to beg Dym for his help, one last, desperate time. The situation was truly dire now; I had to find a way to make him realize that. If Dym couldn't do anything, then I didn't know who could.

Chapter 11

It seemed even colder than usual when I ventured into the garden that night. I pulled my shawl around my neck, trying to keep the bitter wind from finding the exposed parts of my throat. It was almost like winter was clinging until the last possible moment, refusing to relinquish its icy grip. But there was more color in the vines than when I last visited, and they seemed suppler, too. Still, clouds covered the entire sky. It was as if the moon refused to come out.

The moon. When I was a little girl, I'd look up at the sky and wonder if I belonged there. I'd always felt out of place on Earth, as if I could float away at any moment. Sometimes, I'd look down at my feet and wonder what they were doing on the ground. I could've sworn that I was once able to fly. Not just wish for it, but actually remember what it felt like.

As the vines parted before me and I made my way towards the pond, I recited a poem aloud. I'd made it up a few years ago, when I looked at the night sky and put my hand over the moon so I could see only part of it.

with my half eye, drinking in a world
half truth, half lie.
Tell me now,
Eternal Spy:
Will I live by halves
until I die?”

“Not bad,” said a smooth, familiar voice. “Not bad by half. But I never finished the end of Keats for you:

‘We have imagined for the mighty dead;
All lovely tales that we have heard or read:
An endless fountain of immortal drink,
Pouring unto us from the heaven’s brink.’ ”

Dym was leaning one elbow on the edge of the pond. I wondered why he never just sat there like a normal person. It was as if he didn’t want to leave the water. Maybe he didn’t want me to see him without anything on, though he seemed more than willing the last time I was here. I wondered if he ever traversed the garden when I wasn’t there. I worked hard to push away the image of a beautiful, naked Dym wandering in the moonlight. I had more important things to think about this evening.

“Anyway, it’s quite a nice night for poetry, don’t you agree?” he asked.

It’s an even nicer night for saving my life.

“I suppose,” I answered. “But I’m afraid that’s not the reason I came.”

“Oh?” Dym raised a playful eyebrow and made circles in the water with his index finger. “Was it to see the one you cherish so much?”

I was in no mood for teasing. “No,” I said curtly. “It’s because things at Silver Hill are going downhill—fast.”

“Can’t say I’m surprised.” Dym continued making his lazy finger-circles in the water. How is he not freezing in these temperatures? His skin, smooth and gleaming as ever, didn’t even have goose bumps. “You should just run away,” he said. “That’s what I’d do.”

I gritted my teeth. “Yes, well, it’s rather difficult to do when you’re in the middle of nowhere in the middle of winter.” And it would also mean leaving behind all the other girls, not that you care.

Dym stopped moving his finger and raised his head to look at me. “I’m only thinking of your safety, Seluna. Trying to defeat Catron may not be possible.”

“I don’t think you’re as concerned with my safety as you should be. And if I don’t do something about Catron, who will?”

“As you wish.” Dym shrugged. “Have fun tilting at those windmills, kid.”

“It would be more ‘fun’ if you’d join me,” I retorted. My face was getting red, my fury increasing.

“Sorry, no can do.” Dym refused to meet my gaze. “Might interfere with my swimming.”

“Yes, well, don’t let my overwhelming troubles cut into your leisure time,” I snapped. “Did it ever occur to you how serious things are? If it did, you might not be in such a joking mood.”

Dym folded his arms, which pulled the muscles in his chest tauter. “Explain it to me.”

I took a deep breath. “More girls are getting shocked—and gods only know what else—by Catron and his demonic devices. More patients are disappearing from Silver Hill as well.”

“Disappearing? Disappearing how?” Dym asked. “To where?”

“That’s what I don’t know!” I wanted to fling my hands in the air, but one of them was holding a candle. “The Event, or whatever it is, gets closer every day. I still haven’t the foggiest notion of what it entails, or what to do about it. I tried using a sleep spell on Catron, but—”

“Really?” Dym interrupted. “A sleep spell? Where did you get that?”

“What do you mean?” I narrowed my eyes. “You practically suggested it to me.”

Dym nodded slowly. “Ah . . . so that’s what was on page one thirty-six.”

I couldn’t tell if he was pretending not to know the spell had been on that page all along. Right now, I didn’t care.

“Anyway,” I said, “it doesn’t matter. The spell didn’t work; I’ve no idea why. Which means Catron is still up and around, wreaking havoc and planning new tortures for us.”

“The sleep spell didn’t work?” Dym’s jaw grew slack. He seemed genuinely surprised. “Then the danger is greater for both of us,” he murmured.

“No joke!” I was practically yelling. The only reason I kept my voice down was that I didn’t want to alert anyone in the asylum to our presence. “Though I’d say the danger is decidedly greater for me. All you need to do is swim out of here.”

Dym swallowed hard. His expression was the closest thing to fear that I’d seen on him since we met. “You know I can’t do that, Seluna.”

“I know you won’t. I still don’t see why you can’t.” Dym opened his mouth to speak, but I put up my hand. “Right, right; it’s ‘hard to explain.’ But Dym, you really need to do something. I have nowhere else to go. I’m out of options, out of time!”

“I’m so sorry, Seluna. I wish I had more assistance to offer. But if it’s any consolation, I won’t leave you.”

“What do you mean, you won’t leave? You can’t just hang around here in the middle of the pond.” It wouldn’t do any good, anyway.

“If that’s what I must do, then that’s what I must do. All I know is I can’t leave you to face this by yourself.”

“But that’s exactly what you are doing! Not helping me, not even telling me why you won’t. Do you have any idea how all this looks?”

Dym’s shoulders sagged, and his entire body seemed like a deflated hot-air balloon. “Yes, I do,” he said quietly. “All I can say again is that I’m sorry, I wish things were different.” He looked up at me. “And I will not leave you.”

I wanted to throw myself into his arms, to beg him to help me. Or maybe I just wanted to be in his arms, for him to hold me the way I’d imagined. Either way, that would never happen. I was far too proud. Although, Seluna, if your life is at stake . . .

No. I doubted even that would change anything. It didn’t seem like begging was what Dym wanted. He was disinclined to offer aid no matter what I said or did. I hated him for not helping, hated myself for having to ask for help, and hated myself even more for wanting to be with him regardless.

“Fine, then.” I pursed my lips to keep the rage inside. “I guess this is the last time we’ll be seeing each other.” The childlike look of pain on Dym’s face was almost too much to bear.

There has to be something I’m missing, something he’s not telling me. But since I had no idea what it was, and no way of finding out, it was pointless to keep pleading with him. There was only one thing left to do if he insisted on staying here, or on coming back. It probably wouldn’t work, but I needed to try. I couldn’t risk Dym being harmed by this Event. I had to keep him safe, even if he refused to do the same for me.

I had to use the sleep spell on him. Maybe the second time would be the charm.

“It pains my heart to think of never seeing you again, Seluna,” Dym said softly. “It truly does.” His eyes ran all over me, as if trying to memorize my form, my face.

I literally had to bite my tongue to keep from making a sarcastic remark. I still needed something personal of Dym’s in order to work the spell. But what could I get? He didn’t even wear clothing—at least, not while he was swimming. Then it dawned on me.

“At least give me something to remember you by,” I said haughtily. “A lock of your hair, perhaps.”

“You want a piece of my hair?” He looked skeptically at my own, which was waist-length. “You seem to have quite enough as it is.”

“You are wasting the remaining time we have with these asinine comments.”

Dym put up his hands. “All right, all right. You wouldn’t happen to have a pair of scissors on you? Or a small knife, perhaps?”

“Are you kidding? They won’t let us carry so much as a pin at Silver Hill.”

“Figures there would be no sharps allowed. Can’t have you girls do any subversive pinning, I suppose.” Just as I was wondering how to get a lock of Dym’s hair, he ran a few strands back and forth against the jagged edge of a rock. In no time at all, the strands came off cleanly in his palms. He held the hair up to me, and I took it in my hand without my eyes ever leaving his.

Even wet, I was surprised at how light and soft Dym’s hair was. Makes me want to run my fingers through the rest of it. Then I remembered I was still mad at him.

“Well, then . . .” My voice trailed off. I knew I had to leave now. I couldn’t risk Dym realizing how I truly felt. Who knew if I would see him again? If I would even survive Catron? A last, desperate urge swept through my heart, and I wanted to kiss him good-bye.

It was almost as if Dym felt the same. He pressed his lips together and looked at mine.

“Seluna—” he started.

I cut him off before I could change my mind. “Good-bye, Endymion. I wish you luck. The way you treat your friends, I fear you’ll sorely need it.”

Dym swallowed hard and moved back from the edge of the pond. “Good-bye, Seluna. For once, I hope you’re wrong. I hope we do meet again.”

“I think that is about as likely as this garden turning into an Eden overnight.” I turned on my heel before he could see the hot tears coursing down my cheeks.

Chapter 12

I cursed myself as I walked back to the secret staircase, then continued cursing as I wound my way angrily back up to the garret.

What am I doing? Why am I being so stupid? Trying to save a creature who wouldn't lift a finger for me. It was as if I was compelled by some strange, otherworldly force.

I really hope it isn't love, I thought, shutting the big stone door as I returned to my room. I pulled the sheet over it and wiped my sleeve across my eyes. My throat hurt from trying to keep the tears inside. Because if this is love, then by all the gods, they can keep it.

But I still needed to deal with Catron. Since the sleep spell didn't work, maybe I can take another look at that Drawing Down the Moon thing. I didn't know why, but I felt like it might help. It couldn't hurt, anyway, and it was my last shot. I got out the Book and sat cross-legged on my cot, holding a dwindling candle over the ancient pages.

On second thought . . . I propped the Book up on the windowsill and let the moonlight shine on it. Not only did this make it easier to read, but for some reason, it made me feel better, too. I began searching for Drawing Down the Moon. But before I reached it, I came across a section I didn't remember seeing before.

Across two full pages was a picture of a young man gazing at the moon, which encircled a feminine face. The face on the moon was smiling. There was a great deal of text below the picture, written in neat, tiny script. Fortunately, it was in a recent Hartlandian dialect. But some of the text was faded and scratched out, so I had to begin reading several paragraphs after it started. What I uncovered was a most interesting story:

"The king and I were on a tour of the Westernland coast when our ship was caught in a bad storm. It was late at night, and we and the crew nearly drowned but for the quick thinking of a young woman and her male companion. They arrived suddenly, just as our ship was going under. Cramming all of us on board their tiny rowboat, they brought everyone safely to shore."

The king and I? Unbelievable. Maybe the Book really did belong to a Hartlandian queen of old. I read on.

"The girl was quite striking. She had pale, pearly skin with long, thick black hair. Her lover was equally distinctive: a dark, powerfully built boy with bright green eyes. They were constantly smiling, gazing at each other. So clear and deep was their affection, it touched one's heart to look at them.

"They were more than gracious, letting us take shelter in their seaside home. Even though they knew we were royalty, they did not act nervous or affected in any way, like so many subjects do. As we sipped hot drinks with blankets around our shoulders, I asked how long the pair had known each other.

"They laughed and said, 'Forever!' and 'Since the dawn of time.' I smiled and replied, 'I know what you mean. Sometimes, it seems the king and I have been married for an age as well.'

"But the girl shook her head and smiled. 'No, it's true. You see, I am the goddess of the moon, and this is my consort. Because he is not a deity, we cannot stay in the same heaven when our bodies expire. The only way we can be together is to be reborn, over and over, and find each other on Earth. We only learned this recently—in these bodies, that is.' She exchanged a knowing look with the boy. 'I don't know how soon we were able to find out in previous lives. But it appears we come down here with little prior knowledge of who we once were. We must reacquaint ourselves in every lifetime.'

" 'Hardly a disagreeable task.' The boy brought his beloved's hand to his lips and gave it a gentle kiss.

"I hesitated before responding. I wasn't sure whether or not to believe them."

How could the queen believe them? I thought. It sounds ridiculous. I bit my lip. Beautiful, but ridiculous.

" 'Well,' I said slowly, 'that certainly is a very lovely story.'

" 'But what happens,' asked the king, 'if you don't find each other in your lifetime? Or something happens to one of you before you do?'

"The girl's face fell. 'According to what we've learned, that is indeed a possibility. Sometimes, we do not find one another, and must wander the earth alone.'

" 'And then there are forces that may conspire to keep us apart,' said the boy. But he did not elaborate on what they were.

" 'There is also the chance we will fall in love with someone else,' added the girl, 'or not believe the legend from which our love is sprung.'

" 'But that is not the case this time.' The boy wrapped the girl in his arms, and looked on her face with complete adoration. 'Now that I've found you, I will let nothing come between us. You are my sea-treasure, and I will fight to the last to hold onto you.' He kissed her passionately. My husband smiled at me and put his hand on mine.

"Although we had to return to the royal palace shortly afterward, I never forgot that night. And I never forgot the legend of the moon goddess and her infinite consort."

There was a lump in my throat when I finished reading. It's not fair, I thought. I mean, it's not like I'm sitting around in a tower expecting to be rescued. Not exactly. But it would be nice to know that kind of love. Someone who would do anything for you. Why can't Dym be more like that boy in the Book? Sometimes, I thought all girls had to be masochists to give their hearts to those so undeserving.

I looked out the window. The moon was high in the sky; the night was half-over. I should get some sleep if I didn't want my daytime drowsiness to be worse than usual. But there was still the sleep enchantment to perform on Dym; I'd have to look at Drawing Down the Moon again tomorrow. I still half-remembered it . . . circle, wand, chakras, goddess . . .

Taking Dym's hair out of my pocket, I moved the candle over it rhythmically back and forth while chanting. Dym. Dim. I recalled how I'd associated his name with stupidity when we first met. As I thought of how angry I was with him, it took all I had not to say "stupid" in place of his name. Still, I hoped the spell didn't take effect while he was on one of his midnight swims. It would be tragic if Dym drowned because I was trying to save him. But I didn't really have an alternative.

Why did Dym refuse to help me? My mind moved in circles around the question as I performed the spell. He seemed so earnest and sincere, so anguished when he said he couldn't do anything. It made me want to believe him. Then there was the pesky fact that I couldn't stop thinking about him and his welfare—even when I didn't want to.

But I told myself I was saving Dym for purely altruistic reasons. I would do the same for anybody, I reasoned. Even if Dym turned out to be a selfish coward, that didn't mean he deserved to die. I uttered the last words of the spell, holding in my heart the intention that Dym awaken when it was safe. Surely the spell's caveat of "as long as necessary" would cover that.

"If the bloody thing works at all," I muttered, and put the Book under my cot. Pulling the horse blanket over me, I tried to ignore its roughness and concentrate on the minimal warmth it provided. I prayed that tonight, at least my dreams would grant reprieve from the unending sense of doom.

For a long while, I tossed and turned on my cot, but at last, sleep washed over me, and I entered the Palace of Dreams. Unlike my previous dreams, this one was not shrouded in symbolism and metaphor: it was literally a palace. It looked like the home of an Olympian god, supported by columns like the ones at the main entrance of Silver Hill. The moon was just surrendering her reign on the right side of the sky, the sun peeking over a rose-red threshold on the left. There was a valley of mountains with a river running down the center. In the early-morning light, you could see the valley for miles. Never before had I beheld anything so breathtaking.

Things made sense here, the way they only did in dreams. Despite the insane events of the past few weeks, the palace radiated order and logic. I couldn't really explain how. It just seemed that here, I was reminded of truths that in daytime were disguised as lies. Of my real self that in waking hours must hide behind a mask. I walked the flawless marble halls, drunk on the infinite space between sleeping and waking. I remember being soothed by the wild sweetness of my vision, as if no harm could breach the impenetrable wall it built.

But nothing could have prepared me for what happened when I woke up.

I knew something was wrong the moment I opened my eyes.

I couldn't really explain how, except that it was too quiet. Although it was always quieter in the garret than in the girls' dorms, this was different somehow. It was an eerie stillness. I sat up in my cot and looked out the window. The slant of the light was completely off. It wasn't early morning, the time I usually heard Cutter or one of her cronies banging on my door.

I must have overslept. But how was that possible? We were never allowed to sleep in, and I didn't need that much sleep in the first place. The mental strain of the past few weeks must have taken more of a toll than I realized.

I got up, smoothed out my dress, and looked out the window again. The sun was setting! My jaw dropped. Something was definitely wrong.

"Miss?" I heard a tentative knock. "Miss?" Definitely not Cutter. The voice would have been deeper, meaner. Not to mention the full weight of her heavy fist would have been pounding against the door. I heard keys turning, and a small, mousy woman walked in with her nurse's cap askew.

"Come with me." She turned and began walking briskly down the steps and into the hall. I almost had to lift my skirts and jog to keep up with her.

"Shouldn't we be going to breakfast?" I asked as we passed the cafeteria. But the nurse didn't answer. I supposed it was a little late for breakfast, after all. We passed the schoolroom and solarium as well.

"Where is everyone?" I didn't see Rose, Laura, or any of the other girls. In fact, I didn't see any other staff members as we walked, either.

"I'm not at liberty to say, Miss," the nurse finally answered. "All I can say is I'm glad fetchin' you is my last assignment before I get out of 'ere."

"Get out of here?"

"I've been let go—not that I'm complainin', mind you," she said hurriedly. "Frankly, I can't wait to get into decent employ. I 'ad enough of them long nights in this gods-forsaken place." Her eyes scanned the shadowy walls and ceilings as if she expected them to come to life and attack her.

"Why did they let you go?"

Now she turned and looked me up and down as if I had no right to exist. "Well, ain't we the nosy one?" she said. "Not that it's any of your business, but Dr. Catron said 'e couldn't trust me no more. Don't know why, seein' as 'ow I'm one of the most upright souls on this 'ere earth. But 'e's been actin' more funny that way lately, 'ardly trustin' nobody. Anyway, it ain't none of my concern. Like I said, I'm just glad to be gettin' out of this circle of 'ell. Though I ain't lookin' forward to leavin' through that there big 'allway. The way they 'ave them layin' on the floor like that, it ain't right." She shuddered. "They should at least cover 'em with a sheet or somethin'."

Alarm bells were ringing in my head. "Cover what?" I demanded. Still no answer.

"Gettin' even worse, if you ask me, with 'im sayin' that Event supposed to be tonight and all," she muttered to herself, shivering.

Oh, no! The Event is tonight? I knew it was coming soon, but I hadn't realized it was that soon. Is there a chance Catron's wrong? I had no idea what was going on, but it was time to find out. I stopped in the middle of the hall.

"I'm not going another step until you tell me where everyone is and where you're taking me."

The nurse's mouth made a little O, and she grabbed me by the wrist with more strength than I expected from someone her size. "Now, you listen 'ere." She shook me hard. "You're comin' with me and that's that. You's the last job I 'ave before I can collect my check and leave this place, and I'll not 'ave you interferin' with my leavin'!" She twisted my arm and began dragging me.

"If you think I'm going anywhere with you, then you're crazier than anyone who ever passed through the gates of Silver Hill!" I snapped. Then I kicked her hard in the shins, and she let go of my arm.

"Ow!" The nurse howled and grabbed her leg. "Devil take you, you 'ateful little—oy! Oy, you! Get back 'ere!" But I was already running as fast as I could down the hall.

"I said get back 'ere!" the mousy nurse shrieked. Then, to herself: "Which way did she go? Drat these dark 'alls! Doctor can't be bothered to turn up the gas, and I can 'ardly see a bloody thing!" The sound of her cursing my name and Catron's grew softer and softer as I ran faster and faster.

Passing a tall window on my left, I could see that the sun had set completely now. Outside was the rich blackness of the night sky, strewn with stars. Too late, I realized I was running towards the treatment rooms, where Catron conducted his experiments. I hadn't meant to come here, but when I started running, my only thought was to get away from the nurse.

Was she taking me to the treatment rooms all along? I didn't see Catron or anyone else in what must have been the old waiting room. It was as broken-down as the rest of the asylum; paint was peeling off the walls, baseboards were disintegrating, and chairs and tables had legs and seats missing. But the condition of the room wasn't the worst thing about it.

The worst thing was how Laura looked in the wheelchair right in front of me.

Her hands and feet were bound to the chair with leather straps. Her hair was a mess, her dress disheveled. She was doubled over, mumbling and crying. I reached out to put a hand on her shoulder.

"Laura?" I said as gently as I could.

Laura's head jerked up and she shrieked. I was so surprised I jumped back. There was no recognition in her big blue eyes, which seemed to stare right past me. They had a filmy, watery quality to them. She continued mumbling, but more angrily this time. Now, her eyes darted back and forth between me and the ground.

What on heaven and earth did they do to her? The only thing I could think of was that they'd shocked her so many times it destroyed parts of her brain. Or maybe the whole of it, for all I knew.

Laura would never be able to contact Aunt Mae now. And it was unlikely her aunt could do anything to help if she did. Catron and the rest of those evil bastards have all but killed an innocent person. I turned away, unable to comfort Laura, or even look at her. That was when I saw Rose.

She was seated in a wheelchair a few feet away, but at least she wasn't strapped down. Her body was so still, I thought she was sleeping, or unconscious. I rushed over to her.

"Rose?" I cried. "Rose, wake up!"

As I drew closer, I saw her eyes were open. But something wasn't right. Rose seemed catatonic, unmoving. Even odder was the fact that her bangs were hanging over her eyes. Rose hated when hair fell in her face. And though her hands were free, she wasn't making a move to push it back. With the lightest of touches, I pushed the curls away for her. That was when I saw them. Long, unhealed incisions on either side of her head.

From a lobotomy.

I'd read about lobotomies in textbooks. They were surgical procedures that severed nerves in the front of the brain. The surgery was used to decrease or eliminate unwanted behavior in patients—something Catron had always been keen on doing. All the air seemed to rush out of my lungs when I realized Rose wasn't catatonic. In fact, she wasn't even breathing.

Rose was dead.

I jumped back the same way I had with Laura, this time covering my mouth with both hands. My eyes ran all over Rose, looking for signs of life. But there were none. Gingerly, I lifted the clipboard attached to the side of her wheelchair and read the notes scribbled there.

" 'Uncontrollable obsession with nicotine,' " I mouthed. " 'All methods to end obsession failed due to patient's refusal to cooperate with treatment.' "

" 'Cooperate with treatment,' " I said bitterly. "As in 'let them torture her,' most likely. Oh, Rose." My eyes filled with tears that I willed not to fall. "I always said cigarettes would kill you. But I never dreamed it would be like this." I realized this was why girls had been "disappearing" from Silver Hill. Most of them were getting killed during—or after—lobotomies.

I heard Laura whimper, her eyes moving back and forth between Rose and me. How could they have left her alone with a dead body? I hated to think of Rose that way, but essentially, that was what she was now. Then again, why wouldn't they just leave Laura and Rose here together? It wasn't as if they ever cared about their mental welfare. I walked back to where Laura sat. I couldn't leave her, or she might share Rose's fate. I squeezed my eyes shut and clenched my fists, trying to figure out what to do.

And to think I tried to convince Rose she was crazy. Now, I could never apologize, never tell her why I'd done it. Both my friends were gone forever. I never even got the chance to say good-bye. I was so lost in thought that Nurse Cutter's voice came to me like a jolt of electricity.

"Ah, Seluna. You're just in time." She swung open a set of double doors at the end of the waiting room, an orderly on either side of her. "Looks like that dull-witted junior nurse managed to get you 'ere after all. Come with us." She smiled. "Dr. Catron is acceleratin' your treatment."

I was so startled that I pointed straight at Cutter and the orderlies. I thought I felt a snap at the end of my index finger, like static.

"What's she doin', then, Miz Cutter?" One of the orderlies looked at me with a furrowed brow.

"I ain't never seen loonies point like that nowhere, I ain't," said the other. "And what was that at the end of 'er finger?"

So I didn't imagine it. I glanced down quickly at my hand, but there was nothing unusual about it.

"Never you mind what she's doin'!" snapped Cutter. "Lunatics do whatever suits them, no matter what decent folk think. That's what makes them lunatics. And it's Nurse Cutter, you bleedin' idiot. Now, stop dawdlin'; we got a treatment scheduled."

This wasn't good. "Accelerating treatment" was definitely a negative at Silver Hill. Just look what happened to Rose. I had to get out of here—fast. But I couldn't leave without Laura. I lowered my arm and put my hand on her shoulder. She began to make low moaning noises.

"What's going to happen to Laura? Where are the rest of the girls? What did you do to them?" I demanded.

"Not that it's any of your business, but that junior nurse is takin' this patient—" Cutter jutted her round chin at Laura—"to 'er parents' 'ouse. Then that silly woman'll be on 'er way to 'er new position. The carriage we telegraphed for should be 'ere any minute now to pick them up."

So there is a telegraph machine at Silver Hill. Probably in Catron's office, where I first assumed it was. Little good it did me now.

"As for the rest of the patients," Cutter said in a dark voice, "some of them went 'ome. You know that."

"What about the ones that didn't?" I asked. Laura gave a squeal.

Cutter set her lips in a firm line, and her cheeks bulged slightly. "Now, you listen 'ere. I've 'ad quite enough of your cheek. You're comin' with us to see Dr. Catron without any more of a fuss."

"And what if I don't want to?"

It was so quiet you could have heard a pin drop.

Finally, Cutter spoke—very, very slowly. "If you know what's good for you, you'll come with us. Right. Now."

My eyes darted from orderly to orderly. Both were good-size, burly men. The kind that would be hard to fight off. They kept looking at Cutter, then at me, awaiting instructions. I tried stalling for time.

“I just want to know where you’re taking me, and what’s going to happen once we’re there. Asking such things is hardly a crime, is it?”

Still looking at me, Cutter held her hand in the air and snapped her fingers. Without a word, the two orderlies pulled and pushed me into a straitjacket that seemed to come out of nowhere.

It’s hard to describe how unsettling it is to be in a straitjacket. There’s just enough give in the sleeves to make you think you can wiggle yourself out. But no matter how hard you try, you can’t. Never before had I felt so powerless. I don’t know if one could say I handled the situation with sangfroid, but whatever it was, it was the sole thing standing between me and panic. Laura, on the other hand, was squealing like a stuck pig.

Cutter was calm as could be while I grunted and wrestled fruitlessly against my bonds. “That’ll be all for now, gentlemen. Dr. Catron and I thank you for your service.”

“What’s that, then?” one orderly asked.

“I said, ‘Thank you for your service,’ ” she repeated, taking me by the arm. “Which, incidentally, is no longer needed at Silver ’ill.”

“You firin’ us, then, are you?” the other orderly asked, his jaw growing slack.

“That’s about the gist of it. Be sure and collect your things on the way out.” She turned with me towards the double doors.

“Now, see ’ere—” started the orderly on the left.

“No, you see.” Cutter turned around, nearly taking my arm off. “I’ve no time for any more shenanigans tonight. I said your services is no longer needed. There ain’t no more duties for you to perform. If I was you, I’d leave ’ere as soon as possible. There should be just enough room on the carriage that’s arrivin’ shortly. Unless you want to speak to Dr. Catron about it, of course.”

The orderlies looked at one another. Despite the fact that they both seemed much stronger than Catron, one of them swallowed hard, and the other grimaced.

“Well, do you?” Cutter asked menacingly. “Want to take it up with Catron, that is?”

“There’s glowin’ letters of reference tacked to the doors of your rooms. I’m sure you’ll find them very useful in seekin’ new employ.”

The orderlies looked at each other again, and this time, it was the one on the right who spoke.

“Thank you kindly, Nurse Cutter. Best of luck to you, then.” He nodded to the other man.

“Ah, yes. Best of luck, ma’am.” They tipped their caps to Cutter and walked quickly down the other end of the hall. They didn’t give me so much as a second glance.

“Well, thank goodness that’s done,” Cutter said under her breath. “Them was the last two orderlies. Now it’s just me and Dr. Catron, the way it should be. Two true professionals workin’ together.” She smiled and turned both of us towards the double doors again.

If I didn’t know any better, I’d swear Cutter was in love with Catron. The very thought was nauseating. But what she said also meant I was alone with them at Silver Hill.

“Wait a minute. Are you saying that you, Dr. Catron, and I are the only ones left in this asylum?” I asked.

“That’s what I said, ain’t it?” Cutter snapped. “‘Onestly, it’s no wonder you girls end up in the predicaments you do. Ain’t even got the decency to listen.”

“I was under the impression you were muttering to yourself.”

Cutter spun me around by the shoulders and slapped me across the face. I was so surprised, I couldn’t think of anything to say. My cheek was burning, but of course, the straitjacket prevented me from putting my hand to it.

“That’s enough!” Cutter’s voice seethed with rage. “You just wait till Dr. Catron gets ’old of you. ’E knows what to do with impertinent little wretches.” She grabbed me roughly by the elbow, opened the doors, and dragged me down the hall. Laura’s squeals died down until I couldn’t hear them anymore. “Oh, yes,” she said, smiling again. “If you ain’t the one we’re lookin’ for, I don’t know who is.”

I tried pulling in the opposite direction, leaning all of my weight against the force of Cutter’s arm. But she was too strong for me. She shoved me through the door of an operating theater, where Dr. Catron was waiting.

His back was to Cutter and me as we entered the room, but he turned around slowly when he heard us come in. He had a cap on and a surgical mask over his face, but I could still tell it was him. Plastic gloves covered both his hands, and one of them held a scalpel. His usually spotless white lab coat had a number of dark red blotches on it. My stomach turned over.

“Se-lu-na,” he said when he spotted me. I couldn’t see his mouth beneath the mask, but I could tell by his voice he was smiling. “How nice to see you again.”

“Wish I could say the same,” I retorted, still struggling. Cutter slapped me across the face again. If I ever get my hands on that bitch, I thought, I’m going to pound her senseless.

“Now, now, Nurse Cutter,” Catron chided, “there’s no reason to exert yourself. We’ll need all our strength and concentration for the procedure.”

“Of course, Doctor,” Cutter said. “Shall we strap ’er down now?”

“Yes, it’s time.” Catron put the scalpel down and turned up the gas lamp above him. They took me out of the straitjacket and put my hands and feet in leather cuffs attached to a freezing-cold operating table. A larger strap was tightened across my waist, and the last went over my brow so that I could barely move my head. I tore and kicked and even tried to bite, but it was no use. Cutter was an immovable mountain of a woman, and Catron was surprisingly powerful as well. They tilted the table up so that I lay at a forty-five-degree angle.

There was no doubt in my mind now. The final procedure—the acceleration of treatment—was definitely a lobotomy.

I struggled against the straps as they cut into me, mainly along my wrists. I could feel my skin tearing and bleeding, but I didn’t care. All I could think of was the drip, drip, dripping sound of an IV, the smell of isopropanol. The only light came from the flickering gas lamp, and the moon shining through a high, barred window above us.

I twisted my head to one side, but just barely. On a metal tray, I saw several different-size scalpels and a small hammer. There was also something that looked like an ice pick, and a saw. I felt my stomach drop out from under me. I didn't even want to think about what the saw was for. There were also a few tools I didn't recognize at all.

Cutter donned a surgical mask and gloves as well, pulling the latter over her hands and releasing them with a snap. She tied a cap similar to Catron's around her head. Before I knew it, both villains were leaning over me. Catron picked his scalpel up again and sighed.

"I do hope these are better than the last ones." He looked at the slim piece of metal in his hand.

Cutter made a clucking noise with her tongue. "No one is committed to quality these days, is they, Dr. Catron?"

"Only us, I'm afraid," he replied.

"Oh, of course, Doctor. I wasn't referrin' to you. I know 'ow seriously you take your work." There was a strong note of admiration in Cutter's voice that made me want to be sick.

"Yes, it's good to be hardworking when you're a pair of raging sociopaths," I said. At least they didn't muzzle me.

"Se-lu-na," Catron drawled in his patronizing way. "Is this really the time for insults? I wouldn't say our behavior is deviant." He used the scalpel to indicate himself and Cutter. "You're the one with the abnormalities."

"Oh, really? How do you figure?"

"We've been observing you," Catron replied. "Your refusal to conform. Breaking and entering. That clandestine meeting with Francine." My eyes widened. "You didn't think we knew about that?"

"How on earth did you—"

"Never mind how," Catron said. "What matters is that we know. And that our little Francine problem has been taken care of."

I struggled uselessly against my bonds. "WHAT DID YOU DO TO HER?" I yelled.

"Now, now, calm yourself, Se-lu-na." He leaned over the tool tray and began sharpening the scalpel on some sort of miniature grinding machine. "This will all be over before you know it."

"Serves 'er right, the little blighter," Cutter snorted. "A deviant of the worst sort, and a bloody stupid one, too. As if a simple sleep charm would get through the protections this man 'as on him."

"Protections?" I repeated. Catron was almost done sharpening the scalpel.

"Of course 'e's got protections!" Cutter all but threw up her arms. "One don't have a psychic foretell 'orrid things and not demand a protection spell right after the tellin'."

So that's why the sleep spell didn't work. But maybe it means it will work on Dym. Unless, of course, he uses protection spells, too.

"How did you know I cast that—" I started.

“Well, who else could it ’ave been if the magic came from the garret? Besides, the protected always feel somethin’ bouncin’ off them when someone tries a spell.” Cutter rolled her eyes.

“Of course, they don’t work against everything, I’m sorry to say.” Catron finished sharpening the scalpel and turned to me again.

“Like this Event you’re so afraid of?”

Catron looked taken aback. Ah, so you’re not inside my brain yet, are you? I thought. Don’t know everything I know, do you? But he quickly regained his composure.

“Protection spells work well enough against the small minds of pests.” He raised the scalpel above my forehead. “We’ll see if that’s what we have here.”

I swallowed hard. “Don’t doctors usually anesthetize patients undergoing these types of procedures?” Of course, the last thing I wanted was to be anesthetized. I’d need all my faculties to get out of this mess—if I could get out of it. But I also needed to stall for time.

“We feel it’s important for patients to participate in the treatment process,” Catron said sweetly. “Otherwise, how will they grasp the full benefit? How will we know if the treatment is effective?”

“Or if you find what you’re looking for,” I said.

“That, too,” said Catron. Again, I could tell he was smiling. “But your thoughts on the subject are of little consequence. Your resistance is simply more evidence of your madness.”

“Let me get this straight,” I said through gritted teeth. “You want to experiment on me—essentially torture me to death—and I’m mad for trying to stop you?”

“Something like that,” Catron replied absentmindedly. His attention was on the flickering gas lamp. “But it doesn’t matter now. All that matters is that I can avoid the disastrous Event that would have laid waste to our plans.”

Our plans? Does he mean his and Cutter’s plans? The woman doesn’t seem capable of planning so much as a birthday party without his help.

“Soon—very soon—I shall discover the one thing that lies between me and greatness.” Now, his eyes were piercing mine. “And I shall destroy her.” Cutter let out a girlish, almost hysterical giggle.

My sangfroid was disappearing fast. My heart beat wildly, and I had to control my breath so it didn’t come out in gasps. But I vowed not to let any sign of emotion cross my face. I would be like a girl in a book I once read. She was a princess who’d lost her father and fallen victim to an evil boarding-school headmistress. The headmistress always wanted to see her beaten, broken. But the princess never gave her the satisfaction. She pretended to be a brave solider instead.

That’s how I will be. Brave and unyielding to the last.

“At least tell me what you’re talking about.” Beads of perspiration were beginning to run down the sides of my head. “What’s the reason behind all of this? What—or whom—are you looking for?”

“That reminds me, Dr. Catron.” Cutter jerked her head up. “What about the creature?”

“Don’t be ridiculous, woman,” Catron said. “We don’t need the creature anymore. Not if this procedure goes the way I think it will.”

Dear gods, they're really going to do this. They're going to get inside my brain and tear it apart. What if I don't die? What if I turn into someone like Laura—or worse? I couldn't decide which fate was more terrible. I saw the light from the gas lamp flicker once or twice again, then dim considerably and stay that way.

"Bloody hell, there's not enough gas!" Catron threw the scalpel to the floor. "I knew I should've topped it off before we started." He tore off his mask, gloves, and cap, gnashing his teeth.

"I can run and get the canister for you, Dr. Catron," Cutter offered.

"No. All the canisters are in my office, which is locked. And you know how I feel about other people having a key. I'll get it. Wait here." He walked towards the door. Then he turned and pointed at me. "And keep a sharp eye on her."

"Will do, Doctor," called Cutter as he left. "'Onestly, 'e's a brilliant man, but so forgetful these days. It's the mental strain that's gettin' to 'im, it is." She looked down at me. "But all that'll be over shortly, won't it? Soon 'e'll be back to 'is old self."

His mad, delusional self, I thought. But at least I had a bit of time to think. A thin sliver of moonlight peeked out from between the bars of the window high above us. I hoped it was enough.

It was difficult to focus the moonlight on the scalpel; I couldn't move my head a great deal. But if there was ever a time to work hard at something, it was now. I concentrated as intensely as possible, and the scalpel darted across the room and sliced open the top of Cutter's cheek.

Cutter howled, and her hand flew to her face. The scalpel clattered to the floor. Cutter drew back her blood-smeared palm and stared at it in disbelief.

"What the? 'Ow did—"

"Never mind how," I said in the firmest voice I could manage. "Untie me before I use that thing for more than a cut on the cheek!" Cutter just stared at me, blood dripping from her face and fingers onto the white-tile floor.

"I said, untie me!" I looked at the moonlit window, then at the tray filled with surgical tools. The metal saw leaped in front of Cutter, bending back and forth like a scrap of paper. The twanging sound it made was almost musical. It was certainly music to my ears.

Cutter, however, was decidedly less enthused. She stood plastered against the wall, body frozen, eyes wide. I moved the saw to the right, then to the left, inches from her face. Almost as if I were daring her to try and escape. She grabbed the ice pick—or whatever it was—from the tray and jabbed at the saw. Her cap went askew and her surgical mask came halfway off. I kept making the saw move in swift, menacing waves.

"Dammit to hell, untie me or I'll take your head off!" I shouted. Cutter's eyes darted from me to the saw and back again.

"Oh, for the love of the gods, I don't have time for this!" Keeping the saw in front of Cutter, I lifted the scalpel off the floor with my mind. As fast as I could, I used the scalpel to cut away the straps that bound me to the table. Then I leaped off and ran out of the room before Cutter could stop me.

I burst through the double doors; there was no sign of Catron. But as I dashed down an adjacent hall, I could hear his footsteps moving swiftly back to the operating room.

“You let her get away?” Catron roared. “I’ll have your head for this, Cutter!”

“Please, Doctor, it wasn’t my fault!” Cutter begged as I flew past portraits and gas lamps on the walls.

“How could she have escaped? She was sodding tied down!” I heard sounds of metal objects overturning and crashing; Catron must have been throwing things.

“She—I—I don’t know, sir! She just, that is—”

“Damn all, Cutter. Stop your blubbering. I don’t have time for excuses. It doesn’t matter. All that matters now is getting her back.” Their voices faded away as I tried to think of a plan.

I had no idea where I was going. My only thought was to run, run, run. So, I wasn’t prepared when I stumbled into the main hall and saw what had become of most of the other patients at Silver Hill.

Chapter 14

There was something ghastly in the main hall, and I smelled it before I saw it.

Formaldehyde. No doubt to preserve the bodies; not for dignity, I wagered, but so the stench of decay wouldn't attract wild animals. It stung my eyes for a moment, and I covered my nose with one hand, trying not to inhale. Blood from where the table straps dug into my wrists had run down my hands. It was drying in ugly streaks. But I ignored the blood, and the pain, gaping instead at the unholy sight before me.

There must have been eight or ten dead girls stacked in piles on one side of the room. Everything about them looked wilted and gray, from their flat, cloudy eyes to their limp and tangled hair. Some had a waxy, green tinge to their skin. Others were bluish purple, or bloated, with wide-open eyes bulging out of their sockets. I could see veins making black, marbled outlines against their hands and faces. Waves of horror passed over me.

I recognized several faces plainly. Geraldine. Thomasina. Francine. Some I didn't know by name, but I'd seen them before in the schoolroom or solarium. Almost every one had lobotomy scars like Rose's just above their eyes.

This is what that mousy nurse was talking about, I realized. "Should at least cover 'em . . . it ain't right . . ." They must have been awaiting disposal. My guess was that Catron planned to get rid of them in the least noticeable manner. Maybe he was going to throw them into the asylum furnace in the basement. My stomach threatened to revolt. Why isn't Rose with them? Perhaps Catron and Cutter anticipated moving her here after they'd dealt with me.

I turned away, unable to comprehend what I was seeing. That was when I spotted the front doors flung wide-open, as if someone had left in a great hurry. It didn't take me long to figure out who. I could see the orderlies Cutter had fired hitching a ride on the back of a horse-drawn carriage, suitcases in hand.

"Hi-yah! Hi-yah!" shouted the driver, whipping the horses madly. Even he knew better than to stay here long. The mousy nurse sat next to him. "Faster, you fool!" she screeched. Over it all, I could hear Laura inside the carriage, wailing. Any hope I had of catching the last ride out of Silver Hill disappeared rapidly onto the distant moors.

The sound of an alarm rang, unbearably loud as the noise came in angry waves. Why is an alarm ringing? I thought. I didn't even know the asylum had an alarm. Then again, it seems there are a lot of things at Silver Hill I didn't know about. My eyes scanned the room, trying to determine where to go without looking at the bodies of the girls. The long walls of mirrors once again made the hall seem infinite.

Is there really no escaping this hell?

"FIND HER!" Catron's voice was so thunderous I could hear it over the alarm.

Dammit! I had to hide, to think. I couldn't run away from the asylum; Catron and Cutter would come after me. I needed a way to destroy them. There was only one place I knew about at Silver Hill that my enemies didn't. And that was the secret staircase.

As I shut the door to the staircase behind me, I realized too late that I had no way to camouflage it with the sheet on the other side. It was very likely they'd search my room, thinking I'd return there. Maybe they were under the impression it was my safe haven, or that I'd rush to collect mementos before escaping. They really didn't know me very well.

I sighed and swore. The sheet was a loss. Still, I hoped they wouldn't figure out the trick way of opening the door. That might buy me a bit more time. But I couldn't stay in the stairwell indefinitely. And I didn't feel safe at the top of the steps; if Catron and Cutter came to the room, they might still be able to hear me breathing through the wall. I went halfway down the stairwell, taking my Book, candle, matches, and shawl with me. I'd only brought the necessities, praying they would be enough.

The unrelenting noise of the alarm had blessedly stopped. I sat, shawl on my shoulders, candle in my hand, and Book in my lap. I turned the pages furiously, trying to find Drawing Down the Moon or anything else that would get me out of this waking nightmare. I was moving my hands so fast it upset the candle, and drops of hot wax splashed my fingers.

Ow! Bloody hell, that really hurts. I stopped flipping pages and put my burned fingers in my mouth, then put my hand to my head.

Maybe I really am mad, I thought. Maybe there's something in me, a darkness, an evil that I can't see. I mean, nonliving things that I make move? Vines that act strangely whenever I'm near? Who wouldn't think I was odd at least, and perhaps mad at most?

Yet, I couldn't help but think those things didn't strictly point to madness. Differentness, yes. But madness, no. And evil, well, not necessarily. Whatever the case, it wasn't something I wanted to die for, or believed I deserved to. I was just so tired. Tired of thinking, tired of fighting. Paralyzed by indecision, I felt more than a little tempted to give up.

What's the point of all this? Do I really stand a chance, all alone out here with two maniacs hot at my heels? I turned back to the Book, accidentally tearing out a page.

"Oh, for pity's sake!" I said under my breath. I couldn't even read a book right. Trying to fit the torn page gently back in place, I noticed the next page had something tucked inside it. I never would've seen it if I hadn't torn out the previous one. The frail paper was brown with age, even older than the rest of the Book. I had to move it delicately back and forth to get it out, almost as if it were hiding there. There was one word at the top of the page, then a column of text below it. The word was . . .

“ ‘Stay,’ ” I read aloud, then pored over the rest silently.

Stay.

Stay.

Please don't take your light away.
Though day may break you and sun may burn thought, word, and soul, mock the yearning and push towards night with peace-seeming dreams . . .

Stay.

Stay although the stars may shine deceitful beckons to cut short your time, and you long to rest
among your kind . . .

Stay.

Stay to free

the ones who'd mourn the light of you
and souls not born.
They have in mind
a different name for you to keep . . .

The world does change.
Do not yet sleep.

Stay.

Stay to show

the stars and moon
this name you bear, set in tune
to your orbit-world:
the Universal,
Irreplaceable you.

Stay.

Stay for all

that's yet unknown;
solutions found and problems grown too small to ponder as you reach such heights, galaxies wonder . . .
You soar past sight.

Stay.

Stay.

Shine your light . . .

And break the day.

What on earth could it mean? I wondered. But I didn't have time to find out because the wolves were at the door.

"Aha!" I heard Catron's cry far above me, and the sound of stone moving. "I've got it! Look, fresh footprints in the dust, Cutter. She must be here, the sneaky hellion. Follow me."

"Down there, sir?" Cutter actually sounded nervous. "But it's dark, it is."

"Then light another candle, you whining simpleton. She's getting away!"

I jumped up, nearly knocking my own candle out of my hand. They'd discovered my location—and how to open the door. Blast. I'd hoped it would take them a little longer.

Jamming the Book under my arm, I picked up my skirts and hurried down the stairs. I could hear Cutter's heavy footsteps behind me. They were quickly followed by Catron's, which were lighter, but no less terrifying. I rushed out into the garden and looked around. I needed something to block the door. But there was nothing large enough.

I put the Book and candle on the ground, then grabbed a nearby vine. Looping it through the iron ring on the door, I tied the other end to a small, dead tree nearby. I pulled and pulled at the vine, but no matter how hard I tried, it didn't tear off the ring or the tree. It was that strong. I hoped it would work.

Suddenly, the door heaved forward, just an inch. Someone was pushing on it from the other side. I jumped back, my eyes glued to it.

"What's this?" I heard Cutter cry, her voice muffled behind the stone.

"What's the matter?" barked Catron. "Just open the damn door!"

"I can't, sir." The door moved forward again and again, but each time was caught by the vine going across it to the tree. "It's stuck some'ow, it is."

"Move aside, you stupid cow. Let me try." The door pushed out into the garden, maybe two inches this time. But my rope of vines made sure it went no farther.

"Bloody flaming hell!" Catron shouted. "Turn around. We'll have to go back up. I said move!"

I exhaled loudly. “Seems like you were good for something after all,” I said to the vines. They twisted and turned for me, almost as if they were showing off. Their undersides looked even greener than I remembered. I heard Catron and Cutter rushing back up the steps, no doubt to find another route to the garden.

I wonder if they searched the garden while I was sleeping today, hoping to find the creature or the goddess. So much had happened since then, it felt like a hundred years had passed. Just like that story where a princess goes to sleep for the same length of time, and a web of vines grows all around her.

But this was no fairy tale, and I was no princess. I picked up the Book and candle and made my way towards the center of the garden. What if they dredged the pond in their search attempts? How can my spell keep Dym safe then?

I was in luck, if one could call it luck. When I got to the pond, Dym was nowhere to be found. I didn’t know whether to be frightened or relieved. Part of me wanted him to be there, on the off chance he’d do something incredibly chivalrous, like save me. Another part was grateful I couldn’t find him. I dreaded the thought of seeing his body—floating on the pond’s surface—because the spell took effect while he was swimming, and drowned him.

Maybe he decided not to swim to Silver Hill tonight. But he seemed so genuine when he said he wouldn’t leave. And if he didn’t leave, then he’s here sleeping somewhere. My spell worked. At the very least, my Endymion is safe.

It worked, I thought again. At least one spell in the Book worked. Maybe a second one will, too. And as Catron said himself, protection spells don’t guard against everything.

I had a decision to make. To my left were the moors. Endless expanses of wild terrain, where my chances of survival were uncertain to minimal. On my right was the lunatic asylum of Silver Hill. If I could get back in, I might be able to perform Drawing Down the Moon on Catron and Cutter. I could prevent them from hunting me down. And perhaps, most importantly, I could stop them once and for all from harming and killing more innocent girls.

If you don’t do it, Seluna, I thought, then who on earth will?

It might have been utterly suicidal and insane, but I chose the path to my right.

Chapter 15

I broke through one of the garden windows into the old ballroom. It was the only window Catron hadn't bothered to place bars over, probably because it was completely covered with vines. I stood in the moonlight and made sweeping motions with my hands in front of the glass.

Miraculously, the vines parted. I thrust my elbow inside the lowest pane, breaking both the glass and my skin when my sleeve tore. Still, it allowed me to slip one hand inside and unlock the window, which I lifted open with great effort. I'd never been in this section of Silver Hill before, but I knew if I could find my way to the main entrance, I could get anywhere in the asylum.

I can't believe how crazy all this is, I thought as I exited the ballroom. On my right, I recognized the hall leading to the cafeteria, and followed it. Before, I was running away from Catron and Cutter, and now, I'm hoping to run into them. But if that's the only way to end this, then so be it.

From the cafeteria, I found the schoolroom, and from there, the hallway to the main entrance. All the gas lamps had been put out. I blew out my candle as well and left it on the floor; I couldn't risk alerting any enemies to my presence. Thank gods for moonlight and my nighttime senses, I thought. Otherwise, I'd never be able to find my way around here.

Finally, I got to the front of Silver Hill. The first thing I saw was the stained glass window depicting the goddess. The moonlight was shining directly through it, making it glow brighter than usual. Then again, I'd never seen it so late at night. Perhaps it always looked that way at this hour. I hadn't thought about it when I'd been here earlier this evening; the sight of the girls' corpses prevented me from focusing on anything else.

The glass chandelier in the center had only a few lit candles on it, which made it a bit easier to see. Unfortunately, it would also make it easier for Catron and Cutter to see me. The stench of formaldehyde was not so strong now. I tried hard not to look at the dead bodies as I made my way into the cavernous hall.

I assessed things from a military perspective. I'd get to the second-floor balcony; it had the best vantage point. If Catron and Cutter came in on the ground floor, I'd have a better view of them. I picked up my skirts and hurried up the enormous, crumbling staircase. If I could just get underneath the stained glass window, it would be the perfect place to perform Drawing Down the—

“She ain't in the garden no more, sir!” With supreme dread, I heard a familiar voice. “She's 'ere!”

Cutter cried, running into the main hall. No longer did she have on her nurse's cap, gloves, or mask. There was nothing to hide her evil grin, her eyes full of dark delight. One hand held a candle, while the index finger of the other pointed at me on the upper level. "We've got 'er now, Doctor!"

Catron wasn't far behind. His lab coat was gone, and he was struggling with a long, heavy object partially blocked by his body.

What's that under his arm? Wait—is that a rifle?

"Don't just stand there, Cutter!" Catron was trying to load the rifle with as many bullets as it could hold. "Get her!"

Cutter held up her candle and looked at the numerous steps between her and me. "Ah, right then, sir." She began huffing and puffing her way up the balcony, careful to avoid any stairs that were broken or missing. I had to admit, for a large woman, she could certainly move fast.

What am I going to do? I supposed I could run around and around the balcony, praying Cutter would pass out before she reached me. But there was still Catron with the rifle. He would probably use it before I outran her. I couldn't deal with both of them at the same time. I had to find a way to get rid of Cutter first. She was almost at the top of the stairs, just a few yards away.

"Aha!" she cackled as she finished the climb and ran towards me. Beads of perspiration were forming on her forehead, but the hag still had plenty of fight left in her. "Now, Dr. Catron and me is going to make you wish you was never born. C'mere, girlie!"

"Not a chance in hell!" I retorted. Whipping off my shawl, I threw it over Cutter, making sure part of it landed on the candle she held. It set both the shawl and Cutter on fire, as I had hoped it would. At this point, I really didn't care if she burned to death.

Apparently, Cutter didn't feel the same way. She let out earsplitting screams as she frantically tried to wrestle the flaming shawl off. I ran a few yards and ducked behind a long table with a trio of marble busts on it.

"What the devil's going on up there?" Catron was still trying to load the gun. "Curse this old thing; it always jams. Cutter!" He gasped to see the nurse on fire one story above him.

Unfortunately for me, Cutter didn't remain on fire for long. She managed to fling the shawl off and stamp the flames into submission. Half her hair and the shoulders of her uniform were gone. Her face was a mess of red and black flakes. She looked like the angry surface of an active volcano. Although her candle had been snuffed out, she still had the chandelier in the center of the room by which to see. And she used it to focus all her rage on me.

"You miserable, 'orrid little witch!" she howled. "You're going to pay for this!"

Heart pounding, I looked to the left and right. I needed something to use as a weapon. I tried picking up one of the busts, but it was too heavy. I felt like choking the neck of the person it resembled. Cutter was running towards me, light falling on her body again and again from the chandelier reflected off the mirrors.

I gasped. The chandelier! The mirrors! Maybe I didn't have the physical strength to move the busts, but perhaps my animating powers would. I hoped man-made light would work as well as that from the moon. I concentrated hard on one mirror on the ground level, directly across from Cutter. I imagined I saw a beam of gray-blue light shining from the chandelier to the mirror to one of the busts. The stone face opened its sightless eyes and moved its unspeaking mouth from side to side, as if it were waking up. Just as Cutter was about to reach me, the bust flew up and hit her in the chin—hard.

Cutter fell backwards with a heavy grunt. I looked over my shoulder at Catron. I didn't know if he'd seen what happened. But he had managed to load the rifle and aim it at me.

Catron let out an angry yell. "The damn column is blocking her!" He moved from place to place on the floor, trying to find a position from which to fire.

"Cutter, I can't get a clear shot! Bugger all, flush her out!"

Cutter put her hand to her jaw and groaned, but struggled to her feet. Blood trickled out the side of her mouth. My guess was the blow from the bust had knocked out a tooth or two.

For the love of all saints, I thought, can nothing keep this foul woman down? I'd have to try again. I focused on the mirror once more and managed to fling the second bust at Cutter, this time nailing her in the middle of her face. The force of the blow made her cry out again and double over onto the railing, where she stood clutching it and moaning. A quick look over my shoulder revealed that Catron had a better view of me now. He'd definitely seen Cutter get hit with the second bust. I pressed myself against the back of the column. I didn't know what I'd do if he fired the gun at it.

I expected Catron to at least take a shot at me, but instead, something very surprising happened. I heard him give what sounded like a cry of victory.

"It's you!" he shrieked. "You, who turns light into motion!" His voice was hysterical, like a madman's. "We went through all those girls trying to find the truth, but in the end, I knew it was you!"

Light into motion? He must have been referring to my reflecting light to move the bust. But I had no idea what he meant by the rest.

"I searched for decades for your brother and sister without success. But then, I realized it didn't matter. You, with your power of light in darkness, were the strongest. I knew you'd stop at nothing to complete your mission. All I had to do was get to you, and my future would be assured."

The air around me seemed to turn wavy, but I didn't dare put my hands to the sides of the column for balance. It was all starting to come together, like long-mislaid puzzle pieces. The nighttime abilities. Reanimating things with the help of light. The way I automatically point like that woman in the Book. I couldn't believe it. It sounded impossible, and yet, it had to be true. The answer was staring me in the face all along.

"The goddess is . . . me?" It was almost a whisper, but the echo easily traveled down to Catron.

"Don't pretend you don't know! Feigning ignorance won't save you now. I can see you are still too young to know how to use your powers. Better for me that way, however." He laughed again, and I heard the chit-chit of the gun.

My head was spinning. I am a goddess. I have a mission. Catron also seemed to have a mission, part of which involved killing me. Is destroying Catron my mission? Why must I have a mission at all? Haven't I been through enough? You'd think being a goddess meant things would get easier.

I turned my head ever so slightly so I could talk to Catron, but not enough for him to see me. "If I have a mission," I called out, "then what is it? What's this 'future' of yours? What the devil are you talking about?"

"Don't act as if you don't remember!" he sneered. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw him snaking around the column, trying to get the best possible shot. "I was sure you'd be one of the most troublesome girls in the realm, too. I knew if I set up a clinic especially for those girls, you'd find your way here eventually."

A wave of cold horror passed over me. All the atrocities at Silver Hill were committed because of me? Because one man was trying to find me? The thought was too hideous to comprehend.

Regardless, I didn't have much time to contemplate it. Cutter had gotten back on her feet and was looking at me with murder in her eyes. Blood from her nose was pouring down her face and onto what was left of her burned uniform.

Oh, come on, I thought desperately. Can't anything kill this bitch? My gaze fell on a landscape painting on the wall. I still had one more bust left. I had to make sure Cutter stayed down this time.

"There's no use tryin' to run, Seluna," Cutter snarled. Her voice sounded raspy, almost animal-like. "We're a force from which you cannot escape. Our darkness will swallow you 'ole. Your life—and the life of everyone you care for—belong to us. You'll see. We may as well be the monsters that 'aunt your dreams."

I never heard Cutter speak like this. I had no idea where it was coming from. Still, there was only a moment's hesitation before I said:

"Trust me, Cutter, if I ever have dreams about you, they'll end with my kicking your ass!"

This time, I didn't need more than a cursory glance at the mirror. I tore the painting off the wall with my mind and threw it over Cutter. As she cursed and struggled to get her arms out from the canvas, the last bust flew up and knocked her squarely in the forehead.

I half-hoped the blow would kill her before she went over the railing. But in the end, it hardly mattered. Cutter let out an unholy scream as she fell backwards, breaking the balustrade. Her legs flailed wildly, and her body hit the floor with a final, heavy thud. I dashed to the next column before Catron had a chance to react. From there, I could see Cutter still encased in the painting. Her eyes were wide-open; more blood spilled out of her mouth. Her torso was bent at an impossible angle from the lower half of her body.

Nurse Cutter was dead. But there wasn't a moment to celebrate, or even feel relieved.

"Cutter, you miserable sow!" Catron howled, standing over the body. "I suppose I'll have to finish this myself. That's what I get for hiring subpar help."

Well, that was a quick grieving process, I thought. But it was no concern of mine whether Catron cared about Cutter or not. The only thing that mattered was that he was still out for my blood. There was the earsplitting noise of a gunshot, then the sound of shattering glass.

I cringed so hard my shoulders jerked. I covered my ears and thought about crouching down to make myself a smaller target. However, that also might make it harder to run if Catron shot at me again. But as I peeked past the column, I saw that Catron hadn't shot at me at all. Instead, he'd destroyed the mirror that helped me animate.

Oh, no. He'd realized that was what I'd been using. He was going to destroy every reflective surface. If that happened, I was doomed.

As fast as I could, I tried to focus on the next mirror and think of something else to animate. But Catron was faster. I almost cried out as the second shot fired, the huge sheet of glass bursting apart. Next came the third mirror, and the one after that. They disintegrated on contact, or crashed to the floor, the sickening sound echoing throughout the hall. I tried to get ahead of Catron by several mirrors, but it was no use. As soon as I got enough focus, he simply fired again without even slowing down. I could see Catron's reflection in the mirrors' remnants, ten thousand slivers of homicidal maniac.

Finally, every mirror was gone. I could hear the tinkling of glass as the final shards fell. Darting from column to column, I didn't stop until I was behind one at the top of the stairs. I was forced to leave the Book behind; I couldn't run fast enough with it in my hands. Perspiration trickled down the sides of my face as I heard Catron reloading the rifle.

He was actually chuckling. Even though I heard the gun jam a few times, he must have managed to get the next round of bullets in, because I heard the same chit-chit noise as before. From the sound of his voice, I estimated he was standing three-quarters of the way across the room, a few yards behind the chandelier.

"What do you think you're doing, Se-lu-na?" Again, he said my name in that obnoxious way that made me want to clobber him. "Even if you manage to kill me—which is looking unlikely—you'll never stop the others. They're coming for you."

Others? I thought. What others? Maybe Catron's bluffing. But it didn't sound like he was bluffing.

I took the quickest of peeks around the column, to see if there was another object in the hall I could use against Catron. Maybe I could get my hands on a piece of broken glass and—

BAM! A shot rang out, and I heard a bullet whiz past my head to lodge in the wall in front of me, right beneath the stained glass window. Gods, that was close! How was I supposed to kill Catron when I couldn't even turn to look at him?

Just then, a sheet of plaster fell from the ceiling next to the chandelier. I supposed it was the vibration from all the gunfire that did it. It didn't take much for this place to go to pieces. The chandelier made clinking sounds as the plaster hit the glass.

Wait—that's it! The chandelier was made of glass, which reflected. All I had to do was use moonlight from the window on it. With any luck, I could make the whole thing fall directly on top of Catron.

I inched my way forward, towards the wall. BAM BAM BAM! Catron fired three more quick shots. I heard the crunch of glass underneath his feet as he circled for a better vantage point. I hated to make myself a moving target, but I had to turn around in order to focus on the chandelier. Every time I saw Catron getting a good view of me, I moved to the other side of the column to block him. Probably, the only reason he didn't shoot the column was that it would make the building collapse.

Finally, I could see the chandelier clearly in the moonlight. Catron was nearly underneath it now. Narrowing my eyes, I tried to focus on making it sway so that when it fell, it would hit him.

But when it came to bringing down the chandelier, Catron beat me to it. He looked at me, looked above him, then shot the chain holding the chandelier to the ceiling.

The noise from the crash was deafening, even more so than the shattering mirrors had been. It rang in my ears for several long moments, and every candle on the chandelier was instantly snuffed out. A piece of the glass flew up and sliced open my palm. The pain was so unexpected, I cried out.

Dammit! Why did Catron have to be such a good shot? That didn't bode well for me. And the only light now came from the moon shining through the stained glass window.

"You stupid girl," I heard him jeer. "A valiant effort, I'll give you that. But try to kill me now, when you can't even see me."

You're the stupid one, I thought. Catron might have known about some of my powers, but not all of them. For example, he had no idea how well I could see him. How was he going to defeat me, since he could barely see now? Clearly, Catron was not a man who thought things through.

Then I raised my head. Damn it all! I was just beneath the window. The moonlight was shining right on me. Catron had a perfect view.

I tried to think rationally, but my heart was already skipping beats. Can I really be killed by a rifle blast? It was true I had magical abilities, and that in spirit, I was a goddess. But this body was mortal. It could succumb to hunger, fatigue, and pain, as I'd seen during my stay at Silver Hill. I'd just had my hand sliced open by a relatively small piece of glass. I had no doubt that a bullet could kill me.

That meant I had to draw down the moon now.

I never got the chance to review the spell like I wanted. The Book was at least thirty yards away, and it wasn't as if Catron was going to let me have a quick read. I'd have to remember it as best I could. It had only been a few weeks since Rose, Laura, and I talked about the spell in the cafeteria, anyway. Was it really such a short time ago? That meant that this moon was the full moon, the most potent. If there was ever a moon for defeating enemies, surely this was the one.

Chakras, chakras . . . the spell said something about opening chakras. I vaguely remembered that chakras were power centers scattered throughout the body. I prayed mine were already open. I didn't have a wand, but maybe if I was a goddess, it wouldn't be necessary.

But I still needed a circle. Oh, hell. A circle of what? I didn't know if it was supposed to be something specific, like the chalk or ash so often used in witch spells. Regardless, my options were limited. I couldn't even get down to where Catron was to make a circle. Unless . . . my eyes fell on the bodies of the dead girls.

I can't make a circle unless I have some help.

"Okay, ladies," I whispered. "I'm sorry to do this, but I really, really need you right now." I could see Catron on the ground floor. He was squinting and repositioning the gun, no doubt trying to use the moonlight to see well enough to shoot. But I was the one who used the moonlight first.

I came out from behind the column, praying I had enough time before Catron pulled the trigger. I held both hands above my head, and the same gray-blue light pulsed down, this time from the window. I lowered my hands and spread my fingers out towards the girls.

One by one, they rose to their feet and surrounded Catron, eyes open but unseeing. The moonlight only served to highlight the dull, ashen color of their skin. They moved around and around him, holding hands in a macabre dance. It was grotesque, but it had the desired effect. Catron's jaw dropped as he saw the corpses of his victims closing in on him.

"You . . . you can't be. It's impossible . . ." His voice trailed off. His complexion was whiter than the moon itself as he looked from girl to girl, frantically trying to get away. But they were too close together for him to get out of the circle. He jerked the rifle back, pointing it at one, then another as the circle drew tighter. Catron quickly realized he couldn't kill his intended victims.

"You're dead. You're all dead!" Repulsed and terrified, he was unable to shove them aside even with his weapon. He looked up and pointed the rifle at me again, this time with shaking hands. "You mad demoness! I'll see you finished yet!"

Gods, I had no idea how hard this would be. Until now, the largest thing I'd reanimated was a dead rat. I'd never done a human before, and certainly not so many at once. My arms ached, and perspiration was pouring down the sides of my head now. There was nothing to reflect the moonlight off of. I didn't have the mirrors. I didn't have the chandelier. The only conduit for the energy this time was me.

Maybe I don't need a reflective surface, I thought. Maybe, if I focus hard enough, I can kill Catron myself. I just need to harness my powers, to concentrate. But there was still the incantation. And I had no idea what it was.

Then, the strangest feeling came over me. I felt the words rise up from my heart into my throat and out my mouth. But as I was saying them, I knew they were more than ordinary speech. I was remembering. My voice didn't sound like my own. It was deeper, stronger, reverberating throughout the hall:

"I am called by many names.

I am called on many times.

But thrice be damned be he, the man,
who seeks to take what's mine.

My light shines on those in need and keeps them safe from harm.
But if you are one to cause such pain,
evil spirit, then, begone!"

Catron seemed to realize something important was happening. The girls continued moving around him, faster and faster. He took several panicked shots at me, and at the stained glass window. But each one missed, as I somehow knew it would. Chunks of stone spewed out of the walls behind me where the bullets struck them. I felt as if I were floating, as if a misty, invisible barrier were between me and everything happening in the room.

"I'll see you dead somehow, you ruinous harpy!" he cried in great, heaving gasps, eyes wild. With his once pristine suit and flawless hair disheveled, he truly did look like a madman. "When I get through with you, you'll sleep for a thousand years!"

Sleep. It made me want to laugh. What did Catron know of such things? I wonder, when we sleep, do we enter a world as bizarre and unreal as a fairy tale? Or do we dream of home at night? The veil between the daylight world and the one we dream of, the one we know exists, is so thin we could reach out and brush it aside. One motion, one little swipe of the curtain, and our dreams are made real. That is our true home, our true reality.

It was the message I'd been receiving all along as I slept. I had it upside down, backwards, twisted. Like sunlight that reflects off the moon or a mirror. My dreams weren't a confused, nonsensical jumble. They weren't showing me what was wrong. They were showing me who I was. And I'd be damned if I let Catron take that away from me.

My arm no longer ached, but felt weightless. The front hall of Silver Hill, so intimidating when I had first arrived, now made me feel powerful. The moon shone down brighter than I'd ever seen. It created a line of light from me to Catron. I lowered one hand and used the other to point—not to the girls, but straight to my adversary. Of course! Pointing is the way to channel and direct my energy. Why didn't I see it before?

The rifle slid from Catron's hands, but did not go off when it hit the floor. He froze where he stood, wide-eyed, mouth gaping at me. The moonlight was aimed right at him, but still he was not destroyed.

I narrowed my eyes. I wasn't going to let a silly protection spell get in my way. It wasn't going to work, not when I was in my element. I could feel the spell around Catron, an annoying black ball.

The hell with you, I thought. You don't deserve protection. You are heinous and hurtful, upsetting the balance of this world. I focused on the energy coming out of my hand, pushing, pushing, till it popped through the protection bubble and burst it.

Now, the moonlight flowed through me more easily than ever, radiating a sense of peace and stillness. Still pointing at Catron DeKay, I saw a beam literally shoot from my fingertips into center of his chest. Then light exploded all around him, and I shielded my eyes with my free hand. Somewhere in the far distance, Catron was screaming. But I was unafraid and unharmed. I knew this light, this radiance, was mine and mine alone.

I am the power, the moon, the goddess herself.

I lost all sense of time, so I couldn't really tell when the spell subsided. It could have been hours, or it could have been only minutes. The beam of moonlight faded away, and I lowered my arm to get a better look at the scene before me.

Catron was definitely dead. There was an enormous, charred hole in the middle of the floor where he'd been standing. I could see the outline of his shadow on the stone. Some people might think moonlight was insubstantial. But I gave a little smile as I looked at the remains of my conquered foe.

It certainly isn't insubstantial when I wield it.

That was why Catron hadn't been able to find the source of my power: it was the moon. Unless he planned on pulling it down from the sky, his schemes had been all for naught.

I stopped smiling when I saw what was happening to my dead friends. They were leaving the large circle in which they'd trapped Catron, and were walking in aimless, smaller circles. One by one, they dropped to the floor. The last one I knew instantly: Francine.

"Wait!" I cried out as her knees began to buckle. I didn't know if she could hear or understand me, but I couldn't stop the words from coming. "Don't fall down! Maybe I can help you, bring you back to life permanently." I wracked my brain for a way to do just that. I might not have known Francine well, but at least she'd believed in me. And nothing could have shocked me more than the sound of her reply.

"No, it is over. I am over. All of us are." Her voice had a far-off, monotone quality as she turned to me. Her dead, unseeing eyes stared into the distance. I could see the lobotomy wounds clearly above her brow. They were still open, with small rivers of dried blood running down the sides of her face. She wasn't even stitched up. She must have died during the operation.

"My life here is finished; it's time for me to leave. 'To everything there is a season,' and mine on this earth is done. Now, I am going home." She knelt on the floor and sank to her side.

"Wait—please—don't!" I begged.

"Good-bye, Seluna. And good luck with your mission," Francine said. Then the dead girl closed her eyes, never to open them again. She even put her hands together and placed them under her head, as if settling down for a nap. Try as I might, I could not reanimate her—or any of the other girls—a second time. They had indeed fulfilled their mission, their purpose in life.

It remained to be seen whether I would do the same.

Chapter 16

The next day, there was quite a lot of cleaning up to do.

I swept copious amounts of broken glass and other rubble from the main entrance, glad for the changes in my wardrobe. I'd cut away the front part of my skirt and donned a pair of tight black trousers that were in a box marked "Confiscated." I suppose Catron couldn't have girls do anything as rebellious as wear trousers. But it was so much easier to move around this way. And there was a lot of work ahead that would be ill-performed in a skirt. For one thing, I'd moved Geraldine, Thomasina, Francine, and all the rest into a corner and covered them with a tarp for now.

Although exhausted from the previous night's events (and of course, tired in general during the day), defeating Catron had given me renewed vigor. Still, nothing could have prepared me for the sight that had greeted me earlier that morning.

I'd gone out to the garden, Queen Sophia's Book in my hand. I didn't really know why I'd brought the Book; it just felt good to have it with me. The sky was so blue it almost hurt my eyes to look at it. Huge white clouds passed lazily overhead, and the air was balmy, inviting. The pavement stones that were previously a dull shade of gray were almost silver.

And the garden I stepped into was not the one I remembered. It was alive! The trees were proper shades of brown and green, no longer doubled over, but standing proudly at their full height. A few birds were even singing in them, building nests. The vines were no longer black, hateful things. When I brushed against them, they weren't hard and sharp anymore, but soft and smooth. They moved back and forth in the breeze, and I know it sounds silly, but it almost felt like they were waving to me.

And even though it was now early spring, the garden was in fuller bloom than the land around it. I had no idea how that could be. Also, the pond wasn't frozen. I supposed the warmer weather had something to do with that, though I didn't know of any ponds whose ice melted overnight. And the water was a stunning shade: so bright it was almost turquoise. When I spotted Dym in there, my heart soared. I could almost feel it, rising in my chest. He looked even better in daylight than moonlight.

"You're awake!" I cried as I ran to the edge of the pond. I wanted to be angry with him for failing to help me. But that desire was no match for my overwhelming relief.

Dym smiled and yawned, rubbing his eyelids. "Hey," he said drowsily, "I like the new look." He nodded at my half-skirt, half-trouser ensemble.

“This? Oh, thank you,” I replied. “It’s just a little something I threw together.”

Dym chuckled, waking up more fully now. “Or tore apart, by the looks of it. But it’s nice. I don’t think I’ve seen a girl wear anything like it before. And of course I’m awake,” he said. “Rather hard to swim in one’s sleep, don’t you think? Though I did dream I held the moon in my arms. It was almost a pity to open my eyes.”

“But how are you . . . I mean, because I . . .”

Dym raised his eyebrows. “Because you what?”

I sighed. “C’mon, Dym. You must know it was me who made you sleep. After all, it was your idea in the first place.”

“It wasn’t my idea to make me go to sleep. It was supposed to be Catron. And I did wake up with an appalling crick in my neck.” He rubbed his back, just above his shoulders. Then he stretched out his long, lithe arms, twisting them over and over. I couldn’t help but stare. Sometimes I wonder if he’s just showing off.

“I know, but what could I do? You wouldn’t leave! I only wanted to keep you safe. It turns out the spell didn’t work because Catron already had one on him—for protection.”

“He did?” Dym’s jaw fell, and he stopped stretching. “I’m sorry, Seluna. I never would’ve guessed that—or suggested a spell I thought wouldn’t work.”

“It’s all right. I know you wouldn’t. Anyway, you’re probably wondering what happened in there.” I jutted my chin towards Silver Hill. “Why I’m still here. The truth is, Catron tried to kill me. And I don’t mean with his sadistic experiments. I mean really tried to kill me. With a rifle.” I went over last night’s events, including using the spell for Drawing Down the Moon. I left out the goddess part.

“I can’t believe you were so brave,” Dym said when I was finished. “I mean, I can, but I don’t know if I’d have made the same choice you did. Going back in the asylum and all.”

“It wasn’t really a choice. I had to do it.”

“You could have been killed. I apologize again for the sleep spell’s ineffectiveness,” Dym said solemnly. He used his forearms to lift himself partway out of the water. It was almost as though he wanted to take my hand, or wrap his arms around me. “And I am truly sorry about your friends, especially Laura and Rose.”

I swallowed a lump that suddenly appeared in my throat. “That’s all right. I only wish they could have had the future they deserved.”

“At least now, they are vindicated,” Dym said. “And Drawing Down the Moon worked. Guess the protection spell was no match for it.”

“Er, right!” I didn’t know if I should say it was my goddess power that removed the protection. Instead, I motioned to the trees and vines around us. “And can you believe the garden is in full bloom again?”

drawing down the moon calls upon a great deal of cosmic energy. The excess generally goes to the closest place it's needed."

"The garden," I realized.

Dym nodded. "You probably noticed a smaller example when the garden started coming back to life, little by little, when you were here."

"You saw that, too?" I guess it wasn't my imagination. But why does Dym think I carry moon power with me?

"You affect life all around you, Seluna." Dym grinned his smirky grin. "It's a bit hard not to notice."

I tried not to blush. It's just as hard to remember I'm supposed to be angry with you.

"Not to mention the fact that reflective surfaces act as conduits to channel the moon's energies. It's part of why reflections made it easier for you to reanimate things."

"Wait a minute," I said. "How do you know all this? About the moon and the energy and the conduits? And I never mentioned anything about reflective surfaces making reanimation easier."

"I told you, Seluna, I'm a student of the moon." He smiled again and made circles in the water in front of him. "I look at her, study her. Try to predict her every move."

"Okay, then why did the moon save the garden, but not those poor girls?" I sank down by the pond and dropped the Book by my side. Suddenly, I was saddened by the realization that the other patients could have lived, but didn't.

Dym stopped smiling and took my hands. The gesture surprised me so much I almost cried out. His hands were wet, of course, and I expected them to be cold. But though they left damp spots on my trousers, Dym's hands were as warm and caring as any I'd ever held.

"The moon can only work with what it's given, Seluna," he said softly. "The garden was alive all along, underneath. But the girls' life energy was all but gone." He stroked the backs of my hands with his thumbs.

I took several deep breaths and willed myself not to cry. I'd never had trouble controlling myself before, except the last time I saw Dym. What was it about him that made my emotions crash on top of me all at once?

"If you don't mind my saying so, I think you should bury them in the garden. I can help, if you like."

I almost regretted having to pull my hands away from Dym's to stop the tears from coming. For a moment, I put them over my eyes, which stayed dry.

"They'll be part of the earth again, and will help the garden grow," Dym added.

"I don't suppose their families will come looking for them," I said at last.

"Sadly, I didn't suppose that either."

"But the garden will keep growing, won't it?" I lifted my head to look at the trees and vines above. "I don't think I can bear the thought of all this flowering beauty turning back into death."

“It will if you take care of it from now on.” Dym rested his elbows on the ground. “It only died because Catron let it. Most of us need constant light and attention to live, from one source or another. When we are unloved, neglected . . . when our potential and possibilities wither, evil things take root.”

“I’ll certainly do everything to prevent that from happening here,” I said. A green leaf—green!—fell from the tree overhead, and I turned it over and over in my hands. “But what I don’t understand is why Catron’s psychic said an evil event would occur at all. You’d think ridding the world of people like him and Cutter would be considered a good thing.”

“Because it was Catron’s fortune being told, the psychic saw those deaths as evil and inauspicious for him,” Dym explained. “The outcome of the fortune all depends upon your perspective.”

“Speaking of fortune-tellers,” I looked darkly at him, “why didn’t you tell me these things were going to happen? The girls getting hurt. Me getting hurt. So many innocent people dying.”

“Seluna, if I was shown something I thought could keep you—or anyone—from harm, you know I’d tell you in a heartbeat. But it’s like I said when we first met: psychic abilities can be unpredictable. If a feeling or vision comes, it’s like an unexpected gift.”

“Next time you get a gift like that, do me a favor?” I sighed. “Keep the receipt.”

“Rather difficult, with no pockets in my swimming costume.”

I managed a smile. “Then get a box specifically for receipts at home.”

I thought Dym would smile back. Instead, he looked at me for a long moment.

“Actually, Seluna, the sea is my home.”

I frowned. “What do you mean, ‘the sea is your home?’ No one lives in the sea . . . unless that person is a fish.”

Dym looked at me for several more long moments, a reluctant expression on his face. “Seluna, I have something to tell you.” He pushed himself back from the ground and into the water, then stopped. “Actually, it may just be easier to show you.” He swam towards the center of the pond. “Ah, you may want to stand back a little.”

I had no idea what Dym was about to do, but I got up and moved several feet away from the pond.

Dym took a deep breath. “Okay, here goes.” He sank underneath the surface of the water.

When he didn’t resurface right away, I began to get nervous. “Dym?” I called. Then louder. “Dym?”

Suddenly, Dym came bursting out of the pond, leaping straight up. He made a wide arc with his body before slicing back into the water. Over and over, he flew above the waves, each time landing back with an enormous splash, only to explode out again. Incredible, I thought. I didn’t realize he was such a strong swimmer. But his swimming abilities weren’t the most startling thing. No, that honor was reserved for the lower half of Dym’s body.

It was an enormous fin covered in scales.

I gasped. The blue-green fin was long and agile, tapering into two points at the end. It sparkled brilliantly in the sun. Beautiful. Just like every other part of Dym. I was still gasping for breath when he swam to the shore.

“Dym, you’re . . . you’re a mermaid?”

“Merman,” Dym corrected, somewhat sharply. He shook the excess water out of his hair while I returned to where I’d been standing. “I still have all my important parts underneath these fins, you know.” He rolled his eyes. “Just call us ‘mers’ for short. That’s what we do.” Then his face softened. “I see you’re fairly shocked about my heritage.”

I shrugged and quickly regained my composure. “Maybe a little. But my sister claims to have married a cricket. Stranger things have happened.” I narrowed my eyes at him. “So, when I first met you . . . that bit about you being a shepherd?”

Dym didn’t even blink. “Oh, that? I lied.”

“Wait, that means you were the creature Catron was looking for,” I realized.

Dym made a face. “ ‘Creature’ is rather a harsh word, don’t you think?” He smoothed back his hair and extended his long neck to look up at me. “Still, I’m guilty as charged.”

“But that also means if Catron had found you, he would have found . . .” My voice trailed off. Dym was looking at me, full of awe, the same way he had when we first met.

“You knew,” I said simply. “You knew what I was—who I was—the entire time.”

Dym’s eyes were shining, and he smiled as though he’d never stop. “Not at the beginning,” he said. “Though I strongly suspected, as I’m certain Catron did. I heard whispers on the wind that Selene—also called Luna—had been reborn somewhere in this area, and my intuition led me to Silver Hill. I couldn’t tell you outright that I was a mer, or that I thought you might be the goddess of the moon. As I said, I wasn’t certain of the latter. Not to mention that professing the two beliefs combined might make me seem a little, well, crazy.”

“Crazy.” I nodded, glancing back at the asylum. “I agree we’re in the right place for crazy. So, all those times you came here weren’t to swim, relax, or thrill-seeking? It was to see me?”

Dym nodded. “After a while, I surmised who you were.”

“Why didn’t you tell me I was who you thought I was? When you knew who I was, I mean?” I rubbed my head. This conversation is making me dizzy.

“Would you have believed me if I did? What evidence did I have to convince you? Even your own extraordinary abilities weren’t enough to do that.”

I had to admit, Dym had a point. The evidence had been staring me in the face the entire time. I’d just refused to see it.

“And knowing what valuable creatures mers would be to someone like Catron, revealing myself would only have put you in danger. I couldn’t even disguise myself as a mortal at Silver Hill if I wanted to. I have no method of smuggling dry clothes in here, you realize. The only way in for me is through the moat.”

I tried to interject, but Dym wasn't finished. All the words came tumbling out of him. Like my emotions, I supposed he'd been holding them back a long time. He must have wanted to tell me all this ages ago.

"How was I going to explain not only a trespassing boy, but a naked trespassing boy at an insane asylum? If I showed my fins, they'd definitely know I was a mer. We'd both be in a boatload of trouble then. And I couldn't very well bring you to my home to ensure your safety. After all, I live at the bottom of the ocean. I couldn't get a message to Laura's aunt or anyone else, because I'd have to explain how I knew the girls were in trouble, about the asylum, et cetera. Why I was there when I shouldn't have been."

"Wait," I interrupted. "Exactly how would you have been a naked boy? I mean, any more naked than you are now." I looked down at Dym's exposed torso and glistening scales. "You can't walk with fins."

"Mers have legs on land, when our lower halves are dry," he said.

"But I still don't understand why you were so valuable to Catron."

"It is said that the minds of mers instinctively turn towards the moon, and therefore, the moon goddess. I don't know if it's a myth, or if it actually has a basis in science. Let's just say Catron wouldn't be the first to try and fish around in there—no pun intended—for some useful gray matter." He saw the look of alarm on my face. "Not that it's been done to me," he said quickly. "But I've heard of it happening to others of my kind."

"That's awful," I said softly.

"Indeed." Dym rubbed his face. "I don't know what they'd find if they did crack open my skull. Possibly something, possibly nothing. But I selfishly kept coming back because I couldn't stay away from you. I'm so sorry, Seluna. Can you ever forgive me?"

"Forgive you? But there's nothing to forgive! It is I who should be asking your forgiveness. For the way I ended it, the things I said . . ." I gestured helplessly.

Dym shook his head. "I knew there was a possibility of your enchanting me, the way Selene did with Endymion the shepherd. I didn't know if I'd ever reawaken once you made me sleep. Endymion never awoke in the legend, if you recall. But I chose to stay anyway. What else could I do? All mer worship you, Goddess." Again, that look on Dym's face that I had never seen on any other boy's.

"How could I be a goddess and not know it?" I asked.

Dym shrugged. "Many people do not know the power they possess. Especially women."

"But how did you know about the sleep spell? You can't expect me to believe you just chose page one thirty-six by coincidence." I picked up the Book and held it in front of my chest.

"The same way I knew to search for it, and leave it in the secret passage for you to find," he answered.

My jaw dropped, and the Book nearly did as well. "You knew about the secret passage, too? Let me guess: it's all part of that family-intuition thing. And by family, I assume you mean mermaids?"

“Mer!” Dym corrected. “And yes.”

“Where did you find the Book?”

“It was behind a few stones in one of the outer walls. How it got there, I’ll never know.”

“How do you even get to Silver Hill and the garden, Dym?” I turned the Book over in my hands.

“I mean, now that we’re revealing our innermost secrets and everything.”

“Most people don’t know this about the asylum, but its moat connects to an underground river that leads all the way to the ocean. That’s why no one ever sees me walking along the vast miles of moor when I visit.”

“Because you’re essentially swimming underground.” I wonder if Silver Hill’s founders put the river there. “Still, I can’t believe you came all that distance just for me, over and over. It’s an awfully long journey to the sea.”

“Not for an adept swimmer.” Dym rose up and down on his fins. Show-off. I realized all those times it seemed he was standing in the pond, he’d really been moving his tail underwater to keep afloat. He couldn’t kick off like other swimmers because then I’d see his fins. All the strange, mysterious things he’d been doing were starting to make sense.

Slowly, Dym stopped his body from rising and falling. “Seluna, I wanted to ask you, what will you do now that you’ve defeated Catron? I can’t imagine you going back to live with your family.”

I closed my eyes for a moment, then opened them. “I’m not sure. It’s all just been too much. I need some time to think. I thought I’d live at the asylum for a while.”

“Live here?” Dym made a face like he’d tasted Silver Hill food for the first time. “Why would anyone do that?”

“Well, I’d make a few changes, obviously. Besides, there’s a certain mer who visits for midnight swims. One I’ve grown especially fond of.” This time, it was Dym who blushed, and I enjoyed a smug sense of victory.

“And I have a feeling this battle isn’t over,” I continued. “The last time I saw Catron, he said I’d stop at nothing to complete my mission. Then he mentioned something about ‘others coming for me.’”

Dym looked alarmed. “Others? What others?”

“Beats the devil out of me.”

Dym leaned his head closer. “You know, you might have told me this before. I’m only now finding out you might be in peril. Again.”

I pursed my lips. “Well, excuse me if I was distracted by someone revealing himself to be part fish. Besides, I don’t care. Let them come, these ‘others.’ Let them all come. I sorted out Catron. I wager I can sort out anyone else who challenges me. In the meantime, I’m pretty much head of the asylum, and I’ve got some interesting plans for it.”

“I admire your confidence, Seluna, but do be careful. Of course, I will help in any way I can against these new threats, whatever your plans may be.”

My expression softened. “Hopefully, we won’t see them for a while, if at all.” I knelt down to get a closer look at his face. “And thank you, Dym. You are kind beyond words.”

We looked deeply into one another’s eyes. Dym and I were so close, our lips were almost touching. Suddenly, he coughed and juttet his chin towards the Book.

“You know, I flipped through more than a few pages of that compendium before putting it in the staircase. But there was one part I didn’t understand. It shows a boy smiling, looking up at the moon.”

I knew exactly which part Dym was referring to: it was Queen Sophia’s story of the moon goddess and her lover.

“Do you think it could be us?” he whispered. The sunlight filtered through the trees, making beautiful triangular patterns on his face. I could only imagine my face looked similar.

“I think it must be,” I breathed. Maybe that explained the swaying feeling I had when I first met Dym. Is it because I knew him in other lifetimes? Am I the sand to his sea, the moon to his tide? If this is what falling in love feels like—again—it’s enough to make one dizzy. “Perhaps that was the real reason I used the sleep spell to protect you, even though I was furious you wouldn’t help me.” Dym opened his mouth to speak, but I put my hand up. “Now, I understand why you couldn’t, of course. But maybe, subconsciously, I knew we were destined to be each other’s loves. It’s funny, though. You’d think we’d get tired of doing this over and over. Coming back down, having to relearn everything.”

“I don’t know, Seluna,” Dym replied. “A thousand lifetimes with you may not be enough. After all, the moon is the heavenly body of mystery. Endlessly fascinating.” At first, I couldn’t tell if he was teasing me. Then he said the next part so softly, I could barely hear him.

“Why do you think I’ve worshipped you all this time? I think I loved you even before I was sure you were a goddess.” This time, I knew he wasn’t teasing.

“And imagine, I thought you were just a boy in a pond. Dym, I think—no, I’m sure I love you.”

“I have always loved you, Seluna. Always.”

He leaned closer to me, his eyes hesitating. Finally, he pressed his mouth fully against mine and circled my waist with his arms. His whole body was wet, soaking my clothes. But I didn’t care. I threw my own arms around his strong shoulders. Finally. I kissed Endymion. His lips were warmer and sweeter than I ever could have dreamed. Through him, I tasted salt on the water, felt light and shadow on the waves. I kissed and kissed him as a thousand oceans moved back and forth between our souls.

Our lips parted for a moment, and we were breathing hard. We stared into each other’s eyes, almost unable to believe we’d arrived safely at this moment. But Dym kept holding me tight. I stroked the back of his neck. At last, he spoke.

“I finally did it,” Dym murmured. He raised one hand to my face and put his fingertips to my cheek. “I kissed the moon herself.”

Chapter 17

*I*t was late in the afternoon, just before sunset. Thoughts of that morning drifted away as I tried to focus on the tasks at hand. There was still a lot of sweeping to do, not to mention a laundry list of other things. But I could feel my energy begin to rise with the approaching night. I'd already thrown Cutter into the asylum furnace. I considered moving the girls to a separate room until Dym and I could put them to rest properly. It was something I dreaded, but at least the one I loved would be there to help.

Dym. Even the thought of him had me smiling. I was sure his ego would be very satisfied to know that, not that I was going to tell him. We'd made plans to meet again tomorrow at the pond. After that, who knew what would happen? Right now, I had to concentrate on getting Silver Hill back in order. And I had to find a clean pair of trousers for Dym.

I'd just finishing cleaning a large part of the main entrance and was sweeping rubbish down the front steps when my eyes met with the strangest sight. A lone rider on horseback was galloping up to the front door at breakneck speed. The horse's hooves sounded like falling coconuts as they went across the stone bridge over the moat. It didn't look like there was any attempt to slow down. I jumped out of the way, and at the last minute, the rider jerked the horse's reins to one side. The horse let out a loud whinny and swerved into a stop, spraying gravel everywhere.

The rider was a postman.

What on earth is a postman doing at Silver Hill? I thought. Patients weren't allowed to receive letters or packages, not that there were patients here anymore. Perhaps it was something for the recently deceased or absent staff. The postman climbed off his horse and looked around. The front doors were wide-open, so he could easily see the building's disastrous interior.

"What 'appened 'ere?" he asked in disbelief, giving me only a cursory tip of his cap in greeting. I looked around at what could only be described as utter chaos.

"Remodeling," I replied.

He glanced at the falling ceiling, the bullet-riddled and broken walls, shattered mirrors, and of course, the debris-strewn floor.

"Remodelin'? Looks like a bloody meteor came through 'ere!"

"A heavenly body was definitely involved," I said.

The postman's brow furrowed. "What's that, then?"

"Never mind." I nodded to the item in his hand. "It seems you have something for Silver Hill?"

"What? Oh, yes. This." The postman stopped staring at the devastation and handed me a large white envelope with my name on it. "It was only recently the post office got orders to begin deliverin' mail 'ere again. Well, any mail not addressed to 'Dr. Catron and Staff,' that is. Wonder why we got the order all of a sudden."

Dym, I thought. I looked at the address on the front of the envelope. It was written in my mother's hand.

"Say, where is Dr. Catron, anyway?" the postman asked. "'Aven't gotten any mail for 'im in a while."

With a satisfied smile, I glanced behind me at the crater-shaped hole in the middle of the floor.

"He's gone away on a long trip," I said. "He won't be back anytime soon."

"Well, I'll be on me way, then. That is, unless you'll be needin' me 'elp with anythin' in there . . ."

The nosy postman peered over my shoulder, trying to get a better look inside.

"Thank you kindly." I stepped in front of him. "But I'm sure the Hartlandian postal service has much more important things to do than sweep floors." Disappointed, the postman tipped his cap to me again.

"Good day, then, miss," he said. "Good luck with your ah . . . yeah." His voice trailed off, and with one last glance at Silver Hill's rubble, he jumped back on his horse and sped off into the distance. As soon as he left, I threw my broom down and tore open the envelope. Tossing the latter on the ground, I took a deep breath and focused on the tight, elegant script.

"Dearest Seluna,

"If you are reading this letter, then you have realized who you are. Your father and I cannot tell you how happy we are for you. We also understand you met Endymion, who has incarnated as a mer in this lifetime. We know this because the messenger god, Hermes, witnessed these events and reported them to us. But as it is not his role to directly influence earthly affairs, he was prevented from intervening in the dangers you faced.

"By now, you must also realize that we are the incarnations of the Titans Theia and Hyperion."

What? No, I felt like saying, I did not realize that! The shock was so great, I nearly dropped the letter. But I continued reading.

"Your brother, Helios, is the god of the sun, and your sister, Aurora, is the goddess of the dawn. Together, you three form a triumvirate: the Protectors of Light. All of you are reborn again and again to perform a special mission upon the earth: to safeguard light. It's possible Endymion will be able to assist you in this mission during your incarnation. But you may not remember all this just now."

I was suddenly aware that my mouth was hanging open. There really is a Hermes? My parents are Titans, and my siblings deities as well? In addition to discovering I was a goddess and Dym was a mer, I didn't know how many more surprises I could take.

My mission is to “safeguard light”? What in blazes does that mean? Is the sun in danger of burning out? Apparently, that’s my brother’s department, since he’s the god of the sun. This was crazier than anything I’d witnessed at the asylum. It was too unreal for words. Slowly, anger started burning a hole in my chest. How could they do this to me? Throw me into the path of a sadistic madman and his minions? I could literally feel the heat of rage as it rose in my throat. I kept reading.

“You may be angry that we placed you in harm’s way.” You bet your bloody souls I am! “Please believe us when we say that we knew you were strong enough to defeat these monsters. You may not know it now, Seluna, but you are perhaps the strongest of us all.”

The strongest of them all? I don’t understand. I sank down on the steps, clutching the letter. I stared harder at the words, as if doing so would force them to make sense.

“We did not send you to Silver Hill for the reason you believe: that we feared you would end up like Aurora. She’s actually not mad at all; your sister really can talk to animals. No, we sent you to the asylum because it was the only way to show you your strength, and who you really are. Words would not have sufficed, for if someone had told you that you were a goddess, would you have believed them?”

You could at least have tried to tell me! I thought, almost in a silent scream. But I couldn’t help agreeing with my parents a tiny bit. I had always been the skeptical sort. If someone had tried to convince me I was the goddess of the moon, I likely would have laughed at them, no matter how trustworthy or sincere they were. It was the reason Dym didn’t tell me; he said so himself. But there was more to the letter.

“You seem to have this difficulty in every lifetime, not understanding your heritage or your powers. Please believe us when we say we gave a great deal of thought to helping you come to terms with them. We hope you understand, and perhaps can even forgive us. And yes, we always come down to Earth as a family. Oddly enough, Helios and Aurora never seem to have any trouble accepting who they are.”

Nice to know I’m exasperatingly special. At least now, it made sense why Mother and Father had been worried about me. Though I didn’t know that sending me to Silver Hill was the best way to resolve my identity crisis.

“But don’t think just because you now know the truth that things will be easy. Quite the contrary. Your fortitude will be tested in ways you could never have imagined. You may find that, with the knowledge of your divine nature, living as a mortal is more challenging than ever.”

I groaned. Why didn’t they tell me that before I fell in love with a mer? Though I supposed it wouldn’t have changed anything.

“When you are ready, please send for your brother and sister. They will explain more about your mission, and how you three can work together. Your father and I will remain at home for now, so that you, Helios, and Aurora can reacquaint yourselves fully in your new incarnation.

“We are both so proud of you, Seluna. We cannot wait for you to show the world all you were meant to be.

“With everlasting love,

“Your parents, Theia and Hyperion”

I sat on the steps of Silver Hill for a very long time, staring into the sunset. There were so many conflicting thoughts and feelings running through me. Confusion. Anger. Love. More confusion. I couldn't even begin to sort them out. I'd definitely have to give it some time.

There's no need to send for Helios and Aurora immediately. My parents did say “when I was ready.” I'll have to decide when that is. I was curious to find out if Aurora really married a cricket. If so, I could easily invite him as well. Silver Hill was certainly spacious enough to accommodate any number of guests. And of course, I thought with a little smile, you can't beat the garden.

But what about the “others” Catron spoke of? The letter didn't say anything about them. Does my family even know? Maybe they're part of the challenges the letter mentioned. I'd have to ask about it at some point. But despite Dym's concern for my safety, I was intrigued to meet these new villains. I wanted to know who they were, what they wanted with me. And whether or not I could kick their asses like I did Catron's.

It would be interesting to explain this “Protector of Light” thing to Dym. I wasn't even sure I understood it myself. What is his part in it? What is mine? I hoped the future would bring us both some answers.

I heaved a loud sigh and put the letter in my pocket. Then I stood up, retrieved the broom, and headed back into Silver Hill. At least repairing the place would take my mind off things for a while. Plus, I could get ready for these “others,” if and when they decided to show up.

As I moved the broom rhythmically over the stone floor, I thought about what Catron had said. How he would know the goddess because she would be power hungry. But he'd been wrong. I just wanted power over myself and what happened to me. I wasn't different from most girls in that respect.

The broom hit something hard, but it didn't sound like the glass or stone I'd been clearing away. I looked down to find myself staring at the wooden horse Laura's brother had given her. She must have dropped it when the nurse wheeled her out of the asylum for the last time.

I picked up the toy and ran my thumb over it. I knew I wasn't to blame for what took place here. That guilt lay with Catron and his band of evildoers. But I still felt a sense of responsibility to the other patients. What happened to those girls happened because of me. It was my duty to make it up to them, to bring peace to all our spirits. I vowed to make Silver Hill worthy of them, as it always should have been.

Although I hadn't given Dym much detail regarding my plans, I'd decided to make the asylum a safe haven for those who'd been driven out by their families. A place where girls could use their talents, start a business, or refuse to marry. A place they could go even if they just saw things differently than those around them.

I would turn Silver Hill into a refuge, make it truly live up to the name “asylum.” I only hoped my so-called mission wouldn’t interfere. But surely it was possible to accomplish more than one thing in a lifetime. I tucked the wooden horse into my trouser pocket and gave it a few pats.

It was dawn when I finished sweeping and removing the majority of the rubble from the main entrance. I was exhausted; the time when my magic was strongest was at its end. But before I slept, I found a crowbar and began removing the bars from all the windows. I admired the dazzling colors of the sunrise as they shone through the glass.

Never before had the asylum seemed so alive. Never before had I known such light.

EPILOGUE

The vines were enjoying the peaceful weather, hanging lazily along the trees. No longer sinister and threatening, they wound their way freely down to the lake and dipped their toes in the water. No one tried to hinder them, or destroy their curious ways. And like Seluna until she returned to her heavenly realm, the vines were truly part of the garden now, and home. Home at last.

FORBIDDEN THIRTEEN

Friday the 13th is no time to be a telekinetic—at least, not this one.

The number thirteen follows Aria Elle Walker like a bulldog. Lucky or unlucky, it triggers her telekinesis in freaky ways. In an era of banned magic, it could get her jailed...or worse.

One Friday the 13th, Aria's telekinesis goes wild and she accidentally kills a bounty hunter in her home. Before her freakout begins, in walks Ronan Riley, another "thirteen" telekinetic, and his doppelgänger—a dying Forbidden fairy. Hells bells, everyone knows fairies and the Forbidden are extinct!

After claiming she's the gateway "key" to releasing ancient magic into the world, the doppelgängers whisk Aria away from the goons Ronan's father hired to snag her. Dodging bounty hunters and screwy magic, the trio race to fix the damaged Rift before tainted magic kills the doppelgängers...or opens the floodgates to abolished magic. But Aria never expected their desperate alliance to generate a force of a different kind...an uncanny bond and undeniable desire for both doppelgängers.

Destroying Ronan's father, the mastermind behind the mayhem, is just icing on Aria's chaos cake. If her luck cooperates and doesn't kill her first, that is. And will unluck add Ronan to the body count after he betrays Aria?

Chapter 1

*I*t figures my natural bad luck and a blind date on Friday the 13th dumped me in the emergency room. I should've shied away from the creepy combination of cursed luck and locked myself in a closet. Lucky for me, I was okay. Unlucky for my date, Michael, he'd suffered an allergic reaction after eating Mexican cornbread. Talk about bonehead move. I mean, hello, he has a corn allergy. What part of Mexican cornbread had he missed in that little tip? To top that off, the inept artist had left his epinephrine shot at home. Zoe, my soon-to-be ex-best-friend, swore her cousin was available and smart. No wonder he was single. No sense in pleading the fifth on smart. Just another craptastic date on a merry-go-round of losers.

A guilty sigh pushed out of me as I stepped onto the elevator. I punched the fourteen button and the doors whooshed shut. The fact that Michael had ordered dinner number thirteen and the thirteen sombreros hanging from the ceiling had everything to do with him landing in the hospital. My stomach became a tight fist of unease.

Too many thirteens together equaled crapstorm in my life. Cursed at birth, I'd entered the world on Friday, January thirteen, at one thirteen in the afternoon. Or in military terms, thirteen thirteen. The bad luck number affected everything around me. I controlled some of it if I caught it in time, and fate took a spin on the rest.

Had Michael become an unwitting victim in my jinxed life or what? I certainly hadn't known he had a corn allergy until after his face nearly exploded. Honestly, I barely paid attention to what he was ordering while he ogled my chest and babbled on about how he'd love to paint me in the nude for an art class project. As if. Knowing it was Friday the 13th, I should've paid more attention once I'd counted the sombreros due to my insane need to count everything to avoid the number thirteen. Or my not-so-insane need to use my telekinesis to thwart the inevitable bad luck. Or I could've persuaded him to order dish number seven, but he was so freaking obnoxious, he'd left my brain practicing its freedom to terminate the date.

I sucked in my bottom lip. It was just too risky for others to be near me. I mistrusted my ability to control the bad luck side of my telekinesis, and I didn't know where my so-called freaky gift stemmed from. I wasn't sure if I had been born with telekinesis or if it'd developed over time. My abilities hadn't shown up until I'd turned seven years old.

Thank my lucky stars I'd never gotten caught. I mean, seriously, if the government honed in on my abilities, they'd lock me up like Hannibal Lecter, pink mask and all. For the most part, practicing any kind of extra-sensory perception and magic, whether innate or externally created, was illegal. People were scared of ESP abilities and magic, a deeply rooted fear from over three hundred years ago, when Earth was overrun with sorcerers and fairies who'd done the nasty and created a race of powerful fairy-sorcerers. Eventually, the governments eradicated them all and enacted permanent worldwide laws and heavy sanctions on magical use after the Abolishment. Yet, they never defined "extrasensory perception" as magic. That spooked me, so I lived way under the radar.

The elevator stopped on my floor, and I slipped between the doors before they opened all the way. I slid my card key into the security slot and pressed my thumb to the bio-reader. Automatic entry lights flickered on, lighting my way inside the dark condo on top of the Stargazer Casino, San Jose's newest residential-entertainment complex. The top floor of the residential tower was really the thirteenth floor, but marked fourteen. Like people can't count.

I kicked my pink pumps off and dumped my jacket on the antique chair in the foyer. My purse clunked on the marble console, the strap leaving tracks in a film of dust. I jiggled the potpourri bowl until a wimpy bouquet of cloves and cinnamon drifted to my nose. Housework hadn't risen to the top of my To-Do list yet.

"Here, kitty, kitty, kitty." I yanked my phone from my front pants pocket and hopped the two steps down to the living room. The floor-to-ceiling windows overlooked the glittery amber dots of downtown's lights. Winds had swept away the clouds, and a soothing star-blazing night greeted me, a far cry from the doom and gloom of my date.

"Cody, Cleo." My two Himalayans always skittered away from the havoc they wreaked the second they heard my voice. "Where are you?"

Creepy crawlies teased the nape of my neck. I slanted a glance down the two empty hallways. My right pinkie twitched. Oh, hell. If the crawlies advanced to a pinkie twitch, it was bad. Alarm dipped in and squeezed my heart.

Slipping my hand inside the small drawer of the end table, I gripped my stun gun. I tapped in casino security on my cell phone without punching the send button. The wall clock tick-tocking from the dining room eclipsed the sound of my uneven breathing in the quiet-as-a-church space. Not even a mouse stirred.

"Where are you ding-a-ling cats?" My voice trilled unnaturally. "You better not be leaving stinky presents in my new ficus."

Three halls broke off from the living room. The wide hall led to the foyer, and two narrower halls led left to the kitchen and right to the bedrooms. I tiptoed down the right hallway. The recessed lights automatically winked on. At the first door—the hall bathroom—a whiff of cheap Old Spice cologne assaulted me, reminding me of the casino blackjack dealer who marinated in it. My heart thudded in my ears, and I about hightailed it toward the front door. Gossamer threads of something foreign fluttered in my head. As a telekinetic, I sensed ESP, and I oddly absorbed the intangible energy of other beings through my aura, but never to the point where it invaded my mind. I'd never even sensed a telepath tickle my telekinetic sensors, and I sure as shit didn't think an intruder was reading my mind.

I gripped my focusizer, a pendant encompassing the number thirteen. It helped me delve into deep telekinesis and concentrate my energy. Something just clicked in my brain whenever the dang number was present in any way, shape or form. Focusing also allowed me to deflect bad luck...when I knew in advance I needed to deflect. The enameled leaves on the vine and rose lucky charm dug into the flesh of my fingers, comforting and scary at once.

When I crossed the threshold of the wide open bathroom door, the automatic light flashed on. Stun gun held outward, I shoved aside the purple shower curtain. Empty. My heart pounded against my ribs. No rest for the terrified, I still had a bedroom and an office to check. Hating to expose my back to the hallway, I spun to face the door. Where were my useless fraidy cats? I should've gotten the drooling Rottweiler who ate kitties for snacks.

A crash echoed in the office next door, followed by two twelve-pound thuds on the hardwood floor. I nearly stunned myself as the furballs slid down the slick hardwood in their headlong rush toward the living room.

Feathers wavered in and out of my telekinetic receptors. Puzzled, I concentrated on the foreign invasion, but my thoughts muddled. More gossamer wings flapped in the corners of my mind, working toward the middle to totally unhinge me. What the freaking hell?

My phone rang. Startled, I hurled it into the air and it clattered onto the hallway floor. Lunging out of the bathroom, I stooped to snag it. The second I cleared the doorway, strong hands gripped my upper arms from behind.

A banshee scream erupted up my throat. Kicking backward, my bare feet connected with steel beam thighs. I thrashed side-to-side, hoping to break his death grip as his hands slid down my arms. My heart drummed so hard I thought it would pop out of my ribcage. I lost my grip on the stun gun and it spun across the hardwood to kiss my phone.

"Hold steady," my attacker growled. He cinched both my wrists in long, lethal fingers.

Pain seared my shoulders as he yanked my arms behind my butt. He grabbed my short hair and snapped my neck back. Needles scored my scalp.

"Take whatever you want," I gasped out. His weird ESP hit my brain in a puzzling jumble, and my telekinetic brain waves floundered beneath it. It was as if he was sending commands from his head to mine. I didn't care for his terrifying mind commands, not one bit.

He chuckled, his skanky breath hot on my neck. "That's the plan."

The stench of male sweat and very Old Spice filtered into my nose. "Okay." I stalled to collect myself. "Lock me in the bathroom and do your thing."

Sausage fingers tightened around my wrists. My shoulder muscles burned. I muffled a gasp, refusing to dignify the attack with proof of my pain and terror.

“My thing is with you, Aria Walker.” The brute released my hair. Coarse fingers grazed the nape of my neck before sliding beneath my blouse to grip my bare shoulder.

“What are you?” I had to know what caused the tangle inside my brain.

He chuckled arrogantly. “Never met a Scrambler?”

I sucked in my stomach. “Scrambler” was slang for a strong telepath who had the ability to jumble and temporarily kill psychic abilities. A powerful Scrambler could even permanently destroy a person’s ESP, leaving behind a shell of emptiness. Some used to have the mental ability to coerce, but they hadn’t existed in centuries. Anyone with an inkling of ESP knew what a Scrambler was. The last sorcerers to permanently eradicate magic from the world used Scramblers to do the government’s dirty work.

No wonder I’d dropped my guard. The slimeball had messed with my head.

An arctic blast of shock iced my flesh. My innate electromagnetic energies swelled, steadying my growing terror. Energy surged, melting the ice, filling me with warm, heady power. My aura barriers vaulted in place to protect myself from the intense energy seething for liberation. A familiar, alluring darkness mushroomed inside my head. A flame ignited, a pinpoint of white-hot light, growing brighter, blazing hotter. I envisioned slipping into the Scrambler’s mind, forcing my command upon him. Sleep, I willed fiercely, drawing upon the light, oozing my will and my brain waves into the heat. Sleep, lights out, assbat. My bioelectric energy field—my aura—surrounded us, raining a paralysis on the guy.

Spears of energy pierced my shroud, numbing my flesh where it made contact. Mutually increasing horror threw us off kilter against the bombe chest in the hall. Holy crap. I’d never felt my aura touch me in anger.

The dude’s fingers dropped away. The sound of ripping cloth split the charged air as he thumped to the floor. Jagged silky edges tickled my bare arm as feeling quickly returned to me. Sidestepping the heaped intruder, I scooped up my stun gun and smartphone in trembling hands.

Goose bumps broke out along my bare arm. Regardless, I scouted out my condo to ensure no accomplices waited in the fringes. My defiled haven turned up empty and my shoulders sagged in relief. What did the guy want with me? Surely, my secret telekinesis was still my secret. The Scrambler hadn’t had enough time to screw up my head. So what had caused my aura to expand to the point that I actually felt the normally intangible energy?

I tiptoed back to the hallway and scrutinized the body. The man’s bald head, trim brown beard, and mustache didn’t ring my familiar bells. Criminals were sure well-dressed, or he was wearing his charcoal, pin-stripe suit for a funeral. I hoped it wasn’t for my funeral. “Not much of a Scrambler, are you?” I kicked his thigh. “Maybe you’re a wannabe.” Maybe I was a Scrambler. Holy mother of illegal magic.

The quaking in my hands fled across my entire body. Backing out of arm’s length in case he awakened, I called casino security. City cops didn't show their faces on California casino property without an in-house security request first. New laws for an era of overpopulation and legalized stupidity. In a shaky voice, I informed the officer that I'd apprehended a burglar. The grumpy security man of the hour wasn't too jazzed to hear about a breach in their high-tech system, but assured me he'd dispatch a man stat.

Minutes later, the doorbell gonged. On wobbly legs, I managed to jog to the front door. A badge flashed through the peephole. I disarmed the alarm, opened the door. My breath left me in a rush. "You guys are quick."

I looked up and up into the handsome, arrogant face of a broad, muscular guy as he slipped his wallet into his jeans pocket. He appeared twenty-one, same age as me. Shoulder-length black hair framed sun-kissed skin that took poker face to a glacial extreme. Then he cracked. Concern flashed across his somber expression, and his gaze drank me in before his gray-flecked, blue eyes flicked over me, assessing, discounting. The hair of his right eyebrow was a strange shade lighter than his left, emphasizing his disregard.

"R.L. Walker," he said as if I had a sticky note with the answer pasted on my brow. He hauled a gun out of a shoulder holster and shoved past me, nearly knocking me against the wall.

His aura tangled around mine in a way I'd never experienced. Harmless, it seemed to seek relief, leaving a tingly sensation over my exposed skin. I froze, held my breath.

The strange sensation dissipated as quickly as it hit. Maybe the Scrambler had screwed me up. "Geez, what'd I do, interrupt your snooze fest?" I scurried down the hall behind him.

"Stay here." Without waiting for an invite, his long legs hiked over the downed intruder as though stepping over a twelve-pound cat.

Speaking of which...my two felonious felines proceeded to sniff Old Spice. Arms crossed to keep myself from wilting into a puddle of terror, I waited in the living room. After he swept the entire condo, Security Goon barreled out of my bedroom. I checked out his snug jeans, black boots, black T-shirt, and black leather jacket. A cliché in the making? Did he wear black skivvies too? All the security guards wore plainclothes at the Stargazer, so his appearance wasn't unusual.

He fingered the Scrambler's neck pulse. "Did you call the cops?"

"No." I rolled my eyes. "Isn't that your job?" My cats dared to rub against Rent-a-Cop. I tried shooing the furry traitors away with gentle toe jabs, but they wouldn't spare me a morsel of their time. What was up with that? My cats hated the male species.

Suspicion erased his blank expression. "Who did you call?"

"You." I hugged my arms tighter to my chest. "Aren't you a casino watchdog?"

Straightening, his eyes bored into my face. "Did you call them?" He stuck his gun into his shoulder holster, a good sign he didn't plan to use me for target practice.

Bowing my head, I pooled my sketchy mental resources and knotted a knockout spell in slow motion—a fancy way of saying I'd spring an electric emanation on his mind that'd send him to Snoozeville. Why hadn't I examined his badge closer? I swallowed my renewed turmoil and glimpsed the stun gun where I'd dumped it on the chest across the hall, next to Fake Cop. Did I have enough mental energy left to protect myself?

My gaze flitted from his chest to his face. "Who are you?"

"He's dead. Call security off."

As my dwindling brain waves dissipated, my "knockout spell" unraveled as fast as it knitted together. I wagged my head, dispelling my mental sludge. "Not until you tell me who the hell you are and what you're doing here."

He tapped his foot on the floor. "Ronan Riley. I'm bagging your ass to keep it alive."

"Alive?" My eyelashes twitched up a breeze.

He snatched up my cell, stabbed redial, and handed it to me. "Call them off."

"Or what?" I tugged my torn blouse over my lacy pink bra.

Ronan pointed at the intruder. "Or you'll face murder charges, if you live long enough."

Those icy eyes pierced me, bright and beautiful against his winter tan. Energy rolled off him, and I shivered from a sensation of familiarity, almost like a connection. Heat flared low in my middle, startling me with confusing inappropriateness.

"Right. The sleazebag may be out cold—" I bent over the Scrambler. Ronan jerked my hand down and pressed my fingers to the man's lifeless pulse. The phone clicked on at the other end and I stuttered as my brain malfunctioned, "Aria Walker from P14. Ummm...false alarm on the burglar. Safe word, Triskelion. Just my boyfriend playing bonehead games." I waited for dismissal, then shoved the phone in my jeans pocket.

Through slit eyes, I studied Ronan's dark Viking build compared to my fair, petite stature. As night and day as women and men. Renewed warmth flushed my neck. I twisted my hands and scanned the unconscious intruder. Ronan's words registered. "He's only knocked out, right?" I whispered.

He landed his assessing glare on me. "Did you feel his pulse? You have no clue, do you? He's dead."

"No. No." My knees buckled. I'd have kissed the floor if Ronan hadn't swept me into his arms.

He carried me into the living room, dumped me on the couch, and backed away as if I'd sprouted dragon wings and spewed fire. "Water?"

"No. Thanks." I stuck my head between my knees, fighting the nausea inching up from my stomach.

"Your first kill?" Ronan's deep voice penetrated my chaotic thoughts.

"First...kill?" I closed my eyes. I couldn't even kill an ant. Bug spray didn't count. How could I have done that? Was that what had happened? Oh, God. No. The room spun.

"I know who you are, R.L. Walker." Arrogant impatience layered his voice.

"Obviously not, since my name's Aria." I screwed a lid on my raging horror. I had to deal with the...situation. I had to deal with Ronan. Hoping the nausea stayed buried, I lifted my head.

No one ever called me R.L. except my... Holy shit, Batman. He'd called me that twice. I gaped at Ronan the barbarian. “How do you know me?”

He hunched down to my level. “I knew your father for a minute. He called you R.L., short for Aria Elle.” Empathy spooled off him in waves.

I longed for someone to fix this mess, to tell me what to do. Instead, I focused on his words. He knew my father? That rat-bastard who’d split from my life when I was six? The man who vanished into thin air, leaving his family behind.

Ronan stood to his full height. “We’ll talk about him...and other things later.” His hard voice held no sympathy. “Right now, we need to haul ass.”

Numb, I rose from the couch. He cupped my elbow, steadied me. His touch baffling and uncomfortable, I cast him off and clutched my throat. “What did you mean by first kill?”

“I caused my first bad luck kill when I was fourteen. On a Friday the thirteenth.”

Chapter 2

Another telekinetic plagued by bad luck? I twisted around to face Ronan. His grim face halted my inquisition. Small disappointment pricked my heart in learning I was no longer one of a kind, but a warm rush of excitement quickly eclipsed it. My earlier intuition at a connection between us was right on the money. Had a door opened in the life of my aimlessness? The door hidden from me as I searched for my true place? Everyone had died and/or left me too soon, leaving much unsaid and undone, enhancing my bumble into a world in which I never felt connected.

Over the last few years, I'd searched high and low for others like me, hoping I'd blunder upon hidden talents, since magic was illegal to practice. It's not like people walked around flaunting their abilities and risked arrest. My strange abilities weren't documented anywhere and spoon-bending, book-flying show-and-tell tricks were all I'd ever shown Zoe, my most trustworthy confidant. Although there hadn't been a forbidden magic death penalty case in decades, I certainly wasn't going to become a freak-frenzy for the media and law enforcement.

Fearing the unknown, the New Urban World government, known as NUW, established twenty odd years ago, continued the antiquated laws against magic. If anyone exhibited magical ability above a certain kindergarten level—gifting of gemstones for their positive energy properties and palm, tarot card, and crystal ball readings—they were put on the government's Paranormal Science Practitioners list, otherwise known as PSPs or just plain paranormals. It was like going on the terrorist watch or the FBI's most wanted lists. Once on the PSP list, you couldn't pop a squat without calling someone first. Big Brother at its finest.

Ronan and I regarded each other silently until he spun on his heels. "I'll dump the body." He snatched the Scrambler's gun, jammed the weapon into his coat pocket. "Pack a bag for several days."

"Excuse me." Slack-jawed again, I stared at his back. "Why?" I needed answers before I obeyed a stranger, connection or not, dead man notwithstanding.

Ronan ceased fumbling with the body and rose to look down on me from his towering height. "You've been outed, and you're wanted by...people who'll go to any extreme to bag your ass and lock you up forever." He thrummed his fingers against his thigh, nudged the dead psychic with a booted foot. "He works for them, and a shitload of bounty hunters aren't far behind."

My mind reeled as I wrapped it around this eye-opener. Who wanted a lucky charm maker, college art student so badly? Rubbing my ear, I gawked at Ronan. “Why me?”

“They know you have the powers of an ancient sorcerer.”

I waved my hand in front of my face and uttered a short relieved laugh. “I’m not...no one—” My heart plummeted toward my stomach. “What’re you talking about? Sorcerers died off with the dinosaurs.”

He scrubbed his hand over his face, giving me a look eager to melt skin. “Can you manipulate mind, matter, and other kinds of energy? Are you affected by strange things, bad luck, good luck?”

Face growing hot, I plucked at a loose thread on my new fashionista blouse. “How did you know?”

“Your father ratted you out to my fucking father,” Ronan spat out. “We’re both wanted.” He grabbed my bare arm in a vise grip. “Now shift your ass in gear.” He propelled me in the direction of my bedroom, giving a final prod on my lower back. “Pack or not. Either way, you’re coming with me.”

“Bastard,” I muttered. My ass still in park, I turned. “Why the hell would my father tell lies about me? He doesn’t know anything about me. You’re freaking delusional.” I snorted. “Why’re you here and why’re we both wanted? And who elected you puppet-master?” Hands on my hips, I glowered at him so hard my face practically pinched into place.

“Look, we don’t have time for this. I’ll explain it later. I won’t hurt you, but if they snag you, you’re screwed. You’ll wish you were dead. The man they work for will do a helluva lot worse than kill you.” He kicked at the downed intruder. His impenetrable facemask descended again. “Move it or I’ll drag you out.”

Apprehension gnawed at my usual confidence. Under the strain of an emotional kaleidoscope, I trudged toward my bedroom, snagging my stun gun off the bombe chest. I knew what being outed meant. Stranger or not, Ronan was right. I had to run. I couldn’t risk getting caught by the authorities, or anyone for that matter.

I stopped in my bedroom doorway, faced him. He watched me, his brooding face easier to read than earlier. “Where are we going?”

“Safe house near Los Gatos.”

The ritzy, high-rent town bordering San Jose sat along the nearby foothills, close enough to escape into the familiar if I needed to. “Safe for whom? You or me?”

“Both.”

“You’ll tell me everything?” My stubby fingers latched on to the door molding, needing to touch something normal. He nodded. “What about...how did...do you know what I did to him?” I waved a shaky hand at the Scrambler.

“Take two minutes to pack a few things. We’ll talk later.” He returned to hiding the dead man as if he taught body snatching for fun.

Thoughtful, I zoomed into flight mode.

My father had gone Benedict Arnold on me in the worst way, and I wasn't going to take it sitting on my rear, losing my freedom, or my life.

I secured the alarm behind me. Ronan carried my two overstuffed bags of jumbled clothes and whatnot. I left out bowls of water and dry cat food—enough for two weeks if the furballs didn't stuff themselves the first day and kick off from bloat—and both litter boxes filled for Cody and Cleo.

Ronan hadn't divulged what he'd done with the Scrambler's body. Honestly, I preferred to remain clueless about that aspect of my night from hell. I wasn't sure how to deal with my first accidental kill, so I buried it, knowing it would haunt me forever.

His voice butted into my thoughts. "Where's your car?" We stepped onto the elevator and he jabbed the first level casino button.

I studied the earthtone granite tiles. The reek of pot-laced cigarette smoke lingered, and I scrunched my nose to avoid inhaling it. "Where's your car?" The elevator dove to the first floor casino level.

He sneered. "I'm driving on a run-flat."

My head snapped up. "That was you? You were tailing me earlier?" I'd sensed someone following me from the hospital after making sure dipshit Michael was okay. At least until we passed Thirteenth Street and he'd popped a tire.

That perpetual scowl froze on Ronan's face. His sour lemon features didn't detract from his rugged handsomeness. He appeared menacing, a bar bouncer you'd evade at first until you got a tip-off at what lay underneath. Right now, frustration with a hint of fear played along the chiseled planes of his tan face.

The elevator dinged, the doors slid open, and I walked through the opening, staring at the slate tile floor. I pointed toward the door at the opposite end of the hallway. "My car's in the resident garage."

"We're not taking your car. Too obvious."

"I thought—"

"Try not to think. It's not working for you right now."

Slowing, I gave his backside a dirty look. "Screw you, Ronan Riley." I wavered at the first row of dollar slots. He kept on walking with a silent, lethal grace that had part of me dying to give chase. His nice firm ass was so worth it.

Rainbow lights sprayed the casino. Spinning wheels, videos, and bells created a symphony of noise. I spun out of Ronan's sight, jogged to my favorite machine. As usual, the thirteen-thirteen machine was unoccupied. I squeezed between two older women with identical brunette dye-jobs wearing polyester pantsuits differing from blue to purple floral working the flanking slots. Ugh, I hoped that wasn't me in thirty years. I didn't do floral well.

I dug a Player's card out of my rear pocket and stuck it into the card slot. The fifty-credit balance registered. Anonymous and transferable cash-in-a-card after an automatic flat-rate tax hit on any winnings. Usually I waved my smartphone at the machine, but I didn't want this transaction traceable. As I punched the triple play button, Ronan grabbed my wrist, dwarfing half my lower arm in his hand.

"What are you doing?" He mashed his teeth.

Red, white, and blue sevens stopped on my machine's winning line. The woman to the right squealed. Digital bells clanged. Lights above the bank of dollar slots blinked in rapid succession, glints of red bouncing off the chrome and plastics.

"Lookie, sweetheart, I won!" I said in my best Southern belle twang. I eased my wrist from his grasp, jumped up and down, clapping.

Ronan's mouth gaped like a hungry tax man. "You just won twenty grand."

The two women gushed over the jackpot I'd risked my luck to win. Seriously, it was the biggest jackpot I'd ever won. I merely expected to win a thousand credits for emergencies. I never let myself win larger jackpots. I did maintain some morals and personal rules when manipulating my telekinesis.

Ronan plucked the card out of the machine and stuck it in my back pocket. His fingers lingered a few seconds too long before he whisked his hand away. I couldn't halt the bizarre desire trickling into my veins. Add to To-Do list: therapy.

"Time to go, babe," he drawled, matching my phony accent. He leaned down and whispered, "Move it" nastily in my ear, grabbed my hand and hefted my bags over his shoulder.

His long-legged stride forced me to skip to keep pace. "Slow down! I didn't drink my EnerRizer this morning." I knew I'd regret not replacing my supply of rise and shine instant energy in a bottle.

"Shut. It." Ronan's stride revved up as we traversed the midnight Friday casino crowd.

I dropped my voice to a whisper. "Hey, cut the 'tude. I can't go on the run without cash. How much cash do you have shoved up your ass for this jaunt to Insanity?"

We flew by the entrance to the Licensed Escort wing designated by a swish of ruby lips across an ebony door. Wildly popular, Licensed Escorts were NUW's legalized slant on prostitution. I tended to avoid that part of the entertainment complex. Ronan did a double take, slowing, his head spinning like the Exorcist girl.

"What's wrong?" My right pinkie spasmed. "What the what?" I muttered under my breath. Couldn't I skid through the night without more bad luck dumped on me?

"We've been tagged by another bounty hunter." Ronan released my hand and slipped on a pair of black leather gloves he'd snared from a mysterious pocket in his jacket's interior. "If you have gloves, put them on."

"Hell. Lo. It's California." I narrowed my eyes at his worn gloves. "You came prepared for a crime spree? Are you a prophet or just a kidnapper?"

Ronan shouldered me behind a jungle of fake trees and bushes toward a tropical paradise. "Can you get us out of here?”

“What? You’re asking me to think?” Sarcasm dripped venom from my tongue. “I thought you knew what you were doing.”

I had much to learn from Ronan, and it pained me to admit that I was growing to like him. Don’t ask my love-struck eyes. His aura gave off an energy that frolicked nicely with mine. Normally, when I absorbed energy, it was barely perceptible, rarely identifiable. Even though it enhanced my aura, I’d never felt other people’s auras. Mine was always too dominant. His aura I definitely felt, warm and prickly at once. Fear also prevented me from trying anything stupid on him. I might be blonde with three-quarters of an art degree, but I wasn’t dumb.

“You know the casino.” He glowered at me.

I peered through the fake jungle and spotted the man. “Slim guy, navy suit recalled by the ’50s? Dirty blond? Just came out of the escort wing.” Rubbing his bulging crotch. I screwed up my face.

Ronan grunted something akin to a yes. He hovered behind me, peering through the fake branches I’d spread to form a peephole. “Is there an exit behind the waterfall?”

“Probably, but—” I paused. We’d end up on the frontline of a chase. “Lure him closer. Let’s knock him out.” I watched the bounty hunter in an aisle of electronic bingo machines. He spun in a slow circle, scanning the thinning casino crowd.

“Like you did to the guy upstairs?”

“Yes.” I almost missed the incredulous scorn lacing Ronan’s voice. The impact of his words smacked me upside the head. “I didn’t mean to kill him.” I blanched, forcing the memory aside. Dropping the fern branches, I pivoted on my heels. Ronan stepped back, probably afraid I’d whack him too. “I meant knock him out.”

“Won’t work.” Ronan investigated the granite boulders bordering a garden of soaring pampas grass, dense enough to hide in for days. The phony sea breeze fluttered a palm frond at my head. I smacked at it, snagged my foot on a silken vine, knocking down a red parrot. It thumped on Ronan’s foot and he booted the bird toward the wafting pampas grass, where it landed with a loud thwack.

I gave him a tight-lipped smile. “Why won’t it work? I can control it.” In dismay, I peered at the upside down bird.

Ronan stepped behind the waterfall. Crouching, I inched toward him into a utility room off a corridor leading to the rear of the building.

“I’m doing it,” I said, hands on my hips.

He scrutinized my face, but I masked it, stealing a cue from him.

“Two telekinetic sorcerers negate one another when together.”

I rolled my eyes. “I think not. Didn’t I just win twenty grand? Way I see it, if you really are a sorcerer, you didn’t negate me. You probably boosted my energy.” Okay, I exaggerated since I wasn’t absorbing his energy at all even though I felt his aura, but the idea seemed plausible in this new universe of the weird.

Ronan groaned, indecision painting his face as if he struggled with bad information about this negation thing. Suddenly the air wavered around him, streaming into a thin opalescent rope. The rope shot toward the parrot, and the bird rose a foot off the floor, then plopped back down. “You negate me.” His eyes had gone dark. “I tried to shoot the bird into the waterfall.”

“I’m special, aren’t I?” A smirk might have been overkill so he received my beauty contestant smile.

“Yeah, something like that.” Ronan curled his arm around my waist, plastering me to his side. His hard body pressed against mine, and I shivered with that puzzling familiar awareness.

I inhaled his exotic spice on leather, filled my lungs with the intoxicating cologne. His aura stirred around mine, creating a cocoon effect. My heart pulsed in the most bewildering way I’d ever experienced. Cripes, I don’t need my hormones to rampage. “Umm...dude...what’re you doing?”

“He’s nearing,” he said, his mouth close to my ear. “Pretend we’re hooking up.”

My aura swelled and panic smashed my warm tinglies into smithereens.

“Calm it, Aria.” Ronan’s arm tightened on my waist. The heat of his chest pressed into my cheek. “You’ll off him if negation doesn’t affect you. It’s probably why you killed the other guy, if you absorb energy to boost your own.” His breath wafted my hair against my temple. “Give me your stun gun.”

All I’d experienced in the last hour scared the bejeezus out of me. More than anything, I wanted freedom to discover who and what I was without mercenaries tailing me.

Ronan began patting me down. He brushed the sides of my breasts, my nipples stiffened, jutting through my thin cotton T-shirt.

“Did you earn a cop badge in the last two minutes?” Face flushed, I pulled the gun out of my jacket pocket before he caused further harm to my rebellious hormonal system.

He snatched it and released me. “Stand behind me.”

“You have a plan?” I scooted behind him.

His body obscured my view of everything except his back, broad shoulders, and amazing firm and round ass. “Go along with me.” Ronan hid the weapon in his coat pocket.

Faux foliage shifted, rustled. Leisure Suit Larry had breached our hideout. My heart thudded against my chest.

I heard a nasally voice. “What’s up, kid?”

“Murph,” Ronan greeted, an edge of iron to his tone.

“You found her.” Murph rubbed his hands together.

“I’m taking her back.” Ronan shifted from one foot to the other, his spine arrow straight.

Say what? Aural energy escaped me, cracked heads with Ronan’s energy. Tangled telekinetic energy pulsed around us, smacking of electrical wires twisting in a windstorm.

“Come on, man,” Murph whined. “You don’t need the five mil bounty.”

My mouth mimicked a flycatcher. I quickly smacked it shut. Who’d have ever thunk lowly telekinetic Aria Elle Walker was worth five million dollars? Dead or alive?

Murph took two steps closer. Stale smoke clung to his clothes. My nose crinkled, and I longed to bury my face in Ronan's back, but I fought the urge to touch the potential traitor, kidnapper, and hormone charmer.

"Stand down, Murph." Ronan pulled his hand from his pocket and eased it toward his hidden shoulder holster. "She's my take."

"Let's split the dough. No one'd be the wiser."

Would I have to knock them both out? "Hey, Murph?" I called from behind Ronan. "Guess what?"

"Shut it, bitch," Ronan warned.

I gnashed my mouth. He better be acting, or else I'd give his ass the smackdown to Australia. I needed a few more minutes to absorb energy from around me to recharge my brain waves. Not sure what Ronan was up to, I wanted my own escape route. "Murph? How bad do you want the bounty?" I scooted to the left, remaining halfway shielded behind Ronan.

Murph halted in the doorway of the utility room. The tinkling waterfall's splashes drowned our voices in the casino beyond. Grinning, he stroked his chin, displaying a gappy set of tobacco-stained teeth. A weapon hung loosely in his other hand. "Darlin', if you only knew. Now you gonna come with me willingly?"

The heat of his gaze felt like slimy hands on my boobs. I angled my head, eyeing him critically. "Do I look stupid?"

"Dial it down." Ronan stepped in front of me again. I moved along with him, my sight glued on Murph.

The unmistakable cocking of a gun hammer clicked. The gun engulfed in Murph's hand moved into position, aimed at Ronan's head. A muffled shot exploded in the air. It was barely long enough.

Relying upon my focusizer, I invoked my telekinesis, sending out an electrical vibration. Breathing in deeply, I focused on the path of the bullet. It zoomed above our heads, so close the hairs rose on the top of my scalp. A ceiling tile popped behind me after I deflected the bullet's course. My aura lashed out and connected with the energy Murph emitted. He slumped to his knees, arms dangling at his sides. A wet stain darkened the front of his pants as his bladder released.

In one swift movement, Ronan aimed and shot Murph point-blank between the eyes. Even with a silencer, the shot boomed in my ears. Blood oozed out the center of Murph's forehead, dripped down his hawk nose.

The heavy thump of his body on the glossy, red cement floor obscured the hiss of tropical white noise and the screaming in my head. My legs became seaweed, dumping me on the floor near Murph. I stretched forward and yakked my quesadilla dinner into a bucket in the corner. My stomach heaved until I expelled the entire ghastly night.

"Stay hidden." Ronan shoved my stun gun in my curled hand.

The barbarian of Hidden Bodies 'R' Us went to town without sparing me a second thought. By the time my clarity resurfaced, he'd stashed Murph's body in the fake fauna and knelt beside me.

"Leave me alone," I said, voice hoarse and throat scratchy. I tried to invoke my power again, but it sank into a teaspoon of acid in my aching stomach. The energy I'd expended that night had shut down the intangible doors to my ESP. A tingle of electricity fluttered my hair. I just wanted to go upstairs, drag myself into bed with my kitties, and sleep the nightmare off. A blasted tear slipped down my cheek and that pissed me off the most. I slapped at the offensive droplet, smacking sense into myself. Before I could stop him, Ronan picked me up and hoisted me over his shoulder as if I were another sack of dead bones he needed to hide.

"Put me down!" The diminishing splashes of the waterfall drenched my croaky voice as he tramped down the hall toward the rear of the casino. My travel bags, slung over his other shoulder, banged against my skull. Using the last of my strength, I bolstered my arm to muscle the bags from hitting my already rattled head. His shoulder dug into my empty stomach, and my gut ached with every step. "Come on! I can walk."

"If I drop you, will you turn it off?"

"If you ask me nicely, I'll zip it, turncoat."

"Please?" he asked with considerable trouble. "We don't have time to screw around and you're going to draw attention."

Blood coagulated in my head, fogged my fried brain. I hated being upside down staring at the shiny, red floor. "I'll behave." That word hurt to say.

Double steel doors barred us. Ronan wrested me off his shoulder, his hands encircling my waist as he set me on my feet. Surprisingly, he straightened my skewed jacket, and then stripped off his gloves to work the security lock on the service door. Well, one second of gentlemanliness didn't make up for a night of murder, mayhem, and mystifying magic.

I fished mints out of my purse. Blood drained from my head, easing my encroaching headache. I contemplated my next move. Stun and run? Go along with him? I studied a crack zigzagging the length of the cement hallway. The red river zigged to Murph and zagged to the sane, safe life destroyed in one measly hour.

I couldn't go back. If Ronan told the truth, there'd be more Murphs, and the cops would lock me up tighter than a nun's chastity belt. With a decisive squint, I watched the silent hulk's hand enclose the electronic lock. He exhaled a couple of times and the lock clicked. The security light flashed green, and he shoved the door open wide.

"How'd you do that if I negate you?" I accused wanly.

Sweat glistened on his pasty forehead. "Cheap lock. I managed."

So there was a way around the negation, or he lied. I probed his features for any clue I could steal. Shallow lines of pain around his eyes aged his face, my only clue. I trudged past him out the door. We found ourselves by the delivery docks. Not a soul in sight, not even a bat. Chilly air flowed around me, dispelling the bloody stench from my nostrils.

Ronan motioned for me to follow him to a crevice between two loading docks. Shadowy lights illuminated the deserted area. Even in the dim lighting, I saw the pained tolerance on his face. “Get it out.”

I blinked rapidly. “Get what out?”

“Your rant.”

I braced my weary body against the exterior wall. What could I say? Murdering people squarely shoved me outside my element, even if the victims included skeevy bounty hunters. “Thanks, I guess.” My stun gun grew arctic against my palm.

“Aria. Murph was a hired enforcer with a mile long rap sheet. He would’ve taken a few days with you...before collecting his bounty.” His jet lashes swept down, up. “Five million. Do you get it now?”

Revulsion rolled through my middle as his innuendo sank deep. I clutched my jacket tight around me and said the only thing I could think to say, “You don’t want the money?” My teeth chattered.

He grasped my upper arms. “It’s not about the money.”

I jerked out of his hold. “Then why do you care about me? Why do you want me?”

His fists clenched at his sides. “I need your help to take down my father.”

Chapter 3

As much as I wanted to believe otherwise, I didn't exactly live a ho-hum life, especially due to my father's desertion at age six and my mother's death at thirteen. Yeah, unlucky thirteen strikes again. My grandmother raised me afterwards until she died after a bizarre topple off a ladder last fall. A few other traumas I'd rather pretend were fiction, and all involving the number thirteen.

I'd always known I possessed paranormal talents that defied description. Now people wanted me for them. One part of me wanted to knit a red carpet with my toes for the recognition and potentially finding my true purpose in life, something to kill the emptiness inside me. The chicken part of me didn't want the exploitation—or to die for it. Dying just didn't appeal to me. Ronan appeared to have information I wanted and needed. I refused to ignore that. Obviously, it wasn't safe to stay at home, and as much as I hated to admit it, I needed his help to get out in one piece. And he'd let me keep my stun gun.

Ronan and I left the shadows skirting the casino complex. My feet dragged and I was thankful he carried my bags.

"Where's tenant parking?" He slowed his long-legged stride.

My heart galloped from the exertion of keeping pace. "I thought you didn't want to take my car?"

"We're not." Ronan plucked a small tool kit out of his pocket.

"We're stealing a car?" I sucked in air. "I don't steal—" Ronan placed his palm over my mouth and my heart plummeted into my stomach. I bit him and his skin tasted salty...and chocolaty.

He yanked his hand away. "You little—"

I forced winter's fury into my glower, prodded his hard chest with my fist. Forget the evil eye. "Don't ever put your hand over my mouth." I punctuated each word with a finger jab to his shoulder. "Got it?"

His mouth hung open and he rubbed my reddening bite marks.

Shaking like a mad leaf in a gale, I spun on my heels and marched toward the parking garage. I wiped his taste off my mouth with the back of my hand as I approached the black-as-death Mustang I'd bought with Granny's life insurance money. Mom loved Mustangs and had driven one at my age. She was with me whenever I drove the hot rod. But I didn't trust Ronan with it. Maybe borrowing a car wasn't such a bad idea. Oh, sweet hell's minions, get your pitchforks ready. I'd have a lot to atone for if I ever made it home alive.

Ronan's booted footsteps pounded a few paces behind me. Before I knew it, he'd picked the lock on the driver's door to an older dusty Cadillac. The sport model was parked in the thirteenth spot from the end. Wonderful.

"I have another vehicle waiting," said Ronan the barbarian. "We just need to clear out of the area."

Aggravated heat warmed my chilled cheeks, and I whirled to face him. "No fingerprints."

He slipped on his black gloves. "That's why I brought gloves." A hint of a smile curved into a devastating grin. His smile set off the slate specks in his eyes, sparkling from the fluorescent bulbs directly over his head.

What prompted that irresistible grin? My pulse raced circles around my hormones.

"We cool?" he asked as I neared the passenger side of the car.

"As a cucumber." Rolling in the desert.

I used the bottom of my jacket to open the door. Careful not to touch anything, I slid into the passenger seat. Leather bolsters wrapped around me, the leather cracked and rough. Rose-scented perfume lingered in the car, masking the scent of eau de smelly ashtray and locker room carpet. I banged my elbow on a half-empty water bottle in the cup holder, knocking it toward the driver's floorboard. As I made a grab for it, Ronan's hand tangled with mine. Electricity buzzed through his glove and I jerked back.

Wiped out beyond reason, I pressed the recline button, scratching the strange tingling away. The seat eased back softly and I wanted to snooze the night away. I'd placed my life in the hands of a total stranger, but resistance seemed as pointless as my date with Dipstick Michael. One hand resting on the stun gun at my waist, I huddled in my seat. If Ronan so much as looked at me cross-eyed, I'd find a way to jinx his luck.

Our swiped car jolted to a stop, flinging me out of a nightmare featuring the dead intruder chasing my cats on Survivor island, immunity up for grabs. I bolted upright, practically braining myself on the roof. Aural energy trickled from me and dissolved like tissue paper in a bonfire. I hadn't meant to fall asleep, which proved my telekinetic reserves had sunk to the level of ground squirrels. My brain ruled my body, and I needed time to recuperate, or there'd be a war of wills between my head and body. I wasn't quite sure who'd win.

Ronan strung his arm across the center console to brace me in the seat. "Sorry. Mutt ran in front of the car." He parked in the circular driveway of a secluded mansion nestled within a shadowy forest of Douglas firs, oaks, and redwoods. Little starlight penetrated the canopy of towering trees. The headlights and a single porch bulb illuminated the fir strewn, pea gravel driveway. Did the butler forget to buy lightbulbs?

A black lab puppy trotted into the headlight beams, tail wagging sixty miles a minute. I did a double-take, my eyes narrowing as I inspected the dog. Strange psychic energy flashed into my center of power, stemming from the dog. I sensed an old soul inhabiting the pup's body. Exhaustion bogged my mind, and I shook off the weird sensations. Dogs weren't my thing, or I would own a salivating Rottweiler.

I tightened my grip on my stun gun. "I thought we were switching cars. Where are we?"

Ronan killed the engine and shifted to face me. "Adam's place in the foothills. He'll return the car, grab our other ride."

Anxiety circled my chest. "Who's Adam? Is he like us? Do you trust him?" A fiery focus of energy coiled in the pit of my empty stomach. "Whose puppy is that? He friendly?"

Ronan stretched out a hand, thought better of it when my eyes prepared to launch fireworks. "When you bit me earlier...did someone try to shut you up?"

"What's it to you? I ask a lot of questions, so call your lawyer." Ronan Riley, meet Aria's tangent. "Why do you think you can forcibly shut me up without any consequences?"

My last question stopped the words about to trip from his open cavern mouth. He closed it, a veil descending over his expression.

He tapped the dash. He must've been a drummer in a past life, or even in this life. Heck, I knew nothing about him. Gaze fixated on the shadowed house, Ronan ceased his finger solo. "There's a lot you need to know. You're gonna need to trust me. If you can't..." His wide shoulders rose and fell, the leather seat squeaking in protest.

My defiance melted in the wake of my fatigue and curiosity. I suffered his words grudgingly. "I'm listening."

He scratched his jaw. "If I were you, I don't know why I'd trust me. I understand why you didn't come willingly." He rasped his hand over his stubbly cheek, appeared to battle with a desire to extend a gesture. "You're just like your father described—feisty, stubborn, cute as hell."

"Cute is a six-year-old bouncing in the driveway on Friday the thirteenth, waving to Daddy as he drove off to get cookie dough ice cream." I crossed my arms over my stomach, cramming down the angry grief I despised.

A dense silence enveloped us until Ronan whispered, "I'm sorry, Aria."

"He lied to me. Deserted me and my mother, left us destitute, broke my freaking heart." My tears had dried up for my father long ago, and I'd only cried twice since the day he'd left. At that moment, divulging the deepest dregs of my life, I almost ended the drought.

I ground my back teeth. No! I refused to surrender so easily. Not after learning of his betrayal. Fury wiped the sorrow from my heart so painfully my breath hitched. I pressed my fingers to my mouth. The timing of our conversation sucked. I wanted to be two hundred percent lucid when Ronan gave me the goods on my father, and why a five-million-dollar bounty hung over my Goldielocks. And how did my father know about my telekinesis?

I touched the back of his hand. “If you hurt, betray, or lie to me, I’ll hex you six feet under.” I hadn’t figured out how to hex someone, but I was working on it. Of course, I only had to wait for my unluck to handle it for me.

“I figured that was the lay of the land.” He massaged the spot I touched as if he wanted to buy the slightest bit of contact he could afford. “I had no clue I was rescuing a killer.” His lips ruffled up at the corners.

My bitterness skated out on my laugh. “Yesterday, I couldn’t kill a pesky fly. Look at me now. One dude in the hospital, a dead man or two. What’s next? Am I a secret killing machine? Thirteen curses and I’m dead?”

Ronan dipped his head. “If you only knew,” he murmured clear enough for me to catch his drift.

I swallowed the egg-sized lump in my throat, cracked open the door. “Is the dog friendly?”

“Yes.” He unfolded his large, sinewy body from the front seat. Gravel crunched loudly beneath his boots in the still night.

Easing into the pitch-black night, I gingerly planted my boots on the ground. Unafraid of dogs, I just didn’t want to step in any little presents that might stink up my shoes. The tail-whipping lab loped over to me and waited on its haunches. It seemed too well behaved for a puppy. Threads of energy wafted off the pup and skimmed through my aura like slivers of cool, luminous moonlight. The dog’s energy flitted around me similar to an unshielded psychic. It was cozy, exploratory, a light sifting of the hair on my arms, my special brand of psychic sensitivity. I’d only experienced that sensation from a human. Unease slipped over me as if I hovered in the stargate to the Twilight Zone.

“Let her sniff your hand,” a male voice crackled from the porch. “She won’t hurt you.”

Silhouetted in the doorway, within the shadows of the porch light, stood another tall hunk. The mysterious Adam, I presumed. The puppy swung its tail, swishing pine needles on the ground. My sight adjusted to the dark and I reached toward the black pup. Cats were my specialty, but the puppy was adorable. Both guys watched me as though I had an initiation to pass. Love/y.

The puppy stretched its neck, sniffed my hand, its nose cold and wet. Goose bumps fled across my arms as my aura crashed into another band of energy. I patted the dog on its soft head, my fingers tingling against its silky fur. Kneeling on a bed of dry leaves, I looped my arms around the pup’s neck. She smelled of firs and spring meadows. The lab licked my cheek, its tongue sloppy wet. A freeze swept through purgatory as cat lover Aria bonded with a dog.

“Hi, baby.” It wriggled in ecstasy. I kissed her nose and stood up. The pup gave a croaky bark.

The guy looming in the doorway moved toward us into the shelter of darkness from the surrounding forest. “Her name’s Infinity. Fin for short.”

His low, melodious voice drove chills down my spine that quickly warmed and flooded me with... Heaven forbid, I squirmed. Suffice it to say, his voice skimmed my bare skin, simulating a lover’s hands, vibrating in parts of me that had no right to vibrate to a voice.

Even with a baseball cap low over his brow, I saw his eyes glow like an animal's at the end of a flashlight. The violet orbs mesmerized me, and the glow bathed me in the unimaginable. Heat dripped into parts of me that had suffered a cold front for a long season. My mind challenged my body's response to him, tried to dampen my smitten hormones. I'd never burned for another in such a sexual manner. Invasive and welcome, the sensations both excited and frightened me.

I managed to close off my mind to his coercion and conquered whatever mesmerism he nailed me with. His violet eyes changed from emerald to teal to azure before the glow petered out. The stranger didn't possess an evil or harmful nature from what I sensed. He touched my arm but I withdrew a step, bumping into Ronan. I hoped Ronan would jump in if his friend meant to harm me. Of course, he could've led me into a trap as I skipped along on a suicide mission. One thing for sure, Adam possessed a strange breed of ESP I was certain wasn't documented anywhere. I'd stumbled upon the motherlode of criminal activity that night.

Fin leaned against my leg, lending me comfort only an ally offered. And I needed all the allies my love could buy. "What's going on?" I finally asked. A breeze breathed across my shoulders, shifting the tips of my hair. Trees stirred in the wind, and papery dry needles showered us in more death. The air carried the scent of Christmas trees rounding the bend toward Easter lilies.

The pup sidled toward Adam, looked over its shoulder, and waited for me to follow.

"Let's go inside," Ronan said. "It's been a hellish night."

"I'll bet." Adam's voice crackled again, no longer sinking inside my soul, lacking the layers that first skimmed my flesh. He extended his hand, this time with no pretenses. "Adam Freshfields." His cultured voice and manner along with the McMansion fit the life of the privileged.

Wary, I hesitated to touch him. However, my inflamed body screamed at me to take more than his hand. To its indignation, I ignored my fickle body and allowed my faltering mind to shift the gears. His fragmented aura joined Ronan's aura still teasing mine.

Fin gave another one of her short affable yaps, which I took as approval. I'd have to sleep with one eye open if my cats ever found out I accepted affirmation from a dog.

I inhaled deeply and grasped Adam's hand. "Aria Elle Walker."

"I know." His tone held a smile the darkness hid.

He led me through the dark, his aura wrapped around mine, merging within it and Ronan's aura surrounding me. Since when could an aura meld with someone, let alone two people? I derived aural energy from other people, but I just absorbed it like oxygen. I never felt it because my aura always dominated. What was happening to me?

An owl hoot splintered the night's tranquility, and I tripped on the first porch step. The screech of a bird of prey grated across the back of my neck as Adam caught me against him. I wished I could fly off into the night and ease the horror crimping my intestines.

Ronan stopped in the doorway. "You've only touched the tip of the iceberg tonight."

Mechanically, my fingers tightened on Adam's hand. "I kinda figured that out all by my little self."

My cheerful tone fell flat even to my ears.

Ronan nodded, pinched-lipped as ever. “Things will get worse.”

“Before they get better?” You’re just full of ominous clichés, aren’t you? “I get it.”

Adam squeezed my hand, released it. “What he’s trying to tell you,” he interjected, “is that my appearance may unnerve you.”

“You’ve already mesmerized me with multihued glowing eyes.” I tapped an index finger on my chin. “What’s one more link on the chain of weird?”

A random thread of Adam’s aura spilled outwards and dissolved on the brick porch, as if his aura was dying bit by bit. “Look at me, Aria. Here or in full light.”

Brushing my shoulder against Ronan’s chest, I forced him inside the woodland mansion. Fin raced to her bed beside a stone fireplace. A fire snapped and popped, spitting crimson and amber flames, its heat luring me closer. Adam voice-commanded the ceiling light to turn on, adding near daylight brilliance to the great room.

A triangular gouge in the polished hardwood floor drew my dread. Without squandering the last iota of endorphins this bizarre night had instilled in me, I faced Adam.

My gaze traveled his length, feet upwards. Loose khakis encased muscular thighs, slim hips, and a rumpled long sleeve dress shirt clung to an oddly familiar rippling abdomen and broad chest. Then I saw the skin of his hands. My smile died. A gray-violet cast tinted his skin. Dude, the sun shines in California, even in winter. Rent a tan.

The faint odor of fruitwood smoke irritated my nostrils and I tweaked my nose with a knuckle. I pressed my other hand against the hard knot forming in my stomach as my gaze honed in on his face.

He looked like Ronan’s identical twin, after a dip in a pool of bleach. And so much more.

My fried eyes blurred. “I’ve had enough of today.” Without waiting for an invite, I staggered toward a soft chenille couch in the center of the room.

Chapter 4

I awoke in a humongous bed, a heavy jewel-tone comforter knotted around me. Sunlight filtered through angled blind slats on one wall, which I gathered opened to a view of the woods and the muted creek gurgling and splashing nearby. I slanted a bleary glance at the clock. Already noon, I'd slept the morning away as if my problems didn't include extinct sorcerer twins and a psychic pooch. Oh, yeah, count the Scrambler's murder in my condo and Murph in his time-capsule suit. Oh, God. A groan slipped out and I rubbed my temples as the events of last night flooded my foggy brain.

After I'd crashed on the couch, Adam Freshfields guided me halfway-to-dead to the master bedroom, the only bedroom with a lock on the door. He'd chucked a couple of logs on the toasty fire in the bedroom and locked the door on his way out—not locking me in, but locking them out at my insistence.

Who was Adam Freshfields? Why did he look so like Ronan—if you looked past the corpse pallor—but have a different last name? Ronan had called Adam his friend, not brother.

Wary, I brushed my fingers over my stun gun under the pillow, glad it was still part of my arsenal. Shock shivered down to my toes as the realization sank in that I'd allowed myself to sleep in a house with two strangers. I slept deeply too, which begged me to believe my gut instincts that they had no nefarious plans to hurt me. Adam and Ronan's auras tangoed so sweetly with mine, as if we were three parts of a whole. I never sensed a threat. In fact, the warmth of their protection and want wafted over me. Not wanted because of my strange abilities, but desired as part of a threesome. "Yeah, did I just think threesome?" I muttered. I'd never experienced that rash of aural warmth from anyone, not even my beloved mother and grandmother.

Refreshed energy vibrated along the sleepy nerve endings in my brain. My telekinetic receptors were working overtime to connect to Ronan and Adam in that strange way I'd experienced last night.

The air outside the covers was frigid, the fire stone-cold ash. I stretched out my legs, plucking the covers to my chin. My clothes lay in a heap on an overstuffed armchair by the windows. My travel bags sat between closed double doors and a carved mahogany dresser that matched the nightstands and four-poster bed. Seascape paintings in settings from dawn's hazy light to star-spangled midnight's ink covered the taupe walls. All painted by the same artist—someone I'd love to bribe. My condo had yards of wall space desperately begging for splashes of color. I might be a digital art student at San Jose State University, but wall art wasn't exactly my specialty.

Rubbing my icicle arms, I worked the circulation from wrist to elbow, mentally preparing for the nightmare beyond the doors.

High-pitched yapping joined scratching paws on the door, alerting me to Fin's presence. My head began to ache anew. Morbid thoughts of the dead men rose to the forefront of my mind. Focusing on Ronan, Adam, or Fin was far easier to process, even though they were all related, all a circuit on the same memory board. Fin whined and scratched again, forcing me to tackle the here and now.

Adam shushed her from behind the door. "Leave off, girl."

"It's okay." Stun gun wrapped in my fingers and teeth chattering, I shoved off the comforter and ran to unlock the door. Without breaking stride, I dashed back to the bed and snuggled under the covers. "She can come in."

"You don't know what you're asking," Adam said in that curious flat monotone. "She hogs the bed."

The dimple my body made in the gargantuan bed earned my head wobble. "Let 'er rip." I piled up the pillows and leaned against the headboard.

Fin scrambled on the hardwood, sliding to the rug at the foot of the bed, landing with all four legs skewed like a newborn foal learning to stand. She—I refused to call Fin it—passed me a dog's equivalent look of acute embarrassment. More human expressions than...well...Ronan flashed across the dog's mug. Taking stock of her dignity, the pup leapt onto the bed. Barely palpable now, Fin's weirdo energy felt more like an old comforting friend.

Adam remained in the doorway, and I hesitated to confront him either verbally or visually. You know what they say about De Nile being a river. With my mind buried in my surroundings, I pretended my life hadn't flipped topsy-turvy, nor did I reside in the home of the lighter half of twin sorcerers who impersonated a human-sized, wingless fairy. The quick glimpse I'd stolen of Adam after I'd arrived had tattooed itself on my brain. I had a credible hunch he wasn't dressed up for Halloween.

Fin's earthy energy raised the hairs on my arms into a gentle sway. I'd never heard of psychic pets. Hell, with all the newfangled PSPs popping up, it wouldn't surprise me if all living beings on Earth had paranormal ability. No wonder the NUW government kept beefing up PSP law enforcement with their newly minted Paranormal Vice Division, PVD for short.

Fin snuggled against me, and I rubbed my cheek over her silky fur. Static waved her hair against my skin. "What's your story, little missy?"

Adam padded into the room, his weight sinking onto the edge of the bed. Scooting farther away, I feared looking at his face, scared to acknowledge my odd attraction to him. Afraid to confess I sensed a similar bond to Adam as I did to Ronan, despite the mesmerism stunt he'd pulled on me in the front yard. I scratched and rubbed my temple, trying to smooth out my confusion. As if they were two halves of a whole, I felt Ronan in Adam and vice versa. Worst of all, I feared the story, whether truthful or not, Adam and Ronan had yet to dump on me.

“Aria, look at me.” Adam’s low voice crept along my twitchy nerves.

My empty stomach clenched. Fin slobbered on my cheek, and I made a dodgeball play of slowly wiping my face on my shoulder.

Ronan sauntered in. “Room for one more?” he teased, a far cry from last night’s barbarian attitude. The tension in the room fractured.

The moment of reckoning had sprung. What was a girl to do when two gorgeous men wanted to leap into bed with her? I couldn’t be luckier sitting in a field of four-leaf clovers, not a number thirteen in sight.

Ronan set two steaming mugs of coffee on the accent table between the chairs. He opened the blinds and dappled sunlight brightened the room. His butt took up residence on one of the empty armchairs by the windows.

The scent of caffeine ambrosia drifted to me and my stomach purred. How’d he know caramel mocha was my downfall? I hooked my stun gun on my thong for lack of a better hiding place. Still hedging, I flung off the covers. Fin lay splayed on the comforter, as if waiting for a bowl of popcorn and the main feature to start. I swung my legs over the edge, wintry air hitting my bare skin. “If you’re trying to freeze me into an Otter Pop, you’re doing a stellar job.”

“Sorry,” Adam replied, his voice devoid of emotion. “I need cool air.”

Out of the corner of my eye, I watched him walk to the closet and pluck something off a hanger. I bucked up my resolve and jumped off the bed.

He froze, a gray sweatshirt dripping from his fingers. One second his skin glowed and his eyes shone brilliantly. Then it was if gray mist swallowed his vibrancy. That radiance had clued me in on his fae nature last night. No human ever gave off such innate, ethereal beauty. The fae had always fascinated me when I’d learned fairies and sorcerers were the last and strongest magical beings to roam Earth forever ago. Until now, it seemed.

I reached for the sweatshirt, my hand brushing against Adam’s hand. My crackling aura mingled with his the way it tangled with Ronan’s last night. Yet, he lacked something in his energy field, empty boxes that should be full. Parts of his body shimmered in and out of focus as if he fought with Satan to remain topside.

“Whoa,” I exhaled the word, fought my hand from its hormone overload and touching his solid, but faint right arm. “You’re disappearing.”

“I’m still here,” he said. “It’s some bizarre cloaking spell I tried that won’t stop trying to work.”

I tugged on the sweatshirt. Warm and smelling of fabric softener, it hung to my knees. I rolled the sleeves up to my wrists. Slowly, I raised a hand toward Adam’s face. “May I?” I didn’t know what compelled me, but my hands had to feel what my eyes were witnessing.

“Sure.” He smiled, shrugged.

Not a muscle budged as I stroked his cheek, traced the outline of his bones. His magical energy encouraged me to explore every inch of his muscular body. Did I just think that? Like I'd ever get the chance for a further arctic exploration. For now, I'd start with his face.

No hint of stubble marred his baby butt smooth chin. He had high cheekbones, a blade nose, and square jaw, mimicking Ronan's facial features. I traced my thumb over his dry full lips, the color of putty. My thumb dipped into the crevice to the left of his mouth that stretched to a dimple when he smiled. A dimple lacking on Ronan. His gray eyes were flat, the pupils a shade darker than the irises, fringed by translucent lashes. His eyebrows matched his hair, which changed from clear to lavender and gray to white. I couldn't tell if the color was changing or if all those colors tinted his hair.

His thick shoulder-length mane lacked sheen as if coated with powder, negatively setting off the wet-cement cast to his skin. If Adam weren't kicking it in front of me, I'd swear death had called. Yet, he was very much alive. Our mingled auras could testify to that in a court of law.

He smelled of pine and meadow, edging the scant scent of smoke from the room. Every time part of him wavered in and out of sight, the crisp and fresh scent strengthened. Beautiful to me in so many ways I couldn't explain, he was Ronan without the color of health and life.

I hugged my arms to my chest. His energy stroked my aura, leaving me in breathless confusion. Adam tucked an errant lock of hair behind his ear, and my gaze rested on his one ill-formed pointy ear. It looked as if Fin had nibbled on it at one time. His other ear was normal.

"I take it you're not a Vulcan?"

He smiled in a boyishly shy way, his dimple coaxing a spark of vibrancy to his features. "Star Trek fan?"

"More of a Star Wars fan." I had a gazillion questions. Corralling my thoughts, I studied a moonlit seascape painting on the wall to his right. Completely non-confrontational, his magical energy—on him it could be called nothing less than magic—screamed for my attention.

Ronan watched as if waiting for us to jump each other and do the nasty in front of him like we were trying out for a porno flick. All we needed was popcorn, Milk Duds, and soda. I sensed no threat from Ronan either, even in the electricity that always seemed to bristle beneath his tanned skin. It was as if he also felt the strange aural bond and wanted to see where it tugged all three of us.

"What ESP do you have?" I sifted my fingers through kinks in my bedhead.

He patted down a lock of swaying hair floating toward me. "I've never had ESP...before this happened." He wanded his hand up and down in front of his delectable body. "Now...I'm not sure what abilities I have."

I tilted my head. "Mesmerism?"

He winked and his smile spread to a captivating grin in response to the coil of energy I accidentally released. I about dissolved into a puddle. I hunched into the sweatshirt, hiding my body's betrayal.

"Okay, so we're done with the show part of show and tell." I forced a glance over my shoulder at somber Ronan. "Let's get on with the telling part."

Adam's aura fell flat, knocking the air out of me. I staggered, my eyes threatening to shoot nails at his lack of finesse in dealing with our intertwined energies. His form solidified as if humanity won that particular battle, the war still up for grabs.

He gripped my shoulders, steadying me. "Sorry. You okay?"

I eased away with a conciliatory smile. "Warn a girl, will ya?" My aura recoiled, leaving me bereft, as if someone had stolen a cherished keepsake out of my hands and flung it into the fireplace.

Adam's throat bobbed. "I'm still learning...still getting used to—" He dug his hands in his front pants pockets, shot a glance at Ronan.

I pulled the sleeves of the sweatshirt over my freezing fingers. "What are you, twenty-one, two?" With a tween's lack of control over extreme energy. His and Ronan's auras, and mine for that matter, were beyond calculation if we could meld together. Fascination zoomed through me.

Ronan rose from his chair, a cup of coffee in one hand. "Twenty-one, same as me, you. We think he may also be descended from the fae," he paused for emphasis, "and immortal. He may have a long time to grow into his powers."

"Blood of one of the Forbidden," Adam said hesitantly, gauging my response.

My hand slinked southward to rest on my stun gun. Shit was getting real. Hazily, I recalled my paranormal history class from high school. The powers-that-be at the time of the Abolishment had called anyone with magic the Forbidden. The Forbidden included witches, fairies, and sorcerers. All magical races had been extinct for centuries. If Adam was fae, then Ronan probably was too. If Ronan and I had the same telekinesis, was I part fairy or just...what? A sorcerer? The hollowness inside me tingled as if my body was ready to accept my true self. Or was I overreaching into the land of delusion?

Laughter erupted, a crazed sound I tried to push down. I pinwheeled my arms wildly. "I'm being punked right? Where's the camera?" Hot anger bubbled up my chest, and my blood pressure shot to stroke zone.

Adam sank onto the bed, his sadness riding the air. He balled his ashen hands into fists on top of the comforter.

Time to schedule my brain surgery. My self-loathing became a palpable anchor in my aura. "Oh, God." I pressed my fingers on my eyelids. "I'm sorry."

"You've got nothing to be sorry about," Ronan replied softly. "It's my fault Adam's the way he is." He handed me a cup of coffee, the warmth barely penetrating my icy fingers.

Adam laughed roughly. "He'd love to believe he's all that powerful."

I sipped the coffee, savoring the caramel on my tongue, rinsing away the acid of epic confusion. "You promised to tell me everything." I had to exert mental pressure to prevent my energy from leaking out to party with Ronan's aura. I usually didn't have to fight to keep tabs on the stuff. It was normally instinctive. Yet, I'd never experienced anyone who oozed energy like Ronan and Adam.

"Clean up and we'll eat." Ronan finger-combed his damp hair, triggering a waft of citrus shampoo.

“I’ll warm the kitchen for you even if I have to strip to stand the heat.” Adam rose, tugged his wavering hair over his pointy ear.

A hot and cold shiver raced up my back at the idea of a naked Adam. He shared Ronan’s bodybuilder physique, but with skin tone that’d send the unwary into a mental freakout.

“Okay.” My stomach rumbled in loud agreement, and I mentally slapped it to and fro for intruding in the conversation.

They left the room and I locked the door behind them. Fin hopped off the bed, her toenails clacking on the hardwood floor behind me. I spun around. “A little privacy, huh?” I stooped and ruffled the fur on her neck, her cow eyes going round and sorrowful.

“Okay,” I said with fake exasperation. Dog voyeurism was the least of my problems. “Come in and keep to yourself.”

The pup stretched out in front of the tub, stared at a tiny splotch of crystalized tree sap on the slate floor, her mug averted. Okay, maybe she did get human-speak.

I turned on the tub water, squirted in lavender bubble bath I found under the sink. Swishing the water around, I dug deep into the box in my mind labeled NUW History 101. Unfortunately, the Ancient History 101 box had gotten lost somewhere while my mind tried to comprehend my ridiculous reality. History had never been my favorite subject.

A sigh escaped me as I sank into hot, bubbly heaven in the sumptuous jetted tub. Heat turned my muscles into mush. I drew forth the boring history lesson to satisfy that niggling doubt. There was a reason why the world had originally abolished the Forbidden, and it’d cropped up again during the change to the NUW reign.

Twenty-two years ago, the world experienced a cluster of harmless earthquakes on every fault line known to man and then some. It took years for the geologists to yank their heads out of their respective butts and cough up some fib no one believed that a series of new ley lines—invisible lines of earth energies—had exploded from the tremblers. Supposedly, the “lines” spat out a ton of harmless energy, triggering latent ESP in people who hadn’t otherwise exhibited paranormal abilities. More and more cases of psychic sightings kept the police and governments busier than a queen bee serving her horny swarm. Most other scientists didn’t believe it and still searched for answers to this day.

Scientists and paranormal fanatics went berserk and had warned the governments what would happen if they didn’t slap shackles on the newly minted PSPs. They’d reminded the governments that pre-Abolishment days would seem like cake compared to the magical threats to the enormous 21st century population. They’d demonstrated mock horror scenarios of what would happen if PSPs were given free rein to use their increasing abilities at the drop of fly spit. It scared PSPs into hiding, even when the government couldn’t prove telepathy, telekinesis, or the like was Forbidden magic.

“Congratulations on the birth of the New Urban World.” I sighed as the history emptied out of my brain, leaving more questions than answers.

After what seemed like hours of pure pampering in the luxurious marble bathroom, I left it, refreshed and invigorated. I donned my favorite jeans with a hipster topping black and pink sweater. My stun gun accessorized a belt loop. Black riding boots topped off my ensemble of comfort. Maybe unicorns existed in this fantasyland and the boots might come in handy.

Fin and I stepped into a cozy reading loft overlooking the great room. I didn't even remember passing through it last night. Male voices rose up from the first floor beyond the swirly wrought iron railing. I trudged down the hardwood stairs. The thirteenth step emitted a squeak loud enough to awaken the rest of the Forbidden.

Ronan peeked around an arched doorway. "She's alive." The darker color of his left eyebrow lent him a natural mocking expression.

"Funny, ha fricking ha." A ghost of a smile passed my lips as I strode under the archway into the kitchen.

Adam waved his arm at the expansive table centered in the dining area. Afternoon sun streamed through the kitchen windows and set off a faint shimmer around him, transforming his skin tone to opalescent.

Burying my head deep, I pressed on my severely deprived stomach. Pancakes, sausage, toasted English muffins, and juice met my bulging stare. Adam might make a lucky lady very happy one day. I sat in the chair he pulled out. With a flourish, he set an empty plate in front of me and unfolded a cloth napkin on my lap.

French doors and floor-to-ceiling windows filled two dining room walls. Puppy nose prints smudged the bottom panes on the doors. The room overlooked a stunning redwood and conifer forest beyond a clearing of wintergreen bushes and a meandering creek. Maybe I'd get the chance to shoot pictures on my smartphone. I never knew what jewelry design a client might request. Flora and fauna were prominent in my enamel charms, the job that put food on my table while I finished college. I touched my handmade pendant, the small rose and the bigger rose growing out of a heart represented Mom and me.

Fin trotted into view along a bed of battered purple pansies bordering the circular driveway. She lifted her leg and oh so delicately watered them.

I heaped a bit of everything on my plate, smothering it with butter, jellies, and syrup. "Your dog's got serious gender issues." The smorgasbord beat the fruity protein smoothies I usually sucked down for my morning energy boost.

Adam chuckled. "Don't let her hear you say that."

A moment later, the swing of a doggy door creaked in the kitchen, and toenails clicked on the hardwood floors into the dining room. My new best friend sat on her haunches beside me.

As I grabbed the salt shaker, I accidentally rolled two sausage links onto the floor. Fin attacked them like a starved wolf in winter. I tested the holes in the shaker and the lid fell off, spilling a mound of salt on my palm. Crap on toast. I tossed a pinch over my left shoulder, hoping to ward off bad luck.

Adam handed me an empty plate to dump the salt on. "Sorry about that." Eyebrows fused into a V on the bridge of his nose, he examined the shaker.

Stifling a smile, I looked at my watch. Thirteen after the hour. Enough said. Slowly, I cut my pancake into bites, waiting for the guys to start eating. Call me paranoid about eating meals prepared by paranormals. As soon as I saw them shovel food into their mouths, I inhaled two sausages, and drowned it with orange-pineapple juice. I pointed my fork at Ronan.

He clanked his coffee mug on the wood tabletop. "Suppose you want answers."

Part of me did. The other part was halfway out the door. I studied Adam's ethereal features and knew in my heart that whatever set off the hunt for me was linked to his...issues. I grew clammy just thinking about an unknown future and the things Ronan knew about my father and me. It was bad enough my life seemed to revolve around Ronan and Adam. Our auras had converged the moment I entered the dining room and continued to play hide and seek around us.

The bond with Adam and Ronan reached into every crevice of my aura. It was one bond with two similar halves, not two bonds, which freaked me out. How could two people have an identical aura? Or maybe Ronan's aura overpowered Adam's and I only sensed the one. If they weren't twins, what were they? Cloning experiment gone haywire?

Thoughtful, I bit into a strawberry jam slathered English muffin and chewed. Swallowing roughly, I addressed Ronan, "Start at the beginning. How you knew my father. What he did and why. Who your father is and why you want to stop him. Why everyone is hunting me. Why you and I..." I skimmed Adam's face, tried to gauge his knowledge of secret clubhouse things.

"Why you and Ronan have weird telekinetic powers?" Adam wiped his mouth on a napkin.

The question lingered in the air for a moment. "Right. Are there more of us? Why does Adam look like a half-human fairy corpse?" I gave him an apologetic look. "Sorry, no offense."

He chuckled, short and grim. "Like I don't already know it."

Ronan and Adam exchanged a sly meaningful look. I hated being in the dark. Honestly, I wasn't a control freak or anything, but if something affected me, I needed to know about it.

"You want to know why the three of us are magically connected," Ronan added in a gloomy voice geared to plant the fear of Hades in me.

And magically delicious. I licked syrup off my bottom lip. "Damn straight." Spearing a sausage link on the serving plate, I left my fork sticking in the air.

Adam's back tensed against the chair, his hair spiraling around him like smoke tendrils. Ronan muttered, his tangible aura causing my hair to flutter and crackle as though I'd stuck my finger in a light socket. I leaned back, my arms folded across my chest for the reality show of fairy tales.

Ronan's fork clanked on his plate as he angled his chair to view me better. "Ever heard of a company called Dominion Research?" I shook my head. "My father's pride and joy." His nostrils flared in disgust.

Ronan's aura suddenly erupted, jealously driving Adam's energy off me. The tiny electrical zaps didn't hurt much, but they bothered the heck out of me. I clenched my focusizer. Using my telekinesis, I slugged Ronan's energy and coaxed Adam back into the ménage. I'd never done that before, but it worked. Relief coasted down my shoulders and relaxed the taut muscles in my arms.

Ronan wiped the nape of his neck. "What'd you do?"

"Your aura threatened." I shrugged. "I deflected."

Ronan looked bewildered. "No, I didn't."

My exasperation lashed out in a cool aural wave. "You projected stinging energy all around me."

Adam plucked a lock of hair off his eyebrow. "I felt it too. You shoved my aura away from Aria." His hand disappeared for a blink as it morphed into his swaying hair.

Ronan leaned forward, his jaw thrust out. "I don't feel Aria. I'm deliberately containing my spastic telekinetic energy. When she's near, I have a tougher time controlling what little ability I have left."

Obviously, you have no control. I pinned my sight on Adam. "You felt him, right? You feel me?"

Adam nodded, swatting at the lock of hair that swung over his eye again.

"I feel both of you, sort of." I clicked my frosty pink nails on the table, looked pointedly at Ronan. "Who can you feel?"

"No one." Sweat dotted his forehead. "I'm not projecting anything outward." He shoved his chair back and stood as stiff as the redwoods outside. Caustic electricity bristled off him.

Then I guess your power's slipping out your oh so fine ass. Suspicion flickered through my head. I channeled more energy to fight off his thorny aura, pulling the Aria Special off my belt loop. Nothing I did halted his intangible attack. It overpowered Adam's aura again. "Are you sensitive to other ESPs?" A bead of nervous perspiration trickled between my breasts.

"No, just a plain telekinetic, like you."

Proof is in the chocolate pudding. My agitation escalated as well as the heat up my neck. Thank my lucky charm I wasn't absorbing his creepy energy or Adam's tainted magic, for that matter, despite the bond we shared. Or was I and I just didn't feel it?

As Ronan's irritation swelled, it felt like he was dragging his feet in the desert, touching every inch of me.

Chapter 5

The hot prickles multiplied, causing me to sag in my chair. “Ronan, you’re not holding anything back. I feel your energy attacking me.” I scratched my neck and flicked on my stun gun. An idea bloomed. “Go outside for a sec.” I pulled myself upright, dipped a napkin in my ice water, and patted my face.

Ronan scowled his way out the French doors. The farther he moved away, the more he lugged his irksome aural energy off me.

Cool relief trickled through my fiery body. “Better.” I threw Adam a smug look. “You?”

A puzzled smile curved his lips, brightening his dull violet eyes. “It’s just you and me, babe” he teased.

My heart hitched. The last thing I needed was an immortal, sick fairy-whatever in my life. Can we say oxymoron?

I waved Ronan back, and he entered the kitchen. Tingles swept up my neck and I scratched them away as more gave chase. “I don’t get it. Your telekinesis didn’t go psycho on me last night.” I cut Ronan a sly look.

Adam went outside and nothing changed. I motioned for him to return. My pulse quickened in response to Ronan’s intangible attack.

Ronan gestured toward the living room. “See if you can deal with me from there.”

I nodded. “Adam can hang here.” Adam’s energy wasn’t strong, but it hinted of happiness and luck, overshadowed by something that mimicked a layer of soot. His paranormal makeup was seriously flawed. I hoped it was reversible. I’d go bonkers if I lost my telekinesis, flawed or not, illegal or not.

Ronan paced in front of the picture window looking out onto the front yard where a large black SUV with ebony-tinted windows had replaced the Cadillac.

Ronan’s barbs finally ebbed. Log one more item in my Book of Bizarre to muse upon later. “It feels better. What’d you do?”

Tolerance masked his confusion. “Nothing.” He sat at the table again and pushed his breakfast plate aside. “Tell me if it gets bad again.”

“Count on it.” I tapped my fingernails on the tabletop. “You returned the Caddy to the casino?” I asked Adam as I hooked my stun gun on my belt loop.

“They’ll never know it was missing.”

I flicked a couple of crumbs off the polished wood table. Fin chased after them, toenails clacking, and she skid underneath the table. “Tell me how you know my father.” Ronan earned my solemn stare. In order to concentrate on the rest of his tale, I needed to check my father off the list.

A prickle of Ronan’s energy mixing with Adam’s and mine tingled around me, but it appeared to be our new norm. Fortunately, my pinkie hadn’t balked before Ronan’s aura attacked me. The normal sensations I experienced before a bad luck occurrence were second nature, but the pinkie twitch always alerted me to danger...and also granted me time to turn it around by focusing on my telekinesis. With enough notice, I could raise my telekinesis to thwart unlucky thirteen’s threats.

Adam began clearing the table, flatware clanging against pottery, making a racket only a male could make in the kitchen. Steam rose from water splashing in the sink, adding to the feverish sheen on his mottled face. Ronan crossed his arms over his broad chest, his biceps bulging. I licked my lips, squirmed in my chair. Damn, I loved muscular arms. His were double divine.

“Your father was Patrick Walker from Cork, Ireland?”

“Did you think I doubted you?”

He shrugged. “He and my father were college buds. They attended Dublin City University together.”

“What’s your father’s name?”

“Richard Riley.” Ronan’s gaze pierced my face for a sign of recognition.

The name meant diddlysquat. I didn’t know who my father had befriended in adulthood, let alone his youth. Another chain of missing clues of my real identity. “Go on.” I stretched out my legs, crossing my ankles, the nonchalant act belying my inner turmoil.

“About all I know. I was hoping you knew more. I think they were doing research together. There’s bad blood between them. I know that from the way your father threatened mine, hoping to score a big payoff and walk away.”

Adam clattered pots and pans into the dishwasher, the noise echoing up to the twelve-foot ceiling. The air grew unsettled and Ronan’s energy turned tickly. An awkward introspective hush reigned. Even Adam’s movements quieted.

Light flickered in my brain and a truth dawned sunshine bright.

I snatched my legs back, straightening my spine against the chair. “So your father is after me because my rat snake father gave him a dose of his own medicine?”

“Not exactly.” A growl rumbled in Ronan’s throat. His booted foot hitting the hardwood floor resembled a clap of thunder, adding an ominous air to the story.

Adam returned to his seat, anticipation schooling his features. Our three auras tangoed wildly. My skin smarted, on guard from further attack.

I picked at the cuticles on my right index finger, a nasty habit I usually reserved for boredom or indecision. Guess that didn't apply any longer. "What then?"

Uncertainty squeezed that part of my heart my parents—even my father—still owned. I tried to look away, but Ronan's troubled eyes revealed an indecision that seemed to torment him, and I couldn't break contact for fear he'd disappear and I'd never know. "What?" I fought down the scream in my voice. Just kill me now.

"Your dad came crawling to my father last year, couple million in debt. He said my dad owed him."

My stomach contracted. I held up a hand to preempt the torture I sensed coming, but Ronan took sharing as caring to heart. I'd asked for it.

"Your father threatened to expose him, me, and my abilities to the authorities if my father didn't pay up. My father broke him down and Patrick gave him the info he wanted to find you. Your dad walked away with four million." His voice lowered. "Then my father had him killed. He thought Patrick too big a risk to his plans. He knew too much."

I wanted to cover my ears, but sat on my hands to prevent them from exercising their independence from my brain.

"The dead man in your condo pulled the trigger." He paused, as if waiting for a fencepost to speak. "And here you are."

Abandoned and betrayed? And I didn't even know why Dad had left us all those years ago. I dropped my head between my knees, battling sudden dizziness. Ronan thrust a glass of water at me, knocking it against my hand. I held the cool glass to my cheek.

"He's a screwed up bastard, Aria. He'll do anything to get what he wants."

"Your slimy father or mine?" I patted my eyes dry with a napkin, lifted my head.

"Mine."

Adam shot me a sympathetic look, but I didn't get all warm and fuzzy about offing the enforcer in my condo, even though he was collateral damage that probably deserved to die.

Ronan leaned forward and picked at a scab on his palm. "My father was livid. I don't know all the details of what happened between him and your dad. But that's when he cranked up his efforts to locate you, supposedly with the intel your dad dropped on him."

The remains of my heart splintered under the weight of too much knowledge. I threw up my hands. "What does your father want from me so badly that he'd pay my father a fortune, then bury him six feet under?" I asked the only question I might find an answer to from the dark and light twins in the room. "I'm a measly telekinetic. He didn't even know it!"

Adam contemplated the dishes stacked on the counter, tapping his fingers on the tabletop. "You aren't simply a telekinetic."

Welcome to Tongue-tied City. "Excuse me?" My disdain not only leaked into my words, it painted the sneer of all sneers on my face.

Ronan shrugged his hands. "People with extrasensory perception became stronger after the earthquake event twenty-two years ago. Kids born with ESP within a year of the quakes are the strongest according to my dad's extensive research. Not only can you and I manipulate mind, matter, and energy from our telekinetic ability, we're pulling energy from everyone, everything around us, which enhances our telekinesis and gives us this abnormal ability to manipulate all the energy from external sources, people, the earth, and not just from our own brain wave energy. Makes our abilities stronger." He paused and stared at my face as if waiting for the fencepost to burst into flames. "Like the ancient sorcerers. Like the Forbidden Thirteen." His voice lowered to a stage whisper. Fin nosed Ronan's arm, as if providing solace, and he gently pushed the dog away, rejecting her as if he didn't want to infect her with his delusions. "Although I think you can manipulate a lot more energy than me." He tipped his head, popped his neck joint. "Right now, I can barely bend a hair with or without you negating me."

Was he kidding? Could he really manipulate earth energy in addition to people energy? Could I? I thought I had only been harvesting aural energy from people. Did we really have the blood of ancient sorcerers? Surely, the sheriff of Cuckoo Town's on the hunt for him, right?

"What do you mean the Forbidden Thirteen?" A cold sweat slicked the nape of my neck. "Magic was eradicated. The Forbidden were banished. So what? I'm just a lousy telekinetic. If you tell anyone, I'm going to kill you. I won't go to jail for this shit you're spewing and loading the blame on me." Their silence told me otherwise. Oh, wait. "Your father's looking for anyone with magic to test to find your mystical Thirteen because he wants to freaking rule the world or something?" And if he tested me, I was doomed.

"Bingo. Give the lady a stuffed dog," Adam said. Fin snuffled and choked up a hairball, stared at it as if willing it to speak.

As Ronan's bright and shiny truth dawned, with increasing difficulty, I swallowed, my hands holding onto my stomach as if to keep Riley Senior away from me. "What the living hell on Earth does he need us for? What's he planning?"

"He needs us to properly open a gateway he found—the Rift—to the Realm of the Void to let the banished magic of the Forbidden return to Earth." Hunched over, Ronan rested his forearms on his thighs. "My dad thinks you and I together can open the Rift properly using our telekinesis to manipulate the energy keeping it closed. Once open, the Rift should function normally, the way it did way back when, allowing the banished magic to return to Earth. He wants to locate the descendants of the original Forbidden Thirteen, to control the returning magic...to control them."

A hiccupping laugh slipped out and I slapped a hand over my mouth. Forcing a few calming breaths, I still had to smother a giggle. The Realm of the Void was a plane of nothingness between Earth and the Afterlife, which most people didn't believe in. Those that believed in it thought it was a place that existed in space, accessible through a space "portal." Stargate, anyone? There were obscure references to it in old history books as being a plane of existence where ancient magic originally stemmed from...and was banished to. Again, most people just thought it all a big hoax and that the Forbidden simply died off.

Vaguely, I heard Ronan say, “She’s speechless.”

Adam replied, “At least she’s not mad at you.”

“She thinks we’re cracked.”

“Do you blame her?”

“Are you guys off your meds?” Eyes slivered, I glared at them. Fin propped her paws on my knee and planted a sloppy lick on my chin. “Forbidden Thirteen, Rifts, Realm of the Void, and fairies. What’s next?” I grunted unladylike. “Zombies and vampires?”

“Demons too,” Ronan added.

“Possibly. Who knows?” Adam’s eyebrows quirked up, his hair shivering as he shrugged. “Doppelgängers?”

I played the game. “Werewolves and shapeshifters?”

“Definitely.”

Slack-jawed, my mind spun. Could they be any more mental?

“Flies are swarming.” Ronan flicked his hand in the air.

I quickly shut my mouth. “You guys aren’t tripping off the reservation?”

Both chuckled, their laughter stilted and somber, trying to find a skosh of humor in their horror. Ronan tipped his chair on its two back legs. Jerkwads. They had me going. I tightened my arms over my midriff as though to keep the mythical creatures from encroaching on Riley Senior’s primo bounty.

“You’re not kidding about the Rift, are you? Why do I get the distinct impression you’re gonna tell me something about these Rifts I don’t want to hear?”

Adam sobered from their little joke meant to ease my dread. “The Rifts were the doorways the government forced the thirteen most powerful sorcerers to use so they could cull any magical beings left on Earth and abolish magic. They sent all the sorcerers and fae, the last magical beings, into the Realm of the Void through the Rifts. Up to that time, Rifts always existed and allowed magic to flow between Earth and the Void, enhancing the powers of the fae and sorcerers on Earth. When the government figured out the Rifts were truly portals, they concocted their plan to get rid of magic once and for all. They had the sorcerers destroy all the Rifts, until there was one left. One final exit.”

I must have snoozed through paranormal history in high school. At that moment, Charlotte the spider was spinning nonsense in my skull, twisting all that I knew and all my zillion questions into a tangled web of horror.

“The Forbidden Thirteen, the strongest sorcerers alive, created doppelgängers in their likenesses in secret from a heavy mix of fae-sorcery magic, alchemy, changing blood and DNA, using the fae as their guinea pigs. The true identities of the original Thirteen weren’t a secret and they were able to use their fae doppelgängers to take their place in the Abolishment, sending them through the last Rift and permanently closing the gateway, while they stayed safe in their havens on Earth. A suicide mission,” Adam explained.

“Sounds like Frankenstein’s lab to me,” I muttered, trying to absorb their fantastical tale.

“The Thirteen faked out the government and went into hiding,” Ronan added. “It’s not documented for public consumption.”

“You and Ronan are direct descendants of the Forbidden Thirteen sorcerers,” Adam chipped in slowly, gauging my capacity not to go on a berserker killing spree.

I massaged my scalp, spurring my brain cells to perk up. “How do you know all this if it’s not documented?” I squinted at Ronan.

“My father has part of a secret book called the Illuminaria, where it’s all detailed. But he’s missing a chunk of the book. One of the Forbidden sorcerers wrote it in secret to record their history, magic, and the eradication, but over time, the book got split up and separated, until others began to piece it back together. It’s still not complete.”

I starting picking at the cuticle on my thumb, absorbing their maddening tale. “What else is in this mystical book?”

“It’s not mystical. Ronan’s seen parts of it in his father’s safe.” Adam’s hair sifted over the tabletop toward my hand.

“Everything about how to open and close the Rifts, how to control the Forbidden either physically or by using their blood in alchemy is in the book. Basically, how to rule the world either with magic or alchemy.” Ronan scrubbed his face.

My heart stopped. “Where are the missing pages of the book?”

Ronan locked eyes with mine. “Good question. My dad has enough of it to be lethal. He thinks your original Thirteen ancestor wrote the history, spells and alchemic potions, dismantled the book and hid the pieces.”

Holy crap on a crappy cracker. The shit was rising to my eyeballs. Ronan and Adam’s magic cascaded over me, a tingly meld of good and bad aural energy, filling my hollowness with both of them.

The muffled song of my phone blaring the latest alternative rock scattered our co-mingled energy. Our auras settled where they belonged, leaving me empty. I’d so forgotten the outside world that the ringing crashed me back into my sane and safe humdrum existence. Cripes, was that only yesterday?

I followed the tune into the living room where I’d abandoned my purse on the couch in my arrival trance. I rummaged inside my undisturbed purse for my smartphone, punched it on.

“Aria! Where are you? You okay? I’ve been calling you for forever.” Zoe lobbed the words at me, her sultry tone turning shrill with worry.

“Calm down. I’m okay.” A stack of leather-bound books resting on the end table drew my attention. I smoothed my finger over the embossed, worn leather of the top tome, Ancient History of the Magical World.

Ronan advanced, his stance fidgety, fingers extending and curling. I rested my hand on my stun gun, swearing to surgically attach the thing to my palm. He pressed into my side, his lips close to my ear, warm breath caressing my neck. Something weird and welcome tugged on my lower region, almost forcing me closer to him.

“Don’t say a word,” he whispered.

I backed away, seizing my own degree of personal space. My butt nudged the books, and the top three clunked to the floor, the first one opening to chapter thirteen, The Forbidden. I toed the book shut, hiding evidence of Ronan and Adam’s heritage and the dread rising inside me.

Zoe continued to bitch me out. “Your condo’s trashed...” Her voice faded off.

My stomach lurched. Ronan mouthed something at me, his arms straining the sleeves of his T-shirt. Adam tucked his fists into his pants pockets, a muscle in his square jaw throbbing.

I concentrated on Zoe rather than the two hulking whack jobbers from ancient sorcery town. “What are you talking about? Where are you?”

“In your condo. You didn’t show up for coffee and I got worried,” she said in her classic mile-a-minute fashion. “Girl, you need to hire a brain ’cause your place smacks of a white trash hovel.”

Panic jabbed my heart. I looked frantically at Ronan. My left pinkie kinked. Ah, criminy.

“Hang on a sec.” I swiped the mute button, thankful Zoe hadn’t invoked video to see the terror I couldn’t wipe off my face even with a bar of my favorite Belgian chocolate. “My condo’s been trashed. My best friend’s there.”

“Shit,” Ronan muttered, a stony mask of distrust clouding his features. “More of my dad’s henchmen.”

His aura showered me in sparks, and the cell phone slipped from my fingers. “Get. Away,” I managed to expel between clenched teeth, scratching at the fire licking my arms.

Without wasting a frown, Ronan exited stage left, slamming the front door behind his evil energy.

The stinging abated, and I snatched the phone off the Oriental floral rug. “I’d tell her to get out, but she’ll grill me,” I beseeched Adam before punching off the mute. “You still there?”

“Where are you?” Zoe demanded.

“At a friend’s.”

“Seriously?” The curiosity in her voice killed her initial surprise. “Wait. You don’t have any other friends.”

The new BFF ad was going viral tomorrow. “You’re a few jokes shy of a stand-up routine.”

A snarky giggle erupted over the phone. “You have got to scoop me on what went down with Michael last night.”

Adam clamped his palm over the receiver. “Ask her to meet you someplace just to get her out of there.”

An idea flowered. We normally met at the mall’s digital media store & coffee shop every weekend. So sue me for being a book whore. Of course, we worship coffee and shopping for all things girlie. I engaged speakerphone, suggested we meet in half an hour. About to hang up, I heard familiar door chimes in the background.

“Hey, someone’s at your door.” Zoe’s footsteps click-clacked across the tile floor, a haunting din in my ears.

My heart clogged my throat. “Don’t answer it,” I shouted.

“What’s the big frickin’ deal? Hang tight.”

“Zoe!” I stamped my foot. A faint male voice mumbled something.

“Aria’s not home,” she replied.

“Will she return soon?” asked the man with an unrecognizable Scottish accent.

My heart thumped in my ears. My left pinkie twitched again.

Caution trickled into Zoe’s voice. “Who’s asking?”

“Family friend.”

“I think not,” she taunted. “I know all her friends.”

I heard a sharp click, and then a thud hit the wall. Zoe’s cry erupted from the phone, setting off a mini riot in my ribcage. Furniture banged to the floor. Glass or porcelain smashed and tinkled onto the travertine tiles. Mom’s favorite vase?

“Aria Walker?” a man growled into the phone, then snarled in an explosion of rage.

The crack of a palm on skin and Zoe crying out thundered through my senses. I’d give up my puny life for Zoe. Not until I offed the person who hurt her, though.

“Aria Walker?” The man’s Scottish burr thickened. “I know it’s you. Your number’s on your friend’s caller ID.”

Adam and I locked eyes. He plucked the phone out of my hand. “Who the hell is this?” His formerly cultured, monotone voice mimicked arctic Ronan way too much.

“Where’s the psychic?”

Ready for an onslaught of negative energy, I ran to the front door and motioned for Ronan to return from where he waited beneath a scraggly oak at the far side of the front yard. His long-legged stride swallowed the distance in a blink.

I returned to Adam’s side. Hearing Zoe struggle and the man yell at her on speakerphone sent my adrenaline surging. My hand flew to my mouth and I stifled a savage cry.

“Riley?” The Scottish brute panted as if battling a tribe of Amazonians. “If you give up the Walker psychic, this one lives.”

Ronan snatched the phone from Adam. “Who the hell is this?” Steel encased his icy voice, and I shivered at the lethal protectiveness he exuded.

“I think you know.”

“Ian?” Ronan punched his fist into the entryway’s stone wall.

More laughter erupted from the phone, quickly chased by a struggle and another loud slap on skin. “You little bitch!” he shouted. “I’ll kill you if you don’t buck up.”

“Ronan, do something!” Fear vibrated through me.

Ronan held up a hand. “She’s an innocent, Ian. Let her go.”

“Not from where I’m standing. Not until I get what I want,” Ian taunted. “Stay in touch.” He laughed. The phone clicked off.

I raced to the end table and reached for Adam’s cell. Before I picked it up, he grabbed it from beneath my hand.

“No cops.” Adam pocketed the phone.

I spun on him, hands on my hips. “It’s time for real cops, not co-eds playing cops and kidnappers,” I said the last with a sneer directed at Ronan.

“My father has eyes and ears everywhere. The minute you call the cops and give up your location, he’ll have his minions on your lily-white ass in five minutes.” Ronan blanched, scrubbing his head with both hands.

Chapter 6

Slinging my purse over my shoulder, I dashed to the entryway, tripped over a rug, and caught myself on the stacked stone wall. “We’ll finish our convo on our rescue mission.” Acting as if I didn’t almost just bash my brains in, I squeezed past Ronan in the doorway.

He grabbed my upper arm before I clawed through the screen. “Hold on.”

I tried to shake him loose, but his grip was lethal. “Do you want another murder on your rap sheet?” I flung open the screen door, slamming it against a bench on the wraparound porch. A basketball hit an open box of dog treats and tipped crunchy nuggets into a tinkling lily pond. Sighing, I muttered, “Adam, I fed your fish.”

Ronan loosened his grip without releasing me, his face a roadwork of granite. “Ian won’t hurt Zoe. He needs leverage.”

“Screw leverage. Let’s go.” I pushed ineffectively against the mountain of testosterone. Willing my drumming heart to chill, I drew in deep, even breaths.

A muscle stood out in a ridge along Ronan’s jaw. “He won’t hurt her.”

I wrenched my arm again. Losing my footing, I staggered into the doorjamb, banged my funny bone against the stone wall, and caught my balance on the coat rack. Stars exploded in my vision. The sleeve tore on a defenseless windbreaker and the ripping grated on my ears. Dread surpassed my anger as I rubbed my throbbing elbow. “Okay, I get it. We’re wasting time.” Normally, with this kind of lame luck, I’d go back to bed and save the world from me. Not at the expense of Zoe, though.

Adam flew down the stairs, lugging my suitcases with him. “Ronan, grab our bags.”

I hadn’t noticed the two black overnight bags dumped in the foyer beside a planter until Ronan reached for them. “Where are we going?”

“San Jose, then Seattle.”

My eyebrows hiked up to my hairline. “You had that planned? I’m sure glad I got the text message.”

Ronan pushed out a weary sigh. “Did you think we were going to sit on our asses and tell campfire stories?” With stiff, jerky movements, he snatched up the two bags.

“Bite me, Ronan.” At least campfire stories wouldn’t strain his brain. I stomped down the three steps to land hard in the gravel. A jarring pain shot up my leg to my hip. If boredom set in, we could play connect the dots on my bruised body. Ignoring the new throb, I climbed into the SUV's front passenger seat.

"You wouldn't learn shit if we weren't stuck in this mess together." Ronan pitched the two bags into the cargo space.

Adam threw my bags on top and the hatch thumped shut. He climbed into the driver's seat and cranked the engine. Ronan folded his hulk into the back seat behind me, Fin settling next to him.

"You'd be sitting in a magic-deadened cell in Seattle if Ronan hadn't snatched you." Adam maneuvered the black beast off the tree-shaded property.

"Whatever." I held my palm up over the center console. "Give me my phone."

"I'm already calling Ian," Ronan snapped.

"Who's this Ian ass-wipe? Why the hell are we going to Seattle?" I didn't need to ask why my condo was ransacked after Ronan's declaration about the book. The hunters were up shit's murky creek without a paddle searching my condo.

"He's not answering."

I stewed, trying to wrap my mind around the idea of anyone wanting me so badly. "I'm waiting." I barely got the calm words past my clenched jaw. No sense in pissing off my two new boyfriends, again. I'd laugh at the absurdity if my circumstances weren't in the crapper. I twisted around and fixed Ronan with a laser stare.

Adam jetted onto the highway and sped up to change lanes around a snail-powered van. Adam and Ronan exchanged a conspiratorial look in the rearview mirror. Ronan dragged his hand over his face, swearing and muttering to his other self.

"We should be on our way to Seattle to snatch the Illuminaria and take down my father, instead of wasting time on his shitstorms here." Rubbing his twitching cheek didn't help his chronic condition. "Ian O'Rourke's one of my father's most trusted bounty hunters, same as Murph. He must've been looking for the Illuminaria too. Only a couple trackers were given that task."

"At the time of the quake cluster, a Rift that no one seemed to know about, except Ronan's father, opened up at Washington Park in Seattle," Adam explained. "Ley lines exploded all over Earth and caused the Rift to fracture and spew out magic. That's about the time we were all conceived. This Rift's far from the last original Rift in Ireland."

"Whoa." My mouth hung open. "How does Ronan's father know it's an actual Rift?"

"Everything about the Rifts is in the Illuminaria. He has gadgets that detect paranormal activity, and the park has the highest concentration of any place in the world. It all added up to what's in the book."

I didn't care for the rippling in my stomach, stemming more from rolling turns on a stuffed stomach than their word bombs. The implications of Riley Senior's bounty hunters tailing me had yet to reach a Category 10 Crapstorm. The seatbelt law didn't stop me from settling in a more comfortable position facing the back seat. However, I did need to keep my balance as Adam slung us around hairpin turns on the woodsy, tree-shrouded highway that separated San Jose and the Santa Cruz beaches.

“How many bounty hunters did your dad sic on me?” I asked. Ronan shrugged. “You don’t know? I thought you knew everything.” My sneer didn’t quite reach my voice.

Ronan whipped out my phone and hit redial. A few non-responsive seconds later, he slammed the phone on the seat.

Adam took another sharp curve, and I grabbed the console. I dug into my purse for my tin of mints, popping a couple in my mouth.

He cranked up the air conditioner. “Settle back and face forward. You’ll feel better.”

So perceptive, Adam really might make a great prince to a nice fairy princess. After a season in the tanning booth and a bottle of Miss Clairol, though.

“Zoe!” I bolted upright, smacking my knee on the bottom of the dash. A river of pain coursed down my leg bones. Another dot to connect. “She’s a telepath. I don’t want him testing her. He’ll want to keep her for his nefarious shits and grins.” I massaged my knee. “Give me the phone.” I practically knotted into a pretzel to apprehend my cell from the backseat thief.

“Dad won’t kill her, or want to keep her.” Ronan switched the phone to his left hand, farther from my reach. “At least not until he snags you.”

“Oh, that’s comforting.” Tears leaked from my eyes. Damn, not the tears. Until last night, I’d only ever cried when Mom and Granny had died. Oh, yeah, and when my rat snake father slithered out of my life. I yanked down the visor. My eyes had more lines in them than a fault line map of California.

Adam popped the glove box open to reveal a cache of napkins. I snatched a handful and blotted my face dry, wadding them in my fist. The drone of the beefy engine choked out the expansive silence. Breathing slowly, I counted to ten. I needed to get a grip, and fast. Traffic slowed to a crawl as we neared downtown San Jose, granting my emotions a reprieve.

Facing forward, I leaned my head on the headrest. “Isn’t your father hunting Adam too? Aren’t you twins, brothers, or cousins that the magic affected differently?”

“Not brothers. No relation.” The skin of Adam’s knuckles stretched white. If he paled any further, he’d be three days dead. “Only you two know I exist in this sickly form. Until six months ago I was a normal guy. No magic, no fairy look, just a regular human male.”

My heart dived into my unwelcoming stomach. Not twins? “Then...” Aria Elle Walker was at a loss for words. Stop the world from revolving. Oh, holy hell. “You’re doppelgängers. Like the beings sorcerers created from the fae back in the day.”

Adam nodded. “We don’t know how it’s possible. We took blood tests and our DNA doesn’t match. You’ve heard the theory that everyone has a double somewhere? Some were created by magic and alchemy by the sorcerers. Our bloodlines have carried the magic down through the ages.”

“Sure,” I replied, never believing in that old myth. Until that moment.

having similar physical or physiological characteristics. They may have complimentary attributes, or opposite attributes.”

“Like what?” Moisture formed on my flushed face.

Ronan gripped the back of my seat. “One might be cruel, the other kind.”

“Or one might possess magic ruled by his psyche, his innate telekinesis,” Adam added, “and the other, magic pulled from earth energies. But there’s a bond between them.”

“But the sorcerer-created doppelgängers were eradicated and booted through the Rift,” I nearly accused, their story getting weirder and weirder by the minute.

As the vehicle flew down the freeway off-ramp, I grabbed the door handle to keep from sliding off the leather seat. Slowing, he merged into the late afternoon downtown traffic.

Adam gave Ronan one of their boys’ club peeps in the rearview mirror.

“So we thought,” Ronan interjected in his grumpy voice. “There’s nothing about them in the Illuminaria. At least not in the part my father has. It only talks about the banished ones. We kinda believe the original Thirteen just didn’t stop their alchemy when everyone was abolished. Or fae-doppelgänger magic is spewing out of the crumbling Rift.”

“Or I’m an anomaly.” Adam chuckled wryly.

My head ached. “What would Ronan’s father do if he knew about Adam?”

“We’d all be in cages locked up tighter than Hannibal Lecter.” Adam’s low voice spread horror through my system.

A terrible sense of his bitterness hit me. Traffic snarled ahead. Adam braked hard and we screeched to a standstill. I braced my hands against the dash, preventing further bodily damage. The heat of his ailing body seared my skin. As fast as Adam’s bitterness erupted, a barbed thread of suspicion worked its way inside my gut. I drew a deep breath, forbade myself to get sick. Like my stomach ever obeyed my brain.

“Are you sure Richie Riley doesn’t know?” I raised my eyebrows at Adam, refusing to look at the source of mistrust behind me. “Maybe Ronan’s drawing you out into the open and they’re hunting you and me?” Hopefully it wasn’t true, because I needed someone to believe in besides an extinct fairy-sorcerer doppelgänger.

In a flurry of motion, Ronan lunged forward and flicked the latch on my door. The door flew open and my scream followed it. I scooted halfway on top of the center console, shaking with a mix of fear and disgust. My uncontrollable energy stabbed at Ronan, but it flared blind and shattered against his defective aura. Fire ants seemed to chomp on me as he lashed a barrage of tainted energy at me that did nothing but scrape my skin.

“Hey! Did you snort stupid dust?” I punched his arm.

“Get out. You’re on your own.” A dangerous cruelty laced his words.

Adam swerved to the curb amid the blare of a piercing horn behind us. The impact of him hitting the brakes swung the door closed with a bang that vibrated in my eardrums. Ronan hopped out and opened the front door, steam practically spiraling from his blotchy red neck.

“Knock it off, man.” Adam thrust the gearshift in park.

I jumped out on wobbly legs. Ronan’s fury drizzled over my skin in an eruption of molten nails. I prepared to go hillbilly apeshit on him.

“I’m done with you. Go back to the zoo,” I snarled, triggering raised heads from the group of people waiting at a bullet train transport stop. My hand quaked as I thrust it toward him. “Give me my phone. I’ll rescue Zoe on my own.”

“Get in the car.” Exasperation dripped from Adam’s voice. He skirted the front of the SUV, held out his hand to me.

Ronan crammed into the front seat, closing us out of his teensy world. The assault on every pore of my skin downshifted to a tolerable level.

Drained physically, emotionally, and mentally, too much had happened in the last day to upset my boring, secure world. Ronan’s attitude and magic problems were collateral damage I could live without. The man robbed me of my wits. At least I hadn’t spent half my life napping in front of an ion shield the way he had. I could get my wits back. Him, not so much.

I shuffled my boots through faded mulch in the planter between the street and sidewalk, kicking the smirking yellow head off an early dandelion. Not knowing what to do, I grabbed Adam’s outstretched hand. He tugged me into his arms, and his warm hands stroked my back. I laid my cheek against his chest. Heaven help me, but that damn aural connection placed Adam squarely into über-friendly territory. His chest hitched beneath my cheek, and the tightness in his hard body pressed against mine, sharing Ronan’s sinfully muscular body. Two doppel-peas in a pod.

“Ronan has one nice personality, but not for a human.” I sniffed.

Adam swept a strand of hair off my eyelashes. “His father killed his mother a year ago,” he said somberly. “Murph from your casino altercation executed Riley’s orders. Ronan recently found out. He’s dead serious when he says he wants his father destroyed.”

My spine stiffened. I craned my neck to look up at Adam’s downturned face. His baseball cap shadowed his unnatural complexion, granting him a semblance of color. “Seriously?”

“Riley will destroy yours and Ronan’s life if he captures you, or any of us.”

Ronan glowered at us. I eased out of Adam’s arms, unsure why I felt the need to separate, but a naked vulnerability in Ronan’s eyes gave me a cracked mirror into his soul. At that moment, his soul called to me even though he’d thrust me away.

“Hey.” Adam thumbed up my chin. “We need you. I need you. I think you can help me return to normal or figure out what my new normal is.”

I smiled wanly. “Did you guys think I fell for that protecting the damsel in distress act?”

Adam chuckled. “Not really.”

Silent, we climbed into the vehicle. Ronan ignored us, his arms crossed defiantly over his chest, dark gaze fixated out the passenger door window. Thankfully, his aura had returned to the grid. Adam maneuvered back into traffic, avoiding a near miss with a traffic cop behind us.

Timidly, I placed my hand on Ronan's shoulder. He tensed. "I'm sorry. You didn't deserve my smackdown." I squeezed his shoulder, dropped my hand. "I need answers. I think both of you need me." I snorted. "Well, you get my drift."

Ronan cleared his throat. "I have no clue why my power's attacking you. It's pissing me off that I'm hurting you."

My cell rang, and I nearly peed my pants. I retrieved it off the backseat floor where it'd dropped during Ronan's conniption. I held the phone out to him. He hesitated to take it, but I nudged it onto his palm, my way of acceptance.

He jabbed it on. "Riley," he barked, listened for a moment. "Ian, what gives?"

Adam sailed into the parking garage at the Stargazer and headed for the public lot behind the residential tower. San Jose was littered with entertainment centers and most included residential towers due to overpopulation. It was a normal way of life. Was, being the operative word.

A long pause ensued. "Whatever." Ronan clicked off, pocketed my phone. "Ian's taking Zoe to the old Santa Clara University chapel for the exchange." Ronan and Adam traded another one of their doppelgänger-knows-all looks. "We have three hours," he added.

I massaged my temples. I'd like to buy a clue or two hundred.

Rebuilt on the original site of Mission Santa Clara, the chapel was one of the Franciscans-built California missions. A public place open for self-guided tours to anyone. What kind of moron move was that?

"Why there and why so long?" I asked as Adam parked in the first empty slot he found in the back.

"You said Zoe's a telepath? What exactly can she do?" Ronan not so subtly deflected my question.

The dashboard clock flashed thirteen after the hour. I dampened my tangible wave of irritation. The clock reset to twelve and stopped.

"Can we agree on one thing?" I didn't wait for a rhetorical answer to my rhetorical question. "You need to stop putting me on ignore. You have a boatload of information I need."

Adam sniggered. "She's got your number. I want her around, if for nothing other than to help me figure out why I'm stuck in this half-human, half-dead fae body."

I decided to move things along the path of full disclosure. "Zoe can read most unblocked minds." She was going to trade me in for a new BFF if she found out I spilled her secret. "What happened six months ago to change Adam?"

Grooves creased Adam's pasty forehead. "Six months ago, Ronan's dad tried to get him to open the Rift with a ritual from the book using Ronan's telekinesis and his blood. Instead, Ronan screwed up the spell and now tainted magic is leaking into our world, which started my decline. At first, I began gaining abilities. A cloaking spell, mesmerism, powers the ancient fae wielded. The more I gained, the more it began to affect how I looked and felt, and then my fae powers started to decline."

"Now Dad thinks he needs at least two sorcerers to open the Rift, set it right, and stop the taint from spilling out.” Ronan gave me a pointed look. “Apparently, those pages are missing from the book.”

I drummed my fingers on my purse, trying to contain my excitement. My mind lingered on Adam rather than the implicit idea that I may have access to the other parts of the book. Yeah, right. I swallowed hard, pushing down my encroaching unease. “Do I have a doppelgänger too?”

“No one knows.” Adam grinned at me.

“Hell help us if there’s another you,” Ronan muttered. Fin jumped onto the front seat with Ronan, snuggling into his side.

I shot him a scathing look. Hiding a grin, Ronan scratched Fin behind her ears. She licked his hand as if he were a fat, juicy steak. Guess I was a skinny, dry hamburger.

A warm jolt of jealousy rose up. I ignored the fluttering in my stomach. For some stupid reason, I wanted to be snuggled up to Ronan, licking his hand while he kissed and fondled my ears...or some other body part. I gulped. “Then Adam’s part fairy and part sorcerer, one of the final dominant Forbidden?”

Adam sifted his fingers through his flowing hair. “If I was fae or a sorcerer, I didn’t know it. After Ronan screwed with the Rift, I started changing.” He waved his hand over himself. “We have a link, but Ronan’s got all the magic. I got nothing now except what I pull from him. He’s the sorcerer and I appear to be fae, whatever that means.”

“And you’re doppelgängers just like the beings the Thirteen devised back in the evil dark ages. Ronan’s a descendant of a Forbidden sorcerer and Adam’s a descendant of a fae-based doppelgänger, created by sorcerers and from fae who didn’t go through the Rift.” As I said the words, I knew they didn’t make sense, but my head accepted them. What else could it be? It made sense if our ancestors were so über evil and industrious. Hail to the original Forbidden Thirteen. Sneaky bastards.

Holy convoluted hell in a handbasket. My right eye twitched up the dust. “But the magic link is a good thing. You found each other, however that occurred.” I lifted an eyebrow indicating the time was right for further sharing on that score.

“If you can call that a good thing.” That errant muscle throbbed in Ronan’s left jaw. “We aren’t sure how the doppelgänger bond works. It’s screwing with us both. We don’t know what magic leaked from the Rift, whether good or bad, and who else it affected. The history of the Forbidden Thirteen is documented in the Illuminaria, but it was written deliberately vague about the secret doppelgängers or any fae-sorcerer doppelgänger bonds. My dad’s been researching the Forbidden, sorcery, and Rifts for over thirty years and he still doesn’t have half a clue.”

“Why do you think we’re descendants of sorcerers?” I turned to look at Ronan. “ESP is not sorcery. It’s not magic based.”

“It was a closely guarded secret among the Forbidden Thirteen. They had sorcery type powers and psychic abilities.” Ronan cursed under his breath, seeming to hate his lot in life. “The Thirteen closed the Rift, went into hiding, and supposedly their magic winked out throughout the ages of their descendants.”

Until the Earthquake Cluster-Muck—the year we were all conceived. Chocolate-charged adrenaline streamed through my veins.

“If we open” —I did air quotes— “the Rift all the way, if that’s even possible, will the magical population explode?” I held my breath.

Adam blanched paler than pale. “Probably. Energy will explode on Earth and those with a seed of magic or ESP, whether they know it or not, will flourish.”

“Or more residual tainted magic will leak out. Like now.” Ronan scratched a throbbing muscle in his jaw. “It’s not exactly written in blood.”

“Can a doppelgänger coexist with his sorcerer counterpart?” Unease expanded like a wet sponge in my gut.

“We don’t know the full gist of the bond,” Ronan said.

I dared not think of the implications. Should we try to close the Seattle Rift even if we could? Traveling through a vacuum sucking up a clue every hundred miles scared me.

The windshield had fogged and Adam cracked the windows. Sweat beaded his flushed face, and he untangled locks of hair wrapping around his wrist like sinuous seaweed. Our auras tangled and I forced a calming vine toward him. “Why did humans back then chase off the fae and sorcerers?”

“Chase off?” Ronan’s hand froze on Fin’s head. “Our human ancestors murdered them.”

“To rid Earth of everything humans feared and couldn’t control.” Adam rolled up his sleeves, exposing his faintly shimmering forearms. “Magic upset the balance humans wanted to maintain. They worried sorcery would eventually annihilate humans. Humans of that era were afraid of otherworldly beings and thought there was a regular door to the Realm of the Void and that more and more magic would smother the earth.” A lock of his livewire hair shifted, slid down his arm, and fell onto the steering column.

Ronan grunted. “The idiots back then hadn’t comprehended that the Rift gateway might not outlast time, or crumble and unleash twisted magic.” He fixed me with a pointed look. “Twenty-two years is a long time to leak tainted magic and who knows what into the world.” Ronan’s parting shot served up a side order of lunacy. “According to ancient and modern laws, all three of us are walking felons.”

Chapter 7

Before my brain could digest that rusty nail in my coffin, I spied a tall woman approaching the SUV, her lustrous black hair raining down her back. Decked in black from her neck to her heels, she wore glossy, spike-heeled boots I'd sell my cats to own. Her porn queen chest filled out a skintight turtleneck sweater. Raspberry lipstick with matching fake claws completed the panther in heels.

Adam and Ronan swiveled to check her out. The early thirty-something Queen of Darkness parked her stilettos a few feet from the front passenger door. Her beckoning eyes twinkled so brilliantly under the fluorescent lights, her eyes appeared to shoot sparkling emerald icicles.

"You guys know her?"

Ronan drew his gun, his caustic aural energy spearing the air. "Melisande Aguire, my father's right hand and number one tracker." Without moving his sight off her, he pulled a silencer from his coat pocket.

The woman teased her tongue over her bottom lip, causing Ronan's faltering energy to shift to sexual anticipation. I don't know how I knew that, but I did and wished bleach ran through my blood to wash the sensation away. The witchy bitch probed the cab in his general direction, hunger brightening her eyes into emerald jewels.

"Ronan?" I gripped my necklace. "You've hooked-up with her, haven't you?"

"Shit, Aria." He fumbled, dropping the silencer on the floorboard.

"If you've had a relationship, it makes a helluva difference how this goes down." I nudged Fin's front paws off my leg before I knocked her over in my frustration. "She obviously knows how to push your buttons. Is she a Forbidden sorcerer too?"

Ronan slammed the glove box shut. "No. She used me, played me against my father." His scowl deepened, his voice rasped. "She has some freakass coercion ESP, almost telekinetic, but she's not Forbidden. Last I heard my father was doing her."

Where's that ear bleach when you need it? "Can you knock her out if it comes down to it?"

With careful deliberation, he flicked the safety off his gun, cocked the hammer. Answer enough.

"Well, alrighty then." I dusted his shoulder with my palm. "It's crunch time." When I snagged a spare moment to think, I might detest myself from the murderous hell I'd landed in. "Is she capable of enthraling me?”

“Anyone.” His emotionless voice spooked me stiff. “It’s easier if a prior relationship exists. She can leverage off what she knows of you, your weaknesses.” He punched the dash, a dull thud in the aura storm brewing. “Asshole father. He figured out I came after you, and he knows what she can do to me. He wants to make sure I return and bring back the prize.”

Aka, moi. The five-million-dollar prize of three centuries.

“Obviously he knows you’re working against him now.” I fiddled with my stun gun’s safety catch, restraining the urge to blast her down a notch. Ronan gave a too sharp emphatic shake of his head. A warning went off in my brain. He held more secrets than Dominion Research’s closet vault of Forbidden Thirteen trade secrets.

Adam turned up the air conditioner. “Let’s find out what she knows.”

Sweat dripped down Ronan’s temples. The acrid smell of his turmoil filled the interior, his tension scraping the edges of my aura.

“I can’t go out there.”

“Avoid her eyes, man. She can’t be that good.” Adam dipped his head in case she was able to see through the dark window tint, even though it appeared impenetrable.

Ronan landed a mad dog look on Adam. “She is that good, especially when my telekinesis is screwed up.”

“Geez, do I have to bang down the double-D witch myself?” I made as if to open the door.

Ronan lunged between the center console and pinned me against the back seat, practically knocking the wind out of me. Poor Fin got shoved to the floor where she yelped and scrambled to steady her legs.

“Ronan, I know you’re in there.” Melisande’s low, sultry contralto carried on a current of air inside the cab. “I take it you have the psychic? Let’s have a little talk before you do anything with her.” She smoothed her hand down her pancake flat stomach. Skinny, sparkly bitch.

“Don’t be a total moron. I wasn’t getting out,” I whispered fiercely and shouldered Ronan’s hands off me.

A vein pulsed in his neck. “Get down behind the seat before she looks through the windshield. Don’t look into her eyes.” A palette of dread, anger, and bewilderment mottled his face.

Melisande poured herself over the front fender in a seductive pose. She scrutinized her smooth, flawless face in a compact mirror and patted powder on her button nose, slowly sweeping her tongue over her collagen plump lips.

“Aria?” Ronan croaked out.

“Whatever. Um...you can back off. I’m not going anywhere.” Except down a deep, dark hole. No hole in sight, I dipped behind the headrest. “Oh!” An idea flowered, the thought cooling my untimely passion.

Excitement fluttered in my chest. “I can trip Ronan’s brain to resist her when he steps out. Then I’ll stun her brain to sleep,” I said in a loud whisper. They ogled me as if I’d fallen into a vat of crazy. “What? It’ll work. We’ll figure out what to do after she conks out.”

“Won’t work.” Ronan wiped the sweat off his forehead. “You can’t split off your telekinesis to resist her and knock her out at the same time.”

“Get real.” My scoffing became an evil grin. “Who do you think’s been dumping ice on your prick and preventing the witch from skipping to the front of the SUV? At the same time, I might add.” By absorbing extra energy from around me, I can use my telekinetic receptors to hinder someone else’s actions and also knock another out. Without absorbing the energy, I was pretty limited to one action. Holy hell! Was I a descendant of a Forbidden sorcerer or what?

Scarlet embarrassment painted Ronan’s face. “You can invoke two telekinetic spells at once?” He squirmed in his seat.

I gave a start in surprise. “Can’t you?”

“No.” Swiping a hand across the back of his neck, he asked hesitantly, “How many can you?”

I thought back to a bullying incident when I was ten. Those three brats deserved my smackdown for taunting my best friend just because she was a little on the hefty side. I speedily chased the disturbing episode away for a snow day in hell. It was the first time my telekinesis had split off into three targets. “Three, maybe. I might need to connect to your aura for an extra boost of energy.” If my unluck didn’t plunk a jinx on my luck, that is. Even with Ronan and Adam’s tainted aura thrown into the mix, I shouldn’t have a problem with two spells. I hoped. I nibbled on the inside of my mouth. Hell, I’ll just pull energy off the Queen of Darkness. “Or I’ll just stun her.” I patted my pocket with my trusty stun gun.

Defiance tightened Ronan’s square jaw. “You negate me. I have no power with you around. What little I have is nearly dead.”

My eyes prepared to roll before I put the skids on them. “I can still use your faulty aura to pull energy from, or even hers. Leave the rest to me.”

“Ronan, come out to play.” Melisande’s purring voice seemed to filter from the speakers. “If you’ve got the psychic in there, I can help you with her. First, I want to chat.”

Ronan’s psyche responded to her false allure, his desire palpable in the air around us.

“Dude, rein in your horses.” I slapped another dampener on his mind. “She’s too old for you.”

“Uh, yeah, thanks.” His voice mimicked the crackling of a pre-pubescent teen. He not so furtively adjusted the crotch of his pants.

“Can we get on with this? Remember my kidnapped friend, Zoe?” My pitch intensified with my irritability.

“It’ll have to work.” Adam reclined his seat and faced the driver’s door.

“Aria, get on the floor. I don’t want her locking eyes with either of you,” Ronan barked out in a loud whisper.

The moment I dropped down, Fin planted a soppy slurp on my chin, her energy filling me with warm and fuzzies. I patted her and peeked around the seat to glue my sight on Melisande, avoiding her weird, overly bright eyes. Time to get it on before she licked the collagen out of her lips.

Adam merged his aura with mine, expanding our natural fusion, leaving the mix warm and inviting. I hardly noticed his taint as my cleansing aura stole the limelight from him. He almost didn’t have to worry about hiding from the witchy bitch since his entire body wavered in and out of visibility. Guess his body couldn’t choose a side: human or fae, life...or death. I gulped down a lump of air lodged in my throat.

Ronan opened the door and Melisande’s over-sexed enchantment collided with our combined forces. A gasp escaped her, and I suppressed an urge to gloat.

Ronan left the door slightly ajar, standing just outside it. “What the hell are you doing here, Mel?”

“Ronan, love.” She tried to sprinkle holes of bitchcraft magic in our aural shield. We hung tough, and I intangibly spackled the holes as fast as she created them. “Richard doesn’t want you involved in the capture of the Walker girl. You were to remain at the compound. Now it’s my duty to take you in with the girl. If you got her, that is. But maybe we can make a deal?”

“What else does he know?” Hostility poured from Ronan’s tone. Yet fear, in a mix of sweat, spice, and leather wafted off him. Come on. Man up, man.

Melisande’s ESP strained against ours. “You resist me.” A raspy laugh followed. “I taught you too well of my charms.”

“Cut the crap. Why’re you really here?”

“For you. What else?” Another gag-me laugh. “Do you think I’d stoop so low as to play bounty hunter for some idiotic psychic?”

I bristled and readied a knockout spell. Keep talking, witch hag. Maybe you’ll say something intelligent.

“Aria,” Adam cautioned. “Not yet.”

Cramps were tightening my calves as I squatted on the floor, peeking out a corner of the back window.

“Give me a fucking break. You’re Dad’s number one hit man. Did you tell him I was here?”

“I considered calling him after detecting your bio-footprint in the girl’s condo.”

She stepped closer to Ronan, her spiky heels clicking on the tarmac. Her nearness fenced in our combined auras, but she couldn’t penetrate the shield even if the proctologist freed her magic.

“I’m giving you a break.” She uttered an uneasy, silvery laugh.

“What’s your deal, Mel?”

“I’m on your side. Don’t be so hostile.”

“Prove it. What hand can you play in this game?” he asked. “You’re holding shit without Richard Riley backing your ass.”

“We can be a force, you and I.” She paused, held out her arm, her black bag sliding off her shoulder to her wrist. “Take my tablet out.”

“Why? What’s on it?” Wariness laced his words.

“What proof will sway you to my side?” she taunted him.

“The Illuminaria.” I celebrated Ronan’s sneering voice.

Our merger began breaking, and I faltered, allowing holes to form. “We need to speed it up,” I whispered.

Adam held up a finger. One minute to Catwoman blastoff.

“Then I guess we just sealed the deal.” Melisande’s husky voice crawled evil over my scalp, lifting the hairs by the roots. “I want you, Ronan. You’re the power force, not your father. He’s a useless old man relying on his son. You and I could destroy him, take over his mission. Check the tablet. Your idiot father scanned the translation into electronic format.”

“And encrypted it to hell.”

“And I broke his encryption,” her voice slid to a conspiratorial hush.

Stunned, I peeked over the headrest. Melisande caressed his arm with one hand, her other stuck inside her purse. She kept flicking her eyes toward the driver’s seat. I strengthened my spell, helping Ronan cope easier. Adam nodded, giving me the signal.

My left pinkie twitched, then my right. A little late for that, you think? I concentrated on wielding two separate threads of energy. Just as I was about to toss my mental knockout spell at her, a gunshot shattered the air, booming through my chest as if the bullet struck me. From the shadows of the garage to the right, a second shot chased the first.

Melisande screamed a shallow gurgling noise. A shot knocked Ronan against the fender. Grunting, he clutched his left shoulder. Strangled screams rolled up my throat. Fin’s mournful howling joined the din. The blast punched our aura, moved over me in a red haze, shooting fiery arrows into my cramped leg muscles. I rose from my elevated crouch and latched onto Adam’s shoulder. He said something, but I didn’t understand him, all my senses riveted on the scene outside. Terror seized my heart, left my aura quivering around me.

A dark stain spread across the upper sleeve of Ronan’s black T-shirt. Melisande tottered on her spike heels, and I saw the point of impact, a gelatinous mass on the side of her head, soaking her long, midnight hair. I gagged and quickly looked down. She fell toward Ronan, her limp form slithering down his arm to the ground in a blot of ink. The last of her nine lives streamed down the side of her head into a darkening puddle where her black-clad body and the tarmac morphed into one.

Pain speared my head and my knockout spell went wild. My thread of energy sped toward the source of danger hiding in the shadows. Uncontrollable brain waves leached out of me, leaving me shuddering from the force. A gargled yell echoed in the garage and a body thudded onto a car near us. The memory of last night's deathblow resurfaced, and I shielded my mind, cutting off my telekinetic waves.

I scrambled over the back seat to the door on the right, dropping my stunner and bumping Fin onto the floorboards. My heart seemed to stop beating. Gasping, I flung open the door and launched off the seat. My right foot landed on Melisande's open hand. Her rings crunched into the asphalt, the sound of bones creaking renewing the turmoil in my full stomach. I hopped to the right, wanting to dunk my foot in that mystical bleach to rinse the feel of her death away.

Ronan leaned against the fender, holding his wounded arm tight to his side. Blood drained from his face, pain mirrored in his eyes. All thoughts and emotions escaped me. Only one thing mattered. I stepped over Melisande's prone body toward the man who'd saved me last night. The one who mattered.

"Get in the car." Adam jogged toward us, surveying the area for shooters.

I clasped Ronan in my arms, anchored down by his weight. Lines etched his forehead, his eyes glazed over.

"You okay?" I struggled against his weight, not taking stock of the weird ache in my chest.

"Yeah," he ground out. "Get me into the seat." Before we moved a step, he bent double and pulled the black purse off Melisande's arm.

I helped him into the vehicle. Adam hefted Melisande up and carried her like a giant sack of cat litter between two other hulking SUVs.

"The bullet didn't penetrate." Ronan gritted his teeth, hoisted his legs onto the floorboard.

Warm blood soaked his sleeve. The coppery tang filled my nostrils, invoking gruesome memories of last night. Gently, I probed his bloodied arm, patting it with a stack of napkins he'd handed me from the glove box. I breathed in deep to steady my frantic heart.

I assessed the damage, gently plucking the T-shirt from his skin. As it rasped over the open wound, Ronan mumbled a string of blue curses. He had an ugly gash and it needed stitches. Even though the bullet only grazed him, it had to hurt like a mother. I offered him a bleak smile, until I looked at my rusty-red, tacky fingers holding pressure to stem the flow of blood. My smile disappeared.

Ronan placed his hand over mine. "You're alright in a crisis."

Another one of those jolts of warmth weakened my knees. Before I could make fairy heads or dragon tails of what it meant, Adam raced back to the SUV.

"We're on the move." He shoved the doors shut, then bolted to the driver's side.

Ronan twisted into the front seat, his hand replacing mine on his wound. I climbed in, left with no choice but to straddle his legs. I had doctoring to do, didn't I?

I'd barely seated myself on Ronan's lap, our faces inches apart, when Adam slammed the vehicle in reverse. Ronan's arm encircled my waist to keep me from knocking myself comatose against the dash. I managed to press on the wad of napkins without causing him a world of hurt.

"Where's Melisande?" Ronan shifted to give my knees better purchase, one knee between his legs, the other on the side of the seat. Any other time and a girl could love that.

The tires squealed out of the garage as Adam sped deeper into the rear of the casino complex. "Dead. Sorry, man."

Ronan's aura spiked, settled. "Who shot at us?"

"Guy wore a Celtic sword pendant. Probably one of your father's bounty hunters."

The knot in my stomach reformed. I touched Adam's arm. "Did you kill him?"

He kept his focus forward, his mouth compressed. "Didn't need to."

The knot unraveled into a pool of acid. "He's dead?"

Adam nodded. Ronan gently squeezed my waist, more solace than support.

"My energy went wild. I didn't mean to do it." My free hand spasmed and I pressed it to my gut. What the hell was I?

I focused on the immediate situation before I ran screaming for the loony bin. What had Melisande done to incur such murderous intent not just from Ronan but from her peers, if you could call bounty hunters peers? "Ronan, what did she do to you?"

"Turned my father against me, caused—" Ronan grabbed the armrest.

Adam bounced over a speed bump. My head grazed the headliner and I lost my balance. Ronan yelped as I fell against him. I eased back, one hand anchored on his steely thigh. "Sorry. You okay?" My morbid curiosity couldn't wait for a response. I needed answers before I lost it. "She caused what?"

Ronan's eyes shot blue flames of pain. "She talked my father into making me try to open the Rift before we understood what would happen or got our hands on the rest of the book. I screwed it up. It's her fault the screwed up magic is causing Adam..." He lowered his head.

I stuck two fingers under his chin, forcing his gaze to mine. "To what?" Deeply rooted pain hazed his eyes, more pain than the flesh wound deserved.

"To die," Adam said with a detached air. "I don't just look like a cadaver. I am dying."

Chapter 8

The info bombs Ronan and Adam kept dropping on me created more questions than answers. I hated it. Too many people were dying, and I loathed that even more. If my mother was alive, I'd want to ream her a new one for withholding dangerous and secret family history from me. No wonder I'd always sensed I never really belonged in this world, no matter how hard I tried to lead a normal life, have friends, go to college, make a few bucks on the side. I wanted to scream, cry, rail at everything I didn't know about myself and how Ronan and Adam knew it all...or not enough.

The SUV bounced in a pothole, knocking my head on the roof. Ronan cried out and I gripped the seatback to hold steady. We had time to head to my condo before we rescued Zoe. Ronan's arm needed attention and it gave us a chance to canvass my home for clues.

Adam explained what he meant about dying. When Ronan screwed up the Rift, the bad magic leaking through the portal had caused serious damage to Adam's developing powers, destroying him from the inside out. The doppel-hunks believed the taint would eventually cause his body to shut down unless someone figured out how to stopper the magic or allow it to flow unfettered by opening the Rift completely.

Funny thing, Riley Senior believed that someone might be me, not that he knew Adam existed. Yet, Ronan dubbed my telekinesis clumsy and erratic and not much better than his when he was at peak condition. You think? Hello, unlucky thirteen. Of course, I neglected to mention that I'd hatched in the middle of a triangle of earthquake fault lines surrounding the San Francisco Bay Area. The more fault lines, the more ley line energy the earth held or emitted. Probably the reason why energy and I had an easy time hooking up. Since California had more fault lines than the number of guests at a pre-Abolishment sorcerer reunion, I wasn't totally convinced I possessed the abilities the doppel-geniuses expected, or if the faulty Rift caused my bad luck episodes. Nor was I sure I didn't. A parking lot puddle had more depth than I did after that conversation.

We entered the foyer of my condo and I reengaged the alarm. Reality stared me in the face and nausea bloomed in my stomach. A very messy and intrusive reality. I needed an infusion of antacids.

"No forced entry. They bypassed the security system." Ronan jabbed buttons on the touch pad, examining it as if he expected clues to pop out in crime scene bags.

Perps had tossed everything in their hunt for the blasted book of Forbidden life and death. I kicked a chunk of dried potpourri on the tile floor, slipped on a twig, and fell against Ronan who grunted out an oath to the horned one down under. Adam caught me before my butt kissed the marble tiles.

I gained my balance, not so much a calm stomach. “Thanks.” I smiled apologetically at Ronan who backed away from the storm of Aria. “I’ll snag the first aid kit.” I bolted toward the hall bathroom, dodging the scattered litter of normal life. The life I no longer fit. Or ever had.

Bile stung my throat. I rushed into my purple haven and propped my elbows on the counter. Inane sludge filled my head, forcing the bad stuff into a crowded corner. By the time the dry heaves settled in, I was sitting on the cool tile floor.

A few minutes later, Adam entered. Hunkering down, he handed me an open can of ginger ale. “It’ll make you feel better.”

“Thanks.” Our fingers touched as I took the can. A dash of his soothing energy flushed my self-pitying down the toilet. I sipped the calming soda, bubbles popping in the back of my throat.

Adam stroked my hair. My scalp tingled beneath his warm touch, and liquid fire fizzed along the rim of our auras, reenergizing me. Oddly, I felt as if I’d known him forever, even though it was the beastly Ronan also stirring my senses into a tizzy. The idea of Adam’s potential, impending death tortured my soul. Why hadn’t I realized earlier how off the network of the living he was? With gun-toting bounty hunters on my tail, it became increasingly difficult to concentrate on everything happening around me. I vowed to try harder for all our sakes.

I squeezed the can until soda splashed out the top. “Does it get easier?”

“What?”

“The killing.”

Empathy filled his eyes. “I’ve never killed anyone.”

“Oh.” I wiped the soda off my hand onto my pants. Should I be happy or frustrated his resume didn’t include assassin? “I guess I should ask Ronan. He graduated from Murder 101.”

Adam helped me stand, released me gently. “It’s not so bad.”

I peered at his reflection in the mirror and lifted a shoulder.

“Dying,” he said, edging closer until my shoulder blades touched his chest.

Warmth trickled into my southern federation. Damn it. My hormones needed a major time-out. Cruel reality knocked any stupid romantic notions out of my head. I backed away. Facing him, I gripped his shoulders. “Swearing by all that is fairy and holy, Aria Elle Walker will not allow you to die.”

He grinned slowly, so freaking gorgeous. Despite his gray pallor, dull eyes, and brittle-looking hair, that is. “If anyone can save me, it’ll be you.”

A loud bang on the door tweaked the nerves in my neck into a twitch storm. “Time’s running,” Ronan said in a raw tone.

I spun away and grabbed a towel. “I’m not normally a weak-kneed drama queen. Really.”

“Hey.” Adam caught my arm. “Neither Ronan nor I think any less of you.”

I yanked open the door and bestowed a scathing glare on Ronan. “It’s not every day you kill two—”

Faint smile kicking up his lips, he held his gunshot arm to his chest.

Remorse tripped me up. Had the idiot store issued a recall on me yet? “Sorry, I spaced out.” I rubbed my settling stomach.

He brushed past Adam on his way into the bathroom. “Feel better?”

“Yeah, thanks.” I motioned for him to sit on the closed toilet seat.

He unhooked his gun harness, set it on the counter, and called out as Adam walked away, “Scour the bedrooms. I can’t tell if anything’s missing.” He lowered his voice. “You have a computer?”

“Laptop in my office, tablet in my bedroom.”

“Gone. What’s on them?”

“Homework, business and customer files, zeros and ones.” I frowned at his bloody, torn T-shirt. “Strip it.”

He arched his eyebrows but he ripped off the ruined shirt.

Desire rose as I drooled over his to-die-for shoulders, muscled chest, and the washboard abs tapering to slim hips. Oh. My. God. His natural tan didn’t help my bulging, lusting eyes either. Fortunately, Ronan wasn’t paying me an iota of attention while he rummaged in the vanity drawers, gathering first aid supplies as he discovered them in my haphazard glory.

I swiped the fresh coat of perspiration off my upper lip and stared at his gun to stop from totally making a fool of myself.

Perched on the rim of the bathtub, I soaked a rag in antiseptic cleanser. I dabbed the cotton cloth over Ronan’s raw gash, generating a wince. “It’s pretty deep.”

“Wrap it. We don’t have time for a Med-Hub stop.”

Easy to find, Med-Hubs were scattered around the city. They were just small emergency clinics open 24/7 and catered to anyone with a name. I supposed he didn’t want to cough up his name if his father was the all mighty Wizard of the Emerald City.

Frowning, I cleansed the wound and eased the towel up his arm toward the hollow between his neck and shoulder. I wiped the smoking hot tattoo twining his bicep. Green ivy and barbed wire twisted around his arm, dripping drops of red tattoo blood. Each twisted knot on the barbwire formed a swirling number thirteen. Did Ronan also need a focusizer? A strange inner excitement trembled down my limp legs.

I brushed his hair aside, revealing crusty red inflammation bordering two small scabs on his neck. “Who’s been gnawing on you? I think it’s infected.” I touched the cloth to the wounds. He flinched and clenched his hands. “Sleeping with vampires?”

He flicked my hand away. “Leave it.” Tension stood out on his shoulders in knots.

I gripped his square jaw, forcing him to meet my gaze. His smooth-shaven skin blistered beneath my touch. “If we’re in this together, no more dodging.” My thumb rubbed over a tiny white scar beneath his lower lip.

Ronan exhaled his annoyance. “My dad stuck me with a monitoring chip to track everything my body did. If I lost an eyelash, the monitor picked it up.”

My hand faltered, the cloth fell to the floor. “Bastard.” I grabbed the antibiotic cream, squeezed the tube so hard a glob of cream shot out and landed on Ronan’s chest. Heat zoomed to my face. As much as I was dying to lay my bare hands on him, I had to hold my hand back as it warred with my hormones...and the doppelgänger aura meld thingy screwing up my head.

Ronan slid his fingers through the creamy glob and wiped it on the twin wounds. “I agreed to it for my dad’s experiments.”

“Did you have a leak in your think tank or something?” I pushed his hand away and finished slathering the cream on his scabs.

“He also snuck in a tracking chip. I dug them both out before I left Seattle.”

“I suppose he’s the type who can sell black widows to women with arachnophobia too.” I slung the tube on the vanity. It skittered across the slick granite and bounced behind the toilet. “Your father’s a piece of work,” I spat out. Doing my best with an angry air blanketing us, I bandaged his arm.

Ronan guzzled the rest of my soda and tossed the can into the trashcan. “It doesn’t get better, but it becomes easier to shift focus and detach.”

“What?” I taped the last of the gauze in place.

“The killing.”

I shoved the medical supplies into a pile on the counter, my fist crushing a helpless tube of cortisone. “Was your first bad luck kill an accident too?”

“That was the first of two times I lost control of my telekinesis after a ton of energy hit me from external sources.”

“How?”

He shrugged. “I lost focus.”

It didn’t compute. I hadn’t lost focus last night. “This won’t be the last for me, will it?”

He took my hand, wrapping it in the heat of his. Our auras vibrated around us before his taint flared up and killed the meld. “Our powers are mixing in creepy ways I’m sure no one gets. I doubt anyone ever factored in Adam. Who knows how the Rift magic will affect us.” He squeezed my fingers. “Or any other doppelgängers and other sorcerers in the world.”

I knelt between his knees. Our eyes locked, and the certainty in his gaze would have shot me out of orbit if I weren’t already docked for repairs. Reaching his bad arm forward, he feathered his fingers down my cheek. His thumb slid over my lips and he tamped down another wince.

Butterflies fluttered along the back of my neck. I shifted my attention to his arm and eased away lest my traitorous body betray my head beyond the point of no return. “Adam’s...dying because his powers are tainted and erratic, and you’ve lost most of yours. You both can’t exist without sharing your powers until the Rift is fixed.” One way or another. “That’s why you can’t control it and why it keeps attacking me.”

“I guess that’s the doppelgänger effect. Who knows?” Surprise sparkled in his eyes, slid to his mouth. “You’re smarter than you look.”

“We’re like bats twisting upside down in the sunshine.” I swatted his knee and rose to my feet. “Let’s go. First we save Zoe. Then we stop your father’s nefarious plans.”

I helped him slip into the clean T-shirt he’d brought, sticking a finger through a weak seam under the left arm, ripping it. His brow went all wrinkly, but he wore the shirt anyway.

In the living room, I surveyed the sea of disaster with a sharp poke of dismay. So we had a few wrenches chunked into the saving-our-butts goal. Ronan hooked his thumb in a belt loop to stabilize his arm. One-handed, he uprighted an easy chair as if it weighed nothing.

“I’ve never seen any book like this Illuminaria your sperm donor thinks I have. My tablet’s encrypted so they’re up crap creek without a plunger.” My customer data included communications and drawings. I kept my personal charm designs in encrypted files. Fortunately, I backed up to two clouds. One can never be too paranoid.

My diatribe drew winged eyebrows on Ronan’s sallow face. “What’re you hiding?”

I heated from his scrutiny and shoved up my sweater sleeves. “I make enameled charms and keep my designs private, that’s all.”

“Do you sell the charms?”

I shuffled through a life’s worth of decorative odds and souvenir ends to the corner of the living room. My collection of dragon statues in the curio cabinet appeared to have survived the destruction. I closed my eyes for a few seconds, then set the colorful creatures to rights on the glass shelves. Most of the dragons had been gifts from my mother and grandmother, and my favorite pink and purple one formed the logo of my company.

Thank My Lucky Charms. I couldn’t very well name my business Lucky Thirteen, huh? “I sell pieces to local jewelry shops, craft shows, and on my web store. My main business is in custom pieces pursuant to customer specifications.” Hail to my new mission statement. ’Bout time I nailed it down. Note to thieves: update Aria’s website.

Ronan seemed to chew on my words as he reset the chairs around the dining table. The perps had slashed the burgundy and gold chair cushions, the stuffing hanging down the sides like sopping clouds. I watched him punch the innards into place, his hands searching inside the cushions a little too long for my tastes. Annoyance flickered through me.

Racking my brain, I stalked from one end of the room to the other. Hiding the rage and terror clawing at me, I rubbed a gouge along the corner of the mahogany end table where it had banged the edge of the steps. The table was one of the few things I’d kept of my mother’s. I gripped the edge until my knuckles whitened and Ronan gently pried my hands away. Combing for additional evidence, I hid the rage and terror clawing at me. “Your father really thinks my mom and her ancestors hid parts of the book?” Both our gazes slid to Melisande’s tablet sitting on the sofa.

“He spent years searching for the Illuminaria, ancient texts, and journals of the Thirteen sorcerers. He has sketchy evidence that your ancestor wrote the book,” Ronan replied. “Your mother’s the descendant. Did you train together?”

Reluctantly, I threw the pillow clutched to my chest onto the couch, met his trademarked Cro-Magnon stare. “Get real. She hardly knew the extent of my abilities.” Regret slipped over me.

Dawn’s light bloomed inside my mind, illuminating a rocky trail to a forgotten memory. I sank down on the frayed couch, shoving wads of stuffing through the zippered cushion. The dead strolled across my spine in lopsided gaits, sending shivers up and down my backside. “She always pounded into me that if I possessed unusual paranormal abilities I should keep it zipped, even to my grandmother.” Mom totally knew about me if she was a descendant. I slapped my hand over my mouth. It was all a ruse. Why, Mom?

Adam finished his clue gathering in the bedrooms and joined us. “Did she leave anything behind?” He stopped in front of the windows overlooking the wintergreen hillsides. Wistfulness flared in his eyes, and his hair swayed as if air drifted through the strands. He scratched his pointy ear, snagging a thatch of hair off his scalp. “Journal, books, letters?” he added as if nothing were amiss, shoving the wadded hairball in his pocket.

A pang of alarm chased off the perennial cobwebs in my head. How much longer did Adam have to live?

“Nothing like that.” A wayward thought cut through the lingering head fuzz. Years ago, I used to see her hunched over her desk, researching and writing during every spare moment. I couldn’t put my pinkie on it, though. Whenever I had asked, she’d said she was writing a book. I never dug deeper.

“What—” Interest increased the unnatural sparkle in Ronan’s eyes.

I waved my hand, scrunching my face. “I remember Mom writing a novel in a notebook when she usually used a laptop.” I ransacked my memory to the day I had plowed through her paperwork, recalling all the useless drivel I’d shredded. My face fell, as well as my anticipation, into a puddle of frustration.

Sudden horror clamped that infernal claw around my heart. Duh, blonde alert. I pushed off the sofa and cut across the room to the hallway. I wheeled toward Adam. “Did you see my cats?”

“Hiding under your bed.”

Relief snipped a knot in my neck. “I’ll check on them, and then we should take off.”

I coaxed Cody and Cleo out from underneath my bed. My purple swirl comforter hung in tatters off one side of the skewed mattress, and Cody had polyfill wrapped around her neck. Seething, I snatched the stuffing away and flung it into the trashcan. I wanted to fling the bastard who’d done this off my balcony with a wad of polyfill shoved up his ass.

Hugging each cat, I kissed their furry heads, and they snuggled on the bed. Cody swatted at the key ring stuck in my waistband and I knew they’d be okay. As I turned to walk away, that wayward thought decked me and I skidded to a halt. I yanked the keys out of my waistband, flicking the three keys until the small brass key to Mom's old trunk where she'd stored mementos from her past stopped me cold. I always kept the key close to me, to remind me that Mom had a life before me. A haunting memory from my childhood filled my head. Oh, holy mother of the craptastic.

I closed my bedroom door. Her steamer trunk with the padded bench on top rested at the foot of my bed, the lid lifted open, cards, costume jewelry, and mementos scattered across the littered floor. I reached into the bottom and moved some ancient T-shirts around until I found the hidden catch and pried a nail file underneath the false bottom. I lifted the hidden panel only Mom and I had known about. Two packets of papers encased in thick envelopes lay on the layer between the two bottoms. Dickhead Riley's men should stick to picking fleas out of each other's hair. Bounty and treasure hunting certainly wasn't their forte.

I walked into my bathroom and locked the door. Avoiding my ravaged face in the mirror, I opened the thicker and larger envelope, my hands shaking. Older than dirt vellum paper with a slight dusty, musty smell met my gaze. A strange language covered the pages with drawings, maps, symbols, and what looked to be recipes. My heart palpitated. I'd just hit the motherlode of my missing life in the lost pages of the book that held the keys to the Forbidden magical world. The Illuminaria. Carefully, I shoved the packets flat on the bottom of a zippered tote bag and stuffed a few of Mom's T-shirts around them. Mind spinning into a vortex of excitement and dread, I rejoined my new wingmen.

Chapter 9

Ronan and Adam were swiping through Melisande's tablet at the dining room table. I set the alarm on my cell, plunked my bag by my side, and they moved the tablet closer to me. Typed manuscript pages with diagrams, maps, and symbols, eerily similar to the pages I just saw, flashed on the screen. Ronan scrolled past so much text, potions, spells, and what appeared recipes and diagrams my head spun.

"She really did have a translation? I thought she was yanking your chain." I gripped Ronan's wrist to slow his scrolling.

"Enough to be lethal," he replied. "Not all of it, though."

"Hold up!" Adam exclaimed, stopping Ronan's finger from swiping to the next page. The new page on the screen bore a decorative flourish at the top and a number eight chapter header. He read aloud, "'Note: A cataclysmic earthen energy-based event could trigger a failure in the magic securing the Rifts and allow Forbidden magic to flow over the earth once again, triggering latent magic in descendants of the fae or sorcerers who may have escaped the Abolishment or those not counted among the Forbidden, those who may have an inkling of magic in their blood without knowledge of such. However, such an event is unlikely, and without the formidable magic of at least a pair of Forbidden sorcerers, the doorways to the Realm of the Void should remain secure.'" Adam scrolled to the next page. "That's the Earthquake Cluster event."

"It says two sorcerers. Why would your dumbass father have you open the Rift alone? It's like he deliberately had you screw it up." I continued reading over Ronan's right arm, then stopped, a dawning revulsion pinching my heart. "Wait a freaking freakshow minute. He knew what he was doing without the need of two kickass sorcerers! Was he really using your blood with his alchemy, Ronan? Or did he have the blood of another Forbidden? Whose blood?"

Adam and Ronan ogled me, the truth drawing down the horror on their faces.

The tablet fell out of Ronan's hand, clattered onto the table. "He siphoned enough blood out of me to supply a blood bank. I always assumed it was my blood he used in his potion." The pallor of his face gave truth to his father's blood-thieving activities.

I rubbed the vein in the crook of my left arm. "Did my father give him my mother's blood?" Had my father stolen her blood when he left, put it on ice, and sold it to Riley all those years later? Or my blood?

Ronan lifted his eyes to my face. “I...I don’t know.” He rubbed his head, his confusion seeming to drain him. “My father’s brilliant. There’s no way he’d attempt to open the Rift with just my telekinesis and alchemy based on my blood.”

“Then he used someone else’s blood in his alchemy,” Adam said. “Someone not quite strong enough. Not as strong as Aria or you.”

“My mother. Who else? Maybe he’s had her blood since they all knew each other in college.” I drummed the table so hard, my fingers ached. “Has he captured any other descendants?”

“Not that I know of. He pretty much has focused his biggest attention on you. And me. Not that he wasn’t searching for others.”

“Because we’re the strongest? But not our mothers?”

“Appears so.”

Well, screw me screaming and the other Forbidden descendants born of the Earthquake Cluster-Fuck-it-to-Riley’s Hell.

I leaned over Ronan’s arm and continued reading aloud, “‘If one Forbidden sorcerer uses strong sorcery to attempt to open a Rift, he may incur cracks in the original magic and cause faulty magic to leak out over Earth. This magic may be unpredictable and may cause death to the sorcerer who attempted the opening...and possibly to others—’” I clutched my hand to my throat. “Your father tried to kill you.”

“That’s another reason I want him dead.” Ronan shoved out of his chair so hard, the chair toppled over backward and clattered to the floor.

My alarm chirped, sending me slipping halfway off my seat, dropping a crumb of reality back into our numb minds.

With the few minutes we had to spare and my ravaged stomach aching the whole time over Zoe’s plight, we rejoined Fin snoozing in the SUV.

“Didn’t you bring enough clothes in your other ten suitcases?” Ronan grimaced at the stuffed tote bag at my feet in the back seat.

I gave him a black look. “I need something a little lighter.”

Ronan grunted. “You do know it gets cold in Seattle, right? And it’s February?”

Even though I lied, I ignored the man who seemed to know nothing about women and fashion. Bypassing the latest chapter in our manifesto de lunacy, I asked, “With all the bounty hunters on my tail, why would your father send Melisande? Didn’t he trust the others to bring both me and you back?” I refused to admit that Ronan might be working on his dad’s side until I saw more proof. Breaking into Melisande’s tablet went a long way, though. Hell on high, I needed someone to believe in. May as well be the barbarian.

Ronan tugged a red smartphone out of his pocket. “We’ll find out.”

My mouth rounded in my newest flycatcher parody. “Were you a pickpocket in a former life?”

The SUV's beefy rumble drowned out the lull in the cab. Ronan grunted like a caveman playing with a box of matches from the front seat. He scrolled through Melisande's smartphone trying to decode her passwords. In vain, by the one-syllable grunts he spewed forth.

Finally, I waded into the silence, fear for Zoe paralyzing my thoughts. "What's your plan?"

"Ian usually works alone, but I wouldn't count on it. Sometimes my dad's men team up." Ronan stuffed the phone into his jacket pocket. "Adam will cover us in the wings. I'll negotiate with Ian. You'll stay with me."

Clutching my purse to my stomach, I studied the side of Ronan's head, liking the way his dark locks layered in a windblown tousle.

"Do I knock them out all at once or one at a time?" I asked almost too eagerly, as if knocking out people was the norm.

Ronan checked his gun again. Was I that boring or was he that anal? He lifted his head. "They'll have bio-energy detectors and deadeners. They'll sense and kill your magic."

My eyes rolled back into my head slot machine style. "If we have the same ability, don't you know how to toss out brain waves to shield from bio-energy tools? I can get by a 6000D." The 6000D was the newest detector/deadener used at airports, government, and military sites. Supposedly, no ESP bypassed one without detection. Deadeners killed innate energy and dampened aural energy. Sometimes the tools were so strong and people so weak, the electrical waves they emitted knocked people out. Did I mention that NUW equaled paranoid? For some weird reason, I oozed by any detector undetected.

Ronan rubbed his jaw. "With full strength, I can bolster my aura to shield my brain waves from the older models, but they might detect Adam if he's channeling my energy. You'll have to drop any block you can erect to invoke your telekinesis."

I fluttered my hand in the air. "I hate to short out your memory board, but you forget I can do more than one telekinetic spell at a time."

"Shit." Ronan slowly ran a finger on the inside of his leather shoulder harness. It seemed weird hanging out with guys parading guns as fashion accessories. At least I wasn't in the 'hoods of Oakland.

Adam lowered his sunglasses and regarded me in the rearview mirror. "Hope we're never on your bad side." He turned the SUV down a side street of older businesses, a less traveled route toward the university.

My grin broadened, but my nervous, cold heart didn't enjoy the rash of selfish pride. I huddled into my jacket. "Sooo we locate Ian, you give the signal, I knock him out and anyone else working with him. We snatch Zoe, then bounce to smack down on Richie Senior and fix the Rift."

A puppet string seemed to yank Ronan's spine arrow straight. Adam hissed out his breath and tossed his sunglasses on the dash. Even Fin scooted away, regarding me with her doggy eyes as if I was a pariah from the Void.

My grin faltered. Ronan's aura attacked me in waves of pins and needles perforating my skin. Not that it did much good, my aura ascended to defend against his lack of control.

I observed his flinty profile and Adam's deer-in-headlights reflection in the mirror. "What?" I rubbed my neck, struggled to deflect Ronan's tainted energy. The prickles intensified. By Ronan's reddening sourpuss cast, he struggled with it too. Fin growled and the hackles mounted on her neck.

"Stop the car." Ronan reached for the door handle.

Adam swerved out of traffic into the parking lot of a skyscraping residential building. Ronan flung open the door and jogged away before the vehicle stopped rolling.

The barbs on my skin eased. A strong blast of cinnamon-vanilla wafted from the vents. I took shallow breaths, using the air freshener to focus on my diminishing pain.

"Better?"

"Yeah, but it's getting more intense each time."

"The Rift's screwing with his power."

I massaged my temples, wishing I could rub out the woodpeckers pecking for dinner in my head. "Is it affecting me because I'm supposedly one of the Thirteen?"

"Your guess is as good as mine." Adam squeezed my knee, his fingers feverishly hot.

"Wonderful." I traced the prominent blue veins on his opaque hand, stark against my dark jeans. "Why'd you two freak out?"

"Our meld of magic whipped up a static funnel. Weird."

"Oh. I didn't feel anything." Weird was my middle name, and changing the subject was quickly becoming my game. "So there's got to be a reason why Ian came to the U."

Ronan paced the half-empty parking lot, one hand fisted at his side, the other fingering the scabs on his neck. Thirteen parking spaces separated us, enough distance for now.

Adam glanced at his watch. "Riley has the university on a dead zone list. It makes it the perfect place for a paranormal ambush."

"What the heck's a dead zone?" My stomach caved in waiting for the answer.

"Dead zones naturally kill magic. Best guess is that it's due to dead ley lines and the earth or people can't emit energy."

Son of a dead zone bitch.

The SUV's engine spluttered, shuddered, and croaked. I picked at a ragged cuticle, flipped the fringe on my retro suede jacket. Color me cursed. Adam clicked the engine button off and on, receiving a metallic grinding for his effort. He punched his finger on the screen of the diagnostic computer, scrutinized the readouts.

A breeze whipped a sheet of paper at the side of Ronan's head. He grabbed at it, trod into a puddle of freshly dumped coffee. Curses chased after the paper and he stomped his boot on a patch of grass. Poor guy. Hexes come and go when you play with me.

The engine rumbled into a smooth purr. Adam cast me a quizzical look, and I gave him a thumbs-up. At least I had a positive attitude about my unfortunate destructive tendencies.

Thankfully, my skin had quit poking me to death. I rolled down the window and beckoned to Ronan. Quiet and tolerant as a mute mummy, he clambered into the front seat. Adam drove into traffic, his fingers dancing across the computer. I fidgeted in my seat, the creaking leather grating on my last happy nerve. My heart rate sped up the closer to the university we traveled.

Ronan interrupted my troubled thoughts. "Sorry 'bout that."

Without thinking, I combed my fingers through his silky hair, caressing his cool neck, leaving a trail of gooseflesh that traveled up my arm and warmed a jagged path to my heart. Why tall, dark, and barbarian of all people? It wasn't as if Ronan was attracted to me, but something existed between us. When his aura wasn't trying to off me, it was calming, akin to a soul deep tie. A connection I wanted to test drive around for a while. There might even be Belgian chocolate at the finish line...or Adam. Another note to self: zap my brain cells when I get home.

"Again, what's our plan?" Before my hands did something stupid, I switched to ruffling Fin's short fur. She nudged my hand for me to scratch behind her ears.

Too much going on and I was getting lost in thought. A scary place, I might add. I had so much to learn before I went off half-cocked on my own. Zoe was my first priority.

Ronan stared forward at the thickening traffic. At the rate we traveled, Zoe would be a vengeful ghost by the time we got to the university chapel. First haunting: Aria Elle Walker.

"Count on multiple trackers and we go with Aria's plan." Ronan sounded like he was biting off words and spiting them out. "If the university's not in a dead zone, can you spread out your aural block? My jacked-up magic may not slip by detectors."

Inwardly, I gloated. "Probably." Linking our auras was the only way to do it. "Adam too?" My good aura and Ronan's residual power should be strong enough to tackle Adam's taint.

"Why'd I know you were going to say that?" Through glittery silver-flecked eyes, he tossed me a sideways calculating look. Fin's tail whisked up a breeze. "How many can you knock out while shielding us?"

"With the way my power's been acting, a few within ten to twenty feet."

"How close do we have to be?"

"Maybe two to three yards."

"How exactly do you knock them out?" Adam swerved to avoid a driving-impaired lane changer. He slapped his palm on the horn, letting it blast for a few seconds, the loud honk drowning out the indecision wailing in my brain.

I nibbled on my lower lip, tempted to chomp on a fingernail, and smoothed the fur on Fin's neck. Did I have a rent-to-own deal with Satan, or what?

Adam busted out laughing. "After all this, you distrust me?" His laughter held such warmth, I felt like an idiot savant for holding back.

I didn't trust Adam any less than I trusted Ronan. My secret telekinesis had been such a private part of my whole life. Now I had two strangers with whom to entrust my most precious secret. One already knew what it meant to be a freak of nature. Both were sinking into my soul with an awakening that left me reeling. I resisted the urge to dip my fingers into Ronan's soft, thick hair again.

Adam flicked on his right blinker. "If it bothers you that much—"

"No. You've exposed your whole being to me when you didn't have to. I respect that."

"You'll kill us if we tell anyone?" Ronan chuckled.

He laughed! Did a blizzard blast hell last night?

"That's the deal." If they betrayed me, I could always drizzle them with curses for the rest of their lives. Eventually, I'd figure out how.

The mere thought of how my telekinetic energy had morphed and expanded last night sent my brain spinning. I tried to bury the thought, but it kept rising faster than a hungry zombie. Could I control my power better? What if I failed? What if it had happened because of Ronan's proximity?

As casually as I could manage, I said, "It's an instantaneous telekinetic hypnotism. I mind bend them into a deep sleep. I can't explain it. I just think someone asleep and he is. Lights out, Snoozeville. Ya know, brain wave to brain wave." An odd tense vibration shifted the aura bubble around us. "Well, it's not like I've done it a lot." I wiped my sweaty palms on my pants. "Not counting the two, you know the ones I accidentally, not on purpose...killed." I almost choked on the word and it left me reluctant to ever use my abilities. If my life was threatened again, I'd have to focus harder to restrain my power to prevent a deathblow.

To think they feared me, tiny Aria Elle Walker. Didn't Ronan's telekinetic talents work the same way? I'd tax his brain about it later. Hopefully, it wouldn't hurt much.

"Um, guys, what's the deal if it's a dead zone?"

"You still got your zapper?" Ronan pulled out his gun and did his anal check again. "What do you feel? Do you still have your magic?"

It still seemed weird calling my ESP "magic." It scared me, because it solidified the fact that not only was my telekinesis illegal, I was a criminal. The government may not have originally written the laws to distinctively forbid ESP as Forbidden magic, but they would now if they knew about us.

I patted my hip for my stun gun hanging on a belt loop. Magic rumbled inside me, ready for action. I tossed out a feeler of aural energy and Ronan's hair stood erect as if the roof was full of static electricity. "Yep. I work."

Adam laughed and Ronan smoothed down his hair, shaking his head and grumbling to his other selves.

Adam parked behind the university's multi-purpose court. A sterling moon slivered the northern sky, granting little illumination. An amethyst sky gobbled the tail of the sun and twilight's first stars glittered. An occasional student and security droid wandered the near-deserted campus.

We had thirty minutes to cruise the grounds and move into lynch mob position. It appeared safe for Adam to go one way, Ronan and I another. We decided to split up to keep Adam from being detected if Ronan and I were followed. Adam's screwed aura would send bio-energy tools through the nearest stargate, shifting any focus off him. Enough people milled around the campus to clue Ian and potential crew into thinking they were picking up random paranormal footprints.

Ronan and I moved within the shadows of the buildings. We dashed from one structure to another, ducking behind bushes, trees, and garbage cans, evading as much security camera detection, human and droid contact as possible.

The narrow silhouette of a one-story building hid us as an under eaves camera made its sweep. Unused to this cloak and dagger routine, my heart raced. February's humidity seeped through my clothes. I rubbed my hands together, now wishing for those elusive gloves.

Tightness rolled down Ronan's back as he leaned into me. "They're not motion activated," he murmured. He took my hand and we resumed the mission impossible.

Adrenaline blazed through me, a rampant wildfire I hadn't experienced since...ever. I had a difficult time deciphering whether it stemmed from danger or something even more sinister, such as desire. Whatever. I bottled up my spineless jelly senses to focus on the meet and greet.

The whirl of a droid's wheels hissed behind us. Ronan towed me between two brick buildings. As the security droid rolled closer, my heart began to drum a rock solo. A cool breeze kicked up, swaying tree branches in a frenzied dance. It swept the spike of warmth out of me and my teeth chattered anew. I had a hard time concentrating on keeping my electromagnetic energy on an even keel.

The droid skated past us intent on an abandoned backpack dumped on a bench ten yards away bordering a lawn area. Its monotone voice called in a report, and the click of a camera eye filled the quiet night with a sense of normalcy. Oops. A ditzy blonde cell must've escaped, since normal had pulled a one-eighty on me.

"You still have magic?" Ronan asked.

"Yes. Guess it's not a dead zone."

Ronan went all frowny. "What little magic I had is dead. I can't feel anything here."

"Maybe your pops was wrong. He's not the Master of Wikipedia, is he?"

Ronan hooted. "He wishes."

"Hey." I fisted my hand in my pocket until my arm hurt. "What did you feel at the Rift?"

Once we escaped the droid's sensory range, we continued on our way. Automatic landscape lights flashed on, providing more illumination than we wanted. We passed an overflowing garbage compactor, and the stench of rotting bananas barraged my nose. Thanks, but I already popped my daily dose of potassium.

"When I went to the park the first time with my father, I felt like I was being eaten alive from the inside out."

I eased closer to Ronan's side, shivering from his download as much from the night in wintry Iceland. All of a sudden, he wrapped his arm around me, tugging us behind a palm tree. Dry papery fronds rasped together. Two college-aged guys skulked by, gazes darting left to right, silent, treacherous. My heart began that incessant pounding again. I leaned into Ronan, my power boiling to the surface. A low throb in my jaw radiated to my temples.

“There it is,” the taller of the two guys said and streaked toward the droid rifling through the backpack on the bench.

I kept tabs on my power, despite the false alarm. It cost me a dull headache whenever I forcibly focused too often on holding in brain waves that tried to escape. Or when unlucky thirteen wanted to walk all over me.

Ronan dipped his head and whispered in my ear, “That was further proof the Rift was already leaking from the earthquakes. Magic existed before I’d done a thing.”

A breeze carried the smell of dampness and mold, adding the flavor of distaste to Ronan’s tale. I froze in the elongated shadow of a three-story building. Despite the temperature, my palms sweated. “What would you feel if the Rift was fully open?”

“According to the Illuminaria, intense energy. More extreme than the energy the three of us whip up together.” The silver moon highlighted the flecks of charcoal in Ronan’s eyes brighter than the stars twinkling in the indigo sky. “When my father forced me to invoke the spell to open it, magic wrenched on me, trickled into me. It belonged inside me in every sense.” He cupped a hand around my neck and the heat of his fingers lingered in a wash of pained pleasure. “Like thousands of bodies and minds had invaded me and wanted to hijack my body.”

When I absorbed energy from around me, I hardly noticed it any longer. It totally belonged inside me or as part of my aura. I pressed my neck into his hand. Revulsion kicked off a rave in my stomach, but I forced it into a tea party. “Now?”

He bent his head to my ear again, his warm breath fanning my lobe. “Since I met you, the feelings have caved. I feel alive again, like I’ve found salvation.”

Tremors traveled up from the hollow of my back, and I realized it was Ronan’s arm trembling around my waist. The weight of his gaze weakened my knees. Shock struck me and my heart lurched madly. A slender, delicate thread formed between us and I sensed his vulnerability. I clutched his leather jacket in my freezing fists. The warmth of his body offered me no comfort as our auras spun in an unpleasant mix of dread and sorrow.

He gathered me closer. “You want to open the Rift now, Aria?” he whispered, his voice soft, dangerous.

Chapter 10

I registered Ronan's words, losing the ability to breathe for a moment. Did I want to toy with the Rift in any way, shape or form? Was the energy there different from what I already attracted and absorbed? Would I be able to fight off my unluck the way I can when I know it's coming? Can I trade this assignment for the one behind door number 7?

We rounded a bend and the church rolled into view, dark and ominous under a slash of pale moonlight. According to Ian, the tower doors would be unlocked, the church undergoing remodeling. We cased the perimeter. No foreign magic intruded upon my senses outside my aura shield. "Aura shield" was just my snazzy tag for jumbling my energy and the energy I absorbed from around me into a force field of indeterminate energy, or magic I guess. Usually, I blocked my telekinetic footprint if other ESPs sniffed around me as if I was a catnip-scented mouse to a fat cat. This happened more often than I cared to admit. So much for the Abolishment. So much for a fake dead zone too. My magic was doing a little smirking inside me, wanting to go bat-shit crazy on kidnapper Ian.

A window halfway up the tower reflected a wedge of moonlight, liquid illumination dripping into the tower and chasing away the bogeyman shadows to reveal the menacing double doors. I flicked the safety on and off my stun gun with one hand, clasped the other around my lucky charm. The electricity buzzing within me couldn't dial down my erratic heartbeat. My muscles tensed as I prepared for bounty hunters to attack.

Ronan drew me into the undulating shadows of winter-bare trees. "Do you feel energy from anyone else? I still don't sense a thing." He sent out a jagged feeler of energy that sputtered at our feet.

"Just your faulty aura," I whispered, wishing I could bolster him with my powers.

He slicked his hair off his forehead, winced as he hugged his bad arm to his side. "Am I hurting you?"

"No." My fingernails dug trenches in my palm. I loosened my clench around my pendant. "If this is a dead zone, I'd know it by now." A white owl ruffled a palm tree and screeched off into the night. I nearly lurched out of my thong.

The grunting of an injured man carried to us from inside the bell tower. Obviously, he wasn't trying to hide the racket. Ronan hefted his gun and motioned me out of the way. I drew my stun gun and hopped safely behind him. Stupid wasn't my middle name. He was bigger and badder than me. I mentally readied a knockout spell for blastoff. The Aria Special was just for bad luck backup.

The grunting evolved into drawn out groans. The cool, prickly air carried a soft thumping, like someone dragging a sack of body parts across gravestones.

Ronan motioned for me to hang back while he snuck around the tower. My heart pulsed into turbo mode. It wasn't every day I became embroiled in a high stakes illegal paranormal revolution. Like you hadn't already been hit with a cluestick.

I peeked around the adobe wall. Ronan's silhouette disappeared through the doors. A bird whistle rang to my left, and Adam's aura grazed my cheeks like sandpaper. Suddenly, his firm chest pressed against my back, boosting my armor a smidge. I knew I shouldn't need it, but, hello, my comfort zone was far, far away.

"Coast is clear, security and a few kids. What's going on?" He spoke low in my ear.

A gargled yell echoed inside the bell tower followed by a thud against the interior walls. The clatter of metal scraping a wall resonated through my skull and prodded us into action. Adam lunged for the door. I ran fast on his heels, clamping a restraint on my seething power. My pounding head screamed for release. With Ronan and Adam's intoxicating, rabid energy assaulting me, it was increasingly difficult to control my own. I didn't usually live by the saying, "payback's a bitch," but kidnapper Ian would live to regret that night.

Adam kicked the right side door open, an ebony gun a startling clash against his ashen hand. I scuttled to the closed side of the thick wooden doors.

"Damn it, Riley." Ian's husky Scottish burr tipped off his identity. "Leave off the force."

I shoved past Adam into the square tower, my gaze zipping around the cluttered room. No redheaded firebrand met my frantic search among the construction debris. Ronan rested his booted foot on a burly man's hip. Sporting thick chestnut hair, he looked in his early twenties. The dude flopped on his side on a spattered painter's tarp. How much of the red splotches were blood versus paint? A wet stain darkened the left shoulder of Ian's gray T-shirt. Blood flowed from his right thigh, staining his jeans a deep purple. Gunshots, I presumed. Both must have missed major arteries or organs since Mr. Scottish looked more alert than a whore on a crack diet.

"Where's Zoe, you piece of shit?" I primed my stunner. "If you've hurt her, I'm gonna zap the life out of you."

"Gone." Ian began hacking up a lung. A crimson flush stole across the pain crinkling his handsome, whiskered face.

So help me thirteen, I wanted to yank those crinkles into ditches until I got answers. With all the frosty hatred I was able to muster on my face, I took a step toward him.

Ronan held out his hand. "Hold off." His gaze impaled me with a warning.

He had one lousy minute before I got my spin at the Highlander prick.

Ronan shifted his boot off Ian's hip. "Start talking and maybe we'll call an ambulance."

An expression of part evil and mostly pain consumed Ian's feeble grin. Blood loss changed his skin to vampire white. An ambulance might be too late for him the longer we delayed medical treatment. I think he knew it by the look eating the arrogant satisfaction in his eyes. Still I didn't trust him and wanted him tied up.

"Do you want a swift death or a crawling, tortuous one?" I nudged my foot into the blooming stain on his leg.

He roared bloody murder and grabbed my boot. His waning strength propelled me off balance, twirling me onto a sawhorse. Before I could say, "Hells bells," I was tumbling to the floor. My head crashed into an aluminum ladder and my left hand struck a saw blade. The blade serrated my palm as my hand slid to the canvas covering the floor. Pain blazed up my arm and unconsciousness flirted with my mind.

Shouts and scuffles ensued. My aching back and thudding head beat me into submission. The four bells towering above me multiplied into a dozen. I closed my eyes to stop the spinning and ringing, the nauseating sinking of despair as fate tossed another bad luck wrench into my village square. If I died, who'd save Zoe?

Adam's face floated above me. "Aria." Concern pebbled his voice. "Where does it hurt?"

I opened my mouth to speak but my throat had gone Sahara dry. A tear slipped down my cheek. I didn't think I was crying. Maybe my head was numb and leaking.

Adam's hands tightened on my shoulders. "Talk to me, Blondie."

I cracked open my eyes. "Blondie?" That cut past the desert in my throat. Zoe was the only one who had the nerve to call me Blondie. A tiny cheerleading squad tossed pompoms in the pit of my stomach. A lock of his translucent hair curled around my mess of short tresses. "You're one to talk." His relief trembled against me in his exhaled breath. Air wavered, and Adam's aura surrounded me in warm and fuzzies, chased by flakes of cold taint.

I didn't much care for this artificial reality if it was going to hurt so badly. "Other than a concussion, a sliced palm, and a twisted ankle, I'm okay." I rolled onto my side, patted my hair into place.

Adam gently pulled me into a hug, cradling me against his six-pack abs beer companies would kill for. After they killed for Ronan's tanned six-pack. I buried my face against his shoulder, inhaling his citrusy, amber cologne. Our magic generated waves of energy, sweeping the fog out of my brain until one measly thought blew away the mist.

"Let me at that scumbag!" Woozy, I wrestled out of Adam's arms. He hoisted me up, balancing me on my feet. I waited for the dizziness to pass, steadying my legs. "Ian's contribution to the population problem has just been accepted."

Ronan found masking tape in the construction gear and tied Ian's wrists behind his back and taped his ankles. He trained his gun at the goon's head. Said goon slumped on his side, a parody of pleasure contorting his pallid face.

My inner cat wanted to scratch his pleasure into pain so bad, I had to fight to keep my claws dangling at my sides. “Where’s Zoe? Who did this to you? Why did you want to meet us here?”

Ian’s mouth slackened and his eyes closed. He sagged onto his stomach, his body limp.

“No!” Outrage paralyzed me. Lightning strikes of luck filled my telekinetic receptors. Lucky for Ian, not me, as it ignited an excruciating fire in my battered body. I launched a wave of uplifting energy toward him. Air Drugs, one might call it. When I was twelve, I’d tried it on a neighbor’s cat after a car hit it. I kept the cat alive while I borrowed my neighbor’s motor scooter and zoomed to the vet who saved its eight other lives.

Ronan checked Ian’s neck pulse. “He’s alive.”

Ian’s eyelids fluttered up. “What’d you do to me?” His opaque gaze found a home on me.

“I can do more if you give it up.” My grip grew moist on my stun gun. Antsy as all get out, I danced from foot to sore foot.

“I didn’t hurt Zoe Marino. We have no need for her to die. I wanted you two, same as the other dozen trackers Riley sent.” His ragged breathing stabilized. “I was told this was a dead zone and a good place to make the trade without incurring your magic.”

Ronan cursed a blue streak under his breath. “Who took Zoe? Who told you this was a dead zone?”

Ian coughed, his body shaking hard. “Who do you think? We’re all fighting for the money. Thought I’d found an alliance. Said she had something to show me here. Instead, she betrayed me, set this up, and sicced your father’s dogs on me.” Another racking cough rattled him perilously close to comaland.

“Who?” Ronan growled out.

“Melisande—”

Ronan’s aura tickled mine, exploiting his hatred and fury toward the Botox hag. I gave Ian another boost of calming energy to keep him talking. It worked and didn’t cost me much since I was already in two worlds of hurt.

Ronan rose, stuffing his gun in his shoulder holster. “Someone betrayed her too. She’s dead.”

“Where’s Zoe?” I nudged my booted toes below the bloody trickle staining his pants. “Don’t make me ask again.”

Pain sunk the sides of Ian’s mouth and he gnashed his teeth. “Stop,” he cried. “I’m done with this shit. I didn’t sign up to die. Let me live, I’ll divert Riley away from you. I swear, man.”

Danger gleamed in Ronan’s eyes, and a smile twitched up the corners of his mouth. “Who the hell took Zoe and shot you up?”

“Micah Duprey.” Ian’s torso spasmed. The prick laughed as if his sanity was leaking out his new air holes.

Ronan growled and beat a fist into the adobe walls.

“Who’s Micah?” I whispered over my shoulder.

“One of Riley’s enforcers,” Adam replied. “More than a bounty hunter. Riley’s sparing no one to hunt you down.”

Ronan’s anguish smothered the air, bogged me down. Why was Ronan’s father so formidable that he hired enforcers and bounty hunters? Fresh waves of pain stung my palm, and I raised my scraped hand to rub away my terror.

Ian coughed. “Here’s a tip for you. Get out now, they’re coming back for you, if they aren’t already circling the wagons.”

Adam grabbed my wrist from behind me. “He’s right. We’re wasting time.”

Just as Adam said the words, my magic dwindled, as if an electronic deadener was approaching. And fast. “They’re here.”

I bolted and stumbled on the doorsill, falling face forward to the ground, catching myself on my hands and knees. White-hot pokers of fire burned my palms. More dots of pain to connect. Adam tripped over me and took a header into a planter of mulch nuggets. Ronan jerked me up, his chest against my back. He half carried, half pushed me toward the walled rose garden.

“Damn it, Aria. Watch what you’re doing.” As soon as we approached the gate, he released me.

Ire shot through me, becoming a normal emotion renting space in my body. “Thanks for the tweet.” Knees now throbbing, I sprinted through the gate into the garden, leaving Ronan on the other side of the wall. A body thumped to the ground behind me in the dark. My heart scudded in my chest. “Ronan?” No response. I slipped my injured hand in my jacket pocket. Empty. Just once, I’d love to use my stun gun before I died.

Rose bushes provided a paltry waist-high shield. I couldn’t even rely upon a cloud covering. The crescent moon and the sky of twinkling diamonds ratted me out. Power festered in me, but I feared using a knockout spell in case I hit Ronan. Not that it mattered because I think he was out cold.

“If you want to see Zoe Marino alive, I suggest you reveal yourself.” A nasally voice breached the night from the other side of the wall where Ronan had disappeared.

I slipped along the adobe fence closer to the wrought iron gate. “Where is she?” I hid in the shadowy cover of the twelve-foot high wall.

“On her way to Seattle,” he said, his stupidity vaccine working overtime.

Another presence drew nearer inside the garden. My alien body of perpetual mystery couldn’t absorb blocked energy from anyone at that moment.

I hugged the wall and tried to think, but my head thundered from its collision with the ladder. “What’d you do to Ronan?”

“He can’t help you. He’s taking a siesta.”

“Please.” I snickered. “Like I need help from any tool.” I received a hyena bark in response.

Security lights illuminated the other approaching man. A glow reflected off a thin silver rectangular gadget looped around his bull-neck. Although I’d never attempted to manipulate a spell against a deadener, there was a first time for everything, especially with my new meld of doppelgänger power. Mentally, I pitched a net of energy. It scuttled back onto me, showering me in stinging ice. Oh, hell, squared.

The man behind the wall strolled under the archway. Both cavemen leveled high-tech guns on me. I was pretty positive the goons had orders to take me alive, so I didn't fret about dying. But I bet the guns held illegal bio-deadeners. Enough to conk me out and stuff me in an airplane cargo hold. Fingers of ice twisted around my heart. I sure wanted to know what church picnic Adam had crashed. "Richard Riley Dominion Research trackers, I presume?"

"Good guess," Neanderthal number two grunted out, his voice deep and raspy.

Did DR get these goons from the Caveman Zoo? He strolled within three feet of me, one man at each shoulder. Both had a deadener strung around his neck.

Baldy grinned at me. "You're cuter than your friend. I've always been partial to blondes. How 'bout you, Frankie?"

"Nah, I love 'em red." A hunk of hacked auburn hair hung from his fist.

I ground my teeth at the sight of Zoe's tangled hair and tossed another wave of bad luck at them. It bounced back and spit static at me. "If you hurt her, I'll pluck out every hair from your bodies one-by-one, then torch you alive."

"Big words from a little gal." Baldy advanced on me. "You willing to come with us, or do we have to haul you out of here?"

Frankie moved a smidge and light glinted off both deadeners. Then a light-bulb moment whacked me. If I aimed a destructive wave of energy at one deadener, would the other counteract it and fry them both? It was worth a shot. Not like I had many options.

A mockingbird call from the dwarf palms by the bell tower split the thick air of evil. My aura swirled and I recognized Adam's crackling aura. Neither of my would-be captors appeared fazed by the noise.

The dark-haired man took another step closer. "Grab her, Milo, and let's get on the road."

"Wait!" I held up my hand, backing into a spikey rose bush. "I have a deal for you." I mushroomed that weak white flame in my brain and heat expanded as I imposed my will on it. I loosed an extra controlled barrage of energy, pushing against the dampeners, and flung it toward the two deadeners. Rose thorns pricked my butt but I needed the distance. I couldn't risk releasing too much energy in such close proximity if I jammed up the deadeners. No way was I killing anyone else, even if he was a walking argument for birth control.

The air screamed with the surge of energy. A bolt of electricity flickered between them, blinding me for a few seconds. The men roared and scrambled to thrust the sizzling deadeners off their chests. I ducked and skirted around them. Milo lunged and grabbed my legs, knocking us both to the ground. Air whooshed out of my lungs from the impact of my side slamming the damp grass. A mass of screeching nerves burned across my hips, down my legs. My body was so going to betray me and sign that ownership deal with Satan if I lived to see tomorrow.

Milo pinned me on my back, his bulk spread on top of me. “We gave you a choice,” he spat in my face. I scrunched my nose, the reek of roadkill on his breath murdering my sense of smell. “Give me the syringe, Frankie.”

Milo’s crushing weight numbed my torso, and I rotated my head to face Frankie. He rolled and writhed on the ground near the gate, moaning and sputtering. A landscape light illuminated a patch of singed cloth on his chest.

“Hell, we’ll do it my way.” Milo’s fingers dug into my upper arms. Laser pain stabbed my head.

I screamed. No. No. No. Not another Scrambler. I’d destroyed the deadeners that held back his ESP and he took full advantage. Stars exploded in my vision and I once again flirted with oblivion. Flickers of lightning zigzagged in my skull, snipping my energy receptors. I vaguely heard Milo chuckling, yet the rumble of his laughter jiggled along the length of me. Confusion muddled my mind and I was unable to draw upon my telekinesis. I gripped my focusizer, but it was cold and silent. I couldn’t even lift my knee to knock Milo’s family jewels into his throat.

Suddenly, the sound of a blunt object hitting flesh stilled the behemoth on top of me. The magic infiltrating my head cut off, and as quickly as the explosive pain invaded my skull, it vanished. The slumbering weight rolled off me and Adam pulled me to my feet.

“I’m gonna kill that bastard,” I managed to say through gritted teeth, balanced against his side.

Strength coursed into my muscles and I wheeled around. Baldy had toppled on top of the other in a mound of twitching cavemen, out like nightlights at sunrise. Or dead. I wasn’t about to stick around to ascertain which. I’d had enough of that night.

Between my tortured body and dragging a semi-conscious Ronan, Adam and I lumbered to the SUV without another clash from the Neanderthal Asylum. We decided to follow Zoe to Seattle ASAP. The crapfest had dinged Level Ten.

Adam called in an anonymous report of gunfire at the mission church and a plea to send an ambulance, and then we sped toward the airport, barely staying legal. I shoved my rescued stun gun in my pocket and splayed my fingers against my thumping head, needing a diversion to talk me off the ledge. Ronan flopped in the back seat, Fin sliming his face while he groaned and twitched. He assured us they’d only shot him with a bio-energy stun dart, but I still worried. However, from the grumbling overflowing his mouth, his He-Man pride hurt more than his body.

I leaned between the front seats and studied the half-comatose barbarian, his cloudy eyes open, blinking rapidly. Lines pulled at his mouth, etched the skin around his eyes. The pooch nuzzled me, wagging her tail in his face.

Cursing, he swatted at Fin’s rear. “Something you need to know.” He rolled onto his side. “They shot me with an ESP energy depressant my father’s team developed for the government to throw them off his real shit. Normal doses don’t work on me so they doubled up. It kills my magical bandwidth for hours. Not that I have any magic to kill right now. Thanks to the Rift. And you.”

Another evil eye had Ronan scowling at me. I laughed. “Have you been diagnosed? Your scowls don't work on me."

"Your rabid eye doesn't work on me either." He prodded his head, groaned. "Damn it. DR knows how strong you are now."

I straightened the fringe on my jacket. "Your father also knows for sure that we're together."

"Get me something to eat. It'll absorb the drug burning in my gut. Chocolate peanuts in the glove box."

Chocolate! Why didn't he give it up earlier? I rooted out a full bag of double-dipped, chocolate peanuts. One at a time, I fed them to him, sharing with Adam, tossing several into my mouth. Even the beggar Fin got a peanut after I bit off the chocolate. I was hungry enough to scarf down a fat, juicy burger and a bushel of fries, but the peanuts calmed the tempest brewing in my stomach. My thoughts wandered down Foodville, and I didn't notice Ronan nibbling on my fingers until he sucked the tip of my forefinger into his mouth.

The most intense flare of desire boiled the chocolate in my belly and left me craving...Ronan. I wrenched my hand away as if scorched.

"Feed me."

I stuck two peanuts between his lips, threw him the half-empty bag, and shrank into my seat in acute misery. The lines between no-man's land and reality city had blurred, and I needed to stop my southern federation from shipping out invitations. Holy cow. Ronan?

Silence bombarded us until we approached the airport. The SUV lurched to a stop at the light, and Ronan pushed his fists on the center console to steady his dead weight.

Adam swung the vehicle into the San Jose Jet Center and parked in the loading zone. Tongue-tied, I stared. The only kind of jet that flew in and out of the Jet Center was a private one. I'd never been on a private jet! That was more exciting than dwelling on a wrecked Rift, a psycho kidnapper and all-around evildoer. I sorely needed a break from my new hell in a nice private jet with my two doppel-hunks.

"Adam will fill you in some more on the plane." Ronan opened the back door. Fin leapfrogged over his lap to the ground.

"Why can't you?" I slid off the seat and held his arm while he steadied his legs.

"I'm flying commercial. I can't spend two hours on a plane with you."

A normal woman could be offended by that remark. "You can't go by yourself. You're not well. Your shoulder needs attention." I twisted my fingers on his jacket. An iron mass crushed my shoulders. Fear that I'd never see him again worked to destroy my confidence. "I'll be okay."

"Aria." He exhaled my name. Flares erupted in my awakening southern region. "I can't risk hurting you." He fisted his hand around mine. "I'll sleep it off on the plane. You'll be safe with Adam. The jet's secure, not traceable to us." He handed his gun to Adam for safe keeping. "I'll use Adam's identity."

"What about you? Your power's shot even without the depressant."

“I’m not exactly useless without it.” The corners of his mouth twitched.

Overhead lights altered his unfathomable eyes into molten silver pools. “Can you take another private jet?” The heat of his gaze seared me.

“We don’t have time to kill.” Caressing my chin, he slid his hand around my neck, teasing the hair at my nape.

I shivered from his touch and pressed into his hand. “Be careful,” I implored. “Please?”

He leaned forward, brushed his mouth across my forehead, and gently pried my fingers off his jacket. “Count on it.”

I watched him drive away, taking a part of me with him. It was more than just our entwined aura. Turning to Adam, I realized another part of me was eyeing me critically.

Chapter 11

Super-soft leather seats wrapped plushy comfort around my battered body. Fin rolled onto a doggy bed in a strapped-down pet carrier. Adam returned from the cockpit and took my crusty hand in his. I peered at the first aid kit on his lap. “Dr. Freshfields?”

A smile lit his sickly face, his dimple an abyss of heaven. He oh-so-tenderly cleaned my cut. The attention gave me a chance to memorize his face. I loved his boyishly charming smile that twinkled in his ever-changing eyes. Despite his pasty coloring, the shifting washed-out hair, and his one pointy ear, he’d retained his smooth skin and model bone structure. His beauty extended far deeper than skin level. With our aural bond, it was easy for me to envision his true self beyond the cadaver coloring. Of course, I only had to look at Ronan to recognize the darker side missing from Adam. If only the fairies would sprinkle light and happy dust on Mr. Grumpy.

“What do you do for a living? Is this your bird?” The antibacterial solution stung, and I forced my bellyaching body to suck it up.

“I’m a VP in my family’s import, export business, Freshfields International. The plane belongs to the corp.”

My brows hiked into my hairline. “That Freshfields?” It hadn’t registered earlier that I was tag-teaming with a member of one of the richest families in California. He sure didn’t appear the corporate VP rolling in a gazillion dollars. Not that I’d ever dated any white-collar corporate types at my age. I usually attracted tall, cheap, and dumb. “And so young?”

“Surprised?” His humble laugh feathered across my skin.

My hand flinched from the prickly aural energy—guess I should break down and just start calling it magic—his touch triggered. “Should I curtsy when I address you?”

“A simple kiss will suffice.” Adam laid my doctored hand on the pillowy armrest. He tossed his baseball cap on the seat in front of us, his opalescent hair flowing free. It had grown several inches since yesterday despite the locks that continued to fall out. The electrified tresses swayed in a nonexistent breeze, reaching for me and fluttering in the energy my aura kicked up.

The plane taxied down the runway, but my gaze remained unwavering on Adam. The bird ascended, thrusting us against the seats. He leaned into me and his mouth claimed mine in a brief, heart-skipping kiss. Soft and firm, his lips tasted faintly of spearmint. His aura pooled warmly around mine. Fingers on my mouth, I quickly drew apart. My pulse skittered and his touch melted me into the seat. His violet eyes glistened with an unknown promise, leaving my mouth blazing. This was so wrong when I had feelings for both Adam and Ronan and my heart was working overtime trying to figure it out. I eased away as much as the seatbelt allowed.

“Did...did you feel that?” he rasped out.

“Definitely weird.” Several degrees of guilt sprinkled cold water on our mingled auras. Ronan’s frowny face sprang to mind, not that he truly ever left it.

Two men, one Aria. What was a girl to do? I twisted my clasped hand, rubbed my temples, spurring my last two brain cells to work in harmony for a change.

He straightened in his seat, shaking from my frosty aural blast. “I’ve never felt...I think the Rift —” He hesitated. “Our auras are intertwined,” he blurted out. “At the house I felt your aura around me, not inside me. Ronan and I are connected that way. I never knew it until he told me what I was sensing.”

Dazed, I nodded, feeling the hollowness inside my core, a missing piece. It might be Adam’s tainted magic causing the emptiness, or not. Even though I sensed a smidge of Ronan within Adam’s aura, part of him was absent from the equation. Can I freak out now? Doppelgänger magic? Two halves of a whole? What kind of magic did the Rift spit out? Fairy dust love potions?

“Aria?” Anxiety stamped his face. “I’m sorry.” He squeezed my knee.

What if we didn’t make it to the Rift in time and I lost both of them to the tainted magic? Whoa, what? I didn’t even have both of them to lose. I’d met them less than forty-eight freaking hours ago. Who was playing such a sick joke on me? I needed an instant lobotomy to stop the chaos in my brain.

Even though I so desperately wanted both doppelgängers in my life, a tiny part of me didn’t. I didn’t want them only to lose them. I had serious abandonment issues. Every morning I called Zoe to make sure she was kicking and hadn’t toppled me off her BFF pedestal. At least with the doppel-twins, I needn’t worry about my wacky telekinesis chasing them away. Scared spitless, I didn’t know who I was, let alone who wanted me. Or who I wanted.

I picked at a spot of caked blood on my jeans. “We need to focus on the Rift, healing you and Ronan.”

Adam hunched over, probing his pointy ear as if he felt it growing. “Tell me one thing.”

“Sure.” I leaned into him, tilted my face toward the need in his eyes. My heart spooled.

“How do you feel about Ronan?” His jaw tensed. He lowered his hand and a lock of hair stuck to his fingers. Flicking his wrist, he scowled as the lock of hair fluttered to the floor.

Heat rushed up my neck. “I feel the same...I feel...Ronan in your aura. It’s confusing.” No illusions would mar my relationships—whatever they evolved into—with Ronan and Adam. Note to self: find a doppel-magic cluestick, and fast.

The plane leveled to cruising altitude and Adam unbuckled our seatbelts. His warm hand lingered on my thigh, gently drawing thirteens on my pant leg. “Ronan and I speculated about this over a bottle of Irish whiskey when we discovered we were doppelgängers and began sensing each other's energy and aura. We wondered what would happen if one of us found a woman whose magic merged with one of ours, what she'd feel. We knew it was a possibility since ancient sorcerers and their doppelgängers were connected the same way. We wondered what it would do to the other. And we laughed it off." He snorted, his derision all but palpable in the air. "I'm not laughing now."

"I'm sorry," I whispered to the vast, bleak clouds I felt from the occasional bump of turbulence in our dark haven in the sky. After a moment of tense silence, I asked, "How did you really determine you two were doppelgängers?"

"Like we said earlier, it's a big guess based on Forbidden Thirteen history." Adam touched my shoulder, but the blinking beacon of hope on the wing captured my bleary gaze. "We'll work it out." He yawned with loud exaggeration. "Hungry?"

"Starving!" A shaky sigh of relief chased my reply. One more thing to add to that mental journal of items to dwell on later. Soon I wouldn't have capacity left, and I'd have to start checking things off that list, reformat my brain's hard drive, or proceed with that lobotomy.

We ate a gourmet dinner of fresh garden salad, steak, garlic mashed potatoes, and sourdough bread slathered in butter. By the time I pushed away the empty dessert plate, I felt ready to pop out extinct fairies.

The creamy taste of cheesecake lingered on my tongue. Ibuprofen appetizers lessened the brunt of my aches and pains, and I wilted into my pillowy seat, the faint roar of the engines lulling me toward Snoozeville. My mind relived the heady heat of Adam's kiss even as I found his nearness both puzzling and exciting. Yet, the memory of Ronan's tan face and his full, firm lips pressed against my forehead refused to grant me quarter.

The flight attendant cleared away our dinner dregs. Adam dimmed the lights and romantic starlight twinkled in the black abyss. The flight attendant carried in mugs of coffee on a tray, and the scent of caramel mocha nearly launched my pulse into the next galaxy.

"How'd you become a VP at such a young age?" I sipped my ambrosia.

Shadows hazed Adam's eyes for a second. "My father died last year from an aneurysm. I was next in line when my mom became CEO."

"I'm so sorry." I smoothed my hand over his knee. "Which parent do your fae genes stem from? Is anyone else affected?" I whispered discretely.

"It's a mystery." He smiled ruefully. "As far as I know it's just me. My mother hasn't seen me recently since she's been in Ireland opening up a new factory."

Steam wafted from my coffee. "Aren't you curious?" I gently blew into my cup. "Maybe she knows...things."

"She was adopted. So was I. Plus, she wouldn't know a fairy from a dragonfly. I've tried to track down my real parents, but the trail is deader than dead. Almost as if I didn't exist, as if I just popped out of the Rift after the quakes."

My eyes bugged out. Could it be true? Had other sorcerers, fae, or doppelgängers oozed through the gateway from the Realm of the Void? Were they roaming the world trying to figure out what's wrong with them and who they are?

“Who or what else skipped through the Void and is playing in our sandbox?”

“No telling.” Leaning forward, he sized me up with an intent look. “You know, if we figure it out, we may close the Rift, secure it again. I’m hoping Melisande’s tablet has new info Ronan’s never seen.”

Shock cooled the warmth of the coffee sliding down my throat. I straightened my spine, planted my feet on the floor. “Don’t you start popping circuits too. Shouldn’t we open the Rift, let the pure magic out and deal with the consequences later? Isn’t that the only way to heal you two? What happens if we close the Rift, even if it’s possible? Will you disappear...or worse?” I swallowed hard. We hadn’t really discussed goals beyond stopping Ronan’s sperm donor and rescuing Zoe. “Why wouldn’t we want sorcery restored and usurp the Abolishment laws enacted by pea-brained humans?”

“It’s dangerous. We don’t know what will happen when the Rift opens and Forbidden magic is fully unleashed. We have no clue what will come out. Plus, it’s illegal to practice magic.”

“NUW won’t have a choice but to lift the Abolishment and change the laws against magic.” Excitement started my foot tapping. “It’d be wicked cool living next door to fairies and sorcerers.” I set my empty cup aside.

He gawked at me as though I’d opened a demon gate, sprouted horns and a scaly tail. “Not if Ronan’s father has his way and nabs all the Thirteen sorcerers for his world domination goal. They’re supposedly the strongest, or will be, of their descendants. Residual magic’s been building and regenerating throughout the years, probably more so since the quakes. What happens if others have the same ideas once magic escalates? We’re talking world chaos.”

“Then we go back to the incubation box. It’s best to toss out the dumb laws, anyway.” I gave an annoyed sniff. Silent, he pinched the bridge of his nose. “FYI...Ronan’s rubbing off on you.” He might have a teensy, tiny point, but I wasn’t ready to play the acceptance card. “With magic unleashed, groups such as Dominion Research won’t have a donut’s chance in a police station.”

His pale eyebrows drew together in a V at the bridge of his nose. “Who’ll control the Forbidden from destroying the human race once magic becomes rampant again?”

“Okay.” I swished my hand in the air. “We’ll need ten boatloads of cash to buy all the clues.” My thoughts resurfaced in morbid land. “What if the Rift continues to crumble naturally? It’s already been fractured from the quakes and Ronan messing with it.”

“We’ll need to focus on that problem ASAP.” A silken edge of warning rose in his lackluster voice. “That’s even worse to imagine depending on how fast the tainted magic has already infected the world.”

“God, Adam.” I thrust forward and threw my arms around his neck. His strong arms embraced me in comfort, regardless of the unnatural heat of his body temperature. “I wish I could heal you.” I buried my face against his shoulder. “And Ronan.” You can’t walk in with a short shelf life and leave me to tackle this on my own.

He caressed my hair. “I know, Blondie.” The air conditioner kicked on. Despite my layers, I shuddered. Adam needed the cool temp to alleviate his perpetual fever, to provide him a skosh of relief from the faulty magic burning him from the inside out.

I settled back into my seat, needing distance from his aura wrapping me in the feel of him. “How did you and Ronan find each other at the Rift?”

He took a swig of coffee and set the mug aside. “I was on a business trip in Seattle when Ronan went back to the Rift after his first attempt to open it with his father. He tried to close it on his own. I had the bizarre idea to go hiking in Washington Park. My fairy connection to the earth—or to Ronan—was working, I guess.” He shrugged. “Not that I knew it at the time. But strange energy drew me to the Rift where I found Ronan, his heart barely beating. I thought he was dying.” His legs tensed. “He was out of it, babbling weird things.”

The jet flew into a patch of clouds, rocking us side-to-side. I grabbed the armrests as Adam steadied our mugs. As swiftly as the plane escaped the roiling clouds, his mood soared and starlight swept a tender curve to his mouth.

“What strange things?” I eased up on the armrests before they absorbed my hands.

“Stuff about my life. Things no one should know. Later, I had visions about Ronan’s life. Anyway, we found no link to prove we might be related other than our research on doppelgängers.” He raised his hands, dropped them.

“Do you still have visions?”

“No, but our auras are intertwined now. At first, we were able to draw energy from each other. Not anymore.” He propped his feet on the edge of my seat. “Hey, tell me how your telekinesis works.”

My telekinesis had always been difficult to define, something I’d taken for granted since I always believed I was alone with the ability. Now I knew the mother ship had opened its hatch.

“You know, telekinesis, the ability of the mind and body to manipulate matter, time, space, or energy. My abilities have soared radically since I was a teenager.” I wasn’t ready to cough up how much energy I absorbed to enhance my innate energy. Such a secret might keep me alive longer. I held my pendant, rubbed the enameled pattern. “The unexplainable part is how the number thirteen affects me. It basically causes bad luck when I’m not paying attention, sometimes sneaks up on me. When I sense it, which is when my aura starts to tingle around me, my head aches or my pinkies twitch, I can usually stop the bad luck from hitting me by counterattacking it with my telekinesis. I use my necklace as a focusizer. It acts as a conduit of aural energy. Whenever the number thirteen’s around me randomly, it usually precipitates a bad luck event.”

“But you wear a number thirteen on you.” His eyebrows lifted up.

“Its base metal is copper beneath the enamel. Copper’s a bridge for energy, or magic. It provides protection and is a conductor that draws away negative energy.” I fluttered my hand, sketched numbers on the outside of my coffee cup. Adam rubbed his leg against mine provocatively. My mind drew a blank, all thoughts flying out into the ether.

“Go on.” He chuckled, stopping his flirtation.

I blinked rapidly, dispelling the fluttering in my lower abdomen. “That’s it. What else is there?” Every sore muscle in my body stretched painfully tight. “What did Ronan tell you?”

I frowned. “But then how does his tattoo negate bad luck? There’s no copper in it.”

“Exactly. He hasn’t relied on it since he was fourteen, and mostly has control over his power, enough to thwart his bad luck. You probably never needed your necklace with the kind of power you have.”

I scoffed. “Seriously? I get hit with bad luck every day. How else do you think I’m still alive if I don’t drive it away?”

“Did you ever think your necklace might be drawing it to you?”

“Hell to the no way. I lived nearly sixteen years without it. My unluck was ten times worse before.”

“It’s all in your head, and now it’s all in your strength and control of your telekinesis, the older you grow.” Adam reached forward and uncurled my fingers from around my pendant. “Take it off.”

Did a stupid ghost possess him the last time I blinked? A Baja sandstorm seized my mouth. “What?” I scrunched against the sidewall, but he wouldn’t relinquish his hold on my chain. “No. I can’t do anything without it. Bad luck will kill me.” The lie rolled off my tongue. I don’t know why I said it, why I was hiding my abilities, my last bastion of normalcy.

“Please, Aria. I want you to try something.”

“You think I don’t know what I can and can’t do?” I retorted. Without a focusizer, I got lost within my own head. It wasn’t a pretty picture. I hated not having control. My abilities were growing and it frightened the crap out of me, especially since my aura wasn’t entirely mine. I always wondered if all the energy I absorbed might have a lasting detrimental effect on me. Or land me in jail.

Adam pushed up from his seat and grasped the armrests, pinning me between his steely arms. “Everything’s different now.”

“Any connection between your reality and mine is purely coincidental.” I tossed my head and eyed him with flinty triumph. “The Rift crumbling doesn’t affect me.” After everything they’d told me, I knew it had. What else explained my soaring abilities?

“I think it did.” Adam’s voice dropped an octave. “As I weaken, you grow stronger. I feel it in your aura.”

I’d noticed a difference, but I chalked up my recent souped-up power to our eerie threesome bond. What he suggested was three sorcerers short of the Forbidden Thirteen. I shook my head vehemently. “I’m not stealing your magic. Don’t put that on me. If anyone, Ronan’s stealing it.”

“I didn’t say that.” He crouched, his arms caging me in, blotchy aura cloaking me. “You’re keeping our magic alive, feeding us through our shared bond.” His opaque hair quivered over his shoulders, a drifting mantle of snow.

“You’ve snapped a bolt. Let me go.” I elevated my feet on the seat to push against his confining arms. Fin trotted over and uttered a short, happy yip as if I held a steak bone...or her bestie, Ronan, had materialized on the plane.

I shook my head so hard brain cells packed their bags and hopped on a cloud. “Get real. I’ve had these abilities all my life.” The lies continued to snowball off my icy tongue.

“We both know that’s not entirely true. You were born with the blood of a Thirteen sorcerer. As the magic leaks out of the Rift, you channel it and unleash it through your own breed of telekinesis.” He drew closer, his heat flickering around me.

For the trifecta of my scorn, I gave him my evil eye, a glare, and a scowl. “Did you sneak a bottle of tequila in the galley?” I asked feebly, knowing the truth was staring me in the face. I couldn’t escape it. Adam and Ronan knew too much.

“Some of the abilities you possess are unheard of. They’re powers only a Thirteen sorcerer exhibited, as far as sketchy ancient texts explain.”

“I’m not a fairy or sorcerer or whatever else existed in ancient Whack Job Town.” My aura rose defensively, suppressing my roadmap of body aches. I raised my hand to grip my necklace. Adam beat me to it, yanked the chain off my neck, and hurled it toward the galley in one dumbass move.

I skidded off the runway. Hands on Adam’s shoulders, I shoved him flying backward to land against the couch across the aisle. Air held him down, and I sprang toward him.

Eyes glowing, he attempted a crappy mesmerism stunt to compel me to freeze. He exuded the illusion of freedom, rising from the couch, but I hacked through his newly minted illusion powers as if he were an ESP wannabe. Wind swirled his hair into knots as fast as his livewire hair untangled the snarls.

The violet glow in his eyes winked out and empathy tightened his lips. Air held him immobile. “You just proved my point,” he said softly.

“Shut. Up.”

His aura had gone to ground, ripping a piece of my soul out of me. Heat swept over me, despite the cabin's frigidness, stabbing some sense into me. What had I done? What had I become? An unholy panic buckled my knees. My aura fizzled to nothing in the wake of my meltdown. Adam hauled me into his arms, and I buried my face against his chest. His aura bent around me, then shifted back to mingle with mine.

I grabbed a handful of his polo shirt. "Why me? I'm not a plain old telekinetic, am I?" I'm not Aria Walker, little ole college student, am I?

He grazed his hand up and down my back. "You're growing, changing. You've probably been able to do that for a long time."

I stiffened, recalling the first time I'd noticed odd sensations and occurrences when my emotions dove overboard and I couldn't redirect the energy. The day Mom died.

He swept tendrils of limp hair off my cheek. "You've noticed, haven't you?"

"I thought thirteen was jinxing my luck."

"Ronan noticed his ESP footprint shift last year too."

"Ronan's changes are a train wreck."

His hand stilled in the hollow of my back. "We thought you'd feel the same." He laughed, a grim humorless noise. "Instead, you're changing for the better."

"Better?" I grazed my chin along the contours of his pecs. "I thought my Catwoman superpowers arose from our aura meld. Maybe my doppelgänger is still in the Void." It seemed weird saying that. "Do you think?"

"That would be my guess, if one existed. Somehow the tainted magic isn't affecting you."

"Prepare for descent." The pilot's booming voice through the speakers nearly sent me leaping to the ceiling. A perfect excuse to put distance between us.

Adam tracked down my broken chain. The flight attendant cleaned up and headed to the galley. I slunk to my seat and strapped in. Fin hopped into her carrier and curled up for another pup-nap. Lucky bum.

Adam handed me my chain and pendant. "Forgive me? I'll replace it."

In dismay, I inspected the broken chain, hating that he'd resorted to brute tactics. It made me wary of him, despite my head and heart begging to trust him. What new secrets had my brain bribed my heart with?

I jammed the charm in my jeans front pocket and tossed the chain at him. He caught it easily. "So you won't forget."

"I won't forget to replace it." He clicked the seat buckle, the snap a loud definitive sound.

I gave him The Look. "That's not what I meant."

Adam's face hardened as if I'd slapped him. "It's a damn chain. I needed to prove a point."

Stripping off my personal belongings mirrored Ronan smothering my mouth outside the casino. The last two people to smother my will were permanently napping six feet under. Not by my hand, mind you, but dead nevertheless. I'd always thought my bad luck caused their deaths so long ago.

They deserved punishment, but not death. I recoiled, and hastily sank the Gruesome Twosome into my mind's dungeon.

“Points are for ice picks.” The plane dipped into the clouds, wobbled up and down. My ears popped as we sliced through the dense, roiling shroud. Waves of multi-hued lights below illuminated the huge city, jewels in a sea of the black unknown.

Fin whimpered in her sleep, probably dreaming of the big dogs pounding their will into her pretty little body. The plane began its final descent, and I braced myself against the seat for landing. A wintry hand grazed my heart.

Adam's soft voice pierced my frenzied thoughts. “Something good did come out of the Rift.” His fingers brushed my thigh and I flinched.

“You, probably. What else?” I could tell he wanted to touch me but feared my reaction. Even I feared me.

“Fin.”

I met the challenge in his stony, alien eyes. “What do you mean?”

“Fin came through the Rift. She hasn't grown an inch in six months.”

Chapter 12

The silent heat of epic astonishment severed the wintry grip on my heart. I contemplated Fin's soulful eyes, the thin web of energy wafting off her.

"You're not surprised?" Adam asked.

"I thought only magic cruised through the Rift." I unbuckled my seatbelt before the plane hit the ground. Arrest me for being a rule breaker.

He shrugged his hands. "We found Fin sitting on the ground in the Rift opening after Ronan screwed it up the second time. You have to admit she's not normal."

Point taken. We needed faster microprocessors in our brains to process Forbidden info overload. Or some Einstein cells.

The jet's wheels bounced on the tarmac. The pull of the brakes sucked me forward, and I clutched the armrest, grasping at reality again. I was raring to rescue Zoe. I even missed Ronan, although I couldn't fathom how he'd gotten under my skin so quickly, Thirteen connection and doppelgänger bond notwithstanding. He had and I did. Enough said.

I rose, rubbing away the sharp pain in my lower back. Fin molded her small body against my leg, leaving black fur on my pant leg. When the furballs at home got a load of this, I was so dead.

"Hey, Fin, what's up with you?" The mystery amplified the thumping in my head amid my brain's sluggish return to work. "What time is Ronan's plane landing?" I picked up my purse and the tote bag, felt for Mom's envelopes.

Adam gathered our bags from the inside storage bin. "We have an hour's lead. He's setting up a telecon with his father. We do nothing until he gets to the hotel."

Dying to drop an unlucky bomb on Dickard Riley, the idea of the telecon appealed to my sense of safety. Worrying for Zoe contributed to the persistent ball of fire in my gut. Ronan assured me his father wouldn't hurt Zoe, not if he needed leverage to snag me—us. I believed in that modus operandi. Better choices weren't flinging cue cards my way. Calling the police played big-time in my backup plans. Zoe could handle herself. Not that she was a slut, but she knew how to use her voluptuous body for the good of mankind. And she loved a challenge, especially when it gave her fodder for her next paranormal psychology research paper. I could almost see her fingers flying over her keyboard already. Ronan's warning rang in my head, dispelling the vision. We were breaking laws just breathing.

A driver waited with a sweet black limo at the bottom of the airstairs. “Aria Walker, meet Jon Morrison,” Adam said. The older brother next-door, auburn-haired driver threw me a winning smile. Tall and built like a tank, Jon filled out a black suit nicely. A flock of blackbirds—thirteen birds to be exact—squawked overhead. A white bird bomb smacked Jon’s shoulder. Oops. The frown on his face was worth the unexpected bad luck I didn’t even try to foil. I stifled a grin as he wriggled out of his jacket without smearing the gooey glop.

Adam took my arm and steered me to the limo, shaking his head. “You make him nervous.”

I clutched my chest and in my best Indian chief voice said, “Me? Little Aria make big, beefy man nervous?”

“Chill, Aria.” Adam pressed his hand in the small of my back. “Get in.”

“Yes, Ronan.” Barbarian dust was definitely sticking to Adam.

I sank into the lap of Luxury—with a capital L—again, deciding I could get used to Adam’s lifestyle. Men from rich families didn’t impress me any more than men without the dough. However, hot ticket items like private jets and limos worked for me when I had friends to rescue, doppelgängers to save, and Rifts to conquer. I might be blonde, but this cookie had a full load of chips. I planned to use every one of them.

Adam’s thigh pressed against mine. Like we didn’t have an acre of space to spread out in. “Jon’s been on my mom’s payroll for three years. He and his brother, Jax, are the best in security.” He blushed. “I think my mom’s hot on them.” He nodded toward the smoky glass partition. “I’d rather certain matters remain between you, me, and Ronan.” His hand landed on my knee as if he’d been touching me since the Abolishment.

Awkward warmth infused me. I tried to ignore his friendliness by rearranging the inside of my purse, which took all of five seconds. Too friendly too fast, and it twisted and turned inside my chest. Didn’t fairies love to get all touchy feely with people? That’s all it is, right? Add another item to my expanding research list.

“I’d miss you if you weren’t near me,” Adam said in a pebbly voice.

I flicked the vent toward me. Sixty degrees and it wasn’t cool enough sitting so close to him, hearing the flirtations spewing from his too-sexy-for-mortal mouth.

I shifted in my seat, placing distance between my deaf hormones and his natural and unnatural fairy charisma. “A girl could take that comment several ways.”

He rested his head against the seatback. “You kill my pain.”

What the what? Sympathy fogged my judgment, and I fitted my palm flat against his chest. “Does it ease when we’re touching?”

“God, yes.” He walked his fingertips from my knee up my thigh, stopping before traveling out of bounds. “It’s a slow burn in my blood, bones, muscles, eating away at my skin. When you’re near, I feel your aura inside me, around me like a cool breeze in a heat wave. When we’re touching, the burn's almost gone."

"In true romance fiction, I'm a balm to your senses?" I snuggled into the curve of his side. I knew he wasn't playing me because his fever subsided whenever I touched him. I had mistakenly thought it was his aura making room for mine. "Why didn't you cop to this before?"

He swung his arm across my shoulders. "I didn't want to scare you off or cause you to think I was hitting on you. We just met yesterday." He dragged his fingers through his undulating hair, silky strands that kept intertwining with my shorter locks.

"Is the proximity to the Rift making it worse?"

He nodded. "Ronan will feel it too. I don't think we have much time."

"Which means Ronan and I probably can't be on the same sphere." The words hung in the air as if visible. Weird doppelgänger effect?

"His magic's making your faulty developing power worse and vice versa?" The limo drove beneath the porte-cochere at the entrance to the Rainbird Corporate Suites.

"That's our guess, although I'm not sure I'm adversely affecting him as much as the tainted Rift magic." Adam climbed out of the limo behind Fin. Fin always had to be in first place. Must be a dog thing. My cats would still be lounging on the seats, giving me the stink eye for subjecting them to the rain. I took Adam's outstretched hand, his sick magic tugging on my aura, seeking relief.

Nippy, damp air clung to the Seattle night. Billowing steel clouds blocked the night sky, threatening to unload at any moment. My heartbeat sped up. I cast a glimpse at the solid cover over the drive-through and my anxiety subsided. Did the sun and stars ever shine in Seattle, the Emerald City of perpetual gloom?

Adam flipped his hood up and stuffed his baseball cap on, hiding half his face. We entered the lobby and rushed toward the bank of private elevators. I expected no less, so my eyes only bulged slightly in surprise. Jon engaged the elevator lock.

Off to the left, I spied a petite figure determinedly striding toward us, a navy snowcap tugged down to her eyebrows. Matching gloves covered her hands and her chin dipped into a navy and white striped scarf. I suspected her berry lipstick and tan foundation hid her cadaver look. I literally felt her tainted magic burn into me. Hello, I'm not the Fairy Godmother!

Adam stepped into the elevator, tugging me along. Nervous wrinkles broke out around his eyes, and sweat beaded his forehead. Jon sprang in front of us, a gun ominously engulfed in one large hand hidden behind his back.

The young woman stopped a few feet from the elevator. A wisp of pale blonde hair flapped from underneath her snowcap. The strand sprang out like a corkscrew and she tucked it back under the cap. Angst assaulted my aura in a blaze of red, leaving me jittery.

"Please, I must speak with you." Her gaze darted around the sparsely populated lobby before resting on my face.

Adam moved in front of me, abreast of Jon.

I skirted him and nudged the tower of Jon, without much success I might add. “Let her in.”

“Jon, scan her.” Adam stepped back. “Touch her,” he whispered in my ear.

I nodded, my mind already one step ahead of the bodyguard brigade. Although, I didn’t need to touch her to know she could be Adam’s fairy princess. If she was a fairy doppelgänger, that meant she was linked to a Thirteen sorcerer or at least another Forbidden or some other creature from that era. The more I experienced each hour, the more I believed Adam was truly a descendant of one of the created Forbidden Thirteen suicide doppelgängers. I don’t know how I knew this, but the idea refused to die. Yet, I didn’t think that meant he’d strolled out of the Rift after the quake rave twenty-one years ago.

“I’m not armed.” Her gaze continued to bounce, never resting on one spot long. “I...I sensed you across the room. I suspect we have a similar problem.” She traded level stares with Adam, then pierced me with a look of deep longing. Whoa, girl, I’d like testosterone with my order.

Arms wide, feet spread, she gave in to the paranoia and allowed Jon to scan his handheld device over her from head to toe. Once my security detail permitted her onto the elevator, she leaned against me, gratitude swimming in her eyes, her aura flaring weakly.

I touched her feverish cheek. “Who...what are you?”

Sobs convulsed her shoulders. “Sorry.” She buried her face in her gloved hands.

The elevator rocketed toward the top floor. Adam looked like he wanted to dive into the elevator shaft to get away from her. I didn’t pick up evil vibes off her, just deader than a doornail vibes. At least Adam possessed some life within our linked auras, skewed though it was. With her, you’d think an archeological crew had just dug her prune body out of the pyramids.

She wiped her eyes. “I’m just a normal girl. I don’t know what’s happening to me.” Renewed tears welled in her puke-green eyes.

The elevator dinged and the doors slid open. We followed Jon into the depths of the penthouse floor. A chance peep at the crystal chandelier in the hallway had me ducking. The light fixture swayed as if a fan had suddenly blown on it. I deflected attention by grabbing the fairy girl’s hand. Three of the thirteen bulbs popped dead in my wake. No one mentioned it. Lucky me, unlucky hotel.

“Who are you?” she asked, her hand pressed to her heart as if I possessed all the fairy bells and witchy whistles. “Do you know what’s happening to us?”

Adam’s hand tensed on my back, cutting short my urge to run screaming for the nearest loony bin for telekinetic-sorcerers off their meds. “Sort of.”

Jon deactivated the alarm at the suite door. After dumping our bags inside, he split to retrieve my not-so-better third from the airport.

The penthouse’s opulence was lost on me. I was too busy studying the newest freak to join the Court of Delusion. I tossed my purse on the earthtone granite counter between the living room and kitchenette. Wishing I could ward off the taint, I zipped my jacket to my chin.

Adam slipped off her cap, releasing her luminous hair. He yanked off his hood and baseball cap.

Flinching, she stared at his one pointy ear.

Pretty in a country chic way, her translucent hair swayed like a wheat field around her shoulders. She was the same age as us with a few extra pounds and a rounded face that put her in cute territory. Her tainted magic stole the color out of her green eyes, leaving them dull and cloudy.

“Who are you?” Adam literally radiated suspicion. “How did you find us?” He stripped to a T-shirt, and then jacked down the thermostat. “Sorry, but I’m burning up.”

I waved it off, but refrained from discarding my layers. A polar bear would freeze in the room at the current temperature.

“Kiera Kendrick.” She released my hand. Our bizarre connection sank into the dense rug and my aura practically sighed with relief. “I was visiting my aunt who’s here on business, and I sensed you as I was leaving.” Her gaze shifted to Adam.

He edged closer, his arm brushing mine, seeking relief. I smelled his unease overriding the subtle floral perfume Kiera wore. “Are there others like you?” I asked.

Tears created muddy tracks down her cheeks. “Not that I know of.”

“Have you seen anyone who looks similar to you?” I held my breath. “Were you adopted?”

“Why do you think that?” Her back drew straight and her expression stilled. “I mean, how did you know I was adopted? I’m not a twin if that’s what you’re thinking.”

“You’re sure?” I wasn’t ready to spill the doppelgänger secret. Let her think I meant a twin.

Kiera averted her eyes, sweeping them across the paisley carpet. “I was left in Washington Park by my birth mother.” She shrugged. “Alone.”

The freak flags flew full mast. I plunked down onto the plushy armchair behind me. I didn’t want anyone touching me, draining my spirit and energy. I wanted Ronan here so bad. Hell should freeze over after that wish. But I wanted his aura, sick as it was, fusing with mine. It made me feel safer, less hollow. I wanted to ensure he was okay. I wanted him to make Kiera go away.

The fairy wannabe in question flicked her hand in Adam’s direction, anger sparking in her faded eyes. “There’s something going on in the park, at the stone circle. Something drew me there a month ago. It was magical, for lack of a better term, as if all those fictional things you read about stone circles being portals to fantasy worlds is true. Ever since then, I’ve been getting worse, like him, with washed out skin tone, hair growing inches a day and falling out. A constant bonfire burns inside me.”

Rocking forward, I dropped my face into my hands. “Fuck. A. Duck.” Fin dashed over and gave me a sloppy, wet doggy lick. Absently, I scratched her ears, needing to distract my hands before they adopted a life of their own.

“Excuse me.” I shot up, punched redial on my phone on the way to the bathroom. I sat on the closed toilet lid and waited for Ronan to answer. No such luck. My frustration careened off the rails as I whisper-yelled to his voicemail, “You need to get your ass to the hotel ASAP. Something’s happened, and I’m ready to off your dickhead father myself.”

No sense in not putting the bathroom to use. I cleaned up and stole a long look at myself in the beveled mirror. Dark craters had formed beneath my eyes. My hair imitated a victim of a tornado. In the mirror's reflection, I spied the jetted tub behind me and wanted to sink my thrashed body in hot, bubbly champagne with a hose connected to my mouth. Then I wanted to sleep for days, hoping I'd wake at home to a nightmare my overactive mind had conjured up in a snit of boredom. "Aria Walker, come on down. You've just won the grand prize for The Best Sucktacular Life."

A soft knock hit the door. "Aria, you okay?" Adam asked.

I propped my forehead against the door. "No."

"Kiera's not going anywhere."

No shit, Sherlock. "Give me a sec." I wet a washcloth, landed another hungry look on the tub, and left the dazzling marble sanctuary.

Adam stood over Kiera, her impromptu watchdog. I experienced a slew of emotions too twisted to separate, except for a maddening trace of stupid jealousy. Grayish rivulets striped Kiera's foundation, giving her a zebra complexion. Add the streaks of mascara and she had a silent shout out to a makeup-artist. I handed her the wet cloth.

She took it, her feverish fingers resting on mine longer than necessary, burning into my skin. "Thank you." Her eyes shimmered. "Adam said your name's Aria."

"Yes." I dug my fists into my front pockets. "What else did he say?" I asked with a dagger-launching look at him that set off the drums beating in my head. A dull ache plagued my leg and ankle. My hand merely throbbed. Time to party down with a bottle of painkillers.

"Nothing." Adam approached. "Sit. You look ready to crash. Need anything?"

I sank into the overstuffed couch, pressing into the lush comfort, easing the weight off my lower body. "Pain killers and a bottle of water, pretty please."

Adam left the room smiling.

Kiera perched on the edge of the chair. "Why does your touch ease my pain?"

She hadn't given me anything to dislike about her, but I remained wary. "I have no idea." I was so not letting every fairy in the world feel me up. "Do you sense Adam's magic?"

"Just a prickle of energy from him, nothing more. Your magic I definitely feel. It's drifting off you like a strong perfume." She patted the washcloth over her streaky face.

"Wonderful," I grumbled.

"Is it really magic?" She cast her gaze at her feet shuffling on the floor, as if afraid to hear the truth.

"Just exaggerated aural energy." A half-lie's not really a lie, right?

Adam brought me ibuprofen and water. "Thanks." I downed the tablets with half the bottle of cold reality. He sat, drawing me into the crook of his arm. As he rubbed my neck beneath my jacket, his pain diminished and his temperature normalized. The only fairy I wanted touching me was already wrapped around me.

"Have you seen a doctor?" Adam asked.

“Yes. I’ve been having weird symptoms for a month, since I went to the stone circle.” Kiera picked lint off her black pants. “Doctors have no clue. Best guess is the flu.”

Tension twinged my aching back muscles. “Have a lot of people seen you this...sickly?”

She set the wet washcloth on the burgundy and gold paisley rug by her feet. “Not many. I attend an online college so it’s easy for me to stay out of sight. My aunt was ready to call the CDC.”

“Have you been to a scientific or paranormal research facility of any kind?” Adam tugged on his ear, his anxiety pressing on my aura.

“My boyfriend, Scott Walton, contacted a local place called Dominion Research and even spoke to the CEO, Richard Riley. They make those ESP detector devices and research paranormal phenomena.”

Arctic air swept over me, crashing into Adam’s fiery aura, alternatively freezing and boiling my blood.

He whispered in my ear, “Don’t say a word.”

I fixed him an iceberg-melting glare. “Go on,” I urged Kiera with a heartening smile I didn’t feel.

“I have an appointment on Tuesday.” She reached toward Adam and quickly withdrew as if afraid she’d grow a ragged pointy ear too. “You should join me.”

Anger tensed him against me. “Did they ask you to stay?”

“Sure. They agreed to pay my expenses while studying me. I didn’t give them my full name or anything because I was afraid they’d turn me over to the cops. I mean, I’m not illegal or anything,” she quickly added. “But I feel something growing in me.” Renewed tears flowed down her cheeks.

“All that and a bag of stale chips.” Rubbing my bruised head, I had no doubts Riley planned to imprison her.

Adam’s finger dipped beneath my three layers to my bare shoulder, pressing a warning into my skin. “I think you should stay away from them. We believe their motives may be detrimental to you. We can help you, but we need to connect with others first. Give me your contact info.”

Her face brightened, and she extracted a red smartphone from her Barbie-sized purse. “I’ll send it to you.”

Adam opened a link and she sent the information to his phone. At least she was malleable, cooperative, and seemed to trust us. Hurray for another link on the clueless chain of clues.

I angled my head against his steady shoulder. The world rear-ended my thoughts: Zoe, Ronan, Adam, Dominion Research, Rifts, Illuminaria, and fairies. Welcome to my new world of truth and lies. We have nutcase cookies filled with crap chips.

“Ronan should be here,” I murmured, sinking into the deep velour couch. “Call him. He doesn’t answer my calls.”

Adam called and received the same voicemail of avoidance. The second he clicked off, his phone rang. He held the phone between our ears. I anticipated Ronan’s voice, but thirteen gave no quarter. “Ronan wasn’t on the flight,” Jon’s scratchy voice said. “I’ll check other flights and report back.”

My heart plunged into my stomach. I thrust off the couch, gave Kiera a brutal look. “Can you wait here while we talk in private?”

She cringed deeper into her chair. “Sure thing.”

I handed her the remote for the flat screen. This time she hugged the chair arm and pasted herself to the seatback. Was I an ogre all of a sudden?

Adam followed me into the first of two master bedrooms. A burgundy and gold comforter with a thousand pillows adorned the king-sized bed. I salivated at the comfort begging my thrashed body to take it on a trip through the stars. I didn’t give a hoot if there wasn’t a pot of Belgian chocolate waiting at the end of the rainbow either.

“Calm down.” He gripped my shoulders. “He’ll be here.”

“Do you think one of his father’s trackers snagged him?” I picked at the gauze tied around my palm and probed Adam’s pale, soulless eyes, trying to reach into his thoughts. “What if he’s hurt or dead somewhere? What if he betrayed us? What if we’ve walked into a trap? Maybe Kiera’s baiting us?” Every minutia incurred my distrust until otherwise proven innocent.

“Don’t start doubting him. Not after everything we’ve been through.” Adam glowered at me for the first time since we’d met. “Get your shit together and be a member of the team.”

“What team?” I flung away from him. “The doppel-brutes who abducted me from my sane, boring life?” The hollow life I trudged through? Ronan already held my life in his hands. It didn’t sit well and encouraged me to look for subliminal clues in ice cubes if I couldn’t find them in my head.

A scream rose in my throat before I gulped it down. “It’s my fault Zoe was snatched. I feel like I’m chasing a mirage.” Not only did tears swamp my eyes, but sobs racked me. I must’ve soaked up energy from a hormone clinic. I hid my face against Adam’s chest. He held me while I bawled like a two-year-old hosting a temper tantrum, party of one.

“Aria.” Empathy and passion wore heavy on my name.

I linked my arms around his waist. Adam kissed the top of my head, tightening his arms even after I wiped my nose on his shirt. “Sorry,” I mumbled.

His chuckle rumbled against my face. “I’d gladly wear your snot-rags if it means I get to hold you.”

I sniffed hard. “Are you flirting with me?” My voice was croaky from anguish. Although desire wasn’t far behind if that fire dipping into no man’s land was my girlie parts revving up.

He chuckled. “Is it working?”

“Maybe.” I wasn’t ready to commit to squat, not when I couldn’t tell if my desire stemmed from Adam, his doppelgänger link to Ronan, or a fae glamour. Not when I felt the same desire for Ronan. Hell to the no. “Your pain better?”

“You have no idea.”

He slid his hand beneath my multiple layers to massage my back, sending more warm swirling currents of need through me. Oh, hell to the no squared.

“Kiera feels it.”

I fingered my eyes dry. “Damn if I’m gonna sleep naked with you two smothering me for the slightest touch.”

A groan escaped Adam. “I was hoping I’d get you all to myself.” Eyes glowing around the fringes, his hair curled and uncurled around his shoulders. I palmed his cheek. Pain in his eyes booted my good sense into the ether. If I could provide him with a scant few hours of relief, I’d do it. To hell with the consequences. I nodded.

He brushed my cheek with a crooked finger. “You can wear all the clothes you want.”

“I may have to if you insist on sleeping in a morgue.” I ran a hand over my forehead, shoving aside my hair, brushing aside my multifaceted reservations.

“I can keep you warm enough.” A heart-stopping smile transformed his gray face.

The warmth between us made me want to curl up in bed with him that instant, draw his heat into me, assuage his pain. Logically, it had to be our aural bond, but I was beginning to feel something far greater, far scarier, far too twisted up with my feelings for Ronan.

Chapter 13

Adam and I rejoined Kiera pacing a canal through the paisley ocean in the living room.

“It’s late,” she said, nervously dry-washing her hands. “Can we meet tomorrow?”

“We’ll call you.” Adam touched her arm. “Please don’t talk to anyone at Dominion Research or tell anyone you met us.”

I took her hand. She curled her fingers around mine, her body nearly dripping into a puddle of bliss. What am I, fairy speed now?

“You do know what’s going on?” Hope dusted gold flakes into her dull peepers.

“Sort of.” I hugged her and she clung to me, lost and alone in this new unknown.

Adam escorted her down to the lobby. The minute the door clicked shut, I located the address for Riley’s Dominion Research on my smartphone. When Adam entered the suite, a Seattle street map was spitting out on the printer built into the suite’s workstation. Just in case my GPS failed. Never could rely upon my luck.

“Don’t even think about it,” he growled out in true Ronan fashion.

I snatched the page from the printer, stuffed it in my jacket. “We need a backup plan.”

“No plan includes going anywhere near Riley or his research facility.” He spread his long legs in a he-man defensive stance that mimicked his darker half. “They’ll sense you before you’re in sight of the gate.”

“Who said anything about going through a gate?”

Adam stalked closer, like a pit bull licking his chops at a kitten. His eyes glowed violet, skin darkening to the color of Seattle rain clouds. Reaching for me, he clamped his fingers onto my arm. “We’re going to bed before we both drop from exhaustion.”

Our auras tingled in a dizzying wash. The sensation of Ronan’s aura was still achingly present and it was hard to separate the two. I fell against him, my nipples growing taut against his warm, solid chest. Aura drunk, I craned my neck back to look into the pain hazing his eyes. How could I refuse? For once, my head and body were in sync. First, I needed to scrub the day off my skin...before I did something I’d regret.

After soaking in jetted bliss, I felt sparkling clean and limber with some clarity restored. My signature scent—Zoe’s birthday gift to me—in the bathwater filled the steamy room with a weave of freesia and vanilla. I washed my face with my disposable wipes, drying off quickly. I loathed the smothering, deadly feel of water on my face.

Unfortunately, my mind refused to wind down as thoughts of Ronan, both confusingly delicious and equally rotten, nagged me. Of course, agonizing over Zoe left a constant ache in my heart.

I heard Adam talking to Jon on the phone. By the time I slipped out of the bathroom, he was lounging on the bed, wearing a white T-shirt and gray shorts, not at all abashed at my seeing his deathbed glimmer. I knew what hid beneath that sickness so it didn't bother me. And I wanted the comfort of Adam's body draped around mine in my maelstrom of emotions and fear.

Not that I had designs on doing more than sleeping, I realized I hadn't slept with a man in over a year. Not since I'd dumped my boyfriend of two years once I'd found him coiled butt-naked around one of my lucky charm clients—a former friend now on mine and Zoe's shitlist—in my bed. It wasn't that I missed that intimacy much either. My unearthly bond to Adam was undeniable, and he drew me to him like a moth to a zapper, scary and liberating at once. How much of it was the bond versus reality? Or Ronan's other half? How hard would the zapper sting? Time to up my anti-crazy dosage of chocolate.

An admiring smile crinkled Adam's eyes. "There's another bed." Uncertainty erased his dimple.

"Leave it for Ronan." Suspicious, I scrunched my eyes. "He's coming, right?" I stood in my short satin robe outside the bathroom door, gripping my tote, Mom's envelopes stuffed securely inside.

"On his way." Adam held up his hand to forestall my scathing look, which didn't work, of course. "He has as much to lose as you."

Housekeeping would have to hose me off the walls if I didn't shut down for the night. Sighing, I stomped to the closet and snuck the envelopes inside the safe, realizing I hadn't thoroughly read the papers from Mom's chest. I'd peeked inside the packet again on the plane, enough to know I had some or all the missing parts to the Illuminaria. I wanted alone time to really dig into them without divulging my secret to Ronan or Adam. Yet. Other than going to the bathroom, I hadn't had a moment to myself. To escape my life just for a few hours, I dialed a seascape into the built-in sound machine. Waves lapped the shoreline and a foghorn blew in the distance.

I set my stun gun on the nightstand and stripped down to my fuchsia camisole with matching boy shorts. The glacial temperature sprouted gooseflesh on my arms, and my nipples beaded. Desire ignited in Adam's eyes, and a flush sailed up from my toes. I'd have worn long sleeves except I wanted him to have access to as much skin as I was willing to give. For healing purposes. Really.

He scooted to the middle of the bed and lifted the covers for me. I eased my sore body down, rolling on my side to face him, luxuriating in the sumptuous pillowtop mattress. Fin dashed into the room and bought a corner of the bed to worship me from afar, her gaze glued to me as if she were afraid I'd disappear. Funny pup.

"Are you sure you don't want to sleep in the other room?"

A shivery laugh escaped me. "No. Now warm me up, will ya?"

Adam's arms wrapped around me like vines seeking water and sun. His hard body against mine created fantastic tingles of heat scoring me. Linking my arms around his neck, I snuggled into him. Without a thought, I twined my legs around his, bypassing all real estate in between. The sandalwood smell and hard feel of his body stroked my senses, forcing me to inhale through my mouth to resist the temptation.

He smoothed his hands along the planes of my back, depositing a trail of heat. "Warmer?"

"Umm, yes." Our auras blended, one sifting in and out of the other. His hard tension eased as his pain fled, and the friction of our bodies burned away my last chills. We lay contentedly for several long moments, the soft pillowy mattress a boon to my tender, weary body.

Doubts meandered through my mind. "How's security here?" My thirteen pendant hung temporarily on a silver chain around my neck. I pressed it against Adam's T-shirt, hoping the good vibes kept my unluck at bay. Sleep was never a good place for me as I couldn't control my bad luck.

"Alarm's set. Gun's in the nightstand." He breathed in deeply. "You smell nice."

Heavenly spice wafted off him, but I wasn't about to admit it to raise his hopes. "Do you feel better?"

Adam slipped a forefinger beneath my chin, tipping my head back. We gazed into each other's eyes, his irises shifting from pale violet to indigo. My heart flip-flopped madly.

"I feel awesome."

I caught my breath, resting my cheek over his hammering heart. Waves crashing upon the beach and sea birds applauding filled the spaces between heartbeats.

"Aria," he said in that dusky, sultry way that sought an entrance to my heart.

I walked my fingers up his arm, magic quivering up my hand. "Why aren't you taken?"

Shivers of delight followed the touch of his hot hand stroking my back, his body a furnace beneath the covers. "I hadn't met you yet."

My knees weakened, and I tried to ignore the pleasant ache his words left in my limbs. "Right." I giggled to defray my muddled nervousness. "You don't even know me."

His eyes searched mine, reaching into my thoughts, possessing my soul. "Everything inside me tells me all I need to know."

I groaned into his chest. Every woman's fantasy in my clutches and I was torn into confetti whirling in a cyclone. The doppelgänger bond was going to bite me big time. Holy hell, I'm so messed up.

Locks of Adam's opalescent hair feathered my skin, seeking nourishment from my pure aura. I caressed his brittle tresses, giving what little healing I had to offer.

A heavy silence loomed between us. Fuzzy thoughts and feelings assailed me. What would change with Kiera on the scene? Where was her doppelgänger? Was her doppelgänger one of the Forbidden Thirteen? What could I offer Adam, Ronan, and any of the other sorcerers and doppelgängers that might pop up? What if I made their lives and the world worse?

Fear of the unknown nibbled away at my confidence. What if I couldn't sort out my feelings about the doppelgänger bond with Ronan and Adam? Argh! Someday, we'd look back on all this, laugh nervously, and change the subject. Yes, denial was my new best friend. I turned around in Adam's arms to avoid his uncanny allure.

"Goodnight, Blondie." Adam spooned around me.

I yawned. "Goodnight, fairy-sorcerer-doppelgänger king."

His biceps stiffened below my head. I let sleep tame my rampant thoughts.

"Why did you call me fairy king?" Adam's chest turned steely against my spine.

"Everything inside and outside me tells me all I need to know." I drifted off into the universe of the dead, a fallen lock of Adam's hair clasped in my fingers.

Chapter 14

Groggy and barely awake, I luxuriated in the warm air whooshing over my face, noticed the emptiness of the bed where my fairy blanket had lain. Ronan's aura played fitfully with mine, his flawed energy shooting holes through it and scattering it around us. I rolled around in the mound of covers Adam must have layered upon me. As I clawed out of the cocoon, my bruised body screamed bloody murder and I stifled a whimper.

Ronan sat on the edge of the bed, watching me, a wry smile quirking up his lips.

Giving him my most disdainful glare, I lunged into his arms and he captured me in a fierce hug. Stiff and sore body be damned. "I should curse your luck on the spot if I wasn't so glad to see you. What happened to you? Are you okay?" I drew back on my knees and dog-eyed the rusty stain saturating his shirt. My heart skipped a beat. "Oh, Ronan!"

"Glad to see you too." He lightly traced the purpling bruise climbing my left arm, his touch leaving me tingling. "Are you okay?"

I fingered the small bumps on the back of my head and winced. "I might live to get shot at again."

He drew away. "Where's Adam?"

I nodded my head at the closed bedroom door. "He's not out there?"

"No." His gaze roamed over me, then the bed, eyes burning first with lust, then jealousy. "You slept together?"

Surprise pinged my belly, but I impaled him with The Look. "What's it to you? You don't even like me."

He scowled. "I never said that."

"True." I picked at his bloodstained sleeve. He jerked away as though I carried a doppelgänger-destroying plague. "Quit being an ass. Let me doctor that."

I trounced into the bathroom for the first aid supplies from my cosmetics case. Never travel without them. Why risk even more bad luck? Quickly, I brushed my teeth and rinsed out my morning mouth.

When I returned to the bedroom, Ronan had already stripped off his Seattle Seahawks T-shirt and plunked down on the bed, holding a piece of hotel notepaper. I tried to ignore the fire climbing my neck at the sight of his rippling abdomen, thick biceps, and heavenly forearms. His sinful butt mashed my robe, and I couldn't cover my body's betrayal.

Yet the state of his shoulder easily quashed my lustful discomfort. He'd torn off his bandage and red rivulets blended into the wicked vines of his tricolored tattoo. I patted his wound with the wet cloth, applying pressure to staunch the bleeding. "How'd you tear it open?"

His biceps twitched. "Somehow, somewhere."

I pinched his forearm and when he tried to catch my wrist, I whisked my hand away. "What dimension is that on?" If he had another brain, it would be so freaking lonely.

"Adam left a note." He ignored me as usual. "He went into the office for a couple of hours before others arrived. Jax is guarding the door."

My blood bubbled. "Jax?" I slathered antibacterial cream on his wound.

"Jon's brother." He set the note on the nightstand, threw a small tube of Med-Stitch on the bed.

I eased closer to examine the edges of the wound for infection. "Is Jax guarding me or holding me prisoner?"

"Probably both." Ronan tilted his head back to size me up. "What's up with that, Aria? What'd you do?" He averted his reddening face, coughed into his fist.

"What?" I picked dried blood off his arm.

His agitated aura stirred the air. I slanted a glance at his face, my boobs all but sticking in his mouth. Geez, the perfect subliminal turn-on for the poor barbarian. My own heat dialed up ten notches. Subtly, I shifted my chest out of his face. "Sorry, you're sitting on my robe."

"I'm not sorry." Ronan didn't make a move to free my cover-up.

I tried to ignore him, but touching him ignited sparks in my blood that left me jittery—in an unfamiliar desirable way. Easing to the side, I fingered a coating of Med-Stitch onto his wound. "Let it dry." I gathered the stained towels and rushed to the bathroom, needing the distance before my body betrayed me further. He followed, closing fast behind me, resting his hands on my shoulders. The towels fell in a heap on the vanity. We studied our reflections in the mirror. Light glinted off his glossy jet hair, startling against his tired face. The set of his chin suggested a renewed stubborn streak compelling me to rip into. "Where were you?"

"Taking care of business."

"What business?" My fists curled on the vanity.

"None of yours." He lowered his hands to his side, his mouth stretched tight.

I whirled around and poked my finger into his good shoulder. "Your business is my business. You dragged me into this mess."

Ronan walked away. "Damn. You sound like a girlfriend," he slung over his shoulder. He grabbed my robe off the bed and tossed it at me.

Purple satin puddled on my feet. My anger swirled around me and grappled with Ronan's weak aura. "It is my business because it affects me. Your life is my life now." I held up two crossed fingers. "In case you're too stupid or dead inside to notice, we're connected...our auras..." I flung out my arms in a dismissive move, bent to retrieve my robe. “I wouldn’t be your girlfriend if you were hung like a stallion and had a zillion dollars.” I straightened to my full height, my fists buried in satin.

Faster than I could blink, Ronan’s hands spanned my waist and his mouth swooped down on mine. The second his lips touched mine, the heat in my body exploded, showering me in an inferno of lust. A groan escaped me as I melted into him, twining my arms around his neck. Our melded auras filled me with an incredible sensation of arousal and power. Tainted magic poured into me, and mine cleansed it, gave it substance. His mouth possessed mine in the most fantastically passionate kiss I’d ever experienced. I floated on a fluffy cloud of silver power, so much untapped energy between us, seething for freedom and exploration. Soft yet firm, his warm lips played over my parted lips, and his tongue tangoed sweetly with mine, the taste of him, chocolate and peanuts, filling my mouth. All my soft curves fit into the hardness of his body.

Then reality hit me, and I pushed away from him, my mouth burning from the hot as hell kiss. Ronan growled low in his throat. An array of emotions swam the liquid depths of his eyes, leaving bewilderment and speculation behind. Ho. Lee. Doppelgängers. Whoever said men were like potato chips and you can’t have just one needed to live my life for a day.

“I’m not stupid. I sure as hell am not dead.” His rough baritone thrummed through my feverish nerves, threatening to unseat me again. He gripped my waist, my satin camisole between us.

My mind froze in its swirling confusion and my mouth went on strike.

He skimmed his lips over mine. “I can’t believe I’m saying this, but I missed you.”

I blinked up at him, my heart finally catching up with its beat. “You did?” My voice wobbled.

Leaning his forehead against mine, he gazed into my eyes. “I don’t trust easily, Aria.”

I nodded in mutual agreement of my own trust issues and understanding what he’d suffered. That damn shock-o-meter churned out mad fairies in my stomach. Kissing two men? Even if I paid my mind with genius drugs, I couldn’t reconcile the fact that they were two halves of a whole or which half I wanted as more than a friend.

“When you’re not with me, a piece of me is missing.” The baring of his soul made his voice uncertain, fearful. “You drive me through a minefield out of my damn mind.” A slow hesitant grin tipped up the corners of his mouth. I wanted to dip my tongue into those corners. “And I still want you.”

“So you do like me?” I teased, dying to dive into a tub of ice cubes.

Carefree and real, his rich, smooth laughter was a symphony to my ears. “I need sleep. Sit with me and we’ll talk.” Ronan moved toward the closed door, my eyes riveted on his firm rear that filled his jeans to perfection.

My heart revved into turbo mode. “Where you going?”

“It’s bad enough I have to smell Adam on you, but I won’t sleep where you two...” Crumbs of charcoal danger appeared in his eyes. He stalked out of the room.

I seized my robe off the floor and caught up to him. “Nothing happened. He needed relief from pain.” I didn’t need to explain myself. Did I? Criminy, I’m going to hell in a pink Easter basket.

Understanding softened his expression. He led the way into the other bedroom, an exact replica of the first one, except for the deep purple and gold bedding. Without hesitation, he stripped to his black boxer briefs. I knew it! Black to the core. Ronan took in the bed then landed a hopeful look on me.

I was definitely tripping to visit Lucifer when all was said and done. I slipped into my robe, belted it tight. The floor lamp by the door left the room in shadows, and I reached to turn it off.

“Leave it on.”

“You need to sleep, not spend time looking at me.”

“Who said anything about looking at you?” he grumbled half-heartedly. “I like light.”

Despite my heart and head being ripped in two, I gave Ronan the same consideration I gave Adam. I would treat them as equals until one emerged the victor. Or none at all. Damn my life to the Rift! I needed Zoe. I wanted to cry at the weird injustice. Days ago, not a man on my radar. Now, I had to struggle to decipher the intentions of two hunks. How? How do I accomplish that? It’s bad enough I’m trying to figure out my role in the world of adults, the Forbidden, and now the world of men? Aria Elle’s in there somewhere, right?

I crossed the room and lay on top of the comforter, Ronan’s arm a hard but welcome pillow. Our auras tangoed together as longing surged between us, but I hammered mine down before my heart trampled my head. I certainly hadn’t felt that hungry energy spike in Adam’s arms. Not that I hadn’t been equally aroused. Heck, who wouldn’t be in the arms of the doppel-hunks. It was just different. I’d have to develop a whole new language to describe how I felt.

Ronan settled on the pillows. I rested my head on his chest, his heart beating against my ear in sync with mine.

“I went to Melisande’s hotel and snagged her computer. She always travels with a laptop and tablet. I couldn’t let it fall into the wrong hands. We’ll check it out later. Maybe she has more of the Illuminaria. Okay?” His fingers tangled in the hair at the nape of my neck.

A pleased sigh slipped out of me. The sharp tang of antiseptic tickling my nose eclipsed his spicy, woodsy cologne. “Sure, if you want,” I answered with feigned nonchalance. Yeah, baby! That witch is mine. Ronan’s chuckle rumbled in his chest against my ear. “We need to get our instruction guide away from your dad.” Just from the few pages I now possessed, I knew that book was über dangerous in Riley’s hands.

“I know. Dad wasn’t very open with info, even to me. But Melisande worked me against him, and she had access to pretty much everything, except the full Illuminaria.” He blew out a ragged breath. “Hell, I don’t know. We need all of that damn manuscript.”

His stomach earned a pat, and his skin twittered beneath my touch. “Zoe comes first. Speaking of—”

“We talk to my father at one.”

I hugged him tight. We had six hours.

The heater clicked on and a soothing hiss of warmth filled the room. I lifted my face, drawing thirteens on his chest with my index finger and crossing them out before I invoked a rash of bad luck while we slept. Sue me for being paranoid.

“What?” His eyes went all dragon slit on me.

“We have more trouble.”

“I know about Kiera Kendrick. Adam left messages.” He knuckled his eyes. “Later. My head’s killing me from that deadener.”

I scooted up and placed a feathery kiss on his mouth, his nose, his forehead, finally dropping my head on his chest.

“Aria,” he breathed out. “I do like you.”

Twin doppelgänger arrows nicked my heart, spun my head into a flurry of epic confusion. Neither hit the bull’s eye.

Chapter 15

By the sounds of Ronan's even breathing, slumber claimed him in seconds. I stuffed a pillow in his arms and tiptoed from the room to take a quick bath. I turned on the tub tap, evil-eyeing the six showerheads. Showers made me super nervous, mainly because of that wetting the face thing that stems from the worst day of my life.

The night my mother died, I had gotten locked out of the house. I kept waiting for her to come home and she never did. Rain sleeted down, and I'd fallen asleep on the narrow covered porch. I'd awoken choking on water and couldn't catch my breath. Rain had pelted my face and I thought I was drowning. Then I'd lost control of my telekinesis and blasted out the windows on the front door, glass flying everywhere. Another Friday the 13th disaster. That night of death and torment never strayed far from my thoughts. My phobia had gotten so bad, Granny Elle had removed the showerhead in my shower and I removed it from my condo shower. Hence the reason why the multihead shower in the hotel tweaked me out.

Regardless, a half-hour later, clean and glistening, I inhaled a cranberry muffin and two cups of liquid fuel, then painted my face, moussed and dried my hair. I squeezed into a hipster-grazing purple sweater, slim jeans, and donned my black leather jacket. My clunky-heeled boots added two inches to my height. One last glance in the mirror told me I was as hot and ready for the outside world as I'd get with puffy eyes and a pasty face. Total waste of makeup, I might add. Although I twinged with every step I took, at least my outfit covered most of my war wounds.

The mystery pup waited for me by the door to the outside hallway. I hooked the leash on her silver-studded, leather collar. "Let's hit it, Finny."

A younger version of Jon dropped his jaw ogling me from his position outside the door. Potent psychic deadeners flattened my powers, and I eyed one hanging off his neck. Indignation surged hot in my veins. I really wanted to start thinking positive, but I knew it would be a wasted effort. Risking lockjaw, I ground my back teeth.

"Jax, I presume?" I held out my right hand. "Aria Walker."

He pumped my hand, his palm damp and hot.

"How many deadeners are you sporting? Are they for my benefit?" I grinned encouragingly, wiping my hand on my pants. After a few seconds of suppression and absorption of his aural energy, my energy staged a scathing comeback and my telekinetic brain waves surged for release. The night's rest had restored more than my normal cache of energy. The proximity to the Rift seemed to be working to my advantage. Or it was now spitting out a ton more energy. I buried the thought so deep I'd need a brain surgeon to dig it up later.

"No. They're...there to protect you. They're also detectors." Jax's mouth snapped shut and he got a grip on his puny brain down yonder.

My leg earned the ire of my slapping leash. I'm so returning Adam to the Jerk Store. Why did he feel the need to quash my powers? I wrapped my head around my reluctant brain waves and thrust outward, concentrating on the devices around his neck, one on each wrist and ankle. Five pops and Jax danced as if sand crabs nibbled on his feet. Using extreme caution, I forced him into semi-paralysis mode, enough to foil his chase for fifteen minutes.

"Gotta run. Nice meeting you." The poor sap reacted in slow motion to strip the devices off his prickly skin as he slid down the wall to the floor. Excitement kicked my pulse into fourth gear. My new power fuse was becoming easier to control and manipulate. The gloves were off!

I sprinted toward the stairs to catch an elevator on another floor. As soon as I opened the stairwell door, my right pinkie twitched. I looked at my watch, nine-thirteen. Crap on a cracked cracker.

A familiar presence wrenched on my aura. Kiera? Had she ratted us out?

Keeping my sight peeled around me, I unhooked Fin's leash. She remained near me, but I wanted her free to run in case I needed backup. Screw the hotel rules.

I held my stun gun as primed as my internal magic. Peering through the small window on the stairwell door, I met only empty stairs. Back muscles achingly rigid, I focused on the odd pressure in my heart of power. It felt like someone was sipping my magic out through a cocktail straw, tiny draws from the larger reservoir of my core. The sensation wafted in and out of my receptors. Such magic hadn't existed in the world before yesterday, and certainly not from Kiera. Was she suddenly gaining powers from her theoretical Thirteen sorcerer the way Adam did from Ronan?

I tiptoed toward the alcove housing the elevator. Fin trotted off to sniff at a chocolate peanut Ronan must've sacrificed. I stamped my foot, but she licked it up anyway. I see where your priorities lay, Finny. Hope the chocolate doesn't kill you. A second of worry sent me faltering until a gurgle worked up from Jax's throat.

He sprawled on his back down the hall, staring at the ceiling. No help for the wicked from him. My right pinkie twitched again, and a tug on my aura nearly sucked the air out of my lungs. The door swung open. Gasping, I spun around.

A drag on my aura slammed my heart into hyperdrive. A faintly glowing Kiera and her doppelgänger twin surged from the stairwell. Truth stared me down. A Forbidden Thirteen sorcerer and her fairy doppelgänger, Kiera? A viral bug in their webbed energy spun their auras in blurry, fragmented waves, slicing through mine, practically incapacitating me.

Breathing deeply in and out, I flung out a batch of sizzling energy to halt them in their tracks. Their taint hauled my blast every which way and the energy fizzled into the ozone. I tried again, but their caustic magic rendered mine useless. Dread streaked cold strokes up my spine. The supposed sorcerer doppelgänger tossed a brain wave of energy that aped a Scrambler.

“Stop it, Katrina!” Kiera turned on her lookalike. “She can help us.”

“Maybe she did this to us,” Katrina spat out. “She’s pulling on my telekinetic receptors, same as you.” Katrina shoved her fist in Kiera’s shoulder.

“When did you two meet?” My curiosity got the better of the situation.

“Last night.” Kiera scrubbed her hands together, veins visible in her translucent skin. “After I left here, she was at my house waiting for me. Dominion Research was there too. They brought her to me and said they could help us. They snatched her last week from her home in Las Vegas. After your reactions last night and hearing that they’d kidnapped her, we managed to escape before they nabbed me.”

“And you came here to jeopardize me, the one person who can help you?” I pasted on my most fierce scowl and rabid eye. “Did they follow you?”

Kiera shook her head, eyes floating in a sea of apology as parts of her body wavered in and out of visibility as if she too suffered from a poorly executed cloaking spell. Katrina was the Ronan to her Adam, full of life and energy. Their auras tangoed with mine, copycatting the doppel-hunks’ auras.

As if Kiera didn’t just say they weren’t followed, out of the stairwell behind them sprang a trio of cavemen. I recognized Milo from the university altercation. Riley’s men tracked K-Squared straight to the hotel. Holy, honking hell in the hotel hallway.

“You idiots,” I said through gritted teeth. “They stuck a tracking chip in Katrina!”

I raced toward the elevator, Kiera and Katrina hot on my heels. Fin snarled and nipped at the legs of the men. I slapped my palm on the elevator call button, fruitlessly pushing against the rabid paranormal attack the girls emitted. Even gripping my pendant, I couldn’t focus on my power or deflect them. What was I, flypaper for doppelgängers and their pursuers?

“Come on!” I stabbed and stabbed the call button.

The men trapped me between the main corridor and the dead end elevator hallway. Two other men came up behind Double-K and locked their arms around the twits. The girls kicked and screamed until the men knocked them out with a needle in their necks, and they sagged to the floor in a synchronized wave. I crept to the end of the hall, butting against an ornate console table. A golden urn filled with fake flowers rocked on the marble top and toppled to the tile floor, breaking into a million splinters, cracking my barrier of fear. Bird of paradise flowers and tropical grasses thumped to the granite. Good God, who hijacked lucky thirteen today?

“Can I help you?” I shook ceramic dust off my boots one foot at a time.

Fin barked and trotted circles around the men. They kept toeing her away. Leaning more toward cute and cuddly, Fin wasn’t much of a guard dog. I’d have to fix that later if we spent a lot of time together. Only if my cats grant their divine approval, that is. Yeah, my ass was in a whirl and my mind had revolted into the mundane of cats and dogs. Focus, focus. I nearly thumped the words into my head.

The largest man, a candidate for the newest weight loss craze, stepped toward me, crunching ceramic chunks into dust. His beefy hands flexed and curled. “Give it up, little girl. You won’t get away from us this time. Put the weapon down.” He smirked at Milo who reddened and advanced toward me as if he had something to prove. Like maybe increasing the size of his balls.

The elevator finally dinged its arrival. The doors slid open behind them, closed, and my escape hatch disappeared in a whoosh.

Arm wavering, I aimed my stun gun between Milo and Mr. Beefy. They sported deadeners even more high tech than what Jax wore. “Stay back.” My stunner and my mouth were all I had until I figured out how to work with the deadeners. I was already visualizing the duct tape over my mouth.

I tossed a stab of air and watched it ruffle the fur on Fin’s back. Head cocked sideways, the pup wagged her tail. Tension rolled out of my shoulders down my arms.

In a show of good faith, I held up my stun gun, then tucked it in my waistband. I hoped I shut the safety off. A zap down there could really confuse my already mystified hormones. I needed to stall Riley’s mercenaries. My powers had begun to snip at their deadeners, subtle little attacks of energy primed to short them out. And I think I was drawing something from Kiera and Katrina, even though they were conked out.

“What do you want with me? I’m just a college girl visiting friends on winter break.”

The men chuckled in stereo.

“Sure, and I’m the president of the fucking U.S. of A.” Fat-ass moved toward me. His deadener crinkled through my telekinetic receptors, but my supposed destructive energy didn’t dampen them further. It actually seemed to tickle them awake. “Roger, you and Chan take the other two out of here.”

Oh, no! The two men picked up Kiera and Katrina, shrugged them over their shoulders, and headed toward the back staircase.

The elevator chimed, and the remaining cavemen twitched in their rain booties. Fin snarled, ears flattened back, teeth bared. Everyone spun toward the opening doors. Adam stalked out of the elevator with Jon, guns trained on Riley’s three enforcers.

The disruption gave me a chance opening, and I mind-tossed a barrage of energy, zapping the three deadeners at once. Another headache-inducing arc sent the three men tumbling to the ground, writhing in pain. Adam and Jon sprang into motion to incapacitate the brutes.

I beelined it to the suite to snag Jax and Ronan. My feet dragged and fuzz filled my head. No way would I tempt fate and leave my meager haven alone again. Not until I had a solid plan to handle other sorcerers and fairies destined to flock to me.

The Rift, the whole shebang, was bigger than Ronan, Adam, or I ever imagined. Who else had the crumbling gate affected? Did they all have the ability to sense me? Who or what was I to them? A cold wash of goose bumps raced up my spine.

Stumbling, I rounded the bend and reenergized Jax's brain with a simple thought. Not quite sure how it worked, it was all the energy I managed to conjure. Jax crab-crawled away from me, distress scrunching his face. He struggled to sit up, and Adam skirted around me to help him.

"Five wasn't enough." Jax fingered the short-circuited deadener around his neck and looked behind him as if Adam were the sheriff of wicked Fairyland.

"So I see." Adam shot me an impatient frown.

I seethed and stomped into the suite, Adam close on my tail. Once behind closed doors, I blasted him a new one. "Who made you the master of me? I won't be imprisoned by you, or Ronan." I jerked my thumb toward the bedroom door.

His eyebrows quirked. "He's here?"

"You don't miss a trick, do ya? By the way, your fairy princess Kiera and her sorcerer showed up." His eyes bugged out. "Riley's men snatched them." I stalked to the empty bedroom. Fin snuck in before I slammed the door on Adam.

"Pack up, we're leaving before they return," he yelled through the door.

I sank to my knees on the plush carpet. "Why can't I feel your aura anymore?" I ruffled the silky fur around her ears. "Is the bad magic screwing with you too?"

She yipped twice in an acknowledgement that eerily represented a yes and no.

Determination got the better of me. I kissed her furry head, and then snagged Mom's papers out of the safe. It was time to face my heritage. To hell with sharing my treasure with my wardens, or packing. I eyed my belongings scattered around the room, knowing I needed to get my butt in gear before more of Riley's men popped up.

I stared at the envelopes so long they should've started talking to me. "Why did you hide these secrets, Mom," I whispered.

At times, I missed her so much I thought my heart might implode. After both Mom and then Granny Elle had passed, I resolved never to get close to anyone ever again. Zoe ultimately patched the hole and kept me from having an epic freakout about my cursed life. I certainly didn't know what to do about Adam and Ronan since I had no clue what direction my life traveled. I thought it'd be easy to toughen my heart with my crappy past and an unknown future. Not so easy now with the doppel-dudes softening it up.

Carefully, I emptied the packages. Most of the papers inside were so very old. I had no doubt they belonged to the Illuminaria. One by one, I looked at them, all crammed with writing in a foreign language. Half the sheets were newer and it appeared someone had translated the strange language into English. Was this what my mother had been working on all the time?

The pages contained the ritual to open the Rifts—the ritual Riley Senior was missing—along with the alchemic spells to go along with the sorcery-magic. Almost every ritual a Forbidden Thirteen sorcerer could do naturally with their inborn magic, someone could replicate with the right alchemic recipe and ingredients, ingredients that included blood of the Thirteen descendants. Richard Riley's ultimate goal. If he couldn't control the Thirteen naturally, he could do a helluva lot of damage with our blood. Worst of all, he could control all the Forbidden with the alchemic potions in the book. My body became a mass of gooseflesh as the implications imprinted my brain, an almost permanent condition of horrifically mysterious thoughts.

Once past the rituals and potions, the summary at the end of the Illuminaria stunned me more than anything else had in the last few days. My blood turned to ice.

I wasn't just one of the Forbidden Thirteen sorcerers. I was the last living descendant of the thirteenth sorcerer. What did that mean? With my blood alone, Riley could call all the living descendants of the Thirteen to him.

My heart clutched up. I continued reading the enlightening and frightening text. The powerful sorcery that created one doppelgänger for each Forbidden Thirteen sorcerer, also ensured only one sorcerer was born in each generation of the thirteen families, even though multiple generations of sorcerers in each family could be alive at one time. How our bloodlines accomplished that was pretty random. If Mom was alive, either one of us could've been the thirteenth sorcerer, one being stronger than the other.

On and on the disturbing text flowed. The original thirteenth sorcerer—my supposed ancestor—had created the doppelgängers and the magic ensuring that sorcery survived throughout the ages even when most of the magic had been abolished. The magic may have waned for a time or became diluted throughout our bloodlines, but it remained in our blood. The thirteenth couldn't wield magic with a doppelgänger in the world with her. Thank my lucky stars. I didn't think the world could deal with another Aria. Only the thirteenth had a magical bond to the other twelve sorcerers, otherwise the other twelve were not bound to each other—unless the thirteenth bound all thirteen together. Holy sorcerers on high hell.

The pages spoke of the deliberate dilution of magic into odd and sometimes flawed ESP throughout generations to keep the Thirteen safe and undetected. Once brought together, they had the ability to invoke true and ancient sorcery. The pages included a magic spell and its alchemic ritual explaining how to accomplish the task. Only the thirteenth could invoke the final words to restore pure ancient magic to all thirteen. Only the thirteenth had the ability to pull magic from the other twelve and their doppelgängers once the sorcerer and doppelgänger pairs had bonded. It scared the bejeezus out of me.

There was much more in the few pages crammed front and back with magic, myth, prophecies, alchemy, and truth. None of this had to do with a Rift opening and pouring the abolished magic back into our world. I leafed through the pages until I found a frightening and obscure reference that wasn't so vague with what I'd already learned. "Eventually, a generation of Thirteen will be born that will restore the ancient powers of the original Thirteen. However, for all to be born of the same age, the old magic must be present on Earth to trigger the return and births." Powerful scary magic hell. How did the ancients accomplish this? Did they know a cluster of earthquakes could trigger the return of the magic, albeit tainted magic?

Stunned, my mind bended this proof in black and white as I opened a small envelope containing a note from Mom to me in case something happened to her and I discovered the book.

My dearest Aria Elle,

I know you'll understand why I held this from you, and hope that you'll forgive me. I had to protect you from this at all costs, as I'm sure you'll come to realize. If you have this letter, then I assume I'm gone.

I know the extent of your talents, as I was the same before you.

Shock reverberated through me. Why hadn't she told me? I swiped my blurred eyes to read the familiar scrawl.

We belong to an extremely secret group. It has remained so secret throughout time that the members don't even know each other. The original members planned the secrecy at the group's inception. When the founding members entered into their final task on Earth, they did so with full knowledge of their lot in life.

It's an inherent need in each of us to hide our particular talents from the world, including the members of our elite group. That's your cross to bear, as it was mine. I cannot divulge more in writing since it's dangerous, even with what I have written and what I have left behind. So much danger abounds that I cannot comprehend it, let alone write about it. You must remain wary at all costs.

However, you won't be alone in whatever you decide to accomplish. My seer's sight foresaw three good men in your future. They will protect you with their entire beings, as that's part of their task in life, as you will protect them. You will not be alone, and that soothes me more than anything. I'm sorry if that troubles you and compounds your life, but it is what it is.

Remember the danger and the secrecy at all costs. I love you and respect your decisions and choices. I'll always watch over you. Think of the good times we shared, the fantasies we traded, the exotic vacation we enjoyed before I passed on. Think of the realms we explored in our dreams and the one place we always came together.

Love you like the frosting on my cake! Mom.

Chilly air engulfed me, and I sat there for what seemed like hours, unable to turn the pages to read more of the translation. Finally, the absurdity of my life smacked good sense out of me and hysterical laughter bubbled up. I needed to laugh it off, because I really wanted to bury my head in a vat of Mom's decadent frosting. Who were the three men? Ronan and Adam? Who was the third? Please, please, don't let one be Richard Riley.

Vaguely, I heard a bang on the door, making my heart jump. I opened my mouth to tell him to take a hike, but my throat seized on the words. What if it was one of Riley's men? I struggled to get up, lost my balance on the bed, and knocked over the bell jar lamp. Despite the dense carpet, and probably because of my unluck, the lamp hit the bottom of the nightstand. The bulb popped and the porcelain cracked into pieces.

The bedroom door flew open with a splintered bang.

Chapter 16

The doppel-jerks hulked in the doorway. I hopped off the bed, gently pulled the comforter over the precious and priceless papers. Ronan's aura assaulted me like a bulldozer of snow dumped over my shoulders.

"What?" My heart tumbled. Fin pranced in front of me, her tail whipping my legs. "I hope they don't kick you out for wrecking hotel property. Then where would you lock me up?" I trailed a scornful look from the guilty culprit's black boots to the scuffmarks on the white door.

They scoped out the room to ensure I wasn't the victim of an attempted redrum on their watch. Note to self: Watch The Shining to make my life look like cake. Adam returned from the bathroom with a wet washcloth and handed it to me. MAC Cosmetics could probably use me as a prime example of cheap makeup gone haywire.

"What's wrong?" he asked.

I wiped tear streaks off my face. "Nothing."

"Liar," Ronan said softly. They backed me into the corner.

Panic flitted through me and I spooled my energy for an attack. I felt like the trapped mouse Cody and Cleo batted around my patio last summer. I thrust away from the wall, forcing them back.

Greed sparkled in Ronan's eyes as he honed in on an empty clasp envelope lying on the bed. "Is that from your mom?" His eyes narrowed.

"Aren't you Mr. Nosey?" I shot back. "Appears as if I have something you might want."

"What the hell crawled up your ass?" Ronan dug his fingers through his slick hair. The clean, crisp scent of citrus shampoo infused the air. I breathed in deeply, basking in it like a love-struck ninny.

"She's mad at me for thinking of her safety," Adam quipped.

"For not trusting me." My eyes tried to fling switchblades, but I didn't possess that ability. Yet.

Ronan propped his good shoulder against the wall. "Why'd you leave earlier?"

Both nasty and nice answers sprang to mind. The kiss-ass angel on one shoulder quickly won the battle. "I wanted to scope out your father's compound, get a feel for it in person."

I swear on Granny's urn they both growled at me. What tripped me out the most was that their auras oozed fierce protectiveness. A frisson of heat incited a sexy dance low in my nether regions.

Attention: Aria Elle Walker has finally lost control of her body.

“You’re clueless.” Ronan clenched his fists. He edged closer, hovering like a storm cloud of testosterone. His aura taint skated over my exposed skin. “Start packing. We need to get out of here. Now.”

Adam plucked at a tendril of hair curling toward me. “Riley has deadeners all over his campus. He holds the patents on this shit.” Fog seemed to obscure his right side for a second.

Our fused auras sizzled. I moved forward, pushed the doppel-wardens apart, and stomped to the other side of the room. “Well, I wasn’t planning on waltzing up to the front door. We can disguise and shield ourselves like we did at the university. I can trip DR’s cameras one by one.” My determination was like the Rock of Gibraltar inside me. “I was only planning to scope out our opposition before we attack. Check out the deadeners. I wanted to see if I have enough power to knock them all out the way I did on Riley’s cavemen at SCU.”

Ronan’s neutral expression evolved into a critical squint. Lines of concentration formed under Adam’s eyes. A long beat of silence encouraged me to continue despite the thickening in my throat. “We can get bulletproof skin to avoid their bio-energy darts.” Unease blasted that famous rock into molten pebbles in my stomach. I scratched at the nails teasing my neck. “It’ll work. We just need to know where the deadeners, cameras, and sensors are. We have that info on Melisande’s tablet, right?” Flames seared my insides and I bent double. Adam sprinted around the bed.

My knees gelled. Red pokers of agony stabbed my skin and muscles. Ronan’s aura fed on me as if I was the only source of magical nutrient this side of the Rift. My spastic trembling caused me to lose all focus on my power, leaving me as powerless as spit. What new reality show purgatory had I landed in now?

“Son of a bitch.” Ronan streaked out of the room.

“Blondie.” Adam caught me before I crash-landed, and he laid me on the bed, avoiding my hidden paper treasures.

An inferno roared through me, decimating my power. “It hurts,” I whimpered, crawling out of my head. My skin blazed as if demons were peeling me like an orange in H-Town. The rest of my aural energy dissolved, leaving me boneless and vacant. Clothes tightened around my roasting body, and I clutched Adam’s hand in a wimpy clasp. “Clothes...get them...off.”

He undressed me down to my bra and thong. Then he draped cool, wet towels over me. Nothing appeased my pain. No focusing on my telekinesis or my aura brought my magic back. It was the worst feeling I’d ever experienced. I’d lead a killing spree at DR to restore the energy that’d been my one and only companion throughout my life’s upheavals. The one thing that I could always rely upon when nothing else remained constant.

Adam swept hair off my damp, boiling face. “What can I do?”

Another wave of serrated knives scraped beneath my skin, leaving me writhing on my side, panting in terror. Even with my eyes open, I saw nothing but a jagged darkness. Adam caressed my arms, whispering sweet somethings in my ear. I struggled to listen to his words, needing them to center me. My mind had frozen in limbo where all decisions and actions had gone the way of the dearly departed.

I bobbed in a sea of syrupy steam, so hot and wild it could only be tagged a firestorm. It cleared for a second, and I'd reach for that tantalizing pool of energy, then the mist hardened into lava, pushing me away. Everything inside me reached for my aura languishing outside my empty shell, refusing to come home. I screamed in frustration as it slipped from my grasp again and again. Adam's voice finally caught in my ears, and I concentrated on his words.

"Take my energy, Aria!" His fingers dug into my shoulders.

A shallow wave of familiar magic swept over me. It cooled my flesh, slowed my virtual skinning. The scent of spring meadows, summer roses, and cinnamon spices licked the air, flooded my nose, and saturated my tongue. With everything in my being, I drew on my shattered energy and doused the fire engulfing me. Magic rammed into me, jolting me against Adam. It was welcome relief to my near meltdown. My aura surrounded him, lending life to his sick body. He scooped me in his arms, cradling me against his chest, the wet towel between his hard body and my softer curves. Somehow, Adam's body filtered the taint and restored my power. Cleansed, vibrant magic seeped into me, driving out the tortuous pain.

He quaked against my length. "God, almighty. I felt your aural energy completely inside me." Adam kissed my head, his breath ragged. "What the hell was that?"

Achy and exhausted, electricity arced through me, rejuvenating my aural energy faster than ever as if every electromagnetic particle in the hotel filtered into me. Insane laughter boiled up. "Like I know?" I closed my eyes for a moment to calm my galloping heart. "In what fantasy-world hell are we role-playing?" Shivering, I stripped off the wet towels. Modesty was a moot point since he'd seen my goods.

"Wish I had answers for you." He gathered me closer, his clothes damp against my cooling skin.

I hauled the crisp sheet over us. "What did you feel?" Adam's magic settled in an acid puddle in my stomach.

"While your power shot through me, I felt awesome. My real powers surfaced, pure and vibrant, and my pain disappeared. Now, the pain's gone only because I'm touching you."

The last of our auras reverted to their rightful homes, except for a sharp spoonful of fairy taint sprinkling dry ice in my gut. I didn't know what else to call the icy stone. I drew my tongue over my lips, capturing the bizarre taste of fresh roses in my mouth. "Thank you."

His satisfied gaze caressed me. A new kind of heat zeroed in on me, creating sensations I hadn't experienced...well...since the last doppelgänger who'd held me in his arms.

"Anytime." He chuckled roughly, averting his flushed face.

Thank lucky thirteen I had a passion for sexy underwear straight from a Victoria's Secret dresser. My sodden pink lacy bra and matching thong caused Adam no end of appraisal from the glint of wonder in his eyes. He helped me off the bed, steadying my rubbery legs. My lower back throbbed anew. I fingered the skin, feeling raised welts, my eyes bugging out.

“What’s wrong?”

I craned my neck to scrutinize my back. “I’m not sure.”

Adam looked behind me and made a small noise in his throat.

“What?” I scurried into the bathroom. I’ll take my straitjacket in petal pink.

I peered at my backside in the floor-to-ceiling mirror. A raised tattoo scored the center of my lower back. Black and green, inflamed against my winter skin, a vague pattern of vines and thorns emerged.

My heart beat so fast I thought I was going to pass out. I leaned my elbows on the vanity, barely able to suck in more than puffs of air. Did Adam’s tainted power cause this? Ten million ideas tumbled over each other in my head and none of them made a lick of sense. He hovered beside me, commanding me to breathe.

“What the hell?” Ronan’s jealous voice splintered my tenuous foundation.

His aura waltzed over me, airy and pain-free. Adam backed away to give Ronan a view of my back. Straightening, I caught Ronan’s wide-eyed shock in the mirror. He tenderly touched my lower back, never breaking contact with my gaze in the mirror. Adam retreated to the doorway. Ronan’s fingers cooled and soothed the burning welt. Sniveling, I pressed my back against his hand.

“Why me? Who elected me mayor of Freak Town?”

“I wish I knew.”

Turning, I touched his cheek, his skin cold beneath my fingertips. “What happens to you when your aura attacks me?”

“I lose more of what little energy I have left.” He shrugged. “I don’t absorb any more, it doesn’t regenerate.” He moved his hands to my hips and squeezed gently. “Like a piece of my soul is being ripped out when I feel your pain.”

I froze, my mouth dropping open. “Why didn’t you tell me? Do you feel my tattoo...thing?” I slivered my eyes. “What else do you feel?” That could be risky with my emotions battling for world domination inside me.

A slow smile spread his lips, crinkling the skin around his eyes. “You’re feeling better.”

“Tell me.” I pinched his arm playfully, anything to sidetrack the butterflies tangoing in my stomach.

“A beautiful, hot-as-hell woman with far too many clothes on.”

I smirked. “You have the right amount of clothes on.”

“I meant you.” A twinkle lit his eyes.

I glanced at Adam, already knowing his answer to the same question. “Fork over some answers,” I said to Ronan, drawing away, needing to throttle that tangible bond that impelled me to sink into an embrace that included so much more than his hands on me. His darkened eyes had gone as wild as a wind-tossed sea on a moonless night.

Lost in his stormy eyes, it took a long moment to realize I was nearly naked. A flush traveled up from my toes, and I crossed my arms over my torso. My rebel body had totally invalidated my inherent mistrust of near strangers.

Reluctantly, he circled around me to examine my back. “When the pain hits you, it bounces on me then returns to you.” He fingered the welts, skimmed his hand over my right butt cheek. To my consternation, my rear involuntarily tightened.

“Hand me the antibacterial ointment. It’s my turn to play doctor.” He kissed my shoulder, his lips warm and firm.

Adam left and returned with my robe. I forced my mind off Ronan’s unnaturally playful mood. A facet of him I planned to explore in-depth. As much as I enjoyed his flirtations and attempts to lighten the situation, we had no time for it.

Rescuing Zoe was no longer priority one. Many other people were suffering. I couldn’t handle that any longer.

“We have to close the Rift now.” Decision made, I lowered my stricken gaze in the mirror to Ronan’s veiled reflection and Adam’s accepting eyes. We couldn’t risk opening it correctly until we got a handle on everything Forbidden.

“I know.” The only words Ronan needed to say. Adam nodded his agreement.

Chapter 17

After I recovered from my newest short-circuit, we scrambled to pack. Once in the parking lot, the stink of wet asphalt caused more knots to form in my shoulders. Roiling charcoal clouds whispered a warning along my nerves. Just kill me if I ever have to live in Seattle.

I climbed into one of two midnight-blue SUVs from the Freshfields company fleet. Jon planned to chauffeur Adam in one, and Jax got stuck carting Ronan and big, bad me in the other. Suck it up, boys. Aria's here to stay. If Ronan's aura went postal on me again, we'd deal with it. For the moment, our other options numbered zero.

Ronan and I planned to video link to his father while we randomly cruised the city. Even though we turned off our location settings and scrambled them by staying on the move, we didn't trust Richard Riley's ability to bypass the best in high-tech security. The guy was rolling in moola and subhuman gift basket ideas. Since Riley didn't know about Adam, we didn't want to risk him getting caught with us, hence the reason we split up. Ronan and I needed an easy way into DR's compound to obtain the ancient book of clues and to rescue Zoe, Kiera, and Katrina. Riley was going to offer us personal invites to nab his treasures. We just needed to stay one step ahead of him.

According to Ronan, years ago Riley had spent a fortune hiring treasure hunters to locate his portion of the Illuminaria buried in an Ireland crypt. My ancestor had purposely dismantled and hidden the Illuminaria around the world so no one person could lay sticky fingers on the entire text. Someone had previously found and buried the puzzle pieces Riley now possessed. Who'd shot Riley with a lucky shamrock? And did I possess the key to the kingdom of the Forbidden in the missing pages? My point being, the guy would have hell's minions safeguarding his treasures no matter the cost. Our game plan was eleven doppelgängers short of a sorcerer's dozen.

A lot depended on what went down at the Rift. If we left the Rift in its current state, Adam and Kiera were going to die soon, and possibly Ronan and Katrina. Maybe even me. Who knew? After the phone call with Dickhead Riley, we were going to the Rift to close it, then onward to rescue Zoe, the girls, and get the book out of Dickie's sticky fingers. There was no telling how much blood he'd siphoned out of Kiera and Katrina in hopes of creating his alchemic magic. With Ronan's and Katrina's blood—if she was indeed a sorcerer—could he open the Rift? We had to beat him to it and hope our magic took his down a notch and stuck.

Jax exited the parking garage, and Ronan pinned me with a wrinkly nervous frown from the right side of the back seat. “You’ll follow my lead?” Half question, half command.

I peered at my haggard reflection in the smoky window separating us from Jax.

“Aria?” Ronan’s voice lowered. “I’ve been around the block a few times with my father.”

“Okay. I get it.” I studied him from my limpet-on-a-door position, unable to trust myself so near him. It was bad enough our auras partied around us. I couldn’t afford the distraction or the torrent of indecision rushing through my body. How’d I blunder from a humdrum life of loser blind dates to two gorgeous hunks in my back pocket? Dumbfounded and lucky hardly defined it. That Wiki to describe my new empire was percolating way too slowly.

“What happens if we don’t close the Rift correctly? Will we all die?” The brand on my back burned.

Unease painted Ronan’s bland mask. “Let’s wait and see.”

My chin dropped. “Oh, nice. Thanks for the vote.”

“I don’t know.” He punched the seat between us.

His cell jangled in the seatback pocket. A muscle stood out in a hard ridge in his neck. Snatching up the phone, he clicked on video and speaker. The call routed via Adam’s line, and he remained on a three-way, muted conference. As planned, I kept out of view of the camera. Not that I didn’t want to give Dickie a one-fingered salute.

“Son, it’s a pleasure to speak with you again.” Richard Riley’s snarky sweet baritone was more refined than Ronan’s and slightly nasally as if he suffered from a cold. One could only wish.

Ronan wasted no time. “Release Zoe Marino and I won’t contact the PVD.”

We didn’t have plans to contact the federal Paranormal Vice Division, but the threat was real. We decided not to bargain for Kiera and Katrina, yet. We didn’t want him figuring out how much we knew about the situation. I still hadn’t said a word to Ronan or Adam about what I’d discovered in the missing Illuminaria pages. I needed to keep something in my back pocket in case I was walking into a trap of Ronan and Adam’s making.

Riley chuckled. “We both know you won’t do that. Not until you’ve obtained a few of my treasures.” According to Ronan, his father’s possessiveness was legendary. “Since you’ve squandered no time, I’ll get to my point. I’ll release the telepath when you return with Aria Walker.”

“No deal.” Ronan white-knuckled the phone.

“What happened to you, Ronan?” Riley’s tone hinted at regret. “You used to worship the ground I owned. You believed in my mission. We’ve spent your entire life working toward this goal. Where did I make a wrong turn?”

I smoothed my hand over Ronan’s knee, hoping to instill a calm vibe. Destroying Riley wasn’t vicious enough for what he’d done to a crapload of people.

“Give Zoe up and I’ll let you live.”

My eyes widened. Would he really off his own father?

“Let me see Ms. Walker.” Exasperation clipped Riley’s words. “Her little friend wants an eyeful too.”

Ronan flashed me on screen. I flipped Riley the bird, and Ronan shot me a tired look of frustration.

“Aria!”

I snuck a peek at Zoe’s face filling the small screen. Her eyes shimmered with unshed tears, framed by long, tangled auburn hair. I latched onto the device to steady Ronan’s hand. “Zoe, you okay?” Relief cooled the volcano dying to erupt inside me.

“A few bruises, but I’m kicking.” She hiccupped, her shoulders heaved. Two of Riley’s apemen removed her thrashing and snarling from the room.

Riley’s mug reappeared. I glowered at him, but Ronan seized the controls.

“What’s it going to be, Ronan?”

“I’ll return to the compound. Aria and Zoe go free.”

“You can do better.” Riley laughed a silver-tongued, arrogant sound geared to charm the unwary. “You’re not talking to the media or law enforcement. And we both know you don’t have the balls to kill me.”

Fury and hatred vibrated Ronan’s taut body. Riley harbored major blind spots about his son. However, he was right about our inability to cry wolf or to wine and dine the media, which was just another death sentence. We had to gain access to DR’s compound to swipe the Illuminaria and every iota of his research, and destroy his alchemic potions and blood. Then Riley bites it big time.

“Release Zoe. I’ll return to the compound. You get three days with Aria, me present at all times.”

“Growing fond of our Ms. Walker, are you?” Green-eyed egotism was rife in Riley’s voice. “I want her for three years. By then, she’ll beg me to let her stay, as will you.”

I jerked against the seatback. “Bastard,” I said under my breath. The only begging I’ll be doing is begging you to take a vacation on the bottom on the ocean, a block of cement your only friend.

“One week,” Ronan countered.

One minute was crazy risky. We’d located the compound’s schematics, including security data and weak spots on Melisande’s computer. DR had corrected the defects after Ronan’s desertion, but Ronan knew of other weaknesses the latest schematics didn’t reveal. We knew a way out. Out alive was another chapter. We just needed a way inside, and if we could do it by cooperating a smidge, so be it. Dicktard would never kill us, not if we pretended to go along with him.

Riley remained silent for light years. “Sorry to disappoint,” he finally said. “I’m growing rather fond of Ms. Marino. She’s an amazing telepath. Now that my darling Melisande has jumped ship—”

I slapped down the mute button. “He doesn’t know the Queen of Darkness is dead?” Disbelief twitched my eyelids.

Ronan shrugged, yanked the phone from me, thumbing the mute off. “Here’s the final deal, Dad.” He sneered at the word. “You get one week with Aria. I stay indefinitely. When Aria’s safely released, you'll receive a key to a safety deposit box that contains the lost Illuminaria pages." The prepared lie tripped off his tongue. "We want forty-eight hours before surrendering."

Riley's eyes did a praying mantis bug-out. "Now you're talking my language," he purred. "I'll give you twenty-four hours. Be at the gate at one tomorrow." The display darkened.

Ronan and I swapped nervous, satisfied glances. Ronan had predicted his father would give us twenty-four hours. We only needed a few hours. The phone rang again. Adam.

"I'll meet you at the Rift at seven thirty," he rambled off.

"I thought we were going together?" That had been our plan—before we'd sold our magic and bodies to Satan's pride and joy.

"We still shouldn't be seen together." Ronan jabbed the SUV's intercom and instructed Jax to drive to our new hotel.

We hadn't tapped all of Melisande's data, and we hoped it contained info even Riley didn't know she'd pirated. Adam would keep Melisande's gadgets and documents safe and be our failsafe on the outside if something went ass-end wrong at DR. That was, if we managed to close the Rift and he lived long enough.

Ronan curled his fingers through mine. Our magic link pacified my frazzled nerves and erected a thin barrier against Adam's nasty lingering taint from my recent magic flogging in the hotel. Ronan's aura amazingly soothed the incessant burn of my new eerie tattoo.

The privacy window rolled down. "We have a tail," Jax said.

Our fleeting harmony shattered. Ronan and I fixed our sights out the rear window. A late model silver sedan followed at a discreet distance. Two cavemen silhouettes filled the front seats, two hulked in the rear.

Pinkies twitched. The clock struck one thirteen. Too late to thwart my bad luck. Love. Lee. Could I give myself a crash course in ninja?

"Head away from the hotel." Ronan yanked his gun from his shoulder harness.

Likewise, I tugged out my stun gun, primed it for distance on high. "Who is it?" I settled backward in my seat for an easier view out the rear.

A torrential rain began pounding the roof, drowning the sound of my heart's erratic rhythm in my ears. The rear wipers arced across the glass, unable to defeat the mini-monsoon.

Jax drove into a bleak commercial area peppered with manufacturing buildings. Occasional splashes of color decorated the stark facades. The SUV's engine chugged, rattled, bit the dust. I caught Jax's anxious expression in the rearview mirror. You have got to be kidding me.

Ronan locked his sight on the sedan. "What's wrong?"

Jax rolled the vehicle to the curb, stomping on the breaks as the tires bounced off the cement. "Gas gauge reads empty, but we had a full tank."

Ronan landed a glower on me. A bead of sweat dripped between my breasts. Son of an unlucky thirteen bitch.

Jax fiddled with the diagnostic computer. The silver car halted in front of the glass-fronted building a couple hundred feet behind us. Rain slashed the windows, making it hard to see through the murk.

Lightning sizzled across the sky in a blaze of white. A clap of thunder caused me to jerk against the door. Then I noticed Ronan's aura had disappeared. Our compelling, confusing meld of tingly power became a frozen black boulder within me. As if my arteries bled out, my energy slipped out and my aura dissolved. In less than a minute, I became a lifeless hollow, despite my blood, muscles, and flesh calling for the lilting melody to return.

Arctic floodgates swung open and panic crashed into me. "Ronan?" I clenched my weapon so hard the outer shell creaked.

He turned to me, his eyes flinty, calculating. One sweep took in my alarm. "We're in a dead zone." Concentration deepened his frown. He attempted to raise his paltry magic to no avail.

I loathed the soul-eating loss in my core. I zipped my jacket to my chin, insanely hoping the insignificant effort contained my last trickle of energy.

Ronan kept his sight peeled on the car. "More of my father's goons."

Jax slammed his fist against the computer monitor. "Piece of shit."

The silver menace behind us appeared no less threatening through the rain-slick window. What were they waiting for?

Ronan touched my arm. "Keep watch. I'm going to help Jax."

I nodded and pitched a rash of positive mental energy at the computer. It drizzled into a pin drop of emptiness.

Another boom of thunder without the precipitating crack of lightning rattled my bones. A glint of light inside the sedan caught my attention. "They're getting out." Something tight wound up in my stomach.

Four tall men in dark raincoats exited the car. One had a glistening bald head, and the others sported short, dark hair the rain instantly plastered to their skulls.

"We're not waiting," Ronan barked. "Jax, cover us. You're not an ESP and they won't hurt you." The back window latch popped open. "Out your side, Aria."

"I'm not worried. I've got an arsenal." Jax laughed maniacally. He crammed his beefy body past me and rolled into the cargo area. "Ready," he growled, one hand on the window to push it open, the other clutched around a handgun.

A hateful, familiar paralysis claimed me. Everything blurred and that flood of panic became a tsunami. I forced my fingers to maintain my grip on my stun gun. Ronan shouted at me, but I couldn't understand his words. All I saw was the rain sheeting the windows, smothering the world outside. Muscles throbbed in my temples, and I fought against the memories flashing in lightning strikes through my mind. Refusing to let the haunting episodes hit me, I pulled inane thoughts out of other pockets in my mind. Cody and Cleo, bring chocolate to Mommy.

“Aria!” Ronan shook my shoulders. “Get a grip!” He jiggled me again and his mottled face wavered into view.

I focused on that ruggedly beautiful face as fragile life crept back into me. “It’s raining,” I stuttered, numb from my scalp to the soles of my feet.

“We’re sitting ducks and you’re worried about rain?” He shoved past me and flipped the door latch. The freezing numbness remained, but my mind raced into action, delving past the morass of that horrible night eight years ago.

Ronan cupped my face. “Baby, what’s wrong?” His thumb stroked my cheek, hot against my glacial skin. “You’ll get your powers back once we’re free of the dead zone. But we can’t sit here.”

“They’re moving in,” Jax said. “Hey, here.” Something hit my shoulder and Ronan caught it. He jammed a baseball cap on my head, yanking the bill low over my face.

The muck in my befuddled brain sluiced apart and feeling mushroomed in my pits of dread. I took several deep breaths to still my heart and locked eyes with Ronan’s perplexed gaze. “I’m okay.” I hoped. Only part of me knew the rain wouldn’t hurt me.

Ronan sprang into action. “Stay close.”

I stole one last dismal look at the slashing rain suffocating the earth, then plunged into it. We lunged across a short span of slippery lawn to a large sign staking the home of A Fantasy on Us, Inc. Adults Toys. Illuminated, animated purple and black penis-shaped vibrators danced on the left side of the sign. Rain buffeted me, and I dipped my head, my chin practically touching my chest. The comical sign returned a raindrop of normalcy to my bizarre new world.

Lightning lit up the churning dark sky, sizzling into the heavens. It struck the emerald grass, a spotlight on center stage, blinding me with its dazzling performance. Thunder rumbled so loud it shook the ground. I stumbled and grabbed hold of Ronan’s jacket to keep from slipping on the wet grass. Four more cracks answered in quick succession. Only that time it wasn’t thunder.

I flicked on my stun gun. Rain dripped down my neck, and I shuddered from the dampness penetrating the collar of my sweater.

Ronan peeked around the end of the sign. “Make a run for the walkway between the two buildings.”

We tore across the lawn to the buildings. Gunshots tracked us, but I knew empathically that murder wasn’t their top priority, yet they had no such reservations about shooting deadeners. Call it my thirteen spidey sense. We dashed between the one-story buildings. An overhang connected the structures, offering a break from the tortuous downpour. Sprinting to the rear, we rounded the far right corner the same time two of Dickie’s Douches reached the front.

My heart drummed against my chest, beating a way out. The building on the right housed four loading docks, locked steel bars across its doors. Ronan pointed to a narrow opening beneath one of the docks. We slipped through the three-foot-square doorway and scampered deeper into a crawlspace spanning the width of the loading platform. A mildew smell reminded me of dirty, wet socks in the laundry hamper. I scrunched my nose and crawled across pea gravel, praying I didn't cross paths with any creepy crawlies. A hairy spider spaz attack wouldn't be pretty.

Ronan scuttled around investigating. I hid behind a cement pillar, holding my fist to my mouth to stifle the rumbling sound of my breathing. Denim plastered my legs in a wet, heavy layer. Fortunately, my coat and leather boots were waterproof. I unzipped my jacket and wiped my face on my dry sweater.

The steel ramp above us softened the noise of the rain. Wind whistled and moaned a mournful, lonely sound between the gaps in the sheets of steel, the song of the dead zone, the weeping of emptiness inside me.

"Riley." A voice with a New England accent floated closer. "Daddy's looking for you, the girl too. Come out and we won't hurt you."

"We lost them. These detectors ain't picking up shit," a squeaky male voice intoned.

At least the dead zone had a positive benefit. I clasped my hands to keep from clapping.

A phone rang and one of Riley's goons answered, his voice too low to hear until he said, "Today's your lucky day. If you don't show up at the compound tomorrow, we'll be hot on your trail, sniffing your asses before you can say fart." Rainfall muted the group guffaw.

"Lucky bastards," New England groused loudly.

"Let's get outta this cloud piss." Muffled footsteps carried the voice away on a whistle of wind.

Diminishing sounds of rain engulfed us. Ronan slicked his saturated hair off his face. "Damn it. They have your magic footprint as well as mine. The SUV had impenetrable blocks on it and they picked us up before we hit the dead zone."

My mind whirled around the numbing air. Melisande must have coughed up the goods. The best PSP gadgets couldn't locate a body by their electromagnetic footprint; that was only possible by DNA and brain wave scanning. "Why would they give up on us so easily?" Something didn't ring right.

"I don't know. Dad's up to no good as usual. Probably trying to make it look like he trusts us, or spying on us."

We huddled beneath the dock for fifteen minutes before emerging under drizzling, thick clouds. Hiding in shadows, we worked our way toward the street, pausing in the corridor at the front of the building. The SUV had disappeared. Ronan tugged me into his side, surveying the street in both directions. Just as I yanked my phone from my pocket, a honk pierced the silence and the SUV raced up to the curb.

Jax drove us safely out of the dead zone. My power rushed out of hiding, filling me with the most incredible, delicious feeling of sweetness, desire, and heaven. I never wanted to return to a dead zone and miss the magic that had been a part of my life forever.

Shivers seized control of me and my teeth clattered. Miserable in my soaked clothes, I huddled against the door until Ronan pulled me into his arms, folding his own dampness around me. What cuckoo's nest had we flown into? I derailed the incident in my mind, squinted at his face, my insatiable need for information putting him in a full court press.

I drew invisible shapes on his thigh. “Do you have any brothers or sisters?” I began with the most innocent of questions.

A muscle flinched in his chest against my shoulder. “No.”

“Are you dating anyone?”

His hand crushed my swirling finger on his leg. His whole body tensed cadaver stiff. “I have no life. Haven’t you figured that out?” he said in the gruffest voice I’d ever heard. “Do we have to do this right now?”

I flexed my hand to escape his clutches. He held on, but relaxed his grip. “I’m scared,” I admitted. “I need something to kill a few rogue brain cells.”

Tension flowed out of his arms. “I know.” He kissed my temple and his fingers butterfly-danced across my cheek. “My father pressured me into doing things that kept me from a normal life. Things I’m not proud of.” His chest rose and fell heavily. “I never wanted to bring anyone into that life.” The heat of his anger expanded around us.

I inhaled a humid whiff of his cologne, fed the tiny fairies forming a dance line in my tummy. Sensing the heat of his disgust, I changed the subject. “Are you sure I negate you? How bad is your magic failing?” His laugh rumbled in his chest. “Okay. I know hell just froze over.”

“You still don’t believe in the whole negation thing, do you?”

“Why should I when it doesn’t affect me? I feel your aura.” I dusted his thigh with the flat of my hand. “Try it. Pretty please?” I lifted my head off his chest, landing sparkling encouragement on his face.

Annoyance set into the straight line of his mouth. “Feeling my aura has nothing to do with it.”

“Prove it.” I scooted out of his arms, into my seat.

The air between us wavered for a second, and gloom rained on my happy aura parade. My eager anticipation fell into a black hole. “What’d you do?”

“I put your brain to sleep.” The corners of his mouth ruffled. “Did it work?”

Unable to stop myself, I stuck my tongue out at him.

The mask fell over his features and he reached for me. “It’s bad, Aria. Okay?”

As though his words destroyed another barrier between us, I wound my arms inside his jacket and clutched him to me.

Chapter 18

I rucked up my damp sweater and examined my back in the bathroom mirrors. The welts traveling south toward my butt crack stung and itched like the poison ivy I'd fallen into on a camping trip a few years ago. I swore never to go camping again. Nature and I didn't get along.

Ronan strode into the bathroom, wearing dry jeans and a T-shirt, toweling off his hair. Such was our newfangled relationship. He sucked in a sharp breath as he checked out my back.

He chuckled the towel in the tub and grabbed the tube of cortisone off the counter. "Drop your pants."

"Yes, doctor." Careful not to scrape my raw skin, I undid my jeans and peeled the moist denim past my hips.

He crouched behind me and gently traced my new artwork.

"How bad?" I twisted to my side to see in the mirror.

"Stop wiggling." His fingers dug into my hips to hold me steady. "It's no worse, half-inch longer, if that." He slicked the ointment onto the blistering tattoo. His touch and the soothing medicine left my insides dribbling into a pool of happiness.

My palms flat on the marble vanity top, I studied my face in the mirror. I knew my name, but barely recognized the reflection. Pain dulled my usual sparkling teal irises. Seriously, people with paranormal abilities had an extra sparkle to their eyes. It's not overly noticeable except to the trained. My complexion had colored like death warmed over and then returned for a second helping.

"Why did you freeze in the SUV?" Ronan's question came out of the blue yonder and incited a mini panic attack in my chest as my heart tried to detach.

Breathe. Breathe. I didn't care to explain my unnatural rain phobia to Ronan and make him think even less of me. "I don't want to talk about it." I inspected a bullet-shaped glob of aqua toothpaste in the sink. So not a sign I cared to see after our day from hell.

Ronan's fingers ceased moving for the span of an eye blink before resuming their slow massage. "Better?"

"Mmmm." Eyes closed, I was drowning in his calming touch.

His lips brushed my skin above the brand, soft and sensuous on my back, sending a tingly jolt through my legs. He began kissing a scorching trail northward as he shoved my sweater higher, and I shivered from the impact of his soft caressing lips. A tainted barb pricked my skin, and my hip froze against the vanity. The sensation trickled into dancing butterflies, and an ecstatic moan slipped out. His flaming mouth and tongue continued to create amazing sensations on my skin.

“Ronan?” I pushed out the one breath that refused to budge.

“Hmm?” He spanned his hands over my hips and pivoted me around, his lips working magic on my stomach.

Desire streamed molten liquid through my blood, and I slumped against the vanity. My body might as well belong to someone else for all the restraint I had over it. “What if the bad magic returns? It affects us when your emotions flip out.”

He raised his head, his eyes half-lidded chinks of charcoal. “Or when my doppelgänger’s around.”

I gasped. So much crud going on, I hadn’t noticed. And speaking of doppelgänger, I pushed against him. “Stop, Ronan. I can’t do this—” I wanted to cry, scream, and rage. He froze, a black scowl working across his face. And the bottom fell out of his seduction.

White-hot ice picks poked me. Fire scorched the brand on my back. His aura turned ugly and mine scurried away. It was that bit of Adam’s leftover contamination from earlier that dominated us, as though Adam’s tainted magic gloated in triumph.

“No!” Ronan slammed his fist into the marble wall.

“Go.” I shoved at him. Sharpened nails replaced the wire brush scraping my skin. He shook his head, cupped my cheek. I kissed his palm. “I’ll be okay.” I fell back against the mirror.

Alarm raced across Ronan’s hard expression, and he stalked out of the suite leaving the door jarring in its frame.

Thunder boomed in my head. Anger, dismay, and uncertainty all fought for the crown inside me. Guilt swept another blast of fire over my physical pain. I needed to figure out the weird doppelgänger connection to both Ronan and Adam. Man, I’m totally embracing my crazy in a Defcon wake and bake.

Groaning, I buried my face in my hands, suffering the receding pain. My life was too complicated for man troubles. I had too much to accomplish, too much to discover to allow a love triangle in the middle, or any boyfriend for that matter. If we didn’t fix the Rift, none of it would matter. There wouldn’t be a life for either Ronan or Adam. Nor me, because I couldn’t imagine any existence without either of them.

Pinpricks continued a light assault on my skin. I rubbed my arms, soothing my ravaged flesh. My phone rang in the other room, and I darted to answer it, needing a break from myself. Relief traveled down my back as I clicked on video.

Distress knitted Ronan’s eyebrows into unibrow territory. “I just want to see you,” he said. “Hear you. Are you okay?”

“I’m good.” I’d already told him what had happened during the last time his magic attacked, but I withheld the one oddity that made no sense. Neither Ronan nor Adam knew about the small piece of Adam's magic embedded in my core, so completely different than the magical energy I absorbed and assimilated into good energy. Although I had absorbed it the same way I absorb aural energy, it mimicked a fiery leaden ball of electricity, pulsing and ricocheting in my bloodstream.

Just when I was getting used to yesterday, along came today.

"We can't do this." I sat heavily on the couch, clutched my jacket over my chest.

"Obviously." His thick voice shook.

I hunched forward. "What I meant was...you and me."

Ronan flicked off the video. "Adam's not for you, Aria," he said with difficulty.

"That's not what I meant," I shot out. "Wait! What's that supposed to mean?" I bolted upright on the couch. "So you think I belong to you?" Indignation rallied my spirits and drove off the last of my pain. I envisioned his scowl and wanted to smack it off his arrogant face.

"Don't you feel it?" Emotion lay heavy in his voice. "I have, for every damn moment since I walked into your condo. I didn't ask for this. I hate it." He paused. "I want you so damn bad. It's killing me that Adam—"

My throat constricted. I clicked off the phone and studied the paisley pattern on the carpet, trying to wind my thoughts around my too-bizarre-for-words life. For the first time, my love life was as complicated as the maze of endless paisley.

The suite door opened and I smelled Ronan's cologne. The irritated flare of his sick aura grazed my naked flesh.

I scratched the last few tingles on my arm and said softly, "What I meant was that it's not the time to hook up until our lives are on solid footing."

Ronan didn't move from his rigid stance in front of the door. "Okay." Some of the anxiety fled his taut body as his shoulders slumped forward.

"I won't deny the connection I have with both you and Adam."

"I'm a Thirteen sorcerer, Aria." Triumph sparked in his eyes.

"And Adam's your doppelgänger."

"You'll have to make a choice."

Even though my emotions scurried all over the map, I shrugged nonchalantly. Slowly, I walked to him. Rising on my toes, I brushed a soft kiss over his mouth. "I need time, okay? We all need time. You have no idea how that doppelgänger bond affects me."

The thought of my boring, loveless life roared to the forefront of my mind. My inner fire glimmered, and then winked out. Lack of trust and fear of abandonment weren't terms in my new Wiki. How far I'd come in a couple of days. But I couldn't go back to that life ever again. The problem was I didn't know how to go beyond it.

Chapter 19

Foamy clouds splashed night's ink over twilight. Once again, rain slicked the streets and headlights bounced off puddles. Shivering, I adjusted the heater vents. Ronan maneuvered Seattle's busy streets toward Washington Park, the site of the Rift, along the shores of Lake Washington. Excitement railroaded my fear to connect with the mysterious source of ancient magic that seemed to grant me my identity. I wanted to find myself so badly. It was my life now and I needed to live inside it, for better or for worse.

The steps for closing the Rift revolved in my mind. At the hotel, while we'd waited for dusk, Ronan warned me what to expect from when he'd tried the ritual using a page from the Illuminaria. Apparently, only one Forbidden Thirteen was needed to close the Rift. Go freaking figure. I finally showed Ronan and Adam a few of the secret pages I possessed. They'd already guessed I carried the pages in the tote bag. My doom and gloom face had given me away.

We still didn't know what would happen to Adam or other doppelgängers who may be alive. All Ronan remembered reading was that the sorcerer-created doppelgängers possessed no magic of their own and they shared their sorcerer's magic. To what extent remained a mystery. We had no legit clue where they came from since the twelve "created" doppelgängers had supposedly abolished themselves. Then we found an obscure passage in Mom's pages that the Forbidden sorcerers created the doppelgängers based on even older magic from a time when many magical beings roamed the earth. The Illuminaria detailed nothing about sorcerers and doppelgängers not being able to live together on Earth's side of the Rift. Apparently, way before the Abolishment both had lived on our side of the Rift before the doppelgängers replaced the sorcerers in the banishment.

On the other hand, everything we did could bite us in the ass and we'd all wind up dead. Releasing further forbidden magic caused a slew of illegal activity. I wanted the laws changed and I'd accept the gamble if it came down to it. I'd fight to end the government's long-term experiment in artificial stupidity. The world had no right to banish the Forbidden. What if there were other beings alive in the Void? The Illuminaria indicated that only sorcerers, fairies, and the twelve doppelgängers lived to the end of the Abolishment because they were the strongest to survive decades of culling by humans. What if they were wrong? Enough what ifs crammed my head to lay down tracks to the next century.

Before stashing the secret book in the hotel safe, I double-checked Mom's pages, and they divulged the ritual to open the Rift by both magic and alchemy, for the thirteenth sorcerer's eyes only. Only the thirteenth and one or more sorcerers could open the Rift together, which is why Ronan and his father had screwed it up. Ronan was adamant that he could close it alone, now that he'd seen a few of Mom's pages and Melisande's tablet. The steps made sense now, whereas they hadn't before. But I still had a hard time believing the closing ritual would work.

"What if we need all thirteen sorcerers to close it?" I flicked dog hair off my pants.

Ronan rattled his brain cells. "The Illuminaria didn't say anything about all thirteen."

I pressed him. "It didn't say anything at all, did it?"

"It said how to close it. It didn't say form a circle of thirteen freaks, dance, and throw a fucking party." He threw up his hands. "It's not like I ever got to read the whole thing. I had to take direction from my dad and the pages we have here don't say all thirteen either. What more do you want?"

"I want not to be playing with lives here," I yelled. Man, I needed to team up with Einstein to work the Rift.

I massaged away the slow tapping in my temples. Tense moments slipped by. Unable to handle the yawning silence any longer, I faced Ronan, stretching the seatbelt over my chest.

A slow flame of bitterness against Ronan's father ignited in my belly. "Your father didn't trust you much, did he?"

"Nope. He didn't even trust my mother." He gripped the steering wheel so hard, the vehicle jerked to the right. "Melisande came closer than anyone."

"Yet the hag betrayed him." I cut my hand through the air as if to slice off her gooey, dead head.

Ronan parked near an ill-lit path far from the park's mainstream entrances and visitor center. The rain had taken a breather, and I was eternally grateful for the jet-set priced ski jacket I'd picked up in the hotel boutique. Adam had left me a store credit, but I'd used my casino jackpot, not wanting to pimp myself out. Much.

Magical energy overwhelmed the air. It licked and nibbled my skin. For the most part, my aura protected me, but had no luck chasing the stalkerish magic away.

Ronan tugged a flashlight out of his backpack and handed it to me.

I flicked it on, the light bouncing off brown stick trees and winter limp foliage. "What's in the backpack?"

"Stuff."

I rolled my eyes at the scuttling clouds. Leading the way through a rickety ranger gate to the arboretum, he secured it behind us with a quiet snick. We trudged down an unmarked path cutting through the woods. An undeveloped, natural woodsy area shadowed one of the secondary trails, far enough away from the mainstream paths to ensure our solitude.

The air swirled, invisible fingers whispering over us, thick enough to touch. It glowed and dripped from the trees like bunches of moss. The farther from the park perimeter we walked the more the magic raided the air from my lungs. A mischievous evil saturated the sick magic trying to seep into me.

A tremor spooled up my torso and jumped over that thimble of taint inside my core. Was that what Adam sensed? It was bad enough I felt it around me and in the tiny piece of him lodged within me. Thank you very much.

“You feel it?” Ronan held aside a low hanging branch, allowing me to pass.

“Yes.” I buried my pride and grabbed his free hand. Another bullet I failed to dodge.

He jerked out of my clasp and wrung his hand. Horror rounded his eyes as though I’d infected him with fairy slaying poison. The edge of the flashlight beam glittered in his frosty eyes. “You’re full of tainted magic. You feel like Adam.”

“What?” I hooked my hand in my front pocket.

“My aura can’t even penetrate yours.”

He touched me again, wrenched his hand back. “It’s there.”

Was he insane? Or a mind reader? I hadn’t felt or seen any external changes. “One tiny morsel of Adam’s taint.” Honesty would murder me one day, if the Rift granted me another sunrise. Of course, that wouldn’t be in Seattle, since outer space had snatched the sun. I nibbled on my bottom lip. “It’s only a smidge.” I regaled him with my tale of torture.

“The magic latches onto fae-sorcerer DNA. You wouldn’t have his magic in you unless you were —” He studied me as if I dangled the Illuminaria over his head.

“Get real. I thought we were sorcerers, not fae.” Wait a hot minute! “What’re you keeping from me? Are you saying we also have fae blood?”

I stepped on mushy pine needles and my foot slid out from under me. Catching my balance, I grabbed Ronan’s arm and yanked him off-kilter. His good arm whipped the air, banging against a tree limb, raining dead pine needles in our hair. Thirteen, where’s the love? I swatted off the needles.

Ronan shook his head like a wet Labrador. “I’m his doppelgänger, not fae,” he lashed out in a surly tone. “We’re bonded.”

“Maybe we all have fae genes.” I gave him an emphatic smile. We hadn’t read all the pages from the Illuminaria yet. Just enough to get us through our task and ensure we wouldn’t kill anyone. “Go.” I pushed him forward and we stumbled along the craggy path. I clapped my hand over my mouth to throttle the rant waiting for one last credit to feed it. “Face it. We both could use a Scrambler right about now to stir up some history in our heads.” An old branch snapped underfoot and the sharp crack split the jittery air, forcing us into silence.

The strong odor of wet dirt and dormant nature sharpened my senses. We walked for what seemed like miles before lumbering into a glade enclosed by trees and bushes. Overgrown and lush in winter’s final chapter, it lured me closer. My light reflected off a narrow, babbling creek edging the oblong clearing. The air sizzled with magic, pure and tainted, more magic than I’d ever witnessed. So thick with it, the air whistled with every movement we made. The Rift taint had a death hold on part of the glade evidenced by the bleak, brown landscape at the far end of the clearing. Far bleaker than a Seattle winter warranted.

My magic mixed with the Rift's magic, pumped through every cell of my being. It swirled around us in a wash of warmth and barbs of glacial evil, becoming part of me, setting my stomach surging and contracting. I breathed deeply, the damp air congealing in my throat.

"Ronan?" I arced my flashlight in a circle.

He watched me a few yards away, a strange luminosity in his eyes that had nothing to do with the light. It was unnerving, cruel, and possessive.

"What?" He dumped his backpack on the ground.

Easing back, I brushed against a dried bush that crunched death's hold against my jeans. "Nothing." I swallowed roughly. Why bother telling him I wanted to swab out my guts with rubbing alcohol?

Approaching, he extended a tiny plastic bag out to me. "Chew one of these antacids. You took aspirin earlier, right?"

I popped two tablets in my mouth. "Yes." Perspiration dotted my forehead. "What happened at the Rift when Adam found you passed out?"

"The Rift was already messed up after my father's forced screwup. When Adam neared, the magic went wild, killing my power, knocking me out."

I chomped on my bottom lip, wincing at the coppery burst of blood. "What's to prevent it from happening again?"

"You. I wasn't strong enough since he was already drawing my magic. With you here, I can pull from you."

"Does the magic feel different?"

"Yeah, it's centered on you, not me." He took the bag from me, careful not to touch my hand.

Why me? I kicked at a clump of dead weeds. His evasiveness ticked me off. Man, I wished I possessed all of the ancient manuscript and the key to deciphering it. My thirteenth sense told me that Ronan knew more about it—and us—than he'd coughed up.

My stomach gurgled alarmingly and my knees weakened. I waved my flashlight around and found a boulder to sit on. Cold and hard against my rear, it enabled me to raise my knees and drop my head to relieve the magic snacking on my insides. After all, I had an illegal magic ritual to remain alive for. I'll take my handcuffs in diamond-studded platinum.

"Take your deadener off." Ronan's voice floated to me.

"I will when Adam gets here." I spun the gray band around my wrist, my elbows resting on my knees. Ronan had stolen a few of them when he'd left his father's compound. We wore them hoping to keep his father from detecting us. The deadener was only partially effective in the glade, if not downright useless. The antacids helped, and I lifted my head without feeling like I'd just woken up after a rave.

“You’ll forget. Do it now.”

“I won’t forget.” I lit him up, standing where I’d left him, scowling up a tornado. “What’s got your briefs in a twist?” Nearby rustling foliage saved his reply. Adam’s presence stirred the acid in my gut.

“Wow, the magic’s changed. It’s not so bad.” A light bobbed toward me. “Must be you, Blondie.” He sounded chipper while I was as irritable as a women’s clinic full of PMSing girls.

“You think?” I vaulted up. “Let’s get this fairy and unicorn show done with. Ronan needs a dose of sugar to sweeten his nasty.”

“What’s going on?” Adam wheeled on Ronan.

“Let’s just do it.” Ronan stalked to his backpack. “Take your damn deadener off, Aria.”

I slipped the plastic band off my wrist and flung it at Ronan, hitting the back of his legs. He stuffed it in his backpack, mumbling and grunting to his various selves. Nothing changed in what I was feeling. The deadener appeared useless on me so near the Rift.

Mist dripped from the roiling clouds. “Brilliant.” I zipped up my jacket and tucked the fur-edged hood around my head. As Adam moved closer, about to put his arm around me, I eased away. “I’m hot to touch, so you’re forewarned.”

“Blondie, you’re hot, period.” He grinned. “Why are you two—”

“Who knows?” I shivered more from the eerie magic raising the hairs on the nape of my neck than from the night air that had already frozen me into a Popsicle.

Ronan trudged toward us. He handed Adam a lancet to prick his finger and gave me a couple for later. “You have your cell?”

“If anything goes wrong and both of us are incapacitated, call my father. His number’s in your phone.”

Stone still, I landed a death-ray look on him. “Like hell. Did the warranty expire on your brain?” I bumped my breasts against Ronan’s hard chest. External magic punched holes in our auras and he flinched.

Adam extended a placating hand toward me. “He’s the only one who has the slightest chance of helping. You want to risk Zoe’s life? Jon and Jax have instructions to alert the authorities with proof of Riley’s illegal activities if he threatens or detains you.”

“You guys planned this?” I stuck my hands in my coat pocket. “Thanks for keeping me in the loop. You’re welcome, Aria. Glad you’re part of the A-Team. Sure, no bleeping problem.”

Unlucky thirteen reared its ugly-ass head. A droopy tree limb snapped next to us. I dodged to the side and it clattered to the ground between the doppel-jerks and me.

“You’re out of control.” Ronan flung the backpack on the ground.

“Thanks for the alert system warning.” Stepping over the leafless branch, I rejoined them. “Let’s get on with this so I can chase lab mice in a maze for the rest of my life.”

Adam grasped my hand. At least the magic wasn't screwing with our connection. We followed Ronan toward the limpid creek, and stopped at a mini ring of boulders that mimicked Stonehenge. I swished my flashlight in the circle of boulders big enough for six to eight people to stand comfortably within. The narrow rocks ranged from three- to six-feet high.

My aura ascended as I absorbed energy from outside, sweet and full of zest. I erected an aural blockade to deflect the magic the way Ronan had instructed during our dry run. The air lifted my hair, tickled my skin. Ronan and Adam's energy twirled inside me as well. Richer, more intense power churned within the stones. Not dirtier energy, just more of it, period.

The external magic trickled through chinks in my shield. I strengthened it, but the magic was unrelenting.

“I can't block out all the magic,” I whispered.

“It's okay. Neither can we.” Adam squeezed my hand. “At least your pureness is tempering the wildness.”

Ronan dusted the perimeter of the boulders with a mix of crushed yarrow to ground the energy and ward off evil, and jasmine to protect our auras. “She's not all that pure,” he muttered sarcastically. I squeezed Adam's hand until his bones crunched. “Aria has your faulty magic clouding hers.” Ronan stood to his full height and fixed Adam with a fierce look.

Adam dropped my hand, the glow of his eyes changing from light blue to violet. “What's he talking about?”

Well, crap. Since the whole world just got the text message, he might as well know how his magic latched onto me after Ronan's magic attacked me in the hotel room.

After I clued him in, he stroked my cheek. “Sorry. I had no idea that would happen.”

“Not your fault. It is what it is.” I knew it'd happened for a reason, though. By the end of the night, Ronan's magic might also be swimming inside me. Let's ring the freakin' wedding bells if that happens.

Ronan flung the empty plastic bag on the ground and handed another marked with red tape to each of us. The red tape identified the mix of angelica, thyme, and agrimonia herbs for healing, cleansing, and closing the Rift. He also handed me a paper bag of sea salt to break the circle or terminate the ritual, if necessary. My fingers twitched on the bag that held enough evidence to fry us for practicing illegal sorcery. Who knew the old geezers were the original source of herbal-based witchcraft? All the ingredients were easily bought from underground Wiccan vendors.

“Move over there.” Ronan gestured at a copse of stick trees.

“I can't see from there.”

“Your power's merging too much with the Rift.” His shadow loomed, pressing over me as if to swallow me whole. “We discussed this.”

“I know.” I stretched to touch him, but he shied away. Dejection speared my heart.

Adam and I followed the small flashlight beam. On my thirteenth step, I tripped on a blasted rock and would've bit the muddy ground if Adam hadn't grabbed hold of me. I usually watched my thirteenth step, but my mind was too twisted at the moment. "Thanks."

"Hold my hand. I can see better at night with my fairy vision." I found his hand in the dark, my fingers rigid in his warm grasp. "We'll light him up so you can see."

I inhaled his meadow fresh scent rising from our entwined auras, soaked in its familiarity. "I'm scared for you two."

Adam tucked me against his side. "It'll work this time. You make the difference. The magic feels cleaner, stronger."

"It's not cleaner to Ronan." I turned in his arms, leaned my back against his chest.

His chest hardened into a granite slab. "He wasn't complaining, though."

We aimed our lights at the stone ring. Ronan pricked his index finger and blood welled up, black as a starless night against his skin. Using a mix of rowan, willow, and mugwort, he created a twelve-point star around the thirteenth and final spot dead center in Mini-Stonehenge. The herbs helped protect against evil, increased psychic powers, and promoted success. Rowan herb originally came from the land of fairies. It kept diseased magic from haunting people or places. Perfect for our half-baked plan of no record.

Starting with the northern point, Ronan held his finger over the herbs and a droplet of blood fell. The rocks blocked most of my view, but the amber flash of fire was unmistakable. A finger of fog drifted above the tallest rocks and dissipated in the misty air.

A hot spike of electricity shot into me. Adam jolted against my hip. "Was that supposed to happen?"

"No," he said in a fierce whisper. "The cloud of magic should still be visible. We shouldn't have felt anything."

Ronan traversed the ring, dripping his life away in flashes of amber and gold fire that spiraled up in tiny puffs and disappeared. With each drop of blood, my magic intensified.

An intangible force tugged me toward the stones. Power singed my insides. Everything went red, and my lungs burned as if I'd swallowed boiling lava. I clutched my pendant, focusing on the charm to halt the loss of magic, to keep the bad luck away. My aura swirled above the stone circle in a halo of violet and pink. The unknown force tried to lure me closer to the circle. Adam tightened his hold on me. A roaring, whooshing noise filled my head.

"Aria." Adam sounded far, far away. "Pull it back!"

"I can't," I wailed, struggling in his arms. "Let me go." Pain seared my internal organs, a jagged blade cleaving me in two. Half of me filled with the tainted magic, the other with mine and Ronan's pure magic, emerging for the first time since I'd met him.

Spellbound, Ronan continued the ritual. His aura floated above him in shades of pale blue. A dead black spot contaminated the halo. Sheer terror stopped my heart. He shouldn't have the color of death in his aura. Holy fairy godmother, he was missing his other color.

Ugly, disgusting power evolved around Ronan as angry souls screamed in my head, taunting, daring. Invisible arms and wings wrapped around me, grasping at every inch of me, pinching, prodding. I screamed. The sound of my voice died in the seemingly endless stretch of ground to the stones. With the tainted crud seeping into me, my power spent itself cleansing and preventing it from harming me further.

Ronan cried out, a vicious, agonizing sound. He stumbled into the stones and struggled to stand. His pain and anguish burned my soul to ashes.

“We have to stop him,” I cried, my heart in my throat. “It’s not working. It’ll kill him.”

Adam’s arms had already dropped away, the safety of his embrace having lost to the lure of the magic. “Go,” he said softly and prodded my butt.

I lurched forward, propelled by my own feet and the intense, mysterious force compelling me. A tidal wave of realization crashed into me. I muscled against the compulsion, turned and held out my hand. “You’re the missing color, the other half of his soul.”

He shook his head slowly. “Not half, a third.” Wistfulness hung heavy in his tone, but he thrust forward and took my hand.

In that moment, as we stumbled to the stone circle, toward Ronan, I knew without a doubt how inextricably linked the three of us were. Our auras had blended as one from the first moment we all stood in Adam’s driveway surrounded by the forest. Seeing the three halos of aural color above the stone circle, I knew it for real.

Chapter 20

The hum of glorious power in the center of the stones encapsulated my world, pulsing in tune with my heart. Its jagged lure quivered over me, magnificent and devastating at once. Fierce adrenaline pumped into my cells that had never seen the sort. Hungry, grungy desire spiraled against my pure magic, trying to drill through it with its ancient taint, its ancient wonder. I fought it from conquering me completely with every ounce of physical and magical strength I possessed.

Magic choked the clearing, throbbing with a need for release, invisible walls pressing on me from all sides. The immense energy challenged me, dared me to take it. Double dared me to give it everything I had to give. A force of evil languished within the foreign power and I struggled against its magnetism. Earth and the Void seemed to fight for their right to open or close the Rift...or to possess me. Earth pushed back, whereas the Void flooded the glade with crackling, caustic magic.

Ronan's failing magic continued to damage the Rift, adding to the taint surrounding us. He lacked the two vital ingredients that made him whole as a descendant of a Forbidden Thirteen—Adam, and in many respects, me. We made up the triad that could undo the damage and release the pure magic. Only the three of us could open the Rift, I knew that then. Ronan and I couldn't do it alone. He needed his doppelgänger. Had the Forbidden Thirteen known about this connection? Was this the cost they'd paid to trick the world?

I knew I was meant to do this, to be there, to re-activate this bygone world into the here and now. The urge flooded me, set my feet in motion. A cry escaped me, both terrified and excited. I hoped it wasn't too late to reverse the flawed closing spell. I bolted into the stone ring, startling Ronan. A ghostly light surrounded him, bounced off the stone pillars. Deliberately, I knocked my hip against him, shoving him away from the star he'd made on the ground. Drops of blood from his nicked finger missed the twelfth point. Adam curled his hand around Ronan's fingers, halting the blood from dripping onto the ground.

Awed, I spun in a circle and soaked up the glorious energy, fought the corrupt magic with everything in me. The magic in the Realm of the Void sought liberation, and it wouldn't allow the world to ignore it any longer. Why did we think we could lock the enchantment away again when it had tasted life after centuries of incarceration? How could Adam forego the untold power that promised to be his once cleansed and free? What price to the world would this freedom cost? Was there life in the Void, if it truly existed? Would we all live to see tomorrow?

Adam and Ronan tussled as Adam tried to get a dazed Ronan to understand what was happening. They ignored the urgency in the magic cloaking us until our intermingled auras seemed to knock sense into Ronan. Adam's minty aura joined Ronan's ring of blue, completing the circle. The ebony wedge in Ronan's aura disappeared. Three sundered auras gyrated wildly above us. The scent of heaven sprinkled the three rings, showering us with the intoxicating perfume of spring blossoms, summer flowers, autumn spices, and winter's holly.

A howling wind emerged in the circle, blowing the dried herbs away on a dazzling emerald current. Standing aside, I waved my arms to rush the wind and herbs along their journey. My presence tamed the air saturated with latent energy in its epicenter. My hair whipped about my head, snapping in the magic drenching us. The wind whispered between the stones in noisy voices discernible in sound, but indistinct in words. Without a doubt, I knew the voices belonged to ages of oppressed fae and sorcerers, the last known magical beings to walk our earth before the Abolishment.

Oddest of all, an ancient encyclopedia filled my head, waiting for me to decipher the knowledge it contained.

I plucked out the green-labeled plastic bag I'd hidden in my pocket earlier. Soft illumination lit Adam and Ronan's rapt faces, their bodies quaking in tandem with mine from the deluge of crackling magic. They followed my movements as though obeying my silent commands. Careful not to trample the center where I layered the herbs, they rebuilt the twelve points of the star.

I handed each a lancet, and one at a time, we dripped crimson life on the twelve points. After each drop of blood, fire flared, ending in a glittery cloud that ringed the perimeter of the stone circle. This time the magic held in the air around us. Unable to contain my joy, I laughed and shouted my triumph.

Holding back on the final point, I positioned myself in the center and raised my arms toward heaven. The Rift's energy anchored me to the spot, not that I wanted to move from the burgeoning heaven inside the stones. The aura halos spun above our heads, colors combining into a rainbow of mint, ice blue, and mauve. I'd never seen auras in living color!

As I lowered my arms, I brought my hands together. Contained in my cupped palms, the halos fused into a glowing ball of multihued moonlight. I became the thirteenth point, rooted to the earth. Centuries of magic centered me—heady power undulating in my core, streaming sweet pleasure through my blood, pumping excitement and relief into my heart—until the foreign magic consumed me. My telekinetic receptors invited in all the sorcery and fae magic streaming through the Rift.

Ronan closed the distance and covered my right hand with his left. Adam did the same with my left hand. We stood as one body, so close that the others felt the slightest breath taken by another. After a few seconds, our hearts beat as one.

All my senses blossomed with new life, and I drank in the magic's exhilarating sweetness, inhaled the unsullied air. Vitality usurped every fiber of my being, leaving me quivering as if I'd been reborn, the magic scrubbing clean twenty-one years of living. Melting sunlight and honey slicked my tongue, sweeter and smoother than the finest Belgian chocolate in the universe. I breathed in the intoxicating mixture of warm sunrises, hot afternoons, and cooling sunsets. Exaggerated sounds of grass growing, trees budding, and clouds gathering bombarded my head. An amazing sense of the earth's wholeness flooded me.

My hormones zoomed into a free-fall. For once, my head handed them the keys to the castle. Unutterably lost within the energy swamping me, my heart burst with love. Desire spiraled through me, rippling under my skin. It set off a craving for Ronan, for Adam, for the whole of their beings. For the completion of Adam's transformation to his fae-doppelgänger nature, for Ronan and me with the pure blood of ancient sorcerers coursing in our veins, and for the two of them, complete as one. What would become of our amazing triad when all was said and done? My rapture nudged that vague sliver of doubt to the wayside.

The Void's urgency crested in need, shooting gentle sparks into my core. "Ready?"

Brilliant silver flecks glistened in Ronan's eyes. He held his hand toward me, his lips thinning in anguish. The glowing ball of moonlight bounced to my left hand. I squeezed a drop of Ronan's blood onto the globe. It sizzled and a corona of energy radiated above our heads. My skin tingled as much from the ball as from Ronan's touch.

Adam grinned and I sensed his eagerness. His livewire hair danced in the electrified air, waiting for an infusion of life. I took his hand and squeezed his blood onto the sphere, layering it on top of Ronan's sizzling drop, the heat of his body coursing down the length of mine. The ball expanded, radiating pure brilliance, raw earthen and ether magic. I nodded at Ronan. He squeezed my finger for the final drop of the one life.

The luminescent globe exploded around us, blinding, blazing. Hands clasped, we formed a circle. Streamers of moonlit magic bathed the stone enclosure. I wanted to rip off my clothes and let the magic wash over my bare skin. I longed to tear off Ronan's clothes and finish what we'd started in the hotel. I yearned to comb my fingers through Adam's reformed hair, and gaze upon his newborn honeyed skin.

The sphere melded above us into another orb of light and power. It plunged into the middle of the star we'd made, exploding outward, blanketing us with magic. It bristled across my skin, rearranged me at the cellular level. Exquisite, energizing, strange magic replaced the old sluggish magic I'd known all my life. The final particles dispersed on a gentle balmy breeze. Ronan's power joined Adam's pure magic and tangoed evocatively with mine. Their exquisite magic became a part of me, providing me with hope that they'd always be a part of my life, in one form or another.

My tattoo sizzled like hot coals under my skin, expanding outward over my left kidney area. I longed for Ronan's cooling fingers and soothing lips to doctor it.

Pure magic poured into the clearing. We'd done it. We'd opened the Rift! We lived to shout it to the world. Okay, maybe we'd rethink shouting it to the world until we ensured we didn't wind up in an impenetrable dungeon.

Everything that'd happened in my life took me a step closer to the person I was meant to be. But as the sun had risen each day, I still hadn't known what I was, who I was. Then Ronan barged into my condo, and I had instinctively known he'd been missing from my life. This is my place. He is my place.

Adam glimmered with reinvigorated life, and his solid body took on a healthy coloring almost as tan as Ronan. An exhilarating mix of exhaustion and adrenaline melted my legs. Ronan caught me in his arms, and we clung to one another, lips pressed together hard in a fleeting kiss that ended way too soon. Not wanting Adam left out of our celebration, I reached for him, so fiercely longing to touch him in his renewed form.

But Adam had vanished.

"What the what?" Had the Void taken him? Panicked, I lifted my cheek off Ronan's chest to search for Adam only to find the shadowed outline of a trio of men behind Ronan. An air of menace radiated off them, sullyng the beauty we had brought forth.

"Well done, son. You've unearthed the Forbidden Thirteen master." The unmistakable voice with a slight Irish brogue slivered terror through my heart. "And you've finally opened the Rift as I've wanted for so long. Kudos to both of you."

Shocked, I froze in Ronan's arms, searched his face in the dwindling light, but he veiled his features well, even to my expert eyes. Ronan dropped his arms and swung around.

A muffled shot cracked the night air, then a second and a third. The sharp bite of three darts hit my shoulder, stomach, and my right thigh. Power bombed my feet, leaving me an empty vessel of ordinary. Sounds of more shots filtered into my fuzzy mind sliding toward a hollow of nothingness. My weightless body tumbled to the ground in a heap of limbs and darkness.

Chapter 21

My eyes battled the glue clamping them shut. Furious blinking attempted to clear the grit. I rubbed my fingers against my eyelids, and a prick of pain shot into the right side of my neck, forcing me to squeeze my eyes shut again. Soft breathing and a scuffle of shoes by my side encouraged my groggy brain cells to awaken. I blinked away my epic joy.

“Ronan? Thank god you’re okay. Hey, what are you doing?” My hazy gaze landed on the nasty gun-like syringe in his familiar fingers...fingers I wanted holding mine, assuring me I was still kicking it. I ached from my desire to touch him to ensure he was okay. Aside from his previous bodily injuries, he looked absolutely perfect.

Hello, reality of mine. Hadn’t his father shot him full of bio holes? Why wasn’t he laid up? “Get that piece of Riley Senior crap away from me.”

“It’s a tracker. Don’t fight it. Don’t try to run either,” he commanded in a voice gruffer than his usual McGrumpy self.

“Don’t do this to me.” My heart cricked. Weird wetness loosened the stickiness in my eyelids. I sure as hell wasn’t leaking tears. Was I bleeding? “Ronan? What’s going on?”

Absent a sound, Ronan ghosted and floated away on a soft white cloud. Maybe I was dreaming. No way would Ronan hurt me nor do his father’s bidding of the illegal kind. Nope. No how. Just a nightmare.

My brain flirted with unconsciousness again, and I let it sweep me away on a storm cloud scuttling after Ronan and his fluffy white vehicle of confusion.

“Wake up that bleach blonde head of yours.” A familiar raspy voice found a landing in my woozy mind.

Relief coursed the length of my leaden body stretched out on a plank-firm bed. “Zoe?” Fuzz coated my tongue and I had a horrible time dredging up moisture.

“About time you returned to the living.”

Zoe’s face swam above mine. An excavation crew seemed to dig in my skull for long lost brain cells. I squeezed my eyes shut against the brilliant ceiling lights and dragged the covers over my head. Thank lucky thirteen! She was alive. The last two days were all a fat, hairy nightmare.

Tossing gold bullion into a wishing well probably wouldn't wish away my delusions.

I thrust out my right hand from beneath the covers, feeling the bands cuffing my wrists. My blood pressure headed for DEFCON-10. Time to dial up and deal. Mustering lubrication in my throat, I spewed forth a torrent. "Tell me I just got back from my date with your brain-dead cousin, and you're here to dish the dirt. Cody and Cleo are slumped on my ankles after eating ten pounds of food, right?" I really wished it'd all been my worst nightmare.

Zoe pinched my arm. "Right. Here, kitties, come give Mommy a reality check." She tugged the covers off my face. "Did bleach frazzle your brains?"

"I don't bleach my hair." I made an attempt at outrage until tears skimmed down my cheeks, wetting the low thread count pillowcases. I think the bright lights caused my eyes to water. Seriously.

"Who are you and where's the real Aria?" Zoe's relieved voice shook me to my core. "Aria Elle Walker never cries."

"Shut up and hug me." Zoe climbed onto the bed and we hugged one of our nine lives out of each other. "I'm sorry to get you involved." I inhaled her cheap melon hairspray. "I'll get you out of this watermelon hell and back to your beauty salon lifestyle."

"I may have to shave my head to get rid of the drugstore smell." She sniffed.

Unflattering sky-blue fleece sweats covered her voluptuous body. You wouldn't normally catch her dead wearing fleece. Velour was more her style if forced to wear athletic clothes. And she detested blue. "Why did they let you in here with me?"

"You've been out of it since yesterday. The shit-for-brains were worried."

I glanced at my watch. Shock bulged out my eyes. Monday afternoon, and I scarcely felt as if I'd slept two winks. Fingering her jacket's hem, I grinned at her, barely able to contain my joy at finding her alive and well. "What's up with this? Slumming?"

"I could say the same about you, Blondie." Zoe flicked the covers off me, exposing an identical sweat suit in pink.

I smiled to conceal my terror. "At least they got the colors right," I teased, plucking at my sleeves to expose a deadener on each wrist. Pink was my color. My hair felt weird, heavy on my head. Locks fanned my shoulders, reaching lower than I'd ever seen it. Was I delusional?

Irritation darkened Zoe's smattering of freckles. "What's going on? Why does a paranormal research group who makes frickin' deadeners for the government want you so bad? Who wants you dead? Who's that hot piece of ass Ronan who carried you in?" She sank into the black vinyl and chrome bedside chair and leaned forward.

My eyebrows shot toward my hairline. I tried to sit up, but straps held my torso and ankles to the bed. "He carried me in?" I thought Riley had shot Ronan with the same triple dose of bio-poisons he'd shot into me. Had Ronan escaped the extra dose? Wariness centered heavy in my chest like an old wound that ached on a rainy day, which was every day in Seattle. The nightmare returned, and I fingered my neck, searching for the injection site. Nothing, not a stitch of pain. Had I dreamed him?

“Shoulder-length black hair, hot rugged looks—except for the freaky blank stare and frowny grimace. Muscles to die for. Held you like you were the last female on planet Earth.”

The last female on Earth observation mitigated the edge of mistrust and anger creeping up my chest. Things still didn’t play right in this bully versus innocent blonde girl playground fight.

A bang in the hallway sent us lurching in our cheap sweats. We exchanged nervous glances. Beeps dinged before the door slid inward. A stocky security guard sporting a Dominion Research logo on the chest pocket of his navy uniform, carried in a tray loaded with covered dishes. He had a bio-energy dart gun, a handgun, and a smartphone clipped to his utility belt. An earpiece stuck out of his right ear.

How’d they know I was awake and starving on the morgue’s doorstep? A cursory glance of the blue and gray room revealed a camera eye in the flat panel display across the room. Sneaky bastards.

Security dude set the tray on a wheeled table near the door. Zoe jumped up to investigate, swiping the covers off.

“Idiots. Aria doesn’t eat ice cream.” She shoved a bowl at Buzz-Cut. “On second thought, I’m still hungry.” Snatching her hand back, she cupped the bowl in her palm.

Buzz-Cut pushed the cart to the side of the bed and retreated as silent as he’d arrived.

My eyes about popped out of my face. “Have you blown a gasket? He could have smoked your ass into a grave.”

“Chill.” Zoe licked her spoon and grinned. “They’re afraid of you.”

“I hate to burst your bubble, but I’m a bit tied up.”

“Riley’s men have been instructed to engage only under threat of life: theirs or ours. Or escape,” she whispered, a hand cupped to one side of her mouth.

I whispered back, “How do you know?” I plucked the silver dome off a garden salad, snagged a small tomato, and popped it into my mouth. When I bit into it, a sugary burst of grapes and tomato masked the musty taste of fear coating my tongue.

She shoveled in another spoonful of vanilla ice cream, the sight of which sent the tomato somersaulting in my stomach. “Did that aneurysm hurt much?” she asked through a mouthful of goop.

Ding dong. Telepathy. Pocket lint clouded my mind as the depressant drugs wore off and energy dripped ever so slowly into my veins. In fact, incredible new power melted in exquisite harmony with my own. Food could definitely rally it along. I went to town on the salad, chunky beef soup, and chocolate milk.

Zoe licked her bowl clean and tossed it into the trash can with a clang. “Oh dear, did I miss the tray?” The spoon clinked against the bowl. “Spill it. This better be life threatening because I’ll accept no less for being snatched and all.” She tried her rendition of my evil eye, aping the Wicked Witch of the West instead. I wiped my chocolate milk mustache off with a linen napkin. Nice touch for a research institute, but they needed to read Martha Stewart's books on bedding etiquette. Martha had prison experience too. Every time my hand brushed the scratchy muslin sheets, I wanted to peel each thread apart and braid a noose for hanging Dickard Riley.

Zoe cast me a calculating look, her empathic brain spinning a million revolutions a second. Oh, did I mention that she's also a secret empath? By touch, she can feel emotions in addition to reading minds. It'd been tricky to keep my secrets from her since we'd first met in high school. Our ESP abilities were the reason why we'd hit it off so well. Now, I wondered if she might be a descendant of the Forbidden Thirteen. Turmoil sent my bowels churning.

"Does your ESP feel different?" I whispered.

"Same old."

I heaved out a sigh of relief.

"You're angry, feeling betrayed." Worry deepened tiny lines around her eyes. "What's going on? Did you succumb to my mind control and buy expensive makeup? What's in your hair?"

Mind control, my flat ass. "Huh?" I glided my fingers through my silkier and longer hair. I released Zoe's arm and swung the meal cart to the wall, having suddenly lost my appetite. "What's different?" Pulse accelerating, I patted my face and head.

"Your hair's way longer. Are you wearing extensions? Did you get highlights? You're, like, luminous."

My dinner sank to the pit of my stomach. Guess I wasn't delusional, at least on the hair front. Upon opening the Rift, I didn't think the magic had affected my shell. Whatever drugs and deadeners DR had pumped into me suppressed more than my magical energy so I didn't know what was normal or merely new normal. It's been lovely, but I have to scream now.

"What else?"

She shot a look at the flat screen then leaned forward and whispered, "Your aura feels like it's not all yours."

"You can feel my aura? How many auras do you feel?" I continued to whisper in case the room was bugged.

She gloated. "I've always felt your aura. It's part of being an empath," she whispered close to my ear, touching my cheek. "I feel your aura and two similar, but indistinct ones."

Gripping her hand tight, I nearly shuddered in my bootie socks. "We need to get out of here."

"Why do they want you? Who's the hunk you're falling for? Why do you think he betrayed you?"

I sniffed. So much for flying under the radar. I couldn't hide it from myself let alone Zoe. I'd curse that barbarian Ronan if he betrayed me; double-cursed if he broke my heart in the process. Whoa, wait? Ronan? I knew in that moment that if I never saw Ronan again, I didn't think I'd survive life. Ronan had sunk so deeply into my soul, I'd need a bomb to blast him out.

The right side of my neck itched. I scratched it, trying to rub out my lame infatuation. "Dominion Research thinks I possess untapped ESP they want to study."

Disbelief rounded Zoe's eyes. "Why are they so delusional? I mean, how did they find you?"

Walls vaulted in my mind, and I lied like a dirty, wet rug. I hated blocking Zoe out, but sometimes it was necessary and she'd taught me the nifty trick. "I don't know." One of my ragged fingernails sacrificed itself for my dessert. "They sent Ronan after me. He set me up." I might be more accurate than I cared to admit. Clues weren't exactly hiding beneath the covers waiting to yell "surprise, dimwit." If Dickdouche was eavesdropping, he'd form his own opinions.

"Bizarre." Zoe hopped off the bed and began pacing. Her two-pairs-for-the-price-of-one sneakers were silent on the slate-gray commercial carpet that matched Ronan's eyes. "Do you have latent talents?"

I couldn't hide the guilty flush inching across my face.

"What've you hidden from me?" Zoe glowered from the foot of the bed, delicate hands on her perfectly proportioned hips.

"Please don't get upset." I held up a pacifying hand. "It's just more telekinesis." Ugh, a lie by omission wasn't really a lie, right? "It's developing and reacting to Ronan who has similar abilities. He dubs himself a descendant of an ancient sorcerer." I hated bending the truth I hardly understood myself. "What load of bull did they sell you?"

"Sorcerer?" Zoe's brow wrinkled and she wove her fingers through her long, tousled hair. It drove her batty if her flawlessness was less than perfect outside her apartment.

Tears welled again and I hated myself for them and their source. "Why didn't my mother ever tell me any of this?" I sniveled and wiped my nose on the scratchy pillowcase.

Zoe hugged me. "Oh, Aria. She died too soon, that's all. She didn't get a chance to tell you... whatever." She pulled away, clasping her fingers in mine. "How bad is it?"

"It's everything. It's me, my identity, my place in this world. Something was always missing and it wasn't just my dead mother and ditching father. Or Granny Elle. I never fully belonged and couldn't ever figure out why I never felt settled. Now I know why."

Zoe faked a horrified look, screwing up her mouth, aping the Wicked Witch of the West Coast. "You belong. You belong to me, Aria Elle Walker. I love you to death and back. Don't ever think otherwise." She gripped my hand so hard she may have broken a bone, and I yelped to get her to lighten up. "Sorry. But you know I'd marry you if..."

I quirked an eyebrow. "If you didn't love the male species and their equipment so much."

She laughed. "Well, there's that. But I was going to say I think you love the male species so much and one male in particular."

I shook my head so hard, I flung out my sorrow, and anger danced into its place. I deflected. "Apparently, I'm a descendant of an ancient sorcerer like Ronan. Mom was too, and she never said a freakin' word." The bed got the brunt of my fisted anger. "My father betrayed me to these assholes. Was I just a pawn in their lives? Something to bargain and barter with? Born to easily give away and abandon?"

Zoe smacked my arm hard, bitch-slapping sense into me. “Cut the crap. You know that’s not what happened. Everyone loved you. What the hell’s not to love, except this pity party you’re having right now? You were born for greatness...apparently.” She snickered. “It just took time for you to find your place. Looks like you’ve found it. So buck up little donkey’s ass and get over it. Live this life you’re supposed to live now. And love it...and him.”

I could always count on Zoe to blast sense into me in her way...our way. Reaching for her, we hugged again. “I love you too, bitch. And I don’t love him,” I whispered in her ear.

“Liar.” Before she drew away, she said, “They say you have a book that belongs to them. That you stole it.”

“Jerkwads,” I yelled at the flat panel in the corner. “Welcome to Kiss My Ass Avenue, at the corner of No Freakin’ Way.” I thumped my fist over my heart, and then had a sudden light bulb moment.

“Aria, why—”

“Forget the why. They’re lying out their asses.” I motioned her closer, my index finger across my lips. She rolled onto the bed and cuddled against me. “We need to get out of this pit. Follow my lead. Without snark,” I said vehemently in her ear, knowing I was in for a bitch-out later. She nodded, a pensive mask pasted on her face. “Don’t spaz if you see me do...strange telekinesis.”

She unsuccessfully tried to suppress a snigger. “Like what?”

“Scoot over and zip it.” Her back faced the camera and she shielded me from Dickard’s Eagle Eye. I stuck my arms under the covers. “I’m wasted.” I faked a yawn and pulled the comforter to my chin, closing my eyes. “Drugs have whipped my ass.”

The deadeners had worn off and my energy had returned for the most part. If the room contained blocks, they weren’t working on me. I focused inward, reaching for the electromagnetic receptors in my head. The wrist and ankle gadgets sparked and hissed, broke in two pieces. Deadeners crumpled at the end of the thick bands holding me snug to the bed frame.

The torso band flicked against Zoe. “Oww.” She rubbed her hip. “What’d you do?”

“I just killed the deadeners.” We continued to whisper in case audio bugs swarmed the room.

Her eyes bulged unflatteringly out of her pretty little face but she kept her tongue.

I told Zoe my plan. It wasn’t a great plan, but it bought us time and got us out of Little Dick’s Prison. In true crime fashion, the ceiling hosted a commercial vent panel. If we stood on the bed, we could just reach it. No security goons guarded the doors. Just two advanced door locks blocked our exit. Riley’s no-necks wouldn’t be more than seconds behind once we escaped. The camera proved the biggest pickle.

“Aria, you need to eat more. I told Riley I’d get you to eat,” Zoe said loudly, jumping to her feet. Playing her part, she strolled around the foot of the bed to the tray of lukewarm slop.

“Bite me.” I stuck my middle finger in my mouth and gave the camera a nasty gagging look.

“You’ll eat or I’ll shovel it in.” Acting the tyrant as though born to it, her voice dropped an octave. She held the full spoon to my lips.

I slid her a mad dog look. “That swill would kill a robotic pig.” I flicked the spoon away, hitting her above her left breast, a target not too difficult to miss.

She dug her fingers in the bowl and threw a piece of beef at me, deliberately missing my head by a foot. I snatched up the bowl and Zoe grabbed for the tray. I flung the contents of the bowl at the camera eye, coating it and the monitor with congealing beef soup. Continuing to fake noises of a cafeteria food fight, we made a mound beneath the covers to make it resemble me. The fight ended, I stood behind the door, and we waited, hoping the soup hid our actions. We didn’t have a lot to lose if our pathetic plan flopped.

“Go back to sleep,” Zoe intoned, playing her Academy Award role. “Your bitchiness needs a break from reality.” She patted the heap of pillows, turned the flat screen on, and perched on the end of the bed.

Only one set of footsteps echoed in the corridor. The guard peeked through the tiny door window, engaged the intercom. “Keep away from the door.”

“Whatever.” Zoe nonchalantly flipped him off and resumed watching the dinosaur of daytime soaps through clumps of oozing soup. All she needed was a box of chocolates and a cosmopolitan.

The locks snapped open. The goon bulked up the doorway, dart gun drawn, loaded down with useless deadeners. The deadeners pinched my powers, and I pressed my mind through the oppressive force. It felt akin to swimming from the bottom of the ocean and breaking through the water’s surface, filling my lungs with clean, fresh air.

“Move to the bathroom.” He waved his weapon at Zoe and spoke into his mouthpiece, “Walker’s secure.”

Zoe rose and backed farther into the small room. Just as the minion guard cleared the doorway, I pushed the door shut and pulled forth a slew of powers. Six deadeners popped. Minion’s knees buckled and he lost his grip on the gun. It clattered to the floor and Zoe snagged it up.

I snarled in his ear. “Tell them the room’s secure. No backup necessary.”

Acrid fear mixed with musk cologne wafted off him, his shoulders strung tighter than a guitar on steroids.

“Do it!” I grabbed his wispy drab brown hair, snapped his neck back. “When I tap your earpiece that better be all you say. Got it?” I slammed my knee between his shoulder blades.

“Yeah,” he grunted.

I fought to control my madness, the new power roaring to life, almost sinking me to my knees with its ferocity. I tapped his earpiece.

“No backup needed.” He sounded slightly strangled. “Walker’s out, Marino’s secure. I’ll clean the lens and report back.”

I pressed his wireless off and patted his head. “Good guard dog.” My new brew of magic boiled up, and I hurled an onslaught of energy into him. He made a choking sound, flopped forward, out like a stuffed puppy.

“Move it,” I mouthed at Zoe, swishing my arm toward the ceiling.

Wanting to appear as if we’d escaped out the door, I touched the door locks, heat eviscerating them. They snicked apart, smoldering in a puff of smoke. I vaguely wondered which one of my new personalities had accomplished the feat. I slipped on the pair of hideous white sneakers we’d found in the empty closet and joined Zoe on the bed. She’d already pushed up the ceiling tile, and I helped her shove it inside the vent. We didn’t have much time before Riley’s goons caught on. But waiting for shit to happen wasn’t in my playbook.

I boosted Zoe up, and then she helped hoist me into the air duct. I closed the vent hole behind me, we scuttled away from the grill, then stopped to reconnoiter in the tight duct.

Zoe grabbed my ankle, her hand trembling. “Did you kill him?”

“Doubt it.” Not so sure myself, I didn’t want her to dwell on it and detract her sanity from our getaway.

“What’ve you been hiding from me?” Accusation riddled her tone. “I guess I taught you how to block me too well.” Even with a frown turning down her mouth, she still mirrored perfection.

“Later.” I patted her hand. “What’s in the rooms on each side of mine?”

“I was caged to the right. Same layout. To the left is another holding cell. They brought in a sickly blonde girl.”

“Kiera Kendrick.”

“You know her?”

“Met her yesterday. Did you see another girl who looked like her, but less sick?” On hands and knees, I slinked through the square tunnel on the left, elevating my feet to minimize the noise.

“No.”

“Did your room have a window and camera?”

“Yes. Pervs.”

I stopped at the screen over Kiera’s room and peeked down at the tidy bed. Empty. Crawling onward, I wanted to find an unlocked room that Satan’s big brother wasn’t spying into. Zoe closed in on my heels, only the sounds of our breathing and shuffling audible. Cool air flowed through the duct and a long shiver rolled to my feet. The shiver stemmed more from apprehension than the temperature, because my heart was racing on the Indy 500 circuit. The next vent overlooked a supply room.

Familiar voices drifted to me from a few vents down the gray tube. The voices belonged to Ronan the traitor and Richard Riley, the murderer, kidnapper, all around evildoer. Eyes closed, I hunted for Ronan’s aura, but couldn’t thrust beyond my spreading patch of hyperenergy and the deadeners leaching beyond the room’s perimeter.

I counted to ten, steadying the pitter-patter of my traitorous heart. “Stay here.” I scooted down the duct, stopping shy of the screen above what appeared to be Riley’s rich and expansive office. He lounged behind a humongous wood desk in a worn leather chair. Ronan sat across from him in a sumptuous Edwardian guest chair. A chair I might pilfer to replace the one smashed into firewood in my condo. Zoe slunk toward me and rested her chin on my leg. Mental eye roll.

The room's deadeners pinched me, but whatever magic I'd gained at the Rift roiled inside me, punching holes through Riley's rinky-dink technology. I glanced over my shoulder, finger to my lips to silence Zoe, then tossed out a tester wave of magic and sent her hair floating up from her scalp. The deadeners were dead to me.

Ronan smiled at his father, a steaming cup of coffee at arm's reach. The heavenly scent of caramel mocha drifted to the ceiling. Un. Freaking. Believable. My heart skipped a beat.

"What do you really want, Ronan?" Riley asked oily smooth, steeping his fingers under his chin.

"Freedom."

"You've always had your freedom."

"Only when you gave it to me." He paused. "You got Aria Walker, the Rift's open. The other sorcerers will come out of hiding now, drawn to the magic." Unidentified emotion thickened Ronan's voice. "You don't need me any longer."

"That's where you're wrong." Riley's smarmy tone dribbled candy canes. "You're as crucial to my project as Walker, either by cooperation or by making blood deposits. By the way, where's Melisande?"

"In San Jose."

"Dead?"

Another beat of silence elapsed. Did Ronan nod?

"She tried to betray you. She wanted me and her to work together to take you down."

Hatred clamped onto my splintering heart. My hillbilly apeshit, Catwoman, ninja claws joined the power scrabbling for freedom inside me.

"Prove it." Did I hear the slightest sadness in Riley?

Rustling drifted up, followed by the metallic sliding of a zipper. I crept forward, peeked through the vent holes. Ronan handed him Melisande's laptop and red tablet. We need the witch hag's devices! I backed up, focused on controlling my breathing, which took a turn for the ugly. I nearly hyperventilated myself into a tizzy. Closing my eyes, I breathed deep and even.

"Tell me what you really want, Ronan."

Ronan mumbled and a shuffle drifted up. "Truth about my mother and her death." His voice coasted from the far side of the room. "I want freedom to come and go as I please. I want assurances that you won't hurt Aria, Kiera and Katrina, or any of the other fae or sorcerers you capture. I don't want further involvement in retrieval missions or other criminal activities."

"That's a long list. What do I get out of it?"

"My silence."

"I already own your silence. You have as much to lose as I do by going public."

"I doubt that."

“I’m waiting.”

“Did you kill my mother?”

“The NUW government executed her for practicing forbidden spellcraft,” he said as if giving a lecture to witch wannabes.

“That’s not what I heard.”

“You heard wrong.”

“Give me everything I want, I’ll go along with you, and you can have the keys to the kingdom.”

“If I disagree?”

“If I’m late reporting to my team, they’ll know who to contact to shut you down.”

“You’ll go down with me.”

“At least I’ll be free of you and this hell.”

“This hell, as you call it,” Riley said with no small amount of disdain, “will make you a powerful and rich man. You and Walker will have all the control, all the limelight and power beyond imagine. The world needs you both. You’ll restore order, balance, and purity. You’ll own this world. You’ll control the other Forbidden. They’ll do what you want.” He paused for emphasis. “What’s so wrong with setting to rights what was done in ignorance and fear?”

Ronan snorted. “That’s only part of your pipe dream.”

I tried to sense Ronan’s aura, but it didn’t exist on any planet where I had free range.

“What could you possibly have that’s worth so much to me?”

“The lost pages to the Illuminaria and their translation into English, all the magic and alchemy spells you’re missing. Enough to give you everything you’ve always wanted. To dominate the Forbidden. To rule the world.”

My heart shattered. My life exploded. Anger rejected the pain with a ferocity that nearly sent a torrent of bad luck throughout Riley’s building.

*R*onan and his equipment are so dead! He had no clue how much danger the world was in if his father got his paws on the full text of the Illuminaria. And some of the spells in the Illuminaria could only be done by my magic or the magic of two sorcerers, not by my blood or the blood of another Thirteen. Which meant Riley had plans to keep us both. And our blood. I rubbed the bruise on the crook of my left arm. Dumbass barbarian. I had to get the entire book out of Riley's hands before he realized the extent of power he had with or without me. He could literally destroy the world.

Snarling louder than a tiger on the fringe, I pried up the vent and heaved it to the other side of the two-foot square hole. Since I was Richard Riley's ticket to the majors, I knew he wouldn't hurt more than one hair on my head. I swung my legs through the hole, aiming for the desk rather than risking my balance by jumping to the floor. I kicked his mug onto his laptop, cursing the fact that he kept his desk so tidy and his mug wasn't entirely full. My foot slipped and I knocked something else onto the floor where it landed with a quiet thump on the plush rug.

Riley scampered out of his chair. By the time I steadied my balance on the desktop, two guards leveled tranq guns on me. Ronan went all scowly, glowering at me, and a little something tried to die inside me. I jumped to the floor, backing against the windows overlooking a tree-lined grassy courtyard.

"Ms. Walker, it's a pleasure to finally meet you."

I wanted to slap his ingratiating smile off with fingers of thirteen curses.

"Screw. You." I swung on Ronan. "Give it to me." I held my hand toward him. He gripped one of Mom's envelopes. I battled to suppress my straining magic, making Dickard think his elementary science class deadeners were working on me.

"What're you doing?" Ronan clenched his teeth so hard that infernal muscle in his jaw ticked. As usual, his barbarian shell masked his emotions. That is, if he had any left to mask.

Riley's arrogance rolled out on a smooth laugh as he edged closer to Ronan. "You don't really think Ronan will do that, do you? He works for me. Always has."

Mammoth Guard number one looked from me to Riley, his dart gun aimed at my heart, a film of sweat on his forehead. A frisson of magical energy wafted off him, despite the room's strong deadeners wrapping around me like a steel straitjacket...with beautiful escape holes. He moved to my left as the other Rent-A-Guard pointed his gun at my belly.

“Stand down,” Riley ordered. “The room’s deadeners are active.”

I hope that thought lets you sleep at night!

The sweaty, olive-skinned guard lowered his gun, his gaze flitting from me to Dickhead. I recognized the dilated look of the drugged in his foggy eyes. I drew in a soft breath, releasing it slowly as my mind chattered away at this mind-bender.

The weight of the disintegrating deadeners jabbed my shield, robbed my air. Breathing shallowly, I fought to ignore it. I reached for my pendant and noticed for the first time that it was gone. Had Ronan told his father how it helped me focus my telekinesis? Shock jolted my hip hard against the edge of the desk. Adam was right. I didn’t need it.

I tossed a ripple of energy at a verdant hilly landscape painting to the left of the desk. The frame rattled against the wall. Both my pinkies twitched up a tempest. Crap squared.

Ronan’s betrayal hurt so bad I wanted to wither into a sun-bleached grape. But not until I unleashed the Wrath of Aria and hexed him to a portal.

“Hand it over, Ronan,” I said slowly, ominously.

Before he moved a muscle, his father clamped down on his arm. A medley of red splashed across Ronan’s blank mask. My head, heart, and magic warned me not to let Dick Tator Riley get his tentacles on my heritage and the clout to royally screw the world. My half of the book also represented a lifeline to my mother and my ancestors. I’d fight to someone’s death for them.

I lunged at Ronan, scrabbling for the envelope. Using my full strength, I plowed into them and aimed my knee at Riley’s groin, bashing his thigh instead. I managed to bowl all of us to the floor. Riley grunted low in his throat and punched a bone-jarring fist into my hip. Lights dimmed as my abused body sucked up the red blaze of pain. Ronan never lost his hold on the envelope. My hand slapped against him, his flesh sparking on mine. Nothing close to our previous erratic aural problem, though. More like energy scouting for an alternative fuel source, finding it, and struggling to test it out.

Two guards closed in on us. The drugged guard touched my hand. A zap of electricity zinged between us, and I jerked away, trying to crush my magic. Surprise quickened my pulse as I realized from his electromagnet pattern that he was another Scrambler. Where did Riley find all these illegal Scramblers?

Klepto Riley swore up a streak in a parody of Ronan and extricated himself from beneath me. I guess the wormy, rotten apple didn’t fall far from the poisoned tree. He snagged a needle off the desk, the plunger no doubt filled with his special deadener cocktail.

I lay halfway on top of Ronan. The cold-blooded look of his jet-flecked eyes killed my stupid wish that he was playing his father. Ronan took advantage of my shock and flung the envelope at his father. Riley caught it midair, and Ronan lifted off the floor, hauling me against him.

“You just signed your death warrant,” I said, deadly for his ears only, my rigid body quaking my rage and fear against his lethal hardness.

“I’m already dead,” he grumbled.

“Not dead enough for me.” In one swift movement, I spun around and kneed him. Lucky for him, I flinched and my knee slammed halfway into his thigh. I absorbed the jolt to my spine with a shudder. “Your ridiculous little opinion has been noted.”

“Damn, Aria.” His arms dropped away from me. He staggered, his foot slipping on the thick geometric-patterned rug.

I backed into an unoccupied corner of the room, listing against a Roman pedestal displaying an exquisite hand-enameled genie bottle. A plaque beneath it read: To Ronan, may all your wishes come true. Love, Mom.

Several more guards joined the party and even Zoe had crashed the Caveman Ball. One henchman strong-armed her, holding a scary-looking gun pointed at her temple.

Riley salivated over my mother’s papers represented inside the envelope, a shit-eating grin on his face. “Beautiful.” He beamed at me. “Think how much fun the three of us will have together with access to Forbidden sorcery.”

“Think how much fun you’ll have dying.” I matched him smile for smile.

Ronan tottered toward me, halting outside my personal bubble of space, as if he actually gave a damn about me. Something recognizable flickered in his wintry eyes, then dissipated into the pond scum he’d become.

“Take Ms. Marino out and kill her,” Riley said as though ordering a pizza.

“No!” I lunged at him. Ronan and the guard shoved between us, pushing me back.

A strangled roar erupted out of Zoe as she writhed in the grasp of the guard holding her. Red-hot fury and fear obscured the freckles across her nose and cheeks.

Magic plowed through my brain mass, shoving it aside to open the gates to the molten flame, feeding on Riley’s words. The pressure of the deadeners continued disintegrating in the turmoil. New energy derived from the Rift ballooned inside me, and I didn’t think anything could keep it at bay for long. I merely needed to wait it out, but not while they offed my best friend.

I pinned Riley with a bitter look. “I’ll do whatever you want. Just let her go.”

Smug satisfaction burst like an elusive Seattle sunrise across his face. The deadener needle didn’t leave his hand, as if it provided him with a boatload of protection.

Zoe struggled against her captor, kicking him in the shin. “Aria, no,” she wailed.

Unable to face her, I kept my hatred focused on Riley. “Please, I want her released with an untraceable phone and car. Alone.” Eventually, I’d find a way out of this hellhole. At least Zoe would be safe, and I’d get answers to the questions torching holes in my brain.

Riley didn’t hesitate. “Done.”

Muscles rippled along Ronan’s powerful arms as he molded his bad arm against his side. “Take Zoe to her room, get her shit, then bring her back.”

The Scrambler guard opened the door and Riley held up his hand. “One more thing.” He turned toward Zoe. “You’ll never see Ms. Walker alive if you talk to the police or anyone else for that matter. Clear the room.” Riley addressed the guards, “Carlos, you and Harrison guard the door.”

Pensive, Zoe studied my resolute face. Two other guards herded her out, and the door shut behind them with a definitive, life-altering click.

Chaos, panic, disorder. Check. My work here wasn’t done by a long shot.

Ronan made a small choking sound. Again, I gleaned nothing from his blank slate or waxen body.

What gives?

Magic roiled and tingled within me in new ways I’d learn to adapt. It surged and contracted, fighting the room’s deadeners, wobbling me on my feet. I plopped on the couch before I crash-landed. Minutes crawled by as we all settled in the cement-thick tension.

Riley leered at me. “You are so much more than your father promised.”

“That’s because he didn’t stick around long enough to make promises on my behalf.” I clutched my arm. “Is the turncoat dead or alive?”

Mock sympathy stole Riley’s joy. “He came to me in November, loan sharks biting the flab on his back. I helped him regain his feet in exchange for...” he paused and spread out his hands, “... information. He left a wealthy man.”

Did I believe a word? Maybe Ronan had lied to me and his father told the truth. Dismayed, I scratched the stinging tattoo on my back, eyeing the syringe in Riley’s hands. “You get off on sticking your little prick in people?”

Riley laughed, set the needle on his desk. “Ah, you don’t care for my special deadener recipe?”

The double doors reopened. Zoe barreled in, wearing her designer jeans and a form-fitting black sweater underneath her faux leopard jacket. She clutched her purse in one hand and her purple smartphone in the other.

“You sure about this?” She rushed to me, saw my glum look, and halted.

“Your life means more to me than all the cats in the world.” I smiled wanly at our private joke. “I’m staying to help with research. I have a lot to learn from them about what’s going on in my head.” I might make a chronic liar out of myself yet. I’d lie up a storm to keep her safe. “I’ll be okay.”

“What?” she screeched, stamping a spike-heeled boot, slivering her eyes. “What’s going on? Talk to me, Blondie.” Zoe ate the distance and dug her fake claws into my upper arm. “What can you possibly help them with?”

Ouch. That almost offended me, but Zoe didn’t know much about the Forbidden Thirteen, or me, the thirteenth. It left my mind batty.

I composed my features before I popped a blood vessel. “I want to stay.” Ronan shifted his feet, the tranq gun held ready in his hand. Lowering my voice, I said, “Riley knows things about my father and family I need to learn.”

Her freckly skin glided into the pale. “You trust him?”

“I have no choice,” I said loud enough for Riley to hear and gloat.

The guards steered Zoe past me. I threw her a grim, apologetic smile. Jagged silence stretched while we waited. The jeweled genie bottle in the corner drew my attention like a lighthouse to a life raft in a foggy sea. Focusing on it helped me control the rage slurping up my endorphins. I itched to hold it, but I wouldn't give Dick-Fuck the satisfaction of knowing I drooled over an art object he or Ronan owned.

A few minutes later, Riley's cell rang to prove that Zoe was free. Relief sagged my shoulders as she sped away alone in a spiffy Mercedes, with instructions to leave the car at the airport.

Riley squandered no time. “How did you open the Rift?”

I shrugged, trying to dial past the static my mind broadcasted. “What Rift?” What the what? Why was he asking that if he already knew opening the Rift required two sorcerers?

He tossed back his more salted and less peppered head and laughed. “I guess I'll have to read and find out?” He nodded at the large padded envelope Ronan held.

“Sure, whatev. Maybe your OCD will collide with the Milky Way too.” One ace of an idea hid up my cheap fleece sleeve. I'd toss out snark to divert him till the crows came to rest on his roost.

“Ms. Walker, don't you wonder how you and Ronan opened the Rift together?”

The doppelgänger link! Had he not seen Adam at the Rift? Had Ronan told his father about his doppelgänger? My gaze darted from Ronan's vacant face to Riley. Older, leaner, and more distinguished than Ronan, Riley shared the same height and coloring. However, the similarities ended there. Azure colored his eyes in a rounder and softer face that betrayed his emotions, unlike his son.

“Maybe we had help?” Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Ronan's shoulders hitch.

“The only help we had was the ritual in the Illuminaria pages,” Ronan answered indulgently, flicking his hand at the still-unopened envelope.

He had to be protecting Adam on whatever side of the Abolishment he played. I hoped to hell Adam was okay. I couldn't feel him inside me any longer either. The blasted room blocks or the drugs severed our bond, even though my powers had skipped past the deadeners. Or maybe opening the Rift had changed our triad bond. The thought might have left me sad if I wasn't in my current jam, or if Ronan hadn't sold me to Satan's top dog.

Hunger illuminated Riley's dull peepers. “Thirteen sorcerers. Classic number for magic. Ronan part fae and telekinetic. Only one Forbidden sorcerer and the thirteenth can open a Rift. Are you getting it now?”

Ronan part fae? Silence shut down the static in my mind. Blood drained from my face. “Are you saying I'm part fae too? Big deal I'm telekinetic. I can bend a spoon. Want to see?”

Riley smirked. “Let me tell you a little story.” His smirk turned jubilant. “The thirteen Forbidden sorcerers closed the Rifts to the Realm of the Void, as I'm sure Ronan already told you. They conceived the methodology well before the government decided to kill them off. The Forbidden Thirteen had been around long before the governments found out about them. They showed the world how strong they were by killing off any other magic except fae magic and sorcery.” I gasped, clutching my stomach. I side-eyed Ronan and watched him blanch. Riley continued as if he didn’t just sign his death warrant in my head. “The Void and the Rifts existed well before the Abolishment laws were enacted. The Thirteen used the Rifts and the Void to destroy other magic. But they weren’t strong enough to destroy the fae, so they bred with them until they became one powerful race.” He lifted a sword letter opener off his desk and picked at his fingernail. “The Thirteen didn’t want a sorcerer to unilaterally take it upon her or himself to close or open a Rift. So they created a secret master key, so to speak, one dominant sorcerer who had to work with at least one of the other Thirteen to open or close a Rift. Two who could manipulate all the earth’s energies and magic, who would also stand the test of time and dilution. Ancient sorcerers were quite industrious. Their alchemy was incredibly formidable. I thought Ronan and the blood of another sorcerer could open the Rift.” He shrugged. “I was wrong.” Riley hesitated as if waiting for my mind to turn on.

I digested his stunning story. Whose blood? And did I truly stem from a vicious group of magic killing, half-fae sorcerers? Still unable to comprehend, I deflected. “I think you need to lie down and rest your brain. Those XCrack cigarettes you’ve been smoking aren’t helping much.” I certainly wasn’t the freak de jour master key descendant. Maybe I needed to inhale a crack-laced cigarette to return to my previous life.

He barked out a laugh. “Your ignorance is precious. Mixed fae blood is in your DNA. As the Rift unleashes magic, it will trigger the dormant magic in your blood. The more magic in the world, the more power you’ll obtain. In time, the other sorcerers will gain additional powers unheard of in this day and age.”

What about the doppelgängers? He knew about them, but acted as if he didn’t. I didn’t want to tip him off, though. Full-fledged hysteria swirled and blustered in my chest. “I suppose you’re the only one who knows this because you have half my instruction manual?”

Riley smiled from me to Ronan. “Not the only one.”

Rising, I paced around the couch, clutching my throat. “You knew all of it?” I spun toward the defector who’d flipped my life into a hexed hell.

Avoiding my fiery gaze, Ronan tweaked his shirtsleeve and picked at his bandage. “I suspected.”
“When?”

“When I grabbed Melisande’s laptop from her hotel room. She had much more on her laptop, notes she’d pieced together.” Color traveled up his neck. “Things I had heard and read took shape.”

“Whose blood did you use?” I asked. My fingernails dug into my throat.

Riley waved a dismissive hand in the air. “That’s not important now.”

Their wary stares held me hostage. The nightmare had no end in sight. My gaze bounced around the room, begging to find purchase anywhere but on the son of a bastard and the bastard himself. A glint of light from one of the recessed bulbs landed on a matte black object on the floor sticking out from behind a desk leg, hidden in shadows from the desk skirt. Ideas sprayed my mind.

Riley, seeming to sense my panic, gestured at his desk. “Shall we sit and discuss rationally?”

Knowing and fearing the answer, I gave him a belligerent glower. “Just say it. What am I?”

“You are much more than we bargained for.”

“The descendant of the most evil, manipulative sorcerer that ever walked the earth.” Riley grinned maniacally, scrubbing his hands together.

Hearing it spoken aloud changed nothing, except that my legs weakened. “Okay. I’m listening.” Poker became my game as I veiled my face.

They both back-stepped toward the twin guest chairs. A strange emotion crossed Ronan’s features, but I couldn’t decipher it. He was shuttered to me in all ways. Had I only imagined those few moments of bliss at the Rift? Deception was a capital offense where my emotions were concerned now. I’d invoke the penalty phase later.

I marched to Riley’s side of the desk. “May I?” I waved at his chair, itching to see if the object on the floor was a gun. In the frenzy, he must’ve forgotten about it.

“By all means.” He threw me another one of his so-like-Ronan charming smiles. However, the viperous charm didn’t con me.

I swiveled the burgundy chair around, perched on the edge of the cool leather, and scooted the chair forward. I snuck a peek at the desk leg by my right foot. Well, hello, precious. Excitement quickened my heart, and I schooled my face to contain it.

Subtly, I stretched out my right leg, inched the gun sideways. Avoiding the splashes of cooling coffee, I rested my forearms on the desk and began to dog-ear a business magazine to distract my antsy hands.

Riley settled comfortably into a guest chair. “You have two choices, Ms. Walker.”

My eyebrows peaked. “Two. How lucky can an evil girl sorcerer get?” The side of my foot nudged the gun, and I finagled the weapon into position to slide it closer.

“In your case, very lucky.” As intimate as a kiss, he smiled.

Get real, pinhead. My return smile hurt my face. “How can I help you?” Now that you’ve pulled my plug and stolen my paddles.

Riley moved the envelope to his side of the desk. I gave Ronan a glare that would deflate the ego of a hyena. He had the unmitigated gall to look ashamed. My anger spiraled my power into a twisted sword. It lurked, leaking past the room’s barriers.

“You can voluntarily work with us as a team. I’ll give you all the considerable information I have about your true identity, family, your heritage, how to work your magic.” Riley paused for effect, spreading out his hands in a gesture I found maddening. “Or I will force your cooperation.”

“I want some freedom.”

“In due time.” Riley’s rueful look mocked me. “When I can trust you.”

User door number one, or loser door number two? I toyed with an expensive gold and marble pen, sliding it up and down between my fingers. “What if I reject your choices?”

Riley drummed his fingers on the arm of his chair. “You have no other option. What do you think will happen to you on the street? You’ll be on the run for the rest of your life either from me or the government. If you don’t learn to contain and control your emerging power, there’s no telling what will happen to you or those around you. Or to the other Forbidden.” He paused for effect. “Your best friend will be dead within the week.”

I sucked in my middle and dropped the pen with a clunk on his pristine wood desk. Even though I knew the threat to Zoe hovered over my head, I couldn’t mask the blood draining from my face. Should I have warned her earlier? Was she safe now? I had to play out my hand.

I toed the gun within arm’s reach. A diversion was in order. “That’s a beautiful rug you have. I’d hate to spoil it by tossing my cookies all over it.” Two strangled coughs erupted out of me and I clutched my stomach. spurts of power actually rumbled disconcertingly against my hand, as if I was preparing to hatch fairies.

Ronan leapt up. I held up a forestalling hand. “Keep your distance. I’ll use the trashcan.” Bent over double, I captured the gun in one hand, and reached for the can. A few more fake gags gave me the opportunity to hide the weapon on my lap. The bottom of my sweatshirt covered the gun in the folds of my oversized pants. It was the real deal, not a stun gun. Ronan’s stare drilled into me.

Straightening, I grimaced and smacked my lips a few times for good measure. “False alarm, I guess.” Energy shot holes in the shroud of deadeners around me. I drizzled a targeted charge of energy onto Riley and his twitchy hand aped an addict tumbling off the wagon.

He appeared as if he was sinking into an apoplectic fit, mottled face explosion and all. Either he cared more for the rug or me. Who knew?

“You should rest. We’ll resume talks later.” Riley’s arrow-straight back trembled his eagerness against his chair.

I moved the gun into position beneath the desk. “No. I rather adore the idea of cracking your shriveled nuts across your expensive wool rug.” I cocked the hammer, the sound excruciatingly audible in the swampy tension.

The man-squirming began. Riley’s eyes bulged. Ronan instinctively cupped his package, raising the dart gun at the same time. Yeah, like that’d stop a bullet. I barely had time to shower them with a sleepy-time spell. My head thumped in agony, but the magic machines spewed out more happy dust inside me. Not enough to send them to the realm of nightmares, though.

“Drop it.” I stood and hoisted the handgun into view. The dart gun fell out of Ronan’s relaxed grasp onto the floor.

“Slide it away.”

As if he’d been sucking down muscle relaxants, he kicked the gun a few feet with the side of his boot, maxing out the three strikes law to do it. A shimmer of pure electricity sparked in the air between us. Whoa, Nelly, reel in a hint. Ronan didn't give any indication he'd felt it.

I skirted the desk and kicked Ronan's gun behind me. Riley drooped in his chair, and I almost needed toothpicks to prop open his eyes.

"What'll it be?" My award-winning smile pained my pinched cheeks.

"Calm down, Aria." Ronan languidly extended a placating hand. Crimson suffused his face, proving his internal struggles against my telekinesis. "There's no need for violence."

I clung to his words, using them as an anchor for my sanity. "Shut it. I ought to bang you down with the tranq gun. See how you dig it."

His mouth remained tight despite the paralysis.

"That's right. I have the upper hand now," I cooed. "So here are your choices." I pasted on an indifferent smile. "I want a cell and car, and I don't give a rat's puny ass if you've embedded them with tracking devices. Or my personal favorite, I bury you both where you squat."

"You're not a cold-hearted murderer," Ronan slurred with quiet emphasis. Not a muscle stirred in his pitiful body.

"Don't bet the fairy dust on it. I learned from the master." I landed an arctic glower on him. "And aren't I the most evil sorcerer imaginable?" As if. Ants don't even fear me.

"If you kill me, you won't clear the building." A lock of Riley's impeccably styled hair fell over his forehead. "Nor will you ever learn who you are and what happened to your father. You'll never get your hands on my Illuminaria."

Unsuppressed rage stiffened my finger on the trigger. Mention of my father was a verbal F-up. Damn it, I couldn't take down the whole building. I needed more time for my new Catwoman powers to blast apart the barriers. I needed to rescue Kiera and Katrina. Ideas simmered to the top of my head. Scrambler Guard had energy I could borrow and use to leverage him to help me. Whatever drug Riley had him on must be suppressing his energy. It was wearing off, and I think the guy knew it from touching me. At the moment, a game of Russian roulette was in order. A game I was no newbie at besting.

"Then you have only one choice." I lowered the gun and spun the cylinder, listening for the clicks, engaging my mind in their placement. Anticipation spread the warmth of adrenaline, and I stroked the barrel of the gun.

"What if I refuse?" Riley's fingers curled and uncurled around the chair arms. Ceiling lights twinkled on the diamond studded Claddagh ring on his right hand, a ring that looked suspiciously like one my father had worn.

I released the gun's hammer, opened the cylinder, and glimpsed the one bullet. Slowly, I slipped the cylinder in place and spun it. I plucked the figurative ace out of my sleeve and lifted the gun to my head. "Then I'll kill myself, now. Deader than a twice-dead vampire. What'll you have besides a bunch of sorcerers with no master? What if you need to close the Rift? What good will the Forbidden do you if you can't control them? If they don't destroy the world first? I bet dead blood is useless in your dumb alchemy spells.”

Riley’s eyes darkened as if he’d lost his godhood and his offshore bank account to boot. Pain and guilt swept across Ronan’s face. He extended his hand toward me, the ditches around his eyes digging into his skull.

A hard kernel of his magic slammed into my gut. My wellspring opened for him with a welcome-to-the-neighborhood gush of energy. Unable to control my shocked gasp, my legs quaked. Light winked in Ronan’s soulless eyes and he blinked swiftly in acknowledgment. Damn it.

“Aria, please,” he pleaded. “Put the gun down.”

I invoked another smattering of intangible muscle relaxants, sliding Riley to the floor in a blithering crumple. Ronan’s eyes widened. Shrugging his shoulders back, he leapt toward the desk.

Seconds before my finger engaged the trigger, I used my telekinesis to force the gun away from my head and to aim it at Riley not yet passed out on the floor. The gun went off.

The recoil knocked my hip against the desk. The bullet shattered the genie bottle and breaking glass pinged the room. The blast thundered through my soul, rendered me deaf and speechless.

Despite Ronan’s liquid limbs, he dove across the desk. Unintelligible words spilled from his mouth as he knocked my head against the chair. The ecstatic pooling of Ronan’s spring-fresh magic within me accompanied the haze of midnight sucking me under.

Chapter 23

Slipped on the floor, I resurfaced seconds later on the receiving end of a hammering, blinding headache. Both Riley and Ronan were conked out, victims of my sleepy-time magic. Ronan slumped across the desk, and I almost swept the hair out of his eyes, so wanting to return to yesterday.

Magic whipped the air, and dense clouds of it pressed on me. It wasn't the barrier of a deadener, but the mass of fae and sorcerer magic surrounding my core of power. Silvery, golden energy dissolved into my every cell. Untainted, precious magic waited for me to rev the engines. The shock of the gunshot blasted away my shields and opened the floodgates. Holy doppelgängers, what had we wrought by opening the Rift?

"Game. Set. Match," I muttered to the silent room.

What happened? The chamber of the gun should've been empty. I'd spun the cylinder and modified the spin with telekinesis, listening for the appropriate sequence of clicks that supposedly emptied the firing chamber. All was in place, but something had gone ass-end wrong. Something inside me deflected the bullet-that-shouldn't-have-been away from Riley. Not even my subconscious would allow me to become a cold-blond murderer.

I squeezed my eyes closed. From the moment I plunged through the vent, I knew deadeners lined the office. Yet I'd gained control of my magic and busted apart the blocks. It was the reason I managed to shift the gun's cylinder to an empty chamber, or so I believed. Holy crap, the bullet almost marbled the sage walls with my brain.

Strangest of all, Ronan's unsullied magic reinvigorated our bond, solid and irrevocable. Joy streamed through me before I became the virtual victim of an Aria drive-by. When he'd dived for me, he never even touched me before I pulled the trigger. Either bad luck thirteen had struck again or something unfathomable had taken root within me. If what Riley said was true, then denial and I were hooking up. The gun earned my nastiest glare.

I'd done the cylinder movement thing before. At eighteen, Zoe and I had found the key to her stepfather's gun safe. Recently dumped by losers, insanely plastered, we were as depressed as tortillas. It was late and Russian roulette with one blank signaled stupid therapy. I shot at my foot, firing on the empty chamber. Only it wasn't empty, and my telekinesis redirected and slowed the bullet before I shot off my big toe.

The next day, I'd swiped my mom's old revolver out of her trunk and learned to spin the cylinder with my mind, listening for the clinks. A useless trick that only worked on a weapon with a cylinder. Don't ask why I felt the need to play with guns. I wasn't suicidal or anything, maybe arrogant and dumb occasionally.

My first life-threatening episode happened when I was twelve, shaping my warped ideas of invincibility. A car had backed into me as I cycled down the sidewalk. It should've flattened me into a speed bump. At the last second, the driver had hit the brakes. She'd reported never touching the brakes, and I pedaled away without a scratch.

The strange incidences hadn't ended there. I never dwelled much upon the wackiness of my life. Just lucky, I guessed. A paradox, if I'd ever heard one.

I poked my ringing ears and sank onto Riley's padded desk chair. He gurgled from the floor and his eyelids fluttered. I shoved the chair away from Ronan who was responding in one-syllable caveman grunts.

Skin pulled taut over the ridge of Ronan's cheekbones. His paleness magnified the tempest of charcoal flecks in his eyes. For an eye blink, his expression softened, then that blasted hard-ass mask descended. He reached to touch me.

"Back off." I brushed him away and swung my noodle legs over the edge of the chair, aiming the gun between Ronan and his father.

Riley listlessly regained his seating and perched on the edge of his chair once again, shaking his head in confusion.

Energy practically ignited off me. I'd need it to get out alive. Riley would not get his slimy hands on the tools he required and craved to rule the world. Nothing mattered but escaping Little Dick's Pokey with my part of the book and my body intact, including every ounce of blood. Rescuing Kiera and Katrina and getting Riley's part of the book would follow, once I escaped and formed a new rebellion. Ronan's betrayal had forced my hand in a different direction.

My aura circled my head in bubbly shades of pink with bits of green and blue converging on the inner rim. Neither of the Rileys appeared to notice, which meant they couldn't see auras. Score. If I needed evidence of the triad bond...bingo. Ronan's aura spun sluggishly around him, blue with bits of pink and green. Wonderful. Did I want the traitorous fairy-sorcerer connected to me for the rest of my life? If he were to die, what would happen to Adam? If Adam still lived. Heck, what would happen to me if one or both of them kicked off? How connected were we? How connected was I to the other eleven sorcerers and their doppelgängers, if they existed?

Ronan's flinty, dead gaze never faltered from my face. Stare long enough and I might perform another trick.

With the puny deadeners in the room, I should've felt his magic more, especially after our fuse at the Rift. Maybe he wore a bio-energy block just for little 'ole me? I couldn't take the chance of finding out. Any iota of trust in him had disappeared with the Seattle sun.

Exhilaration buzzed down my legs, and I fidgeted discretely, crossing my legs tight to wait out the resurgence of my new power. More magic than I'd ever known flooded me, laughing at the deadeners. And it wanted revenge. I was also hell bent on wiping up the floor with Riley's smarmy mouth.

What was a little extra magic careening inside a body if one couldn't exploit its full potential? Before either Ronan or Riley gained their full composure, I tossed out a heavy wave of energy destined to knock out every living being in the building. If it worked, I might become an exterminator in my next life. Ronan did a faceplant on the desk again, and Riley slowly folded over the right arm of his chair.

I scooped up the envelope and stuffed it down the front of my blouse, tucking my hem into my tight jeans to keep it from sliding out. A cell phone poked out of Riley's blazer pocket, and I snagged it, shoved it into my pants pocket.

Exiting stage left, I jetted down the hallway devoid of deadeners. Why would Riley line his office with deadeners, but install none in the hallways or rooms? Too much reliance on his drug-deadener regimen? Or was I too far gone into the land of ancient, illegal magic to even sense deadeners anymore? Nothing penetrated the ecstatic power cocooning me. The energy erupting from me was so intense it should've annihilated every electronic board within a mile. Maybe I had decimated all the deadeners.

Magic flooded me with energy and happiness. Free at last, it knew no bounds, using my mind and body as a vessel to control and harbor it. Prepare for takeoff, flying fairy-monkeys.

There wasn't a soul in sight until I rounded a bend and spied two guards still kicking it and flanking the double glass doors to the vestibule at the front. Another set of doors barred the outside world from the devil's den. I skidded to a halt, backtracked, and peeked around the corner. A wrought iron gate, lush lawns, and evergreens dominated the front of the complex. Both sets of doors had security pads on them, plus another set of guards—with guns trained on me.

Just as I was about to send the four a dosage of Aria's Slump 'n Snooze, my pinkies kinked. Shrill alarms drowned my pulse roaring in my ears. Commands rose down the hallways and booted footsteps rushed me from behind. Doors banged shut, locking automatically.

As I turned the corner toward the front doors and Riley's office near the reception area, the first two guards drew their guns on me. Darts shot out, aiming for my torso. A wall of solid, invisible air surrounded me, captured the poisonous barbs, whooshing them away in a cyclone.

Growing power pounded in my veins and swelled every cell of my being. Voices chanted in my head, obliterating the tremendous pressure building. It would be fun learning what new magic I could flaunt. Like this little number.

A warrior's cry escaped me as I threw up a wall of energy. I concentrated on disabling the four weapons centered on me rather than trying to deflect a barrage of tranq darts. The multi-zone clocks dotting the granite wall on the left struck thirteen after the hour. Without squandering a moment, I spun in a circle and threw up another electrical gust. Hopefully, that time it worked. Lessons on knocking out battalions of people were on tap when I returned home.

The men sported masks of shock, and they drooped to their knees, weapons clattering to the slate floor. Defenseless as dirt, awareness gleamed in eight sets of hazy eyes. I swiped my sweaty palms down my pant legs. Were they dead? I clutched my chest, having to make myself breathe in, breathe out. Damn it, I wasn't a murderer.

Dazed, I dashed up to Riley's office, my gaze landing on Ronan's familiar hulk heaped on the desk. Eyes closed, his chest moved. He coughed and his legs twitched. I very nearly ran to him, dying to wake him and return us to yesterday. Muscles throbbed in my throat, and I imposed an iron control on myself. Until I understood Ronan's game plan, I had to escape alone.

Alarms beeped on the sliding doors to liberty. I sprinted toward them and touched the lock. It fizzled into a thin spiraling stream of smoke, but the door wouldn't open. Stumbling to the nearest guard, I grabbed the security card clipped to his breast pocket. I slid the access card in the reader and pushed open the doors to my new freedom of chaos.

My footsteps pounded down the stamped cement path cutting the lawn in two, jarring in my ears. No one followed my escape from freakshow hell. Had I incapacitated the whole building? I refused to dwell on what I'd done, and forcibly chased off the eight hundred pounds of horror riding my back. Par for the course, the inconceivable tossed another wrench in my escape plan.

Locked twelve-foot high gates blocked my escape hatch. I slid the guard's card key in the reader on the right and the gates hissed open. I resisted the urge to high-five myself.

Willing my heart to quit trying to break through my ribcage, and to stop dying, I dashed through the gates. Glorious power sang inside me, even as realization whapped me, and my stomach sank with it.

Freedom included the price of confusion.

Half the tools I needed to traverse the Twilight Zone remained behind, along with a fractured piece of my heart.

Chapter 24

Except for an occasional vehicle, the streets remained deserted around the Dominion Research building. I ducked in and out of bushes and behind cars. My elation tested no boundaries, but I refused to allow it to nail me. Worry for Adam, Zoe, Kiera and Katrina undermined it sufficiently. Ronan's fate even chewed away at my self-confidence.

Had Ronan implanted me with a tracker? Had I killed the electronics in the building? Had I killed my own tracker?

Dizzy from my lingering headache and residual drugs in my system, I tripped on a rock in the landscaping surrounding a poop-brown building. A low hedge tempered my tumble onto waterlogged mulch. Groaning, I rolled against the windowless wall and sat on my knees. The stench of moldy mulch filled my nose, gratefully stealing away my vertigo. Away from all the deadeners, the newly open Rift spoon-fed me adrenaline in the guise of powerful ancient magic, like tiny conquerors marching into my every cell.

I breathed in cold, humid air. Halfway calm after counting to twenty, I plucked out Riley's top bling phone.

Fingers crossed, I dialed Zoe's number. It rang twice before she picked up. "Zoe, are you safe?" I hugged my knees to my chest. "I've escaped."

"Aria!" she screeched. "I'm driving around in this kickass car wondering if I should go to the police, but I'm scared. Can you talk?"

Quickly, I relayed the events of the last hour. "Come get me." I looked at the sign on the side of the unmarked building and the address number was thirteen thirteen.

I shrank deeper into the bushes. Sweet mother of crap. It had to be a coincidence, right?

Edgy silence lengthened as Zoe sped away from the building. I kept glancing in the rearview mirror, but nobody had followed me. Had I incapacitated the whole circus tent? Were Kiera and Katrina safe? Should we try to rescue them? Apprehension crawled up my spine in a wide trail of ants.

Zoe veered the Mercedes onto a major thoroughfare. "Where to, lady?"

I didn't know what to do. "Just drive." I rested my head on the headrest, the envelope pressing into my breasts. I wasn't ready to share the contents with her. The less she knew, the better for her safety.

The odor of charred burgers hung onto the earthtone interior, causing my belly to rumble against my recharging power. Not good. My stomach never interfered with my telekinesis. I pressed my hand to my middle, nudging down a wispy thread of hysteria. What was inside me now? What had I become?

"How bad do they want you?" Zoe's shaky voice scared me.

A tear escaped my left eye and I choked up.

"That's twice. You never cry. It's bad, isn't it?"

Composing myself, I slapped the tear off my face, bitch-slapping sense into me. "I think I'm the Holy Grail that just returned abolished magic to the world."

Zoe skimmed the curb and slammed on the brakes in front of a strip mall of lunch crowd eateries and convenience shops. She thrust the gear into park. Her eyeballs would've popped out of her head if they weren't attached. "You? Klutzy Aria?"

"Thanks for the vote." I straightened in my seat. "Get moving." My gaze darted out the windows. "Go." I pushed her hand on the steering wheel.

I needed a plan. Was Adam in on Ronan's backstabbing scheme? I stared at the phone, my forehead scrunched up. I didn't know Adam's number. My head was so screwed up I couldn't even recall his rich family's last name. Brain massage therapy or a lobotomy sounded golden.

The car roared into traffic, suffering Zoe's lead foot. "Riley won't report the car stolen, will he?" Her long, purple fingernails bit into the leather steering wheel.

I swished my hand, half-listening. "He wouldn't risk it. He'd lose me for sure."

"We need to rescue those other girls, right?" She swung the car down another major street.

"Yes. I can't let them stay there. He'll use them as bait to lure me back the same way he dangled you." Breathing evenly, I closed my eyes to regroup my brain cells. "Did you call your mom?" Zoe lived in a studio apartment over the garage at her parents' house, and her mother had a bead on her whereabouts most of the time.

"Yeah. She thinks I'm on a work trip." Uncertainty wavered in her voice and I hated it. We glanced at each other for a second, a moment of unspoken understanding.

"Did she suspect anything?"

Zoe emitted a cackling witch snicker. "Are you kidding? She was arguing with my stepjerk. I guess she finally fessed up that she'd enrolled the twin twits in private school. He's having a shit-fit about spending the money." She paused, a pensive silence descending. "Should we call the cops?"

"No. We're illegals." A branch of ideas sprouted in my head. I jabbed on the GPS.

"That could be tracking us." Zoe shoved my hand away from the GPS controls.

"I'll take the chance." I punched in the access menu. "They're probably already tracking the car."

If I hadn't killed everyone, that is. That spot on my neck tickled, and I rubbed it, not feeling anything beneath the surface. "I think they implanted me with a tracking device."

"What? That's illegal." Zoe smacked her palm on the steering wheel.

I blinked up a breeze to keep from rolling my threadbare eyes. "Like anything they do is legal. Get a grip, Zoe. This isn't fun and games. These people are murderers, kidnappers, who knows what else. They probably kill animals for paranormal experiments."

"Kill the sick bastards!" She tossed back her hair and gunned the car on a clear stretch.

I squeezed her arm. She made a sharp turn, dislodging my hand in the movement. "Did they hurt you?"

"They were decent. Even that dumbass Ian didn't hurt me."

"I heard him slap you."

"I raked my nails down his neck first."

"Seriously?"

She sucked in her bottom lip. "Do you know if he's okay? Riley's other men shot him when they grabbed me. They wanted you hard."

My mouth flapped in amazement. "Why do you care what happens to that creep?"

Her lips softened in an innocent smile. "He's not so bad. He was forced into that life. You know, like the mob, death's the only way out."

Again, I bribed my eyes from rolling into their sockets. "You picked that up with your empathic skills?"

"He was going to make a deal with you guys before Riley's mug-ugly dogs chewed him up."

"Holy cow." He was planning to flip on Melisande. I chewed on a fingernail, the next course after snacking on my cuticles.

"What are you hiding?" she asked with deceptive calm.

She knew me better than I did sometimes. I told her what had gone down at the mission church. "I need my phone." Plus, I needed a magical recharge from the Rift, to feed my waning reserves after my magic show at Dominion Research. I could barely float my hair. The gut feeling that magic still flowed out of the Rift refused to budge.

"Where is it?"

"Washington Park Arboretum." Punching in recreation sites on the GPS, I set the park as our destination.

"I'm not even gonna ask," she murmured, listening to the female GPS voice spew out its first direction.

Chapter 25

The police had posted temporary “closed” signs along the park’s perimeter fence. Regular police and Paranormal Vice Division officers—as evidenced by wicked purple bands around their shirtsleeves—guarded the visitor center gates.

“Keep driving.” I clutched the door handle. “Something’s up.”

“Ya think?”

A news van cut in front of us and stopped. Zoe stomped on the brakes, jolting us in our seats. My seatbelt practically cut my ribcage in half. Another van blocked us from behind. Reporters, police, and bystanders surrounded a suited, gray-haired man preparing to give a briefing in front of the visitor center. “Go see what’s up.”

Zoe unbuckled her seatbelt, her hands shaking. “Are you also wanted by the police?”

“Not yet.” I waved her away. “Hurry, he’s speaking.”

Magic wavered in the air. My aura spiked trying to pull me in the direction of the stone circle, wanting to party at the Rift. Could I risk getting closer to the wild energy with all these people in the area? What would it do to me, to those around me?

Moments later, Zoe shouldered through the knot of bystanders and slid into the car. “A dead area of the park is spitting out tons of paranormal energy.” Excitement bristled off her, leaving her voice singing. “There’ve been reports of people lured to the site, and their ESP abilities—” Zoe froze, mouth hanging open. “Cue the evil organ music. You did it, didn’t you?”

I chewed on a torn fingernail. “What?” I stared at her accusingly, or at least I tried to, but I think it came off as a look of contrition.

“Don’t you dare spin it. What’s going on?”

“ESP abilities skyrocketing?” I finished her sentence softly. “Are people turning into fairies and sorcerers?”

“They didn’t exactly say, but the milling people were making wild guesses.” She leaned slightly forward as if to force the words on me. “Your eyes are glowing.”

“What?” I jerked the visor down.

“Oh. My. God. Aria, you’ve been affected—”

My gargled screech drowned Zoe out as I examined my face in the lighted mirror. A glow edged my eyes and painted my face with a new luminosity. Copper and gold streaks highlighted my golden hair, at least two inches longer than yesterday.

“Uh no. No.” A warning wailed in my brain. “I’m not one of them. I can’t be.” I didn’t look like a fairy! Neither did Adam, much. We had too much human blood. I edged my finger around my ears. Normal. Would we eventually change? Had Riley been telling the truth about our fae-sorcerer origins? The contents of my stomach pitched. In case I needed to toss my cookies, I searched the ground outside the car. I might as well hook disposable barf bags on my wrist if this kept up.

Hordes of curious people surrounded our car trying to get into the park. The SWAT team had arrived for crowd control. Night sank fast beneath a billowing mantle of soaked clouds. The earthy scent of winter-spent vegetation drifted in with the faint breeze ruffling the bare trees. It whispered across my skin, invaded my senses, became a part of me. “We need to get out of here pronto.”

Zoe gauged our access space. “We’re in the middle of a jammed parking lot. Try again.”

“Then we hoof it. We need to ditch the car anyway.”

“What’s the plan in case we get separated?” Grooves drew her eyebrows close to unflattering unibrow terrain. She hooked her hair behind her ears, a sure sign of her agitation since she hated exposing her ears.

I had no choice but to confide in Zoe further. I might be endangering her life, and I hated that part the most. I trusted her with my life and secrets, though. It wasn’t like I had a stack of best friend applications waiting at home. I loved her too much to replace her.

“If I tell you, I’ll have to kill you.” She received my wicked eyewink.

“Bite me, fairy wench.” She whacked my upper arm. “I’m already into this up to my red roots.”

“Seriously.” My fingers bit into her arm. “Anyone connected to me is in jeopardy. I may end up on the run for the rest of my life to elude the dirtbags who want me alive and jerkoffs who’ll want me dead.”

She gave a wonky shrug. “I need a new adventure. You know you can trust me. Besides, we don’t know anyone else who has two ESP abilities. I want to know where I fit in this creeptastic world.”

“No kidding.” I linked my hand with hers.

“Damn straight.” She banged our hands down on the center armrest. “So what’s the grand plan?”

I squeezed our fingers together, released her hand. “If we get separated, contact Adam... Freshfields.” I smacked my forehead, finally remembering his last name. “I’m not a hundred percent certain I can trust him, but if he’s still alive, he’ll help you.” The neckline of my sweatshirt tightened. “Use your empathic talent to scope him out first. Then tell him everything that’s happened.” I plucked on my sweatshirt, releasing the anxiety threatening to choke me.

“Adam Freshfields? The guy voted the number one hottest catch in Silicon Valley under thirty?” I nodded. Zoe’s face transformed into her do-I-have-a-date-prospect-for-you gleam. “Oh, this is getting better by the moment.” She dry-washed her hands. “What if I can’t find him, or trust him?”

Ideas weren’t zinging into my head with my newfound superpowers. “Go to the PVD if you feel threatened.” Who else could help her? Ronan Turncoat? Hell to the no. “I can’t risk finding my phone. It’s in the middle of this shitstorm.” I hesitated, stared long and hard at her. “Listen and don’t ask.” I downloaded the book-cover blurb of everything I’d left out earlier.

“Hot damn.” A mischievous grin lit up her face. “You’re a direct descendant of the thirteen Forbidden sorcerers?”

“According to Riley and my mom, I am the thirteenth. The most powerful of them all.” I nearly choked up a hairball at the idea.

“Hmmm... Riley thinks you’re the master key to unlocking Forbidden magic?” Gears turned in her mind, almost visible in her brightly widening eyes. “It explains a lot about you.”

I swatted her arm. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

She nibbled on her bottom lip. “Just that I can’t always read you when you’re unblocked.” My eyes bugged out. “Your thoughts waver in and out with your emotions like you’re not all there.”

She’d never once said she couldn’t read me. That’s why I kept my thoughts blocked half the time around her. “That’s because I wasn’t all there,” I muttered half to myself. I twisted in my seat, surveyed the park. The crowd had thickened. “We should blend in now.”

Using Zoe’s phone, I dialed information and connected to Adam’s hotel voicemail. “Call me.” It was the only message I felt remotely safe leaving.

I reached to jab the door button, but Zoe’s grip on my arm stopped me. “You really do have fairy blood in you, you know?”

“Thanks for rubbing it in.” The wry twist of my mouth hurt my new perfection. “According to Riley, I have all kinds of funky blood in me.”

“They said the Rift energy is reacting to those affected—”

“I know.” I mashed my fist against the door. “I sensed it miles ago.”

The lines between her eyes became gullies. “I heard a cop yak to a PVD agent that he had orders to arrest any paranormals, and to use deadly force on anyone who resists.”

“Then I won’t resist.” I shoved my hair behind my ears, the new length bothering me. “Let’s hit it. We’re sitting fairies in this car. Riley’s men probably aren’t far behind, and the police are the lesser of the two hells.”

We met at the front bumper. A blast of wintry air shivered down the length of me. My sweatshirt didn’t work past sundown. At least Zoe had a leopard wrapped around her.

To our left, a group of college kids milled about in the shadows of twilight. We joined them, skirting the fringes of the crowd. Zoe strode in front of me to run interference. I dipped my head to hide my glowing eyes. A racket of excited and scared voices bounced in my ears, my dread swelling to rocket launching levels. The bitterness of damp asphalt clogged my nose, sending my tail spinning into the stratosphere. A narrow froth of clouds scuttled overhead. Dusk’s first stars littered the indigo sky and freed the suffocating hold on my heart. They were the first stars I’d seen since landing in Rainy Town.

Despite my natural skewed sense of direction, the Rift enticed me to the right. I could find it blindfolded. The Japanese Gardens loomed ahead, and the circle of stones nestled beyond it in the out of bounds section of the park.

Zoe's phone vibrated against my waist, and I skipped a step in alarm. The unfamiliar shoes didn't help my natural unluck much, and I stepped into a slurping, oozing mud puddle. Beep, beep, bad luck coming. "Hold on." I whipped out the phone, not recognizing the local number. "Hello?"

"Blondie?" Adam's voice splintered. "Where are you?"

Relief untied a knot in the back of my neck. "I'm not at DR if that's what you're asking." Ice filled my voice, which wasn't difficult to achieve since I was freezing my butt off. The night had shot my awakening ability to trust straight to the tar pits. Until Adam gave me something concrete to chew on, I had to nibble. "Have you heard from...Ronan...in the last hour?" I had a hard time dredging his name from the cobwebs in my brain. My heart throbbed in my ears, overriding the din of fearful excitement in the air.

"Yes. He said you and Zoe escaped. You could have killed him, Aria."

More relief trickled warmth through the ice in my veins. What if I had succeeded? I didn't want Ronan dead. "Anyone else?"

"Two guards are sleeping it off at the hospital. They'll live."

A freezing sweat washed that trickle of relief away. Numb, I couldn't speak.

"Aria? You okay?" The agony in Adam's voice radiated through the phone.

"He betrayed me." I choked up. Blindly, I followed Zoe into the shadows of an overhanging evergreen, distancing us from chattering co-eds converging on our space.

"No, not true." Nothing he said dulled my misery. "I'm coming for you. Where are you?"

"How do I know I can trust you? Ronan's working for his father. He set us up at—" I shut my trap lest I stuck my muddy foot in it. "You weren't there to see him cater to his father." I spat the words out like gravel between my teeth. A gust blew a damp, frigid wind over us, and I cast a nervous glance at the ever-changing sky. "How do I know you didn't go Benedict Arnold too?"

Three of the college kids, two women and one man, gathered close. One reached past Zoe and tried to grab my arm.

"She's one of us," the shimmery guy exclaimed.

I caught myself staring at the pale blond guy, noticing the wimpy auras around the trio. I lowered my head, hiding my face. Their energy flirted with mine meekly. Fear surpassed my anger at the invasion of my space, and my gaze darted around suspiciously. "Come get me," I snapped into the phone.

"Where?"

"Washington Park. Near—"

"Damn it. Do you know what's going on there?"

"Thanks for the 411," I whisper-yelled. Wheeling in a circle, I tried to shun the hands reaching to touch the slightest bit of my exposed skin.

Zoe slapped at their arms. “Give us some air here, people.”

“Twenty minutes,” Adam said. “Can you get to the Rift?”

Mr. Blond tried to grab the phone. I jerked back, tromping on Zoe’s toes, slick mud sliding me backward. She clasped my arm to keep my ass from kissing the ground and took a powder on her own butt. “I don’t know.” I mouthed “sorry,” and helped her up. I slicked mud off her behind, leaving a nasty residue on my hand.

“Try. Use the energy to defend yourself. It’s off limits to all but the scientists. The energy’s raw, so be careful. Stay out of the stones and erect a blocking shield. That’ll keep you invisible until I get there.”

“How do I do that?” I brushed against the brunette girl. She landed the most beautiful smile of devotion on me. I mean, her teeth practically glowed in the overhead lights. Her waist-length hair feathered my side, several locks twining loosely around me. All of them plucked on my aura, a natural magnetism, rather than an energy suck. Electrical heat radiated off me and they slurped it up. I had become their ray of sunlight. All hail Aria the Queen of Fae. As if.

“Aria! You listening to me?” Adam shouted.

His voice lugged me out of my baffled unicorn land. “What? Repeat.”

He explained how to erect the fae aural shield. “I owe you my life, Blondie. I’ll never do anything to lose your trust.” He let out a stilted laugh as though he had a hard time admitting an awkward truth. “I don’t know what Ronan did, but we’ll straighten it out.”

My heart thawed. I clutched the phone so tight my fingers grew numb. Of course, the ice age wind chill factor didn’t help. “Just get here, please.”

“Move along, folks. Playtime’s over.” A cop advanced on a group surrounding our gang of fae.

“Let’s go.” I grabbed Zoe’s hand and shoved through the trio. “Excuse us.”

“Where to?” the short girl asked.

“You’re not—” Could I abandon them here to a fate worse than death, if not death? After all, they were dead fae walking. Hell, I was the greatest felon of them all. I always wanted to be somebody, but I guess I should’ve been more specific.

I handed the phone to Zoe, the text message champion. “Give up your phone numbers. Then skedaddle before you’re arrested. Don’t tell anyone what’s happening. I’ll be in touch.”

Their auras wavered in relief and harmony. They rattled off numbers, and Zoe’s thumbs blurred on the screen.

A man shouted “hold up” behind us.

“Over there!”

A beam spotlighted us, and a crew of news people rushed over. They’d spotted us, sitting fairies on a log, and our niche of the park lit up like Christmas tree town. Let the games begin.

I pushed Zoe from behind. We bulldozed through the crowd, the three fairies scattering in the opposite direction. Someone tugged my sweatshirt, then my mud slick shoes slid, and I fell forward. A large mass bashed me onto the soggy grass. I stuck out my arms to take the brunt of the hit and to keep grass stains off my face, but the force blasted the air out of my lungs. The brute rolled off me, and I sucked in air.

Scores of people talked excitedly. Zoe screamed street gang slurs at a PVD officer. A cop grabbed my wrists and wrenched my arms behind me. Fire licked my shoulders.

“Get up.” The cop with a New York accent heaved me to my feet as though I were a toothpick. I wished I was a unicorn so I could stab my horn up his ass.

Someone slapped deadener cuffs around my wrists. A spark of my energy snapped to attention and laughed at the rinky-dink technology. I spat out a blade of grass stuck on my lip. It tasted faintly of dew. Why did I know how dew tasted? It wasn’t something that’d ever been in my diet.

The three paranormals—fae, sorcerers, whatever—huddled together, an overzealous cop training a gun on them. A pair of PVD officers drove up in an unmarked van, squealing tires as they braked to an abrupt stop. Zoe disappeared into the heaving crowd.

The New York brute prodded my shoulder from behind. “Walk toward the van.”

I frantically scanned for Zoe, but the sea of people had devoured her. Camera flashes exploded in blinding light, and I hid my face in my shoulder.

The Rift’s magic invigorated me, waltzed across my skin, recharged my batteries. My ninja Catwoman powers increased with every passing moment. Dubiously, I followed the mental instructions for the shielding spell Adam taught me. Where he learned it was beyond my comprehension. The air wavered, thick, shimmery. Each time I shifted a limb, air solidified around me and a thin veil shielded me. Digging deep, my magic shorted out the electronic wrist cuffs. Invoking the final words of the invisibility spell, I scampered for an opening in the crowd. A strange mix of energy coursed through me, sweet, pure, earthy. It was more robust, more recognizable than before.

“Son of a bitch,” my cop brute yelled. “Where’d the fairy freak go?”

“Asshole, go gargle some bleach.” I backed into an open space and waved my arms, jumped up and down, but caught no one’s attention.

The three fae stood shaking in fear and anger at the rear of the van. I dashed toward them and brushed against the short girl, sensed acceptance in her touch. Amazement wiped the fright from her eyes.

“Shhh. I’m not here,” I murmured, enjoying the airy sensation of invisibility.

The other two averted their faces as the detaining PVD officer opened the van doors. Like lightning, I touched each of their cuffs. The deadeners popped and smoked but no one noticed in the darkness encroaching on the winds of trouble.

“Run when you can,” I said in the girl’s ear before zooming away.

Diversion time. I shouted, “Hey, fuzz balls.” Careful not to bump into anyone, I dashed around the area. I touched a couple of dimwit cops, feathering my fingers over their hands. They reached for me, missed, pointed their guns at nothing, yelled and cursed as I baited them.

Pandemonium broke out, and the sharp smell of anxiety and testosterone clouded the air. I was having way too much fun by the time I realized the three fairies had disappeared.

“See ya, bozos.” Light as a leaf on a lick of wind, I jogged into the dark park. Shimmering ghost trees hid me as I searched for Zoe’s distinctive red hair and leopard jacket.

Night settled on the area, a moist mantle bogging down the air, but headlights, beams, and camera flashes set the darkness back into the early gloom of twilight. Tree limbs rustled and snapped. Wind swirled dead leaves into the air, shifting into a whirlwind of nervous mauve above my head.

“Where are you, Zoe?” The tired trees of winter absorbed my whisper. Maybe they’d arrested her for smacking a cop, something she’d do in a heartbeat. I wandered closer to the crowds and searched. Nothing.

I counted to ten, calmed my breathing, praying she was okay. Time wasn’t spinning backward. Adam and I would have to return to hunt her down. I had no idea what to do about the three fairies or the others that undoubtedly had materialized in the midst of the awakening fae-sorcery from the Void. One crisis at a time.

I rushed toward the stone circle. No GPS required. Magic chased over my skin in a long, slow possession. It tugged on me like the mother ship towing a spacepod, even as I vacuumed the vapor trails of magic inside my center of power.

Who was doing the possession? The Rift or me?

Chapter 26

Magic flooded me with the most enchanting serenity, a sense of belonging inside myself and in my life. I felt immortal, old as the universe, young as a newborn baby. Lazy spring afternoons, summers abloom with reckless abandon, air freshened with sultry promises, melting, sugary. I wanted to lap it up, bottle it, and take it home. Also my new tattoo sizzled in answer to a bizarre silent plea.

I ached for Ronan, the man who'd saved me in my apartment, the man who'd opened up a world I never knew existed, a world I fit into for the first time in my life. The sorcerer of my heart. Half of the two beings I loved so very much, each in different ways. Ways I still hadn't reconciled within myself, a fairy and a sorcerer who made up the whole of the doppelgänger. The realization left me reeling, and pain became an ember in the core of my heart. I had to force my mind off him and his potential betrayal. We may never go back to yesterday. The future was my true path, wherever it carried me into this dangerous and exciting world of the Forbidden.

Canary crime tape roped off a broad area around the Rift. Biohazard and no trespassing signs hung every twenty feet. An electronic fence emitted an electrical hum that vibrated in my ears. Floodlights illuminated each quadrant.

Several people wandered inside the marked zone, holding electronic gadgets, taking notes and readings. I remained outside the invisible fence and strode closer to a short, thin man scrutinizing the screen on a handheld device. A tall, chunky redheaded woman approached him, peering into her tablet, searching for her own cluestick. How much did these people know about the banished magic and the Forbidden?

I shifted to the left and stumbled over a rock that I swear wasn't there a second ago. I swung my arms to catch my balance.

The two scientists whirled in an excited fluster. "Who's there?" the man's voice squeaked. A series of blips and red lights flashed wildly on his electronic device.

Mindful of the face-busting terrain, I rushed into a planter of winter dormant bushes. They dashed behind me until their gadgets fell silent. The man beckoned to a second pair of scientists and the four consulted notes. I bet it took more than four scientists and lots of toys to figure out the speed of dark too.

Tiny lights bobbed in the air and streaked toward them. The swarm of large fireflies buzzed over their heads, zipped into their faces, zoomed away only to charge them again. The four swatted at the bizarre insects, and I slapped a hand over my grin, stifling a giggle. The glowing buggers wouldn't stop long enough to give me a chance to see if they were bitty fairies. Who knew what had spewed out of the Rift. The Void may have been an incubation farm for all the former magical creatures that ever existed for hundreds of years.

Carefully, I walked into the cordoned off area toward the stones. Electricity pinched me as my passing killed the ineffective deadener block. Woe is me.

"Fairy King, come out, come out, wherever you are." A breeze carried my whisper away.

Hands grabbed my hips from behind, tugging me into a familiar hard body. Air whooshed out of me in a moment of panic before Adam's clean, enticing aura circled me. Wow, he felt awesome, so alive, and real.

"Right here, Blondie," he whispered in my ear, then spun me in his arms.

I melted against him. "Can you see me?" I asked in a low voice. "Are we still invisible?"

"Yes and yes." Adam took my hand in his, raking his gaze from my tousled hair to my muddy shoes. "God, you feel incredible. Your magic's in my blood now."

What else was new? I was a new creature of the magical night. I defied definition. The Twilight Zone was now the Aria Zone.

"What exactly do you feel? Can you use my powers? Are you telekinetic?" Curiosity didn't kill the awe streaking up my back.

"I feel your aura in mine. Your magic enhances my new powers, but I can't draw from you and do what you can. Ronan and I are sharing each other's energy. I don't know how it works." He moved so close we became one, with a huge empty pocket. Ronan, I presumed. Was that how we'd feel with all thirteen sorcerers? What would happen when the others found their doppelgängers? I shut the gate on that mental path and inched backward to view what our magic had created.

Seeing Adam for the first time since we'd restored life to his magnificent body, I couldn't resist giving him the once and twice over. The lord of fae appearance had replaced his death-warmed-over exterior. Even in the glare of spotlights, I saw that his skin tone had deepened into the color of honey. A slight glint radiated from his vibrant, blue-violet eyes. Two beautiful fully formed, but subtle, pointed ears peeked through his thick, silky hair. Did I say magnificent? There must be a better word, but I was firing blanks.

"So, I'm a god now?" I joked, defraying my awe, letting the intangible sunlight wafting off him bathe me in its warmth.

"A goddess." Roses and lightning floated in his eyes. Rays of sunlight burned them away, leaving a rainbow in their wake.

Twilight Zone to Aria: we welcome you to your new loony bin. I clutched his arms to keep my spinning head in the air and my watery knees solid.

“Park’s off limits until ten o’clock.” A PVD officer’s loud dismissal sent my heart skipping. Yellow light washed over us and highlighted the last few people the magic and darkness hadn’t chased away.

“He can’t see us,” Adam murmured close to my ear. “Stand still, he’ll pass.”

The last three people exited the unarmed gate. I hugged Adam tighter. I couldn’t describe the attraction between us, the internal tug on everything good inside me, beyond the realm of normal or human. So different from the hot and cold wrenching confusion Ronan caused. Adam still felt as if he was part of Ronan—his lighter half—so pure and energized. On the flipside, I sensed his individual self apart from Ronan. And I had a feeling his unruly fairy glamour created much of the attraction between us. My head whirled with the array of mystifying feelings.

One thing I knew for certain, my head trusted Adam implicitly. No pinkie twitch warning me away. How far I’d come in the trust department over the last few days. It scared the bejeezus out of me. It also offered me hope that I could leave my insecurities and phobia of forming attachments at the Rift. With Adam—and Ronan—I didn’t have to hide my true nature or the bad luck, klutzy Aria.

Two officers swept lights over the area. As the beams hit the landscape, I checked out the miracles our magic had wrought. Formerly yellowed grass had transformed the ground into an emerald carpet. Dead tree limbs glistened lively, dotted with early spring buds. Life had reclaimed old mottled brown trees and bushes. Owls hooted in the tallest trees and small animals scurried among the bushes. The whole site radiated life to both the natural world and the paranormal unknown, a treasure trove of unfathomable magical artifacts.

I grinned up at Adam, who hadn’t taken his eyes off me. The lights shut down, painting the air with midnight ink, until a natural faint shimmer rose up from the stone circle. Radiant magic sparkled like multi-hued jewels on the trees and flora. “It’s beautiful.”

“You did this.” His smooth, lilting voice was a slow caress down my body.

“Not without help.” I hugged him tight. My heart dove into my stomach. “Zoe!” I clamped onto Adam’s arm. “I lost her by the visitor center. Three...fairies were almost captured.”

Adam called Jax and instructed him to track down Zoe and to look for any paranormals. After he hung up, we walked away from the energy inviting us closer to Mini-Stonehenge. “Was there a reason you came to the park?”

My teeth chattered and I shoved my hands up my sleeves. Adam shrugged off his leather jacket and wrapped it around my shoulders.

“Thanks.” I snuggled into its warmth, inhaling his familiar scent, along with a whiff of sunshine and moonlight. More elemental scents invaded my new world. “I thought the hotel might be watched. I wanted to slurp up some of the energy here while I snagged my phone.” I scanned the area. “It’s in Ronan’s backpack.” I nearly strangled on his name. “Hey, what happened to you? I don’t think Riley saw you. Did you invoke this invisibility glamour?”

Adam snuck his finger across my lips. “The magic must have naturally shielded me. I hung behind to grab the backpack and cover our tracks.”

I shook my fist in his face. “The memo fairy hadn’t given me Ronan’s plan. He nailed us to the wall. Did you know about his scheme?” The words tasted like dirt in my mouth. I grimaced and swished my tongue over my gums. These strange elemental scents and tastes were becoming irksome. I needed elemental chocolate.

He shook my shoulders, his fingers digging into the leather. “Riley found us through luck. Ronan didn’t set us up.”

“You’re a lap behind the field if you think that.” My heel caught on a tangle of vines. A clump of limp leaves cushioned my fall to the ground. I looked at my watch. Seven thirteen. Figures. I scooted off the plant onto the moist grass and crossed my legs.

Adam crouched down. “You seriously think Ronan set us up?”

“Too many coincidences. Why did he really go to Melisande’s hotel and hide it from us? Calling his father alone from San Jose? His nasty attitude at the Rift?” I wiped my damp hands on my sweatpants. “That’s just the icing on the cake of crap.”

“He’s not exactly the most open person.” He held out his hand. “Let’s go.”

“Where?”

“To the hotel.”

“No.” A dead flower received the impact of my fisted anger.

He sighed in frustration. “Why not?”

“Do you trust me?” He stroked the back of my hand.

His touch fired tendrils of reassurance through my heart. I jerked my hand away. “Stop playing fairy tricks on me.” In the span of seconds, my instincts and trust began sparring. No romance going on there.

Adam searched my face, his eyes glowing around the rims as if embers smoldered behind them. “No games, Aria.” He rose to his full height, towering over me. “I’ll never betray you, nor lie to you. Nor have I ever. We clear on that?” His tone brooked no trash talk. “What did Ronan do that’s got you all fired up?”

My neck smarted. I jumped up, rubbing the spot, dying to rub out Riley’s life as easily. I knew I’d disabled the tracking device inside me when I blasted Riley’s campus. Why else hadn’t his apemen found me by now? Just in case, I wanted double assurances. “Can the energy here deaden a tracking device?”

Adam’s nostrils flared as his face went all Ronan scowly. His hair curled and uncurled like an angry fist.

I tugged his hand but the mountain of fairy testosterone didn’t budge. “Let’s go.”

“It’s probably a crap-shoot here, but I bet Riley stuck one in you. Ronan assured me his father wouldn’t use the trackers because your innate magic made them useless. A lie, but that’s how he convinced his father he still had his implanted after he removed it.”

We set off toward a thicket of mist-shrouded trees, ghostly silhouettes in the dim park.

“Ronan implanted the tracking device in my neck.” I slipped on a patch of soggy grass. “I’m pretty sure I already disabled it.” I touched the puncture, zinging it with a ripple of a brain wave, and felt nothing to indicate it was still live.

“What?” Adam stopped abruptly, holding my arm steady. I guess he’d gotten used to my natural bad luck and wasn’t taking any chances of my ass kissing the ground.

Birds took flight, squawking, wings flapping. Although I hadn’t noticed anything unusual in the gloom, apprehension prickled across my shoulders. “Keep moving.” We continued trudging toward the trees.

“Was Ronan acting for his father?” Adam steered me to the left into a border of bushes along the trail.

“Who else? I awoke and he was sticking a gun thing in my neck. He flat out told me it was a tracker and don’t try to run.” A small animal scurried across our path, rustling into the bushes. I hugged Adam’s arm closer. “I thought I’d dreamed it until my neck just now burned.”

“Was Riley in the room?” We halted within the veil of trees. Branches clicked and creaked above our heads, resembling old bones in a hangman’s graveyard.

“Ronan was alone, but the room was audio and video bugged.” The faint glow from my glowering eyes extended a few inches beyond my face. “I told you he’s playing games. This isn’t how this was supposed to go down.” My right pinkie twinged. My shoulders tightened. Stop the world, so I can escape.

A clatter arose in the brush to our right and we spun toward it. A crunch followed in the same spot, and I peered into the deepening black night. The thickening cloud cover had stolen the last of our starlight.

“Are we still invisible?” I’d released my glamour by the Rift.

“No. I can’t hold the glamour for long. My magic really isn’t mine, you know. It’s mostly Ronan’s. You might, but wait until we need it.”

“Will mine shield you?” Several pairs of footsteps slogged through the wild park area. A spur of familiarity added a new knot of dread in my gut.

“Don’t worry about me.”

I stood on my toes and raised my lips to Adam’s ear. “It’s Ronan.”

Did he believe me about Ronan? Did I believe me? My heart twinged and my head ached, battling each other. I squeezed Adam’s hand so hard, he flexed his fingers, shaking me off. I dug my shoes into the wet ground to keep from running toward Benedict Ronan.

“Hold it together.” He rubbed my back underneath the leather jacket. Electricity tingled along the edges of my tattoo at his touch. “I feel him too. There’s more to the picture than meets the eye.”

“He was negotiating his freedom with my part of the Illuminaria.” The envelope helped keep the chill off my midriff. Would I ever see the whole book?

Adam rasped his fingers over his chin. “Invoke the glamour and return to the Rift. We’ll use the energy there.” We skirted a brick planter filled with stinky, moldy compost.

“I read more of the pages than I shared with you two. I wanted something to believe in that didn’t come out of your mouth or Ronan’s,” I explained as if I was sitting on the witness stand.

“I get it.”

“I guess Ronan thinks I betrayed him by holding out. I needed to understand how crucial it was to keep them from Riley’s hands. You’re right about your magic belonging to Ronan. The doppelgängers alone don’t have much innate magic...at least not yet. They pull from their linked sorcerers. It’s all in the lost pages.”

“Ronan and I figured that out. We never thought opening the Rift would change that aspect of our nature.”

I needed to tell him another crucial fact I’d learned from those pages that bothered me to the depths of my soul. “The more magic Ronan uses, the more it will hurt you. It’s the cost the sorcerers pay to wield their magic. Eventually, he’ll kill you if he uses too much magic.”

Adam sucked in a breath. I took his hand in mine, tried to peer into his faintly glowing eyes, but he averted his face. Emotion leaked into his death grip on my hand. “If he dies, you die too. If you die, he loses magic. You two balance each other out in that respect.”

Adam scrubbed a hand over his face. “God, what a mess. What would’ve happened if we’d closed the Rift, even if it was possible?”

“I don’t know. I skimmed the pages, but didn’t get a chance to read them all.”

A branch snapped in the nearby trees. Adam tugged on my hand.

Stealthily, we made our way to the Rift, trudging away from the thin air of malice nipping at our heels. I only tripped once on my thirteenth step. My aura riled up with my new infusion of magic. I tried to restrain it, but Ronan’s lure was too strong and a sliver slipped out, opening a fissure, waving a welcome to the Aria Zone sign. Ronan’s power yanked harder. Obviously, the connection between us transcended all things human and earthly. If only I could trust it once again. At that moment, my heart let my head take charge.

“She’s here,” Ronan said, unmistakably loud and clear, and oh so very near. Was he baiting me, or warning me?

“Concentrate,” Adam nearly snarled. “I can’t help you with magic until I figure out what I’m doing. You can do it. You’re stronger than he is.”

“I’m trying,” I said under my breath. Tug of war ensued between Ronan and me, weakening my tired defenses. Obviously, he’d regained his magical strength. Strong, recharged, an invisible rope of energy built between us, braided with threads of each other and Adam. Wrestling against Ronan’s power, I lost control of my glamour.

The light of two flashlights illuminated me. “There’s our wayward master sorcerer.” Riley’s chuckle grated along my last nerve. “Stun her.”

I released Adam’s hand so as not to disclose his presence under his faltering cloaking spell. I tore off, bobbing and weaving, distracting their attention. The direction of their voices stemmed from the stone circle so I ran in the opposite direction, away from the card-carrying members of the Buzz Kill Club.

Gopher holes created a tricky path, and I feared busting my butt on any misstep. I leapt behind a cedar to calm my racing heart. Peeking around the trunk, I couldn’t make out Ronan or Riley, but Ronan’s aura glommed onto me, stroking me from head to toe, melting my insides into wanton syrup. I readied a knockout spell and threw the mental blast at one of the two bodies waving the flashlights. A grunt and heavy thump on the ground tailed my targeted knockout. With all my recent practice, it was much easier to direct my brain waves. I couldn’t contain an excited grin. Take that, you sorry saps.

My second blast shot forward. An infinitesimal whizzing confirmed the mind toss, but I didn’t hear a second grunt and thump. Instead, the energy swerved and boomeranged toward my sheltering tree. I lunged behind the trunk, but the deluge caught me and threw me toward the tree. I thrashed my forehead into the rough bark. Blinding white light exploded in my skull. The electrical wave of magic drove me backward in a gust of prickly wind. My legs flew out from under me and I fell, the back of my head smashing into a decrepit, crumbling log.

Chapter 27

In muffled tones, I heard my name in two distinct arias that created a whole song, Ronan and Adam's voices merging as one. Riley stood four or five feet to Ronan's left. Stars gathered in my eyes, but they didn't stop me from blasting a targeted dose of an ass-kicking snooze at Riley. He crumpled to the ground in a quiet thump. The Rift magic was already filling me up, slowly but surely.

I was one giant ache from thudding head to searing footpads. On the flipside, Ronan and Adam's magic mated with mine, a sweet intoxicating joining. Soul deep, heart bound. Warmth and sunlight flooded me, and I had the sense of Ronan and Adam's souls dipping into mine, becoming one with all that we had been, all we were destined to be. Complete again, but at what cost? Who'd spin the hard drive that clunked against my skull? My vision swam in and out of focus. I gripped my head to stop it from careening away.

Ronan knelt beside his father and checked his pulse. "She all right?"

"Don't worry, sweetheart." Adam gathered me in his arms. "Where does it hurt?"

"Where...doesn't it hurt?"

"Can you be serious for once?" Ronan's curt voice snipped my last nerve.

"Go suck on a grenade, Ronan." Whether I felt it or not in my battered body, I managed to instill a dose of animosity in my tone. "How dare you throw my magic back at me? I thought you and Dickard wanted me alive?" I spat the words out, along with a leaf that'd snuck its way into my mouth. The faint taste of azaleas coated my tongue. Ugh. I was sick to death of kissing the ground and slurping on nature's bounty.

"You did that?" Adam lashed out, his arm hardening on my neck. His fae magic rose, but mine wasn't receptive. In fact, I wasn't sure I could throw another knockback spell at an ant, unless lucky thirteen decided to kick in.

A sharp stick dug into my knee, giving me the encouragement I needed to stand. I approached Ronan and his father, lying prone on the carpet of woodsy debris. I pulled the gun I'd filched from Riley's office out of my back waistband and pointed it at Ronan. "Move away from him."

Sparing a frown, Ronan stood, held up his hands, and backed away. "I'm on your side, Aria."

My anger refused to be caged. "If I throw a stick, will you leave?"

Adam joined us and removed Riley's weapons, which included a nasty-ass dart gun probably filled with Riley's exclusive magic killing elixir. He tossed me a flashlight, then tied an air band around Riley's wrists and ankles, leaving me suitably impressed with his newfound abilities. Before Adam had a chance to back away, Riley was already coming to. I was also suitably impressed with my newfound control, and glad that I hadn't zapped him to heaven, or in his case, hell.

"Well, well, well." Riley sputtered out the words, struggling against the invisible bindings on his wrists. "Finally, our fae doppelgänger has arisen." Excitement trembled in his recovering voice. "You did well, Ronan, exactly what I'd hoped for."

"You used me to flesh him out?" Stunned rage thickened Ronan's voice, and he slammed a fist against a tree trunk.

The flashlight beam lit up our little Come to Jesus session. "What are you, the pied piper of magic?" I said, my mouth raring to go off on Dickwad. Ronan deserved his chance, so I bit my tongue hard.

"I suspected you had found your other half after we screwed with the Rift. His identity was a mystery until tonight. His pull on your magic had been too strong over the years. Your abilities were hampered by him, his absence. He's the missing element in my alchemic potions using your blood. So much magic had returned to Earth after the Earthquake Cluster event, the shakeup of the ley lines...so much no one knew about or could even begin to fathom. The return of the sorcerer-fae magic, and the return of the magic of the original twelve doppelgängers, latching onto the DNA of humans with an iota of ancient magic in their bloodlines. Neither one of you would have been born without the other to balance you. Now that you've bonded and opened the Rift, you'll reach your full potential. And you'll live now. So you see, in essence, I saved your lives by coercing you to open the Rift properly."

"Not that you'll be around to see it." I smirked and toed Riley's leg.

"Oh, I will, I will." Riley barked out a smug laugh. "Do you really think you can handle the purest form of magic now saturating the world without me? Like you said earlier, I have your instruction manual, and so much more."

"Please." Sarcasm drew out the word. "The bullshit gauge is going to explode. You think I'm gonna waltz into your Club Lockup and bow to your will?"

"No one has access to the Illuminaria or my extensive research except me. Anyone tries and it's all set to self-destruct." Riley's smugness defied his bonds. "I have your mother's blood. Who do you think was the second sorcerer to help Ronan open the Rift the first time?" My mouth hung open and he laughed. "Oh, yes. Your mother, father, and I made quite the team in our university days."

"Fat lot of good it did since you couldn't open the Rift."

"Because she wasn't strong enough. She wasn't the true thirteenth."

"Shut it." I stamped my foot on a pile of decaying branches, sending splinters flying into the air. "You're not all that."

"You and Ronan are just like your fathers. Idiots who didn't know any better. You need me to teach you the ways of the Forbidden.”

I’d have frozen from shock if I weren’t already an iceberg. Adam brushed against me, and a tiny spark of electricity radiated up my arm to my shoulder.

Anger and frustration contorted Ronan’s features. “What did you say?”

“You’re not my son,” Riley said in a conspiratorial tone as if he’d waited to drop that tasty morsel for eons. “You never anticipated that one, did you? As smart as you thought you were, Ronan.”

“You...are...not,” Ronan toiled to speak through his stunned confusion, “my father?”

“Sorry to disappoint, but your mother wasn’t my great love.” Huskiness broke Riley’s steady voice. “Don’t get me wrong, your mother gave me everything I wanted. She gave me you, Ronan, from the blood of the last sorcerers on Earth. Fortunately,” he chuckled, “she was pregnant with you before we met.”

“Who’s my father?” Ronan asked, his voice weak and unsure.

“Maggie refused to tell me, only that he was a descendant of the Forbidden Thirteen and he walked away from her. The idiot had no clue how valuable you and Maggie were to the world. She later told me he’d died, and she’d burned every last shred of evidence of his identity. There were a lot of things Maggie did against my wishes.”

Ronan shook his head. “No. I got my blood from her. She was one of the Thirteen descendants.”

“Not so. She was a pathetic half-assed seer and nothing more. Maggie destroyed the evidence she’d collected about the Thirteen families so I couldn’t readily locate them. I’ve spent years trying to find Ms. Walker’s identity. Too many wasted years because of that bitch’s treachery.”

“No doubt because she learned of your plans,” Adam spit out.

“I only planned to right the wrongs of an ignorant world. The three of you together will lure the others to me. I can help them attain their abilities. It’s all spelled out in the Illuminaria. Without the Illuminaria, you’ll all kill each other. With the Rift open now, there’s no stopping the magic from returning to this world. It can’t be contained in the Void.” Riley continued spilling his secrets as if he chewed on a bargaining chip. “The Thirteen will rule this world. What’s wrong with that? How can that be a bad thing?”

“What about my doppelgänger.” Once again, I held my breath, waiting to hear what we’d suspected.

Riley chuckled. “Your ancestor ruled the Thirteen alone. She created and invoked the sorcery to destroy the world’s magic. She created twelve doppelgängers from the original Forbidden Thirteen.”

Fascination zoomed through me like asteroids hurtling toward Earth, fiercer than the fear eating my stomach lining. I couldn’t imagine whether Riley told the truth or not. A horrible mix of emotions clamped my mouth tight. Riley was willing to spill, so I zipped it. Then I’d hex his luck for eternity.

Pure hatred toward his father contorted Ronan’s face into a dark mask of murder. I knew then that his feelings for Riley had never changed. Had he been playing his father since the moment Riley captured us? No longer one hundred percent convinced he’d betrayed me, I wanted to torture and kill Riley for Ronan's sake.

"You're a piece of work," Ronan ground out. "Do you honestly think we'll go along with your mission now, Dad?"

Riley clicked his tongue, his OCD as consistent as the Seattle rains. "Are you going to kill me? You going to call the cops or PVD? You won't have a choice. I've got your blood, Aria's blood. I've still got Kiera and Katrina. I've perfected advanced bio-drugs to keep you in line. The second I'm released, it'll take one keystroke on my cell and you'll be incapacitated. It's worked so far, hasn't it, son?"

Had he drugged or controlled Ronan all along? Hope perked up my foggy brain. Rift magic seeped into me, nudging out my headache and lethargy.

"What are you thinking?" Riley asked, remaining immobile as though patiently waiting for our magic to wear off. Au contraire.

"Absorbing your fairytale." Sarcasm sparked the bitter edge of my fury when I didn't want to provoke him further. Sue my mouth for being a rule breaker.

"Clever words." His eyes shone brightly in the glow of the flashlight. "It's a shame your parents didn't live to see you grow into your birthright." His gaze swerved to Ronan. "Same with yours, Ronan." He laughed in that smooth, scornful way I found beyond irritating.

Rage and loathing shattered my last nerve. "You scum sucking prick!" Satan would get his asswipe back tonight.

Riley curled up and swung out his legs, knocking me off balance. Arms and legs still bound, he lunged to my left away from us and fell back to the ground on his side. A thick cushion of air stopped my tumble and pushed me away from him. Adam's eyes glowed lavender for a second until he shut down his magic.

"I'll stick a deadener gun up your ass and turn you into a lollipop if you try that again," I said. "Thanks, Adam." I erected an aura shield around the three of us.

During that few seconds of our preoccupation, Ronan had extracted a weapon from his jacket and aimed it at Riley. Simultaneously, Riley pointed a gun at Ronan. His wrists were bound, but his fingers still moved.

"You wouldn't dare." Riley's hand shook slightly. "Your doppelgänger and your master Thirteen won't let you. I have the information you need to live. It will die with me, and then you'll have nothing."

"I'll have Aria and Adam," Ronan said, quietly lethal and ominous. "That's enough."

I aimed a surge of magic at Riley, a second late and a credit short.

In surreal horror, Ronan and Riley pulled their triggers. Despite the silencers on both guns, the muted shots boomed in my head. The blasts split a hole in our aura meld, splintering it on the damp breeze, diamond flecks scattering onto an ebony canvas.

A dark stain blossomed on Riley's white shirt below his heart. Slack-jawed, he slumped to his knees.

I spun toward Ronan. Through the dim light, I couldn't see where the bullet made contact. Ronan's face betrayed no pain, but out of the corner of my eye, I'd seen him jerk. Terror skewered me and my mind leapfrogged onward.

Riley thumped on his stomach, his mouth working in his last moments of life. "I...loved you...like a son."

"Yeah, well, fathers don't murder their sons' mothers."

"I didn't—"

"I was there, you stupid ass. I saw the whole scene from the closet. I have it all on video," Ronan screamed, waving his fist at his pseudo-father. He advanced on Riley, and I thought he might stomp the bastard's smarmy face into the ground.

My shock knew no bounds. Why would Riley try to kill Ronan? Or had he just meant to hurt or scare him? Too bad stupidity wasn't painful. I wanted to hug Ronan, but I held on to Adam's hand, giving him my strength, curling my other fist against my stomach. Ronan needed to kill his demons his way.

The stain on Riley's chest swelled. Blood dribbled down his chin. "She...threatened...to expose me and you to...authorities." He coughed and spit. "She betrayed us. She deserved to die." He laughed a wet, gloppy sound.

Ronan's rage shot a surge of toxicity inside me. Chaos battled as both sympathy and betrayal clouded the bond that should have been springtime fresh and summertime warm. Instead, I felt autumn's wane and winter's cold.

All of a sudden, someone plunged into the scene, a dark wraith from out of storybooks charging from behind us. My watch beeped its hourly chime, a lonely sound in the hostile park, thirteen after the hour. My left pinkie twitched. Ah, criminy. Toe tag time.

"And you deserve this," the hooded man said, cool as dry ice. He stepped forward and shot the Dick Tator point-blank between the eyes.

Chapter 28

Ronan sank to his knees, his fist clutched to his chest. I screamed and crawled toward him, clawing the wet grass. Woozy and unsteady, I felt like I was lapping up a river of tar until I had my arms around him. I cradled his shoulders on my lap, wanting to give him all the new life inside me. Adam shoved aside the bullet-shredded jacket, revealing a crimson stain darkening the front of Ronan's gray Seahawks T-shirt. Blood drained out of my face, and I wanted to crawl inside Ronan and give him my life's blood. After all this, I refused to let him die on my watch. Not when I was so close to figuring out which side of the light and dark I would choose. No. Idiot. Wake the hell up. I already knew I was falling head-over-hard-heels for Ronan, even after he'd shattered my heart when I believed he'd betrayed me.

"Don't die, Ronan," I whispered. Mom believed in you. I believe in you. I believe in us! Oh, God, there's no us without you.

The mysterious intruder turned on our huddle, pushing his hood off. It was too dark to make out his features, but his eyes glommed onto my face and he smiled. "This has been a long time in coming." His voice choked on the words.

The barest Scottish accent served up another side order of crap. Was he another of Riley's bounty hunters from the pool of Celtic diversity?

"Who the hell are you?" Ronan ground out. "You kill me and you got nothing. No bounty. It's over."

"I'm Alexander Caliburn. There won't be any more killing tonight." The vaguely familiar man tucked his gun into his shoulder holster. He crouched next to me and gently applied pressure to Ronan's wound.

Adam grabbed the gun out of the man's holster and trained it on Alexander's chest.

Ronan's throat bobbed. "Aria?" He throttled my name.

Without giving the standoff a second thought, I swept tangled hair off Ronan's forehead. My tears dripped onto his cheek as I bunched his jacket over his wound, applying pressure to stem the bleeding.

"You crying over me? Don't—" A hacking cough nixed his words.

"Shhh..." I caressed his clammy cheek.

“Is he dead?”

“I think so.”

His eyes closed, eyelashes a fringe of black against his polar-white complexion. “You’re safe now...from him.”

“Stop talking, will ya.” Bands squeezed my heart.

He opened his eyes. “It’s not fatal...I’ll live.” He tried to move his left hand to feel for the injury, but I took his damp hand in mine, keeping him from moving.

“You’re all safe from me.” The man turned to me, his hand straying to my cheek. I jerked back to avoid his touch. “I’m not here to hurt you. It was never my intent.”

“Then what do you want from us?” I demanded.

Two of Riley’s guards rushed us. The moment they took in the scene and the gun in Adam’s hands, their weapons hit the ground and hands lifted in the air.

“Get Ronan in the back seat of the SUV. Then we’ll take Riley’s body to his compound before the cops make their rounds.” Adam’s authoritative voice belied the anguish emanating off him.

“You don’t recognize me?” the familiar stranger asked, emotion heavy in his voice.

“I can’t even see you in the dark.” I helped lift Ronan to his feet. “All I know is you’re the man who fired the killing bullet on Dickhead Riley. You’ve probably been chasing me all over the freaking West Coast. The bounty’s cancelled. Now get out of my way.” I pushed at him and it was like pushing a boulder.

“Aria Elle.” He held my arm, his grip warm, with something familiar in the way he said my name. Like R.L., like Dad used to so many years ago.

My knees sagged. Dad’s dead. I shook my head. “No. You betrayed me. You’re dead,” I whispered.

“It’s not true. It’s really me,” he said as Adam came between us. The guards hefted Ronan under their arms, blocking my view of him.

“Screw you and the asshole you rode in on.” I left him standing alone and ran to catch up to Ronan, Adam on my tail. I blinked back the tears threatening to unseat my tenuous new foundation.

We took Ronan to Dominion Research. A skeleton crew was on night duty, and we managed to skirt around them and avoid their questions. I had no clue what they did with Riley’s body. The mysterious Alexander took care of everything. The comfort that act brought me reminded me of my childhood, and I gave in to the security he granted me that night.

Surprise, surprise, Riley’s Scrambler guard, the one I kept sensing the ebb and tide of his magic, Carlos Sorentino, was also a doctor. Unable to trust anyone, Riley wanted his prized biochemist close at hand, guarding him. Doctor Carlos kicked into high gear to patch Ronan up. The bullet hadn’t hit anything crucial, and Ronan would only have a short stint of physical therapy to return his arm to peak gun-slinging shape.

Blood and gore didn't bother me, but I grew dizzy at the sight of needles sewing flesh. Reluctantly, I left Ronan in Dr. Scrambler's expert hands to hunt down Zoe. Jax and Jon had found her outside the park where the police had forced her out.

I fell into her hug on the couch in Riley's office. "Did the fairies get away?"

"Did you think I'd abandon them?"

"What'd you do, promise to email the PVD team nude photos of yourself?"

Zoe knocked a finger at the side of her head. "Damn, I could've used that one." She grinned wickedly. "No, I just promised a couple of hot, single PVD officers a night on the town with a redfire frenzy and a blonde-streak bombshell."

"No way!" I tugged on her hair.

"It's not like we have to keep the date. Don't get your thong stuck up your crack." She gripped my arm. "Tell me what happened."

While we waited for Adam, I gave her the peapod version of my escapades.

"O-M-G. Your father's alive?" Tears welled in her eyes and she hugged me tight. "Is it over?" She wiped her face on the shoulder of my borrowed sweatshirt.

"Eew. Stop it." I rolled away and sagged on the couch in a comfortable recline, rubbing my shoulder against the back cushion. "For now."

She hugged her knees to her chest. "It's just the beginning, isn't it?"

The door suddenly swung open. Saved by the proverbial bell. Adam sauntered in, closed the door behind him with a quiet click. A seductive smile lit up Zoe's face, erasing her unease and fatigue. I think she might have drooled on her hand too.

She listed sideways and whispered, "If you're passing on him, he's mine."

Jealousy pricked my heart before we giggled it off. Certain now that it was Ronan in my blood, holding my heart, usurping that part of Adam's magic, I didn't know how I felt about Zoe and Adam together. First, a bone deep exhaustion anchored me, and I needed to go lick my wounds.

The droopy eyes of fatigue hardly detracted from Adam's return to hotness. He was radiant, perfect, and his eyes twinkled brilliantly. Scenes of flowers, meadows, the sun, moon, and stars flickered in his irises. It almost hurt to look at him, but I couldn't tear my gaze away. A lank of tawny-gold hair lay casually on his forehead. Long, silky tendrils framed his honeyed face. His minty aura swirled above him, and if I peered just right, I saw chinks of pink and blue with a fuse of all three colors on the edges. Life bloomed from him like a field of new springtime wildflowers. Even in his exhausted state, he exuded cheerfulness, and his charm wound around me in a silken shroud of euphoria.

He perched on the arm of the overstuffed chair across from the couch. "We're heading back to the hotel." He yawned broadly.

I sat up. Concern creased the tree bark scrapes on my forehead, stinging my skin. “I want to stay with Ronan.”

Adam rubbed the stubble sprouting anew on his chin. “He doesn’t want to see you right now.”

Hurt and guilt curved around my heart. Oh. “Okay.”

I narrowed my eyes. What drugs? Ronan had refused a sedative and almost refused a local anesthesia while the doctor dug out the bullet and sewed him up. Then it dawned on me: Riley’s advanced bio-chemicals, advanced enough to eclipse a person’s will. Ronan had me so convinced of his betrayal, I couldn’t see beyond it. I still wasn’t one hundred percent sure of his agenda. I tried to blow the cobwebs from my brain, but the eight legs of emotions spun faster and thicker.

Adam interrupted my near short circuit. “He’ll stay and shut the place down and destroy the blood Richard collected from you, your mother, Ronan, and the girls. We already sent Kiera and Katrina home before their families called in the PVD and FBI.”

A red, raw cuticle earned my attention. “Is he safe here?” I studied my crusty sneakers, loathing the sight of them. Would life ever be safe again?

“Jax will stay. Jon will return with us.”

“Riley’s body?”

Adam stood up and held his hands out to Zoe and me. “Everything’s taken care of.” He paused for a long moment. “Alexander—your father—wants to see you.”

“He’s not my father,” I slung back.

As if on cue, the door slid open and the rat bastard sauntered into the room. There was no mistaking that the man who shot Riley was an older version of the father I remembered, the man formerly known as Patrick Walker, a name as fake as my own. Salt sprinkled his thick brown hair. His slightly flared nose and the rare blue-green eyes matched mine. The telling evidence was the round scar on the back of his right hand and the emerald and diamond Claddagh ring he always wore. He had burned himself working on his car a year before abandoning his family.

The fit and trim man had taken off his hooded jacket, exposing expensive slacks and a button-down shirt underneath. I think his Rolex probably cost more than my car. Had he lived a life of luxury while Mom, Granny, and I had scraped by?

“Can we talk alone?” he asked, his gaze sweeping past me to Adam and Zoe.

“They can stay.” Zoe and Adam surrounded me, my wingmen in a burgeoning sea of the unknown.

He gestured at a lone chair next to the couch before taking a squat. “Sit.”

My gang and I sat rigidly on the couch. Not that I was obeying him, my knees were about to turn to mush. My anger had become a limp noodle instead of a steel rod.

“Spill it. You left. I heard you were dead. Now you turn up as Alexander Caliburn. What gives?” I lashed out.

He scrubbed his hand over his face, plucked on the familiar goatee. He looked young for his age, despite the shallow lines fanning his eyes. “Your mother and I agreed this was for the best. She knew I was leaving. I’m sorry I had to do it that way. We thought it best that you hated me so you didn’t try to track me down. Your grandmother wasn’t so keen on the idea and had written me off.”

“Yeah, no kidding.” I snorted. “She freaking hated you till the day she died. Who does that to her own son without a valid reason?”

“Preaching to the preacher.” His eyes never strayed from my face. “I stayed away to protect you, to draw others away from you, to throw them off. I was there at significant events, at your graduations, even at some of your public birthday parties. I killed the couple who abducted you from the mall in Las Vegas when you were ten.”

“What? I didn’t do that?” My mind shot back to that day. The man in the park had cupped his hand over my mouth so hard I thought I was going to die. Then they gagged me and wrapped tape across my mouth. I’d lost control of my telekinesis and thought I’d caused their car to veer off the road to slam into a tree. I’d walked away without a scratch while they hunched over in the front seats conked out.

“That’s why your mother moved you to the Bay Area. Riley had located you in Vegas. The couple worked for him. Even back then, he was looking for anyone with magic. He didn’t know who you were, though. He was just hunting anyone with extreme ESP, hoping they were one of the Forbidden Thirteen.”

I remembered the incident that triggered our move vividly. I was at the mall for my friend Laura’s birthday party. Some boys were taunting us. They started harassing Laura, calling her fat names, making rude oinking sounds. I shut three of them up with simultaneous threads of telekinesis to their brains.

Growing warm under my father’s scrutiny, I swallowed hard and waved my hand at him to continue.

“A few years ago, Melisande Aguirre infiltrated my team and stole the half of the Illuminaria we’d managed to piece together, which we kept in a separate location. She handed it over to Riley for a king’s ransom and her loyalty.” He held up his hand to forestall our shocked responses. “The entire Illuminaria belonged to your mother. It was supposed to remain in the possession of the thirteenth. That was your mother.” He paused for elaboration. “Now it’s you.”

I rocked forward, my face in my hands. “Screw me now,” I whispered. “Mom was trying to fly under the radar by shunning anything to do with the paranormal. She feared the laws and so much more. After what’d happened to the couple in the park, I feared them too.” I feared me.

“I played cat and mouse with Riley for years to keep him off you and your mother’s trail. I drew his people all over the world with false leads, never able to lay my eyes on him as he remained underground. I formed a team to protect you and the others. The team has been in place since the Rift first shifted the year of your births. Once Riley got his hands on the book, everything spiraled out of control. I found out he had your mother’s blood on ice, taken during our college days in Ireland. He used it with Ronan’s magic to screw up the Rift. I set up the deal where he supposedly paid me off, to get access to his compound. He killed one of my best men, who sacrificed himself for the task by taking my place in a ruse to get inside the compound. He's the father of Matt Barlow, one of the Thirteen. Matt's safely living in our new secure compound in the Santa Cruz Mountains, not far from Adam's house." Adam and I traded shocked stares. "His father knew what was at stake for all the kids if Riley got even one of them under his control outside of Ronan. Especially you. You have the potential to call them all to you. We had to stop him at all costs." He scrubbed his face. "Unfortunately, Ronan's mother was collateral damage."

"What about my mother?" My voice sounded small and squeaky. "Granny Elle?"

"Accidents as far as we know, honey." His face blanched, and his voice grew croaky. "I'm so sorry. Your mother's accident happened before Riley discovered you were in the Bay Area, before we beefed up our security."

"But your man Barlow gave up Aria's identity and whereabouts." Adam shoved his long, thick golden hair over his shoulder as if it bothered him.

"He must have broken under Riley's torture. We'll never know. He was a good man who went to any length to save his son...and Aria." His voice softened. "We gave Riley false leads. It was just a matter of time he'd find Aria through her magic. It's too strong to hide under his detectors. He had his people and electronic detectors stationed around the world. All Aria had to do was walk down a street near a detector and bam. We're still learning the full extent of his reach."

My stomach gurgled, and I sucked in a few deep breaths to still the blooming ache. "Why didn't you just come forward once Riley sicced his dogs on me?" I demanded, having a hard time feeling out his motives.

My so-called father rose and began pacing the room. He toed aside pieces of the broken genie bottle that'd exploded during my earlier escape. "Riley had you tailed, bugged, you name it. If he even suspected I was alive, it would have blown my cover. I couldn't protect you or the others if that occurred. Your security has been my number one goal since before you were born. I refuse to jeopardize that."

Confusion reigned supreme inside me. I rubbed my temples until a knock on the door served up a side order of reality.

An unfamiliar man entered, carrying a silk-wrapped package the size of a large book. "We got it out of the safe without incident." Alexander accepted the package and dismissed the man.

My father stepped toward me. Adam tensed and I patted his knee. He'd remained silent for the newest tale to join the fairytale tome, and I appreciated his protectiveness.

"This belongs to you." My father set the package on the coffee table. "It's the original Illuminaria with the English translation."

Wide-eyed, I ogled the wrapped book. "Except for the missing pages."

"Except for the pages your mother kept separated. We knew the Rift had fractured and either she or you would need them to control it one day."

“How did you get it out of Riley’s safe?” Adam touched his fingertips to the cloth. “He said he had a self-destruct device on it if anyone but him tried to open it.”

“Only if his fingerprints weren’t used to open the safe.” Alexander’s implication sent a cold crawl of detached body parts up my spine.

Reverently, I peeled back a corner of the smooth cloth and unearthed the illuminated manuscript cover. It was as old as Earth, the edges slightly worn, oils fading the colors of the cover and dirtying edges of the pages. It was beautiful and full of life. I rewrapped the silk around it again and hugging it to my chest, I rose off the couch.

More of the upside down world insanity sank into my bones and I shuddered. Zoe stood and took Adam’s hand. They waited, staring at me as I fixated on the multifaceted amethyst, sapphire, and emerald genie bottle pieces twinkling beneath the overhead lights.

Finally, I leveraged my tired and sore butt forward. I picked up a piece of the rainbow glass the color of Ronan’s eyes. Thankfully, no one said a word. I was hardly able to explain the unearthly attraction to the genie bottle myself, so why spend my last brain cells to decode it for them. I clasped Adam’s comforting hand.

In the corridor, the tug on my aura fought the huge part of my heart that belonged with Ronan. The other part of my heart let Adam lead me away. I think Adam’s doppelgänger bond to Ronan would always be a part of me. I’d eventually learn to deal with it. At that moment, all my thoughts centered on Ronan, and his magic dominated our triad.

Silent, my father trailed us out of the building, his guards in tow. I was grateful for the chance to dwell on all I had learned that night without him pressuring me for something I couldn’t give yet. In time, I think I’ll rekindle my love for him.

The king-sized hotel bed was as close to heaven as I’d seen in days. After a quick bath, I donned one of Ronan’s extra-large T-shirts and spritzed on his cologne, taking a deep breath of him. I cranked up the heat and snuggled into the sumptuous pillowtop mattress. Zoe began squawking a song in the shower. I stuffed a plump pillow over my head and groaned. Add to shopping list: duct tape.

The door swished open, Fin dashed into the room, leapt onto the bed, plastering her furry body against my side.

Adam followed the pooch’s path to my heaven. He’d showered and donned a pair of sweatpants and a white T-shirt, smelling fresh and crisp of soap and shampoo, which enhanced his various underlying scents of the fresh outdoors. He perched on the edge of the bed, resting his hand on my leg.

“I missed you, Finny.” I scratched the preening pup’s head.

Adam patted Fin’s haunches. “Maybe someday we’ll find out her story.”

“Maybe now she’ll start growing.” I tweaked the pup’s ear, wallowing in her happiness.

The shower door opened and Zoe's rendition of new alternative rock thankfully trickled down the drain. Birds were safe again from the off-key screeching.

Adam leaned forward, his face close to mine. "Sleep tight." He gave me a chaste kiss on the forehead. "See you in the morning."

Yawning, I slipped beneath the covers again. "More like evening." I grabbed his wrist before he moved away. "You're okay now?"

"Would you let me sleep with you if I told you I hurt like hell?" He grinned.

I squeezed his hand and let go. "You couldn't handle the two of us." His laughter followed him into the lonely depths of the other bedroom.

Zoe swept out of the bathroom in a cloud of steam and jasmine. "Can I stick my jewelry in your safe?" she asked much too loudly. "Oops, sorry. You asleep?"

Exit sandman. "Not now."

"How can you sleep with that delicious fairy next door?"

"Watch me." I shoved the pillow over my face.

"You're no fun." She fake-pouted. "What's the combo?"

The question gave me pause to think, so hard it hurt. Ronan had broken into the safe, not that my choice of combination was much of a secret to someone who knew me the way he did. Had it been an act on Ronan's part? Or had he seriously tried to bargain for his freedom at my expense? Or was it his father's drugs? My baffled mind refused to ignite and I pushed out a weary breath. Reality would return with the sun...er...clouds tomorrow. "If it's not already open, it's thirteen, thirty-one."

"Well, that's sure original."

"You'd never have thought of it yesterday."

Zoe proceeded to keep the dead awake as she rustled in the closet. The lock clicked open. Fin growled, and I absently pet her.

"You know you have things in here," Zoe's oh-so-intruding voice called. "Hmm, now this is interesting." Curiosity never killed Zoe. Papers crinkled.

"What the—" I thrust the covers off, buried Fin beneath the heavy jacquard, and jumped out of bed. Zoe rushed toward me with a large padded envelope dangling from her hands. We butted heads.

"Oww." We groused in unison, rubbing our heads, giggling.

My pulse revved up. I snatched the envelope out of her hands, stared at the pages inside. Holding them to my chest, I sprinted toward the familiar envelope I'd taken from Riley's office and tossed on the desk after we'd arrived in the suite. I peeked inside to find it stuffed with photocopies of Riley's Illuminaria pages copied from Melisande's tablet. Ronan had faked out his father with his own book.

"Oh. My. God."

All my doubts fled. My decision became even more final. Would Ronan feel the same after all that had happened?

Chapter 29

Magic, murder, and mayhem were hell on the body. I believe I'd connected all the dots of my bruises possible to connect. Twelve hours after we'd arrived at the hotel, I left the bed better than I'd felt in forever. Zoe and Adam were talking and laughing up a riot in the living room. I wasn't jealous. Well, maybe a tiny part of me wanted to bitch slap her to San Jose. I think they were totally into each other, and if I couldn't have Adam, then I wanted Zoe to have him.

Honestly, I was glad Adam was taking everything so well. What long-term bond and head-trips would the doppelgänger hunks suffer? At some point, I too would have to deal with my own familial issues. Adam told me my father planned to remain incognito until I was ready to deal with him on my terms. More of my animosity toward him slipped away.

I strolled into the bathroom, stripped off Ronan's T-shirt, and gazed at my luminous skin. The bruises, scrapes, and cuts that had colored me like a rainbow were a distant nightmare. Fae magic had healed me faster than a snake shedding its skin. Had I also gained fae immortality? Were the fae really immortal? The nagging thoughts drifted away. I twisted my torso, scrutinized the vine growing up my back. One ebony thorn sprouted out of the bottom right of the vine above my butt crack. A reddish purple flower bloomed on a stem shooting toward my kidney. It had thirteen petals. "Weird, I tell you, weird."

An hour later, I joined Zoe and Adam eating ice cream in the living room.

They clapped.

"Ha ha."

"Ice cream?" Adam held out his freshly scooped bowl.

I pursed my mouth at the pink, brown, and white glob. "No, thanks. I don't eat ice cream."

"Who doesn't like ice cream?" He shoved the bowl closer.

I hadn't eaten ice cream since my father promised me a hot fudge sundae. "Who said I didn't like it?" Nudging him aside, I veered to the left toward the closet. I plucked out my jacket and wound my purple ombre scarf around my neck.

"Where are you going?" Adam approached, his eyes going all alpha male dark on me. I swear they mirrored a black hole.

I rose on my toes and kissed his cheek. "Running an errand. Is Jon or Jax up for a spin?"

Wariness radiated off Adam in waves of exotic spice cologne and slightly singed roses. “I’ll take you. Where?”

“No. Just me and Fin.”

His aura prickled around mine, his displeasure an odd sensation I’d have to learn to live with among all his other emotions. Along with Ronan’s, I supposed. Allow me to introduce my selves.

I stroked his sun-kissed cheek, loving the feel of stubbly life grazing my fingers. “Trust me.” He was like the sun, a force that had awakened me. Magic shimmered between us, sprinkled me in happy fairy dust.

He growled low in his throat, borrowing a cue from his darker doppelgänger. “Okay. Just tell me where.”

I glided my hand down his chest. Electricity popped warm pleasure in my veins, and I drew away before the allure sucked me in. “To the Rift.”

His expression clouded. “It’s not safe.”

“I’ll shield myself.”

“Why on earth would you want to go there?” Zoe piped up, clanging her bowl on the coffee table.

“Chill, you guys.”

Fin ran circles around me, tail whipping up a whirlwind. I zipped around Adam, grabbed my purse, and called out to the brothers. Knuckles rapped on the door, and Jon didn’t bother waiting for an invite.

“Come on, Finny.” I blew Adam and Zoe a kiss, grabbed Jon’s arm and wheeled him around to the door. “See you later. Have fun,” I threw over my shoulder. “Don’t do anything you’d feel guilty about later. Love you both.” I rushed Jon out and hooked Fin’s leash on her collar.

“Two hours, Aria.” I turned to see Adam give Jon a knowing look. “If you’re not back, I’m coming for you.”

Jon fidgeted in his boxers. “Um...she’s not gonna knock me out and steal my car, is she?”

I slapped his arm. “Don’t be a wuss. Let’s go.”

I had dreamed during my long sleep and awakened with visions of fairies fluttering in my head. Some had wings in all colors of the spectrum, with or without pointy ears, long hair, or short hair. They had glowing eyes and normal eyes. Short, tiny, tall, human size, bug size. Beautiful, mystical, magical. I was their goddess, little humdrum Aria Elle Walker. Forbidden sorcerer extraordinaire. The big, bad thirteenth.

Jon rolled up the privacy window. Funny guy. He could blast me with his wicked gun, yet he was leery of me. Fin hopped from seat-to-seat as if fleas had landed for a party.

Jamming my fists into my coat pockets, my right hand butted against something small wrapped in a velvet pouch. I plucked out the pouch and a chain fell out. Unwinding it, I discovered a gold, floral-engraved heart locket on a heavy chain, along with my lucky charm focusizer. The note read: I hope you like. Love, Adam. Adam had stuck in a tiny picture of Ronan. My heart melted as my eyes teared up. He'd known all along, probably before I even figured it out.

I strung the sparkly box chain around my neck. The gold hung warm against my skin, and I loved the tinkling jingle my pendant made against the locket.

Twenty minutes later, we reached the park. Jon parked behind the familiar copse of ghost trees. Brushstrokes of purple and indigo painted the twilight sky. Rain was a recent memory. I grabbed the flashlight and stuck my phone in my pocket.

The door opened and Fin dashed away. "Fin. Wait!" I scrambled out of the car, grabbing hold of Jon's hand. "Hang tight, please. It might take a while."

"No way." He dug in his heels. "I can't let you go off alone."

I tugged my hand away. "I'll zip it if you do." I tried to sneak past his hulking body, but he pressed me against the limo door. "Please. I'll owe you one," I cajoled. "I swear I won't do anything to get you in trouble. You know I can handle myself."

His expression shifted faster than a professional liar on the witness stand. Scowling, he stepped back and flicked his hand. "Go."

I thumbed on the flashlight and ran toward the Rift. Currently closed 24/7, a few guards made regular rounds. I invoked the wicked cool cloaking spell, just in case. Who knew sorcerers and fairies had such fun magic? No wonder it was illegal.

A moist wind blew through my jacket and my teeth rattled. I reached the stone circle without planting my face into a tuft of grass or a crusty pine.

"Fin, where are you?" I swished the flashlight beam at the ground. A snuffle and snort resonated in the center of the stones. Rift energy wavered at my proximity, and the magically charged air swept my chills away. I slid between the two smallest jagged stone pillars and stood in the center.

Fin jumped against my knees, jiggling on her hind legs.

I laughed. "Give me a minute." I killed the beam and stuck the flashlight in my pocket. "Stand in the center with me, Miss Infinity."

Her small body vibrated against me. I closed my eyes and focused on the energy of the stones, calling on the magic that seemed to belong only to me. The ancient magic hummed in my veins. It filled me with ecstasy, encircled me in glittery sparkles. Arms held upward as if reaching for the stars, I danced and lost myself for minutes, days it seemed.

Awash in tingling electricity, I emerged from my trance. The energy dissipated and floated away in a spray of rainbow fireworks. The ritual was instinctive, something I'd never have thought up in a gazillion years before we'd opened the Rift. I grinned and spun in a circle. "Fin?" No response.

I dug out the flashlight and shined it around. "Where are you?" Dread nudged out a slice of my exhilaration. I heard a slight fluttering behind me, the swish of birds' wings, and flashed the light at the ground.

“Did you ever wonder why I lifted my leg to pee?” a bitty exasperated voice said near my left ear. The tiny buzz saw of wings whooshed close to my head.

“Fin?” I backed up a step and saw...her...naked body fluttering in a flare of light. Gold spots sprinkled the bitty fairy’s gossamer wings of iridescent lavender and pink. She was Barbie-sized and imitated one too. Long, golden hair framed a stunning oval-shaped face, flowing down her perfectly proportioned body. I unwound my scarf and spread it open. She flew into the folds, stood on my open palm, and I gently twined the scarf loosely about her tiny body.

Fin was a shifter-fairy? Infinity...

“Thank the Goddess. I thought you were going to freeze me to death now that I’ve finally shifted out of that Goddess-awful canine body.” Her voice held a beautiful, lilting Irish accent. “My name is not Fin. Or Finny. Goddess, do you know what identity issues I’ve suffered from? It was bad enough I shifted into a bloody puppy, having to lift my leg to keep myself clean. I’ll never live it down.”

Foolishly, I grinned at her, my excitement banging my heart against my chest. “What...what’s your name?”

She straightened to her full height and replied with all the stature her ten-inch frame could muster, “Lorelei Wildwood, Queen of the Wildwood Clan, at your command.”

At my command? I held out my index finger and she pumped it up and down. “Nice to...er...meet you.”

“I’m very glad to meet you, Aria Elle Walker, Goddess of the Forbidden. I’ve been waiting for this day since I was a wee child.”

For little ole me? I gulped and tilted my head. “How old are you?”

“What year is it?” She laughed a tiny, tinkling sound. “I was twenty-nine when the Rift closed. I believe I’ll be twenty-nine forever.” She looked all of eighteen.

Carefully, I sat on the warm ground in the middle of Mini-Stonehenge and positioned her on my knee. “What happened back then?”

Lorelei plonked down, dangling her legs off my knee. “All the fae and sorcerers were summoned and locked into the Void, as you well know. The Rift wasn’t here, though.” She glanced around and sniffed with no small amount of disdain. “Ireland is far more beautiful than this dreary stink-hole.”

“Ireland.” Despite the warmth of the circle, I shivered. “How’d you end up here? Of all the crap-ass places, why’d they put a Rift in Seattle? I mean, the sun never shines here.”

Her wings vibrated through the scarf, and a glow shimmered, then winked out as she took a moment to recall. “They didn’t put a Rift here. These magical stones have been here since before humans inhabited the earth. Once the scared witless humans and your early ancestral sorcerers began culling the Forbidden toward extinction, some fairy clans tried to hide, knowing the end was coming. Most migrated to this part of the world to live in peace. Mountains were plentiful with uninhabited woodlands. Humans would not suspect fairies to journey to a place so foreign and far away from our origins.”

“They knew fairies were here if they were summoned to the Void, right?”

A red glow suffused Lorelei. “Possibly.” She gripped my knuckle. “You must understand that other magical beings were in this area. The summoning magic the sorcerers used extended to all beings with magic. Fairies just outlived them all and were the last to go.”

I swallowed hard. “What other races?”

She released her grip on my finger. “I don’t know specifically, since I was not among those fairy clans that migrated here. They’re all gone now. Very little of their magic remained in the Void. Few fae were left even though our magic was dominant.”

“Plus the doppelgängers?” Cool air replaced the warmth in the circle.

“Yes, them too.” Lorelei shuddered. “Half-fairy, half-sorcerer. The residual magic from the dead is drifting out of the Rift. Eventually, it will dissipate or be absorbed by humans or the Thirteen and their doppelgängers.” Her hands fluttered up and down.

Whoa, Nelly. I shrugged the matter to the back of my mind. My brain was going to send me a bounced check charge soon. “Why is Adam so human looking without wings, and you’re so tiny—”

“Goodness, I see I have my work cut out for me.” She rolled her neck, and I think her hands went to her hips beneath the scarf. “The fae come in many varieties. As for Adam...” she sniffed as if I’d stepped in a smelly, brown pile, “...he’s a doppelgänger, born of leftover sorcery. Besides, his blood is too watered with humans and sorcerers.” Her shoulders lifted and I adjusted the scarf.

“So how did you and Fin shift? How is that possible?”

“Not much to tell there.” Her sweet lilt perked up. “When the original Thirteen were closing the final Rift after sending the doppelgängers into the Void, I shape-shifted for the first time ever into a puppy.” Embarrassment suffused her face in a cotton candy glow. “I was a little late to the summoning,” she said in a whisper that I strained to hear. “I got locked in the fuzzball’s body in stasis, where I’ve been ever since. I think the sorcerers did it on purpose. Those ancestors of yours weren’t exactly the nicest beings on the planet.”

“So I guessed. I’m sorry for everything they did to you. I plan to make it right. The Forbidden Thirteen will be a better, moral race of sorcerers than ever before.”

“There may be more of my kind hiding in the world. I want to find them.” The anguished look on her face stopped my pending inquisition. In due time, we’d hunt down her kind, if any remained or had escaped the Void.

“Can you shift back to Fin?” I asked instead. Nothing escaped the realm of reality anymore.

She placed her hands on her hips and rolled her tiny luminescent eyes. “Goddess, I suppose. Couldn’t those damn sorcerers create their shifters from tigers instead?” She smoothed her hands over her arms, tightening her wings around her miniature body. “I’d rather not test the theory at the moment. I very much like my old self and would rather remain a fairy for another eternity.”

I laughed agreeably. “No kidding. But I’ll miss Fin.”

“Posh.” She fluttered her hand at me. “You’ll like me better.” She gave me a beauty contestant smile, eerily similar to my own. Hmmm...I seriously doubt this world was ready for two of us. And I’d have to sound a world alert if I had a doppelgänger hanging around the stargate. She slapped my hand, her teeny palm stinging like a snapped rubber band. “You’re not a dog fan, are you?”

Heat rose up my face and I picked at a dormant bedding plant. “Well, I am a cat person.”

A papery scraping of leaves in the trees by the babbling brook reminded me of the time. “We have to go before the doppel-wardens send the Starfleet posse after me.” I gently lifted her in my hand and rose off the warm ground.

“Put me on your shoulder,” she suggested. The perfect idea freed my hands.

Another nearby crinkling and snapping alerted me to a looming presence. A tingle inside my core and the surrounding energy identified the intruder. More relief than I cared to admit to gushed through me.

“Ronan?” I whipped out my flashlight and illuminated him at the outer edge of the stones. “How’d you know I was here?”

“Adam.” He held his left arm in a sling against his chest.

Lorelei tugged on my ear teasingly. “The fairy and the barbarian. What’s a girl to do?” She giggled and pinched my lobe. I tapped her knee and gave her a sideways evil eye.

“How much did you see?” I asked.

He smiled at Lorelei. “Enough to know Fin’s still around.” He laughed so carefree and happy, and I fell in love with his laugh...and him all over again. “I’ll drive you back. I sent Jon away.” He extended his good hand.

Without a thought, I took it, his fingers sliding over mine, entwining and electric. Something inside me melted, and that single gesture vanquished the tension between us. The rich scent of his amber spice cologne mingling with the earthy scents of the Rift area curled through the air, aroused my senses, booted out the last of the dust on my hormones. Everything felt right in the world. My head and heart had quit warring with one another. The convoluted impact of the doppelgänger bond waned with every day as I fell more in love with Ronan.

The cuff on his wrist brushed against me. I lifted our hands and inspected the deadener. “Why the deadener? Aren’t you done with your father’s legacy BS?”

“For Adam.” He stopped walking and peered down into my face. His unfathomable stare drilled down to my southern hemisphere in spikes of heated blood. “When I use magic, it kills a little something inside Adam.” I sucked in my stomach. “When he pulls from me, it drains me. We thought it best not to use any magic until we figure it out.”

“Oh. I read about that...in the book.” I fingered my trembling bottom lip. “I’m sorry.”

He shrugged. “Everything comes with a price. Magic’s going to cost us big time. At least we have the Illuminaria now. It’s bound to hold answers.”

We began a careful trek to the grove. Needless to say, unlucky thirteen still loved me. I tripped in a hole on my thirteenth step and slapped—almost squashed—poor Lorelei against my shoulder to keep her from kissing the ground with me. Maybe wrapping her in the scarf wasn't such a grand idea. Ronan circled his arm around my waist, snuggled me against his side.

After assuring Lorelei was okay and listening to her high-pitched voice ream me a new one, I turned into him. "Is your telekinesis back?"

"And more." His voice was a velvet murmur. "More magic than I've ever felt. You don't negate my magic any longer. How about you?"

"Same. More magic than ever." Electricity arced around us and my thoughts fragmented. I jumped with a rush of electricity and tried fighting the dance of magic, the spiral of desire. Despite the deadener, our auras still partied together. Thank the Rift. I think I would die if that part of Ronan and Adam didn't dance with such a vital part of me. "How's your arm?"

"Sore. It's not gonna kill me."

He sported a bandage on the right side of his neck in the exact opposite spot where he'd cut out the tracking device on the left. My mind flinched in anxiety. "What happened to your neck?" I rubbed the spot where my dead tracker was buried.

"I had the second tracking device cut out. That's how my—Richard—kept tabs on us."

"Oh." Another piece of the puzzle slipped into place. "Alex...my dad said Richard had been hunting us all over Seattle, everywhere really."

"He's a good guy, Aria. He did what he thought best to protect you and your mom. He even tried to help my mom escape Richard. They had all known each other in college."

I leaned my head on his arm. "I know. We'll get past all this. I want to know him."

Silence fell like a growing slant of sunlight warming a wintry day. Air sighed around me as real as if it touched my face with warm fingers of life and hope.

"Aren't you going to introduce me to your new friend?" His deep voice broke into the coziness of our companionship.

"How much did you really see?"

"Everything." He angled his head, appraising me slowly. "How did you know to do that?"

I tapped my index finger against my temple. "I'm psychic, remember?" He scowled then grinned, and I about swooned for real, holding onto his arm to keep my knees from buckling. That trickle of desire tormenting me expanded into a rushing river. "Actually, it came to me in a dream last night."

"Hey! Don't mind me. Studmuffin and I go way back." Lorelei laughed, the scarf tickling my neck as she twittered and bounced.

"I guess we do." Ronan snorted. "You peed on my shoe once or twice."

Lorelei glowed pink in embarrassment. "You probably deserved it."

As he'd learned to ignore my barbs, he smiled at Lorelei and let her dig slide. I formally introduced the fairy-shifter to the fairy-sorcerer.

"So why did you come here?" Hope shifted my heart into park.

His arm tightened around my waist. “I had to play the part...with my father, and I didn’t get a chance to discuss it with you after we were captured. You were drugged. I was drugged—”

I squeezed his waist. “I know.” I touched the piece of the genie bottle in my pants pocket, that little part of him in the gift from his beloved mother. “No need to explain.” Relief glided down his side. “I’m sorry I mistrusted you.”

“I needed him alive to find the Illuminaria. You saw how lethal it is.”

“I’m glad we have it safe and sound. My dad wants to take us to his compound. It’s actually near Adam’s house in the hills.” I didn’t even want to contemplate how our life would play out next. Goodbye to the lonely days of humdrum. How would the new magic affect my luck?

The welcome to purgatory bells continued to ring for me. We had a whole new set of problems to contend with: legal, moral, and magical. Hunting down the other sorcerers and their doppelgängers. Discovering what magic may have seeped into the world since the ley line explosion and since we’d opened the Rift. Do we blab to the world? Do I hide my head in dreams of Ronan? Alas, the world couldn’t banish the Forbidden or the magic any longer. Just let them try.

Ronan stopped and looked down at me, flicking curious eyes at Lorelei. She’d fallen asleep curled against my neck, snoring softly. He cupped my face. “I got what I wanted.” His voice faded, losing its steely edge.

His warmth pushed against mine and I snuggled into him. “Which is?”

The yearning for my place in this life slipped away and I leaned into him. He brushed his lips over mine once, eased closer for a deeper kiss. His kiss possessed me, owned me, and my lips quivered in unspoken passion. I’d died and slipped into hunky kisser’s paradise. I pressed against him, and sudden white-hot desire spiked my dormant girlie parts. Magic slipped out of me and showered us in sparks. I basked in the sensation of my power flowing into him and reversing course, my gaze riveted onto his storm-tossed eyes. He jerked against me in surprise or shock. As long as he didn’t stop kissing and touching me, jerk away. Our kiss was fierce, passionate, and hotter than hell. I wanted every piece of him, body and soul, tainted power and pure, right there on the spot. With that one hot-as-molten-lava kiss, he possessed me. And I let him. Desire and satisfaction smothered my lingering doubts.

He groaned deep in his throat, his good arm pulling me to where air didn’t exist between us. My heart gave my head a high-five. Breathless, we drew away, a tiny line of confusion marring his forehead.

I smoothed the line out with my finger and said the words he needed to hear. The words in my heart. “I know who I am and I have this amazing magic inside me. But it’s nothing without your magic within me. Nothing without you.”

“What about Adam?” His right hand slid into my hair, cupped my neck.

“He’ll always be a part of me as long as you are. I’m so lucky to have the both of you in my life. But he’ll always only be my friend.” I kissed him to seal the deal.

I'd found my purpose and my heart.

"Hey!" Lorelei began sliding down my upper arm. I wrenched away from Ronan and caught her on my palm before she tumbled to the ground, twisted in the scarf. She plunked down in an indignant heap, the scarf tying her wings to her sides. The tiny fairy glanced from me to Ronan, her eyes glimmering brighter. "Got any of those chocolate peanuts? No skimping on the chocolate either."

"In the car." A disconcerted twitch of Ronan's lips revealed a flash of white teeth.

She rolled on her side, propped her head on her hand, and tweaked the cuff buckle on my jacket.

"Did I tell you I have thirteen good luck gold spots on my wings?"

Well, thirteen was my number.

MORTALITY BITES

When I was dead, all I wanted was to be alive. Now that I'm human again, all I want to do is die.

Being alive is tough. Especially after 300 years of being a vampire. But now that I'm human again, I've decided to do what any 18 year old human girl does - go to university. I thought it would be a breeze ... after all, how many other students have the kind of life experience I have.

But after exactly one day of being a human university student, the only friend I made - an old librarian who was kind to me - was murdered. And not just murdered - ritually sacrificed. Looks like I'm going to have to dust off my huntress skills and test them out in a human body.

My name is Katrina Darling - ex-vampire, re-human-ated university student and totally pissed-off.

PART I

PROLOGUE

TODAY—

“We disappointed them,” the monster says, pulling the ropes.

The old librarian groans in pain as the ropes force his arms and legs apart so he hangs like Leonardo da Vinci’s Vitruvian Man.

“Please,” the librarian mutters. “We didn’t disappoint them. The gods ... they just left. That’s all.”

The monster gives a final tug of the ropes to ensure they are secure, then calmly walks past the librarian. “No, you’re wrong. We turned our backs on the old ways. We forgot the fundamental rule when appeasing the gods,” the old librarian’s torturer—the monster—says as it browses the library’s rare items display. It pauses on the item it wants, touching the cool glass with a light, almost careless finger. The monster’s lips crook up in satisfaction. “This modern world, with its iPads and smartphones, its Wikipedia and unlimited data ... it forgot that this ... all of this ... is because they willed it. Without the gods, we would be monkeys picking the ticks off of each other’s backs. Stupid, arrogant modern world—to think that they actually believe they can go on without the gods.” With one powerful, angry fist, the monster breaks the display glass.

“Don’t do this. Please. It will not bring them back. Nothing will bring them back!”

The monster ignores the old man’s pleas, pulling the ancient obsidian blade from its stand. The monster caresses its tip. The blade is sharp and a tiny stream of red blood drips from where it tore into flesh. “Blood. We forgot about blood. About how it is the essence of true worship.”

Approaching the helpless librarian, the monster holds the blade aloft and starts muttering ancient ritualistic words.

“Stop this. Please. I beg you,” says the librarian, but he knows his pleas are useless. He’s read the history books; he knows what these old rituals entail. The fear and suffering of “that which is sacrificed”—him, in this instance—is part of this. According to the texts, the harder the one who is sacrificed holds on to life, the closer the gods pay attention. Mustering the last of his pride, he closes his eyes and silences his cries. Death is coming—there is nothing he can do about that. But at least he can deny this monster some of the satisfaction.

The creature opens its eyes and, lifting the ceremonial knife high above its head, it cries out an ancient incantation that no human ear has heard nigh on a thousand years.

As the blade punctures his heart, the librarian utters a silent prayer—not for the gods to intervene, he knows that is useless—but as comfort to himself in his last moments. After all, this old librarian was once a priest, and old habits ... well, old habits do die hard.

Chapter 1

VAMPIRES, OTHERS, PROFESSORS AND FOOTBALL PLAYERS

YESTERDAY—

When I was dead, all I wanted was to be alive. Now that I'm human again, all I want to do is die. Or shrivel up and disappear. I've never been so embarrassed in my life.

It all started when I walked into Professor Hayes' class and some smart aleck decided to open the drapes without any warning. Light streamed through the open window and I, of course, freaked out, jumping back to avoid the sun rays ... and right into Justin Truly's arms.

Justin Truly—Junior, McConnell Hall President, straight-A student and all-around hunk—and here I was in his arms, freaking out (did I mention I was freaking out?). And why? Because I was afraid of a little bit of natural light. Oh, the horror ... the HORROR!

"Are you OK?" Justin asked.

"Yeah. Old habits die hard, I guess."

"Old habits?" He lifted a curious eyebrow in my direction and my heart skipped a beat.

"Yeah ..." I said, but to be honest his question hadn't penetrated my brain. He was cute before, but that eyebrow lift ... that eyebrow lift just upgraded him from cute to irresistible.

But then I remembered where I was. More importantly, I remembered who I was. A normal human girl—and not some three-hundred-year-old vampire. Well, ex-vampire. "Ahh, I mean ... I was daydreaming and ... the sudden appearance of the light startled me, and ... well, I'm a jumper."

Justin continued his oh-so-incredibly cute, curious-eyebrow trick. "I see. First-day jitters, huh?" He ran a hand through his thick, lush black locks and I just about died—again.

"I'm working on it. But like I said—"

"Old habits—yeah, I got it." He gave me a wry smile and extended his hand out. "I'm Justin."

"I know," I said, staring down at his perfectly formed fingers as if Jesus Christ Himself were offering me a drink from the Holy Grail.

"And you are ...?"

I looked up again. "Me?"

He chuckled. "Yeah, you."

I shook his hand. “Ahh, Kat. Katrina. Kat.” Smooth, girl. Smooth.

“Kat. I see you are aptly named.”

I gave him a curious look of my own, sans the eyebrow trick. Harder than it looked.

“You know, old habits and all. You always land on your feet.”

“Feet?” I asked. “Oh, I get it. Because I’m a jumper. And a cat. Kat.”

“Bingo,” he said, shooting his pointy finger my way.

What did that mean? Did he just shoot me dead? Figuratively speaking, of course. Or was the finger a good thing? Like he was acknowledging me in some kind of affirmative, kudos kind of way?

Being human is so hard.

Before I could think of anything to say back, I was saved by a stern, loud voice that cried out, “Will everyone take your seats? Now, please.”

The class was starting. Phew.

Justin gave me an after-you gesture and I took the nearest seat, which was way up in the auditorium, hoping Justin would sit next to me. But the sophomore football player didn’t, opting instead to walk down the steps to the front row.

A dark-skinned boy a few rows in front of me gave me a thumbs up and said in a deep foreign accent I recognized to be from West Africa (Where was that? Ghana?), “Smooth, girl. Very smooth.”

Yeah—smooth like sandpaper. So much for having a great first day.

Professor Hayes slammed two folders down on the table. “Why did the gods leave?”

Of all the questions I expected to be asked on my first day during my first class, this wasn’t one of them. Especially because no one knew why the gods left. Their GrandExodus happened four years ago and scholars, philosophers, theologians and scientists alike debated what would prompt them to go. The truth was—no one knew why they left and no one would ever know.

We’re not gods, and therefore god logic is not something we’re capable of.

There was a chuckle in the room.

Professor Hayes pointed in my direction and said, “Glad I was able to surprise you—and yes, a very good answer, but incomplete.”

Crap, I was speaking out loud again. It was something I did a lot. I don’t mean to, but I guess after years of being a lone hunter and creature of the night, you got used to talking to yourself. And as for being embarrassed about it, that was new too. Back in those days, I’d simply rip out the throats of anyone who dared laugh at me.

Talking out loud was another old habit that I really had to get under control.

Professor Hayes smiled at me, his pudgy chipmunk cheeks squishing his eyes making him look like the Santa Claus version of Clint Eastwood.

I stared back, not daring to say—or think—anything.

“You, in the back row,” Professor Hayes said. “What is your name?”

“Ahh ... me?” I started, but before I could get my name out, a voice in the front row said, “Katrina. Kat for short. Careful, Professor Hayes—she’s a jumper.”

Justin Truly.

The auditorium chattered with muffled giggles.

Professor Hayes shot Justin a look and said, “Katrina ...?” He dragged out my name like I was supposed to complete it or something.

Oh, yeah—complete it. “Darling,” I said. “Katrina Darling.”

“Miss Darling,” the professor said. “Your answer is absolutely right. We don’t know. All we do know is that the gods did exist—once—and that three days from now will mark the four-year anniversary of their departure. We also know that they did not take it upon themselves to explain their behavior, instead leaving with a simple message of ...?”

He raised his hands like an orchestra conductor and at his cue, the class sang out in harmony, “Thank you for believing in us, but it’s not enough. We’re leaving. Good luck.”

The gods’ last message to the world, and something that every living creature heard at exactly the same time. I’d never forget where I was when I heard that voice in my head. How could I? That was the exact moment I reverted back to human. Vampire no more. Thanks, gods.

It was a strange transition, to say the least, and abrupt as all hell. I was turned when I was fifteen, and I’d spent the last three hundred years as a teenager trapped in an immortal body. An immortal body that needed blood to survive.

When the gods left, I happened to be drinking from the neck of my—ahem—my latest victim: a vicar I found wandering the fields alone at night in a Scottish meadow near the town of Oban. I was halfway through with him when the gods’ message rang in my head. In an instant my fangs retracted. Unfortunately for both me and the vicar, I had bitten deep enough that my front and bottom teeth gripped flesh, and as said fangs retracted, a substantial squirt of his blood shot up into my mouth and down my throat.

I pulled away and promptly—elegantly, prettily even—threw up.

Only moments earlier, the taste of blood was something I craved. Now it was something I detested.

I would later find out that when they left, they took most of their magic with them. And me being a creature made from that very magic, I became magic-less, boring human again.

Wiping away the blood from my mouth, I thought, What the hell just happened? Evidently, I’d spoken this thought aloud, as per usual, because the old vicar was nodding at my question vigorously, also experiencing his own existentialist crisis. His face was painted with fear and his vestments were painted with his own blood, still streaming from his neck. But the fear on his face wasn’t of me—it was fear of whatever that message was. In some odd comradery, we walked into town together, not speaking, not really acknowledging each other's existence.

As we passed an old pub, its TV blaring, we glimpsed images from the local news with the big bright letters that confirmed we weren't the only ones who heard the message. In fact, everyone in the world heard it. The gods were gone. What we'd all heard was true. My own newly grown human canines were proof.

But them leaving and me turning human wasn't the strangest thing to happen that night. Not by a long shot.

No, the strangest thing was the appearance of the Others. Seems that when the gods left, they closed all their domains, forcing mythical creatures of all religions, fables, and fairytales down to Earth. Centaurs, dragons, mermaids, nasnas, ecantado—you name them—all fell down. Fairytales raining from the sky.

And to think—prior to that day, I'd thought I was the biggest and baddest monster to roam this earthly plane. Sometimes my arrogance astounds me.

"That's right," Professor Hayes continued. "Thank you for believing in us, but it's not enough. Not enough for what? To sustain them? To nurture them? To hold their interest? We'll never know. All we do know is that whatever we once gave them, whatever it was that had kept them here for millennia, was no longer enough. Or perhaps it never was, and it took them that long to realize it."

Professor Hayes adjusted his glasses and let out a heavy sigh.

"Will the Others in this classroom please stand up?"

A dust of pixies, an oni demon, a raiju, three fairies, two angels, an Incan apu and a gargoyle all stood up. I considered standing myself, but I wasn't an Other. Not anymore, at least. My current human status—and desire to not embarrass myself in front of Justin Truly again—compelled me to remain in my seat.

But if I'm honest with myself, that wasn't the only reason I kept seated. Truth was, I was ashamed of my past. When I think about all my victims—my human victims—I just want to rip out my own throat and watch myself bleed to death.

Morbid, I know. I'm working on that, too.

Besides, I used to be a freaking demon. Surely that counts for something in explaining my past ... umm ... discretions.

"Others," Professor Hayes said to those standing in the auditorium, "I welcome you to my class. As your professor, I speak for everyone here when I say that I am proud to be part of the only university on this good great Earth that accepts Others as students." He eyed the seated students. "For any humans who don't approve, or who distrust them, this is what I say to you—they live among us now. Deal with it. Intolerance, hatred, fear—these happen outside of these hallowed halls. Those destructive ideologies have no place here. Do you understand?"

The auditorium was silent.

"I said, 'Do you understand?'"

A mismatched chorus of weak Yeses could be heard in the lecture room. Not the most resounding acknowledgment of Professor Hayes's ultimatum, but it would have to do. It had only been four years. Change takes time.

"Very good," Professor Hayes said, motioning for the Others to take their seats. "Let's get started. History is not going to teach itself."

Chapter 2

HISTORY IS FOR THE HYENAS

The rest of the class went pretty much like you'd expect a history class to go. Dates, events ... yadda, yadda, yadda. Given that this class focused on the Industrial Era and I'd actually lived through that, I was surprised at how inaccurate so much of the history was. I flipped through the textbook, reading about the rise of machines that forced farmers out of the fields and into cities to find work, about overpopulation and pollution which made day-to-day life miserable.

That's not what I remembered.

I remembered people having more time to think, to dance, to sing. To play. That social classes were beginning to break down and, for the first time ever, the common man had a chance to be more than to carry on in whatever menial profession his father did.

It was a good time. Not the best, but far better than what had proceeded it.

Not that I was going to say anything to Professor Hayes. I was a normal human girl in her late teens. Normal human girls in their late teens do not have firsthand experience with the early 1800s.

And to think that I thought this class was going to be a breeze. Now I would have to learn everything they claimed happened and replace it with everything I knew actually happened.

Arrgh!

The bell rang and everyone started to pack up and leave. I purposely took my time, hoping Justin Truly would come my way and talk to me. This time I would be more suave. Cool as ice. I'd be the bee's knees—no, that's not right. That was human vernacular in the 1920s. This was the new millennium, the GoneGod world. Unfortunately, I lived through a ton of those eras, each with their own particular and peculiar vernacular—plus, I had a deeeep love for '80s and '90s TV—so I wasn't really hip on modern slang. Yet.

What I did know was that in this era, humans didn't use words like bee's knees, groovy or rockin'. And one wasn't in or down with it anymore.

Modern humans were now saying things like GoneGodDamn! or Empty Heaven. I'd even heard some idiot say Hallelujah! Probably thought he was being clever or something.

That's what I needed to be—a modern human. Part of being a modern human meant that you didn't wait for Justin to show up. You just happened to be in his path when he did. So, in an effort to be like my contemporaries, I pretended to be engrossed in the class's textbook. When he passed, he'd stop and say “Hi,” or maybe something cooler like “Hey.” I’d lift a casual finger as if to say Give me a minute before looking up as if unaware who had been standing there.

Yeah—that was what a modern human looked like. Calculatedly casual.

Besides, I didn’t need to be too modern, because—not to sound full of myself—I was cute. Not gorgeous, mind you, but cute. I had a kind of Reese-Witherspoon-in-Legally-Blonde or Sarah-Michelle-Gellar-in-Buffy vibe going for me. I had a cute but confident yet somehow helpless aura to me that I’d cultivated over the centuries of being a vampire.

I had to. It was how I hunted.

During that time, I had two main shticks to lure in my prey. The first one I called Cute and Helpless, and it went like this: “Oh my, Mister Big-and-Strong, it is dark outside and I’m scared. Do you mind walking me home?” That was good when I wanted a quick meal without all the fuss of screaming and running.

The second technique was reserved for when I was in a playful mood: Cute and Terrified. In that routine, I’d find some dark alley or secluded place and start screaming for dear life. Eventually, some macho guy came running and, well, let’s just say that there was some screaming and running on his part. I’d play cat-and-mouse with him for a bit before, you know ... eating.

I’ll admit it: I was a real bitch back then. But part of me being human again was atoning for all the bad I did when I was the monster who went bump in the night.

The other students shuffled out of the class, but no Justin. No worries. He had sat in the front of the class, so it made sense that it would take him a while to get to me. But when the auditorium went quiet, I dared a glance and saw that everyone was gone. Everyone including Professor Hayes. I was totally alone.

Except for the kid from Africa, who stared at me from two rows down. Evidently, I wasn’t cute enough for Justin to stop and talk to me.

Disappointed, I packed my stuff and stood up. As I did, the kid—who was totally checking me out, by the way, and not in a cute kind of way, but in a creepy-stalker way—kept his eyes on me. It felt like he was looking through me, rather than at me.

I couldn’t take it anymore. I may be human, but I wasn’t helpless. I knew things—like where all the major arteries were and which nerves crippled your prey versus the ones that absolutely paralyzed them. Plus, in my travels, I studied a variety of martial arts. A lot. I figured that I was probably one of a handful of humans with such a wide range of styles, and I’d had hundreds of years during which to practice them. But despite knowing what I was capable of, my heart still raced when I met his gaze and said in the harshest tone I could muster, “What?”

The guy didn’t flinch. He just sniffed the air and said, “You should have stood up.”

“What? When?”

“You know when.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about. I’m just a girl. A human girl.”

“Sure you are,” he said.

“I am,” I repeated as I slung my bag over my shoulder, leaving the room as fast as I could—and feeling his eyes on me the whole way.

Out in the main hall, I saw Justin mulling about with his McConnell Hall buddies. They jokingly called themselves the Omega Omega Omega (O³ for short) Bros. Their little gang were legends on campus for throwing the biggest and baddest parties.

I think they got their name because the Latin letter Omega is mistakenly associated with the Apocalypse. You know—God saying He was the Alpha and Omega and all that. And given that the gods leaving were an apocalypse of sorts, I guess they were tripling down on the rhetoric. I kinda wanted to tell them that Omega didn’t mean the end, but rather the concept of God being the Alpha and Omega was to give Him a cyclical, renewing nature. You know, circle-of-life kind of stuff. The gods leaving made that Biblical quote kind of meaningless, anyway. But these guys were teenagers on the cusp of adulthood—they were far more interested in the cool factor of the name than anything else. Who was I to burst their bubble?

Besides—Justin made the O³s cool. He made everything cool.

The O³ Bros were standing in a line, handing out flyers alongside an Incan apu who was in the history class with us. They were jostling each other, seeming to be having a good time. It seemed Professor Hayes’ warning that we should all get along was unnecessary. Here were three humans and an Incan apu—an Other belonging to a religion that was now ancient history—and they were getting on just fine.

I tried to position myself so that Justin would hand me one of the flyers, but instead, I was intercepted by the apu. Apus were Incan nature spirits and were usually associated with a place—a forest, a river, even a town. These spirits were defenders. If you ever caused trouble in a place protected by one of these guys, you were in for one hell of a fight.

Up close the apu looked like a normal human except for one, eerie difference: he was made of rock. I don’t mean like the Thing in Fantastic Four, nor do I mean he was carved from stone like a gargoyle. His skin was the color of a cave floor, like it was made from slate, with tiny ridges that swooped along his forearm, giving it a weathered look.

But that wasn’t the strangest or most captivating part of him. No, that was reserved for his eyes. It is said that the eyes are windows to the soul—but this apu’s eyes were more like actual windows to the outside. Like I was sitting in a tunnel looking outside to the clear blue, endless sky. Beautiful, eerie, intense.

The apu handed me a flyer and our fingers briefly touched. His skin didn't only look like a rock, it felt like it, too. Hard, rigid, like touching a moving stone. What's more, he had dust on his skin, and as I took the flyer a little bit of sand rolled down its front. This guy flaked sand like some humans flaked dandruff.

I read the flyer:

O³ cordially invites you to
THE END OF THE WORLD
When the gods left, they started an apocalypse.
We aim to finish it.

The O³ party—the first big party of the semester—was two days from now on the anniversary of the gods' GrandExodus.

And I was invited.

“So—you in?” His voice had an echo to it, like he was talking in a cave or something. It was a bit unsettling, because generally when one echo was present, all the ambient sounds echoed too. But here, it was only him. The general shuffle of students milling about was perfectly normal.

“Your voice ...” I said.

He smiled, like his voice was something that got him a lot of attention from ... well ... the girls. I guess we all have a shtick—and his was to impress the impressionable with his resonance. “I'm a cave apu—caves have echoes, hence my voice,” he reverberated. “Actually I was one of the twelve sacred apus of Cusco.” When I gave him a blank look, he followed up with, “Cusco was the capital of the Incan Empire in the fifteenth century.”

“Ahh, so a big deal. Five hundred years ago.”

“Oh, yeah—very big deal five hundred years ago,” he chuckled. Sticking out his hand, he said, “I'm Sal.”

“Oddly normal name for a guy like you, wouldn't you say?”

He gave me a shy smile and said, “My real name's Salkantay, as in the highest peak in the Vilcabamba mountain region. You know—the Peruvian Andes.”

I nodded. I'd been there. Granted, that was a hundred and eighty years ago, but still, I'd seen the place.

Sal closed his sky-like eyes for just a second, but I swear it felt like night had suddenly fallen. Then, opening them, a light sky with big puffy clouds returned. “Anyway,” he said, almost embarrassed, “the guys thought it was best to give me a more, ahhh, human name. You see Nate over there—he came up with Sal.” He pointed at the shortest of the Bros, a kid with brown hair cut in a buzz, and I could see genuine affection in those impossibly beautiful eyes of his. “I think they meant it to be ironic. Something so average for someone who looks so different. But I can tell you that I am very honored to be given such a normal name. It means they don’t see me as an Other, but as a friend.”

He’s right. The fact that those guys teased him by giving him such a boring name means they accepted him as one of them.

“Boring name?”

Damn it—talking out loud again. I could feel my cheeks flush with embarrassment. “ ‘Sal’ certainly isn’t Algernon or Constantine ... so yeah, boring.”

“Yeah, but these days I’ll take boring over the alternative.”

“I suppose,” I said.

“So, the party,” he said, tapping the flyer in my hands and sending another wave of sand down the paper. “It’s this Friday. Will you come?”

“Maybe ...” I said, throwing in as much coyness as I could.

Evidently, the coyness didn’t take, because he said, “Great, see you then,” and went on to hand another flyer to three girls behind me.

I folded the flyer and put it in my purse. I waved at Justin. He gave me a subtle nod as he continued to play wrestle with Nate without losing stride. If anything were to happen between Justin and me, it wouldn’t be now. And so, taking that as my cue, I headed out to the main campus, where I hesitated at the threshold. My foot nervously hovered just behind the line where the shade met the light. Like I said—old habits do die hard.

I took a deep breath and stepped into the light. Even though I knew I was human, I still breathed a sigh of relief that I didn’t burst into a ball of flames.

Yay, me!

Chapter 3

BEGGARS EVIDENTLY CAN BE CHOOSERS & EVEN COOL KIDS CAN BE AWKWARD

The sun didn't disintegrate me—so at least one thing was going my way today. I know it's irrational for me to be scared of natural light, but you have to understand that I was a vampire one minute and then a human the next, while fang-deep in some vicar's neck. It was like someone flipped a switch. On—vampire. Off—human.

If the vampire switch could be switched off, for all I knew it could be switched back on just as suddenly. And if I happened to be outside ... Great balls of flame à la moi!

I really should start walking around with an umbrella.

Just when that thought occurred to me, my eyes were drawn to the large oak tree in the center of the quad, beside that GoneGods-awful statue of the university founder, where I spotted three human hockey players tormenting some homeless guy. Except, given his unearthly pale white skin and ruby red eyes, this homeless man wasn't a man at all. He was an Other. A type of Other I'd never seen before.

I was pretty hip with Others—able to recognize most of them on sight, thank you very much—but this one alluded me. He didn't even have any of the telltale signs as to what religion or folklore he belonged to. There was no wispy mustache so typical of Chinese traditions, no protruding lower-jaw tusks most Japanese demons had and no animalistic and oddly two-dimensional attributes you found in most Egyptian Others.

Instead, he—I think he was a “he”—wore baggy white pants that were scuffed and dirty but when clean would have matched his impossibly white skin. He had a long-sleeve dirty white shirt on that looked more like undergarments than a proper top. His hair was also the same white as his skin, and because the coloring matched so perfectly, it looked more like strands of skin on his head than actual dead-skin-cells-and-keratin hair. In fact, the only thing he had on him that wasn't white was his cane—an oak-wood, crooked staff that looked too flimsy to actually support someone's body weight. Not that he had much weight to him. He was absolutely emaciated. The term skin-and-bones didn't do him justice. It was more like skin-sundried-on-bones. Poor guy must've been dying from hunger.

The lead human—a largish guy with black hair and the kind of nose that looked like it had been broken, set wrong, then broken again—kicked the homeless guy. “Get out of here, you freak!”

A second human—a smaller, skinny guy with blond hair tied back in a ponytail that, when he looks at pictures of himself when he is older, will be totally embarrassing—said, “Bad enough they let these freaks enroll in the school, but now we have to put up with their vagrants, too. Oh, hell no!” He emphasized this by spitting on the Other.

That was the last straw. I ran down the steps of the building, over to the tree, and grabbed the skinny guy. Using a move I learned from a judo master in Kyoto some hundred-and-fifty years ago, I pulled him back so that he fell over his own feet and tumbled backward.

I put myself between the other two humans and the Other and, summoning a real gem that I probably got from Degrassi: The Next Generation or Beverly Hills, 90210, said, “Why don’t you pick on someone your own size?” Stupid really, because I was picking a fight with them, and all three of these guys were way bigger than me. I really had to work on my vernacular.

The biggest one pointed at me and said, “Get out of our way, little girl. Otherwise—”

I grabbed his finger and twisted. This wasn’t a move from any martial art I knew, but more something I used against my little brother when I was human—three hundred years ago, sure, but it still did the trick. The big guy cried out in pain and tried to punch me with his free hand. I pulled back and kicked his chin, forcing his left leg out and his right knee down. Then when we were about eye-level, I punched him. Hard. In the nose.

There was a sickening crunch! Given how little power my punches usually packed—since I became human, at least—I must’ve been right about his nose being broken before. The thing crumpled like a paper cup. He dropped to the ground, blood pouring out of him.

His friend, a slightly smaller version of him, sized me up and decided to charge.

Using a move I learned from an aikido master in San Francisco (about forty years ago if you’re keeping track), I used his own momentum against him, guiding his body into the wall behind me. He hit face-first and dropped to his knees.

The ponytail guy stood up, saw his downed buddies and ran. The other two managed to collect themselves from the grass, the bigger guy still clutching his blood-gushing nose, and followed their friend. I half expected them to say something like “You haven’t see the last of us!” or “We’ll get you, just you wait and see!” but I didn’t get any of those cliché gems as they ran away.

Looking around to see if there were any other threats, I saw that a bunch of people were looking at me from all around the quad. And not just students. Professors, Others—heck, even Justin Truly was watching from the steps of the Arts Building across the quad. Suddenly, several of them started clapping, then hooting, then cheering.

I guess standing up for this Other was a ... good thing?

I realized something, blushing as my peers and professors clapped me on the back. I may not be the bee’s knees or smooth or even the cat’s pajamas, but I was heroic ... and in this new GoneGod world, that seemed to count for a lot.

After I gave a few bows and enthusiastic thumbs up, people went about their usual business. I turned to the homeless Other, fished through my bag and pulled out a granola bar that had been sitting at its bottom for weeks. I handed it to the guy, half-expecting him to eat it cellophane and all.

But he didn't. Instead, he read the wrapper in detail and, breathing a sigh of relief, handed the unopened granola bar back. "Thank you," he said.

"You can have it. I mean—eat it." I tried to hand it back.

The strange Other looked at me with a confused expression on his face. "I already did." He groaned. "Not very good."

"OK ..." I said with trepidation. I had to admit, though, that this guy looked a little better after having read the package. I was beginning to wonder if this weird Other didn't eat granola. Or oats. Or whatever this supposed nature bar was made of. Made sense—after all, you would no more give a rabbit steak than a lion a carrot. For some Others, eating mortal food was deadly. Maybe that's why this poor guy was so emaciated. Human food just didn't work for him.

"So, no granola?"

He shook his head. "No granola," he whispered.

"So what can you eat?"

"The truth?" The poor guy was so weak that he was having trouble speaking.

"Yeah, the truth," I said, trying to throw in as much empathy as I could. It was possible that this kind of Other ate something very unappealing to humans. Kappa ate algae. Pixies considered maggots a delicacy. And succubae ate— Well, succubae drew nourishment from sex. Besides, who was I to judge? For three hundred years I lived entirely off of human blood. Let she who is without sin cast the first stone. Stones firmly in pocket.

Being a bonified Homosapien and law-abiding citizen meant there was no way I could have sustained myself on pig and cow blood. Believe me, I tried, and it nearly killed me. But that's another story. As for these newly mortal Others, algae, maggots, and sex weren't something you could get at your local grocery store or farmer's market, so kappa learned to eat kale, pixies substituted nuts for maggots and succubae bought naughty mags for a quick snack. It must have been a rough existence, and there is rarely a day that goes by that I don't silently thank the GoneGods for taking their magic and turning me human again.

I looked down at him with an understanding smile, waiting for his answer, but the strange Other just groaned in response. OK—so be it. I took a mental picture of the guy, determined to figure out what he did eat and said, "I'll be back tomorrow. With real food. I promise."

His eyes glistened with gratitude.

I looked at my watch and saw that it was quarter past one. My next class started in fifteen minutes—no real chance to go to the library now. Especially because I had no idea where my next class was. I was really, really, really starting to regret not going to the orientation meet-up, but it was at eight in the morning—and I hadn't seen that ungodly hour in over three hundred years.

My map was a mess, especially because I had no idea where I was and there was no convenient “You are here” mark, no “Oak Tree Quad” conveniently labeled. Just when I was resolving myself to missing my second class on my first day, a hand snatched the map out of my hands.

“Hey,” I said, getting ready to kick someone in the shins ... until I saw who had grabbed the map. My demeanor immediately changed and I tried not to swoon too hard. “Hey, Justin.”

“That was pretty amazing of you,” he said.

“What was?”

“How you kicked those guys' asses. Total jerks, by the way.”

“Oh, that. They were being bullies. I hate bullies.”

“Me too.”

Oh, great. Something we have in common, I meant to think—but wound up saying out loud. Girl, get a grip!

“Yeah, we do, I suppose,” he said, eyeing me curiously. “I take it that outside of being scared of light, you're also a bit quirky, too.”

“You could say that,” I blushed. “Is that a bad thing?”

“No,” he said, “I like quirky. And I like cats ... so, we're good here.”

I felt my blush darken three shades.

“So—where are you going?”

“Going?” I said in an absentminded tone.

He held up the map.

“Oh, yeah—class. I've got Literary Theory in Alternative Cultures now, but I have no idea where I'm going.”

“That will be over here.” He pointed at a building on the map. “Here—I'll walk you.” He held out his arm like gentlemen used to do when inviting dames to dance in the 1800s. How retro of him.

Cute and helpless—works every time.

He looked at me, his eyebrow doing that dance again. “Excuse me?”

“Oh, nothing.”

I took his arm, and as I did, his O³ Bros sang out from the top of the hill: “Justin and Weird Girl sitting in a tree!” Neither of us said anything, but we both looked up and smiled. This would have been a perfect moment ... had it not been for the kid from West Africa staring down at me from behind the others on the hill.

That guy was really starting to give me the creeps.

Chapter 4

LIBRARIES DON'T JUST HAVE BOOKS, YOU KNOW

My second class went a lot smoother than my first one. No mishaps with cute football players, no speaking my thoughts aloud and drawing all the class's attention on me. And no jumping at the sight of light. I'm particularly proud of that last one.

With class over, I checked my schedule: no more classes today. In fact, my next class wasn't until three p.m. the next day. Sheesh ... university life. I had fifteen hours of lectures and that was it. What was a girl supposed to do with all this free time?

I hefted the monstrosity my professor called a textbook, considered all the articles that were supplemental material (plus, let's not forget the five essays in this class alone) and realized that if I wanted to do well here, I knew exactly how I was supposed to use the rest of my time.

Reading, writing ... and not sleeping.

It was day one and I already knew that all the parties, boys and fun that Animal House, the Van Wilder series and Revenge of the Nerds promised were lies.

As they say in my native Scotland: Nay bother. I wanted to do well. I needed to do well.

I will do well here, I told myself, even if it kills me.

Time to hit the books. After, that was, I kept my promise to that pale white Other and figured out what he ate.

Either way, it was off to the library for me.

Finding the library was a lot easier than finding my last class. For one thing, it was the biggest building on campus, and for another, you could see all those books through the windows. No map necessary.

I walked inside and to the directory. In the old days—and mind you, by “old days” I mean five years ago, just before the Others came—you couldn't find an entire library section dedicated just to mythical creatures. That stuff was usually distributed between sections: the classics would house information about the Greeks and Romans; the Asian Studies section would have all the stuff about Japanese, Chinese, Indian and other Asian countries and religions; and if your library had a children's section (this university, surprisingly enough, did not), that's where you'd find most other fairytales. But these days, all those books were collected into one department, aptly called: Other Studies. Bingo, I thought. Or did I say it out loud?

The Other Studies library was so big that it had its own building. An old converted church that was on the main campus right next to the Arts Building. It was easily half a football field, three floors high, the upper levels wrap-around balconies looking out into the center of the library where all the study tables sat. Dozens of bookshelves lined both sides of the study area and, from my angle, I could see that several dozens more shelves were on the upper levels.

I'd never seen so many books in one place.

I didn't know what heaven was like—and now that it's closed, I guess I never will. But I imagined it to be this place.

When I was a vampire, I spent a lot of time in libraries. This was before television, remember, and I was really into reading, devouring every book I could get my hands on. I did also eat the occasional bookworm—I don't know what it was, but humans who were into reading tasted sweet, like sucking on a mango.

So walking into the place, my heels lightly tapping on old, worn marble, its soft tones echoing off of wooden shelves that housed well-loved books—well, for the first time since I'd become a university student, I felt at home. I closed my eyes, lifted my hands from my side and spread out my fingers so that I could absorb this place all the more.

Of course, I thought, I'm not really absorbing anything, but it still feels good to try to soak it all in and—

“Ahem.”

I opened my eyes to see several people sitting at the study tables staring at me. A few were suppressing giggles, but most just gawked at me, like I was a freak or something. And they were right—I was talking out loud again, and according to TV and movies, only freaks and the criminally insane talked to themselves.

There was a second “Ahem” and I turned to see an old man standing near an old oak desk. He was staring at me over the rim of his reading glasses, his bald head reflecting the lights overhead. He did up the top button of his jacket and pointed a weathered finger at a sign.

PLEASE BE RESPECTFUL OF THOSE STUDYING.

“Sorry,” I whispered and walked to the back of the room, now very conscious of the tapping my heels made with every step.

When I made it to the back of the library, I saw that books weren't the only things this massive library housed. Toward the back of the main floor were numerous rows of display cases. I walked over and found that they housed hundreds of artifacts. Some of them I recognized: an old Bleeder vampire's pricked their victims with when they wanted to slowly drain them overnight; a spiked silver collar mages used to control their pet werewolves; an obsidian ceremonial blade once used for human sacrifice; a Horn of Abundance that the desert-wandering nasnas blew to summon their nightly feasts.

They even had several of King Solomon's rings, each of their rubies trapping a protective spirit that would do the wearer's bidding. I wondered if the rings still possessed the trapped spirits ... not that it mattered. It would take powerful magic to release them—and powerful magic was in short supply these days.

But the artifacts and rings were just the tip of the mythical-artifacts iceberg. Most of this stuff I had no idea about, but this much was clear—a lot of Others donated a lot of their stuff to this place.

I walked among the artifacts, some impossibly old, others once supremely magical in nature, in awe until I wove my way to the back display, where I saw something that I never expected to see again in my life. Right there in a display case that hung on the back wall was a full Scottish uniform from the late 1800s, complete with tartan, ghillie brogues, sporran, kilt pin and dirk. I don't think it would have stood out so much if it wasn't for the fact that it was my clan's tartan—when I had a clan to call my own.

But it was more than just seeing the old crisscrossed bands of color that made up my clan's pattern. You see, at the foot of the display sat a faceplate that I hadn't seen in centuries. The faceplate façade covered the wearer's face from hairline to chin, and because it was made of iron, it also protected the wearer from attacks. That thing was built for battle. Not that you would assume so by looking at it. It was designed to look like a baby's face, complete with rosy cheeks and an innocent smile that a fool would interpret as friendly. I recognized the mask immediately. It was my father's ... and what he wore the night he hunted me down in the Grey Friar's abbey.

The night I killed him.

As I took a step closer to the display case, still lost in thought, I suddenly sensed a presence behind me. What the—?

“Can I help you with anything?”

I turned. It was just the old librarian, standing directly behind me. The old guy either had the prowess of a cat or I was too distracted to sense him behind me—probably the latter, from the look of him. Either way, he scared the bejesus out of me.

“What?” I yelped.

He lifted a finger over his lips, then in a whisper repeated, “Can I help you with anything?”

He was so close that I could smell the mint coolness of a lozenge still on his breath. He also had that old man smell to him, but not in that I’m-over-medicated-sick-and-waiting-to-die kind of smell. This smell said, This body has seen and done a lot in its years, and those experiences have been soaked into my bones. Hey, don’t judge me—as a vampire, smell was very important to me. Like a wine connoisseur’s nose, mine told me a lot about the person I was about to eat.

Old habits, and all that.

“No talking, remember?” I mouthed, giving him a serious look.

At this, he let out a muted laugh; a warm smile overtook his features. “There are degrees to which a rule can be bent without breaking it. If we are respectful, no one will mind our whispers.”

“Oh, OK,” I mouthed and turned back to the display.

He walked up to the hanging uniform and adjusted his glasses as he took a closer look. “Ahh ... this is an old tartan, old indeed. It was donated to the library by the Divine Cherubs—an ancient order of vampire hunters. It belongs to their founder, one Eoghan McMahon from the clan—”

“Blane.”

He lifted a curious eyebrow. “Correct. But that is not a common clan, and the crest had been modified to represent his mission to vanquish demons. How did you ...?”

“I’m half Scottish. My dad was really into our clan’s history. I grew up learning all the patterns.”

“I see,” he said, still wearing a skeptical look. “Well, then you have heard of the great Eoghan McMahon ... it is believed he was the first Scottish vampire hunter, and the man who ultimately created the Order of the Divine Cherub.” He walked up to the display and pointed at the mask. “A baby’s face. Or more to the point—a cherub’s face. Hence the order’s name. Legend has it they wore masks like this when hunting. Angels to exorcise demons, you see.”

I sighed in grief, but the old librarian must have interpreted my exhalation as one of a bored teenager. “Don’t dismiss them too quickly,” he said. “After all, we now know that vampires and demons are real. The Order of the Divine Cherub fought them in the shadows for centuries.” The old man tapped the glass, then gave a low chuckle. “Of course, now they mostly meet in log cabins, drink whisky and talk about the good old days—but make no mistake, back in said good old days, they were a force to be reckoned with.”

I know that better than most, I thought—and did not speak aloud, thankfully.

The old librarian pointed at my father’s tartan. “Eoghan McMahon,” he said with reverence in his voice. “Legend has it his daughter was turned and—”

“And in his grief and rage, he dedicated his life to eliminating the vampire kind from the Earth. Yep—I know all about it,” I said with a sad familiarity. “A lifetime spent avenging his daughter, only to be taken down by her in Edinburgh on the night of Hogmanay.”

The librarian nodded, his look of skepticism returned. “Scotland’s New Year’s. He did disappear on that night, never to be seen or heard from again ... but there is no record of what happened that night. As far as the historians know, he simply disappeared. Of course, rumors abounded, but ...” He took a step forward so that he could get a good look at me. “Is there something you can contribute to his history? Something that his descendants know but has not necessarily been adopted into canon?”

“Ahh, no,” I lied. “It was just what my dad said happened. You know—a romantic ending to the vampire hunter. That kind of stuff.”

“Your father sounds like a poet.”

“You have no idea,” I said, looking at the tartan. When I was a vampire, the sight of his mask stirred no emotion in me. But now that I was human again ... I had to fight to hold in the tears. I don’t think I would have been able to do it, except for the old librarian. I couldn’t risk him suspecting what I was.

So I took in a deep breath and, summoning all the cold-hearted steel I could find in my soul, asked, “How did you get this?”

“It was donated, just as all the artifacts here were,” the old librarian said. “Most of this came from Others who now live among us—little keepsakes that were on their person when the gods left. And some of it had been passed down generation to generation, humans who had brushes with the creatures behind the veil. But now that the veil is gone, I guess they no longer felt the need to hold on to these artifacts and donated them to this display. Perhaps it helped them move on with their new lives.”

“I see. But you don’t know who donated this particular tartan, do you? So I can tell my father,” I quickly added. The truth was I was curious—I had no siblings, and as for my mom ... when I turned and my father insisted on hunting me, I did the most passive-aggressive thing I could do to him—I turned my mother, too. It was one thing losing me, but losing the love of his life to his only daughter, that must have hurt him very deeply. Exactly what Vampire Katrina McMahon was trying to do.

The old librarian looked at the display’s accompanying plaque. “It doesn’t say. I can look it up for you, but I’ll have to dig into the archives. I would be willing to do that for you later tonight.”

“That would be grand,” I said.

“Grand? That word was antiquated when I was a child.”

I blushed. “What can I say, I watch a lot of old movies.”

“I see,” he said. “Now that we have had our little chat, perhaps you can answer my original question.”

“What’s that?”

“Is there anything I can help you with?”

I told the old librarian about the strange, pale Other—what he looked like, what he wore—and as I spoke, the elderly man picked up book after book, leafing through them as he tried to find the creature I described. After several books were pulled down from their shelves, the old librarian put his finger on a page from an old leather-bound tome and asked, “Pale white, you said?”

“You said that he had a cane with him?”

“Not a very good one. It looked like it would crack under his weight—even if he only weighs sixty pounds soaking wet.”

“So it might not be a cane at all.”

“Possibly, but he holds on to it like it’s the only thing he has left in this world. Whatever it is, he values it.”

The librarian turned his book around and showed me a picture of a pale white Other riding a pale white horse, bow in hand. “Is it possible that the staff isn’t a staff at all, but rather an unstrung bow?”

I took the book from him to study the image closer. The creature on the horse was white, but unlike the creature I’d helped, this being was proud, strong and slightly overweight. “I guess,” I said uncertainly.

Coming around to look at the book with me, the librarian said, “Mergen. A Turkish being of wisdom. I believe that we’ve found your Other.”

“But it says here that Mergen was a god.”

“So?”

“So the gods are gone.”

“Ahh. Therein lies the rub—the gods are gone. But not all their avatars are.”

“Excuse me?”

“Avatars, Earthly representations of the gods. Most gods did not have avatars, but the ones that did often left theirs behind. After all, why would they need an Earthly representative when there was no guarantee that where they were going would have an Earth?”

“I know what an avatar is, I’ve seen the movie. So these avatars, are they like the gods’ Firsts?”

“Not it is my turn to say, ‘Excuse me?’ ”

I laughed softly. I was starting to like this old guy. “In a duel, when you were either too scared or too busy to participate yourself, you sent in your First. This guy is the god Mergen’s First.”

“Exactly. A First—that term is quite tragic, especially in this context.”

“Ahh, my dad—”

“The romantic.”

“Yeah, him. He was also a history buff. You know, one of those guys who’d dress up like a knight on the weekends and go ...”

The librarian nodded, smiling. “LARPing. Live Action Role Playing. I know the type.”

I diverted my gaze back to the book, pretending to be embarrassed rather than a liar. I wasn’t used to lying so much. If I ever needed to get out of a tight situation before, I usually just ripped off someone's head and had a quick snack.

I looked at the image of the proud being riding that magnificent horse. "How sad."

"How sad indeed," the librarian echoed. I looked up, confused by his response. He gave me a knowing smile and said, "How sad that a creature, once-upon-a-time proud and important, be reduced to a beggar, unable to defend himself against three scared human teenagers."

"Unable, or unwilling," I said.

"Hmm?" He lifted an old, gray eyebrow. "Elaborate."

"This Other's bow tells us he's a warrior, and myth tells us he's a sage—in other words, the wise warrior. And what do all wise warriors have in common? They only fight when there are no other options. Mergen knows that if he retaliates against those bullies, he will only scare them more. So they'll come back with more force, and it will never end. He also knows he can't kill them. Not in the GoneGod world. That would only cause more fear, more hatred."

"So he takes the beating."

"Because he is wise enough to know that in the long run, that is his best option."

"That hardly seems fair," the librarian said. "And not every Other agrees. If you watch the news, we see plenty of Others fighting back."

"Which is good for the individual, but not the group. Overall, they're making it worse for other Others. The Others have to first prove they're not a threat before we can start talking about what's fair."

"Indeed," the librarian sighed. "Fairness will only come to them after they endure much that is not fair. So if an Other cannot fight back using their fists and weapons, how, then, do they fight back? After all, they cannot exist as humanity's whipping dogs forever."

"No, they can't," I agreed.

"So?"

I don't know what to tell this old librarian, I thought. It's not like I have all the answers. Besides, what he's asking doesn't have an answer. Not yet. The Others will have to wait and see what happens and—

"I disagree," he said, eyeing me curiously. "And I don't appreciate being called 'this old librarian.' "

Crap, I'd been talking out loud again.

"Then again—I am old, and a librarian ..."

"Ahh, I'm sorry. I meant to think that, not say it."

"Doesn't make me less old."

I chuckled at this, glad he wasn't taking what I'd said too seriously. "Granted. But I don't know your name, and the 'old' thing ... well, I tend to think out loud. A lot, and not on purpose. Sorry about that. It's a bad habit that I'm working on—"

"Please don't," he said, his eyes serious. "Those thoughts you accidentally share are always the honest ones. This world needs more people saying what they think and thinking what they say. And as for my name: Old Librarian will do ... for now.” He put out his hand.

I never thought about it that way before, but he was right. Over my three hundred years, I spent a lot of time without any living person in sight. Talking to myself was always a way to combat the loneliness. But what came out tended to upset me and I’d have long, bitter arguments—my voice unwaveringly honest, versus my rationalizing, compromising inner thoughts.

I looked at his hand for a long moment before taking it in mine. “Nice to meet you, Old Librarian.”

“And nice to meet you, Peculiar Girl. Now that those pleasantries are out of the way, I wish to disagree with your earlier point. ‘Wait and see’ is not all they can do. Far from it.”

“I don’t see what else they can do. Not without causing a lot of harm to themselves.”

“True, change is hard. Still, there are ways to minimize the ire they will inevitably draw on themselves as they work for a brighter future. Organized protest and passive resistance, to name a few.”

“Like the Suffragettes and Civil Rights movements. Like Gandhi. Mandela.”

“Yes, but those are grand examples. Back when I ran my congregation, I saw many brave men and women who fought for equal rights in small but very meaningful ways. There were plenty of Rosa Parks refusing to go to the back of the bus that never made it to the news. Plenty of brave souls who stood up to bullying without ever being recognized for their bravery. And no single one of them invoked change. But the sum of their deeds ... that is another story altogether.”

I didn’t know what he meant by that, but I nodded anyway. I’d mull over his words later. Turning back to the book, I said, “If you’re right and he is Mergen’s avatar, we still don’t know what he eats. All it says is that he’s Turkish and that he’s the deity of Wisdom and Abundance.”

“That’s a start, isn’t it?”

“I guess.” I pulled my purse over my shoulder. I supposed figuring out what that poor Other ate would take some time. “Thank you,” I said, and started for the door. I stopped with one more burning question I had to ask. “You referred to your congregation. So you were a priest before, you know, you became the Old Librarian?” I said, smiling.

He stared at me over the rims of his glasses. “Who said I am no longer a priest?”

“You did. You referred to your congregation in the past tense.”

“Indeed—but only because the flock has thinned after God’s GrandExodus. But His absence doesn’t mean that I don’t have faith anymore. Quite the opposite, in fact. I now have proof that the god I devoted my life to is real.”

“And gone,” I said, regretting my words instantly. I was being rude.

He nodded at this, giving me a patient smile. “And gone—you are quite correct. But my faith was not contingent on His presence before He left. That has not changed just because I know He is gone.”

“So why have it? Faith? Sounds like an unnecessary burden.”

“Perhaps—but then again, our past defines our future, no matter how hard we try to bury it.”

I looked over at my father's tartan. "Maybe. But some of that stuff is best left in the past."

"Perhaps. But then again, perhaps not. You have a keen mind. Tell me, do you have a campus job, Miss ...?"

"I thought we weren't doing names, Old Librarian."

"I promise to call you Peculiar Girl, no matter what your name is. I ask for different reasons." He paused, waiting expectantly.

I obliged. "Darling. Katrina Darling."

"What a pretty real name you have, Peculiar Girl," he smirked, not unkindly. "You have a keen mind, and your banter is something I think I would enjoy. Do you have a job? Or rather, would you like one?"

"A job?"

"I need someone to help me catalog and organize this place. The pay is abysmal and the job can take you into the wee hours of the night—but you will have unfettered access to all this." He gestured around him to the shelves of books bursting with knowledge and the display cases packed with history. "And perhaps we will have time to debate the past and contemplate the future while enjoying the present."

That would be nice, I thought. "I like working nights," I finally said. "I'm kind of an insomniac."

"Very well then. I shall put your name down as the new assistant librarian. Officially it is ten hours a week, which means I will only pay you for a fraction of the time you'll be working."

"Great," I said, wondering if great was the right response when basically agreeing to be an indentured slave.

"Great, indeed. Address?"

"Gardner Hall. Room zero-zero-one."

He wrote that down on a little notepad he'd pulled from his breast pocket and said, "You start tomorrow."

He stuck out his hand. I shook it, then headed to the door. At the threshold, I stopped. I wanted to turn around and tell him how he made this scared freshman feel welcome and how much I appreciated having not only a job but a bit of a purpose in my new life. But instead, all I mustered was an awkward "Ahh ... thanks," before leaving.

If I had known that would be the last time I'd see Old Librarian alive, I would have maybe tried to say something a little bit more meaningful.

And I would have asked him for his real name.

PART II

PROLOGUE

He stands perfectly still in the moonlit night, near the statue of the university founder. He is under the canopy of the large oak tree and is facing west because although it is near midnight, the moon has yet to fully rise. That will happen in the coming hour. For now, he stands and waits.

He waits for the moon.

And for it to call to him.

In the old days, he would have assumed the form of a hyena with his fellow pack members. They would have all faced west, just as he is now, together waiting for the moon to reach its apex. They would have then sung out to her in pitch-perfect unison, thanking her for her lunar light under which they would hunt.

They would praise her beauty and love her for being the mother of night.

Then the pack would let the frenzy of the hunt take over.

But that was years ago, before the gods left. Now that the gods are gone, his pack has disbanded. Some embraced their humanity. Some left the old lands to seek new opportunities in this new GoneGod world. Some refused to accept the change and still go out nightly to praise the moon goddess. And some could not handle the change, choosing forever-lasting death over this new life.

But Egya—Egya is different. A hybrid among his fellow hyenas. He chose to both embrace his humanity and honor his past. The gods may be gone—but the moon goddess still hangs above him. Of that much he is sure.

The moon is nearing her apex—in moments she will have fully risen. Egya is preparing his howl, summoning the low guttural hum within.

It is good that he is alone in this field. His roar is mighty and it would scare any human unfortunate to happen by.

But just as he is about to unleash his howl, he sniffs someone approaching.

He does not need to see her to know who she is: the Other pretending to be a human. The one who lost her magic, just like him. Moving with the silence of an experienced predator, he stalks around the tree, out of her sight. Then he stands perfectly still, tracking her movements not with sight and only partially with hearing.

He mostly tracks her with smell. The gods may have taken his hyena form from him, but they did not take his superior sense of smell—not all of it, at least.

She stops by the statue, some trace of her former instinct telling her someone is near. But she embraces her human side far too much, and she suppresses her instincts, choosing to ignore them and move on rather than stay and explore possible dangers.

Egya lets out a low disapproving growl. Her past—her Otherness—it is a gift. A gift she denies.

And this angers the former were-hyena.

This angers him greatly.

PART III

Chapter 5

ROOMMATES RUMINATE

I got back to the dorms at dusk and saw with alarm that my dorm room door was open, which could only mean one of two things: I was being robbed, or my roommate had finally chosen to show up.

Reassuring myself that the old days of constantly being under attack were over, I walked to the threshold and looked in. When signing up for the dorms, I had two choices to make:

Would I accept a Co-Ed floor? Check.

And would I be happy having an Other roommate? Check.

The dorm admissions board put me on an all-girls floor (although the floors above were full of rowdy boys), but as for my second check, looking inside, I could clearly see they had taken me at my word. The person unpacking wasn't human.

Not by a long shot.

She was a bit taller than me with pointy ears and an impossibly perfect body. Athletes could work out all day and night and still not come close to the frame and muscle tone of this creature. I knew this right away because she was standing naked in my room. Other than that, she looked human enough, although no one would ever mistake her for one, unless they assumed she was a human twelve pies short of a baker's dozen. Her ... ahh ... quirks immediately disqualified her as a member of humanity.

I groaned as I watched her unpack her peculiar possessions. Of all the Others I could have been paired with, they had to put me in a room with a member of the fae—specifically, a changeling. A changeling currently severely messing up the feng shui vibes of my room.

She was stapling Astroturf to our walls.

Fae were obsessed with the outdoors; they drew their strength from the natural world. And changelings were of the warrior variety, which meant their homes needed to be of the earth and soil and loam, so they could easily heal themselves after a battle, or some hippie crap like that.

Not that that mattered anymore. For one thing, their gods—just like everyone else's gods—were gone. So no more glorious battles to heal from, and no more magical natural medicine. Besides, her roommate—me—wasn't fae. I was a human girl. OK—granted an ex-vampire human girl, but a human girl, nonetheless. I definitely wouldn't appreciate finding worms and fungus on the walls.

There was a wheel barrel in the center of my room with one of those large rolls of Astroturf used on football pitches. The changeling was using her unnaturally powerful body to unroll the bales and stick them to the walls. Mud was everywhere and the grass—which, I was tempted to remind her, was meant to be on the ground, horizontal—was falling onto the floor faster than she could put it up. Clearly, this frustrated the process, but she was damn persistent; she just sprayed the walls with water from a misting bottle, trying to get the soil to clump. Drops of dirty water were streaming down the walls and—

No way ... was that my brand new Hermes beige leather jacket on the floor?!

I darted in, picking it up, shaking it to get the dirt off.

She turned and gave me the biggest smile like she hadn't just destroyed our room with dirt and grass and staples. "Oh, hello!" she said. "I was wondering when you would make your entrance."

Not sure what my face looked like when she said that, but I'm sure it was a healthy mix of incredulous and enraged.

She didn't seem to notice, because she stuck out her hand and said with a lilting Irish accent, "I'm Deirdre."

I looked at her hand, not taking it. Honestly, I was more likely to bite it than shake it. After a long awkward moment, she retracted it, peering at her hand as if it had broken down. "The Being Human handbook said that humans greet one another with handshakes, but we did not. Did I do it wrong? Was I meant to wait for you to offer your hand because you were the new one to arrive? Or perhaps—"

"You didn't do it wrong," I said. Fae—sticklers for protocols. And this one was trying to learn human like an etiquette. "It's just that ..." I gestured helplessly around me.

"Oh, yes. I got these rolls of grass from something called a hardware store. Strange name, given the softness of the grass." She picked up a handful and took a deep breath in. "Perhaps you could aid me—I'm having trouble getting it to stick to the walls. You wouldn't happen to have the appropriate adhesive?"

When I shook my head, she handed me the staple gun.

I swear to the GoneGods I thought about shooting her with it.

But instead, like a good little ex-vampire, I put it on my desk, counted to three and asked, "And why do you want it to stick to the walls?"

"Decoration," she said. Her hands pointed at the walls, and I couldn't help but noticing her laboratory-perfect nipples pointed at me.

I looked back up at her face. GoneGodDammit, I wasn't going to have one of those cliché "college experiences" just because my roommate was a frigging supermodel—a supermodel that didn't seem to own a scrap of clothing.

"I'm pretty sure we're not allowed to staple the wall with grass," I said.

"We're not?" she said with genuine confusion.

"For one thing, we're not allowed to put holes in the walls—so that's a no to the staple gun." I had to hand it to myself. I was remarkably calm, given how angry I was. “For another, we’re meant to keep our rooms clean. Which means no mud ... and definitely nothing that can grow mold.”

“But mold isn’t dirty—it’s natural, and the right kinds have many healing properties. Of course, there is poisonous mold. I used them to line my weapons and—”

“That’s a third thing we’re not allowed. Weapons.”

“Not even broadswords?” She turned away and bent over, giving me a perfect view of her ... well, let’s just say I’ve now seen the “dark side of the moon,” and it actually isn’t all that bad. Reaching under her bed, she pulled out this huge broadsword that would have made Braveheart’s rapier seem like a toothpick in comparison. “It’s more ceremonial than used in actual battle. That said, I did wield this when facing off against a horde of golems. Funny story—”

“No broadswords. No grass on the wall.”

“You mean no decorations at all? Even my poster?” She pointed her broadsword at the wall behind me—barely giving me time to duck out of the way—where a poster of Ryan Reynolds hung, stapled to the wall.

“Seriously?”

“Oh, yes,” she swooned, putting a hand on her breast—or her heart, I suppose. “He’s so handsome he is almost elf-like. One day I will be Mrs. Reynolds ...”

I rolled my eyes. Fae. Of their many-faceted quirks, falling in love with an image was probably their strangest. And the love was real. At least for them. I looked up at the poster in true sympathy. Ryan Reynolds would most likely be filing a restraining order against this changeling at some point in the future.

Then I looked at her perfect naked body and thought, Then again, maybe not.

Either way, that wasn’t my problem right now. My problem was that this changeling was tracking dirt everywhere. “I’m sorry to keep interrupting you,” I said, “but ...” I pointed at the ground around me.

She gave me a confused look.

“You’re going to have to clean all this up?” I clarified.

“Really?” she said, her voice full of despair.

“I don’t mind, but humans have rules and—”

“I broke them. First day here and I’m already screwing this up.” A tear rolled down her cheek. “Being mortal is hard,” she said, plopping herself onto her bed and sending up a fresh shower of loose soil.

I felt for her. Really, I did, despite the ruined jacket still in my hand. I was finding mortality hard, too, and I was human ... well, I was born human, at least. That gave me a lot more experience at it than her. I sat next to her and put a hand on her shoulder, still acutely aware of her nudity. Damn, even her skin felt like it was manufactured in a lab. “Mortality does bite, Deirdre—but I’m here to help. If you have any mortality questions, just ask me. I’ll steer you right.”

“You will?”

“Cross my heart.” I dropped my jacket back to the floor and made an X on my heart.

She looked at me curiously. Before she could ask, I said, “It’s a human expression. Means ‘I promise.’ A slightly old expression. Probably had its heyday thirty years ago, but—”

The changeling wrapped her arms around me and hugged me so tight I struggled to breathe. Damn, she was strong, too. “Thank you, thank you, thank you!”

I’d never been hugged by a naked fae before. It was nicer than I’d expected.

After a long second, she pulled away and put her hand over her heart—a common fae salute. “Thank you, human girl. In return for your generous offer, I give you my sword arm. This is my pledge to you. This is my ...” She loosened her fist and made an X over her left boob—erm, I mean her heart. “This is my heart-cross to you.”

Oh, yay ... day one and I’d already got a warrior fae as a protector.

Maybe college wouldn’t be so bad after all.

Chapter 6

DAYSTALKER, NIGHTWALKER

I helped my changeling roommate clean up and take everything outside, which involved convincing her first to put on some clothes and then not to sniff, pick at or eat the grass as we carried it outside. She really struggled with this last part; twice I caught her stuffing a handful of soil and grass into her pockets. It was slow work, but eventually we managed to get it all outside.

Unfortunately, we didn't manage to accomplish this before some of the other girls on the floor started to make fun of us. They mocked us from a safe distance (they, too, were acutely aware of Deirdre's powerful build) with comments like "Look at her ears" or "Eat dirt much?" Not particularly witty, but these humans were wary of picking a fight with Deirdre and, if they were totally honest with themselves, they were probably all jealous of how beautiful she was. The perfectly lithe body, high cheekbones, rosy cheeks, lush blond hair and inviting smile ... the perfect recipe for beauty. And they knew it.

So the girls stood in little clusters and watched us. Safety in numbers, I guess—schoolgirl bullying 101.

Only one of the girls broke away from a cluster of her peers to help out by giving Deirdre a plot of soil that had fallen out of the wheel barrel. She was a mousey little thing with amber hair and thick black glasses. She scurried away the second Deirdre said "Thank you." Deirdre looked hurt.

"They'll get used to you," I said. "And as soon as some more Others show up, you won't be the only freakshow on display here."

"Freak?" she asked. "What is this 'freak' you speak of?"

"You know—stranger, non-human, different. Freak."

"I see," she said and picked her wheel barrel back up. "We are freaks."

" 'We'?" I said, slightly offended.

"Me because I'm an Other. You because you help Others."

I sighed. "That's me, human freak at your service."

After helping Deirdre get the Astroturf out of our room, I left her to sweep up and went for a walk.

She was pretty upset having lost all her earth and grass, but she seemed to accept that this new GoneGod world had different rules. That said, I was pretty sure that I'd come home to her having stuffed her mattress with the leftover dirt—but at least I got most of it out of the room. Small victories.

Tomorrow, I'd figure out a way to get her to give up her broadsword. After that, we'd move on to the smaller stuff, like wearing clothes and how most of nature belonged outside.

Baby steps, Kat. Baby steps.

It was late—almost midnight—and most of the campus was closed up. The only place that was still open was Gerts, the campus bar, and given that it was a Tuesday night, even Gerts wouldn't be open much longer. Besides, I didn't feel like a drink. I was of the legal age—according to the moral law, in the province of Quebec, all you needed to be was eighteen.

I was nineteen.

By now, I'm sure you would correct me on that one: I was actually over three hundred years old. But the way I figured it, I was—biologically speaking—still only nineteen. I was turned at fifteen, so I figured when I returned to being human again, I would start aging from that point. I'd been human for four years since the GrandExodus—so four plus fifteen. Nineteen.

My math skills were impeccable. I was sure to make the Dean's list.

Anyway, that's how I saw it, but I wasn't sure how the rest of the world saw it. You see, ever since the Others came, moral law was challenged on multiple levels. Legal definitions had to be broadened and bastardized and reevaluated to include Earth's newest residents.

But society was still too busy dealing with angels, minotaurs, wendigos, avatars and all sorts of OnceImmortals. We half-breeds were largely ignored—partly because we were technically human, but mostly because we never went into the limelight. After centuries of hiding from humans, we were pretty good at confining ourselves to the darkness.

I walked down the hill toward the university main campus and took a deep breath. Autumn was on its way, which, being in Montreal, meant that real cold was coming. Mont-Royal was a university town with four major universities within its city limits. I went to McJames—the best of the bunch (or at least that's what other McJames students say).

Mont-Royal itself wasn't a bad place to live. European feel with North American sensibility; friendly people, not too smug; lots of bars, clubs and other places for frustrated locals to let off some steam. When I was a vampire, this would have been ideal hunting grounds. As a student, Mont-Royal was ideal party grounds. Funny how the two go hand-in-hand.

But partying and hunting aside, what made Mont-Royal special was that it was built on (and around) an inactive volcano. I wish it were a dead volcano, but it wasn't. Not that anyone was worried, though. Montreal's volcano hadn't shown any signs of activity since I was born—yeah, three centuries ago. That was a good indicator that it was safe enough, right?

Then again ...

Four years ago, mythical creatures barely showed any activity on Earth, either.

And look at where we were now.

But still, a volcano was a volcano, and the locals, several decades ago, decided to hedge their it-won't-erupt bets by putting a cross at its very top. A Christian, neon-lit, bigger-than-an-upright-bus, vampire-burning cross.

And this was the city I chose to move to?

What's more—I actually lived on the volcano. If you walked up the hill, past the Royal Vic Hospital, past the McJames football stadium, you entered McJames University dorm territory. If this volcano erupted soon, us freshmen would be the first victims. Seems fitting, if you think about it.

McConnell, Molson, Gardner and Douglas Halls all sat about halfway up the hill with a large circular cafeteria that was cutting-edge architectural design ... in the 1950s. I lived in Gardner—the dorm that was the absolute closest you could find a residence to that beacon of a cross.

Every time I trekked up the hill, staring at that cross, I would just think to myself that moving here was some inner penitence or something. You don't spend three centuries as a murderous immortal demon without developing some inner masochist.

I walked onto the main campus field, which never seemed to close—too many late-night studies—and passed by Gill McJames' statue. The Scotsman explorer was a short stout man, holding his pioneer hat against the wind, cane planted firmly on the ground in one hand, the other pointing straight ahead. It wasn't a grand statue or anything. The guy was my height, and I was born in eighteenth-century Scotland—we were a lot shorter than today's average human.

I gave my fellow Highlander a pat on the head. Immediately, the hair on the back of my neck stood up. In the past, that was what happened when danger or potential prey was nearby, like a vampire's sixth sense. Maybe late studiers were finally going home, or perhaps two lovebirds were making out in the moonlight.

But I saw no moonlight lovers, no late studiers walking home, nobody. In fact, I noticed for the first time that everything around me was eerily dark—no lights, no noise, all the buildings long abandoned. I take that back. There was one light on the main floor of the Other Studies library. I guess my senses were on the fritz.

Oh well.

I peered closer at the Other Studies building. Seems the Old Librarian was still up, and I wondered if he'd be up for a visit. Maybe he would finally be able to tell me how he got my father's tartan.

Besides, I thought (out loud, probably), I'm his newest employee ... and technically it is tomorrow.

The library had one of those old wooden church doors. From the front, I couldn't see inside—all the large windows were on the sides of the building, with only two slender stained-glass displays on either side of the door.

I tried the door. Locked.

I jogged back to where I'd been to look up at window again, but there wasn't enough light to make out what was happening inside. At this point, I usually would have just given up and called it a night, but I wasn't especially looking forward to finding Deirdre naked in our dorm again (I swear! I wasn't!), and something about this whole thing was starting to make me feel uneasy. That vampire sixth sense, again, maybe? I jogged to the front door again and, pulling back on the iron knocker just within reach, I knocked on the door and waited.

Nothing.

I was about to give up when I felt the hairs on the back of my neck stand up. When I was a predator, those hairs saved me more than once. Up until now, I had assumed they were a part of my vampiric nature. Either I had carried over some of that nature with me or that tingly feeling was my human part all along.

Either way, I had learned to trust that instinct. The door was locked, nobody was answering the knocker ... I scrutinized every inch of the door and the surrounding façade. I spotted a mail flap near the bottom of the door. I pushed it open and peered inside. Two desk lamps were lit in the study area, but from this angle, their light only revealed a couple cushy armchairs and an empty fireplace. Nothing of interest.

But I could smell something.

A smell I knew very well.

Human blood.

Chapter 7

VAMPIRES AREN'T ONLY HUMANS

Human blood. Unmistakable ... I should know. I only spent the last few centuries guzzling it down like a camel in the desert. A ... vampire camel? Whatever. Poor simile, but you get the point.

Smelling it as a human was completely different than drinking it as a vampire. As a vampire, the smell excited me, intoxicated me—drove me mad with insatiable desire. But as a human, the smell of blood made me wretch and the thought of tasting the crimson liquid made my stomach twist with nausea.

Get over it, girl, I thought as I tried to find a way into the library. It's probably nothing too serious. I tried to comfort myself with the thought that the Old Librarian had merely fallen and hit his head. That the smell of blood came from a head wound, and not a gaping throat or severed carotid artery. A few stitches and a concussion would be the worst that he'd suffer.

But the smell was way too strong for that ... and as much as I tried to lie to myself that he'd be fine, I'd been a part of enough death to know better.

The Old Librarian was dead. The part of me that was still vampire knew that.

The human part of me, on the other hand, still clung onto hope.

I pulled at the door handle again—no good. This heavy wooden door would need a battering ram to get through. If only I still had my vampiric strength. But what I lacked in strength, I made up for in smallness. The windows that lined the side of the door were narrow, barely the width of a dinner plate. But I could work with that. Now all I needed was something to smash the window with. I ran to the path leading up to the library and picked up a heavy stone lining the flower bed. Rushing back to the door, I hefted the stone and smashed it through the window.

Taking off my Hermes jacket—still muddy from Deirdre's home décor—I wrapped it around my arm and cleared the rest of the glass, silently lamenting the lacerations the leather got from the process. I'd definitely have to buy a new one now. Good thing I had money—and lots of it. Three hundred years of antique collecting and compound interest tends to do that.

Glass cleared, I sucked in my breath and shimmied through. I made it in—barely—with only my butt and my chest getting squished as I did. Evidently, those parts of me were a bit wider than a dinner plate.

Inside I wasted no more time. I let my nose guide me to the back of the library's main floor, near to where the artifacts were kept—but even without that sickly smell as my guide, a part of me knew this was where I'd find the old man.

As I got closer, the smell of blood got stronger and stronger. I braced myself as I turned the corner for what I thought I'd see.

What I saw was much, much worse.

The Old Librarian was strung up on the heavy, oak bookshelves closest to the display cases. His hands were literally nailed to the thick shelves. His feet, placed one in front of the other, were held together by a thick metal spike, which had been driven through them.

He hung in a crucified position on that shelf. I might have thought his killer was imitating the classic Christ crucifixion ... if it weren't for the stuff on the floor.

Like some Egyptian mummification process interrupted, four canopic jars had been arranged in front of him, each holding a different organ. His small intestines sat on a silver tray, his large intestines on a gold one. And as for his blood—that had meticulously been drained from his body, into large clay pots. Very little of it had been spilled on the floor. His murderer had been precise.

My eyes were drawn back up to his body. His chest cavity had been torn open and I only saw an empty hole where his heart should have been.

I groaned ... but this was not the worst part by far.

From the expression on his face, I knew that he had been awake while he was being ripped apart.

"Oh, Old Librarian," I whispered. "Why didn't you scream for help? Why didn't I hear you?"

The answer came when I looked down and saw that his tongue lay on a cloth right in front of his both. The cloth was wet, not only with blood but also mucus and saliva, which meant that the monster responsible took the time to stuff his mouth with that cloth to muffle his screams. The monster most likely cut out the Old Librarian's tongue after he died.

This didn't make sense. Too much was going on here. The crucifixion, the ceremonial draining of blood, the way the organs were distributed in the four jars ... the tongue on a cloth. It was like he was killed by a bunch of monsters from a dozen different horror movies.

I tried desperately to keep my composure. I'd played my part in quite a lot of killing. Some for fun—most of it to survive. But I had never been a part of something such as this. Say what you will about vampires—we never did this to our victims.

I turned away, having taken in as much of the scene as I dared. With my back to him, I now faced the cases housing an array of Other artifacts. Several of the display cases, I now noticed, were broken and empty. I didn't need to turn around to know they had been used in the sick killing behind me. I couldn't recall exactly which ones had been in those now-empty cases, but I breathed a sigh of relief.

when I saw one that wasn't missing—my father's old Scottish dirk.

His display case stood untouched.

As I stared at my clansman's weapons, I considered my next move. What happened here was recent, maybe even minutes from completion, which meant the killer or killers couldn't have gotten far. I could hunt them down—after all, I was pretty good at that. But I was also human now. What would a human do? A human would call the police. It would take ages for them to get down here, and the trail would probably be cold by then. But they had modern forensics and—

Crunch.

Coming from the front of the library, the unmistakable sound of a foot crunching down on glass.

The monster was still in here ... and had accidentally stepped on some of the glass I'd smashed when breaking into the library—which meant it (I can only assume something capable of committing such a horrible crime was an it) was trying to escape.

Looking at the old Scottish dirk, I knew what I had to do.

I may no longer be a vampire.

But that didn't mean I wasn't still a killer.

Chapter 8

DIRKS AND LIPSTICK

The monster stopped moving, evidently waiting to see if I had heard the glass beneath its boots ... or claws, or ... whatever passed as its feet. This monster was playing it cautious, which meant that it wanted to escape without incident.

That wasn't going to happen.

Even though the old rush of the hunt came surging through me, I fought the urge and stood perfectly still, pretending not to have heard my prey. Then I listened.

Faint breath came from the front of the library.

I slowly counted in my head, waiting, listening. In a minute, I'd make my move and either it would attack me or run. Either way, whatever I did would have to put me in the best position to take it down. I thought about the Old Librarian. He had been frail, weak—certainly not trained like I was. He wouldn't have put up much of a fight. That meant I couldn't gauge my opponent's strength on what I knew.

What I did know was that it was at least strong enough to string the Old Librarian up, which put it in the class of a big and strong human at the very least. I also knew that it contained the resolve and constitution to brutally tear apart a living creature—to crucify an innocent old man and harvest his friggin' organs—without sympathy or mercy. This most likely meant that when I did engage with it, the monster wouldn't hesitate to put me down.

But I also knew the Old Librarian was a good man who had treated me kindly. This knowledge alone was enough to lead me to one final conclusion.

This monster was going to die ...

... and I was going to be the one to make that happen.

The minute was up. The monster hadn't made another move, so it was my turn. I darted forward to my father's display case and smashed the glass with my elbow. I reached in and managed to get my hand on the dirk before powerful hands pulled me back and threw me across the room. Of course, ever the college freshman looking to impress (or at least fit in as human), I just had to go out in my Versace dove-white silk blouse. On smooth marble floor such as this, my blouse was like a sled. I slid across the floor until I hit the front door—with my head.

So much for this monster being as strong as a large human male. More like a frigging bull, or an elephant. Maybe a bull elephant.

I probably would have spent the next minute on the floor, groaning in pain—if it weren't for the large figure bounding from above. It would have crushed me under its weight, but I regained my wits and rolled under one of the large study desks.

A black claw ripped the table back. I rolled under another table. The claw ripped away this table and I rolled beneath the next. Then another.

This perverse game of musical chairs—well, tables—wouldn't last forever. I knew I needed to get a weapon if I wanted a chance at fighting this thing, which meant I needed to put more distance between us than a few layers of lacquered wood.

I faked rolling beneath another desk, then darted between two shelves instead, using them as cover. Lucky move—the monster was wider than the space between the shelves, and as it charged, its weight pushed them apart, causing them to knock over like dominos in two directions.

Good ... just what I wanted to happen. This creature was a predator—which meant that it hunted using sight, smell, and noise. The clambering shelves and tumbling books would cover any sound I made, and all the book dust puffing into the air would mask my scent. Which only left it sight—and what I lacked in strength, I made up in smallness.

When the shelves tumbled down, they didn't fall flat, but rather tipped onto one another like drunks, creating little tunnels beneath where one shelf rested on another. Those gaps were as wide as the shelf's width—which was thankfully about twice the width of a dinner plate. Perfect for me (including my butt and chest, this time).

I crawled through the opening and listened. When I was sure the monster was on the other side of the shelves, scratching about and searching for me, I ducked into the next makeshift tunnel, then the next. Ultimate Hide-and-Go-Seek.

The monster stalked the aisles, occasionally leaping on the toppled shelves and bringing them splintering deeper into one another. But it couldn't find me. And from the sounds it was making, I could tell it was getting frustrated.

I smiled, vindicated. This is for the Old Librarian, you bastard. Run, while you still can.

A little cocky on my part, I know. That was the vampire in me. Either way, the monster didn't take its chance to run. It kept methodically leaping from one shelf to another, snarling.

OK—have it your way.

Slowly, carefully, I made my way to the last row and peered around. Across the aisle, I could see the Old Librarian still strung up. I don't know if it was seeing him there or if it was my fight-or-flight instincts kicking in, but either way, the brave, stupid part of me took over. I darted out of the makeshift passageway and, leaping from display case to display case—

I jumped for my father's dirk and shield.

After all these years, it took scant moments to fit the ancient artifacts in my grip, like well-oiled hinges. Weapon in hand, I turned to face the monster. For the first time I got a good look at it.

GoneGodDamn—if I had seen it earlier, I might have acted smarter. And way less brave.

The thing looked like an honest-to-the-GoneGods bulldog—if, that was, the bulldog were the size of a Highland coo, had fire-yellow eyes and snorted friggin’ steam out of its nose.

Oh well ... no use in crying over spilled milk, I thought as I held out the dirk.

It slammed two of its massive claws on the ground, gouging into the marble as it prepared to charge. I did the same, minus the marble-gouging. Given my stature, it was more like doing the two-step. Still, it was the best retort I had. If I could snort steam, I would’ve.

It sniffed. I growled.

It roared. I screamed back defiantly.

And with the pre-fight ceremony out of the way, we charged at each other.

It was big and fast, but I had something it didn’t.

A silk blouse.

At the last second I dove into a baseball player’s slide and under it, thrusting my long dagger upwards. A fountain of lava-hot blood poured out of its belly. If it wasn’t for my shield, I probably would have been burned to death. Luckily I was able to divert the stream as I rolled out from under it. Turning, I immediately abandoned my shield as it literally burst into flames, its wooden frame consumed by this thing’s blood.

The thing about Others—they don’t bleed red. Ogres bleed green, dwarves a dirt brown; angels bleed actual light and pixies dust. But fire? Only one being I knew bled fire—a jinni. God made jinn from smokeless fire. I guess that explained the flickering yellow eyes this thing had.

It reared up onto its hind legs, still spilling blood from its midsection, seeking to crush me under its weight. I rolled to the right, expecting it to try and step to the right and crush me, but instead, it swiveled to the left.

I had all of one second to consider why it would do that when its tail swiped across the floor (did I say this thing looked like a bulldog? Its tail was more like that of a dragon’s, spikes and all) and hit me hard in the chest, causing me to drop my dirk. I was pushed to the side and before I could tumble out of the way, it pinned me to the side of the wall. Its big flat-nosed face was an inch away from mine and it was bearing its fangs, long, pointy bastards dripping oily fire. I could tell it was relishing the moment before it would bite my head off—literally.

It had me, and without a weapon or any gods to hear my prayers, I didn’t have a hope in Hell of getting out of this alive.

Except we weren't in Hell—and hope was a fickle bitch that liked to wait until the last second to swoop in. This time, she took the form of my fellow classmate, the weird African guy, who leapt on the monster's back and—what the hell?—bit down on the thing's neck.

Kid—I don't know what you're trying to do, but I'm pretty sure that wasn't the best— I started to think (out loud—good to know I could still rely on my quirks in life-and-death situations) when the kid reared his head back and spat out a clump of the monster's neck, fiery blood and all.

The monster reeled back, howling in agony. Steam and lava poured out of its wound and I just managed to roll out of its waning grip.

“Holy crap, kid,” I said, running for my dirk.

The kid—who had been knocked off the beast's back—tumbled in my direction, dabbing at his blistering lips. “Holy Hell! That was hot!”

“Jinni, kid. Jinn. They bleed fire.”

“Apparently. And, for the record, my name is not kid. It is Egya-Boi Awooner of the Fante.”

“And I'm Connor MacLeod of Clan MacLeod,” I said.

Egya gave me a curious look and I managed to say, “What? Not a Highlander fan?”

Before he could answer, the monster, who had managed to pick itself up from the steaming blood-slick floor, resumed its attack. It raked its claws at us, forcing us to split apart. The creature, unsure which target to pursue, chased after me—and not because it was a “Ladies first” kind of monster. No, there was something else going on.

Not that I could ponder that particular mystery now.

Now I had to avoid its massive claws. I ran to the far end of the library, seeking to draw it to the display, hoping against hope that I'd be able to find something, anything to use against it. Maybe a spear or some kind of anti-jinni weapon.

Wishful thinking, but stranger things have happened ... like giant bulldog-faced, dragon-tailed, lava-spewing monsters chasing you through a college library on a Friday night.

I ran, and as fast as I was, this thing was faster. Where the hell was Egya? I couldn't hear him, and a shiver ran down my spine. If Egya ducked out of the fight, I was done for. Maybe that bite of lava had been more than he'd bargained for.

I kept running for the displays, but it involved a lot of obstacle-course dodging of the mess I'd made with the toppling shelves. Before I could get close, the creature flipped a shelf full of several heavy books over, toppling it at my feet and tripping me over.

I fell on my stomach and quickly turned so that I was lying flat on my back. The creature came close, getting ready to bear down on me. Pointing the tip of my sword straight up, I was preparing for the old stab-and-roll maneuver when I heard a howl. Egya jumped from the viewing balcony on the second floor, straight onto the creature's back.

Egya'd learned his lesson: he didn't bite the thing. This time he stabbed it with something I couldn't quite see from my vantage point. No matter. Stab as if my life depended on it, Egya!

Taking my cue from its howl, I thrust my dirk into the nape of its still-bleeding neck and then twisted my body as hard as I could to the right, gripping my sword with all the human strength I had in me—and maybe any vampiric strength still left deep down.

My sword stuck in its molten skin. Despite the heat, I continued with as much pressure as I could. I felt my sword travel through its skin another inch, then two more, and with one last effort, I managed to slash through the thing's throat—ripping a hole in it the size of the library's book-return slot.

The monster tried to scream, but without a throat, all that came out was a low, guttural hiss as it collapsed to the ground in its own molten blood.

“Damn. Remind me not to get on your bad side,” Egya said, climbing off the creature's back.

I ignored him, walking around it slowly. According to Islam, God created two types of humanity: one from mud—humans; and the other from smokeless fire—the jinn. The jinn were like us, complete with different races, ethnicities and geopolitical alliances. And although this creature had all the telltale signs of being jinn, it was more animal than sentient being. Something didn't feel right.

As I examined him, my foot hit something hard by its front left paw. Looking down, I saw my father's cherub mask on the ground, its innocent face staring up at me out of the fiery blood. The irony wasn't lost on me—here I was fighting an evil demon to avenge the death of my friend ... How many demons had my father vanquished in my name? Too many to count, I suspected.

Gingerly picking up the mask, I slipped it in my slightly torn back pocket. I'd need new jeans now, too. Add that to the list.

Egya had been watching me the whole time. Seeing his gaze, I was just about to say “Let's get out of here before the police show up,” when I heard a voice yell out, “Hold it right there!”

Two flashlights shined in our eyes. Behind the glaring light, I saw two figures approach with guns drawn.

Oh, great—campus security's here. Great timing, morons.

The voice behind the lights barked, “What did you say?”

Talking out loud again. I really, really had to stop that.

Chapter 9

HUMAN SECURITY SECURING

First the campus security came, then the cops, then the local news and finally the coroner. Not that we saw any of that. Deirdre told me later. Word had gotten to the dorms what had happened and many of the students, including her, went down to see what happened.

Egya and I were interviewed at the scene—in handcuffs—and after our statement was taken down and taken down again by every cop determined to crack the truth out of us, we were whisked away to the local police precinct in a police car, sirens ringing through the night air and drawing unwanted attention to us. Already a ton of students were out; I wanted to curl up in a fetal position at the floor of the cruiser from embarrassment and shame—and loss. Twenty-four hours had yet to pass and already I was the freak who jumps at light, gets into fights with hockey players and gets arrested for murder. The murder of the one person I'd managed to make friends with.

At least no one can say I don't make a first impression.

The nearest precinct was about a mile away. Once we made it inside, I noted that there was a disproportionate number of Others in handcuffs. Made sense—Others were the easily distinguishable minority and seeing them in chains just proved to me that the world didn't change that much just because the gods left.

Once our prints were taken (our hands had to be washed and treated for burns first), Egya and I were separated. I was guided to a room with a desk and one-way mirror. Presumably so was Egya.

Then I waited.

And waited.

And waited some more.

I'd been in similar situations before, so I knew the drill. They wanted us to get nervous, because nervous people talked. The trouble with me and waiting was that, as an insomniac, former vampire who hunted in the night, when I wasn't talking to myself, I was really good at sitting perfectly still for long periods of time. It's not that I went asleep or anything. I just kind of shut off. Meditation on overdrive. When I'd go into that state as a vampire, I'd actually stop breathing. As a human, I couldn't do that, of course, but my breaths were low and shallow and infrequent. Not sure if this skill would have real world applications, but one thing I noticed happened when I did this was I made other humans really nervous. And in situations like this, I got a bit of a sick pleasure out of that.

The door flung open and the way the detective—a woman with a gray suit and olive, button-up shirt—burst in, I knew that she’d seen me through the one-way mirror and thought I’d had a seizure or something.

The movement caused me to turn. When I animated, I could see the detective visibly relax.

“What the hell are you doing?” she asked.

“Meditating,” I answered honestly.

“Meditating?”

“Well, kind of. I play old movies in my head. It relaxes me.”

She raised one eyebrow. “Huh?”

“This time I was screening An American Werewolf in London—the original, not the remake in Paris. I was playing the scene where they were walking back to the pub and—”

“And why were you playing that movie in particular?”

It was my turn to raise an eyebrow. “Because ... did you see that thing? I kind of feel like I was attacked by a werewolf, myself. I’m sort of wondering if I’m going to turn into a giant bulldog with hot, lava-like blood.”

“I see,” the detective said, taking off her glasses and sitting down across from me. “And you do this to, what? Relax? Why do you need to relax?”

I gave the detective a wry smile. This wasn’t the first time I had found myself in an interrogation room for killing something—or killing someone. Caught plenty of times when I was a vampire. This was, however, the first time I was in a place like this as a human—and for killing an Other.

As a vampire, I’d wait until it got really late and bite my way out. As a human, I would need another tact. Luckily, I was one of those psychological Hannibal Lector killer vampires (as opposed to the hack-and-slash kind) and was used to playing mind games. Unhinging the detective with my meditation trick was a start. Better she was nervous than me ... but still, if I was going to get out of here, I needed to be very careful what I said and didn’t say.

So I considered her question before replying evenly, “How many people, innocent or guilty, get put in a room like this and don’t need to relax?” I gave subtle emphasis to the word innocent.

“You’ve got a point,” the detective said. She stuck out her hand. “Detective Sarah Wilcox. And you are?”

“Katrina Darling, but you know that already, from my statement. I suspect that you know a lot more than that, too.”

She nodded. “OK—yes—I’ve run your name through the databases. So can you imagine what came back in your file?”

I froze. It was possible that she uncovered I was an ex-vampire. I had done my best to hide my tracks. I paid a lot to get myself a long-form birth certificate, I fabricated a death certificate for a fake father who’d died prematurely from a heart attack ... I even had my bogus dad set up a trust fund for me—an accumulation of my assets collected over the centuries of long life.

In my human story, Dad was a diplomat and we'd moved around a lot—that way I could have fewer ties and less (read: zero) schoolmates to remember me. Hell, I even set up a Facebook page with doctored photos of me doing human activities in the sun as a little girl (thank the GoneGods for stock photography and photoshop).

Still, humans—the AlwaysMortals, that is—were paranoid about Others, even former Others, and had created a registry for beings like me to sign. There was even an amnesty program for vampires, werewolves, ghouls and zombies—expunging us from any legal recourse for the murders we committed when we were an Other.

But ... I never did. Technically speaking, I was breaking the law by not doing so.

Detective Wilcox turned the file around. It was thin, with only a couple visible pages. Evidently, she wasn't going to tell me what she'd found without me asking. GoneGodDammit—any upper hand I had with my meditation trick would be gone if I did. Still, I had to know.

I sighed inwardly. "What?"

"Nothing," she said with a smirk—she knew she'd just won this battle of wills. "But you were awfully nervous, given how little there is about you."

"Well, you know—it's my first time talking to a real detective," I lied.

"Sure, sure. These are unusual circumstances." She pointed at the mirror and a few seconds later a cop walked in with a file and my bag. "But we had expected more, even for a young first-year like yourself."

I shrugged. "I moved around a lot and my dad was a very private person. Before he died, that is."

"Yes, your file mentioned that. Sorry for your loss."

I nodded. She was the second person today to offer me condolences for a man who died before the Titanic sank.

"OK, Ms. Darling, there are a few other things we need to know." Detective Wilcox turned the file back to her and spread out some photos she pulled out of an envelope.

I had expected the photographs to be of the crime scene—the Old Librarian strung up, his organs displayed like pastry in a bakery—but instead, they were pictures of the Old Librarian alive, healthy and smiling. Then there were photos of he and I speaking beside the display cases. And finally, a photo of me standing outside the library at night—something that must have been taken just before I tried to break in. Barely two hours ago.

"These certainly tell a story," she said.

"How did you get those?"

"CCTV—there are cameras all over campus."

"Humph." I picked up the photo of the Old Librarian and looked at it. My voice softened. "Did he suffer?"

Detective Wilcox narrowed her eyes. She hadn't been expecting that question. Not at this point, at least. "Excuse me?"

“When he was killed—did he suffer?” I wasn’t playing a mind-game with the detective; this wasn’t some kind of trick like the meditation. I really wanted to know if he suffered in the end.

“I would like to answer your question, but before I do, I need to know ... what makes you ask that?”

“It’s just that the way he was killed—it was ritualistic, or psychotic, or both. Point is, it was pre-planned. His killer wanted to hang him that way, wanted to cut him open that way. Wanted to pull out his organs that way. Either the killer was doing that because he—”

“He?”

“He, she, it—whatever,” I said, annoyed with myself for the assumption the killer was a boy (this was the GoneGod world—girls were just as capable of killers as boys). That and accidentally hinting that I might know something when I didn’t. “My point is ... either the Old Librarian suffering was part of this or it wasn’t. And given how much blood and gore and dismemberment there was ... why didn’t someone hear his screams? Someone like, oh, I dunno, the police?”

The detective glared at me, but I kept going.

“Maybe the killer put him asleep before doing what ... ahh, it ... did.”

She folded her arms. “That’s quite the astute observation for someone with a file thinner than a rice cake.”

I shrugged. “I watch a lot of TV.”

The detective raised one eyebrow.

“A lot.”

“OK,” she said, “tell you what: I’ll answer your question if you answer mine.”

“You really going to blackmail me into speaking to you over the question of whether or not my friend suffered when he died?”

Detective Wilcox paused at this. “No, I suppose not. From blood splatter, an examination of his body and blood work that measured the presence of adrenaline and other elements, our best guess is that the initial cuts were done with him fully awake, but as soon as those preliminary steps were taken, the killer drugged him. After that, he probably didn’t feel much when he, she or it really started to get into it.”

Really started to get into it. Well, that’s one way of describing it.

“So you don’t know who the killer is?” I said.

Detective Wilcox pursed her lips, putting on her best poker face, but after centuries of playing mind-games myself, I knew the answer. She didn’t.

“Nothing on the cameras, then?” I asked.

Lips pursed. Poker face. Nothing.

“What about the Other Egys and I killed? He could have been acting alone, right?”

She shook her head. “No, he wasn’t. But we’ll get to him in a moment.”

She emptied the contents of my bag onto the table, which consisted of lip gloss, a vintage wallet containing forty measly bucks, my student ID, my debit card and credit card, my phone, my dorm keys and the O³ flyer.

Oh, and my father's cherub mask. They'd confiscated that from my back pocket pretty quickly.

She picked up the flyer. "O³ is still at it, eh?"

"Excuse me?" I narrowed my eyes.

"O³—the party organizers. My cousin's one of them."

"Oh? Which one?"

She paused for a moment like she was considering not telling me, before she finally said, "Nate."

"Yeah, I know him. Sort of. More like I know of him. And from what I know—nice guy."

"You have no idea." She dropped the flyer, looking at my other stuff. "Very well, then, let's start by you telling me what this is." She picked up the mask.

"Give that back," I said, lunging forward. I immediately regretted doing that—just another instance where I was giving the detective the upper hand, probably even playing right into her hands—but seeing my father's mask in this cop's said hands stirred some old rage in me. I was simultaneously scared by the image of the Devine Cherub and upset that another person dared touch my father's most prized possession.

"Hold on, missy," she said, pulling back. "So this is important to you, huh? What is it?"

"Sun protector," I said. "I wear it to keep all those nasty UV rays off my face."

"Cute," she said. She dropped it on the table just out of my reach.

I don't know why I'm being difficult. I guess I'm just scared, I thought.

"Makes sense. You just saw a dead body. I've been on the force for years and I'm still not used to it."

"Yeah, you're probably right," I said out loud—on purpose, this time.

"So, the mask? Care to elaborate?"

"It's ... very old. An antique, you might say." A family heirloom, you might say, I was careful to think silently.

"And ... not a sun protector, I take it."

I shook my head. "No—just something that my dad gave me. It's been in our family for generations," I admitted, completely glossing over the fact that I stole it from the library. The detective looked at me expectantly. I was lying to her by omitting certain facts, but it wasn't like I could just come out and say that I stole the mask from the library, but it wasn't technically stealing because it really was a family heirloom.

So I did what I always did in situations like this: I kept lying.

Fake it till you make it. That was basically the ex-Other motto.

"I brought the mask with me to university because ..."

"Because ...?"

I shrugged, assuming a carefully guarded look of sadness. "It reminds me of Da' ... and I'm homesick.”

She looked up at me, putting down the pen.

“The mask—it was something my father really loved and, well, I guess I wanted to have something to remember him by.”

Detective Wilcox stared at me for a long time before finally nodding and saying, “OK—you’re free to go.” She handed me a card. “If you think of anything else, please call me directly.”

“What?” I took the card, staring at it blankly, a bit surprised this was it. “Nothing else? No questions about what I saw, felt ... did?”

“The officer on the scene already got your statement. If we need anything else from you, I’ll be sure to contact you.”

“So that’s it? I’m free to go?”

“That is what I said.”

I didn’t move.

Detective Wilcox gave me a curious look. She gestured at the mask. “We know that didn’t have anything to do with the librarian’s murder. What’s more, forensics is pretty advanced these days and we didn’t find a single hair strand, fabric fiber, fingerprint or DNA sample of yours on the scene.”

“Really? You got that already?”

She sighed. “No. But I don’t expect to find anything. We have campus security footage that clearly shows you leaving your dorm and going for a walk at the time of the murder. Because of those little cameras everywhere, violating your privacy rights but aiding in allowing your freedom to have privacy rights, you have an air-tight alibi.”

“Oh?” I said. “Oh! Well ... good thing I’m not that private of a person anyway.”

The detective gave me a suspicious look, then shook her head. She was clearly tired. “Unless there is a reason I should be arresting you ... you are free to go.” She pointed at the door.

I know that was what I wanted, but being let go so easily really boiled my blood. For one thing, I was the first person on the scene and the junior cop that took my statement barely scratched the surface of what I could tell them. Granted, a lot of what I knew stemmed from my experience as a vampire, and I wanted to protect that secret as best I could—but still! Couldn’t this self-important detective recognize an asset when she saw one?

But that wasn’t what really upset me. No, what engulfed my recently returned soul in flame was that she was letting me walk after I killed an Other. A living, breathing Other.

Is Other life so worthless that you could literally kill one of them and not go to jail? Or—even if I killed him in self-defense—can’t the authorities at least investigate with more than a passing interest? Last I checked, killing someone in self-defense at least requires an investigation. I should be calling my lawyer. I should be explaining over and over again how I had to kill him. I should—

“Actually, what you killed wasn’t a sentient Other,” she said, interrupting my out-loud thoughts. “It was a kelb. A common jinni elemental, often used as a guard dog. Which means—”

“So?” I asked, with perhaps a bit too much venom in my tone for someone who was being let go. “Shouldn’t I still be charged with something? Or at least investigated?”

“As much as you would like to be a martyr for equal Other rights by forcing me to arrest you, kelb is a type-C classification Other. It is the Other equivalent of a domestic dog or cat—although who would want something that big and vicious as a pet, I have no idea. We do not file cases against killed pets—especially when it was clearly done in self-defense. That’s up to the owner. And since the owner is clearly the killer, I doubt he or she will be filing a suit against you anytime soon.”

I took a minute to let that sink in. The creature Egya and I killed was a guard dog of sorts whose master unleashed on us. Not the killer at all.

“Oh?” I said, kind of wishing I’d asked first, ranted later—out-loud thoughts or not. “OK, then.” I stood up and put the contents of my purse back into my bag, including my father’s mask. Once that was done, I paused and looked Detective Wilcox directly in the eyes. “You said that you have footage of the murder.”

She nodded.

“So you know who the killer is?”

She gave me a look that said she couldn’t answer that.

“Come on—you’ve got to give me something. The librarian was my friend. The only friend I’ve made since I got here.”

Wilcox shook her head, cursing to herself. “This stays in this room.”

“OK—cross my heart.” I did so, to show her I was serious.

“The assailant was ... blurred.”

“Blurred?”

“Yeah—like what you see in documentaries where the interviewee wants to remain anonymous.”

“Magic?”

“We can only assume,” Detective Wilcox said. “We can gather quite a bit of evidence from the video, but a clear ID? Not as of yet. But we’ll get the bastard. I promise you.”

“Thank you,” I said. I pulled my purse strap onto my shoulder and headed out the door.

Chapter 10

HYENAS AND DENIAL ARE LIKE OIL AND WATER

The cops were less willing to take me back home than they had been to take me in. I guess it tends to be a one-way flow. Not that it really mattered—the campus was about a twenty-minute walk away. Stepping outside, I saw that dawn had already come and gone, and what greeted me was the morning hustle and bustle of a city getting ready for work.

I wrapped my ruined jacket close to my body, held my purse tight, and entered the flow of people walking to work. Mont-Royal is a beautiful city—there’s no doubt about it—but at that moment I wanted nothing more than to leave this place far behind. I mean, I had been here less than a day and already I had seen the inside of a police station.

And the inside of my only friend’s chest cavity.

But there was one more thing to consider. I killed. Yes, in self-defense, and it was only an attack dog that I felled. Granted, I killed a fire-breathing attack dog the size of a bull from the jinn’s mythical realm of Qa, but still: I killed. Coming to university was my attempt at being a normal, average human. Normal and average usually means do not kill ... but here I was, on day one, stabbing my dirk into someone’s neck. I could chalk it up to seeing my friend strung up like some macabre puppet, something that could believably have brought out my old instincts, but that would be a lie. Truth was, as a vampire, I was good at killing. I may have lost most of my powers when I became human, but I didn’t lose everything.

What really scared me was how easy it all went down. Once I decided that the creature responsible for killing my friend deserved to die, I acted without hesitation, guilt or remorse. Even now, after the adrenaline had worn out and the heat of the battle had cooled, I felt no regret.

Killing was too easy. At least for me.

I considered my options. I could quit college. After all, I had enough money to last me several lifetimes; given that I was human again, I only needed it to last one. I had an old Victorian mansion waiting for me near Edinburgh’s Meadows. And I had enough life experience that the so-called “college experience” wasn’t really necessary. When I was considering my options, one of the things the McJames brochure highlighted was how university helped you mature, helped you grow up.

I was over three hundred years old.

Maybe I’d already done all the growing up I need to do.

I wasn't sure what to do. Get out of here? Stay? I pulled my purse closer. I could feel the bulge of my father's Cherub mask under its plush leather. I thought about my father—the relentless hunter who never quit. What would he think about me leaving? Leaving meant quitting—and I'd never been very good at doing that.

So maybe I don't quit. There were other options. I could leave this university and go somewhere else. There are plenty of schools that don't accept Others ... they would be less complicated and—
“Coward.”

“Excuse me?” I said, turning to see who was calling me names.

I saw Egya sitting under the umbra of a Tim Horton's Coffeeshop canopy where three metal tables and several chairs sat. It stank of cigarette smoke and coffee dregs from early commuters. The table he sat at had no ashtray, but it did have two coffees, and from the fact that one of the cups was empty and the other one had a total lack of steam coming out of it, I guessed he had been sitting there for a while.

Which meant that he was waiting for me. Great.

He gestured to the seat across from him.

I shook my head. “I don't sit with people who insult me.”

“Then don't say things worth insulting.”

“Like what?”

“Girl—you talk to yourself. And when you are not talking in a loud voice that birds high in the sky can hear—” He pointed to the sky with long skinny arms that had firm, defined muscle. He might not have much meat on him, but there was no doubt he was strong. Also, he was wearing a tight, black polo shirt and I could see his lean muscle bulge from beneath. “—when you are not thinking loudly, you think quietly, mouthing your thoughts so that one with keen eye-sight such as myself can read your lips.” He caught my eyes with his own emerald eyes, accentuated against his dark skin. “Keen eyes like mine. Please sit—I bought you a coffee.”

“Humph,” I said, walking past him.

“I know what you are,” he called after me.

I froze, looking around at all the humans walking by.

“And I know what you are pretending to be,” he said. “Shall I announce it to the world and free you of your terrible secret? Or will you join—”

“Fine, fine,” I huffed, turning around and taking a seat. I grabbed the coffee and downed the now-tepid liquid in one gulp. Given I hadn't eaten in a while, I knew it would only be a matter of minutes before it gave me that anxious coffee buzz. Not that I cared. I wanted to get out of here as quickly as possible, away from this stranger. A finished cup implied a finished conversation. At least I think it did. I was still learning human customs.

“So,” I said, wiping my mouth on a brown paper napkin. “What do you think you know about me?”

“You are no ordinary girl,” he said, looking through me just like he had in class.

I shuddered under his gaze. “Well, thank you very much,” I threw in as much sarcasm as I could.

“Don’t mention it,” he said, either not noticing the scorn in my voice or not noticing it. “It is quite obvious. For one, you fight monsters.”

“Not usually. I was in the wrong place at the wrong time and—”

“Most humans simply die when the time and place are wrong. But not you. You fight.”

“And what about you? Are you ... what, my knight in shining armor?”

He laughed at this, pointing at his orange polo-shirt logo. “I am not a knight, but I do have the horse. But come now,” he said, leaning in close, his arms resting on the cool metal of the outdoor table. “Let us address the ... what do you Westerners say? ... the elephant in the room. A funny expression for a culture that has no indigenous elephants. I, on the other hand, come from a land filled with elephants, and I can say one thing about them—we never take them inside.”

“Très drôle,” I said.

“Most certainly—I am very funny in my native land.”

“Ghana?”

“Again, most certainly—but how did you know?”

“I don’t think that is how you use ‘certainly.’ ”

He didn’t say anything.

“And to answer your question—it’s your accent. I spent a lot of time in Africa. All over the world, actually. My father was a—”

“Vampire,” he said, more as a statement than anything else.

“Ex ... excuse me?” I picked up my mug to hide behind a sip, forgetting that I’d finished the drink already.

“Or ghoul. But what I know for sure is that you were no shifter.”

“Again, excuse me?”

“Shifters are natural liars. You, my dear, cannot lie to save your life, let alone hide your past. And given that vampires, ghouls and zombies were the only other creatures to become human once more when the gods left ...”

“And you know all this from what? Experience.”

“Most certainly.”

I grimaced at the expression. “Just because you were a ... a what?”

“Were-hyena.”

“Don’t you mean werewolf?”

“I would if that was what I changed into, but wolves are not indigenous to my homeland. Hyenas, on the other hand ...”

“And because you were a monster, once-upon-a-time, you ... what? Think I was, too? And a ghoul, at that?”

He sipped his drink, smirking. “Possibly.”

“But ghouls,” I said, looking for a cop-out, “aren’t they ... ghoulish?”

“Not all of them. In my homeland, there were many types of ghouls, some of whom could lure their prey with promises of pleasure, both divine and carnal, and—”

“I am not a ghoul.”

“Was, not ‘am.’ I am speaking of your past.”

“OK—then read my lips. I—was not—am not—nor ever will be—a ghoul.”

“Then vampire.”

“I am not—”

“Again—not ‘not.’ Before.”

“My past? My past! That is exactly what I don’t want to speak about with anyone, let alone someone like you.” I stood up in frustration. “Am, was, will be—I’m not a GoneGodDamn—” I caught myself before I shouted, and leaned in close. “Vampire.”

Egya gave me a smug look. “Liar.”

“Asshole.”

“Most certainly,” he said with a wicked smile.

I left Egya in the wake of my rage.

GoneGodDamn it, damn it, damn it!

My anger affirmed his suspicions, I was sure, but I couldn’t help it. His accusations just confirmed what I was afraid of: I can’t be in a place where people know who or what I am? I came here to have a new start. To forget my past. Fresh future. Egya might tell people who I was. Or worse, they might make me sign-up with the damn government Other registration.

Dammit!

I may have been conflicted about quitting before, but now that I had someone like Egya on my tail, I just might have to leave. New start, new place ... without that were-dog chasing me.

I’m going to have to quit university, aren’t I? I groaned. Well, at least I made it to the dawn of my second day. That’s practically a record.

PART IV

PROLOGUE

“Joseph Campbell, in The Hero of a Thousand Faces, outlines the commonalities shared by all religions.

“Origin stories: Christians, the Jewish faith, and Muslims all have the Garden of Eden; the Hopi have the Four Worlds; Shinto has the Tenchikaibyaku.

“Then, of course, there is the flood story: the Abrahamic religions have Noah’s flood; the Norse have Bergelmir’s escape; the Sumerians have the Gilgamesh flood myth.

“The parallels go on and on. Forbidden knowledge, trickster beings, concepts of an afterlife and so on ... But there is one less known, less discussed commonality that we see in almost every religion—especially when we look at their early practices. Can anyone tell me what that is?

“What? No takers?

“Very well, then. Let me tell you. Sacrifice. Almost every recorded religion is known to have some form of human sacrifice as part of their canon. Even Judaism and Christianity speak of animal sacrifice in the books of Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers, to name a few. The methods of sacrifice might be different, but the purpose is universal.

“To please the gods.

“Well, we’ve all seen how that’s worked out, haven’t we?”

Chapter 11

ACTIVISTS PLAY FOOTBALL, TOO

Day two of me trying to be human and already I felt like crap.
It wasn't even 10 a.m.!

I wanted to go back to the dorms and curl up under my duvet—if I had a duvet left. For all I knew, Deirdre, that socially unversed changeling roommate of mine, might have taken out all those goose feathers to make wings for herself.

Whoever said that your time in university would be the best days of your life clearly didn't have mine in mind.

As I walked past the Eaton Centre and toward the main gain, I passed by McJames' statue, pausing to look at the dark, copper man. He held onto his hat against an endless wind as he pointed toward ... what? ... the future? The next steps in evolution?

I followed his finger and saw that he was pointing toward the Mont-Royal's train station. Maybe he was telling me to get out. Was this a sign?

Whatever! Sign or not, I wasn't going to be here for long. It was time for this girl to exit stage right and ... and ... do something else. What, I had no idea, but I'd figure it out. Determined that leaving was my best choice, I turned on my heels and headed to campus. The way I figured it, I'd wrap up some loose ends, inform Student Admin that I was dropping out and pack up my dorm. If I hurried, I could get it all done by the weekend.

As I walked to campus, I was so deep in figuring out exactly how one drops out of university that I walked right into Justin—for the second day in a row.

"Whoa," he said. "Seems the only way to get your attention is by getting in your way."

I looked up to see him smiling at me with his kind yet powerful jaw, the sun shining off his perfect black locks ... and what's more, he was holding me, two gentle hands cradling my elbows. All we needed was for him to be shirtless and me in some loosely draped corset and we could be a Harlequin romance novel cover.

"Ahh, sorry," I said, making sure to not pull away. "I've got a lot on my mind."

He didn't let go. "Yeah, well, welcome to university. A lot can happen."

Oh my, I thought. It's been a long time since I've been in a man's arms and not wanted to rip out his throat.

“Excuse me?” he said. From his confusion, I gathered he didn’t quite make out what I’d said. Thank the GoneGods—that must have been my “quiet” thinking, like Egya had called it.

“Nothing,” I swooned. “I was just saying—a lot on my mind.”

“No kidding,” he said. “I’ve been looking all over campus for you. Even went to your dorm room, but your roommate said you hadn’t been home all night.” He hesitated.

“What is it?” I asked.

“You know what happened, right? Last night?”

I nodded.

“Rumors are that you were there.”

I pursed my lips and looked down, as if in thought. After what felt like an eternity where I debated between telling Justin everything or denying it all, I eventually settled on a harmless nod. There was no point in hiding it—everyone would find out eventually. If, that was, Egya hadn’t already distributed flyers.

“Wow,” Justin said, lifting one of his hands so he could nervously run his hands through his perfect hair. “Did you see what happened?”

“No,” I said. “I got there too late. The killer was still there—”

“Did you see who it was?”

I shook my head. “No. Whoever it was had already left, and before I could look around too much their jinni guard dog attacked me.”

“Jinni what?”

“Jinni guard dog—think normal guard dog, only about twelve times bigger with a long, spikey tail and lava for blood.”

“And what, it attacked you?”

“Yep, but I managed to ...” I paused.

“‘To ...’?” Justin’s eyes widened as he waited for my answer.

Again I thought about lying—but the truth would come out sooner or later. It always does, I lamented. I looked away. I didn’t want to see Justin’s reaction when I told him.

“... to kill it.”

“What? How?”

“An old dagger that fell out of one of the display cases. I stabbed the thing—jinni or not, it wasn’t immune to being stabbed.”

“How in the ...?” he started, but trailed off.

I knew he must have been judging me for what I did, that he was probably thinking of an excuse to get away from me. Hell, he was probably afraid to leave too quickly, lest I stab him too and—

Then I felt a finger on my chin, gently guiding my face up. I let it and a second later I was looking into his deep blue, endless, concerned eyes.

“You must have been terrified,” he said.

I nodded.

“What did the police say?”

“That it was a Class C Other. Seems it’s not a crime to kill a Class C—so if you see any around ...” I made a slitting-throat gesture that was meant to be my attempt at a joke.

Justin did not laugh.

Great.

Hoping to leave my poor-taste joke behind me, I quickly added, “But given how it almost ate me, I think it’s more of an attack dog with Terminator-like dedication.”

“Ah-hah,” he nervously laughed. “And what about the killer? I’m guessing anyone with that kind of creature following them around for protection is an Other of a ... different ... classification?”

I stopped for a second and thought about the implication of his question. “The killer is an Other!”

“Um,” Justin said, “isn’t that obvious?”

“Not really. But if it is an other, its classification would be telling. The police can use that as a clue.”

Justin nodded, but then the implication of my words hit me like a bag of bricks.

“The police will use that. They’ll single out Others. That’s what you mean.” I looked up accusingly. “In other words, the killer is someone who is easily identifiable by the shape of their body, color of their skin or the extra appendages their body has.”

“I didn’t mean it like that,” he said, drawing away. “I mean it like you said ... it’s a clue—a narrowing down of suspects, or something.”

Fine—I’ll give him a pass, but only because he’s so gorgeous. And he did seem sincere. I nodded, “That’s what the cops think.”

“And you?”

I nodded begrudgingly. “I can’t think of many humans who can summon a jinni, can you?”

“No,” he chuckled, “I can’t.”

“But still,” I said, “don’t tell anyone that the killer is probably an Other. They’re already being picked on, and it took so much work for a university to open its doors to Others. The last thing I want to do is add fuel to the already fear-filled fire.”

He winced at this.

“What?” I asked.

“It might be too late for that,” he said, handing me a flyer.

I took the red flyer and read it:

OTHER KILLER ON CAMPUS!

BEWARE, BE VIGILANT AND BE SURE TO CALL SECURITY

IF YOU SEE ANY SUSPICIOUS OTHERS ABOUT.

The flyer had a picture of an ogre lurking about, but the funny thing about the image was that it was taken from the World of Warcraft movie. Real ogres don't look like that. For one thing, their skin is more of an avocado green, and it's covered in a lot more hair and—

“You know a lot about Others,” Justin said.

“Too much,” I groaned. “I am—was—thinking about majoring in Other Studies. Hence why I was at the library.”

“ ‘Was’ majoring?”

“ ‘Am’ ... ‘might’ ... haven’t decided,” I lied. The appropriate helping verb was more like won't ... as in won't be studying anything anymore. I handed him back the flyer. “This is bad. Any Other student is a target now. Even your dorm buddy, Sal.”

“I know,” he said solemnly. “That’s why I’m going to give a speech at the candlelight vigil tonight.”

“Vigil?”

“Yeah, we’re holding a memorial. I’m going to give a speech and invite everyone to our O³ party.”

“What? You’re using this as a way to promote your party?”

“No, no,” he said, his cheeks flushing red. “I didn’t mean it like that. The whole point of the party is to start the school year in an all-inclusive, everyone-is-welcome sort of way. Others included, of all body shapes, skin colors and extra appendages.” That made me smile, which gave him more confidence. “I figured if we can get everyone to party together—you know, they’ll all get along.”

“Make love, not war,” I said.

He laughed at this, not knowing that I wasn’t trying to be funny or cute. I had attended the Mother’s Day Peace March in 1965 (well, attended the after-dusk part, at least). Nowadays, it was a cliché printed on a T-shirt. But back then, it meant something.

I looked up at Justin. “I guess I see what you’re trying to do,” I said.

“Look, I know it’s not enough, but it’s something. It will make sense tonight, I promise. Will you come?”

“To the party?”

“No—the vigil. For my speech. I’m super nervous ... I could use a friendly face.”

I didn’t say anything.

Justin gave me an empathetic smile and said, “I know you’ve been through a lot, Kat. Think about it. I could use all the support I can get.”

“What about your dorm buddies?”

“They’ll be there. The humans, at least. We’re encouraging Sal to lay low for a while.”

“OK,” I nodded. “I’ll think about it.”

“Good.” Then, looking at his wristwatch, he said, “I’m late for class. Maybe see you tonight, but definitely see you at the O³ party?”

The O³ party was this weekend, which meant delaying leaving by a day or two. I could go and pretend that it was my goodbye party—even if no one attending knew me, knew I was leaving or cared. Still, I should attend one college party to see if they lived up to all the hype 1980s comedies promised.

I nodded at Justin.

“Great,” he said, flashing a big, perfect smile as he started to jog away. “Glad I can make you commit to at least one of them.”

And with that, he was gone, leaving me at the entrance of campus, holding the Other-hating flyer. I crumpled it up and tossed it in the nearest rubbish bin.

Arrgh—Others! I wondered if the gods knew how many problems sending them to Earth would cause. If they would have still done it.

My guess was ... yes.

I guess “hindsight is 20/20” only applies if you actually care about the people you’ve left behind.

Chapter 12

WISE SAGES AND PALE WHITE RIDERS

So I was stuck here until after the weekend. Fine. Just more time to get my affairs in order. Affairs—hah! All those college movies talked about hooking up with boys, falling in love, dancing, partying ... living. Sure, I saw students playing frisbee, hanging out by the founder statue and generally just chilling on campus, but what I didn't see was me being a part of that.

Maybe I don't deserve it.

"Oh shush," I growled at myself. I deserve to live and be happy just like everyone else.

Pulling my purse closer to me, I walked into the Admin building and straight to a receptionist with purple hair tied into a ponytail and hipster glasses.

"I want to drop out," I said.

She looked at me over the rims of her glasses. "Day Two jitters?" she asked.

"Day Two coming-to-my-senses," I said.

"Uh-huh. Student ID, please."

I opened my purse and handed the laminated ID to her.

She keyed my details into her computer. "A student advisor will see you shortly. Until then, have a seat."

I went into the waiting room, where three humans huddled at one end and four Others hung out on the other side. The awkwardness between the two groups was palpable. The Others were comprised of two cherubs, a gargoyle that looked like a stone dragon the size of a tomcat and an oni demon. Among the humans was the mousey girl from Gardner Hall (the one who'd handed Deirdre some soil) and a guy who looked like he was auditioning for Small Town Hick at the local school theater.

I nodded at Mousey Girl, giving her a knowing smile. She promptly looked away in fear, blushing as she pushed up her thick-framed glasses.

The two cherubs were both only five inches tall; one looked like a baby with a halo and dove-like wings, while the other one looked like a cute, miniature devil with bat wings. I figured them for shoulder cherubs. You know—the angels who sat on your shoulder and encourage you to do good or bad. Given how they huddled together, I knew they were scared. Made sense ... shoulder cherubs were meant to sit invisibly on your shoulders and guide you through the murky waters of morality. They weren't used to being visible, shoulder-less and sitting in a human waiting room.

They were harmless.

The oni demon, on the other hand, looked like the manga version of the classic Western image of the Devil—red skin, pointy tail, horns, but with huge eyes and tusks that protruded up out of his lower jaw. He was clearly nervous as well, grinding his teeth together, which, because of the large metal ring in one of his tusks, made a clicking sound every time he separated his jaw.

With each tusk-grinding click, Hick Boy clenched his fists like he was just itching to charge at the oni demon. Stupid human—you'll need a crowbar or machete to do any damage against that thing. Its skin is tougher than a coconut shell. Believe me—I once got into a fight with one of them on Zamami Island off of Okinawa's mainland when—

Everyone was looking at me. OK, girl, I thought—in my head this time—go with it. I turned to Hick Boy and said, “You're clearly scared of this guy, otherwise you wouldn't be acting so aggro.”

“You mind your business,” Hick Boy said, in a Southern accent I couldn't quite place. Mississippi? Possibly Georgia.

How cliché, I thought before saying, “I can't mind my business when I see you trying to burn holes in that poor guy. Can't you see, he's just as scared as you are?”

“Kawai janai,” the oni demon boomed, at which Hick Boy stood up. So did the oni demon, while Mousey Girl screamed.

I got between human and demon, all of my five-foot-nothing frame standing between two massive bodies of aggro testosterone, and yelled, “Yes, you are scared. Both of you are.”

I must have said it with a force that belied my size, because both of them stopped.

Pointing at the oni demon, I said, “Do you speak English?”

The oni demon nodded, his tusk ring clicking.

“OK,” I said. “The rest of us would be more comfortable if you don't yell—and if you need to yell at all, do it in English so that everyone who can't speak Japanese can understand you.”

Hick Boy chuckled at this.

“And you,” I growled, pointing up at Hick Boy. “I thought you Southerners were all about hospitality and being good ol' Christians or whatever. Where are those Southern sensibilities your mama taught you? Huh?”

“My hospitality doesn't extend to freaks,” he said.

“Bold words for a guy in flannel. It's summer and not 1976.”

I saw Mousey Girl's eyes widen with terror. I needed to calm down the situation if I didn't want to get into yet a third fight in two days, and my sassy comebacks weren't helping. I made a calming gesture and said, “I have an idea—if everyone will sit down, I think I can fix this.”

Hick Boy and oni demon stared down at me for a long moment before finally sitting down in agreement.

“Good,” I said, “Presumably you all are here to drop out.”

Several nods greeted me, with Hick Boy adding, “I didn’t sign up to go to school with a bunch of freaks.”

“I’ll get to you in a minute,” I said, glaring. “First, you.” I pointed at Mousey Girl. “You’re scared, right?”

She nodded.

“I’ve seen you around. You live in the dorms? Gardner Hall?”

“No, I live off campus. I came up to visit a friend, but—”

“You saw lots of weird creatures about, so you just went home where it’s safe?”

Again she nodded.

“So might I offer you an alternative? See that guy over there?” I gestured at the stone gargoyle. “He’s a protector. And given that he’s here, willing to leave this place, I’m willing to bet he has no one to protect. Do you?”

The gargoyle closed its stone eyes in despondence. It let out a long sigh that sounded like pepper being ground, then shook its head. I bent down close and tentatively put out my arm, as I’d read these little protectors preferred. Seeing my arm before it, the gargoyle’s eyes widened in awe. Without further hesitation, it leapt from the chair to my arm, its stone claws gripping my jacket sleeve. Ah, well—the jacket was ruined anyway. That grinding-pepper noise picked back up, but it wasn’t sighing. Was that ... was it purring? It seemed to like me. Up close, I saw that the gargoyle had several runes carved along its body—beautiful, really.

I walked over to where Mousey Girl sat, scowling at how she cowered in her seat as the gargoyle on my arm got closer. “Problem?” I pointed at Mousey Girl, then gestured to the gargoyle. “Meet Solution.” She still seemed nervous that the stone creature was so close, so I added, “Why don’t you two just go for a walk together? Out in public with lots of eyes watching you. The campus is a safe place to get to know each other. And if it works out ... well, this could be a win-win.”

Mousey Girl considered this before finally nodding and standing up. The gargoyle jumped off my arm and the two of them left together.

“Freaks,” Hick Boy snorted.

I turned to glare at him again, but what had just occurred had given me a change of heart. Instead I sighed.

“No, not freaks. Just different. You say your Southern sensibilities don’t extend to them. But is that the right thing to do? I mean, deep down?”

I walked over to the shoulder cherubs and, extending my hands, invited them to jump on. I carried them over to Hick Boy. He tried to move away, but before he could I said, “What? Scared of something smaller than a ferret?”

He shook his head defiantly and took a deep breath. “I don’t know what you are trying to do, but—”

“Shh ... just listen.”

The angels began talking in his ears and—miraculously, in a world where miracles left with the gods—Hick Boy listened. The thing about shoulder cherubs is they don’t tell you what’s right and what’s wrong; they don’t even tell you you’re right or wrong. They tell you your right and wrong. Everyone has a different moral compass. Well, not everyone ... and some of those who do have one clearly need to get it recalibrated ...

Sorry. I’ve clearly let my analogy run away from me.

The point is, shoulder cherubs ... the words they whisper into your ears are guided by that moral compass. And whatever they were saying to Hick Boy, it worked. His shoulders relaxed, his fists unclenched and he actually smiled—not the prettiest thing, but definitely an improvement for him.

I pointed to the oni demon. “Now, you. What’s your name?”

“Takashi.”

“Good. Now, Takashi, loosen that ring in your tusk and ... smile.”

The oni demon pulled out the tusk ring and tried to smile, which, judging how big those tusks were, was not an easy task, and did not yield the most aesthetically pleasing results. It was awkward, not very human-like, but somehow endearing.

“Now, might I suggest one more thing?” I said to the two monstrous smiling buffoons. “Oni demons, amongst other things, are famous for distilling their own saki.” Takashi nodded proudly. “And Southerners are famous for their bourbon. Why not have a drink together first, kill each other later? Or at least talk it out. Can you do that?”

“Hai.” Takashi bowed his head, then, correcting himself, said, “Yes.”

The good angel whispered in Hick Boy’s ear, but he didn’t move. Then the devil said something and Hick Boy’s smile turned unquestionably wicked. “Don’t mind if I do.”

The two of them left at that—although that wicked smile of Hick Boy’s was a bit worrisome. Ah, well. God didn’t create the world in a day.

Phew, I thought, sitting down in a now-empty room. That went better than expected. Satisfied with my little display, I picked up a magazine, but before I could settle I heard, “Katrina Darling? Given that you just cleared the room, I guess you’re next.”

I looked up, expecting to see a human counselor, but what—or rather, who—greeted me was Medusa.

As in the one-of-a-kind, Queen-of-the-friggin’-Gorgons, Medusa.

“Ahh, hi,” I said, gulping, trying not to stare at her snakes. “It’s a pleasure to meet you. I’m a huge fan.”

Chapter 13

SNAKES AND SAGES

Living for over three hundred years gives you a lot of time to see just about everything you want to see. But while Medusa was one of my idols, she'd only become seeable in the last four years, and I hadn't yet had the pleasure.

And believe me, the pleasure was all mine.

She was beautiful—creamy skin, flawless symmetry, everything you'd expect from a Greek goddess, all topped with the more-than-intimidating nest of vipers cascading around her head, surprisingly similar to a regular hairstyle. But what surprised me was her age. Sure, I was living proof that someone could live an incredibly long life yet still resemble a teenager, but I would never have guessed that my idol—Medusa, Queen of the Gorgons—and I would actually have something in common! As I followed her out of the waiting room, I noticed every fashionable article of clothing on her body with delight.

We have the same fashion sense! Medusa's stylish, just like me!

Oh, GoneGods, I was fangirling so hard.

Medusa led me into a tiny room just big enough for a small desk and two chairs. In an effort to maximize space, several shelves had been fashioned to the wall behind her and climbed all the way up to the ceiling. They housed all sorts of files and books, and one of them even had Medusa's purse and several of her personal effects out, like a cubby or open-ended locker. Good thing, too. This room was barely a closet.

An old PC sat on the desk. She gestured to one seat and, taking the other one, began tapping away at her keyboard. Two of her snakes rose high about her head and, using their mouths, picked up a bowl of jellybeans. They placed the bowl in front of me.

"Help yourself," Medusa said, not looking from the PC's screen.

The two snakes flicked their tongues at me. Snake hospitality?

"Johnny and Alfie are two of my nicer snakes," Medusa said, punching Enter twice on her computer keyboard. " 'Katrina Darling—Major Undeclared. Gardner resident.' Interesting—says here that under 'Roommate Preference,' you ticked none. An Other roommate?"

"Changeling."

She looked away from the screen. "Yikes—they're ..."

“Monumental tree-huggers?”

“Quite literally, in my experience,” Medusa said. She gave me an appraising look, not unkindly.

“But something tells me you can handle it. After all, you were quite resourceful in the way you handled the tension in the waiting room.”

“Thanks.”

“That said, I’m not sure how I feel about encouraging students to start drinking at,” she looked at her watch, “ten-thirty in the morning.”

“Yeah, well ...” I blushed. “College life,” I added lamely.

“So, you want to drop out?”

“I just don’t know if this place is for me. I mean—if my first day is any indication, then I definitely don’t belong here.”

“So drop out,” Medusa said without any hint of sarcasm or irony. “I did.”

“Excuse me? I heard that ... I mean, aren’t you a student here.”

“Was. They opened up the school for Others last semester and I was the first to enroll. For my one and only semester here I studied Sociology—which is really just a funny way to say ‘Studying Humans.’ I even got a 3.96 GPA. I had a full scholarship—which, given that I donated the Golden Fleece to Other Studies, they kind of owed me. Loved it here.”

“And you dropped out?”

“Yeah.”

“Why?”

The largest snake on her head dipped into her purse and pulled out a badge. “Thanks, Marty,” she said, handing it over to me.

Looking at the badge, I said, “You’re a Paradise Lot Police Officer?”

“Not yet, but if everything goes right, I will be in two years.”

“So what are you doing here? Isn’t Paradise Lot ...” I thought about it. “Where is Paradise Lot?”

“Oh, you know the place,” she said. “That island in England’s Lake District. The new home for most Other refugees. I’m not there now because the school asked me and a couple other Others to come to campus at the start of the semester to talk to humans who want to drop out because of Other attendance. They figured a familiar head of snakes such as myself”—the snakes all hissed, as if saying “Tadaaaaaa!”—“would help with the adjustment ... so, surprise, here I am.”

“And Paradise Lot Police—what’s that about?”

“I took a look around me and asked myself, ‘Where can I do the most good?’ My choices were to stay here, study humans, then get a job with some political party or activist group ... or I could go to Paradise Lot and help out my own kind there.”

“So you chose to become a cop?”

“Paradise Lot is quickly becoming the only Other-majority city in the world. You know what that means?”

“That Others enjoy a good wordplay on classic literature?”

She shook her head. “There are so many kinds of Others from different traditions, religions and folklore that the mish-mash of cultures in such a small place will mean a lot of conflicts. And right now, because Others are the newcomers, we need to prove that we can not only live on Earth but that we will be productive, peaceful citizens. If the world turns on their TV and sees fighting in Paradise Lot, their distrust of Others will only grow. I went there to do my part in keeping the peace.

“But that doesn’t mean I can’t come up here to show humans like you that we Others aren’t to be feared. After all, if the big, bad, turn-you-to-stone Medusa is a nice gal, then maybe, just maybe the other Others are nice, too. Right?”

“Yeah ... I have to say you are not what I expected.”

She leaned forward and put a hand on my arm. Several of her snakes, including the big green viper that came out of the crown of her head, winked at me. “Girlfriend—we never are,” she said with a smirk.

I chuckled.

“You have a nice laugh—and a kind smile,” Medusa said. “You’re also cute as a button, smart—a great sense of style.” She looked down at my outfit appreciatively and I enforced every ounce of my willpower to not let out a high-pitched fangirl squeak. “A girl like you should not only fit right in, you should be the belle of the ball.”

“You’d think. I mean, if you watch all those college movies ... Animal House, Revenge of the Nerds, Van Wilder—”

“—Legally Blonde,” we said in unison.

“Yeah,” I said, laughing. “Exactly. I mean—look at me. I’m basically Reese Witherspoon without the annoying voice.”

“So what’s the trouble?”

“Last night, it was ... it was terrible.”

“Yes, you’ve mentioned. What happened that was so bad?”

I shook my head. I didn’t want to rehash what happened. It did surprise me that Medusa hadn’t heard about it yet—she wanted to be a police officer, didn’t she?—but I would be feeling this way regardless of what had happened. If I were to be totally honest with myself, I was already feeling uneasy before all the stuff at the library. “It doesn’t matter,” I finally said. “Let’s just say that it’s painfully evident that I don’t fit in here.”

“Just because you had a bad day doesn’t mean you’re going to have a bad year. A day is a day. And in my experience, what happens today doesn’t predict what will happen tomorrow.”

“I think it does. If anything, it predicted that I’m not like everyone else.”

“And that’s a bad thing?” Medusa said, petting her lead snake. “If I was like everyone else, I wouldn’t have Marty here keeping me company.”

“Yeah—but you’re Medusa. You are literally a legend! I’m just—”

“A Darling.”

“Excuse me?”

“You are Katrina Darling—that’s somebody.”

“Yeah, but—”

“So drop out,” she repeated.

I looked up at her, once more surprised. Wasn’t she supposed to be trying to convince me to stay?

My shocked look was met with a kind, warm smile of understanding. “Or stay—it doesn’t matter to me. But whatever you do, do so because it is where you can do the most good.”

“That’s just the thing. I don’t know if me staying will lead to any good.”

“Do you think you can do more good somewhere else? That’s why I left.”

I didn’t say anything.

Medusa’s snakes hissed impatiently and the former Queen of the Gorgons closed my file. “For what it’s worth, I think you should stay. The way you helped the students in the waiting room proves you have a knack to bridge the divide between our species. McJames could use more students like you.”

I shook my head hesitantly. “I don’t know ...”

“And you don’t need to know. Not right now. Just think about it. Get through the weekend. From what I hear, McConnell Hall is having a big party tomorrow.”

I smiled. She hears about parties but not on-campus murders. She’d have a rude awakening at police orientation. “Yeah—the O³ costume ball. ‘Ringing in the Apocalypse.’ ”

“The apocalypse already happened, and we’re still here.”

“I know,” I said. “If I had been on the planning committee, I would have suggested the party be called something like ‘The World Without End’ or something like that.”

Medusa tilted her head, nodding in approval. More than approval—like she was proud of me or something. It felt nice to have someone so warm and inviting look at me like that, especially my literal hero.

“Yeah,” Medusa said. “Like I said—I like your style. The weekend ... OK? If it doesn’t go well, then you can come back here and drop out. Deal?”

I didn’t move.

“Deal?” she repeated with more force in her voice. I was painfully aware of every snake on her head staring at me intently, like they were trying to turn me to stone.

I nodded. Reluctantly. “Yeah, sure. Will ... will you be here?”

“Sadly, no—I’m back to Paradise Lot later today. But someone else will be here, and I’ll be sure to put in your file that you are a special case. A very special case, indeed.”

Chapter 14

THE TRUTH, THE WHOLE TRUTH, AND NOTHING BUT THE TRUTH

The Truth, the Whole Truth, and Nothing But the Truth (... So Help Me, GoneGods)

I left Student Admin feeling more confused than ever. TV dads (my primary source of fatherly advice, given that I ate mine a few centuries back) always tell their daughters that they don't have enough life experience to make the right decisions. They imply that life experience comes from age, from doing and seeing things. From living. I'd been alive for over three hundred years and I still didn't feel I had enough life experience to decide anything.

My stomach grumbled. Seeing that it was almost noon, I walked down into off-campus housing (affectionately known as the Student Ghetto) to find something to eat and—lo and behold—what is the first place I stumbled upon? A Döner kebab shop opening up.

Two birds, one kebab, I thought as I walked in, thanking the GoneGods for small miracles.

"I know what you are," I said. "You are Mergen—or rather, Mergen's avatar."

I found Mergen sitting in an alleyway behind the Religious Studies library (a building that was adjacent, but oddly unconnected to the Other Studies library).

At my words, a weak smile appeared on Mergen's face—and I knew that I was right. Or the Old Librarian had been right. He was Mergen. Score one for you, librarian. Your last point before the buzzer, I thought with a heavy heart. Mergen's eyes brightened and there was a glint of hope in them. I guess that's what happens when someone acknowledges your existence, and I suspected that in the four years that he'd been mortal, I was the first person who actually called him by his name.

The avatar was sitting on the ground, looking weaker and more emaciated than ever. His skin was also whiter. No, that wasn't it exactly—it was more ... transparent. Like he was literally fading away into nothing.

"I don't know much about you yet, except to say that you represent Truth and Wisdom—that, and you're Turkish. Which is why I got you this." I handed him the Döner kebab, which he took with a hand so absent of flesh that bone poked from his fingertips.

Picking the cleanest plot of ground near him, I sat down and unwrapped the falafel I'd bought for myself. Glancing over at the avatar dude, I noticed his expression had changed drastically. Whereas initially he looked grateful and slightly better, now he sat staring down at the sandwich, his head hung low in despair once more.

"Oh, come on!" I said. "This is from your homeland. Are you really telling me a Turkish deity doesn't eat Döner kebabs?"

He shook his head and uttered, "The truth?" It sounded like a question.

"Yes, the truth," I said. "What do you eat? A friend of mine debated this very topic with me before ... well, he's gone now."

He pursed his lips, not answering, his impossibly white skin shining in the sunlight.

"Are you a vegetarian?" I asked, taking the kebab and handing him my falafel. "I am, too. At least I am now."

He took the sandwich, which was essentially deep-fried, mashed chickpeas, and sniffed it. Then he groaned.

"Look, no judgment here. If you tell me you eat kittens, I'll help you find a kitten. I won't watch you eat, but I won't judge you either," I lied. Well, maybe not lied. I exaggerated. I would judge him. But my judgment would fall short of condemnation. After all, I'd eaten a lot worse than kittens.

A lot worse.

But he just shook his head.

"OK," I said, sliding next to him. "If you can't eat that, can I?"

He handed me back the falafel.

I ripped the foil and took a bite. I felt guilty eating in front of him, but it was a necessary part of my plan. I wanted to get this guy so hungry and frustrated, eventually he'd break and tell me what he ate that was so disgusting he just didn't want to share with me.

"You know," I said, taking another bite and speaking to him around it, trying to show him just how delicious it was. "I'm not sure I'm cut out for this place."

He nodded. I couldn't tell if he was agreeing with me or simply acknowledging my feelings.

"When I first came here, I thought: here's a place where I can have a second chance. A place where no one knows me, knows what I've done, where I've been. A fresh start. A chance to become brand new."

I heard Mergen smack his lips—presumably the Turkish godly equivalent of, I hear you, girl!

"But then I got here ... and you know what I discovered? That you may be done with the past, but the past isn't necessarily done with you. So much for a fresh, brand new start, right?"

Mergen groaned again. And not in the I'm-in-pain kind of way. More like This feels so good, it's bordering on creepy. A little nervous that Mergen was perving out on me, I turned to see what was making him so happy. He was looking right at me, the corners of his lips turned slightly upward in an expression that simultaneously had a grateful and don't-stop quality to it. But it wasn't his expression that most astonished me—it was the transformation he just went through. The avatar was still pale as ever, but he wasn't as transparent as before. And what's more, his hands had some meat to them. They almost looked normal.

“What's ... going on?” I asked, amazed that anyone or anything could change so much in so little time with no nourishment in-between.

“The truth,” he muttered.

“The truth? What are you talking about?”

Then it hit me—when I had asked him what he ate, he'd said, “The truth.” Because of the way he inflected the end of the word, I had interpreted it as a question—as in, “Do you want the truth about what I eat?” And when he didn't answer that question, I thought it was because he didn't want to tell me. But seeing how his skin fleshed out and how he perked up a bit when I told him about my own inner struggles, I realized that when I asked him what he ate and he said, “The truth,” he was telling me the truth.

This guy doesn't eat chicken or beef, lamb kebabs or broccoli. He eats Truth, with a capital T, the honest-to-the-GoneGods Truth. And me admitting what I did, me telling him how I truly felt, that fed him. “Holy crow ... you eat the Truth?”

He nodded.

“And I guess with everything going on around here, the Truth isn't in high supply, huh? People are mulling about, denying how they're fed up with the world, not really confronting what is really going on, right?”

Again he nodded, but I also noted that his skin, although still impossibly white, was gaining a little bit of meat on it.

“OK,” I said. “If I tell you some of my own Truth, will you keep it secret?”

“To my grave,” he said softly.

I believed him. After all, a creature who ate truth probably couldn't lie. That would be akin to poisoning himself.

I took a deep breath.

“I used to be a vampire. And I haven't told anyone because I'm ashamed of who I was and what I did.”

His eyes turned down and he grabbed his stomach, as if he had a belly ache.

“What's wrong?” I asked. “I didn't lie to you—it's the truth.”

“It is ... half the truth,” he said.

“Half the truth? What more do you want from me?”

“All of it.”

I started feeling a bit defensive. “I gave you all of it.”

“No ... no, you didn’t.”

“What do you mean?” I could feel my frustration rising up in me. What did this guy want? For me to bare my soul just because he was hungry? He would have to take the truth I gave him.

He gave me a knowing look. “Thank you,” he said.

“For what?”

“For trying.”

That really boiled my blood. “Trying”? Trying! I just told him my biggest, darkest secret—and it wasn’t enough? I grabbed my purse and stood up in a huff. “You know, I understand that you eat the truth and all, but you’re still a beggar. And beggars—they can’t be choosers. You should be grateful for what you can get!”

At this, his eyes widened and a satisfied smile painted his face. “Mmmm,” he moaned. “That is true. And tasty.”

I stared at him. “You’re weird.”

“Yes,” he agreed, rubbing your belly.

“And you creep me out.”

“I do, don’t I?” he said, smacking his lips.

“And I am leaving,” I said, turning on my heel.

“Yes ... that is the Truth, and it is delicious!”

Oh, brother ... I’d met a lot of Others in my life, but this Mergen guy took the prize.

Chapter 15

JESSICA FLETCHER, YOU ARE NOT DARLING

I walked up the hill in a huff, stomping my feet down with an unnecessary intensity as I made my way back to Gardener Hall. The truth? The TRUTH?! I thought (probably out loud, if we're being truthful). He wants the Truth?! Well, maybe the Truth is that a creature like him is too weak to live in the GoneGod world. Maybe he needs to get off his high horse and eat some humble pie like the rest of us. Maybe he should burn all the magic time he has left to blow smoke up his own a—

A couple students who were meandering down the hill looked at me as I passed by them. Not that I cared. I was too busy dealing with the “Truth”! Frustrated and dejected, I entered through the building’s front door and made my way to the basement stairs. All I wanted was my bed, my iPad and a movie. Preferably a slasher.

And I was so close to getting just that.

I was only a few yards away when I heard the unmistakable voice of my changeling roommate in the laundry room. “Never, you foul, disrespectful urchin!” I heard Deirdre cry out.

“What did you call me?” I heard a voice say, more in confusion than actual anger. “Look, I don’t know what your problem is, but that’s mine. I’m the one that picked it up. I get to keep it.”

“For what purpose? To display on your mantle? You did not dispatch the creature—you have no claims to keep a part of him as a trophy. This being—this piece of ‘stone,’ as you call it—deserves a proper burial. An appropriate farewell.”

“Leave him alone,” I heard another, higher-pitched voice say.

“Stone? Stone!” Deirdre’s rage was intensifying. I didn’t know the changeling well enough to know if she could control her temper or not, and my fear was that if she did lose it and attack this guy, she’d rip him to shreds. Literally. Changelings don’t mess around. Given all the resurrection magic that used to exist among the UnSeelie Court, they tended to destroy their victims’ bodies to the point of no return.

I stepped inside the laundry room—a bleak room painted orange and holding six machines. Two of them were running, their tumblers reverberating white noise as the smell of detergent and fabric softener wafted through the room. Inside, there was some kid with an Iron Man hoodie, holding his hands up as if in surrender. A classically pretty, tall blonde stood next to him in what looked like her pajamas, holding an empty white basket.

Uh-oh. She looked like she was getting ready to scream.

The kid in the hoodie took a step back and diverted his gaze. Big mistake. He just showed Deirdre that he was scared. As a fae warrior, her instincts would be to press her advantage—any true warrior would feel the same way. Destroy your enemy however you can. And if they're weak? Just means an easier victory for you.

Deirdre pulled back her fist and took a step into him. I could see immediately that she was going to knock him to the ground and, once he was on his back, use her leverage to beat his body into the linoleum floor. Before she could do it, I darted forward and clamped her arm in mine, pulling her away from the boy.

"Unhand me!" she said, lashing out at me—but as soon as she saw who I was, her eyes widened in distress and she dropped to one knee, ashamed that she almost attacked the very person she'd recently pledged her sword arm to.

Fae protocols—sometimes they could be useful.

"I am sorry, milady," she muttered in a rushed whisper.

I rolled my eyes. "Get up, Deirdre." I tried to help her up, but she wouldn't budge.

"What's going on?" the boy said, nervously laughing at the plateau before him. "What are we—in an episode of Game of Thrones?" He looked around him as if expecting Jon Snow to saunter by, and laughed again, this time derisively.

Deirdre ignored him, simply offering me the stone which had apparently caused all this ruckus. Up close, I saw what she was defending. My face flushed with rage as I stared at the fine carvings of the slab, making out the details of a cat-like eye with several medieval runes surrounding it.

The gargoyle from earlier ... and the one good deed I'd done today. Seeing it, I guessed that either the Mousey Girl did this—something I highly doubted, given her demeanor—or she'd abandoned the poor guy and he was attacked by whatever misguided human thought he was doing the world a service by killing it.

And now some idiot student wants to have a piece of the gargoyle's body as ... what? ... a freaking paper weight?

"Where did you get this?" I asked the boy.

"What's the big deal? It's just a piece of sto—"

"Where did you get this?" Now it was my turn to get in the kid's face.

His laughter had all but dried up in his throat. "I found it. In the stadium's parking lot."

"Stadium?" I pushed into him, demanding more.

"Yeah, you know, the football stadium just down the hill. The parking lot is a shortcut up to the dorms."

I hadn't been here long, but I did know about the stadium shortcut. If you entered through the parking lot and up the stairs into the stadium itself, you cut out the steepest part of the hill. A popular route for the lazy, drunk or overweight—or all three. Still, it didn't make sense that he'd found the remains of the gargoyle there. In the Student Ghetto, maybe, but the football stadium's parking lot? What was the gargoyle doing there?

I pushed him hard against the back wall of the laundry room.

"Liar," I growled.

"No, I swear!" he said, his lips quivering with fear. "I was walking home, up Pine Street and through the lot, and that's where I found it. There were a bunch of stones piled there, like someone had smashed a statue or something. I sifted through it and found that piece and ... and I thought it would look cool in my room."

"This isn't a piece of stone."

"What ... what is it?"

I could feel Deirdre standing behind me now.

"You really don't understand," I said, "do you? This is part of a gargoyle. You know—stone guardians? They tend to live on castle turrets. What you picked up and so carelessly carried around with you is the equivalent of a severed head. This is part of something that was living, breathing ... thinking. A creature who came to this place to make a better life for itself." I gripped the stone tighter as I clenched my teeth. "You should be reporting this to the police. Should you be helping them find his killer? What you absolutely shouldn't be doing is bragging to that blonde ditz about bringing home a trophy that used to be part of a person."

"Hey," she started, but I shot her a look that said it was not beneath me to beat her perfect little nose into her skull. She shut up.

I turned back to the guy. "This is a tragedy—not memorabilia. Do you understand that? Do you?"

He looked at me for a long, hard moment, his face so drained of expression that I couldn't tell if he was going to fly into a rage, cry or run away. The part of me that still yearned for the unbridled violence of my past wanted him to fly into a rage. I wanted him to attack me so I could smash his smug face into the wall and then beat him senseless. But I was calm enough to know that wouldn't help. If anything, it would get me expelled, possibly arrested (again). Sure, that would solve my dropping-out-of-college conundrum, but it would also sow more discontent between humans and Others. So I just stared him down, not saying anything more, waiting for him to make his decision.

What he finally settled on was a macho "Screw you," followed by him grabbing the blonde's hand as he pulled her out of the room. She dropped her basket as they left and I watched it teeter for a long moment, then finally settle on its base.

I looked down at my hand, at the face of a creature who only a couple hours ago was sitting in Student Admin seeking to quit this place. GoneGodDammit ... I got involved and convinced him to go with the mousey girl because I thought they could get along. Idiot!

"No, milady," said my roommate, whom I'd forgotten was standing right behind me. "It is I who is the fool. I should have never engaged the ill-informed human. I should have—”

“Deirdre,” I interrupted. The last thing I needed was a rehash of what just happened. “Do you know how to give this gargoyle a proper burial?”

Deirdre hesitated, then nodded. “If I can learn his name, then yes.”

His name—I had no idea what his name was. Trying to help, and I hadn’t even bothered to ask his name. I didn’t bother to ask any of their names. Yet another piece of proof that I wasn’t here to connect ... I was just here.

Rubbing my fingers along the curves of this once living stature, I thought about how I could find his name. Maybe when he went into Student Admin ... he must have signed in, right? That was a possibility. I sighed and handed Deirdre his cracked face. “I’ll try to find that out for you. In the meantime ... take care of him?”

“As you command,” she said.

I started out of the laundry room and toward my dorm. “One more thing,” I said as I walked away. “Stop with all this ‘as you command,’ ‘milady’ and ‘my sword arm is yours’ stuff. People don’t talk like that. Not on Earth, at least, and considering you’re an Earthly being now, you’ve got to get with the program.”

“‘Program’?” She tilted her head in confusion.

“Just act like everyone else. It’s better that way.”

I stepped into the hall and Deirdre followed me.

Walking into our room, I saw that much of the soil and grass still littered the floor, but at least it was mostly clean. Grumbling to myself, I took off my shoes and jacket, put down my purse and, without getting into my pajamas, crawled into bed.

I closed my eyes, but could feel something—or rather, someone—staring at me. Without opening my eyes, I said, “What is it, Deirdre?”

“You saw his body?”

“Whose?”

“The librarian’s?”

I groaned. “How do you know about that?”

“It is now common knowledge.”

“Which part?”

“That an Other killed the librarian—and that you bore witness to his death.”

“Not exactly. The only thing I bore was his dead body. I showed up after he had been killed. And there’s no evidence it was an Other who killed him. That’s just an assumption based on fear-driven stereotypes. Bigotry.”

“I see, mila— ... my friend.”

I thought that was it, but when I didn’t hear her move, I opened my eyes to see Deirdre slightly bent over, staring down at me.

“Is there something else, Deirdre?”

“Yes. There will be a candlelight vigil held in his honor. I wish to attend.”

“So attend,” I said.

“Will you attend with me?”

I thought about it. The Old Librarian was my friend—I think. I had only met him once, but I did like him. Attending would be appropriate. But after all that had happened, I figured it was best to never leave my dorm room again. I seemed to get in trouble when I did. I shook my head. “I don’t think so. I’m tired and—”

“In the UnSeelie Court, vigils lasted forty days and forty nights, with the warrior class standing guard over the body, our swords always at the ready.”

“What’s your point?”

“Here on Earth, I do not believe that they observe the same customs.”

“What gave you that clue?”

“This.” She pulled out a flyer from her pocket. The same one that Justin had handed me earlier. “The invitation.”

“It’s not an in—” I started, then thought better of it. “Sorry, you were saying?”

“The invitation speaks of candles and invites people to speak. It also has several religious symbols decorating its borders. The rituals of this vigil will be different than the ones I know.”

“Again, so ...?”

“I require a human escort.”

“I’m hardly human,” I said.

“Then a being that understands human rituals,” she said, evidently not getting that I was joking. “I fear that if I go alone, I will only make a fool of myself.”

“So don’t go.”

She looked at me, as if hurt. “Vigils are a requirement for one such as I. It was our duty to attend all for whom an invitation had been issued.”

She thought she was specially invited. And because of that, she was obligated to attend. Oh, brother ... she’d have been a Latter-Day Saint’s dream come true before the GrandExodus.

I thought about explaining that flyers were just a thing humans did to disseminate information, but seeing the steel in her eyes, I knew that she not only saw it as her duty to go—it was something she wanted to do.

“Attend,” I said. “But don’t take your sword.”

She gave me a longing look.

“No swords, Deirdre. And you don’t need an escort. Just do what everyone else does.”

She began to blink rapidly and if I hadn’t seen this behavior before, I would have thought she was having a seizure. But rapid blinking was the fae’s equivalent of pleading. She was—in her way—on her knees, begging me to come.

“No,” I said.

More rapid blinks.

“I’m not going.”

Now the blinks were not only faster but out of sync, too. How the hell was she doing that?

“You’re not going to stop unless I agree, are you?”

She shook her head, maintaining her manic blinks.

“Fine, fine,” I said. “We’ll go. Satisfied?”

Deirdre stopped blinking and smiled.

“Good. Now if you don’t mind ...” I said, and pulled my duvet over my head.

“If I do not mind what?”

“Please be quiet and let me nap, Deirdre!”

The room went silent. Thank the GoneGods.

Chapter 16

STICKS AND STONES HURT WAAAAY LESS THAN WORDS

I woke up to Deirdre wearing my grass-green blouse, her hair tied back in a ponytail with tiny lilac flowers in her hair and a laurel wreath on her head. She was watching the news on my iPad. I guess among her fae ethics, using my stuff without permission was nowhere in sight. I thought about reprimanding her, taking it away, but then I heard the Global News Mont-Royal news anchor start his report with “More mythical creatures being targeted in hate crimes.”

I got out of bed and asked Deirdre to turn it up. Together, we watched in horror as two satyrs were being carted away on a stretcher, a flash of an angel bleeding light on the sidewalk as police interviewed her and three pixies crying as they were taken away in the back of a police car. What wasn’t shown was the dead gargoyle—which kind of made sense. The police, like the kid in the Iron Man hoodie, would have mistaken him for a pile of rubble and not a body at a crime scene.

The anchor ended his report with, “Police theorize that these attacks are in response to the death of Dr. Dewey, who was brutally murdered by an unknown Other late last night,” signing off after that.

“Dr. Dewey?”

“The librarian,” Deirdre said. “‘Dewey’ was his surname.”

Hearing his name felt like a slap in the face. All this time, I knew him as the “Old Librarian,” and that gave some distance between us. Now that I knew his name, much of that distance was lost.

I lifted my face to the ceiling, desperately trying to stop a tear from escaping. “What else is the news saying?”

Deirdre told me. It seemed that in the six hours or so that I slept there had been a half-dozen attacks on campus. All against Others. I guess the murder of the Old Librarian—ahh, Dr. Dewey—opened the floodgates of tension. Given how dangerous Others were supposed to be, there were a hell of a lot more Others being hurt at the hands of humans than humans being hurt by Others.

But isn’t that how fear works? It turns aggressors into the righteous and victims into demons.

“This is just one report,” Deirdre said. “There are other stories on other channels.” A tiny tear ran down her cheek and fell on the iPad’s screen.

“I know,” I said, my own tear escaping.

“What can we do about it?”

“Nothing.”

Deirdre sighed heavily.

“I’m sorry, Deirdre, but there’s nothing to do. We just have to wait until the anger subsides and pray that the world comes to its senses.”

“Pray? To whom?”

I didn’t answer. There was no one to pray to. Everyone knew that.

Deirdre handed me the iPad and stood up. “Perhaps tonight’s vigil will help heal some wounds. Perhaps—”

“You can’t go to the vigil, Deirdre! You’ll be in real danger there.”

She gave me a look like I was the crazy one to consider not going.

“Look,” I explained, “there will be a lot of angry people there. Angry humans. Humans who will want to take out their frustration on an Other just like you. There’s no way. I’m not going and neither are you.”

“But I was invited. As a fae warrior, I cannot—”

“You’re no longer a fae warrior. You are a mortal creature living in a world without gods.”

“But ... but ...” She bunched her hands together, holding them so tight that her fingers turned white with the effort. “I am fae.” Two more tears escaped and rolled down her cheeks. “Oberon and Titania may have abandoned us. The UnSeelie Court and Planes of Forever Green may no longer be ... but that does not make me any less fae than I was. I am fae. I will always be fae.”

With those words, she dried her eyes and looked at the clock. “The hour is near,” she said. “I will attend the vigil—with or without my human guide.”

I’d been around the fae enough to know that once they made up their minds, nothing short of divine intervention could discourage them. And since we were all out of that, I sighed and pulled an old poncho out of my drawers. “OK—we’ll go. But you can’t dress like that.”

As we made our way down the hill to campus, I expected to see the streets filled with people shouting anti-Other chants, some fights, the air thick with tension. Anger.

Hate.

But that wasn’t the case at all. Instead, Deirdre and I found dozens of students carrying cardboard signs that read various flowery stuff like:

OTHERS DESERVE THEIR PLACE.

LOVE STILL MATTERS.

WE MUST WELCOME THE MYTHICAL REFUGEES INTO OUR HOMES.

And once we got into the vigil itself, I saw students crying, more signs, a picture of the Old Librarian surrounded by flowers and candles. The hate simply wasn't here. Well, at least it felt like that ...

But I couldn't shake the feeling that this was just the calm before the storm.

We started to make our way through the crowds because, as Deirdre put it, it was our duty to light a candle in his honor. I thought it was enough we showed up, but who was I to argue with fae logic?

Whatever, I thought as we wove through the sea of bodies. As long as we make it there and back without drawing too much attention to our—

"Ms. Darling," I heard a voice say. "It's good to see you here."

I turned to see Detective Wilcox standing behind me. And right next to her was a boy in a hoodie who looked like he'd like to be in a million other places than on this field at this time.

"Detective Wilcox. Good to see you here, too," I said. "And hi, Nate. How's it going?"

Nate shrugged.

"OK," I said, wondering what his problem was. "Is Justin here, too?"

Nate didn't look up, simply pointing at the founder statue. "He's setting up for his big speech."

"I see that you're already acquainted with my cousin," Wilcox said.

"I am. Sort of. He mostly made fun of me. Something about Weird Girl and his friend, Justin."

"Is that true, dear cousin?" Wilcox said, pinching his cheeks in that exaggerated way you did to kids when you wanted to ensure them of their cuteness.

Nate pulled away in anger, slapping her hand away. "Bitch," he said.

"Excuse me?" Detective Wilcox said, seriousness flooding her face.

"Not you—her," Nate said.

Now it was my turn. "Excuse me?" Deirdre took a step forward, but I held out a hand. "I can handle this. Now, again, excuse me?"

Nate looked up, finally pulling his hoodie off his head. "You heard me. Bitch." He took a step forward.

"What is your problem?"

He pointed at the Other Studies library and whispered, "My cousin here says you're not the killer, but I saw you on with those hockey players."

"I was defending that poor Other beggar. And besides, all I did was give them a bloody nose. I didn't string them up or—"

That's when Nate pushed me. And I don't mean a gentle, get-out-of-my-way nudge. It was a full-on shove, and since I wasn't expecting it, I landed hard on my ass.

Deirdre immediately got between us, and if I had waited a second longer, she might have shoved him back. Being shoved by a human might get you on the floor, but being shoved by a pissed-off changeling—that was likely to send you to the next block.

“Don’t, Deirdre. It’s not worth it.” Deirdre gave me a confused look as I clambered back to my feet, so I added—just for good measure—“Against human protocol to fight at a vigil. Nate here dishonors the Old Librarian—”

“Dr. Dewey,” Deirdre said.

“Yes, Dr. Dewey.” I gave Nate a cold, hard stare, then flashed the fakest smile I could muster. Turning to Detective Wilcox, I noticed she hadn’t moved. She must have been just as shocked as I was. “I don’t know what your problem is, Nate,” I said, “but I liked Dr. Dewey. And even if I didn’t, I would have never—”

That’s when Nate spit in my face.

I lunged at him, and if it hadn’t been for Deirdre taking my No-fighting-at-vigils comment seriously, it would have been Nate knocked on his ass. That, and Wilcox stepping between us. From her expression, I could tell she didn’t know if she should hit me or reprimand Nate.

Pointing a threatening finger in Nate’s face, I said, “This isn’t over.”

I pulled Deirdre close and we made our way to the memorial. I glanced over my shoulder to see Nate and Wilcox watching me walk away. Wilcox still had a puzzled look on her face, but Nate ...

Nate was smiling.

We passed by students strumming guitars, singing hymns, reciting poetry, lighting candles—all paying homage to a man that virtually none of them knew. And yet I could sense that their misery was genuine. They truly felt the loss. Why? How could they lament the loss of someone they never knew? Was it fear that something happened so close to them? Fear that if it happened to him, it could happen to them?

Or maybe it was something else ... a human thing. Humans crying for humans? I doubted that, too. I’d seen so many wars and random killing—hell, I committed many of those—and I’d never seen this kind of reaction.

No, there was something else going on. But what it was, I could not tell.

And then I saw Deirdre crying and knew that it wasn’t just humans that were being affected. Whatever they felt, Deirdre felt it, too.

Wrongful, violent death shakes us all, I thought.

Deirdre nodded in agreement.

OK—so we all felt his death. Very well, then ... let me pay my respects. We got near the image of him; looking into the frozen image of his kind blue eyes, I knelt down and picked up a candle that had gone out and lit it from the flame of another.

I stared at his image for a long moment, wondering how my life would be different here if he were alive and well—and my boss. I wondered if our friendship would have grown. I suspected it would. After all, we'd be spending a lot of time together, shelving books, categorizing the museum collection, taking care of the old building's needs. That would have been a good thing—but now it was gone.

And soon, I'll be gone, too, I thought, shaking my head and crying.

A hand touched my shoulder. I whirled to see Egya standing behind me.

“Why,” I said, “do you always show up when I least want you to? Which is to say, why do you show up at all?”

But Egya wasn't paying attention to me. He was pointedly looking everywhere else but me, his eyes shifting back and forth.

“What is it?” I said, whispering now and drawing closer.

“Look,” he said.

I turned to see that most of the people standing immediately around the memorial were looking at us, no longer speaking, just staring in silence. Their tears were turning into curled lips and clenched fists. But why would they direct their anger at me? Was it because I was there at his death? How could they know who I was? As far as any of them knew, I was just another student paying her respects. I scanned the area around me for Deirdre. She was standing about ten feet away from me, under the canopy of the old oak tree. Her hood was still over her head and she was looking down, mournful and lost in her own grief.

“Sheesh,” I said. “What's everyone's problem?”

“Come,” Egya said softly, “walk with me and watch their eyes.”

We walked over to Deirdre. As we did, everyone who was within ten meters of us looked up at our passing and stared, hate painting their faces. But that wasn't the strangest thing about this. As people fell outside of the ten meters, they'd stop staring at us and continue their conversations as if they hadn't been trying to bore holes in us with their eyes.

“A curse,” I whispered.

“Strange guess for someone who is just a human girl,” Egya said. Then he shook his head. “This is not a curse—there is too much emotion. This ... is a hex.”

I swallowed, digesting what he'd just said.

A hex was serious business. Think of them as suped-up versions of curses, the difference being a curse was a general suggestion that things “go wrong” for its intended victim—bad luck, disease, poverty, lost love, even death—but because it was just a suggestion, a gentle nudge that things fall apart, it can take forever to happen, if it happens at all. It is entirely possible the intended victim's immunity (as in the case of disease) is strong enough to ward off the curse. Or perhaps the target is incredibly lucky or rich or in love, and thus the curse falls flat.

A hex was something else entirely. The right hex, with the right amount of time burnt for the proper amount of magic, not only causes bad luck, disease, poverty, lost love or even death—you can get really specific with its terms and conditions. Say you wanted the victim to die in a spectacular fashion, maybe get hit by a bus. No problem. The victim will find themselves wandering into a highway for no reason at all. Lost love? The intended victim will happily take photos of themselves with a sheep (in the, erm, biblical sense) and send it to their lover with the subject line: I've found someone who fulfills me in ways you never could.

Hexes were the Terminators of curses.

I closed my eyes. Even when I couldn't see the people glaring at us, I could still feel their rage. But to say that they were merely angry at us would be wrong. The hatred they focused on us was palpable. You could literally feel it. And I don't mean that as a euphemism or an exaggeration. I mean that making eye contact with them created a sense of tension that felt as if someone had wrapped a garroting thread around us and was pulling. Hard.

But I couldn't let Egya know that I—someone who was just a girl—knew the difference between hexes and curses, so mustering all the acting skills I'd learned from day-time soaps, I widened my eyes. In a worried, trembling voice, I asked, "What's the difference?"

He smirked at this question—evidently not believing my Days of Our Lives shock. "One is bad. One is terrible. But at least hexes have one thing to our advantage. They don't last long. Too much burnt time is needed to keep them up."

"Why us?" I whispered.

He cocked a thumb toward the library. "Not us ... you."

"Me? How do you know?"

"I've been following their eyes. Always trained on you. Not your changeling friend. Not me. You."

I scanned the crowd as we reached Deirdre. Egya was right—all eyes were on me.

I nodded. "OK, it's me. But why?"

Egya shrugged. "Isn't it obvious? You disrupted the killer's ritual and he wants you to suffer for it. This killer of yours is a vengeful spirit."

"But if I am the focal point, then why aren't you affected? Or Deirdre? Why aren't you two staring at me like you wanna spill my guts?"

He shrugged again. "Because we know you."

I gave him a look. "Hardly."

"We know you enough to know you aren't our enemy. But they"—he pointed to the crowd—"they don't know you from Eve ... and that is all that is needed to turn a stranger into an enemy."

"Fine. Let's say I believe you. What kind of 'fun' exactly did I interrupt?"

“Not fun. Ritual. Do you really think Dr. Dewey was strung up for fun, just-a-girl?”

“Don’t call me that—and yes, why not?”

Egya narrowed his eyes like he was trying to figure me out. “What kind of killers would go to such lengths ‘just for fun’? No—the killer was performing a ritual, preparing the body for something ... bigger.”

The thought that the killer wasn’t just maiming the librarian for his or her twisted amusement hadn’t really crossed my mind. To be honest, I used to kill for fun ... I guess I assumed that if I did so, then most killers would be like me.

“What ritual?” I asked.

“I have no idea. And we don’t have time to consider this now.” Egya pointed at two boys who were starting to walk toward us. They were two of the three hockey players from yesterday—the ones who had been picking on Mergen—the big one with the now-thrice-broken nose and the short one with the unfortunate ponytail. “Their hate will turn to rage. The rage that will be directed at you—and anyone they consider to be your friend.” He gestured at Deirdre, and I could see the third hockey player walking toward her.

I walked over to Deirdre and whispered, “Pull your hood on tight and get rid of those leaves. We’re leaving.”

“Why?” she gurgled between her own tears. “We just got here and I have yet to sing ‘The Solemn Ode to the Dead.’ ”

“We’ve got to go. Now. Move it.”

Deirdre might have been a bubbling mess of emotions, but she was, first and foremost, a trained warrior. And as a trained warrior, you learn to trust the instincts of those around you—especially those you have pledged your sword arm to.

Without bothering to wipe away her tears, she plucked the leaves from her head, dropping them to the grass at her feet, and swept her hood over her head.

“Good,” I muttered. “Let’s go.” Grabbing her by the arm, I guided her toward the main gate. It was only a few feet in front of us when the two hockey players from earlier blocked our way.

“The Other lover,” Broken Nose said. His voice was comically nasally with that plaster cast covering his schnoz. “What are you doing here?”

“Same as everyone else,” I growled. “Paying my respects.” I tried to push past them.

Without warning, Ponytail pulled at my ponytail—ironic, really—at which point Deirdre grabbed his wrist and squeezed.

“Ahh—”

But before he could let out a full scream, I covered his mouth.

“Deirdre, let him go,” I said.

She did as I asked.

Broken Nose tried to intervene, but I put a finger up to his lips, just touching the bottom of his casted nose so that his eyes watered with pain. I said, “Not here and not now. I will not let Dr. Dewey be disrespected by the lot of you. So if you want me, come get me. Bring your brood—” I gestured around us with my chin and suddenly saw that it wasn’t just the three boys I’d seen walking toward us. Three more of their hockey friends had joined them ... plus, there were a lot more students ready to join the fight all around us. I gulped and repeated, “Bring your brood. We’ll be waiting in the alleyway behind the bookstore.”

I held onto Ponytail’s mouth while Broken Nose considered this. Before he could object, I added, “Besides—look around you. See all the campus security? We don’t want them interrupting a good fight, do we?”

I pointed to several security guards mulling about.

Broken Nose looked around and nodded. “Behind the campus bookstore,” he agreed, a cocky smile creeping in the corners of his lips. “How do I know you’ll be there?”

“Because,” I said, finally pushing Ponytail away and brushing past them. “You can follow me there right now.”

“Brave girl,” Egya said, pulling in close to me.

“Not brave,” I muttered to him as we walked through the crowd. “If hexes work the way I think they do, a fight in this place will only mean we have to face off against more and more people as it grows in strength. We can take care of a half-dozen testosterone-fueled idiots, can’t we?”

Egya snorted in answer.

“But,” I continued, “I have another reason why I want an alleyway showdown. If this is a hex, then the killer must be somewhere nearby, right? He—”

“Or she.”

“—or she—may even join the fight. It will be easier to pick him or her out behind the bookstore.”

“Pick him or her out as we’re being stomped to a pulp,” Egya said. “Excellent plan.”

“Oh, don’t be so dramatic. We have a changeling warrior with us.”

Egya looked over at Deirdre, who was cracking her fingers, Bruce Lee–style, as she walked just behind us. “Indeed,” he said, grinning. “Indeed we do.”

“Besides,” I said as we made our way to the main gate. “I meant what I said. Dr. Dewey deserves more than having a fight break out at his memorial.”

Just as we made our way off campus, a speaker scratched, cutting through the general noise of the crowd. Looking back, I saw Justin holding a mic attached to a portable speaker. He was standing on the rim of the water fountain base, the founder’s statue beside him. He suddenly looked like some ancient Roman god giving the opening commencement for a spring festival.

And somehow, as if the fates were conspiring against me, our eyes met as Egya continued to pull me away. I was walking out on his speech ... and he saw me doing it.

Maybe I was also cursed?

Chapter 17

UP, UP AND AWAY!

The main campus was a roughly square gated area that covered a dozen or so acres in the middle of the city. Immediately surrounding campus were several buildings that played supportive roles to the education of a future generation. School supply shops, buildings that housed more classrooms, the smaller libraries or study rooms, and student cafés, restaurants and bars.

The bookstore was the largest building adjacent to campus; an alleyway cut between it and the Faculty of Management building. Since the alleyway was between the bookstore and the lamest faculty building, I figured it would be empty.

I figured wrong.

Mergen was sitting there leafing through a basket of old books he probably got from some charity shop for pennies. From the way he scanned the pages, I figured he wasn't finding much to eat in Harlequin romances, old westerns and hard-boiled detective novels. Still, he wasn't looking as emaciated as he'd been just earlier today, so I guess those old trash novels weren't completely devoid of truth.

That, or he was still getting nourishment from my little outburst earlier.

Mergen looked up as we walked by and I considered ignoring him, but quickly realized that wouldn't work. The hex was on me—me ... and anyone considered my ally. Three of the mob following us had been on the receiving end when I defended the pale white rider, and one of them was sporting a broken nose from it. They'd see him as a bonus.

"Follow me," I said. "Your life might just depend on it."

"Mmm," Mergen said, licking his lips. "Yes, it just might."

I drew the crowd into the alleyway, careful to pull them into the far end so that we—as in my “gang”—were actually spilling out into the other exit. That way, I figured, they couldn't sneak up on us and block off our escape route. I was hoping that this way we would get there and, seeing who showed up, I'd have a fairly good sense of who the killer was. We'd fight—maybe. Normally I'd think this would digress into some posturing, a bit of blustering bravado, insults and maybe a few shoves, before fizzling out into nothing. After all, these kids didn't want to get into a fight any more than we wanted to have one. Unless maybe their leader was going for a record and wanted his nose broken again.

But we were hexed—which means they were compelled to attack.

No worries, I thought—I'd already seen how Egya could handle himself, and Deirdre was a born warrior. Mergen was my only concern, and he was the freaking avatar of the Turkish god of war and wisdom.

"I think this is far enough," said Broken Nose, and in this dark alley, that ridiculous nasal voice was even more comical. "We don't want to be on the main road and attract the wrong kind of attention, right?"

So let's let the blustering bravado begin, I thought.

Egya and a couple of the hockey minions chuckled at this. So they weren't so far under the spell that they didn't see the absurdity of the situation. Good, I thought, silently this time, I can work with that.

I stared at an asshole who, when unhexed, had wanted to pummel a poor defenseless Other for the crime of being different. Hexed asshole and unhexed asshole were pretty much the same guy—just minus any inhibition, common sense or fear. A fight was coming. I knew it. He knew it. Everyone here knew it. Which meant there were really only two questions left to be answered.

Was the guy (or gal) responsible for the hex in the crowd?

And how long until my side ran?

I scanned the crowd. As far as I could tell, everyone was human. A hex—as powerful as it was—needed magic. And since magic left with the gods, a human conjuror was out. Sure, in the old days, a human witch, shaman, warlock or mage could have cast a spell like this, but he (or she) would have sold their soul to a demon, fae or whatever malevolent spirit said spellcaster ascribed to. But those days were gone (as was evident by my lost appetite for blood), so that meant that the caster would have to be an Other.

And there were no Others in the crowd.

The only Others here were on my side, and despite desperately wanting to be human—with all their idiosyncrasies and pettiness—I was on theirs.

All that I saw were the three assholes from yesterday and three more of their hockey friends, a group of cheerleaders, four goth kids (of everyone I saw, you'd think they'd be on our side at least) and—crap—one of Justin's frat brothers. I didn't know his name, but he had been there when Nate teased us.

Of everyone here, he was the only one who knew me—well, knew of me. He knew his O³ Bro and I were flirting, and that he'd have a lot of explaining to do if he went back to the dorm with my blood on his hands. Maybe I could use that.

"So," I said, "how does this start?"

“That’s a great question,” Broken Nose answered. “Since it’s going to end with your funeral, and since civility didn’t leave with the gods, I’ll let you tell me how this all starts.”

“We could not do this,” I offered.

“Oh no,” he said, sneering. “This is happening.”

Mergen affirmed this by smacking his lips in agreement. Guess this guy ate Truth even when it was being served up with a beating.

“Why?” I said, ignoring the Truth of the situation. “Come on—you have to feel that this is wrong, don’t you?” I gestured at the crowd. “Why do you all hate me so much? Most of you don’t even know me. And as for you—the only person who kind of knows me,” I pointed at Justin’s friend, “am I really that bad of a person that I deserve what’s about to happen?”

Reasoning with the angry mob—if only Frankenstein, Dracula, Quasimodo or the Beast thought of trying. Probably ... and then took one look into their rage-filled eyes and opted for the fight-or-flight options.

Justin’s friend gave me a regretful look before lowering his head. “Ah, Justin ... Justin really likes you.”

I looked at Mergen for confirmation, but he just shrugged. I guess when it comes to matters of the heart, Truth is murky. Still, I thought, given that this guy is being compelled to hurt me, I’m going to give his revelation the benefit of the doubt—Justin likes me. Yay!

“Ahh, Kat—this is not the time,” Egya whispered in my ear.

“I said that out loud, didn’t I?”

“Indeed.”

“Sorry,” I muttered. I pointed at the O³ Bro. “So if Justin, your friend, likes me, can I be as bad as you evidently feel about me? Or maybe, just maybe, there’s something wrong going on here.”

He shook his head, then nodded. “Maybe ... it’s all so confusing.” He hit his forehead with the palm of his hand. “So muddled.”

“Friends—lend me your ears.”

“Kat ...” Egya whispered. “What are you doing?”

“Quoting Shakespeare.”

“You’re quoting a guy stabbed multiple times by his friends.”

“Whatever—just shush and let me work my charm.” I turned back to the crowd, lifted my left hand and placed my right hand over my heart. I called out, “You do not wish to hurt me—us. Don’t you see? Dr. Dewey’s killer wants to distract us by causing distrust and anger. There is an evil spell afoot, cast to sow the seeds of distrust and anger. Let us not give him—or her—the satisfaction. Let us walk away and foil this evil plan.”

I turned to my friends. Mergen groaned, but Deirdre was nodding in approval.

Egya, on the other hand, eyed me with confusion. “Why are you speaking like that?”

“Gravitas—more likely to break the spell with it than without.”

“Is it?” he asked, then, grabbing me with lightning-fast reflexes, he pulled me several inches to the right just as a beer bottle flew by. “Perhaps not as effective as you think.”

I turned to see the crowd shifting their weight from foot to foot as they prepared to advance. Looking over at Justin’s Bro, the only one who expressed doubt, I saw that he had traded his confused eyes for clenched fists. He cracked his knuckles in that I-got-a-tough-job-ahead-of-me sort of way and took a step forward.

So much for talking them out of this.

“OK,” I said. “Time for Plan B.”

“Plan B?” Deirdre asked, stepping forward so that she stood shoulder to shoulder with me.

“Yep, Plan B.” I kicked Broken Nose in the shin and as he went down, I punched him in the broken nose, breaking the plaster cast. The pain knocked him out cold. I looked at the remaining seventeen people and assessed my options.

Then I turned around and ran.

Have you ever been chased by an angry mob through a modern city that prides itself on being tolerant? If not, you’re missing out.

There’s a certain brand of ire that rolls off all the citizens like waves of heat as you run past them. First, they watch as you run past them, confusion painting their faces, perhaps saying to one another:

“Why are two humans and two Others being chased?”

“Is this right?”

“Aren’t we welcoming to Others?”

“Should we call someone?”

But then, as you pass by them and the hex takes hold, that confusion becomes certainty:

These four are guilty of something—not sure what, but that doesn’t matter.

What matters is they are captured—brought to justice.

Better yet—dealt with.

These four are clearly evil!

And finally: The mob chasing them will need help. Our help.

Which effectively meant that the angry mob grew every time we passed a pedestrian, person sitting outside or dog walker. I even saw two drivers abandon their cars just so they could chase us on foot.

We ran out of the alley and up toward the mountain. It was night, and I figured that the best place to lose them was up where there were no street lamps, limited population to fall under the hex and lots of trees casting moonshadows to hide under. Still, that meant running uphill and past Gerts, the campus bar, where a bunch of students who had opted to skip the vigil were standing outside smoking.

Before we even passed them, they were flicking away their cigarettes or pocketing their vaping devices and trying to block our way. I had to knee one of them in the—ahem—family jewels, and elbow another's nose to get past.

How many noses does a girl have to break to get left the hell alone?

Egya chose a more elegant solution—he jumped on a parked car and used the height advantage to jump clear over them. Elegant, indeed, especially when compared to Deirdre, who opted to clothesline several guys before they even had a chance to pocket their lighters. Mergen, however, was less suited to get past them. Deirdre and I had to double back, flattening two girls who were literally trying to tie him up with their cardigans.

We got past them just as the main mob caught up.

“We need to get out of the city!” Egya yelled. “Up there.” He pointed at the beginning of the mountain’s tree line. “If we could just get in there before they tear us apart, we might be able to lose them.”

We ran and ran some more, until finally we arrived. There was our potential salvation, a neat line of trees heralding the entrance to a vast forest—and all we had to do was cross a four-lane road ... that was currently bumper-to-bumper traffic.

Perfect!

“Jump over the hoods!” I yelled, taking a leaf from Egya’s book.

Egya nodded appreciatively, but Deirdre didn’t immediately understand my reasoning and opted to run between two cars. Before she even got through, the white reverse lights of the lead car lit up and the back car's engine revved. The two cars collided into each other as they tried to pinch her between back and front bumpers.

“Deirdre!” I screamed.

Fortunately, changelings have lightning-fast reflexes. She managed to jump straight up and onto the back car’s hood before she was caught. The driver, who, under the powers of the hex, also had fast reflexes, threw his car into Reverse. Deirdre fell. Then he floored the car again, trying to throw her into the car in front of his.

Deirdre managed to get to her feet just as I jumped onto my first hood, where that driver did the same thing, trying to knock me on my feet.

This was the worse game of Frogger I’d ever played—and given that I was helping Mergen cross, it wasn’t loading well for me ... at this pace, the crowd would catch up and tear us to shreds.

So I did the only thing I could think of—I jumped back off the car and opened the driver’s door. I yanked the driver out and, pushing Mergen through to the passenger’s side, made an impromptu tunnel for us.

Then I grabbed the next driver and, using a kickboxing move I learned in Bangkok, swiped her feet and knock her down on the ground. I gestured to Mergen to move his ass and we burrowed through the second car.

Two lanes crossed. Frogger Level 50% Complete. Only two more cars and we'd be at the tree line.

Except, by now, the two other cars were savvy to my strategy and had simply locked their doors to foil me.

Mergen and I were trapped, with the angry mob only meters behind us. I was looking for an escape when I heard the deep honk of a city bus and saw that several cars back, Egya had hijacked the transportation vehicle.

He slammed on the accelerator and the two cars in front of us slammed into each other, which stopped the cars from doing their back-and-forth trick. He'd also managed to use the sheer size of the bus to do the same thing to the cars in the fourth and final lane. This made jumping over their bonnets relatively safe. Mergen and I, thankful for the assist, wasted no time getting across the other two lanes over the tops of the cars.

"Thanks!" I yelled as we made it to the tree line. Egya honked his reply.

Once inside, we ran up the middle of the woods. My plan was to get to Beaver Lake, where there were a few buildings for us to break into and hide. I turned to see the angry mob breaking through the tree line. We were only about forty feet ahead of them, but at least, being in this brush, we were out of their line of sight.

"Come on—let's move," I whispered.

Deirdre grabbed my arm and stopped me.

"No," she said. "I have a better idea."

"What are you doing? We've got to keep moving," I said.

But Deirdre didn't move. She just placed a calm finger over her lips, shushing me. She faced the road. I could hear the angry mob only yards away. A few more seconds and they'd be parallel with us. All it would take was one of them to look to their right and we'd be sunk.

But Deirdre just stood stock still, almost defiantly so. I suddenly worried that she planned to do something stupid and attack the human mob. But Deirdre didn't attack. She ... swooned—as in lightly swayed back and forth, her feet planted firmly in place. Then, fanning out her fingers and twirling them so it looked like she was playing some invisible piano, she began to hum.

"Deirdre! Be quiet," I whispered harshly, taking a step forward. If she wasn't going to shut up, I'd have to shut her up.

Egya stopped me. "Kat ... look." He pointed at the ground.

What I saw was nothing short of a miracle.

The earth around us began to move. No, "move" was the wrong word ... moving implies that something shifted from one place to another. The brush didn't just shift. It grew and expanded and intertwined itself until it formed a canopy in front of us that blocked the view from the road—but what was odd was that we could still see the road. Like window blinds, the leaves angled themselves so that we had a one-way view out while blocking the view in. And what was most spectacular about what was happening was the brush didn't make any noise as it twisted and angled, grew and intertwined.

It was completely silent.

The angry mob ran past us, completely unaware. I could hear Ponytail cry out, "They must be at the lake." The rallying cry of determined and violent humans followed, and we heard the scamper of feet continue along the path.

After a long minute, the footsteps faded into the darkness and we were alone.

Deirdre turned to me, smiling, proud of what she'd just done. "Camouflage—fae style," she said simply.

I nodded curtly. "How long?"

Deirdre tilted her head to one side in confusion.

"You burnt time, right? To create the magic that did this?"

She nodded.

"How long?"

She didn't answer.

"How long?" I growled.

"Twelve hours."

I stared at her. "Twelve hours? Do you know what you can do with twelve hours? And you wasted them—threw that precious time away—and for what? We could have outrun them."

"Kat," Egya interjected, "I disagree. We were pretty far away from them for a while, and we're even farther away now, but they're still an angry mob. Even outside of the hex. They wouldn't have let us just run away."

I looked around at my hapless crew. "That doesn't justify what Deirdre did, Egya. She wasted twelve hours of her life. For nothing."

Mergen groaned.

"Shut up—just because you don't like the taste of something, doesn't make it a lie."

Mergen smacked his lips.

"We could have outrun them," I repeated, my rage bubbling.

Deirdre stared down at the ground.

"Kat," Egya said. "The girl did what she thought was best. She sacrificed her time to save us. You should be more—"

"What? Grateful? Grateful that I'm on top of a volcano with you? Grateful that someone is trying to kill me? Grateful that my fellow students want to string me up?"

"The hex will wear off by morning."

"But how do you know? You just said they're outside the range of the hex. So how do you know?"

Egya's cold glare was all I got as an answer.

"Fine—it will wear off by morning. What do we do until then?"

Without turning around, Egya pointed up toward the huge neon cross at the top of the hill, to the right of where the mob had run. “We rest.”

“Oh, great,” I said, pushing past him. “We rest.” I trekked up the hill toward the neon cross and my bed for the night.

Here I was—an ex-vampire—sitting under a Christian crucifix, the symbol that I feared for three hundred years and now used as sanctuary, on top of a GoneGodsDamned volcano and waiting for dawn so that an angry mob hexed out of their minds wouldn’t kill me.

Great advice to stay, Medusa, I thought, not caring if it was in my head or aloud.

As I reached the cross, I wondered if there was a worse place for me to be.

END OF PART 3

PART V

Cue in the dramatic pause, look around the audience, make eye contact. That’s very important—eye contact. That’s the one commonality between Others and humans—neither group can ignore eye contact. Then take a deep breath. Give them your best wicked smile. You know the one—the golden smile that has gotten you your way so many times before. The smile that says you are smart but down-to-earth. Beautiful, but somehow still approachable. Young, but wise.

“I know what many of you are thinking. How do I know something that so many scholars, philosophers, scientists, politicians and theologians don’t know? The answer is simple—they know, too. They just don’t have the balls to say it.”

Cue the fencing—just so the audience knows there is no escape.

Begin the incantation. Evoke Huitzilopochtli. Evoke Shang Ti, Moloch, Kū, Re—even Yahweh. After all, the Old Testament was full of animal sacrifices. What is a human but an upgrade?

“They left because we forgot who they were.”

Push the scared little students into the center of the field. Then randomly point at someone young and frail—but pick carefully. You need the first sacrifice to be a screamer. Wait silently as the first sacrifice is tied to the tabernacle—the stone lip of the dried-up fountain. Once the virgin is secure, resume your speech.

“They left because we forgot who we were.”

Pull out the knife. The virgin will scream, so wait it out. If he or she doesn’t stop after, say, ten seconds, gag them. Remember: at this point, the party will probably think this is all part of the show. It won’t be until the blood starts flowing that they’ll realize what’s truly going on. Realize that they are all doomed to the same fate.

“Well, it’s time to remind us all—god and mortal alike—just who and what we are.”

Run the knife's tip along the virgin's body. Take it slow.

“Once that happens, they'll come back.”

Stab, stab, stab.

“Did I mention my speech was going to kill?”

Chapter 18

ON A HILL, BENEATH A NEON CROSS, WAITING FOR DAWN

Day One of University: Witness a gruesome murder and defeat a giant bulldog.

Day Two of University: Spend the morning hours being interrogated by a detective and the nighttime hours being chased by an angry mob.

And before Day Three even begins, I'm hiding out beneath a giant neon cross crowning an inactive volcano. My companions include a changeling, the physical representation of Mergen the Turkish god of War and Wisdom—a creature who feeds on, might I add, the Truth—and some guy from Ghana who thinks he knows me.

"I do know you," Egya called out. "I know what you were and who you are."

GoneGodsDammit—talking out loud again. "Private thought," I yelled back.

"I also know what you will become if you don't face your past."

"Oh, and what's that?" I hoisted myself off the mesh fence that surrounded the base of the cross and walked up to Egya. I might not have had my vampiric strength anymore, but I still knew karate, kung fu, Krav Maga, Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu, as well as Scottish- and aikido-based swordplay ... and I was looking for a fight.

Egya made a growling noise. Not like a dog. This sounded more like someone trying to suppress a laugh. A menacing, scary, soul-shaking laugh.

Deirdre stood behind me. "If you lay a hand on Lady Darling, I shall—"

"Yeah, yeah," Egya said, stepping back. "I won't touch her. I don't hit girls."

Mergen groaned at this, clutching his stomach in pain.

"Sentient lie detector," I said, pointing at the avatar.

"Fine," he said. "I don't hit girls ... unless in the heat of battle, and said girl," he pointed at me, "is an ex—"

"Don't you say it," I warned.

"—something-or-Other," Egya said, giving emphasis to that last word purposefully, "who is more than capable of defending herself. But I would never, ever hurt the defenseless or weak."

At this Mergen hummed and rubbed his belly in satisfaction.

I looked at Mergen, the sentient lie detector. How can that be the Truth? I thought.

"I'm not the hapless agent of chaos you think I am," Egya said. "Believe it or not, I want to help you.”

Mergen licked his lips.

“See?” Egya said, pointing at Mergen.

“Help me? How? You mean like you did on campus?”

“I saved you.”

“Again—how? Were you the one who had to re-break a nose that probably looks like a dumpster fire by now?”

“If it wasn’t for me, you wouldn’t have noticed the hex. And before you say anything—we all know you know exactly what a hex is ... so don’t play stupid with us.”

Mergen sucked on his fingers one at a time, as if licking off barbecue sauce.

“You”—I pointed at the ghostly white avatar—“stop that. And you ...” I looked back at Egya.

“Why do you want to help me so badly?”

“Because,” Egya said, “I know the cost of running from your past.”

“I’m not running from anything.”

“So that wasn’t you going to Student Admin to drop out just two days into the semester?”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about!”

Mergen groaned and made a face like he just accidentally drank sour milk.

Deirdre looked at me, a look of hurt surprise on her face. “You are leaving?”

“No.”

Mergen spat on the ground.

“I mean, yes.”

I looked at Mergen, who continued to make a disapproving face.

“Maybe,” I said.

At that, Mergen smiled.

“I haven’t decided yet,” I admitted. “But it’s hard. I mean ...” I gestured around us. “This is only my third night here.”

“It will get easier,” Egya said. “You are only beginning your journey.”

That really annoyed me. “Look here, Yoda,” I said. “You can pretend to be the wise little sage that knows more about me than I know about myself, and you might have once-upon-a-time been a were-dog—”

“Hyena.”

“Were-pain-in-my-ass! Whatever you were, you’re not that anymore. Now you’re a human. A human like me. A stupid, worthless, broken human!” I cried out.

I don’t know what happened exactly, but saying those words unleashed something in me. I started sobbing, still speaking between gasps. “It’s just so hard. I mean—one minute you’re—a supernatural predator that eats people—and the next—you’re just—people.”

I walked over to the mesh fence and looked up at the cross, basking in its neon halo. I calmed down, taking deep breaths and wiping the tears from my face. “Not too long ago, the sight of a cross would have sent me running. Its power protected those who believed in it from monsters like me.”

Deirdre walked up behind me and put a hand on my shoulder. “A symbol that offers protection for those who wish it to.”

I nodded. “But now, here, under this monstrous thing, I feel ... nothing. Neither fear nor comfort. To me, this cross is just a piece of decoration on top of a hill.”

“But Lady Kat, is that not a good thing?” Deirdre drew in close. “This symbol can no longer cast its oppressive shadow over you. You are free.”

“But that’s just the thing. I don’t feel happy, I don’t feel free. I don’t feel anything. About this cross, about being human again, about ...” I stopped myself.

There was a long silence before Deirdre, the fae pain-in-my-ass, asked a question I did not have the courage to ask myself.

“Lady Kat, are you without ... pain?”

I nodded.

Deirdre straightened her back and lowered her hands to her side so she resembled a tree trunk without branches—the fae’s body language for concern or worry. “That is not good, Lady Kat. We fae believe that true life resides in the throes of emotion, be it comforting or adversarial.”

Tears spilled down my face once more. “When we vampires became human, there was a lot of confusion. We lost our fangs, our powers and super-human strength and senses. And we also lost our need to drink human blood. This caused us more confusion than you might think. For one thing, all the horrible things we did when we were demons came flooding back to us. Being human meant having a human conscience. And a conscience is a heavy burden.

“Most of us—at least amongst the ex-vampires I spoke to—decided on two things. One, we’d do our best to atone for what we had done. And two, we’d try to forgive ourselves. After all, it was the demon within us that killed all those people. And that demon’s gone now. That has to count for something.”

I had been staring up at the cross once more, but now I turned and looked back at everyone. “Well, it doesn’t, and I will say one thing about forgiveness. It doesn’t come easy. Because I wasn’t sure I could ever let go of the guilt, I decided to focus on atonement. That’s why,” I said, turning to Mergen, “I saved you from those hockey players, why I thought to feed you. Saving you was part of my atonement.”

I looked away. “But that’s a lie.”

“No, it isn’t,” Mergen said, dabbing at his lips.

“Fine, but it is an incomplete truth. The whole truth, the Truth, is this: We ex-vampires lie to ourselves, saying that it was the demon inside that killed ... but when you’re turned it’s not like the movies where you lose your soul or become a mindless killer. The truth is, nothing about who you are actually changes.

“You are who you are, but with an insatiable, painful hunger that—if not satisfied—will kill you. Human blood is the only way to survive as a vampire. And your thirst for it is all-consuming. When I drank from my victims, I did so because I didn’t want to die. Not because a demon was telling me to do it.

“And before you ask—pigs, cows, rats ... animal blood doesn’t sustain a vampire.

“And yes, I tried to only drink the blood of those who were evil—at first. But after years of killing, even that line gets crossed. You start to find evil in all humans, no matter how small, and you lie to yourself, saying you’re making the world better by ridding it of its scum. After a while, you don’t even bother saying that either. It just becomes a part of you. You tell yourself, you are no more evil than the man who slaughters a cow for sustenance. Being a vampire, you say, means humans have become your cattle. That is why I’m ashamed of who I was—”

“ ‘Was’?” asked Mergen, clutching his stomach.

“Am ...” I said. “Am ... I am a killer who—at first—killed because I didn’t want to die. And later because it just became a ... a normal thing to do.”

“Mmmm,” Mergen said. “The truth may be bitter ... but it is always nourishing.”

I didn’t look at the avatar. I couldn’t. I was so ashamed, and my eyes were so overflowing with tears that I couldn’t see anything. In the clarity of my Truth, the world was a blur to see.

“Maybe,” I said, “there is one more Truth to share.”

Mergen’s eyes glinted. “Please.”

I took a deep breath. “When I turned my mother, it wasn’t because I wanted to hurt or punish my father. It was because I believed that he—seeing both his daughter and wife a vampire—would agree to be turned. I wanted to have my family back. Me, mother and father, traveling the world, happy and whole. But he refused.

“On the night he died, I took him by force and made him a vampire against his will. But my father was strong. Stronger than I will ever be. Upon seeing that he could not conquer the hunger that now burned within him, he took his own life by waiting for the sun to rise. I tried to stop him, but now that he was a vampire, he was too strong for me to pull him away from the light.

“ ‘The sun will kill you!’ I cried out.

“He just shook his head and said, ‘Dying is the right thing for me to do.’

“ ‘But it will hurt,’ I said, like a petulant child scared to take her medicine.

“He just smiled in that kind way he used to do when I was little and scared. ‘Sometimes, doing the right thing hurts.’ And then he turned to face the dawn.

“And what did I do? I watched from the shadows as the morning light turned his body to ash.”

As I sobbed in full earnest now, I realized that I wasn’t crying because of the story I told. No, these tears were because I was mourning the death of my father in a way I couldn’t do when I lied to myself about who I was and why I did the things I did.

A heavy hand squeezed my shoulder. Wiping away heavy tears, I saw that Mergen was trying to comfort me. But it wasn't the skinny, emaciated ghost-white man I had come to know.

He was fat. As in ... Santa fat.

He drew me in close and hugged me. At first, I resisted him, but as soon as I let him hold me and my face touched his shoulder, I wailed and lamented and howled and wept the tears of someone who had finally faced her past.

Chapter 19

CHECK OUT WHAT'S BEEN CHECKED OUT

After a good, long cry, I looked up at Deirdre and Egya, who were kind enough to have walked to another side of the grove to give me my space. I stood up and, wiping away tears and runny mascara, said, “OK—it’s all out of me now.” I hiccupped. “Promise.”

“Do you feel ...” Egya paused as he searched for the word, finally settling on, “lighter?”

I didn’t answer right away, taking the time to look inside myself. I felt encumbered by my tears, the heavy head that comes after a big cry. But I also felt somehow freer—like I had been wading through water and had finally gotten out of the swamp. Lighter ... yes, I did feel lighter.

I nodded.

“See, milady?” He bowed. “I am Egya, here to help!”

Deirdre walked up to me and hugged me. No, it was more like she swaddled me in her big, powerful arms. “I am so glad the black man upset you and that this white man was here to comfort you,” she said.

“Me, too,” I chuckled. “But Deirdre, in the future it’s not appropriate to—” I thought about explaining that describing humans by the color of their skin was a faux pas, but decided that was a lesson in being human that could wait for later. For now, I would try to enjoy her embrace, as tight as it was. “Oh, never mind.” I hugged the changeling back.

“So,” Deirdre said after she eventually let me go, “you will no longer leave?”

“Might not have a choice on the matter. We did just get run off campus. But right now I’m more concerned about avoiding roving gangs of Other-haters.” I smiled grimly at the absurdity of it all. “And to think, yesterday my greatest ambition was to go to the O³ party.”

“Most certainly,” Egya said. “I was going to dress as a ghost. I even bought the white sheets, complete with a pointed hood.”

“Uh, Egya ... you know that costume is—”

“A joke, Darling. A joke. I may be from deepest, darkest Africa, but we still have history books.”

“I don’t understand,” said Deirdre. “What is wrong with the black man dressing as a ghost?”

At this Egya and I laughed. Deirdre, unsure what was funny, eventually joined in, happy to see us happy. And Mergen, he seemed to be feasting from the honesty of the moment.

As our laughter died down, Deirdre said, “All I wanted to do was find my place. I am starting to think that I will not find it here.”

I didn’t know what to say. If I was struggling to find my place here, what hope did this changeling have? “Deirdre, I thought you didn’t want me to leave ...”

Deirdre nodded, but it seemed she wanted to talk about something else. She pointed at the canopy of leaves around us and asked, “Will we be able to go home soon?”

“The hex should evaporate in the morning. We can go back to the dorm then and ...” I started, before I realized that she wasn’t talking about Gardner Hall. “Home, like ... Fae? Only if the gods come back, Deirdre.”

“They will never come back.”

“How do you know?” I asked.

“Gods do not change their minds.”

Mergen hummed in delightful agreement.

“And even if the hex dissipates, the humans will remember what happened this night. This will cause ...” Deirdre’s voice trailed as she tried to think of the right words.

“Further complications,” Egya offered.

“Yes ... further complications. I see little hope for us to stay.”

I sighed in agreement. “Maybe. I guess we can hold out on the hope that the O³’s party will heal the divide. Justin seems to think so. But ...” I shook my head. “None of this will matter if we don’t find out who the killer is.”

“And bring him to justice?” Deirdre asked.

“Or her,” Egya pointed out.

“Justice has little to do with it. I actually think that bringing the killer in will cause more harm than good. All we do know is that an Other is doing this with magic. Bringing them to be tried under a human court’s system will only focus a spotlight on the powers Others have. It will just cause more fear. I’m thinking ... we should just stop him. Or her. As in, permanently.”

Deirdre began stretching, as if preparing to enter a sporting competition. “Exactly, Lady Darling. Justice.”

Fae logic ... of course she wasn’t thinking human police and court systems. Fae justice was swift and permanent—and usually justified after the fact.

“Justice,” Egya echoed. “Justice may be blind, but I will not be so anymore. I will say what I know we have all thought. It is the Incan apu who is behind this.”

I sat up so fast that my head spun. “Incan apu?”

Egya nodded. “The Other friend of the O³ Bros.”

I thought of the tall, stone-skinned, sky-eyed Other. “Sal? I’d never thought that.”

“Then you are a fool. Or willfully blind, like Justice.”

“OK ... Egya. Enlighten us. How can you be so sure?”

“Think about it. Dr. Dewey was part of a ritual sacrifice. Incans, Mayans, Aztec—their traditions demanded that human sacrifices be made to their gods. This is common knowledge, yes?”

Mergen smacked his lips.

“Common knowledge?” I asked. “Maybe to you. How do you know all this?”

Egya shrugged. “I am a student of the dead religions—which is to say, all of them.”

“Lots of religions had ritualistic sacrifices,” I pointed out, having lived through many of them.

“The Etruscans, the Old Chinese Dynasty, the Celts. Not just the Incans.”

“True, but only one of them is enrolled in this school.”

“Fine, but—”

“Just because the cave apu with baby blue eyes smiled at you doesn’t make him innocent.”

“It’s not that,” I started, but when Mergen groaned I added, “OK—it’s not just that. Mergen, you are really starting to annoy me.”

Mergen grinned like he was just handed an ice cream cone.

I ignored the pale rider. “We can’t just accuse Sal because he’s different.”

“Why not?”

“Seriously?” I said. “Ever heard of racial profiling?”

“This is different than judging someone by the color of their skin.”

“How so?” I took a step toward Egya.

Deirdre, sensing my fury, stepped between us.

But Egya didn’t give up. “Because a black man, Arab or Jew can’t cast magic simply because they are black, brown or gentile. An Incan apu can.”

I shook my head. “I refuse to blindly accuse him—”

“The jinni guard dog and the hex required magic, Kat. Any Other is a suspect. But the sacrifice—that is part of the Incan mythos. Put two and two together and you get ...” He made a fist.

“Yes, but ...”

“But nothing. You know I’m right. You must.” He looked at Mergen for confirmation, but, much to his (and my) surprise, Mergen neither smacked his lips nor groaned in disgust.

“See?” I said, as if this proved anything.

“See what? His complete lack of reaction makes my words neither true nor false. It just means that you’re still being willfully blind.”

“Oh, you self-righteous—”

“What?” he said.

“Stupid little ...”

“What else?”

“Know-it-all!” I yelled. Not my best insult. And in utter fury, I turned around and kicked the mesh fence that surrounded the base of the cross. I guess no one really ever cleaned the thing, because a cloud of dust flew up into the air, creating neon rays of light in their clouds.

Now here I was literally basking in the cross’s rays. That’s when I realized how stupid I was being.

“Deirdre,” I said, pointing up at the neon icon, “what did you call that thing earlier?”

“The cross? A symbol that offers protection for those who wish it to.”

“Exactly ... a symbol that offers protection for those who wish it to. Or maybe, for those it wishes to. It all makes sense now!”

“What makes sense now?” Egya asked, cocking his head to one side like a confused dog.

“Sneak me back onto campus.”

“Why?”

“To confirm something.”

“Confirm what?”

“Who the killer is.”

“Confirm what, girl?” Egya said. “We know who the killer is.”

“Maybe,” I conceded. “But I have a theory that might prove otherwise. You may be right about the apu, but I think there may be more to it than that. Come down with me, help me break into the library and keep an open mind. If I’m wrong, I will hunt the apu down with you. But if I’m right, we will have saved an innocent Other from ... well ... us. Agreed?” I stuck out my hand.

Egya looked at it for a long moment. “If your theory proves false, we go after the apu without hesitation?”

“Without hesitation.”

Egya took my hand and let out an unnatural cackle.

I guess he still had a bit of hyena in him after all.

We waited until the dead of night to sneak back onto campus. By that time, the campus was deserted, but the remnants of the vigil remained. Flowers, unlit candles, homemade signs ... the relics of a human farewell.

As we made our way up the steps and into the Other Studies library, we passed the Old Librarian’s picture, and I felt as though his eyes were watching me as we passed.

Police tape still hung over the entrance, creating a barrier that was more psychological than physical. I hesitated at the yellow ribbons, but Deirdre, who did not share my cultural apprehension for the invisible barrier of authority (and who also had a great disdain toward plastic), just ripped through it and into the library.

I followed the changeling inside, praying to the GoneGods that Egya had been successful in disabling the alarm. It wouldn’t stop the cameras from recording our entrance, but given that we were all wearing wide hats Deirdre had fashioned from leaves and foliage, I doubted we’d be recognized. Once inside, I made my way to the display where he’d been strung up. We skirted the smashed shelves and torn books still littering the expanse of the library floor. I guess with Dr. Dewey gone, there was no one to clean this mess up. At least his body was still gone ... and the CSI's clean-up crew had mopped up the blood and any other body parts that might be considered a biohazard.

At the display case, the main part of the crime scene, little plastic tents with numbers on them littered the floor. Most of them stood next to various items used in the ritual: a scalpel, three buckets holding read-stained towels (I guess the killer wanted to control the blood flow), a few vases and other decorative items that prettied up the murder. Rituals are nothing without their shrouds, vases and incense, right?

Several placeholders stood where the jars or containers with bits of body in them had been. They had been taken away as either evidence or as part of the bio clean-up. I tried to remember what was next to the lone placeholders before going over to the display and looking for the one clue I needed to confirm my theory. Walking among the ransacked display cases, I didn't have to look into more than a couple of them before I found what I was looking for. Well, several whats I was looking for.

"I knew it," I said.

"Knew what?" Egya said, emerging from the shadows. He held up several wires in his hands. "Disabled alarm. Elegant solution."

"The obsidian knife," I said. "It isn't here."

"So?"

"Obsidian knives are central to Mayan and Aztec ritual sacrifices—not Incan, like you'd said. The obsidian knife is missing, but not the Feast Bowl. Why would an Incan apu go through all the trouble to steal the blade, but not the other ritualistic items? It doesn't make sense."

"Again, so?" Egya said.

"So—look at what is missing."

I walked over to a smashed display case and pulled out the little card description, handing it to the former werehyena. He read it. "GoneGodsDamn it! I'm going to kill them all," he growled.

"I'm sure you will," I said. "And I'll be right there with you."

Mergen, hearing his unbridled rage, belched. He made a gesture that he couldn't possibly eat another bite.

LET'S PARTY LIKE IT'S YOUR LAST DAY ON EARTH

(Except It's Not and the World Already Ended)

The party started, not with a bang, but rather, a parade.

I had heard the university parties were a big deal, but this was something else.

The O³ Bros had arranged that some of the more enthusiastic participants would parade up the hill together. Hundreds of kids—all dressed up as minotaurs, valkyrie, angels, wendigos, kappas, cyclopes, elves and a whole host of Others I didn't recognize—made a slow ascent up the hill toward the area that stood between the four dorms. McConnel, Molsen and Gardner Hall served as a net, with each building standing at three sides of an uneven field all the dorms shared. In the center of the field stood an old, circular building that housed the mess hall, a large open courtyard at its center. In the center of this courtyard was an old stone fountain that hadn't worked in years.

Slowly, deliberately, the partiers poured into this courtyard, Others dressed as humans and humans dressed as Others. Some of the humans were so well-disguised that I mistook them for Others, and only after a double-, sometimes triple-take did I recognize them as human. And not from a flaw in their costume. It was their mannerisms that gave them away: an oversized dwarf running his hands through his hair in a very nervous, human way; a tiny minotaur chugging a beer; an over-accessorized valkyrie vaping.

And then there were the misinformed humans. The ones with fake vampire fangs or the ones prancing around in werewolf costumes. They clearly hadn't gotten the memo that those once-upon-a-time kinds of monsters didn't exist anymore.

Not that it mattered. In a way, I was comforted that vampires and werewolves were still something humans thought about (huh, "humans," look at me refer to them like I wasn't one of them myself).

I walked through the crowd of humans pretending to be Others when some shirtless boy shoved a plastic cup filled with beer at me and said, "Nice sword. What are you supposed to be? A Scottish baby?" He chuckled at his oh-so-funny joke. He trousers were furry and his feet looked hooved. A satyr. He even had a pan flute in his hands—nice touch. With that beer in his hand and that wicked grin, he could have been Pan himself.

I was wearing my father's mask and my old Stewart tartan that was older than this guy's grandfather. Still, he was acting in good humor, and this was a party after all. I curtsied—not an easy feat when you have a dirk wrapped around your waist—and in my poshest British accent, I said, “A Cherub warrior, actually. And before you ask, yes, all angels are from Scotland.”

At this, he guffawed and handed me five tickets that reminded me of the coupons you won at a carnival. “You’re a funny gal. Here—beer tickets. Enjoy.” And with that, he pranced off with such grace that for a moment I thought that he might actually be Pan.

I looked at the tickets in my hand and shrugged. “When in Rome,” I muttered to myself, and made my way to the makeshift bar the O³ Bros had set up beside the fountain.

As I made my way over to the beer stand, I scanned the crowd. After what I saw—or rather, didn't see—in the library, I was pretty sure the killer would use the chaos of this party to enact the next phase of his plan.

Or her plan. I still wasn't certain about that.

There were so many people, though, all dressed up in so many disguises, that I wasn't sure how I'd ever find him. Luckily I wasn't alone. Deirdre was somewhere in this crowd, dressed like a purple ninja—the only costume that covered her face we could come up with, given our limited wardrobe. Egya wore an uninspired white sheet with eyes cut out—his version of a ghost. I guess he wasn't kidding about the costume, after all. And without the hood, he thankfully just looked like a kid under a sheet. As for Mergen—well, that guy had eaten so much Truth on the mountain that he'd literally swelled up to be the size of a plump fat man.

So we dressed him like Santa Clause.

All we had to do was find the killer. Trouble was, based on our investigations, the killer was human, not an Other like the hex had led us to believe. You see—and this was where I was particularly proud of my Nancy Drew skills—I noticed that the only items used in the killing ritual and the only items stolen from the library were human relics used in human sacrifice. Ancient rope, a ceremonial bowl, and the obsidian dagger.

Others—particularly the human-sacrificing kind—didn't use items like that at all. By their logic, there was too much distance between the human and victim when using a crucifix; better to bind them with magic. Granted, magic was in limited supply these days, but still, they wouldn't crucify their victims. Why use a Christian symbol to taint their own traditions, when simply tying them to a chair was enough?

And as for the ceremonial bowl—why use something as silly as a bowl, when it was much better to drink the blood straight from the source? I should know—ex-vampire here, remember?

An obsidian blade looks cool, sure, but claws are much easier to use.

All that told me it had never been an Other. But what it didn't explain was the jinni guard dog that attacked us in the library, or the hex cast on me afterward. A human cannot conjure something such as that, and so it really posed a huge plot hole for us. Until, that is—and this was the pièce de résistance—we found one of Solomon's rings shattered in its case.

Even though it's in the Bible, few people understand what King Solomon's rings were about. Solomon was the “wise king,” the guy who could supposedly speak to the “other world.” All that was true, but it was the nature as to how it was true that few understand. King Solomon could capture and control jinn. As in, otherworldly creatures which God made from smokeless fire.

What a power.

Only problem with his power was that he had to capture the jinn in gems. Gems that he fashioned to rings, bracelets, belts ... you name it.

Seems the Other Studies library inherited a boat-load of them.

Few people would know that ... could know that. But an Occultist bastard hell-bent on performing human sacrifice might. Knowing the power of the ring and being backed into a corner—the corner of being caught by a certain ex-vampire girl wandering into the library in the middle of the night—would have been motivation enough to release the jinni from its eternal prison. Luckily for us, the killer must have returned to the scene of the crime sometime after I'd been hauled off to the police station and returned the ring to its case. Must have thought the police would just assume it had been broken in the debacle along with so many other things, and they wouldn't put two and two together. Too bad for the killer—I'd had the last three hundred years to bone up on my history and lore. The instant I saw the broken ring, I knew the answer.

And as for the hex? That was witch's magic. Witches, just like vampires and werewolves, lost their magic when the gods left. But they didn't lose their talismans. It was perfectly conceivable that a witch might have imbued an item in her possession with a hexing spell. In fact, it was perfectly conceivable that she might have dozens of items, all imbued with various nasty, one-time spells at her disposal.

And so, all these facts led us to the same conclusion—the killer was human.

And, most likely, at this party.

Trouble was, there were an overwhelming amount of humans at this party. Talk about finding a body in a mass grave (sorry, sick vampire humor).

The line to the bar was moving at a snail's pace; given that it literally wove around the entire courtyard, I'd be here for a while. But standing in a line was just as good a place as any to look for the killer. Looking up and down the line, I saw the last person I wanted to see standing right in front of me.

The mousey girl who got that poor gargoyle killed.

I took a double take, but there was no mistaking her. There she was, dressed in a cat suit complete with fake cat ears pinned to her hair and a silly cat's tail pinned to her arse. Ironical that someone so mousey dress as a cat, but hey, I guess we all aspire to be something we're not from time to time.

I knew that I had something really important to do. I knew that confronting her would be the worst thing I could do at this moment. But I also knew that I may never have another chance to tell that bitch what a horrible thing she did. There would be no justice for that unfortunate gargoyle, but there might be a little retribution.

I leaned forward and pulled at her cat's tail. She whirled around, and her stupid mascara whiskers were in my face. Our eyes connected, and I saw the regular fear and anxiety constantly on her face. She didn't know who I was—as far as she could tell, I was some drunk cherub having a bit of fun. She tried to smile, but given how nervous she was, all she managed to pull off was a troubled smirk. I now saw that it took every ounce of her nervous, anxiety-ridden being to dress up and come to this party.

Not that I cared.

“You,” I said, dropping my posh British accent, “have been a very naughty girl.”

“I have?” she said.

I lifted my cherub mask up for a second before lowering it again.

Her eyes flashed with recognition.

“You abandoned someone who only wanted to fit in—just like you,” I said. “What's more, you abandoned someone who would have protected you. I would have thought someone as weak and pathetic as you would have—”

“Georgie,” she said, scanning the crowd. “Is he here?”

I paused. “Georgie?”

“Yeah,” she said, leaning in close. “The gargoyle. Is he here?”

They must have gotten a few extra hands at the bar. The line started moving and within seconds we were making a slow march toward drinks. “You mean you didn't ...”

I suddenly realized that I had automatically assumed she was responsible for the gargoyle's death. But in reality, I didn't know. “No ... Georgie isn't here. What happened yesterday?”

We were walking side-by-side now, and I was starting to feel like a real moron.

“We were walking home,” she said, “talking. He was telling me all about his role in protecting some medieval king. Chlo-something.”

“Chlothar the Great,” I corrected her. “It was the Gargouille who birthed where all gargoyles were born from. They rose when Chlothar was king.”

“Yeah, that's it. We had a good time, and we decided that we'd go up to the gazebo. You know, the one on the hill behind the dorms. We cut through the stadium's parking lot. It was the middle of the afternoon, so we figured it was safe enough. And when we got in, we saw several hockey players loading up their gear in the van, laughing and having fun. You know, boys being boys.”

“And what? They saw Georgie and attacked him?”

She shook her head. “Not at all. They didn’t even look in our direction. Not until ...”

She stopped talking and her shoulders scrunched up like she was literally trying to make herself smaller. Even in a cat costume, she managed to look like a mouse.

“Until what?” I asked.

“This woman stepped out of a car. She walked over to the passenger side and opened the door. A boy our age stepped out. But she wasn’t looking at him. Her eyes were fixed on Georgie. She had a wicked smile on her face, and as we walked past she pointed at Georgie and said, ‘How convenient.’ Then ... then she slapped the boy. Georgie didn’t like that. Not one bit.”

“You mean some kid was being slapped by his mother?”

She shook her head. “No. First of all, the boy’s a student here. I’ve seen him around. And as for the woman—she was too young to be his mother. But she was mad. And she slapped him hard. Weird thing was, she wasn’t looking at him when she hit him. She was looking at us. Well, not us—at Georgie. ‘Let’s see if this works,’ she said. Her voice was eerie, like she was trying out something she shouldn’t be. Then she slapped the boy again. And again. That’s when Georgie started shaking his head and huffing. Then that crazy woman pulled out a gun and pointed it at the boy’s head. That’s when Georgie started to really get mad, but the woman didn’t seem worried. She just pointed at the group of hockey players who were no longer loading their gear in the van, but were now staring at her. ‘If you want him to live,’ she said to Georgie, ‘then you’ll take care of them.’ He looked at me and said, ‘Run. Please. I’ll find you later, but you must run now. Run, run, run!’ The woman giggled at this and pulled back the hammer on her pistol. That’s when Georgie’s eyes turned red and he charged at the group of hockey players. I mean, he was like a creature possessed. But that wasn’t him. He wouldn’t just attack them and— and ...” She trailed off.

“What happened after that? What did you do?”

She looked around before lowering her head in shame. “What do you think I did? I ran, just like he told me to.” She shook her head and dabbed the corners of her eyes with the end of her tail. “I shouldn’t have left. But I was so scared. And he was so angry.” Then she clamped her fists at her sides and her voice took on a bit more confidence. “But that’s why I’m here now. I’m looking for Georgie. He’s going to live with me...just like you and—”

The mousey girl so abruptly stopped walking that the people directly behind us bumped into her back. Not that she noticed. She just pointed in front of her and said, “That’s the woman who made Georgie so crazy.”

Chapter 21

SCREAMING THE GODS BACK

I looked up to see where the mousey girl was pointing, half expecting to see some crazed Occultist standing with the obsidian blade in one hand and a rain-stick in another. What I didn't expect to see was Detective Wilcox, standing next to Nate.

They stood on the far side of the fountain, too far to make out any real detail, but close enough for me to clearly make out who they were. If I could recognize them, that meant they could recognize me. For a split second, my heart started to race. Either the mousey girl had gotten all her facts wrong or Detective Wilcox was somehow involved in all this. Which meant she was probably responsible for the hex. My heart skipped a beat—until I remembered that I was wearing the cherub's mask.

I breathed a sigh of relief, then scanned the crowd for Mergen, Deirdre or Egya. None of them were in sight. The only familiar face—other than Wilcox and Nate—was the apu, Sal, standing by himself and looking pretty glum. And since Wilcox was with Nate, one of the apu's closest friends, I couldn't be sure which side he was on. Dammit!

The mousey girl turned to run away. I grabbed her arm and said, "Where are you going?"

"Away," she whispered in a rushed voice.

I looked up at Wilcox, who seemed to be scanning the crowd looking for someone. Nate, on the other hand, looked dejected, frustrated and scared.

But the mousey girl could easily get away. From where we stood, she could veer to the right and use the beer line as cover. Even if Wilcox could recognize her as the girl in the parking lot, the mousey girl would be long gone before anything could happen. "OK," I said. "Go—but before you do, I have a question. Do you know the gargoyle's real name?"

"Huh?" she said, fear filling her mascara-decorated eyes.

"The gargoyle. Georgie. Do you know his real name? We want to give him a proper burial and, well, his name will go a long way into making that happen."

I don't know if she even heard my question, or else she'd probably have started bawling from the knowledge that her new friend was dead. But her eyes were trained on Wilcox. The line edged forward. The mousey girl's terror quickly got the best of her. She pulled her arm away and disappeared into the crowd.

I was alone in the line. At least I wouldn't be recognized, which meant I could get close enough to confirm or deny Mousey Girl's story without being detected. The line edged forward until we were almost parallel with Wilcox, with the fountain between us. As I got close enough to make out some details, I realized that the mousey girl had only been half right.

Detective Wilcox wasn't just the terrifying lady who'd gotten Georgie the gargoyle killed. She was the crazy woman who was going to get everyone at this party slaughtered.

The line was meandering along, snaking around the courtyard, closer and closer to where Wilcox was standing, and now that she was only meters away, I could see that she hadn't had only the one Solomon rings, used and abandoned at the library—she had dozens. The sharp ruby-red diamonds lined each of her ten fingers, most sporting two rings each, and at least a dozen more hung from her belt as seemingly harmless decoration. And that's exactly why I hadn't seen her wearing any yesterday. She knew she could get away with displaying them in the open at a GoneGodsDamned costume party.

The most frightening thing about her was how she wore the rings. The glass parts were facing inward, which meant that all she needed to do was clap her hands together and she'd shatter all of the rings at once. Not that she was poised to do that now, thank the GoneGods. She had one arm around Nate and another one in her jacket like she was holding—

They were standing next to the dried-up stone fountain, and now I noticed for the first time that something was different about the fountain than the last time I'd been here: it was decorated with vines and orchids and lilies and several other plants, and its stone bench-like edge had been cleared as if as a table or ... a botanical tabernacle. The perfect surface to perform a ritual on—and I knew exactly what kind of ritual she had in mind.

We took a few steps closer in the queue. As I drew nearer, one detail became clearer—she was holding a gun on Nate. Looking behind me at Sal, I suddenly realized why he was so distraught. He knew Detective Wilcox was threatening his friend. As an apu, he was bound to protect his friends in a way that went beyond fraternal loyalty. He was created to protect those in his charge. That was his purpose for being ... and right now he was helpless to protect his friend.

The rings, the trapped jinn, Dr. Dewey's murder, threatening Nate—it was starting to make sense. But there were still some missing pieces. Missing pieces I didn't have time to contemplate now.

Now I needed to stop Wilcox from going through whatever plan she had in mind.

I left the queue and walked toward the fountain, swaying like I was just another drunk reveler, until I was standing right next to Wilcox. Then, using a handy wrist move I'd learned from an aikido master in Japan, I forced her to release the gun and pulled her hand out of her jacket, while simultaneously lacing my fingers with hers. She tried to punch me with her free hand, no longer holding Nate. I rolled into the punch so as to weaken the impact enough that none of the rings would shatter against the hard surface of my mask.

No jinn appeared. My move worked. I breathed a sigh of relief, then kicked her in the shins and laced my other hand with hers. Now we were hand-in-hand-in-hand-in-hand.

She tried to pull away and I just went with it. I might not be able to match her strength—after all, she had three inches on me—but that didn't mean I couldn't inconvenience her. And as long as my fingers were laced with hers, that meant she couldn't break the glass and release the jinn.

“What are you doing?” she yelled.

People were starting to gather around us, evidently getting into position to watch a cat fight. Well, a cherub-versus-gypsie fight. That was fine. I didn't mind an audience.

“Nate,” I said. “Run.” The way I figured it, as long as Nate was safe, Sal would be able to help. As it was, Sal was walking toward us, trying to determine if Nate was, indeed, far enough away for him to get involved.

Nate didn't move.

“Come on—run! Sal and I can take care of her.”

Wilcox and I turned in a tight circle as she tried to pull free, so Nate was now behind me. Therefore, I could only imagine that his face transformed from fear to malice the second before I heard him say, “Why would I want to do that?”

Then I felt a heavy hand grab my shoulder and pull.

GoneGodsDammit! Nate was actually trying to help Wilcox. I'd read this situation oh, so wrong.

“What the hell are you doing?” I cried out.

He leaned in and whispered, “What do you think? We're trying to get them back.”

“Them?”

“The gods ... we disappointed them when we turned our backs on the old ways.” I could feel his hot breath on me. “And now we have the ability to do it. Finally.”

“How?” I asked, as the three of us swayed in one weird dance. I wasn't about to let go of Wilcox's hands, and moving so the rings stayed intact while shrugging off Nate as he tried to pull me off her was no easy feat. It meant going with the flow, with both of them. Trouble was, they had opposite flows, and the only thing that prevented them from breaking free was that they had yet to coordinate their efforts.

“Idiot,” Wilcox hissed. “The apu is bound to protect Nate. And by threatening him, I am forcing the apu to do as I demand.”

Oops. That should have been obvious. “And what's that?”

Kind of wish I hadn't asked, because her eyes widened with anticipation and excitement. And not in the I-just-won-the-lottery kind of way. It was more like After a lifetime of being a vegetarian, I just had my first steak and now that I know the taste of flesh, I'm never going back. My similes need work, I know, but I was under a pinch of duress at the time.

"The gods," Wilcox practically moaned, "they left because we turned our backs on them. We no longer honored them the way they wanted. We no longer paid them tribute. I am here to usher back the old ways."

"And by 'old ways,' which ones are you talking about?"

"Blood tributes," Wilcox said.

"You mean human sacrifice?"

"Is there any other kind?" Nate asked as he pulled.

We continued our dance, and all the while I saw the confusion on Sal's face. He couldn't hear our conversation or assess the level of threat against Nate. All he could do was helplessly watch as he waited for some clear indication of what to do.

"So it was Nate at the library?" I said. "You didn't release the jinni from the ring—you don't have the power. But the guard dog is a protective creature, and it released itself because Nate was threatened."

"That's what's amazing about the apu's power. He uses what is around him to protect his charges. In the library, that meant breaking the ring. At the vigil, when you so conveniently threatened Nate, Sal's protection took the form of a hex that literally turned these otherwise reasonable human beings into a roving gang of hate."

Mousey Girl's story suddenly made sense. A gargoyle's nature is to protect their charge. When Detective Wilcox threatened Nate in front of him, not only was his nature to protect Mousey Girl's safety being tested, but he was also falling under the Incan Other's spell; the two opposite forces were being pitted against each other, and Sal's spell won. Georgie attacked those hockey players because, at that moment, it was literally the only thing Sal could do to stop Wilcox from hurting Nate.

"The apu's spell contains so much beauty in its simplicity," Wilcox said. "And since I am a constant threat to Nate, there is only one solution for the apu."

"Do your bidding?"

"Do my bidding," she repeated as her eyes widened again in a maniac expression. "And my bidding is to sacrifice all these silly kids just like they did when the sun would turn black in displeasure and demand human blood as a tribute. The apu was hesitant but not as hesitant as you would expect. After all, he is a creature who was once given human tributes himself."

"But you're not really threatening Nate, so why would he—"

At this, Wilcox made a mock pouting expression. "You mean would I kill my little cousin? Without hesitation."

"Thanks, dear cuz," Nate said with venom in his own voice.

"So the solution is simple," I said. "Remove you, remove the threat—"

That's when the worst thing happened.

From behind me I felt a powerful force rip Nate off of me. I turned just in time to see Deirdre standing over Nate, her broadsword raised over her head.

“You dare harm milady?!” she cried out.

“No, Deirdre—don’t!”

But my words were drowned out by the sound of a glass shattering noise.

Wilcox’s rings were all broken, releasing an army of angry, over-protective jinn onto the party.

CHANGELINGS, HYENAS, WARRIORS AND ANGELS

What happened next was nothing short of awe-inspiring, chaotic and terrifying. Thirty-one jinn burst out of Wilcox's hands and belt. Thirty-one creatures—and not all of them were guard dogs like from the library. There were all types: a monkey-looking creature the size of a wendigo, a monster with a human head on a body the shape of a horse-sized chicken, a ten-foot-long ferret with a scorpion's tail. Hell, I even saw a couple salmon bigger than park benches swimming through the air.

Thirty-one creatures of all shapes and sizes. Thirty-one creatures, each possessing immense power. Thirty-one creatures all hell-bent on doing one thing.

Protect Nate.

I expected the jinn to just go on an all-out rampage, but they didn't. Instead, they hovered (well, those that could hover; others leered, crouched or just stood vigilantly, dozens of tiny eyes staring in every which direction) around Nate and Wilcox, employing the dead fountain as an ad hoc base of operations.

Legend said that whoever wore the broken crystal controlled the jinn. But Wilcox didn't have the power to actually release the jinn. That was Sal. His protective magic would have forced them out in order to protect Nate. Nevertheless, now that they were released, they were under Wilcox's control ... and as long as her commands didn't threaten Nate, they would do her bidding.

Wilcox looked around, turned to me and said, "This wasn't how I imagined this going down."

I lifted an eyebrow behind my cherub mask and scanned the crowd behind me. All eyes were on us—not surprising, given that thirty-one creatures suddenly appeared out of thin air. Deirdre was behind me in her ninja costume, her broadsword at the ready, but she was smart enough to bide her time and wait for an opening. The only eyes that didn't seem to be on us were those of Egya and Mergen, who were nowhere in sight. I could only hope that they were up to something useful.

"I was going for more gravitas," Wilcox explained. "Ah well, too late now." Fishing around in her jacket, she pulled out the obsidian blade and pointed it at the crowd. Speaking to her guard creatures, she said, “Make sure nobody escapes.”

Jinn went every which way and the screams and panic began in earnest. I heard the loudest shouts of alarm toward the edges of the courtyard, which surprised me. I looked up and saw that someone had slid thick mesh fences across all the exits leading into the surrounding building. No escaping the mess hall, apparently. I don’t even know how they managed to install sliding cage doors like that without anyone noticing. These guys were good.

Then Wilcox pointed at the cleared-off alter on the fountain and said, “Bring me the virgin.”

A nasnas (a creature that looked like a man, if you cut him in half from navel to forehead) hopped through the crowd and picked up a large shirtless boy dressed like a Roman legioneer. “Hey,” he cried out. “I’m not a virgin! I’ve done it. Lots.”

Oh, brother. If it wasn’t so horrible, it would have been funny. But as it stood, seeing the terror in that kid’s eyes, there was nothing ha-ha about this moment.

I turned to Nate. “Come on, Nate—this won’t bring the gods back. This can’t.”

“You . . . you don’t know that.”

“Indeed,” Wilcox said with a laugh. “No one does. We’ll just have to try and then wait and see.”

The nasnas placed the large “virgin” on the tabernacle, and Wilcox commanded it to tie him up, handing the nasnas an ancient rope. As he was being strapped to the stone, Wilcox teased her sacrifice-to-be with the obsidian blade.

Turning to the crowd, she cried out, “I know what many of you are thinking. How do I know something that so many scholars, philosophers, scientists, politicians and theologians don’t know? The answer is simple—they know, too. They just don’t have the balls to say it.

Then she began chanting. One hand on the blade, which she slowly raised above her head. The other on her gun.

“Nate,” I heard a voice say behind me. “Are you doing this?” Justin walked up behind me, perfectly in tact, not a single jinni attacking him. And then it hit me that none of Nate’s circle of friends would be harmed, just like the hex. The apu’s spell wouldn’t allow it. Five fewer people to worry about.

Justin walked past me, panting heavily. He had obviously been running. “Tell me she’s not telling the truth, Nate. Tell me you have nothing to do with this.”

Nate didn’t move as Wilcox continued her chant. Justin took another step forward, but two jinn—one resembling Swamp Thing, the other an actual dinosaur—positioned themselves so that he couldn’t progress. They didn’t attack him, mind you, but they didn’t let him through, either.

“Come on,” he said, “we can’t let her do this. This isn’t right. This isn’t right!”

But Nate’s expression stayed the same. He didn’t move. Nothing changed.

Justin wiped away a tear from frustration. “Why is this happening?”

“Because of me,” Sal said, his hollow voice somehow piercing the screams of all those being corralled by the jinn like cattle.

Justin gave him a curious look. “You?”

Sal nodded. “My spell. These creatures emerged because Nate was threatened. And she possesses the rings.” He pointed at Wilcox, who laughed in agreement. “As long as she does, they will obey her.”

“Then ... turn it off,” Justin said.

“I ... I can’t. I am an apu. My magic demands that I protect those I love.”

“And do you not love them?” Justin said, gesturing to the roiling crowd all around them.

Sal looked around and shook his head. “I tried, but none of them have accepted me. Not like you and Nate. They give me strange looks and speak to me with trembling voices. They’re afraid of me, and because of that fear, they keep their distance.” Sal’s eyes turned from their usual crisp sky blue to a stormy gray.

“And this will make that better?” Justin shook his head. “This isn’t right, Sal. If you can’t love them, then at least feel empathy for them. Protect them, too.”

I could see what Justin was doing—he was trying to get the apu to extend his protection spell. For a moment I thought that it just might work, but then Sal shook his head, a cloudy tear falling from his face. “I can’t. I’m sorry.”

“Fine,” Justin said. Showing exactly why he was the star of the football team, he faked past the two jinn and ran up to Nate. “If you can’t protect everyone, then maybe you can find it in your heart to choose.”

Then Justin did something that I will admire for the rest of my life. Knowing full well what would happen, he walked right up to Nate and punched him.

Right in the nose.

Man, what I wouldn’t give to be the one to punch that kid in the nose.

Deirdre glanced over at me, arching one eyebrow.

“What?” I said. “It’s the Truth.”

Where was Mergen when I needed him?

Nate fell down as if in slow-motion, and before his butt could hit the ground with a thump, I heard a sound that could only be described as rolling thunder ... rolling closer and closer to us.

“Shit!” I yelled out. “Justin!”

In one fluid motion, I slid between the dinosaur jinni’s legs and tackled Justin, pushing him behind me just as a dozen jinn turned on him, seeking to protect Nate. “Get behind me!” I pulled out my dirk and waited.

The jinn charged forward.

They would have to get through me first if they wanted Justin.

There were far too many for one ex-vampire, of course, but I figured I could cut down a few of them before they'd be able to get through me. At that moment, Deirdre appeared at my side and I realized that we might be able to dispatch more than a few before they eventually overcame us.

As far as last stands, this wasn't the worst way to go.

I readied myself, gritting my teeth behind my mask, just as my father might have once done.

But the jinn didn't attack.

Instead, they hovered about in confusion, staring at both Justin and Nate.

The jinn had been paralyzed by indecision.

Seems the apu wouldn't let them hurt anyone in his charge ... and this was something he took very seriously. Seems that even knowing his friend had used him and the pain and suffering that this had caused, he still could not let harm fall upon him. Say what you will about Sal—once he was your friend, he was your friend for life.

But at least the jinn weren't attacking anyone. Thank the GoneGods for small miracles.

Justin, standing behind us, cried out, "Come on. You coward! Come on!" But he didn't try to get at Nate again.

"Nate," I called over my shoulder, still facing the confused jinn. "You know this isn't right. All you have to do is say one word and this can all stop."

Wilcox's chanting got louder as the obsidian blade rose higher in her fist. She was going to kill that poor kid any second now, and I was stuck on the far side of the fountain, surrounded by monstrous jinn, powerless to stop her.

I might have been powerless ... but the Truth wasn't.

Without warning, a hail of arrows flew at Wilcox. I turned to see Mergen lumbering into view at a speed that shouldn't be possible for someone so fat. His bow was out and he was shooting arrows with a speed and accuracy that wasn't only divine in nature—it was also very badass.

Mergen must have been seven feet tall now, and just as wide, his Santa costume ripping at the seams. He looked like a Jolly Ol' Nick version of the Incredible Hulk. I guess the Truth of everyone's terror became an all-you-can-eat foie gras-style buffet for him, literally funneling nourishment into his being. He grew with every cry, every scream, and his size and speed made him the most formidable warrior on the field.

But as accurate and fast as his arrows were, the jinn were faster. They caught every arrow before any could hit Wilcox. Not that this deterred Mergen any. He just kept them coming.

A thought occurred to me. Every single jinn was occupied stopping his typhoon of arrows.

A diversion. Hell yeah, Mergen!

I jumped up onto the fountain, skirting all the decorations and jinn toward the side with the tabernacle. Slicing off the tail of the ferret-scorpion jinni, I jumped on the poor sacrificial legioneer and struck at Wilcox. The ferret-scorpion tried to grab me with its paws, but it was too late. I was already up in the air again. But before I could make contact with Wilcox, two jinn zipped up between us, protecting her from mortal danger.

Mortal danger—but not pain. I brought down my dirk on the only exposed part of her—the hand that held the obsidian blade.

I missed. Sort of. I had been aiming to cut her hand clear off, but because of the angle, all I managed to do was cut through her thumb, the hilt of her dagger stopping my sword from making a clean cut.

Still, I severed her thumb. Anyone with opposable thumbs will tell you that you need a thumb to sacrifice a human.

Wilcox cried out in pain just as three jinn came on me. I was sure it was only a matter of seconds before they disemboweled me for my little maneuver, but instead, they softened my fall, gently putting me on the floor.

“What the—?” I started.

“You are willing to die to protect them,” I heard a voice echo.

I looked up to see the apu crying tears of confusion. He knelt down over me, sending a shifting dust of stone around us.

“Yes ...?” I said.

“Then you are the real protector of this realm. Not I,” he said, and his impossible sky-blue eyes became gray and sullen, matching his stoney skin. “I surrender this place to you.”

“No more spell?” I said.

“No more spell,” the apu said, lowering his head.

“No more spell? You idiots!” Wilcox said, grabbing her bleeding hand. “You served your purpose. The jinn are free from their bounds of protection, and still under my control.”

“Not all of them,” Egya said.

In all the confusion, I didn’t see him sneaking up behind her. Egya wasn’t only silent, he was practically invisible—I had no idea how he got past all those jinn defenses. Until it hit me: he’d approached without the intention of hurting Wilcox, the jinn’s new sole master. He was just some silent kid moving in this direction—that raised no alarms, didn’t set off any defenses. His willpower to control his thoughts was incredible. How could he be so disciplined?

I could learn a lot from that kid.

He no longer wore his ridiculous ghost costume, but instead was shirtless, a Ngbaka throwing knife at his waist. He held a Ngombe sword in one hand, its looping tips looking like the scythe’s evil twin, and his other hand was held aloft, holding something that glinted in the light.

Then I realized what he was up to. He held Wilcox’s thumb in his hand, the crystal ring still on the flesh. Pulling it off and letting the thumb drop to the courtyard floor, he gracefully slid it onto his own finger and said in a tone far too casual for such an awesome move, “Jinn—bring me her belt.”

In a whirl, a giant hawk circled Wilcox and faster than you could say, Holy sh—, the belt was in Egya's hand.

Wilcox knew she was done. There was only one move left for her to do, and the bitch did it. Raising her nine fingers with seventeen rings, she cried out, "Kill them! Kill them all!"

That set them off. Oh, GoneGods, did it ever.

Jinn went every which way at once—lunging on humans as they did. I watched in horror as teeth and claws and talons (and scales, in the case of the giant salmon) lashed out at totally shocked humans, and that's when I realized there was no way to get out of this without casualties. Wilcox may only have control of half of the jinn, but that was still enough to cause mayhem and confusion.

The monkey jinni lunged at two kids who might have been dressed like dark elves (but then again, might have just been dressed goth). I leapt up and stabbed the creature in the back. It writhed in pain and turned to face me, twisting its long skeletal talon to strike my face. But I was ready for that. Ducking under its swing, I took advantage of its momentum to thrust my dirk into its neck.

It squirmed and tried to screech, but its cries of agony only forced fire-yellow blood out of its neck wound faster.

I managed to pull my dirk from its corpse and stay relatively unscathed.

One down—sixteen to go.

In the carnage, I saw Deirdre swinging her broadsword in defense as she ushered students across the courtyard. She wasn't trying to kill any of the jinn, but rather place herself between them and the students. I suppose you could say she had pledged her sword arm to the entire student body. A student body that had been less than kind to her and all Others. In that moment, I felt a surge of pride for my fae roommate.

I also caught a glimpse of Egya. He was commanding the jinn under his control to protect the innocent. He, too, wasn't going for the kill, using his long arms and powerful swing to protect those who were trying to run.

Mergen continued his barrage of arrows at Wilcox, filling the three jinn protecting her like pincushions.

But the three of them could only cover so much. This wasn't going to go well, unless—

As I watched Mergen shoot another arrow, which lodged itself in the tiny forearm of the tyronasaurus rex, I saw Wilcox pull Nate away, through the crazed crowd, flanked the whole while by a swimming salmon. As she reached a far exit, the mesh door slid open just long enough for her to yank Nate through before slamming shut again.

She was taking him to McConnel Hall.

Evidently, she thought she'd watch the chaos unfold from the relative safety of the inside.

Remember how I'd said that, while certain ex-Others had lost their magical abilities, they still retained a certain amount of latent skill? Sure, I didn't have a taste for blood anymore, but I'd always be a master at kung fu. Witches lost their powers to cast spells, but they could still use talismans they'd already imbued with magic. Werehyenas ... well, I wasn't quite sure what Egya could do.

Point is, I was determined to follow Wilcox and Nate, and a simple caged door wasn't going to stop me. A couple hundred years ago, I developed a pretty kickass ability to scale just about any building wall. Castles were my specialty. So this courtyard's perimeter walls weren't going to pose any challenge.

I left the battle to rage on without me, quickly scaling the mesh cage and using it to launch myself to the overhanging awning above. Pulling myself onto that, I leapt to the other side of the roof and, without thinking of my own safety, propelled myself into the air.

Yeah. It was pretty awesome.

When I met the ground, I let my body roll with the gravity and sprang back up, never breaking stride as I ran across the springy grass. I followed Wilcox into the building. Given how grievously wounded she was, Wilcox was surprisingly spry. She made it to the door before me and slammed it behind her, gaining a precious headstart as I wasted valuable seconds breaking the heavy glass with the hilt of my sword. I reached into the hole I'd made and unlocked the door from the inside to let myself in.

I ran up the Z-shaped stairs, only sparing a second to glance out the window at the mess hall. I couldn't see into the courtyard from this angle, but I was high enough to see the occasional jinni soar up into the open air above the courtyard. Deirdre, Mergen and Egya—as well as thirteen loyal jinn—seemed to be making short work of Wilcox's minions. The battle would be won—victory without casualties.

Well, victory with very few casualties, I thought as I made it to the seventh-floor landing.

I could hear the door to the communal bathroom fly open. Wilcox was taking refuge in a defensible room. She still had one good hand and a gun, which made her very dangerous indeed. I had no idea what her plan was. I doubt she did, either.

She'd lost, and now she was cornered.

Cornered rats don't make plans.

But they also don't hesitate to do anything bat-shit crazy to get out of said corner.

I pushed open the bathroom door. Three gunshots rang out. Looking up, I saw light stream through three bullet holes about a foot above my head.

Thank the GoneGods I'm short.

"Not 'gone' gods if you'd let me finish my ritual, you bitch!" Wilcox screamed back.

"Wilcox," I said. "It's over."

“NO, IT’S NOT OVER! They’ll come back! They have to!”

“Your ritual failed. And even if it succeeded, I doubt it would have made a difference.”

Wilcox didn’t respond. Instead, I could hear her mumbling to herself. I had to really concentrate to hear what she was saying ... and as soon as I was able to lock onto a couple words, I knew her plan.

Crap.

I burst through the door and saw exactly what I’d expected. Nate on his knees, Wilcox’s gun at his head. She was chanting the Incan incantation.

If she couldn’t sacrifice several hundred kids to the gods, then she could still give them one.

And now that Nate was no longer under Sal’s protective spell, nothing would come to possibly save him.

Nothing—except for me.

Without hesitation or second thought, I hurled my dirk at Wilcox. It whirled through the air in dazzling slow-motion. She tried to veer to the right, but she wasn’t fast enough. Instead of the sword splitting her down the center of the skull, it hit her just above her left eye.

Wilcox went down with a sickening thud.

Nate burst into tears—but not tears for his dead cousin. They were tears of relief, joy—tears of emancipation, of one who had finally found freedom. Sure, Nate had called me a bitch at Dr. Dewey’s vigil, but in all of this, he was just as much a victim as anyone else. He muttered one word over and over again, and this time it wasn’t “bitch.” It was “sorry.”

“Sorry, sorry ... SORRY.”

I thought he was looking at me, but he wasn’t. He was staring behind me. I looked over my shoulder.

It was Sal. I guess in all the chaos, the apu had found a way out of the mess hall courtyard and came up here to see if he could help, too. That’s the thing about protectors. It’s not easy for them to stop loving those they protect.

Sal walked past me, drew close to Nate and gave him a powerful hug. As he held Nate, he turned to me and said, “What now?”

I shook my head. I honestly didn’t know, and at the moment I was staring at Wilcox’s body. I killed, I thought as I pulled my sword out of her skull. And not a Class C Other this time. A human. Even if I argued self-defense ...

“No one will ever know what you did here,” Sal said.

This was one instant where I was glad for my little quirk of speaking my thoughts aloud.

What the apu did next was nothing short of astonishing.

He spread his hands out across the marble tiles of the bathroom floor, and right before our eyes everything turned to rock, slowly absorbing Wilcox's body into it. Within moments she was gone, along with any trace of what I had done to her.

I made my way down the stairs and back across to the mess hall to find that the battle was, indeed, over. Wilcox's jinn had all been dispatched, and Egya's jinn were standing, frozen statues on the stone fountain. And as for the humans? Many were standing near Mergen, happy to have his protective presence near them. But even more rushed to the doors as Sal and I pried their gates up high enough for a safe exit.

By the time everyone had exited the mess hall and felt the refreshing air of the fields outside, the humans spontaneously decided to hoist Egya and Deirdre in the air and crowd surf them like rockstars. Egya was quick to get down—evidently, he did not like the attention, or the heights. But Deirdre—the changeling warrior—had finally found some acceptance here. They loved her for being a warrior. For being different. And for using that difference to save their lives.

None of them seemed to notice me, which was good. I'd lost my cherub mask somewhere in the climb over the mess hall, and the last thing I wanted was to be recognized. I was sure I'd be rewarded for saving them by being attacked. And I wasn't sure I had it in me to kill another, even in self defense.

I might have helped save hundreds of lives—but I did so by tarnishing my own, newly human soul.

As I wandered around the field, I happened upon an item hidden in the grass. I knelt down and, to my surprise, found the cherub mask. Touching its ceramic cheek, I imagined that I caught a glimpse of my father's own struggles in that angelic face.

Sometimes doing the right thing hurts, I thought, and then spoke aloud:

“But that doesn't make it wrong.”

EPILOGUE

Sirens climbed the hill as the students sat outside waiting for help to arrive. As best as I could tell, no one was hurt. Sure there were some scrapes and bruises, a few bloody noses and whatnot, and a hell of a lot of terrified, most likely emotionally scarred kids—but no deaths. Well, no deaths except Wilcox ... but given how Sal's magic worked, I was pretty sure her body was absorbed into the bathroom floor of seventh landing of McConnell Hall forever.

She was gone for good. But considering what she tried to do, I could live with that.

Really, I could.

I didn't wait for the police to show up. I just walked behind the mess hall and into Gardner Hall's basement, where my room and bed waited for me. I figured that if the police needed to speak to me, they could come find me where I belonged. In bed, under my covers and away from anyone or anything.

Crawling into bed, I sighed and closed my eyes. Barely a second went by before there was a knock on the door.

I ignored it.

Then another knock.

I ignored that, too.

But when a heavy fist knocked a third time, I sighed heavily, got up and opened the door.

I was expecting a cop or ten, but when I saw Justin's bloodied smile, my heart stopped beating for a couple seconds (and believe me, I know what it feels to not have your heart beat).

"You left," he said. There was no scorn or anger in his voice. Just matter-of-fact, like he was trying to process what happened.

I didn't say anything.

"The cops will want to talk to you. Well, not you, but the girl with the cherub mask."

"They'll find me eventually."

Justin smirked. "I'm not so sure. I told them I was pretty sure the girl with the angel face was actually an angel who took to the sky after she saved us."

I raised my eyebrows at him. "What?"

"I mean—not many know who you are ... I mean, really, truly are. And those of us who do—Sal, Nate and, well, me—we all said the same thing. And that’s not all. Word is getting out. Dozens of students all saying you’re gone. Like Superman or something.”

“Supergirl, you mean?”

“Super-whatever,” he said, drawing me in close. With gentle hands that held my tight, he wiped away a few loose strands of hair from my face. “Thank you. And not just from me. From everyone. You saved us.”

I blushed. “I had help.”

“You did ... and we’re thankful to them, too. But the kid who emerged from the almost politically incorrect white sheet said you were the one who figured it all out. You were the one who saved us.”

“I guess,” I said, looking down.

A firm and kind finger gently lifted my chin so that I was staring directly into Justin’s impossibly beautiful eyes. “Thank you,” he said again as he leaned down and kissed me.

I resisted at first, but feeling his warm lips on my own, I leaned into it. It was the first time I’d kissed anyone. Alive, that is. I died when I was fifteen, before I’d had any serious suitors, and now that I was alive again ... well, kissing was good.

Eventually, we pulled away from each other and I thought, Does this mean were an item?

“An ‘item’?” Justin asked, laughing. “What are you—from the sixties?”

“Ahhh, actually, that expression is from the fifties,” I said. Hey, if I was going to think out loud, I might as well embrace it.

“OK, then,” he said, kissing me again. “We’re an item.”

I shook my head. “No—not yet. I need to tell you something. And I’m not quite ready. But I don’t want to start this with a lie ... so ... no. Not yet.”

He withdrew, narrowing his eyes. “Not yet, but ... there’s hope?”

Right thing to say, I thought (and this time in my head). “Oh, there’s more than hope,” I said. “But I need time to ... to figure out how to be a college student first. How about while I’m figuring it out, we have a couple dates? Real dates. Court me like I’m a Scottish gal from the nineteenth century.”

He smiled, stepped back and curtsied. “As you wish.”

“Actually,” I said, “Scottish suitors didn’t curtsy.”

“Oh ... I figured that with the skirt—”

“Kilt.”

“—they curtsied. No?”

“No,” I said, grabbing his hand and guiding him to my door. “They bowed.”

Standing outside my door, Justin bowed. “Like I said, as you wish.” And with that, the boy with impossibly beautiful eyes and perfect black hair took his leave to give me time to figure out how to be ... well, how to be human.

Again.

The next days saw a flurry of activity. Over one hundred human students dropped out, more Others moved in and the university finally found a return to normalcy that—given the circumstances—wasn't very normal.

Deirdre, Mousey Girl (whose name, I discovered, was Aimee), Egya and I buried the gargoyle, whose real name was George Paul-Henri Gardien III. We found a quiet spot not too far from the neon cross and laid his stones to rest. Since Georgie was a guardian Other, Deirdre gave him a warrior's funeral as the rest of us said our farewells.

Aimee cried.

And so did I.

But Georgie got his farewell. And in this new and terrible GoneGod world, that had to count for something.

Days passed and the routine of college life started to become ... well ... routine. Classes, dates with Justin that ended with PG-13 kissing, hanging out on campus ... the university routine I figured must have taken place in-between the wild party scenes from the old college comedies. I was just finding my rhythm when one day—about a month after the 0³ party—I opened my mailbox and pulled out a letter from the Library of Other Studies—apparently it was open again and I was to report to work starting Monday. I guess Dr. Dewey, the Old Librarian, had put in my application before he died.

GoneGodsDammit!

I mean ... Oh, yay!

Monday morning I walked into my first day of work. A funny-looking woman who wore a bright blue blazer and red pants greeted me. She had a name tag that read Jennifer Brovavick and a smile that said Ask me anything.

I handed her the letter.

“Katrina Darling? I heard they were going to send me a little helper. I was half expecting an elf.” She chuckled at her own joke, but when I did not, her face went solemn. “Sorry. I take it this must be difficult for you.”

I lifted an eyebrow.

“You did know David. Correct?”

“David?”

“Yes, the librarian who ...” She looked at the back of the room.

“Dr. Dewey,” I said. “Yes, I knew him. He was the first friend I made here.”

“I’m sorry for your loss.”

I nodded.

Jennifer Brovavick stood perfectly still for a moment before reaching into her jacket. “I found something amongst his stuff—he left you this.” She handed me an envelope with my name on it. “Take your time.”

She walked away, leaving me with a letter that was quite literally from beyond the grave. With hesitant hands, I opened it. Inside was a short note:

Dear Ms. Darling,

Regarding your inquiry as to who donated the McMahon tartan. Upon investigating the matter, I discovered that a Miss Charlotte Darling donated it. Suspecting that she is a relation of yours, but unable to give you her number directly due to university confidentiality clauses, I gave Miss Darling a ring and—

No, no, no, no!

discovered that she is indeed your—

“Kat ... Katrina!” I heard an old familiar voice call my name.

mother. She informed me that she will be up for a visit at her earliest convenience. I do not know if I crossed any lines by mentioning your employment at the Library of Other Studies and—

“Yoo-whooo ... Kat, dear. It’s me. It’s—” wanted to give you a heads-up just in case I did.

Your friend,

David Dewey, the “Old Librarian”

“—Mom,” the voice called out.
I groaned. GoneGodsDammit.
And this time I meant to say it out loud.

The End

Chapter 1

SAND CASTLES

*Northumberland County, England
Bamborough Castle,
Eastern Shore of the North Sea
The Year of Our Lord, 1340*

“*Y*ou’ll have to run faster than that!” Beon shouted.
Sophia giggled as she pushed herself, trying to speed up, the feel of sand beneath her feet bringing a smile to her face. As did the mirth she could hear in Beon’s voice.

As Sophia ran along the beach, she glanced up at the fortress that was Bamborough Castle, inwardly marveling at how Beon’s presence, his dark brown eyes and easy smile, brightened the dark corners of the gloomy castle she’d lived in all her life.

If only Beon could banish the scowl from Father’s brow as well, she mused, returning her focus to the beach in front of her. Was it really so taxing to be the Baron of Bamborough? Were Father’s duties truly so grim?

Another laugh from Beon let Sophia know how close he was, she squealed and ran harder. If she continued letting moments of distraction slow her down, she would lose the race yet again. Truth be told, she didn’t mind losing to Beon.

Today was that rare occasion when Beon, a young page under her father’s charge, was able to join her for some sport after completing all of his duties to Sir Lyndon, her father’s man-at-arms.

As fast as he was, Beon always won in games of chase. In fact, he won every game they played, but Sophia found she didn’t mind at all. There was very little distraction in Bamborough Castle. There was very little warmth within the cold and dim dwelling.

How could such dark eyes be so warm? The light in Beon’s brown eyes, flecked with shards of amber, somehow made its way inside the stone walls where even sunshine had no hope of entering. But Beon had, bringing something to the cold chambers that even a fire in the hearth hadn’t been able to bring. Sophia had yet to sort what that ‘something’ was exactly, but even his name was comforting as it rolled off her tongue...it had a musical quality, and Sophia loved to sing. Beon was constantly having to correct people with the pronunciation, which Sophia found amusing. “No, no, it’s bee-own,” he would say, “with the stress on the second syllable.”

Beon was older than Sophia, three years or so, and had been living with her family ever since he came to be fostered under her father’s house. Even though it was customary for a boy to leave his home at the age of seven to serve as a page under a knight, Beon had gotten a late start, which made him slightly older than other boys had been. He’d explained that being an only child with his father away at the wars against France, his mother had held him back.

Sophia had met his mother and knew how much she worshiped the lad, showering him with praise and attention. He was quite arrogant as a result. He would tell Sophia himself with his chin jutting to the heavens that there was ‘nothing he could not do, and not do well.’ What was so infuriating to the other pages and squires who lived in the castle was that his claim proved to be true.

Beon was still considered a boy at ten years old. Sophia knew he would not begin to ignore her until he became a squire at fourteen, so until that time, she would savor the much needed amusement he brought to the castle.

Sensing that Beon had lost interest in his pursuit, Sophia slowed and watched as he veered off toward her younger brother, who was quite a bit faster. They careened toward the foamy waves until the nursemaid shouted them back.

“How many times have I told you to stay away from the water!” she said.

Catching her breath, Sophia plopped down on one of the grassy knags that bordered the beach and gazed at the Farne Islands just off the coast. Even from here, she could see it abuzz with several flocks of birds. Sometimes she could even spot a seal or two. But the birds were her favorite. She could watch them for hours. A gull swooped into view and landed several feet away from her.

“Hello again, Oliver,” Sophia said.

The gull squawked in reply.

“I don’t have many crumbs for you today,” she said, as several more birds landed close by. Sophia pulled a folded piece of burlap from her skirts and opened it to reveal a few small chunks of bread. She began to pick at the bread and toss crumbs to the eager creatures.

Suddenly Beon came thundering over a dune and her winged companions scattered. Emitting a laugh, Sophia also leaped up and took flight, thrilled the chase was back on. Panting for breath, she gathered up the hem of her skirt and scurried across the sand. Beon grabbed her waist and wheeled her up and around in a circle, spinning her like a top. She giggled uncontrollably.

“Master Beon,” Nurse shouted, “Put her down this instant! Remember your manners, young man. That is no way to treat a lady, and you’ll do well to behave yourself. The Baron would give you a lashing if he saw you handle his daughter that way!”

“Yes, mum,” Beon said with a bow after setting her back on her feet.

“That’s enough frolicking for one day. You run along back to Sir Lyndon now, like a good lad.”

“Yes, mum,” Beon answered. He smiled at Sophia just before he lit off toward the castle.

Not only was Sir Lyndon her father's man-at-arms, but he was also Father's most trusted knight. Stories of how he'd fought alongside her father in the Scottish Wars for years before she was even born had been told so many times she would never forget them. Even now, her father would rally his troops and ride off with Sir Lyndon to defend the border against the Scots or run to the aid of some other noble house that had come under attack. Once or twice they had even fought against other fiefs, either because they had dishonored her father or because they owed him a debt. Father was always up for a fight, it seemed.

Sir Everard, Beon's father, had sent him to foster at Bamborough Castle specifically because he would be a page to Sir Lyndon, as had been put down in the contract with Sophia's father, Lord Gall. Tales of how Sir Lyndon and Sir Everard had come up through the ranks together and how Sir Everard had gained much favor with King Edward III, earning himself a title and lands as a vassal to his majesty, were fresh in Sophia's mind as she made her way back toward the castle. Their day of running along the shore had come to an end.

Sophia didn't understand it completely, but Father seemed dissatisfied that the king had sent Sir Everard to the north as a trusted colleague. Pausing to peer out over the water, Sophia caught her hair as it danced in the wind as she wondered why they'd said tensions were still very high and loyalty somewhat questionable. With the sea as calm as it was at the moment, she couldn't fathom why Northumberland would be 'in constant turmoil with Scotland, France, and Italy.' If the people were truly a mix of nationalities and lineage, where could the conflict be coming from?

Sophia's father was, indeed, a fearsome man. She, herself, was afraid of him, although she knew better than to admit it. On the rare occasion that she saw him, usually at the table, he hardly spoke a word to her, and never, ever looked at her. She would swear that if he saw her in the great hall amongst a group of people, he would not recognize her. Sophia simply kept quiet, and kept her distance, as she'd been taught.

However, her father lavished attention on her younger brother. Even at her young age, Sophia understood that this was simply the way of things. She knew in her heart that her father's preferential treatment didn't feel fair, but conversely, nothing seemed amiss because it was completely and utterly normal. Most men didn't notice women, unless after they had been drinking ale in the great hall all night. Under those circumstances, Sophia had noticed that men became very attentive toward certain women. It was all very confusing. She much preferred the silence of the castle when the men were away tending to that 'turmoil' they kept going on about or hunting, which was most of the time. On those days, her mother would let her wander off daydreaming, or play hideaway in the castle with her brother. Sometimes even Beon would join the game...and win, of course. She could look for hours and never find him. Then she'd return to the spot in which they began the game only to come upon him casually eating an apple with his feet propped up on the table.

"What took you so long? I got hungry," he'd say as he chewed.

However, mirth and mischief would immediately drop from his face if Father happened to enter the chamber. He would shoot a glare in Beon's direction, his lips pursed with disapproval noting the boy's relaxed pose. Sophia was not sure if Beon truly feared Father as much she did, but he would immediately spring to his feet and bow, showing the respect she knew her father expected to see. Then Beon would apologize and offer to leave or be of service. Father would either command him to do something ridiculous or completely ignore him altogether.

An air of tension seemed to follow her father around their dwelling much like gray storm clouds, threatening a torrent of wind, rain, and lightning in its wake. Sophia saw no other way to explain it but as a result of her father's thirst for battle. When he became too restless, he would plan a hunting party, a jousting tournament, or invade a neighboring fiefdom. When he wasn't doing any of those things, he would rage against the servants, or get into heated debates with his knights about politics, or whip a serf who was being lazy. His energy for confrontation and threshold for violence seemed boundless. When he was like this, which was basically whenever he wasn't eating, sleeping, or talking about battle, Sophia made herself scarce.

His coarse black hair and a full beard looked prickly to touch. His giant hands were always dry and cracked with blisters and cuts. However, she could never recall a time when her father had touched her. Sophia never saw him smile and she'd never heard him laugh. She certainly never witnessed him give a kind word or gesture of affection toward her mother.

"Come along, Sophia dear, do not dally!"

With images of Father stomping through her mind, Sophia had jumped at Nurse's words. "Yes, mum!" she answered as she gathered fistfuls of her skirts, turned away from the sea, and continued up the hill toward the castle.

As the garden entrance neared, Sophia let her thoughts drift toward Mother. In Sophia's mind, the name Maerwynn suited the undeniable beauty of her mother. Mother's small and fragile frame conjured up fear for her safety, however, especially when she stood beside Father with his fists clenched as they often were.

Of Scottish descent, Mother had dark orange tresses and blue eyes. Sophia would often study her parents, comparing herself as she noted which features she'd inherited. Sophia's auburn hair was a mix of her father and mother's shades. But she most definitely shared her mother's eyes of blue.

So delicately striking was Maerwynn—both in her size and features—Sophia thought of her as a fairy. Mild mannered and generally content, the servants respected how she ran the house with a gentle hand, letting them go about their business without much meddling. Sophia believed they took pity on her mother, or at the very least felt a sense of protectiveness for her. Mother invoked that feeling in people due to her size and demeanor. Sophia, even at the age of seven, was nearing her mother's height. Sophia worried she might take after her father in regards to stature, but when she compared herself to other girls her age, she found she wasn't much taller or shorter than any of them. Father was the size of a doorway and quite sturdy of constitution. Her brother, Marcel, was of the same build, she could already tell.

Sophia suspected this size difference was the reason her mother had lost three babies, two after they'd been over a year old. It pained her to think it, but Sophia could tell her unfortunate younger brother and sister had taken after Mother and were too weak to live any longer.

To add to Sophia's worries, Mother was with child yet again and was due within the next fortnight. Sophia prayed in the chapel every day for her mother and the unborn babe. The stillness of the chapel welcomed her, making it one of the places she enjoyed being the most. She also enjoyed taking the secret passage from the panel behind the armoire in her mother's chambers, down the spiral staircase to a long narrow hall, and out a panel in a small vestry behind the confessional.

The secret passageways wove within the walls all over the castle. Sophia, her brother, and Beon had discovered them by accident and then explored much of them like caves by candlelight. The tunnels were a fairly new discovery, so they hadn't yet explored them all. And with Bamborough Castle being so very large, it would take quite some time to map it all out. Creating maps had been Beon's idea, but Sophia didn't care much about that. To her, finding places in the castle where she couldn't hear Father's ranting was all that mattered.

Dropping to her knees upon the cushion in the chapel, Sophia clasped her hands in front of her, and bowed her head, saying the same prayer she said each day. "Our Father in Heaven, I come to ask that you let my little brother...or sister...live."

After thanking God for Mother, Marcel, Beon, seashells, and seagulls, she rose up and strolled about the chapel singing, finding the spots in the room that created the largest echo. She did this every day as well because she loved singing, especially in this sacred room that sang back to her. If she stood in just the right spot, the sound would surround her with a warm, humming vibration. If she closed her eyes, the sensation made her feel as though she were floating high above the castle in the night sky.

More than once, Nurse had said she was a silly girl upon finding her singing alone like this, but Sophia thought it was better to be silly than to be grumpy like father, so she would simply giggle in response and sing louder.

When Sophia tired of singing, she meandered her way back up to Mother's quarters and found her knitting beside the fireplace. Mother limned in yellow by the light of the flames was a welcoming sight. Smiling, Sophia nuzzled up beside her, suddenly feeling small and very much like the child she was. Mother set down her sewing and stroked Sophia's hair, humming a soft melody. Her mother also stroked the rounded part of her belly where Sophia's new brother or sister was growing.

"Sing to the babe, my sweet poppet," her mother cooed.

Grinning even wider, Sophia took a breath and sang while Mother continued to run fingers through her hair. After singing several lullabies her Mother had taught her, Sophia said, "Please, tell me another story from when you were a little girl, Mama."

"All right, dear...hmm, let's see...well, as you know your grandpapa was vassal to the King of Scotland and he was lord of the manor over much land in Jedburgh, just over the Scottish border from here—”

When Mother stopped abruptly and sat forward, staring at the fire as her blue eyes widened, Sophia found herself clutching tighter to Mother’s skirts.

Sounding weaker than before, Mother said, “Better run and tell Nurse to fetch the midwife, poppet...my water just broke.” She smiled at Sophia and caressed her cheek, attempting to ease the fear written upon Sophia’s face. “Run along, darling... I’ll be fine until they get here.”

Beon galloped toward the quintain with his lance couched tightly under his armpit, Sir Lyndon's instruction fresh in his mind. "This is a quintain, and it is used for knighthood training, specifically jousting," the man had said and then he'd pointed, "This circular target is affixed to a wooden arm that swivels atop a post when you strike it. Understand?"

Beon nodded as Sir Lyndon continued, "On the opposite end of the wooden arm is tied a sack filled with sand. Once the target is struck with the force of the lance, it will cause the sack to spin around and strike you, the would-be knight, in the back." Sir Lyndon had then winked and added, "Unless you are quick enough to duck or deflect it."

"I'll be quick enough," Beon had promptly replied with confidence.

Sir Lyndon blinked and Beon thought he detected a bit of mirth in the man's dark gaze.

The pony Beon sat astride was sweating and fatigued after having made this run with several other pages before him. But it was his turn now, and he was determined to hit the target and successfully dodge the swinging sack that had knocked every other boy off the horse in succession. He knew he would get the opportunity to make this run countless times during his training, but a first impression was always paramount, especially since he was a little older than most of the other pages and thought of himself as a cut above the rest. He would show them all he was more fit to be a knight than any of them. It was true that Beon had been told a number of times that his pride was inflated and needed to be adjusted, however, he preferred to think of it as positive thinking. How could that be a bad thing?

Mainly he wanted to impress Sir Lyndon. He had grown to think of the Knight as a second father. He was kind and light-hearted, but a firm teacher who expected the very best effort from his charges. He was the largest man Beon had ever seen. Sir Lyndon was even bigger than Lord Gall, although he was much more genteel than the Baron. He had a kind face, like a gentle giant, that could change in an instant to the face of a hardened warrior. Beon liked him immensely and respected him above all, save his own father, of course.

Knighthood training began in earnest as a page for those of noble birth or those who could afford it, and most boys started at the age of seven. Beon had been eager to begin his training too, but his duty to his family came first, and Mother had needed him. Having been ill since losing her last child, Beon had been called upon by Father to take care of her until she was able to run the household duties once again. It ended up being a full two and a half years before Mother felt strong enough to give her blessing.

He loved his mother dearly, but by the time his tenth birthday approached, Beon was anxious to get started. During those years at home when he should have been fostering, Beon absorbed as much training as he could from the man-at-arms and other knights Father had left behind to guard Brentworth. They'd fondly ruffled his hair, commenting on how impressed with his natural ability they were, praising him for his hard work and tenacity. By the time he'd arrived at Bamborough Castle and stood in front of Lord Gall, he was positively brimming with zeal. However, Lord Gall barely looked up from the maps he was studying. The Baron's lack of interest had been difficult for Beon to adjust to at first.

"So, you're Everard's boy," Lord Gall had said, glancing over at Beon.

"Yes sir, Beon Everard at your service, sir. I won't disappoint you. I have been—"

"Too late for that. I was expecting you three years earlier." The knights standing around Lord Gall had laughed at his remark.

Beon steeled himself against the pinch of humiliation he felt, unwilling to show how the words made him feel. "But sir, I've been—"

"And you do not speak unless I give you permission. I see you have much to learn, boy—most notably, about your station in life. Well, you're Lyndon's problem now," Lord Gall had said, turning to Sir Lyndon. "Have him muck out all the stalls each morning before sunrise. That should break him of his filthy habits."

And so it went. For the first full year, until the new batch of young pages arrived to be fostered, Beon slopped out the muck in the stables. Nothing had frustrated Beon more than yet another delay in his training, but he was also wise enough to see that if he did not keep his mouth shut and do what he was told, he risked even more setbacks and that would simply not do.

During that time, he'd known quite well that all the training would be geared towards learning horsemanship and how to fight with the various weapons used by knights. Not wishing to fall behind, he'd use sticks or tools he'd found around the stables to practice his swordplay. He'd also gleaned what he could by closely watching the knights with their horses while he spread fresh hay into the stables.

Since he wasn't allowed to join in with the other pages, Beon had time to get to know Sophia and her little brother, Marcel, building a bond and friendship stronger than with any page. He'd discovered that Marcel was a good lad to plot mischief with as they mapped out the labyrinth of secret passageways here at Bamborough.

Sophia always tagged along, and Beon found he didn't mind as much as he'd first feared he would, her being a girl and all. The chestnut shade of her hair intrigued him as candlelight danced over the lighter strands, drawing out the red within the brown. The guileless look in her blue eyes when she'd first peered out at him from behind the brocade draperies had instantly made him think of the cherubs depicted in the tapestries hung along the walls of the great hall.

Once that first year had ended, Beon found it wasn't too much of an adjustment to shift from using sticks as swords and other makeshift weapons to the wooden versions the knights used for training. Secretly, Beon wanted to skip to the real weapons, but he hoped if he proved himself with these toys first, he might be able to speed up the process. But, as it turned out, he wasn't always given a chance to show off his skills. For example, when the Knights had them recreate battles on piggyback while using wooden swords and shields. Beon was most often the 'horse' in such exercises, much to his chagrin, simply due to his size and age.

When it came to the many physical challenges, however, even if they were games, Beon was rarely in contest with anyone. Many of the lads called him an arrogant coxcomb because of it. He didn't mind their jealousy, as it only confirmed his superiority and fortified the hope that his plan to progress quickly would succeed.

Beon remembered from watching the pages and squires at home that great emphasis would be placed on endurance and strength, so he'd kept up with that as well. When it came to moving sacks of wheat to stockpile the kitchens, or piles of rocks to repair walls, or buckets of water to feed the livestock and care for the knight's horses, Beon executed the tasks without complaining as the younger boys often did. Anything was better than mucking out the stables, even though he loved being around the powerful animals.

Despite hating it at first, being restricted to the stables had given Beon yet another advantage over the other boys. Several of the knights in residence at Bamborough Castle had destriers. By spending so much time with the beasts, he knew each horse intimately, as well as the Knight it belonged to. Lord Gall's destrier was called Goliath, and the beast was as cranky as its owner. However, none was as fine as Sir Lyndon's horse. Sir Lyndon had smiled as he told Beon the story of how he had acquired it. "I was gifted this fine animal by the King himself after a victory over the Scots at Halidon Hill. Your father had also been one of the commander's of the King's army that day. That's when your family was given Brentworth, only a few short years before you were born." Beon had perked up with pride for his father when he heard the tale.

Lord Gall was often out among the knights in the lists, practicing his swordplay or instructing them in their stratagems. Again, Beon had listened as he refilled the wheelbarrow with fresh hay. He suspected this gathering of information would serve him now.

However, today marked Beon's fifth real day of training—his chance to keep putting what he'd learned to the test—and Lord Gall stood alongside Sir Lyndon, observing the progress of the pages. All the boys were deathly afraid of the Baron and performed even more poorly when he observed them...except for Beon. Beon was unafraid of the battle-worn baron. Perhaps because he was used to being around blustering and brave noblemen. He felt an odd kinship with the Lord Gall. Although he was a little reluctant to admit it, Beon thought they might be alike in many ways and that someday, after he had proven himself above all other knights, he too would be a baron or even an earl. He had not been born into his nobility; his father had fought gallantly and won it. But Beon felt it was his destiny to expand his father's name, and there was no limit to his ambition.

One after another as the other pages were thrown from the pony by the swinging quintain, the Baron would laugh along with some of his other knights as the boys ended up on their backsides. Sir Lyndon never laughed. He would bark words of encouragement or instruction, but never belittle the young students the way Lord Gall was prone to do.

"You are far too soft on these lads, Sir Lyndon," Lord Gall would laugh, "Just wait till I get my hands on them—just wait till their first siege! Then they will know how soft they really are...like lambs to the slaughter!"

One boy puddled himself in his stockings at those words. Beon had felt sorry for the lad as he watched the boy's blue eyes turn glossy with embarrassment, and he decided then that he would always defend the weak when he finally became a knight.

But now it was Beon's moment to prove himself as a page. He slowed his breath and steeled his gaze on the approaching quintain. As he approached the target, Beon couched his lance as he'd been taught, substantially reducing the amount of flex in anticipation of the lunge. He steadied himself and took aim. The pony was panting furiously, but he ignored the horse's strain. Sensing the best moment, he thrust the lance forward, and...twak!

Beon knew he'd hit the target dead on, but Sir Lyndon's words remained sharp in his mind, and he was ready for it when the sack swung toward him. He bent his torso, ducking his head down to the side of the horse's neck. The sack whooshed above him, missing him completely, but Beon's abrupt maneuver had thrown the pony off balance, causing it to drop its head forward and hit its muzzle on the ground.

The pony's sudden slip sent Beon soaring over the horse's head as it went down in a tumble of dust and mud. While in mid-air, Beon let go of the lance and tucked into a tight roll as he hit the ground. After coming out of the somersault, he landed roughly on his feet and slid about three yards. When he came to a halt, he saw that the pony had already sprung up and started galloping toward the stable like the devil. Dust began to settle around him, and Beon noticed everyone staring at him, their eyes wide and mouths hanging open.

Suddenly the other Pages erupted in cheers. Sir Lyndon shook his head slowly and grinned like he wanted to chuckle but kept it contained. For the first time since the training exercises had begun, Lord Gall was not laughing. In fact, he had a strange look on his face, as though he tasted something very sour.

"Come here, son of Sir Everard," the Baron said.

Beon went and stood before him.

"You are unarmed. You've tossed your weapon away. You may land like a cat if thrown from your horse but much good it will do you if you have tossed away your weapon." With that, in one fluid motion, the baron drew his sword, and, using the flat side of the blade, slapped Beon's feet from underneath him. He landed with a hard thud on his back in the mud. Heat rose within Beon, and he jumped to his feet to face Lord Gall, but as soon as he turned the Baron had the point of his blade to Beon's neck. Beon stood, frozen, panting. After a tense moment, the Baron dropped his blade and smiled coldly.

"You've got a hot one here, Sir Lyndon...it is yet to be determined if he is brave or stupid. He is certainly bull-headed and belligerent toward authority..."

"Go gently, my lord, he is still learning the ways—" Sir Lyndon began.

"Go gently indeed," Lord Gall interrupted as he swiped his long sword a second time, slapping Beon's feet from under him yet again.

"I would stay down this time, boy. You may have inherited the arrogance of your father but none of his talent or skill...and you still have no weapon."

Lord Gall was distracted at that moment by shouts from the castle. Servants were calling for the Baron to come at once. He left Beon and the other pages without a word. Wearing an expression of worry, Sir Lyndon followed Lord Gall.

Beon couldn't decide if he was more determined than ever to prove himself to the baron or if he hated the man. A shadow fell across him, and Beon looked up to see that all the other boys had gathered around him. Two of them reached down on either side of him and hoisted him up off the ground. They dusted off his tunic and cleared a path for him toward the stables. He nodded his thanks and walked toward the castle with head held high. As he approached, he heard a sound that sent chills down his spine. The servants had begun to wail, so much grief in the cry that Beon turned pale.

Chapter 3

WHAT BRINGS THE RAIN

Sophia watched, her vision blurry from emotions, as Mother was lowered into the ground behind the church, her body wrapped tightly in a white linen shroud. She found she'd felt utterly numb for the past day—unable to speak and unable to cry. Her prayers had been answered. Her baby brother had indeed survived. But how could she have been so remiss as to forget to pray for Mama's life? Sophia berated herself as the priest blessed her mother. The entire parish had made the long walk from the castle through the middle of the small village to St. Aidan's in complete silence. She had made this walk many times at her mother's side, holding her hand, through wind, rain, and sunshine. But never more. And it was all her fault.

Father had not spoken a word either, and his silence seemed more frightening than his typical rants. His expression told her that he was positively furious. Red-faced, a clenched jaw, and something Sophia suspected was murderous rage. Watching him closely, she wondered if he might burst at the seams. After Maerwynn had been covered over, the crowd began to disperse. Sophia kept her eyes fixed on Father, but she could hear the weeping continue as nobles and servants alike drifted away. Still, her father stood, like a stone. As the din of mourners died off, Sophia wasn't sure if anyone else remained for she refused to look behind her. She refused to look anywhere but at her father. She didn't know why, but she was looking for something. Waiting for something. A sign perhaps.

Slowly, her father's eyes traveled from the earthen mound up toward the heavens, his mouth twisted with disgust. With his eyes still lifted to the sky, he spat upon the ground in front of him. After a beat, he turned and walked away. Sophia found that she was breathing at a quick pace. What did this mean? Why was her father angry? Did he blame himself as well? Did he blame God? If her father was enraged enough to spit in God's eye, then he must have truly loved Mama. If he blamed God as much as Sophia blamed herself, then he must have had real feelings for her. A wave of emotion swept over her when a sense of intense fear seized her gut. What if Father were to find out that she was to blame for her mother's death, having only prayed for the baby's life all those days and nights?

Sophia began to cry, the tears creeping up on her, snatching her breath away. She was heaving before she knew it and was frightened by the way her body reacted to this new concern. Rushing to the mound, she threw herself onto Mother's grave, wailing. After a moment, she felt someone kneel beside her and lay a comforting hand on her back. When the scent of lavender touched her nose, she immediately knew it was Nurse.

The woman stroked her head and hummed a low tune that calmed Sophia. Once her breathing had slowed to a more normal pace, Sophia lifted her head and laid it in Nurse's lap. When she did, she noticed that all of Father's pages had remained, along with Sir Lyndon. They stood at attention, as if on watch. Everyone else was gone. She thought it strange that they had stayed when it was apparent the rest of Father's troops were on their way back to the castle along with him.

Before she could think any further, Beon stepped from the ranks. He held something in his hands and carried it ceremoniously toward her. She sat up and wiped her face. Beon knelt before her and handed her something folded in a white linen kerchief. Furrowing her brow, she gently opened the folds. When she peeled back the last fold, a bird was revealed—a bird in flight, carved out of wood. It sat in her palm on the cloth as if against a white sky. The detail was beautiful, and just the sight of it made Sophia's heart feel warm.

The tears began to flow again as she peered up at Beon.

Speechless, Sophia just stared at him, her fingers sliding over the finely etched lines making up the wings and feathers.

As gallant as any knight, the boy rose from his knee and bowed to her. He turned and walked back toward the other pages. As he approached the line, the boys parted and let Beon continue past the church, then fell in behind, and followed him back down the hill toward the castle. Sir Lyndon bowed to her as well, before turning to leave with the others.

In awe, a shuddering breath escaped her as Sophia looked down at the bird in her hand, wishing she could fly away. But she had not the strength to do anything at all. She wasn't sure if she cared to do anything for the rest of her life.

As though the heavens began to mourn her mother as well, droplets of moisture began to fall from above and Nurse got to her feet. But Sophia was not ready to leave her mother. With one hand she clutched the little bird to her chest, and with the other, she reached forward and pressed it to the cold earth as it became mottled with raindrops.

It wasn't long, however, before Nurse bent down and pulled Sophia up gently, saying, "Come, my sweet child."

Perhaps in protest, the rain began to pour in earnest as they made their way through the gravestones and down the hill toward a future that seemed bleak and uncertain. Rising up before her, Bamborough Castle looked as though it was being consumed by mist and rain while the sandy waves crashed beyond.

Chapter 4

GET THEE TO A NUNNERY

Seven long years of intense training had passed since the dark and dreary day of the burial. Images of Sophia's tearstained face had haunted Beon ever since. And whenever he saw an angel within a tapestry or painting, he was again reminded of the heartbreak visible within Sophia's blue eyes. But as Beon knew well from experience, life was not fair. If he could find a way of keeping the destruction of death from ever touching Sophia again, he would do it without hesitation. Knowing it was simply a fanciful wish, he set the idea aside.

Beon would admit that he'd been too busy to think of the girl often, but today was different. He was literally on his way to see Sophia for the first time since her mother had died. Beon hoped during her time away from home that the innocent joy and curiosity might have returned to her eyes. Even though it was common to do so, Beon had not been pleased when Sophia was sent away to the convent on Lindisfarne Island. It just didn't seem fair to isolate her from everyone she knew so soon after her mother's passing.

The convent lay just off the coast about a day's ride north of Bamborough Castle. Lindisfarne had long been referred to as Holy Island due to its inhabitants of monastic monks and nuns who had created a bastion of faith in the secluded place. He'd been told that Sophia now lived with the nuns at the Lindisfarne Priory and the fact that it wasn't far away made him feel guilty for not seeing her until now. But aside from never being free of his duties long enough to make such a trek, it wasn't proper for a young man to even consider visiting a girl of marriageable age without very specific intentions.

Sophia had returned home for visits only a few times over the years, at Christmas mainly, but Beon had always returned to Brentworth to celebrate with his family. Whenever Father caught him staring distantly out the window, he would tease him by asking, "Do tell me, Beon, who have you left your thoughts with at Bamborough?" But he'd never been able to admit aloud that it was Sophia's angelic features filling his mind.

He'd only heard about her rare visits in passing. Sir Lyndon would give him an update now and again. For the most part, Beon's thoughts had to be occupied with his training and advancing his career as a knight. He longed to join his father on the field and make him proud.

However, the Baron still seemed extremely disinclined toward Beon. The man was impossible to impress. And the more unjust Lord Gall was in regards to his advancement, the more determined Beon became. In Beon's mind, the Baron had intentionally delayed making him a squire, even though his fourteenth birthday had come and gone years ago, with the excuse that he had 'started late.' What did that matter if he was superior to the other pages in all areas of their training? He could best most of the squires as well, for that matter. Beon's fingers tightened around the reins at the thought, his teeth pressed together in frustration, the sound of his horse's hooves clacking against the stony path echoed in his ears.

Beon knew without a doubt that he had excelled in his studies and training. He was respected by both the younger pages and the older squires alike. Even those that were jealous of his abilities still showed him respect. In addition to building up his physical strength, Sir Lyndon had insisted that Beon increase his mental acumen by reading in his spare time. There were not many books to be found, but Beon read whatever he could get his hands on. Poetry, histories, ballads, even maps. He was learning about previous battles and strategies, and he was thirsty to prove himself once and for all. War was happening all around him, just beyond his reach. King Edward III was tireless in his conquests, whether on the front against France, or against the Scots. Not to mention the insurrections that would often occur on England's own soil. Beon was awaiting his chance to go to battle and trying his best not to let his impatience cause him to make an error.

Once again, however, instead of being given a chance to prove himself with tasks better suited to his skills, he had been sent to escort the baron's daughter home for the May Day feast and festivities. Despite being secretly curious about Sophia, Beon found he was annoyed by an errand that was yet another way of excluding him. The order had not come from Lord Gall's mouth, but Beon was sure the Baron had arranged it. Babysitting a child, charming though she may be, was a waste of Beon's precious time. Not that he minded the idea of being in Sophia's company.

Remembering her broken form beside her mother's fresh grave brought a return of the sympathy he'd felt. He'd thought it would be a knightly gesture to comfort her in some way, to honor her grief, as it were, so he had gifted her with one of his carvings. Having witnessed how the seagulls flocked around her at the beach, he'd known at once the bird was for her.

With his thoughts returning to the task at hand, Beon stared at the back of the knight he'd been assigned to travel with and frowned. Not only was this not a good time for his training to be interrupted, the knight he'd been partnered with was one of the cruelest people he'd ever met. The truth be told, Sir Bartley was even meaner than Lord Gall. For the most part, Beon was able to avoid the man because he served as one of Lord Gall's personal knights, but on this trip, Sir Bartley would be inescapable. And since Beon feared this man was watching for any missteps he might take so he could make things worse for him with Lord Gall, it was one more thing that could delay his advancement.

They made the day's ride north along the coast and planned to stay at the Barn at Beal just this side of the island on the mainland. They would take the short boat trip to the island before daylight so as to have Sophia back at Bamborough Castle before dark the next day. They'd brought along a small pony for Sophia to ride back.

Staring out across the South Low, the small bay separating him from Holy Island, Beon watched as the setting sun cast a reddish glow on the Priory and surrounding stone structures. The Priory appeared well-worn and whitewashed from weather. Birds flew over top, the sunset catching on their wings.

Beon only allowed himself a moment of reverie before ducking into the inn after Sir Bartley. Noticing that the knight was already nursing a tankard of ale, Beon asked for his own room. He still needed to study, after all, and needed his privacy. Enjoying these rare moments alone, the master of his own charge, Beon savored the hearty stew and drank two tankards of ale while he read about courtly etiquette. He took one more tankard to bed with a candle as he continued to read contentedly, late into the night.

Told to expect her escort before dawn, Sophia was eager to leave and had made sure she was up and ready earlier than required, but she was disappointed when no one appeared to collect her. As the sun peaked its head up over the edge of the ocean, she was beginning to feel restless and annoyed. Her escort had never been late before.

Startled by a sudden ruckus behind her, she turned to see a page wearing the Gall colors of green and gold, tumbling over a stack of baskets by the courtyard entrance. Potatoes rolled in all directions as the page tried to quickly recover his dignity by chasing the tumbling tubers and gathering them back up into one of the baskets.

Sophia was too surprised even to laugh, so she just watched and waited.

As he set the basket down, having missed several potatoes, he shrugged his shoulders and dusted off his hands. When he came to full height, the rising sun cast him in a dewy glow. Intrigued by what she saw, Sophia's breath caught.

Taking in the fact that he was tall and sturdy, Sophia wondered why she'd first thought he was a page rather than a squire, at the very least. With an earnest brow and a handsome countenance, the squire carried himself with a familiar air of confidence, despite his tumble with the baskets and potatoes. His brown hair was thick and wavy as it rested on his shoulders. The young man looked like Beon, but she wasn't entirely certain if it really was him. If it was Beon, then he'd grown from a boy to man since last she saw him.

"Beon?" she asked.

Swinging around to face her, he swiped a hand over his sweaty brow and then started walking briskly toward her. As he neared, Sophia immediately knew that it was indeed Beon. "Forgive me, my lady," he said as he came to bow before her, "but would you be so kind as to direct me to Lady Gall."

“Beon...it is I...it is Sophia.” A grin captured her mouth. Did he truly not recognize her?

Beon raised his head and studied her features. He blinked a time or two and then his mouth fell slightly agape before he quickly bowed his head again. “I...I overslept, my lady. Forgive me.”

She couldn’t help the laugh that escaped her. She had never seen Beon like this before, and was marveling at how much taller he was now, so was she, of course—so, maybe she shouldn’t have been amazed by that. “Sir Beon, did you indulge in more ale than you should have last night?” she found herself asking with a laugh.

He rubbed his eyes as though trying to clear them and remained reluctant to meet her eyes. “I didn’t drink as much as Sir Bartley did, my lady.”

“Sir Bartley is with you?” she asked in dismay, as she was not fond of the man. The knight smiled even less than Father, which was never.

“And you must not call me ‘sir’ as I am not yet a knight.”

“Oh,” she said, unsure of what else to say, detecting the disappointment in his voice.

“And yes,” he went on, “I may have had one tankard too many. Forgive me for being late.”

Sophia just stood there, again unsure of what to say.

“You look...very well, my lady...all grown up,” he said, eyes remaining downcast.

“And you...I hardly recognized you.” Why was he being so bashful? she wondered. “You’re so tall,” she added softly, hoping the small compliment might help.

Beon looked up at her then, and they stared at each other for a moment. Perhaps too long, she thought, when he kicked a stray potato towards the baskets and rubbed a hand over his nape.

“Well, we’d better be on our way if we hope to make it to Bamborough by nightfall,” Beon finally said.

“Will Sir Bartley be joining us?” she asked out of curiosity.

At that, Beon simply shrugged his shoulders.

Sophia was surprised at how happy she was to see Beon. When she had first been sent away, she’d missed her brothers terribly...particularly Marcel, for she hadn’t a chance to know her baby brother Marcus yet. Over the past several years, however, she had enjoyed visiting less and less. Marcel was completely under her father’s charge and had no time for Sophia whatsoever. Marcus was still basically a babe, and while she did savor her time with the boy, who resembled Sophia’s mother greatly, he was always whisked away to play at arms with the older boys. Bamborough didn’t seem to hold any parts of her mother’s soul, save that in Sophia’s own heart.

She missed her mother most of all, but ever since she left the castle, Sophia felt her mother’s spirit had journeyed to Holy Island along with her and had remained close by ever since. This feeling gave Sophia strength and comfort. Much to Sophia’s surprise, life at the convent had been rather blissful. After living in such a tense and war-centric environment at Bamborough, she found comfort in the quiet solitude of the Priory. She basked in the solace of the island and the holy communion of the sisters and brothers who lived there. She went about her chores and her prayers with an open heart and empty of ambitions, feeling her mother's spirit ever present. She would sit for hours and watch the birds and animals of the island, many of which had become so familiar with Sophia they'd eat right out of her hand.

She had taken charge of the chickens and other fowl within the monastery, as well as the flock of doves and homing pigeons. She was hoping to convince the Prior and Head Sister to allow her a falcon. They felt it was too akin to sport and fancy. However, Sophia was determined to convince them otherwise in time.

"How do you like living on the island?" Beon asked, as they finally got on the road south and could take a breath. Sophia could tell that Beon was berating himself for being tardy because he rowed across the South Low like a madman. Doing his best to make up for lost time, he had the horses saddled within minutes after arriving at the barn. When they'd finally started their journey, Beon was sweating from his efforts but showed no signs of fatigue.

"I love it, actually," Sophia replied.

Beon regarded her quickly. "Really? I never imagined you as a nun."

"No, no...only the rejected girls take the vow." Sophia laughed. "Although I don't suppose I'd mind...especially if it meant I could stay on the island forever. It's so peaceful."

"What do you mean by 'rejected?'" Beon asked.

"Well, I'm not the only lady there. Some of us have been rejected by our families—or rather, have relatives who wish to keep the girls' dowries for themselves—while others are just temporary boarders. For instance, Lady Eva is there for 'safe keeping' while her father is at war."

"Your father isn't at war."

"I know. But Mother is gone, and I guess Father..." Not knowing how to finish, Sophia found it was her turn to shrug her shoulders.

"I think it would grow tiresome living with nuns, yes?"

"Mm, not for me. There's always some chore to be done or some animal that needs feeding. And so many birds of all shapes and sizes, you wouldn't believe. I can lie and watch them circling above me...I can close my eyes and put myself in their place. Have you ever done that? Imagined yourself flying?"

"I imagine it's similar to riding a horse at full gallop, yes?"

"Well, perhaps, yes...or in a dream?"

Beon considered this while furrowing his brow. "No, I haven't."

"It's the most amazing feeling."

Beon shook his head as he smiled at her. "How old are you again? You may look grown up, but you certainly haven't lost your childish ways."

"I beg your pardon? I turned fifteen this past March. Are you calling me childish?" she asked.

"No...what I mean is...I just meant—"

"Ah, I see. Still sputtering like a child. And still my father's errand boy." As soon as she said it, Sophia regretted her choice of words. She had been stung by Beon's words and couldn't control her impulsive counter attack. Beon raised himself up and looked down his nose at her. He was trying to look angry, but she'd seen the flicker of pain in his eyes. Without saying anything more, he huffed and kicked the sides of his horse, taking off into a gallop. After blinking in disbelief, Sophia had no choice but to follow. She grabbed the reins of her pony more tightly and took off after him.

It had been a while since she'd ridden a horse at full tilt but she found it came back to her naturally. She was her father's daughter after all. As they raced along the south road, the smell of the ocean filling her nose and the wind in her hair, she began to feel a huge grin spread across her face. Sophia felt as if she were flying, just like Beon had said. She felt exhilarated as she dashed down a slight dip in the road. When the path flattened once more, she closed her eyes, let go of the reins and stretched her arms out wide, like wings. It was the most amazing feeling she'd ever felt...true freedom. Tears of joy began to spread from the corners of her eyes and blow back toward her ears from the force of the wind. She laughed out loud.

She opened her eyes, but her smile dropped when she saw that Beon had stopped some distance ahead and was staring back at her with his mouth open. Sophia reached down and grabbed the reins again, bringing the pony to a canter and then a trot. When she reached the spot where Beon stood waiting, Sophia came to a stop.

"You were right! It's incredible—it truly feels like flying! Just like you said!" Sophia exclaimed.

"Are you mad? You could've been killed! I've never seen anything so reckless in my life!" Beon said.

"But you said...I assumed you'd done it before..."

"My training doesn't allow for silly games. Now, I was instructed to have you back by nightfall, and I intend to be a man of my word," he said, as he turned his horse south again.

"Without Sir Bartley, you mean?"

Beon shrugged his shoulders. "The horses just need to be walked for a bit. They need rest before we can run them again."

They rode in silence for a while, passing the odd traveler along the road. It was a lovely spring day, and she watched the sun slowly make its descent in the east as she and Beon ran their horses, and then walked them intermittently. Sophia noticed a lone peasant some distance ahead of them on a cart, a mule trudging along in front of it. They had only passed a couple of travelers heading south that day.

She considered Beon as he sat erect in his saddle, looking awfully serious. Still a bit pompous as well, and yet, she found she didn't mind. For whatever inexplicable reason, she had faith in his abilities as a knight even if he said he wasn't an official knight yet. She felt safe around him. Perhaps he invoked these feelings because he himself had such faith in his abilities. It didn't matter what he was doing, he approached the task with absolute faith that he was capable and would excel. She had never met someone so sure about their place in the world and so determined on a path to get there.

Sophia thought of his face as he'd stepped from the ranks of the other pages to pay his respects on the day her mother was buried. She thought of the bird he had carved...or at least the bird she assumed he had carved. She actually didn't know for sure. The little token had come to be a source of great comfort for her, especially in the beginning. When she first arrived at the convent as a girl, Sophia would speak to the bird as if it were her mother. Often she would talk to it in her bed at night as she cried herself to sleep. As time passed and the sharp pain of loss began to subside, the bird came to symbolize that the spirit of her mother was always close by. Sophia cherished the bird, as she had cherished her dear mother.

Sophia sidled up alongside Beon and said, "I want to properly thank you for your gift."

Her voice had startled him, and she assumed it was because they hadn't spoken for several miles.

"Pardon?" he asked, looking at her.

"After my mother's death, you were the only man...well, man or boy...to offer me any comfort."

He turned his face back toward the road. "Well, it was only what any proper knight would do. Sir Lyndon agreed."

"It meant a great deal to me. I thank you, sincerely."

"You're welcome, my lady."

"I still carry it with me. Always, in fact."

He turned to look at her again. "What?" he asked.

"The bird."

Sophia reached into her skirts and produced the wooden creature. She held it out to him in the palm of her hand. He furrowed his brow as a smile of recognition broke out across his face, and he took the bird from her hand.

"My word, I'd forgotten it was a magpie."

"So you did carve it?"

"Yes, a little hobby of mine," he said, examining his work.

"Well, it meant a great deal to me...it means a great deal still."

"This one is extremely rudimentary," he said disapprovingly, handing it back to her. "I've improved much since then."

"I thank you all the same," she said.

Sophia thought she could detect a slight smile of satisfaction tugging at his lips. She smiled too as she looked to the west once again to watch the sun make its final dip past the hills. Exhaling, she took in the scenery as they moved along. She loved living at the Priory, but Sophia loved the countryside too. Refocusing on the yellow sunlight, she watched as it blazed through the silhouetted trees like a forest fire, and then extinguished itself.

As night began to surround them, she found herself asking, "How much farther?"

Again, her voice seemed to wake Beon from some deep or intense thought. He looked toward the horizon where the sun used to be and cursed under his breath. “We’re still about a mile out,” he said. “Come, there’s a bit of light left. We’ll gallop the rest of the way.”

Even at the easy pace they’d been walking the horses, they had gained considerably on the peasant ahead of them. He was clearly visible in the dusky light. Just as they were getting close enough to pass by the unfortunate fellow, the mule that was pulling the peasant’s cart reared onto its hind legs and halted with an ear-splitting squeal. The poor beast looked positively spooked, and the peasant was shouting at the animal to no avail. The mule was fixated on the line of trees to their left and attempting to back up the road toward her and Beon. Sophia wondered what sort of wild animal could have it so frightened.

Suddenly, as quick as a gust of wind, something burst from the tree line in a single bound and collided with the peasant dead on. The beast, along with the peasant now in its clutches, flew to the right side of the road before rolling on the ground and ending in a pounce atop the poor wretch.

The man was shrieking at the top of his lungs, the sound causing a chill to slide up her spine. Sophia reached out to grasp onto Beon’s sleeve, whispering, “That poor man...can’t you help?”

“Shhh, it could hear you,” he answered, speaking so softly she barely heard him.

At Beon’s words, the creature froze and may have looked at them. Since it was really just a big black shape, she couldn’t say for sure, and Sophia thought it would be impossible for anything to have heard them with the man screaming like he was. She ached for the poor soul, but she knew now that Beon had been right in quieting her. Drawing the dark beast their way would be quite dangerous due to its size, and while most knights could have taken it on, it was obvious that Beon wasn’t yet as tall as any of the full-grown knights.

When the creature didn’t start moving their way, probably unwilling to give up its prey, Sophia searched her mind, trying to imagine what it could possibly be. But nothing its size was known to live in this area—that she knew of anyway. There had been a library at the Priory, but she’d always been drawn to books about birds. All she could think of was that it might be a wolf or wild dog. When the idea occurred to her that creatures such as those tended to travel in packs, she glanced around at the trees but saw no movement.

Now that the beast was stationary atop the flailing peasant and now that her eyes had adjusted to the darkness, she could get a much better look at it. It was black and hunched over with its back to them so she couldn’t clearly recognize its shape. It appeared to be covered in long hair, but without being able to see its head or legs, she remained mystified as to what it could be.

The beast turned its head towards the peasant’s face, and then he went completely silent. In fact, he stopped struggling altogether and laid his arms outstretched, completely prone. What had happened to quiet him so quickly? It didn’t appear as though he was dead yet.

Finally realizing she was holding her breath, Sophia gasped, and the sound seemed loud in the sudden silence. The beast turned toward them at the noise, and she covered her mouth to silence her next gasp. Its eyes were a shimmering gray color, almost silver. Her heart pounded in her ears as she feared it might come bounding their way. Something about the way it moved next made her think it wasn't an animal, though, and Sophia slowly clutched the crucifix around her neck.

Chapter 5

THE THING FROM HELL

The shadowed creature lunged into the trees along the east side of the road. Beon drew his sword. Mentally, he struggled to stop the shaking in his body, but he had never seen anything like this before. When the creature had looked at them with a pair of reflective eyes, he'd decided it must be an enormous dog. But when it had moved, he'd begun to think otherwise.

The...thing...seemed human. Like a man. A sort of man, anyway. Beon wasn't sure if it had been a trick of the light or not, but its face had appeared pale in the dimming light. And when it hissed at them before dashing off he would swear he'd seen unusual teeth—like the fangs of a predatory animal. A human with fangs just did not fit.

A terrifying and unnatural silence settled in around them, not even crickets filled the night with their chirping, and Beon tightened the grip he had on his sword.

The peasant still lay prone on the ground about forty meters ahead of where they had stopped. He wasn't moving. Had the creature killed him? Beon wanted to check on the man to see if he could help, but something told him it wasn't safe yet. And while he felt sorry for the peasant, his top priority was Sophia. He also wished he wasn't alone in his duties at the moment—even Sir Bartley would be welcome at this moment and he wondered with annoyance what had happened to the man.

Beon heard a rustling directly to his right, and before he could even turn his body, the dark figure came out of the shadows so fast he didn't have time to react. He was knocked from his horse so hard he worried some bones might have broken. Landing with a painful crash, his sword slipped from his grip, clattering to the ground. In a daze, Beon got to standing as fast as he could and grabbed his sword; glad at least that Sophia's pony had danced forward far enough she wasn't thrown to the ground.

When Sophia turned her pony around, probably to ask if he was all right, Beon held up his hand to keep her quiet.

"But—" she began, and he shot a stern look her way, hoping she would take his warning seriously.

Hating how his limbs wobbled, Beon listened intently as he blinked into the darkness that was now falling fast in the forest.

Again, there was that eerie silence.

Forced to step forward when he was suddenly shoved from behind, Beon whirled around. Already knowing the assailant could strike harder than that, Beon realized this thing was toying with him, mocking him by not using all of its strength with each blow.

Beon lifted his blade, but the attacker blew past him, wrenching his sword free of his hands again. This time the creature did not disappear into the wood but stood, perfectly still, several meters away.

There were no doubts in Beon's mind now, this thing was indeed a man, and although he had been moving so unbelievably fast, he wasn't even breathing hard. He may not have been breathing at all. Beon's head was pounding from the fall—and from utter disbelief. He had no idea what he was seeing. It was a devil...a demon...a spirit from the grave. He knew not. And he could not decide if he was awake or dreaming.

The creature-like person locked eyes with Beon as he slowly moved closer. And as the devil held his gaze, Beon found he no longer wished to escape it. To his horror, he felt a desire to be near the demon...he also felt his legs go limp...they truly could not hold his weight any longer...his thoughts became muddled...not making sense at all. The demon was so close now Beon could see the piercing quality of his eyes as if they floated out from under the inky black hood.

The next thing Beon knew, Sophia had stepped in front of him. She held something in her hand that she stretched out toward the monster. As soon as she did, the demon shrunk away a little. Beon felt a release as if his body had just been dropped by a giant hand loosening its grip. He could breathe again, and his head began to clear.

Able to focus on Sophia now, he could see that she held a crucifix. It was the crucifix she'd been wearing around her neck. She held it in her fist and jutted it toward the demon's face as if it were a weapon. The devil continued to shrink away until it turned and ran back toward the peasant, who now seemed to be stirring. Moving like a rapid river current, the creature scooped up the man as if he were a rag doll and disappeared into the forest.

When Beon's senses returned after a long moment of silence, he could hear Sophia's heavy breathing. Turning to look at her, he noticed that she was still frozen in the same position as when she'd defended him against the attacker—her arm outstretched and holding the cross.

Beon went to her gently and touched her shoulder. She startled as she looked at him with wide eyes.

"It's all right now...I think it's gone," he said. "Still, we should make haste to the castle—if we can find the horses." They had bolted during the attack. "How did you know?" he asked. When she looked at him blankly, he asked again, "How did you know to use the crucifix that way?"

Sophia was still clutching the cross in her fist like a sword and he realized she might be in shock even if she had singlehandedly saved them both.

After staring at him for a moment, she began, "There have been whisperings around the monastery...of monsters...alive and dead at the same time. Some have discovered ways of deterring them. I thought they were just stories..." Sophia stared off into the darkness and started to weep. "I never should have left the nunnery.”

“Nonsense. You saved my life...with only...”

Beon dropped to one knee before her. “I pledge my allegiance to you. I am your servant, my lady.”

She blinked down at him. “I...what? Don’t be silly...Beon—”

He reached up and silenced her with one finger. Rising to face her, he asked, “Do you have any idea how long I have been training to become a knight?”

Before she could answer, he went on, “Long enough to have been able to protect us, I assure you, and yet you saved us both from a creature belched forth from the very depths of Hell with a pretty bobble.”

It was well over an hour before Beon was able to retrieve the horses and get on their way. At this point, Beon was dreading their return to Bamborough. He felt certain that Lord Gall would be pacing the floor—or worse yet, send out a search party at any moment. Either way, Beon would be drawn and quartered. Somehow he was sure it wouldn’t matter to Lord Gall that Sir Bartley had abandoned them. He could bid farewell to his hopes for a promotion—it would never come after this episode. What exactly had he seen, anyway? He was still in a daze from the extraordinary events he’d just witnessed.

He helped Sophia onto the pony, keenly aware of the fact that she had begun shaking. Laying his hand on hers, he said, “You’re all right. It’ll be all right. We’re quite close.”

“I—I don’t think I can.”

Beon considered Sophia and decided she looked rather frazzled. Afraid that she could still be in shock, he helped her back down off the horse and instead put her atop his own steed. He grabbed the reins of the pony and tied them to the saddle of his horse and mounted as well, planning to let it run alongside them. He sat with Sophia in front of him so he could hold onto her lest she faint. Wrapping his left arm around her waist, Beon gathered up the reins of his horse with his right hand. Sophia crossed her arms over top his as if she welcomed the warmth and protection. Something Beon could not identify brimmed to life inside his chest at her touch—a burning sensation that caught his breath and awakened his loins in a way that startled him.

As they took off in the night, Beon was suddenly very aware he had never been this close to a female other than his mother. Her hair blew in his face and smelled of the ocean and lavender. He found himself holding her tighter to his chest, and Sophia in turn, clamped her arms more tightly around his.

Beon was almost sorry when the torches of Bamborough came into view. He was feeling so many different emotions at once, it seemed the only thing that made sense in all the jumble was this stolen magical moment with Sophia. It even caused his fear of Lord Gall to melt away. Come what may, he thought.

Before they got within a stone's throw, Beon brought the horse to a halt.

"Why are we stopping?" Sophia asked.

"I think...perhaps I should get off and walk you the rest of the way, my lady. For appearances."

She held tightly to his arm and laid her head back on his shoulder. "I feel so safe and warm though."

Beon's heart raced, and his mouth went dry. He suddenly felt awkward and stiff, and he had no idea what to do. He wanted to stay just as they were a little longer but the reality of the castle loomed large, as though it had eyes. The fantasy was over. Seeing no way around that encroaching reality Beon slid off the horse, and Sophia turned her face away from him bashfully. He found he couldn't look at her either.

Beon led the horses toward the gate and braced himself for the worst. Not only was he extremely tardy in completing the task given him, but he'd put the baron's daughter in mortal danger and quite possibly compromised her virtue. Beon wasn't certain about this last one, he just knew something had happened in his body that had never happened before. Best to put it out of his mind, he decided. He had no idea what Sophia was thinking and didn't dare ask. Perhaps she hadn't noticed anything.

The castle seemed quiet once as they walked toward the gates. The two sentries poked their heads out from atop the battlements and recognized him immediately. Their heads disappeared without a word, and the gate began to open. Beon and Sophia entered to find the courtyard vacant aside from a servant or two making their rounds. Beon felt a measure of relief but wasn't quite ready to count his chickens.

"You seem surprised that my father is not here to greet me. I am not surprised in the least."

Beon did not know how to respond to that, so he changed the subject. "Would you like to continue on to the stables with me?"

"I would," she said.

They walked in silence for several moments, both holding their breath. Finally, Beon could take no more and blurted, "What will you tell your father, my lady?"

She turned her head but still didn't meet his gaze. "About...tell him about what? Oh...you mean—about the creature?"

"Yes, my lady—"

"Please, Beon, call me Sophia."

"Sophia," he whispered, "I need to know—I want to do the honorable thing. As I said, I am your servant, indebted to you forever, but this is a very complicated and confusing revelation. It may be best we don't speak a word of this to anyone."

"Even Sir Lyndon?" Sophia asked.

There would be no way around Sir Lyndon, even if they'd escaped the wrath of Lord Gall by the grace of God, Beon would have to tell his mentor the truth.

“Perhaps after I return you to Holy Island...Sir Lyndon is the only one I would trust. We need to find out more about...whatever it is we saw. I’d like to get another glimpse, come better prepared, and possibly even capture the thing. If I could do that, then we wouldn’t run the risk of everyone thinking we’re mad.”

Sophia looked at Beon for the first time since arriving, gaping and frowning rather fiercely at him. “You want to return me to the convent?” she stammered.

“Well...well, yes, to make sure you arrive safely, yes.” When Sophia stared at him with doleful eyes—her frown deepening—Beon continued, “I don’t mean now...”

Sophia expelled a shuddering breath and then smiled faintly. “Of course, forgive me, I was afraid you meant right away.”

For some reason the comment made him laugh uncomfortably, and he was relieved when she joined him.

Clutching at his middle as the laugh subsided, he said, “No, no...we can’t have you missing the May Day Feast after all.”

“No...”

Another bout of silence surrounded them as their eyes held intently upon each other.

“Well, I suppose I shall bid you goodnight then,” she murmured quietly, as though she didn’t mean what she was saying.

“Oh, shall I walk you to the great hall?” he offered, secretly not wanting to leave her side just yet.

“Thank you, but no...I...thank you,” she answered, her words unsteady.

“As you wish, my lady,” he said, unable to think of a valid reason to remain in her company.

After a moment of awkward silence, Beon asked her something that had been gnawing at him the entire trip. “If you please, I would very much like to improve upon the carving I gave you all those years ago. I would return it to you in much better condition and give you—”

“Oh no, no, I wouldn’t dare part with it,” she interrupted. “I like it just the way it is.”

“In that case, I shall just have to come up with a new creation for you. A better one, I assure you.”

“Right, well...”

At that Beon knelt down and bowed his head.

“Goodnight, my lady,” he said.

When she shot a pout his way, he corrected with, “Sophia. Goodnight, Sophia.”

“Goodnight, Beon,” she replied, smiling faintly.

By the time Beon raised his head, there was nothing left of her in the darkness but a lingering scent of lavender and the sea. The waves crashed below the castle, the only sound to be heard aside from the chirp of crickets...and for reasons he couldn’t explain, he felt empty inside without her. Beon felt ill prepared to do anything about it, though. He wasn’t yet a knight, and that goal needed to be reached before he thought of...well, frivolous things like very pretty girls. Especially with the knowledge that hellish creatures were hunting people in the darkness. Knighthood was needed to fight whatever evil he had stumbled upon that night.

So instead of exploring parts of himself he did not understand, and instead of trying to understand feelings more foreign to him than physical pain, Beon redirected his thoughts to more pressing matters. Like how to win over a man who was clearly bent on ensuring he failed in his quest to become a knight.

Chapter 6

HEARTBROKEN WITH TIME

Sophia was awash with emotions as she prepared herself for the May Day festivities that would last the next few days. Visitors would be arriving at various times throughout the feast as guests of her father and Bamborough Castle. However, she was still so confused by the events of the night prior that she didn't much feel like being a hostess. So much had happened that she was still struggling to process. That creature on the road. That ride with Beon. It was all so frightening and thrilling. Beon had been most gallant...and arrogant and brutish...yet so very sensitive and caring. To say she was 'confused' was too simple a word for what she was really feeling. She couldn't seem to narrow it all down to just one emotion let alone three or four.

Father had given her his customary cold greeting at repast of 'I see you made it home,' while it had been wonderful to see her two brothers again. Marcus was already training as a page, and Marcel was a young man now. Of course, she was happy to see that both of them appeared to be quite strong and healthy, so she did not fear an unexpected death to steal either of them away from her.

Marcus had immediately wanted to play hideaway with her, which she'd obliged, but found it only reminded her of Beon. Reaching into the little purse attached to her belt, her fingers curled around the bird he'd given her, her thumb sliding over the carved details. A part of her knew she might wear it down with the habit, but she couldn't seem to stop. Sophia took it out and looked down at it, wondering why he wasn't happy with it. She still thought it was very well crafted, so artistically done that it was hard to imagine any squire or knight coming up with something so lovely.

Breathing in the familiar air and heady memories of her Mother's solar, Sophia jumped up from the bed when Nurse entered. Her familiar smile, an expression that reached right into the woman's eyes and brightened her entire face, was such a welcome sight Sophia rushed into her arms and immediately started crying for no reason whatsoever.

"There, there, child... What is the matter?" Nurse asked, cradling her head to her shoulder gently.

"I don't know...I suppose..." She sighed before finally saying, "I still miss Mama, so terribly," she answered, but deep down Sophia knew that was only part of it.

"I know, love, we all do." Nurse guided her to sit before the fire and retrieved Mother's hairbrush as she'd done many times in the past and the sight of it caused a lump to develop in Sophia's throat that made it difficult to swallow.

Even though it had been years since her mother had passed away, Father had not allowed anything to change within Mother's chambers. Her gowns still hung in the wardrobe. Her brush, mirror, and jewelry still rested upon the vanity just as she had left it. Not only that—but the round, filigree pendant that was meant to hold a stone or a locket of hair—instead contained two tiny portraits of both her and Marcel that Mother had painted onto bits of parchment, rolled, and then tucked inside. Sophia had been extremely tempted to take it to the Priory with her as a memento of something Mother had created, but she feared what Father would do if he discovered it missing. And even though Mother's worldly possessions resided here at Bamborough, Sophia still felt as though her soul did not.

Sophia did her best to set these thoughts aside while Nurse brushed her hair. Tucking her folded hands into her lap, she stared into the flames within the hearth as they flickered and danced around the log. When Sophia tried to think of her future instead, images of the Priory and Beon overtook her memories of the past in a way that drew her eyebrows together in contemplation. The jumble of thoughts and emotions whirled inside her mind, threatening to burst. What exactly was she feeling for Beon? And why did his presence make her wish to stay here in the castle forever?

Later that evening, as she and many of the guests were still in the great hall conversing and listening to the musicians, Beon approached her and bowed.

“My lady,” he said softly.

Sophia still did not wish for him to call her that. However, as she considered the company, she could admit that it wouldn't have been proper for him to address her by name.

When she rose to face him, his eyes danced around the room warily as he whispered from the corner of his mouth, “I've not been able to find any mention of a demon like the one we saw in any of the books at my disposal. Does the Priory have a larger library?”

“Yes, the monks—”

Cutting her off, he said, “You must tell me all you know.”

“I was told that these demons—” she stopped speaking again when his wide eyes danced around the chamber once more.

“On second thought, I'm not sure if now is the best time for this conversation,” he said.

Sophia blinked, aware of the fact that no one stood close enough to overhear them. But when she noted Father's scowl directed her way, she promptly whispered, “Meet me in the chapel during my morning vespers.” Then she curtsied.

Beon followed her gaze to Lord Gall and bowed in turn, saying, “As you wish.”

Beon's posture told her he was disappointed by something. Sophia couldn't imagine why he would be disgruntled by her words and frowned after him as he disappeared into the corridor.

The next morning, Sophia rubbed at her eyes, not having slept well at all. Images of that murderous creature in the woods had caused a shadow of fear to enter her dreams, twisting the stories that played through her mind into confusing nightmares. When she realized she was safe at home, the distressing feelings faded.

The idea of seeing Beon revived her, and she found herself taking extra time in front of the looking-glass as she prepared for their meeting. She felt silly and excited all at once, and this odd buoyancy baffled her. Even though it was completely unnecessary, Sophia took the hidden passageway to the chapel and smiled along the way, thinking of the happy memories it invoked. It was almost as though the stones of these passageways still echoed the carefree giggles she, Beon, and Marcel had emitted as they explored the dark passages. An echo that may have only resided in her mind, but she cherished the idea anyway.

Once she reached the chapel, she pushed against the panel, opening it partway to listen, making sure she and Beon would truly be alone. Moving to one of the pews when she heard no one, she waited...and waited and waited.

With a sigh, Sophia rose and began to wander the chamber. As the memories of coming here every day as a child filled her mind, she absently began singing to herself like she used to do. The old and forgotten rhymes came rushing back to her lips. Eventually, she rediscovered that magical spot in the room where the acoustics enveloped her like a warm, heavenly blanket. Sophia started spinning in place, letting her skirts billow out around her legs as she'd done when she was little—until she noticed that she wasn't alone and stopped, gasping in surprise. "How long have you been standing there?" she asked Beon. He had the strangest look on his face, and she searched his expression trying to understand it.

"I...did not know you could sing," he stammered.

"Of course I can sing and don't you know it's impolite to sneak up on someone like that? You might've frightened me to death."

Beon stepped closer, and she had to lift her chin to keep her eyes on his. "Have you been frightened? Since the woods, I mean."

"I'm all right with the sun up."

"But at night?"

"I awaken with night terrors," Sophia admitted. "But they fade once the sunlight chases away the darkness."

"I've hardly slept since we returned, but mainly because I'm devising a plan to trap the demon," he said, clasping her hands, his fingers warm to the touch. She also detected a warmth within his brown eyes she hadn't noticed the night before. As his hands warmed her own, she shivered, only then realizing how chilled she'd become waiting in the dim chapel. Dragging in a calming breath before he noticed her trembling, a stench assaulted her nose.

Taking her hands from his, she covered her nose and couldn't stop herself from saying, "You smell of manure."

"Forgive me, my lady, I failed to mention last evening that I would not be able to reconnoiter with you until my chores were complete."

“Father still has you mucking out that stalls?”

“I don’t mind, really. I love the horses...and they love me. Quite loyal, they are, and tremendously helpful to have such allies in the lists during our exercises. Your father has given me a great advantage in my training, although I doubt it was intentional.”

Sophia wrapped her arms around herself, feeling the loss of his warm touch.

“I’d offer you my robe, but...as you pointed out, it stinks...” Beon trailed off as if he’d had an idea. He next untied his robe and threw it over a nearby pew. Then came to Sophia and wrapped his arms around her from behind—just like he’d done on the horse the night before. She closed her eyes and leaned her head back against him, instantly feeling better as the heat from his body enveloped hers.

“Will you please sing like that again, my lady? I don’t believe I’ve ever heard a more beautiful sound.” Feeling his breath dance over her hair, she blushed in his arms.

With her heart now pounding in her throat and her mouth going dry, she whispered, “I fear I’m shaking too much at the moment.”

Beon held her a little tighter. They stood like that in silence for a long beat. All the while, Sophia was afraid to move or speak, lest the magical moment be over. She suspected Beon felt the same when he remained just as silent and motionless.

“Do you really think you can capture it?” Sophia finally asked. And what would they do with it after they caught it?

“The demon? Well, yes. All devils have a weakness.”

“But what if it’s an angel? An angel of death.”

A gasp escaped her when he spun her around and gripped her shoulders, his earnest eyes boring into her. “My lady, how can you speak such blasphemy in a house of God? That thing was pure evil... delivered directly from the bowels of Hell, which is where I intend to return it. Now, tell me everything you know about it...you said it was alive and dead. What does that mean?”

Momentarily silent at his sudden intensity, she finally gathered her thoughts. “I don’t know. I’ve only heard whisperings of a creature that survives off the living blood of men. It has no beating heart, is cold to the touch, but somehow the blood gives it life.”

“And strength as well, obviously. It knocked me down like I was a stalk of wheat.”

“Yes, well, supposedly it only attacks at night. I don’t think anyone knows where it goes during the day.”

“Tell me more about its weaknesses...the devil clearly shrank from your crucifix, further evidence that it is evil by the by, so we should arm ourselves with a few more of those. Why not one for each hand?”

“Especially if they’re silver, like mine.” She pulled the chain out away from her neck, letting the cross sit within her palm for him to see it. Beon’s fingertips brushed against her skin as he lifted it from her hand. “Rumors speak of an aversion to silver...and of holy water. Oh, and garlic,” she added.

After rubbing his thumb over the pendant, he released the necklace, and it dropped back to her chest. “Garlic? Really? Well, it is rather pungent. I have an aversion to garlic myself.”

“And light. I suppose because they are nocturnal they avoid light.”

“So we need silver crucifixes, some cloves of garlic, holy water, and a couple of strong torches. Anything else?”

“Well, the one priest I saw—the one who went off to free an afflicted village of the beast, had several sharp wooden stakes in his belt. I don’t want to think what he intended to use them for...but there you have it.”

“I would think he meant to impale the demon—”

The instant grotesque images filled her mind at his words she interrupted him. “I said I don’t want to think about it.”

“Right, yes, of course, my lady. Forgive me.”

“You really don’t need to refer to me in that way, we’re old friends.”

“It is a simple show of respect and admiration, my lady.”

“Admiration? I see... All right, Sir Beon, knight of Bamborough Castle, if you insist,” she said with half a smile.

Her smile fell away when he gave her no hint of a grin in return. In fact, he looked to be a mixture of annoyed and sad. “Have I said something wrong,” she asked.

“You seem to have forgotten that I am not yet a knight. With that in mind, you must know that I do not deserve that level of respect.”

Sophia wanted to argue that she did respect him a great deal, no matter what his title was. “No matter. A squire then?”

“Well, I shall start gathering our supplies in anticipation of your return to the Priory. Will I see you at the feast this evening?”

His answer was a poorly disguised attempt to change the subject. She grasped onto his sleeve. “You can’t still be a page, can you?”

“At the feast, my lady, will I see you there?” he asked, again blatantly hedging.

Realizing she might hurt his feelings if she continued pressing for an answer he was clearly unwilling to give, she said, “Of course you will. I mean, Father wouldn’t have it any other way. That is why he summoned me, I’m sure...to attract a suitor, now that I am of age.”

Sophia noticed Beon’s face turn pale at this, and she worried she’d said something wrong once again.

“It sounded to me like you wanted to stay on Holy Island,” he said.

“You wish for me to become a nun then?” she asked, bewildered. That hadn’t been the impression she’d gotten from him when she’d first spoken of her time with the nuns.

“No...I mean...well...” He sighed a bit sadly before finishing with, “I meant why would I be escorting you back after the celebration if Lord Gall didn't mean for you to stay there a bit longer?"

"I don't know why Father does half of what he does, honestly. But, I..." A flood of uncertainty came rushing back. When she'd first been sent away, she'd heard that only 'unwanted' girls were sent to nunneries, unless the stay was a temporary arrangement for their safety. And quite frequently, these girls were kept in the dark as to why they were there. Since Father was not at war, what if she was one of the unwanted girls and just didn't yet know that she'd been discarded? Was she still being punished because Mother's death was her fault? Was there something wrong with her that Father recognized, while she was too witless to see it for herself?

When Father had summoned her back for the May Day celebration, she'd hoped he was now going to welcome her back home. How was she to recognize the truth? Knowing her father would not react well if she dared ask such a thing, Sophia was left to wonder.

As a sense of hopelessness filled her, she said weakly, "I didn't know he was sending me back so soon."

She may have wanted to go back if Beon hadn't been the one to bring her home again. With him here, nowhere else felt like home. Why were her thoughts such a tangle of conflicting emotions? Feeling the sting of tears, Sophia ducked her head and ran for the entrance to the secret passageway.

Beon couldn't let her rush away like that, and went after her. Knowing these passageways as well as she did, it didn't take him long to catch up with her. Taking her hand, he drew her around to face him. At the sight of tears rolling down her cheeks his stomach clenched. "I'm sure Lord Gall is just sending you back there for your safety."

"How can you know that?"

"You're his only daughter."

"And a burden..."

"Ask him not to send you back this time."

"Do you honestly think he'll listen?"

Beon's answer to that question would have been no, so he kept it to himself.

"My things and the girls who understand me best are still there..."

"You sound conflicted."

"I am," she admitted as she swept fingers over her cheeks, shoving away the moisture. Her focus dropped to the floor, and he wondered if there was more to this she wasn't telling him.

Catching her chin against his finger, he guided her eyes back to his. "If your father has you here to find a suitor, it means he still plans to pay your dowry rather than take it from you, meaning you won't be one of the 'rejected' girls. Let's see what happens after the festivities, shall we?"

A shuddering breath escaped her, and she nodded.

The sadness and uncertainty would not release Sophia as she absently performed her duties for the feast and for the bonfires that would follow. As she gathered yellow flowers from the nearby meadows, along with just about everyone else in the castle and surrounding village, she tried to guess at Father's plan for her, but he was impossible to read. Her father's mysterious motives were not new to Sophia, but it was far more distressing where her own future was concerned. As expected, he paid full attention to Marcel, a lesser amount of interest went to Marcus, and she was all but invisible.

Typical of this celebration, the day was consumed with decorating every window, path, and door with bouquets, garlands, and crosses, all crafted from any and all yellow flowers available. Not only that, but the small hawthorn tree in the courtyard had been draped with strands of vibrant flowers and ribbons tied to branches, which fluttered in the breeze, as well as brightly painted shells that were hung from strings, so they made a faint tinkling sound as they danced against each other. As long as she could remember the tree had served as the May Bush, but rather than bring a smile to her face, it reminded her of how much things had changed. She'd missed many a May Day, which had been one of her favorite events here at Bamborough Castle, Mother's too.

And when she remembered how lovely Mother had looked with so many sprigs of primrose and rowen flowers in her hair, Sophia's mood sank a little more. As a child, and always on May Day, Sophia had wondered if her mother wasn't simply a real fairy, but actually the queen of all fairies. How that fey queen had come to live at such a solemn castle and be her mother, Sophia had never been able to sort out, but she was certainly grateful she had. As time passed, Sophia had lost touch with the whimsical side of herself, and her heart ached over that loss as well.

As Sophia's memories of the past swam before her eyes until she might drown, a bouquet of fragrant primrose suddenly blocked her vision. Before she had a chance to turn, Beon whispered very close to her ear, "With bright yellow flowers strewn before every door, and a May Bush that puts those in other villages to shame, as they each vie for the most handsome in the land, how can anyone pout so fiercely?"

Somehow the sound of his voice had chased away the shadowy memories like a ray of sunlight breaking through storm clouds, and a smile captured her mouth so fast she couldn't help but tease him back. "I'm not pouting," she said, knowing it wasn't true.

"Will a fine show of Morris dancing banish the frown, my lady?" he asked, proving he knew she was fibbing.

This drew her gaze to his attire, and she turned to face him. Noting the fact that Beon was already wearing the bells around his knees, she asked, "I'm surprised I did not hear you coming."

Half of his mouth lifted in a smile, along with an eyebrow. "I've heard that if you pout too hard, then it can cause a temporary loss of hearing."

Sophia laughed, taking the flowers from his hand and lifting them to her nose. After drawing in the fragrance, she blinked up at him. “You’re dancing?”

Beon nodded. “Along with the other lads, yes.”

“With sticks or white kerchiefs?” she asked, deciding she needed to see this. In their youth, he’d been too young as it was usually the men who performed the Morris dancing.

Before he could answer, however, Father’s angry voice cut into their conversation—and just that quickly, her mood plummeted. “Sophia! Stop neglecting your duties and make yourself ready! And see that Marcus is presentable as well.”

Marcus shuffled in her direction. “I don’t need her to look after me!” Marcus said.

Father’s fingers curled into fists when she did not respond, and she thought he might strike her if she didn’t do as he asked quickly. “Yes, Father!” she said, gathering Marcus by the hand and rushing toward the castle.

As the evening progressed, Sophia enjoyed the wonderful feast, the delightful Morris dancing, and the magical bonfires. As long as she kept her focus fixed upon Beon and not her father...that is.

Chapter 7

MAYPOLE DANCING, MYSTERIOUS MONSTERS, AND MISSING PERSONS

If Beon had been asked the night previous if there were many redeeming qualities about Bamborough Castle, he would have told them ‘no’ quite forcefully.

Having spent a great deal of his youth and training in this place, he could produce a thorough list of its many flaws. Beon would have a multitude of similar complaints about Lord Gall as Baron of this pile of moldy stones.

However, as Beon stood on the perimeter of the courtyard watching Gall’s daughter, Sophia, interact with the other guests, he would tell you that Bamborough Castle was the finest in the land and the only castle in which he wished to reside in all of England.

The typically dreary castle seemed much lighter with her and a crowd of smiling people in attendance to celebrate the arrival of summer. With minstrels playing, colorful banners hung, every archway and window draped with fresh flowers picked that morning while dew still clung to their petals, Beon found the scene before him vibrant and welcoming. The sights and sounds, as well as the floral fragrance, transported Beon to a world where fey reigned rather than war-crazed kings...a world where knights were not needed, and tears never filled the eyes of the innocent and weak. And yet, whenever Sophia looked in her father’s direction, that pout crept back to her lips no matter how many times Beon tried to banish it.

Dressed in a golden gown with so many forget-me-nots tucked into the plaits of her auburn hair, Sophia looked more like an Elven princess rather than the only daughter of a brooding baron. She stood beside the May Bush at the moment, pointing to the painted the shells and talking to another maiden about things Beon couldn’t hear from this distance.

Sophia truly had a way about her, Beon thought to himself. It was something that had drawn him to her when they’d been younger, but that quality held him in place now, almost as though he might have become one of the stones making up the structure of the castle. He found that he liked her even more than he’d first thought as he got to know her once again. He also felt an overwhelming desire to protect her, not only because she had saved his life and he was bound to her by duty, but because he cared for her.

As Beon thought about it for the first time, Sophia may be his only real friend. He knew all of his fellow fosters quite well, and even enjoyed their company from time to time, but Beon mainly kept to himself, studying, doing his chores, cleaning the stalls, feeding the horses, and putting in extra practice with his swordplay, archery, and close combat after everyone else had retired.

True, he hadn't seen Sophia in years, but growing up as children together gave him the sense they really knew each other. Or perhaps it was something more...something deeper. Or perhaps he was kidding himself and just wished it to be true.

As Beon's attention was drawn back to the scene before him, it became apparent that he was not the only one who noticed Sophia had blossomed into a young lady during her absence. The squires and knights paid her special attention as well. Beon decided he was unconcerned by this because he knew that he and Sophia shared a secret and a bond that transcended the superficial attentions of strangers.

The attention of her father was another matter. The man didn't seem to notice her at all unless it was to demand something of her. Beon could see Lord Gall at a distance tearing a chicken leg apart at the long table while jabbering loudly with some of his closest knights about the latest hunt. Beon felt a twinge of disapproval. She deserved more. "You have good taste, young man."

Beon was startled to find a nobleman standing next to him. He was only slightly older than Beon and extremely refined. After taking in this man's fine apparel, it was obvious he was filthy rich. His easy smile and the smooth air about him made Beon dislike him instantly.

"Pardon me, my lord?" Beon asked.

"The yon lady you so clearly hold an affection for. Who is she?" the man asked, his eyes still casually fixed on Sophia.

"And who might you be, my lord?" Beon asked, not minding that it was rude to ask a question in answer to a question. This man might outrank him, but his arrogant tone was offensive. Beon knew this was how he got himself into trouble, and might well be the root of his difficulties with Lord Gall. Even so, he couldn't resist shoving back verbally. He was also willing to admit this man's query about Sophia had provoked him as well. The man raised a single, sophisticated brow and glanced at Beon out of the side of his eye. Did Beon feel penitent for overstepping his station so boldly? He would determine that when this conversation was over. But supposing it was wise to feign a level of meekness he wasn't really feeling, a tactic which had served him well in the past, he said "Forgive me, my lord," and bowed before the mysterious nobleman, "My name is Beon Everard, page to Sir Lyndon under the foster of Lord Gall, Baron of Bamborough, at your service."

"Aren't you a bit old for a page, Beon Everard?"

"I started late, my lord...my family needed me at home."

"A noble reason, indeed. Family is everything, is it not?"

"I agree, my lord."

"Your father wouldn't be Sir Everard of the King's guard, Lord of Brentworth, would he?"

"Why yes, you know my father?" he asked, suddenly a bit more interested in this exchange.

"I fought with him at Halidon Hill. He is a man among men."

Was the compliment genuine? Beon wasn't sure and wondered what it was about this stranger he found so unsettling. While the conversation was still rather civil, Beon detected a tension he couldn't seem to put a name to. Lithe with blond hair and steel blue eyes, there was something about the man that seemed majestic and feral all at once.

The nobleman reminded Beon of his theory that positive thinking lent itself to a confidence that inspired success, despite the fact that it frequently came off as egotistical. This man had self-assurance too, but it was different somehow. It was more like a deep, serene pool...completely still and utterly certain of itself, which was even more unnerving.

"She is a rare beauty indeed. What was her name again?"

"Lady Gall," Beon answered, unwilling to tell this man her real name. "And you are?" he repeated, not missing the fact this man had never given a proper introduction of himself.

"Good luck, Beon Everard." Evading Beon's query once more, the supercilious nobleman dipped his head toward Beon and sauntered off in the direction of Lord Gall.

"I...didn't get your name, my lord," he called after him, but the nobleman did not hear him...or ignored him. Beon stood there trying to sort out the underlying intentions of that odd conversation, but he just couldn't manage it.

He watched as Lord Gall greeted the man with feigned surprise and adulation. Beon could tell the baron must truly respect this mysterious guest, because his behavior was rare indeed.

"I see you've met Henry," Sir Lyndon said, startling Beon yet again.

"Henry?"

"Yes, Sir Henry de Percy, Lord of Alnwick. Strange man...strange family, but rather likable nonetheless."

Beon recalled that Alnwick Castle was about a day's ride southeast of Bamborough and considered the gateway to Northumberland. It is essentially the county seat, and the Percys were the 'Lords of the North,' for lack of a better way to put it. Beon had certainly heard rumors of their eccentric nature, but then, when a family is as wealthy as theirs, it often came with the territory.

"I haven't seen much of you since your journey to Holy Island. Have you been avoiding me?" Sir Lyndon asked with a knowing look in his eye.

"Yes, sir, forgive me. I overslept the morning I was to retrieve Sophia, which put us behind schedule. I'm still unsure of what happened to Sir Bartley. Anyway, due to those mishaps, we arrived back shortly after dark."

"I'm pleased to hear you only experienced 'mishaps' that night. Strange about Bartley going missing," Sir Lyndon said a bit grimly. "I was concerned for you because a villager visited Lord Gall yesterday worried that her husband had not returned home the night before. He had been traveling the south road, just as you were. So it would seem that two men have gone missing in one night. I don't see how they could be related, though."

Gulping at this news, Beon felt his heart start beating wildly within his chest. How could he, in good conscience, not be forthcoming with Sir Lyndon about what he'd seen on the road considering the report he'd just heard?

With his thoughts so focused on Sophia, he'd scarcely considered the poor peasant who'd fallen victim to the demon. A woman had lost her husband. Was she now a widow with no way to feed her small children?

Additionally, he was afraid that if word got to Lord Gall about this, he would be punished in more ways than one, held back even longer in his quest to become a knight and at the very least, forbidden to escort Sophia back to Holy Island.

Deep down, he had also wanted the glory of capturing the demon himself. But a true knight was selfless, Beon reminded himself. A true knight did not hide in the shadows or keep secrets from his most respected friend and mentor. Yes, friend, Beon repeated to himself. Beon realized that as he'd been thinking of Sophia earlier, he'd somehow forgotten about Sir Lyndon. Despite the fact that Sir Lyndon was several years older than Beon and had seen many battles, there was a mutual respect that had grown between them over the years that was bordering on camaraderie. Beon knew in his heart that Sir Lyndon had his back and cared for him...much as a brother or uncle might. Beon felt the same way about him.

"I've been trying to sort out what I saw...forgive me for not coming to you sooner...I had selfishly wanted to capture the demon on my own, to prove once and for all to Lord Gall that I am worthy—"

Sir Lyndon interrupted his words by lifting one hand. His eyebrows drew together and then he said, "We'll come back to this foolishness about feeling unworthy once we've dealt with the more pressing matter. What is this talk of a demon?"

"I saw...something...a human-like creature...attack a peasant on the road—"

"The same peasant who went missing?"

Beon nodded. "I tried to stop the demon...I had withdrawn my sword, but it possessed an unnatural amount of strength, leaving me quite powerless against it. Had Sophia not frightened it off with her cross, I fear it would have killed us both."

"Thank the god's that you're both all right! What of the peasant? Could he have survived?"

"The thing carried him off into the night as though he were a slab of mutton."

"How could Sir Bartley have abandoned the two of you on such a journey? It's true that I don't particularly like him—he tends to be rather cruel—but he is a strong knight all the same."

"Could Sir Bartley have fallen prey to the creature as well?" Beon wondered aloud, but then another thought occurred to him. "Or what if—?"

"Blast it all! Are you suggesting Sir Bartley could be possessed by a devil and he was the demon you saw?"

"It might explain his disappearance."

After a long pause, in which time, Sir Lyndon seemed to ponder it, he said, "We can never know the truth of that until we see this thing again. I have actually heard of such tales in the far reaches of Europe. Stories of flesh-eating demons, but that's all I thought they were, frightening tales to make naughty children behave."

"Sophia says that blood is their life source," Beon said.

"Yes, perhaps that was it...blood-sucking demons that would pick off young villagers like sheep if they lingered overlong within the woods when they were expected at home for supper. Other rumors say that it's the great pestilence that is sweeping across Eastern Europe, claiming hundreds of lives. Again, I'd thought the worrisome stories were just too fantastical to be real."

"Having seen it with my own eyes, I fear it could become a great pestilence."

"How does Sophia know so much about this creature?" Sir Lyndon asked.

"Certain monks from her priory have been called upon to rid villages of the epidemic. The devils appear to shrink from certain materials and objects, and from what I gleaned, can be killed with the proper use of a stake."

"Hmm. Well, it is obvious that I should be the one to return Sophia safely to Holy Island, although I had planned—"

"Please, Sir Lyndon, allow me to escort her," Beon interrupted a bit too enthusiastically. If he wasn't careful, he would reveal his fondness for her. "Sir, I must be allowed to complete my mission and see her safely home."

"Calm down, my young charge, if you had allowed me to finish..."

"Of course, forgive me, Sir Lyndon," Beon responded quickly, bowing his head.

"I had planned to join the escort either way. But with something like this lurking within the woods, we can't risk you being forced to do it alone again. Not only do I wish for both of you to be safe, but she is also a young lady now, quite clearly, and her virtue must be considered. She should really have a lady's maid about at all times."

Beon's face reddened again. "Sir, I would never—"

"I know, Beon," Sir Lyndon said, patting him on the shoulder. "Your honor is not in question. It's only a matter of appearances, as you know."

Catching onto movement out of the corner of his eye, Beon's attention was once again drawn to Henry de Percy. His insides froze when he saw Lord Gall introducing him to Sophia. Henry gave Sophia a dazzling smile and kissed her hand. Even from this distance, Beon could see Sophia blush. And suddenly, he felt he was in competition with this man who clearly possessed an advantage in that he had already won over her father, a feat Beon feared would forever evade him no matter what he did.

His hands fisted at his sides when he remembered what she'd said about Lord Gall bringing her home to meet suitors. Suitors to marry her. As the true gravity of the situation sank in, Beon felt a new level of panic that had him grasping desperately at his idea about 'positive thinking.' Could he possibly lose her to Henry de Percy?

Violent thoughts of ways he could destroy Henry filled his mind as Beon continued to watch how Sophia bashfully conversed with the nobleman, her lashes fluttering, her lips smiling.

“So? How was it seeing Sophia again?” Sir Lyndon asked with a glint in his eye as he made it known that he’d caught Beon fervently observing her every move. Beon kicked himself for being so obvious.

“I would be delighted to see you perform the Maypole dance with Sir Percy,” Father said, and Sophia found herself allowing the lord to hold her gaze as she mentally sought a proper response. She had known this was the purpose of her return home, but was she truly prepared for it? Not only was she feeling conflicted about returning to the Priory, but she was also still trying to understand what she was feeling for Beon. A part of her wanted to dance with Beon and no one else, but now she found she was also intrigued by Sir Percy.

As she stood there like a fool, not knowing what to say, Percy beamed at her with those steely blues of his, took her by the hand, and led her towards the Maypole in the center of the courtyard. Impulsively, she looked for Beon, but it was too late to dance with him even she wanted to. Father had made that decision for her.

“Why does my father refer to you as ‘Sir Percy’ when I know you to a nobleman and a lord?” Sophia finally asked as they took their dance positions.

“I prefer it that way, my lady. I am a knight, first and foremost, and a man of the people. I put very little stock in titles...a man is the sum of his actions, don’t you agree?”

Sophia nodded and smiled in agreement.

When she looked up, her eyes locked on Beon standing beside Sir Lyndon. Sophia wasn’t sure how to interpret the expression she saw written on his face. Was he encouraging her as a brother might do? Or was he dismayed to see her dancing with another man? Her gaze widened when Beon suddenly started coming her way, determination in his stride.

“Here is your ribbon, Lady Sophia,” Sir Percy said, drawing her attention.

“Thank you,” she said, not knowing what was about to happen next.

Sophia dropped her eyes to the blue ribbon in her hands, unable to face Sir Percy. What was Beon about to do? Did he mean to cut in? She was too unsettled even to look. When she lifted her eyes and noticed the other couples were preparing for the dance to begin, each person taking up one of the colored ribbons, she looked around for Beon and found him standing directly across from her with another young woman. She exhaled in relief that he wasn’t about to cause a scene that would anger Father.

The music began, and as they moved through the steps, weaving the ribbons around the pole, over and under each other as they went, Sophia discovered it was easier to look at Beon rather than her dance partner because he was directly in front of her. With only ribbons obscuring her view of him, Beon held her gaze as they traveled around the Maypole. And even though Sir Percy was at her side, he was almost completely out of her line of sight, and therefore out of mind. She'd been wrong to assume that Beon was trying to avoid her. Instead, and rather brilliantly, he'd skillfully stolen her attention. Sophia didn't think Beon was as surprised by how well it had worked out for him as she was...if she was to judge the smirk on his face accurately.

Remembering it was proper to curtsy to her partner when the music eventually ended, and the plaited design was complete, Sophia turned to Sir Percy, presented a smile, and dipped into a curtsy as he bowed in turn.

If Beon's expression had confused her previously, Sir Percy's look had her utterly bewildered. One thing was certain, Sir Percy was definitely considering her for a bride. How did she feel about that? Would Father care if a union with Sir Percy wasn't something she wanted as well? If she knew her father, Sophia wouldn't likely have a say in the matter. She next wondered how Beon would respond if Father made a choice he didn't agree with.

Chapter 8

IS THERE SUCH A THING AS AWKWARD CHIVALRY?

The internal battle within Sophia continued, and while she was happy about getting back to the quiet routine of the Priory on Holy Island, she would have been just as happy about reliving May Day at Bamborough...as long as Beon was still there, that is.

For quite some time, the convent had felt like her true home—now and forever. However, forever seemed like it might be too long now.

She'd let go of her fears about Father discarding her when he'd been so eager for her to dance with Lord Percy. Obviously, he was working on making a match for her.

A beautiful spring day lay before the three travelers as they trotted along the road and an exhilarating wind blew up from the sea. Even so, having two escorts who had armed themselves to the hilt only made her more anxious to be off the road and safe on the island, where monks knew how to deal with that demon. Bamborough Castle seemed safe enough, but it appeared as though Father wasn't yet aware of this new danger. This thought made her consider the safety of her brothers as well. But with their young ages in mind, she'd reasoned that they wouldn't likely be too far from Father's side and would, therefore, be quite safe.

Sir Lyndon and Beon rattled along noisily with all the extra 'demon-repelling' accouterments they carried. The knights had brought along strings of garlic, several crucifixes, drams of holy water, axes, knives, spears, and stakes of both wood and iron. Sophia found it a tad reckless to go seeking a blood-sucking creature—why not avoid it completely?

As she watched Beon talking to Sir Lyndon, she decided to start referring to Beon as 'Knight' even though he was still just a page, because to her, he seemed more knightly than most of the men in her father's employ. Indeed, Sir Lyndon was an exception. She couldn't help but feel safe in the presence of such a giant of a man who was both fearsome and kind.

"You still haven't answered my question, Sophia—"

"That is because I am ignoring you, Sir Knight," Sophia remarked, interrupting Beon before he had the chance to tease her once more about the plethora of male attention she'd received over the course of the holiday. And when he winced at her new nickname for him, she giggled.

"I'm not yet a knight, as you well know, my lady."

Sophia shrugged her shoulders. Beon sent a frown her way. Sir Lyndon caught her glance and offered up a wink, nonverbally encouraging her, and she giggled again.

“How many marriage proposals were you given, did you say? Was it ten or twelve?” Beon went on.

“I am ignoring you,” Sophia repeated.

“As am I,” Sir Lyndon added. “I can’t abide this blathering any longer. You’re embarrassing yourself and the lady, now cease your taunting of the poor girl or I shall have to trounce you for good measure.”

When Sophia laughed louder this time, she slapped a hand over her mouth and shot a wide-eyed look Beon’s way, wondering what he might do about being accused of teasing her when it was really the other way around.

His frown deepened, and Sophia decided he was just adorable when he frowned. “Forgive me, my lady. I meant no harm,” Beon said a bit sadly as his cheeks flushed.

She quickly regretted her words, not wishing to hurt his feelings. Because, if she were honest, she rather liked the attention she had been getting from Beon ever since the feast.

“No harm done, so there is nothing to forgive,” Sophia said, hoping to rid his face of the frown to ease her own guilt.

“Speak for yourself, my lady, for my ears are throbbing. Beon, you may be gifted in many areas but in the ways of wooing a woman you have much to learn.”

“I beg your pardon, Sir—” argued Beon, appearing horrified the conversation would take such a turn with her there to witness it.

Undaunted, Sir Lyndon went on, “I suppose it falls upon me to teach you that as well.”

Sophia found herself gaping at Sir Lyndon. Truly the man had no soul...well, that might have been an exaggeration, but it seemed Sir Lyndon would not let up on the poor lad. Sophia couldn’t quite decide if she still thought it was funny or not.

“Let us begin with a bit of civilized conversation that does not include badgering or belittling the poor lady, like so,” Sir Lyndon turned back to Sophia and addressed her with a nod of his head, “How did you enjoy the feast, my lady?”

Deciding to play along, she said, “I enjoyed it quite well, thank you. I do not recall the castle being as lively in many a year.”

Sir Lyndon turned to Beon and said, “You see? And then you follow up with an affirmation, coupled with a compliment, like so,” then turning back to Sophia he said, “I couldn’t agree more, my lady, and might I say you looked most becoming in your new gown.”

Sophia blushed and said, “Why thank you, sir, that is most kind of you to say...however, it wasn’t exactly new.”

“Well, then it must’ve been your inner beauty shining forth that made the dress anew, for I’ve never seen you look so radiant.”

Who was Sir Lyndon teasing now? Her or Beon? she wondered. Sophia knew she’d blushed a deeper shade and looked down at the reins she was holding. “Thank you, kind sir.”

Sir Lyndon turned back to Beon and said, “And there you are. Perhaps that last bit was a tad poetic, but you get the idea... Ask her opinion on a subject, listen and agree, then give a genuine compliment. Now you try.”

“But it’s Sophia...she’s like a—well, like family.”

“No matter! Sophia is a lady now, and it is high time you learn how to speak to one. Now go on,” Sir Lyndon pressed.

“Yes, sir...ask her opinion on a subject...listen and agree...then give a genuine compliment,” Beon repeated before glancing up and briefly making eye contact with Sophia. She was still blushing and wasn’t sure if she was delighted by this game or beyond horrified. Did Beon view her as ‘family?’ He cleared his throat and continued, “What did you converse with Henry de Percy about, my lady?”

Finding she was a bit taken aback by this question, her eyes widened, but Sir Lyndon didn’t give her a chance to answer.

“No, no, no,” Sir Lyndon said, interrupting. “That’s far too specific to start out with, and it isn’t a subject you can agree or disagree on because you weren’t present to form an opinion.”

“I don’t mind, Sir Lyndon...I mean, I’ll answer the question,” Sophia said. Why she wanted Beon to know she couldn’t say.

“Very well, but for the sake of the exercise it doesn’t suit us at all,” Sir Lyndon said.

Sophia turned to Beon and said, “He asked me if I was enjoying the festivities and told me that I looked most becoming in my new gown.”

Sir Lyndon laughed. Beon seemed to be doing his best to ignore his mentor and buoyed himself up in his saddle. “Well, I...I couldn’t agree more with the man. You did look quite lovely.”

Feeling her cheeks go extremely warm, she ducked her head, letting her hair cover her face. Surely, her cheeks must be the same shade of red as an apple.

“Much improved! Perhaps you do have a talent for this after all!” Sir Lyndon exclaimed. “Or perhaps I’m just a wonderful tutor! Carry on, carry on!”

Emboldened, Beon continued, “What did you think of Lord Percy, my lady?”

“Now, now, again too invasive, too soon. Go gently!”

“I found him to be extremely charming...and different,” Sophia said, answering anyway.

“Yes, very different indeed...but you too are different, are you not, my lady? In the very best of ways, I mean,” said Beon, ignoring Sir Lyndon’s protests.

Sir Lyndon chuckled. “Masterful! Now follow with another question.”

“You didn’t find him to be a bit of a coxcomb, my lady?” Beon asked.

Sir Lyndon choked. “Not exactly suitable conversation for a—”

“No more so than you, Sir Knight,” Sophia said, again interrupting and giggling.

“Quite right, my lady, I can’t argue with you there. I am the biggest coxcomb of them all. And justifiably so, for I would best everyone in that room, including Sir Henry de Percy, to win your favor.”

Beon’s gaze captured hers, and they stared at each other for a time as their horses continued to meander along the path. At that moment, Sophia felt she knew what Beon thought of her and he did not think of her as ‘family.’ At all. If Sophia were to hazard a guess, she would say his thoughts were more along the lines of building a family.

Sophia hardly paid any attention to Sir Lyndon when he shook his head and addressed Beon with a tsck, “That won’t do at all. You started out well enough with the deprecating comment about yourself, but you followed with a compliment that was cocky and self-centered.”

She watched as Beon visibly steeled himself to try again. Sophia knew what was going on and it was rather thrilling. Beon was communicating his honest feelings to her, right under Sir Lyndon’s nose. It was so bold, she found herself highly intrigued.

“My lady, do you think someone like Lord Percy could ever make you as happy as, say, someone you’ve known for most of your life?” Beon asked.

“Again, too forward for—”

Sophia interrupted Sir Lyndon to respond, “I do not, Sir Knight. I don’t think he’d stand a chance.” She held Beon’s gaze once again and for a moment everything else faded away.

Beon gave a nod and a slight grin as he said, “My lady is most wise. You have an acumen beyond your age.” Beon next performed a flourish of his hand and a bow of his head. It was a very knightly gesture.

Sophia had to look away as she blushed so fiercely she must be redder than an apple.

After taking a calming breath, she turned back.

Silence held them for a beat or two and then Beon said brightly, “I thank you for the pleasure of your company, my lady, and may I offer to fetch you some wine or sundry morsel?”

Sir Lyndon applauded and laughed. “Well done, Master Everard, well done! You will make me proud yet!” He turned to Sophia, “What say you, my lady? Do you think our young master is ready to be an effective suitor?”

“I do indeed,” she agreed softly.

The sun was beginning to set as Beon and Sir Lyndon rowed across the low to Holy Island. It was thrilling to know that Sophia’s feelings did, indeed, mirror his own. With that in mind, he questioned once again whether he should be returning her to the convent. However, no other plan made sense at this point. He needed to earn his knighthood before thinking about courting a lady such as Sophia.

The exhilarating conversation had also made him completely forget about pursuing the demon, and while he knew it wasn’t wise to set his plans to capture it aside, he found he was less motivated in the task than he had been. He also knew it would be irresponsible to pretend it wasn't a real threat.

Beon could see no way around it. Sophia had to go back to the Priory. His heart sank at the idea, but it was the safest option.

As their boat neared the island, Beon looked over his shoulder and noticed a lady waiting at the dock who caught Sophia's eye and began to wave excitedly well before they reached the shore.

"Eva! Halloo!" Sophia called with a smile stretched across her face.

The orange light of the sun behind Sophia cast a glow around her hair and shoulders. Beon thought she was the most beautiful sight he'd ever seen. Sophia Gall. Since he had retrieved her some days before on this very spot, she had become his everything. His life had been transformed, and he hardly recognized himself.

"Might I ask who you are attempting to capsize our vessel for?" Sir Lyndon asked as he strained to look behind him as he rowed.

Beon glanced over his shoulder a second time to see that this lady was still waving vigorously too.

Smiling broadly, Sophia said, "That is Lady Eva. We share a cell in the convent, and she is like a long lost older sister to me."

Sir Lyndon paused in their strokes to take a proper look. When the man did a double take, his jaw dropping a bit, Beon took in the fact that Sir Lyndon seemed transfixed by the lady on the shore.

Beon cleared his throat, and the knight snapped out of his trance. They finished rowing to shore and helped Sophia disembark. As soon as she was free of the boat, Eva embraced Sophia heartily and they laughed like little girls.

"Oh, I missed you, dear sister! It felt like ages passed without you here," Eva said.

"I missed you too! Oh, it's so good to see you...it's so good to be back!"

Beon's stomach clenched at that. Beginning to feel awkward, Beon stood with Sir Lyndon as they silently watched the reunion.

Lady Eva was only slightly older than he, but taller, which was saying something. She had striking black hair that was plaited to her waist and only accentuated her unusual height. Her eyes were a piercing blue, but not as piercing as Sophia's, to his way of thinking.

"May I introduce you to Beon Everard," Sophia said, finally remembering he was still standing there. "He has been fostered under my father for many years...we have grown up together." Bashfully, Sophia averted her eyes from his when she placed a hand on his shoulder by way of introduction.

Beon took Eva's hand and bowed.

"What a pleasure to meet you," said Eva, "Yes, I do remember you from stories Sophia has told of home...you are a formidable opponent at hide and seek, as I recall!" With this, she laughed a very high-pitched honking sound that was quite amusing in and of itself.

Beon had never heard such a ridiculous laugh and restrained a giggle.

"And this is Sir Lyndon, my father's most trusted knight and man-at-arms," Sophia said, smiling toward Sir Lyndon.

He bowed abruptly and stammered, “A—a pleasure...my lady. At...at your service.”

When he arose from his bow, his face began to turn red as if he were holding his breath. Beon was feeling rather stunned at the moment. Had he really just heard Sir Lyndon stutter out his words like a silly young lad?

“The pleasure is all mine,” said Eva. “It is lovely to meet you, Sir Lydia.”

“Sir Lydia,” Sir Lyndon repeated.

“Yes, Lydia...an unusual surname, but quite—”

“Pardon me...the name is...Lydia. No, I mean to say...” Sir Lyndon continued to splutter, completely making a cake of himself, as Beon barely contained his laughter. Never in all of the years he’d known Sir Lyndon had he seen the man so utterly flustered.

“Oh, forgive me!” Eva exclaimed accompanied by that high-pitched laugh. “Sir Lyndon! Yes, that suits you much more than Sir Lydia.”

While Beon and Sophia joined her in the laughter, Sir Lyndon continued to gape at them with the same dumbstruck look on his face.

Before things became too awkward, Beon leaned over and whispered, “Ask a question, agree, and compliment, remember?”

Sir Lyndon looked at him and blinked. Beon gave him a sardonic smile.

As an uncomfortable silence fell, Sir Lyndon cleared his throat and steadied himself. “Forgive me, Lady Eva, for today’s travel seems to have me out of sorts. But isn’t it grand weather we’re having?”

“Oh yes, simply divine weather. I’ve spent the better part of the day collecting shells along the shore.”

“The perfect occupation for a day like today. You must have a stunning collection.”

“I do! Every shape and color you can imagine.”

“I would be honored to see it someday.”

“It would be my pleasure, Sir Lyndon,” Eva said as she curtsied.

The two stared at each other for a moment longer before Beon once again spoke up, “Well, we must beg your leave, ladies. Duty calls.”

“Yes, yes,” Sir Lyndon agreed, “Duty calls.” Sir Lyndon took Eva’s hand and bowed to kiss it. “Farewell, for now, Lady Eva.”

As if by reflex, Beon reached out and grabbed Sophia’s hand. He bowed and kissed it, lingering to take in her scent.

Beon expelled a measured breath as he stood and watched the ladies retreat through the Priory gate, walking across the grounds hand in hand, giggling to one another, until they finally disappeared inside one of the main structures.

Looking to his side, Beon took in the fact that Sir Lyndon had done the same. How fascinating it was for him to see Sir Lyndon behave this way. Had he just witnessed love at first sight? If he had, he was quite happy for his mentor, as he was feeling just as star struck by Sophia.

This entire trip had brought to mind the things he'd learned when he'd studied up on courtly love, and he wanted to do something romantic and knightly for her. Beon suddenly pulled out his knife and said, "I just thought of something."

Sir Lyndon looked at him quizzically. "Should I be concerned?"

"Not at all," Beon said with a smile. "I just thought of something I could leave behind for Sophia."

"Is a bit of mayhem afoot?"

"No, just a bit of wooing."

"Even better," said Sir Lyndon.

Chapter 9

A LONGING HEART

“I missed you,” Sophia said as she and Eva walked along the shore, picking up shells now and again for their collections.

“Are you sure you missed me? With the magic of May Day celebrations all around you...and lords trying to woo you? I’m not sure I would have missed me.”

Sophia laughed. “Don’t be silly. It feels like home here.”

“I remember the last May Day I got to attend,” Eva said dreamily. “The Maybush was my favorite part. Or, well, maybe the Maypole was what I fancied most. Yellow flowers everywhere...that was wonderful too...” Eva’s words trailed off when she stopped, bent down, and picked up a shell. “This one would have been perfect on the Maybush if it were painted yellow, don’t you think? Did you get to paint shells for the Maybush?”

Lifting her hands for Eva to see, Sophia asked, “What do you think?”

“Oh dear, won’t the paint come off?” Eva asked when she saw how Sophia’s fingers were stained with azurite blue.

“I’m sure it will wear off.”

Pocketing the little shell, Eva resumed walking. “Enough about May Day, tell me about any handsome knights you happened to meet.”

“Seeing Beon again might have been the highlight. It has been so long since I’d seen him.”

“He is certainly a handsome young man. Isn’t he a knight?”

“Almost,” she said, knowing he would reach his goal eventually. If she knew anything at all about him, he was too determined not to. “And he’s so much taller than when I last saw him.”

“I’m sure he is.” Eva paused a moment, considering her. “He seems smitten with you.”

“Does he?” Sophia asked, feigning ignorance. For she knew must be ‘smitten’ after what he’d said on the journey north.

“Honestly, I wasn’t paying all that much attention to Beon. Tell me more about Sir Lyndon.”

Sophia smiled. “I’ve never seen him behave that way. It was as if you put him under a spell!”

Eva laughed loudly, and a gull squawked nearby. “I’d happily put him under my spell,” breathed Eva.

Sophia giggled and impulsively checked behind them to make sure there weren’t any nuns within earshot. Eva would have to pay some kind of penance for a statement like that if they had. “My father definitely wanted me there to parade in front of potential suitors, when I wasn’t caring for Marcus, that is.”

“Marcus is the baby?”

Sophia nodded.

“I would imagine he’s taller too.”

“Indeed, tall enough to get into trouble.”

“He must be adorable by now.”

“Oh yes, adorably messy.”

“Any prospects from these ‘suitors’ your father presented you to?” asked Eva, returning the conversation to the topic of men.

Sophia shrugged her shoulders, still unsure of how she felt about the situation, but said, “There was one, yes.”

“If only I could be so lucky,” complained Eva with a sigh.

“What do you mean?” she asked, suddenly worried Eva’s family had decided to leave her at the convent.

Instead of answering her question, Eva asked, “Were there many lords to be met?”

“Lords?” she asked, knowing this excluded Beon but he was the one she really wanted to talk about.

Eva nodded.

“Well, there was one Father introduced me to...Henry de Percy, the Lord of Alnwick.”

“Oh my, I think I’ve heard of him. His family is extremely wealthy, are they not? What was he like?”

He wasn’t like Beon, she wanted to say. “Certainly handsome...and my father adores him,” was all she managed.

Sir Lyndon looked at the knife and then back at him. With a laugh, the knight asked, “Do you have a mind to stab a few monks before we start back?”

Beon laughed. “It’s nothing quite that exciting, I assure you.”

“Is it the nuns you mean attack?” Sir Lyndon asked, obviously joking.

“I won’t be but a moment or two,” Beon said, ignoring Sir Lyndon’s continued jesting as he rushed ahead, being as stealthy as possible.

“I think I need to see this,” said Sir Lyndon, sounding intrigued as he followed.

As dusk began to overtake the island and darkness loomed, Beon made his way to the courtyard, scanning the windows for any possible onlookers, and searched for just the right shrub for what he had in mind.

“What on earth are we looking for?” Sir Lyndon asked quietly.

“A bird.”

“What?”

“Here we are, this one is perfect,” Beon said, putting his hands on his hips and taking in the boxwood hedge that was rather overgrown and wild looking. “Truly, it is a shame they do not have a proper gardener to tend to the shrubbery, don’t you agree?”

Sir Lyndon blinked at him and then asked, “I’m beginning to fear you may have lost your wits, boy? This is a bush, not a bird.”

Beon just laughed and began to slice at the branches and twigs. “Have you forgotten how much I like to carve wood?” he asked Sir Lyndon.

“Oh yes, you have quite a knack for it, as I recall.”

“Well, this is the same concept, only with a bush.”

Sir Lyndon stared at him blankly for a moment before his eyes widened with understanding. “Clever lad. I’ve got to hand it to you; you might know more about charming the ladies than I’d first thought. How can I help?”

Beon pointed to a section above him to the left. “Cut me a swath from here to there. Then I’ll come along behind you and shape it.”

The men worked like that for a half an hour, all the while listening for anyone who might happen along. As the light continued to diminish, a monk strode past the walkway and they both ducked behind the shrub next to the one they’d been carving.

“I hope he doesn’t look too closely at the unnatural shape of this plant,” remarked Sir Lyndon. “Else you might actually need to stab him.”

Knowing Sir Lyndon was jesting and afraid to respond for fear of being heard, Beon just held his breath as they waited.

When they heard the monk’s footsteps fade away and all was quiet again, they immediately got back to work.

Once he thought it was complete, Beon stood back and surveyed his work.

“It’s incredible,” Sir Lyndon said. “What are you going to do with the mess, though?”

Beon’s eyes dropped to the bits of greenery littering the ground around the shrub. Upon searching the garden, he noticed a pile of baskets beside a small shed. He grabbed up the biggest one, strode back to the bird sculpture, and began stuffing the branches and leaves inside.

“I suppose that will do,” said Sir Lyndon.

Hearing the disappointment in the man’s tone, Beon asked, “Do you have a better idea?”

“A bonfire, perhaps?”

Beon’s head lifted, thinking for a moment Sir Lyndon was serious but then laughed when he took in the amusement on the man’s face.

“I had you for a minute there, didn’t I?”

Choosing not to respond, Beon chuckled and shook his head. Sir Lyndon had such a dry sense of humor, which Beon found difficult at times to determine if he was being serious.

While looking up at the boxwood, Sir Lyndon tipped his head to the side. “I’ve never seen anything like it. I mean I’ve seen shorn hedges and round shaped bushes, but nothing like this. Where in the world did you come up with it?”

With a shrug of his shoulders, Beon said, “I don’t know, honestly.”

“I’d wager a pretty young lady with auburn hair inspired you.”

Beon couldn’t deny it.

“Well, next time we’re carving a sea shell for Lady Eva.”

“Next time?”

Instead of answering, Sir Lyndon clasped onto his shoulders and began guiding him out of the garden. “Whilst this has been fun, we’d best be going before another monk comes along.”

“Is that all you’re worried about?”

“Truth be told, I’d like to see if we can capture ourselves an evil blood-sucker and be back at the castle by dawn.”

Chapter 10

SHADOWED DEVIL

Once back on the south road, Beon and Sir Lyndon drove the horses hard, only slowing down a time or two for spots that were particularly dark or rocky. Otherwise, they trusted their steeds completely. After several hours, the moon was high above their heads. They had covered an impressive distance quickly and were almost to the spot where Beon had seen the peasant taken by the demon.

The sounds of crickets and other nocturnal creatures filled the night as they slowed to a trot. The forest had grown thick in this area, and light from the moon became patchy, making it even harder to see.

“There’s really no logical reason why the creature would return to the same spot in which he killed before,” Sir Lyndon said thoughtfully.

“No, but it’s all we have to go on. And it is logical that it would rely upon the road to provide a steady diet of passersby.”

“True.”

Just then a twig cracked to their right. Both men pulled on their reins, stopping the horses, and listened intently. They had strung the garlic around their necks, and each wielded a silver crucifix in one hand and sword in the other. Each had a pouch of holy water tucked into their belts as well as three spikes.

Beon felt extremely prepared, but there was still a great deal of uncertainty involved with this plan, which he didn’t like because uncertainty was something he could not control. Experience had taught him that when a scenario was difficult to control, then it was far more dangerous than a situation one could strategize for properly.

Suddenly, an eerie hush fell over the wood as the crickets stopped chirping, and an unnatural stillness put Beon on edge. The fear he had felt on the night Sophia saved him came rushing back to his throat. It was as if the air had been sucked out of the woods as well as his lungs. Then, after a moment, there was a whooshing sound and the forest breathed again. Crickets began to chirp, and owls began to hoot. Beon took a breath too, loosening his grip on the crucifix.

“Did you feel that?” Beon asked, afraid to make any noise for fear of the devil returning undetected if he did.

“Yes. It’s hard to explain it with words, though.”

They waited, and when the usual nightlife continued to make a ruckus, Beon said, “I don’t think it’s coming back.”

They nudged their horses into a slow trot again, but Beon couldn’t stop from keeping his ears pricked for any little shift of movement within the shadows. When several minutes had passed, Sir Lyndon broke the silence with a question that made Beon jump reflexively. “Aren’t you going to thank me for nudging you and Sophia along?”

“You...wait. What?”

“I don’t think things would have moved along quite so smoothly if I hadn’t given you a little shove in the right direction.”

“You mean...you did all that on purpose?”

“Of course,” Sir Lyndon said, giving Beon an approving smile. “I think you two will make a fine match someday.”

Beon’s face heated and he smiled.

“And, I don’t think our blood-sucker is going to show. We may have prepared too well and frightened the poor thing off,” Sir Lyndon went on.

““Poor thing?”” Beon found he was still too spooked to laugh. “Are you serious?”

“Irony, my boy, ‘tis an art.”

Beon honestly had no response for that, wondering how the knight could joke at a time like this, so he changed the subject. “Do you think it was here? When the forest was quiet, I mean.”

“Indeed...it was here. I could feel its eyes on us.”

A chill sliced up Beon’s spine at the image those words conjured within his mind.

Sir Lyndon sat in silence a moment longer as though considering this, before saying, “Come, we have about an hour until daybreak. We’ll be at the castle in no time if we nudge these horses into a gallop.”

Appearing as though it were a mountain rising from the sea, Bamborough Castle slowly became more visible as they drew closer. Once the front gates came into view, they discovered it abuzz with activity, which was rather unusual for the hour. Men were rushing into the gates from all directions, torches ablaze, trumpets sounding. It was obvious Gall was preparing for battle yet again.

As Beon and Sir Lyndon made their way into the courtyard, Lord Gall could be seen on the riser, alongside Henry de Percy, standing over dozens and dozens of men, all armed to the teeth and ready to fight.

“What you’ve heard is true,” Lord Gall was saying, “Sir Percy has confirmed that Hexham has fallen this night at the hands of the Scottish Army and their king, David. We call on all those able to fight to take up arms against this blackguard and his pathetic band of miscreants. It is up to us to squash this rabble once and for all!”

The men raised their weapons and cheered. Beon felt a buzz of excitement at Lord Gall’s words

‘all those able to fight.’ For this included him. Was he about to embark upon his first battle at last? Deep down, he’d wished for a distraction to take his mind off of Sophia, and this would certainly accomplish that task.

Hexham was a day or two due west of Bamborough. Beon wondered which direction the Scots were headed as he followed Sir Lyndon closer to the wooden riser.

Sir Percy stepped forward, and a hush came over the men as he and Sir Lyndon dismounted. “I am rallying all the Lords in the nearby country, that are not away in France with our King, to advance what troops they can muster to Neville’s Cross where we will head off the Scots advancement,” Percy said. “It is up to us, men, to protect what is ours. It is up to us to protect our country. If these Scotsmen think they can take this land simply because our King is abroad then they are sorely mistaken...if they think we are weak because our country’s fighting men are away doing battle in France then they are deadly mistaken...and they will pay with their lives!”

Again, the men erupted in cheers. As the din died down, Beon leaned over to Sir Lyndon and whispered, “Why does Lord Gall refer to him as ‘Sir Percy?’”

“Percy insists upon it. For he is also a highly accomplished knight.”

“Sir Percy has asked for the help of Bamborough, and we will answer the call!” Lord Gall shouted over the men. “Prepare for battle! We ride at dawn!”

With one last ‘hoorah’ the crowd dispersed in a bustle of activity as all began to make their preparations...all but Beon. He stood frozen for a moment before rushing to catch up with Sir Lyndon.

“Sir Lyndon, does Lord Gall mean me as well?”

The knight turned to Beon and smiled.

“Yes, Master Everard. Your first battle is now imminent.”

Sophia awakened to the sound of waves. Warm sunlight spilled in through the windowpane, heating her legs where it fell across the foot of her bed.

Stretching, she covered a yawn with her hand and then rolled to her side to get up. A part of her was eager to check in on all the birds and other animals in her care, but another part of her wanted to leave all of this behind and return to Bamborough, even if Father meant to use her as a nursemaid to little Marcus. But if she returned sooner rather than later, she might have to face a decision between Beon and Sir Percy. If Father even allowed her to have a choice, she reminded herself.

After a good night’s sleep, Sophia hoped she would settle into the same comfortable routine she’d had before Beon appeared to escort her home, but that didn’t seem to be happening. She still felt so very conflicted about what she wanted and where she wanted to be.

Reaching over, she picked up the wooden bird off her side table and stroked it. “Good morning, mama,” she said, before tucking it into her pocket so that she would have it with her all day...just as she did every day.

Sophia rose and went to the bowl at her window, leaned over and splashed cool water on her face. After gathering up the linen to dry off, she peered out the window, blinked at what she saw in the courtyard, and then gasped. Rubbing the sleep from her eyes, because she couldn't believe what she was seeing, she looked again.

Could it be? she asked herself. Reaching into her pocket, she retrieved the little bird Beon had given her and then turned back to the shrubs running along the garden path, a smile spreading across her face. One of the large hedges had indeed been carved into the shape of a giant bird...just like the one Beon had given her all those years ago. She lifted the wooden one up to compare, marveling at how accurately he'd managed to recreate it.

She just stood there, staring at it for a time, marveling at what a sweet thing Beon had done for her. It was such a beautiful sculpture. A lump of emotion developed in her throat because his thoughtfulness made her feel extremely homesick for him...and less conflicted about what she wanted.

Victorious shouts of 'the king has been captured' and 'Scotland is defeated' could be heard throughout the dark encampment as Beon returned with the other knights, squires, and pages.

Lord Gall burst out of his tent at the noise. The baron gawked like a fish when he saw the detachment of men comprised of several different houses in the region along with David the Second, King of Scotland, as their prisoner. When his eyes landed on Beon, he frowned as fiercely as ever. The proud smile Beon had been wearing immediately vanished.

As usual, Lord Gall seemed displeased by the very sight of Beon, but he prayed that would change once the Baron learned he'd helped capture the king. Beon was startled when Sir Lyndon came up behind him and said, "Are you going to help me out of my armor or not, Master Everard?"

"Of course, my lord!" he said, jumping into action.

Beon worked the laces loose that kept the backplate in place for Sir Lyndon.

"I'm immensely proud of you, Master Everard." Sir Lyndon chuckled and shook his head. "To think, all this time King David was hiding under a bridge. How did you spot him?"

"Sir Coupland dropped his shield while we crossed, I went to fetch it for him, and I noticed the king's reflection in the water." To Beon, this didn't seem like a noble victory. It wasn't as though he'd gone into battle and defeated the king singlehandedly with the skillful use of his sword. Beon had been excited to finally join his first real battle, but he found he kept wishing he was on his own warhorse with his own squire to aid him. How would he ever convince Lord Gall he was up to the task?

It's true Beon had been able to show his skill with a sword during the attack, but while Sir Lyndon acknowledged his efforts, Lord Gall hadn't been anywhere in sight. Apparently, the man had been here at camp, in his tent, doing who knows what while the rest of them fought bravely on the field.

“You’re too hard on yourself,” Sir Lyndon said once he was free of the many plates of armor. The knight patted his shoulder and then left. “Rest well, Beon.”

Taking inventory of the damaged pieces of Sir Lyndon’s armor, Beon gathered them up and took them to the blacksmith for repair. As he passed by Lord Gall’s tent, hushed but angry voices drew his attention. Beon meant to continue on his way, knowing it was improper to listen in on conversations that were none of his business, but he couldn’t resist.

“It was your squire that spotted him. I thought you’d be happy it was one of your fosters that found him.”

“My squire?”

“I don’t recall his name.” The unidentified man snapped his fingers. “Everard’s boy. He is one of yours, is he not?”

Brilliant, thought Beon, this wasn’t going to help his advancement at all.

“Him? That pompous imbecile...and his name is ridiculously odd, like Beowulf or some nonsense I can never remember. He is the most entitled peasant I have ever met! I tolerate him to appease Sir Lyndon and keep the peace with Sir Everard...for the time being. And he’s a page, not a squire, we must be clear on that point,” Lord Gall said through gritted teeth.

Beon winced at that.

“He seemed older to me.”

“He is older, he’s just stupid.”

Beon rolled his eyes and turned to leave. This man was impossible to please!

That night, a messenger arrived with a missive from Bamborough addressed to Sophia. After having read the letter through twice, it slipped from Sophia’s fingertips, fluttering to the ground. She dragged in a shuddering breath. Slipping one hand into her pocket, she ran her fingertips over the little wooden magpie for comfort. Father had not been away at war, but he was now. The missive had been promptly sent to inform her that he meant for her to remain in ‘safe-keeping’ at the convent for the time being.

Knowing war could last for years, her heart sank even further because, as a page to Sir Lyndon, Beon could very well be at war too. How long would it be before she saw him again? Would he be safe? Would he still want her if she was an old maid by the time he returned? Perhaps she was foolish to think he ever had wanted her.

Sophia laughed without humor at her thoughts as she peered up at the bird Beon had carved into the shrub. It wasn’t just the way he had left that held her thoughts captive, but what he’d left behind.

Moonlight limned the edge of the plant in silver when the clouds shifted out of the way, letting the light spill into the garden.

Even the scents filling her nose made her think of Beon Everard. Sophia hadn't noticed the connection until making a habit of coming out to the garden to look at his sculpture so often. He smelled fresh and earthy, as though he typically spent a lot of time outdoors, which was reasonable to assume considering his duties. It was all so frustrating, Sophia wanted nothing more than to slap him and kiss him all at once.

Somehow, by the way he had looked at her during the May Day celebration, and the way he had spoken to her, and held her upon the horse, and then left these art works behind, he'd spoiled the peace she used to feel while here at the convent. "It's not fair," she said to no one else but herself as the crickets chirped on.

When the crickets suddenly ceased their singing, Sophia tugged her cloak more tightly around herself. A silent hush fell over the garden that seemed to make the shadows grow darker. As the clouds shifted, snuffing out even more light, a chill crawled over every inch of her skin.

"What's not fair, Sophia?" asked a man, the voice of whom she didn't recognize.

Turning to the sound of the voice, she asked, "Who's there?"

"What's not fair?" he repeated.

The fact that he did not answer her question had her pulling the cloak even tighter and taking a step backward. "War," she decided to say as she continued to search the darkness for this person. He must be one of the monks, she reasoned, because he knew her name. She was out after her curfew, so perhaps he was about to chasten her.

"No, war is not fair," he agreed gently.

Sophia caught movement to her left, and she watched as this man stepped out from between the line of hedges along the path.

"Forgive me," she said, performing a quick curtsy. "I know I shouldn't be out this late...I just, well, I just needed some fresh air."

"If you were out here all night long, simply gazing up at the stars, I wouldn't mind at all." He was moving closer, and she could see that the hood of his cloak had been drawn up over his head, concealing his face even more than the shadows already were.

"I think I'm tired now, anyway," she said abruptly, deciding to rush past him to get inside. Why would he not care? Was he not one of the monks?

With fear sending its tentacles around her senses, she all but ran past him. When she did, Sophia smelled something more enticing than any fragrance that had ever filled her lungs, and she almost stopped. But when that little voice in her head that guided her soul told her she shouldn't, she kept going.

From that point on, she only visited the bird sculpture during the day, and she never did discover which monk it had been who'd spoken to her that night. This unsettling fact was yet another thing poking at her patience.

Chapter 11

BOUND WINGS

“This isn’t goodbye, Sophia. I shall return. I promise.”

Beon stopped as they walked along the shore of Holy Island. When Sophia hadn’t noticed he’d stopped and kept going, he chuckled, captured her by the hand, and drew her around to face him. She stumbled, trying to keep her balance at his sudden move, and stepped forward, bumping against his chest, her fingers clutching his shirt.

“Forgive me,” she said, trying to pull away.

Beon wouldn’t have it and wrapped his arms around her. Smiling down at her, he brushed a few strands of hair out of her face and tucked them behind her ear.

Since the last time he saw her, his fortune had completely turned. Despite Lord Gall’s predictable behavior toward him, Beon had been commended by his comrades and summoned, along with many of the other men who’d fought at Neville’s Cross, to join King Edward in France. He and Sir Lyndon would be sailing in two days. While he was eager to put more of his skills to the test and fight beside his father in France, he couldn’t have left without validating this connection he was feeling with Sophia. It was as though she pulled at some part of him no matter how far away he was.

“I don’t want you making promises you can’t keep, Beon Everard. You’ve wanted this your whole life, to go and fight alongside your father. I know he will be so very proud.”

Beon took her hands in his, hearing the slight tremor in her voice. Sweet of her to be so brave for him, but he could tell she was worried for his safety.

“Whilst I still wish to become a knight, none of those things are as important to me as they were before. And whilst pleasing my father remains a goal, becoming a knight so I can claim your hand has become more important.”

Sophia blushed and smiled, her chin dropping as though she meant to hide her reaction from him. Pulling her hands away, she turned and continued walking down the shore as if she were embarrassed, her fingers clutching at her skirts to keep the hemline from dragging on the sand.

Beon peered behind them and saw Sir Lyndon and Eva following at a distance. He knew they were along as ‘chaperones,’ but they appeared to be lost in their own intimate conversation. Eva’s high-pitched laugh could be heard periodically over the waves. Watching them, Beon couldn’t help but think what a lovely match they made. And the fact that they seemed more consumed with their budding relationship than watching over him and Sophia suited him just fine.

“There’s no need to be shy, my lady. We can speak freely,” Beon continued as he caught up with her. The sun was setting to their right, and the ocean stretched out forever on their left. The last rays caught her auburn tresses and made them glow like embers.

“Is my father going?” she asked.

“No, Sir Percy has asked him to stay behind as Guardian of the North.”

“Since when does anyone tell my father what to do?”

“I’m not sure if your father wanted to go to war.”

“Why do you say that?”

“For someone who speaks tirelessly of the glories of battle, I don’t think Lord Gall lifted a finger to fight.”

Sophia looked at him with surprise, and he weighed the consequences of sharing more with her. “I regret to have to say this, but now that I’ve seen the mettle of the man in action, he has lost my esteem...”

He thought she was going to say something, but apparently deciding against it, she bit her lip and looked out over the water. Finally, she said, “I’m not sure I know what he means to do with me.”

“What do you mean?” he asked, fearing the answer.

“For a while, I feared he wanted to leave me here and forget about me, but as of late...oh, I don’t know.”

“Please explain more.”

“Well, as of late, he’s been sending letters explaining the suitors he’s considering.”

“Has he given you names of these men?” Beon forced himself to ask, his stomach clenching.

“No,” she said quietly.

“What do you want, Sophia?”

At the question, she turned to face him. “What I want doesn’t matter.”

“I don’t think that’s true at all.”

“In my experience, it is hubris to believe there is a single, solitary truth in this world. For all people have their own version of it.”

She walked on in silence as Beon contemplated her statement. Beon believed without any hesitation or doubt that there were absolute truths in life. He was surprised at her point of view. “Is that what they teach you here? That people have such bleak impressions of truth?”

Sophia shrugged her shoulders and shot him a look.

Beon tried to put the pieces of a puzzle together from what he read upon her face. She seemed pensive and glum as if she were giving up on her dreams, as though she were a bird in a cage. What could he say to give her hope? Would he be leading her into more heartache if he did? He couldn’t say for certain what was going to happen next. One thing was for sure, however, he would not let Lord Gall crush the beauty within her with his cold and traitorous heart.

He dropped to one knee before her, and her eyes widened when he took her hand into his “I vowed once to serve you. I vow again to give you everything you want in this life.”

Tears filled her eyes at his words, and he rose up to face her. “Again, you’re making promises you might not be able to keep.”

“Silly little bird, why do you doubt me?”

“It’s not you I doubt...”

“Then what is it?” he asked, brushing the moisture from her cheeks with the backs of his fingers.

“Speak to me, please.”

“I’m not sure if I know where home is.”

“I know where home is.”

Her blue eyes lifted to his. “You do?”

She laughed, finally. “That’s not arrogant at all.”

Beon smirked at the sarcasm. “Do you remember when I used to chase you along the knags and dunes below the castle?” he asked.

“Of course I remember,” she answered, bashful again.

The memory of those times as children immediately brought a smile to his face. “Those are happy memories of home for me,” he said.

“For me as well.” Her cheeks had become a rosy shade of pink, and Beon knew he was making progress.

“I’ll wager I can still catch you.”

“Another arrogant statement.”

“Are you going to prove me wrong?” he asked, giving her a challenging smile.

Sophia just stared at him for a moment before giggling and taking off running.

Beon smiled too and took off after her. He knew he was probably still faster, simply because he was taller, but Sophia had the advantage of being barefoot. Beon could tell right away she had gained quite a lot of speed since the last time they played cat and mouse as children. The boots Beon was wearing hindered him considerably. When he was unable to gain on her, he thought about kicking them off but knew he would lose too much time doing that. He eventually caught up with her as she began to tire. Catching her about the waist, he lifted her feet from the ground and twirled her in the air before planting her back down onto the sand.

“I guess this means I failed to prove you wrong, doesn’t it?”

“You certainly made it difficult for me...you’re very fast!”

Sophia looked up and noticed a few gulls hovering over them. One of them squawked as though speaking to her. Childhood memories of seeing her surrounded by several feathered companions filled his mind.

“Oh, don’t worry Oliver, Beon is a friend. You remember Beon, don’t you?”

“Don’t tell me Oliver is still following you around in search of crumbs!”

“He is indeed,” Sophia said, smiling.

Beon looked up at the group of birds flitting above them. Another memory filled his mind, an image of Sophia riding a horse with her eyes closed and her arms outstretched. At the time, he’d thought she was mad and reckless, but he understood now that she simply wanted to be free like the birds she adored. He could only imagine how oppressive life with Lord Gall as a father must be. Beon didn’t have a horse nearby, but he wanted to give her that rush of freedom once again.

“I have an idea...do you trust me?” He asked her, as both of them continued to breathe heavily.

“I trust you, Sir Knight. You know I do,” Sophia said, imitating his intensity.

The sky was nearly dark now. Beon looked back at Sir Lyndon and Eva, almost obscured by the distance and the dim light. It looked as if their heads were touching as they walked.

“Close your eyes and take my hand,” Beon said, reaching out to her.

“It seems dark enough,” Sophia said, looking up at the moon. “Must I close my eyes?”

“I want to try something, please...it just entails a little trust, and a little more running.”

“Oh, all right then,” Sophia said, closing her eyes and taking his hand.

“Just keep your eyes closed and let me lead you. I promise I will keep you safe from harm and will not lead you astray.”

“What are you up to, Beon Everard?” Sophia asked, shaking her head.

Beon led her along the tide line where the sand was firm under their feet. He started walking at a brisker pace, his hand firmly gripping hers at arm’s length. After a moment or two, he picked up the pace to a gentle run.

“This is the strangest sensation I’ve ever had. It’s as though I’m blind but still able to move without a care...”

Beon began to run fast. Sophia started to giggle but kept her eyes closed tightly. Beon ran faster still.

Now the wind was in their hair, and the gulls called to her as they swooped. She laughed a throaty sound and held out her other arm...now both outstretched like wings, Beon still holding on to one by his fingertips. She was running full tilt now, with tears of joy streaming across her cheeks. Laughing as she used to as a child...giggles that were unrestrained and free. It was the most beautiful sight Beon had ever seen.

They slowed down and came to a stop. She grabbed his other hand as she swung toward him, opening her eyes dreamily. The moon shone back at him within those blue irises.

“That was amazing! It felt like I was flying! I felt so free!” she said as she wrapped her arms around his neck.

Beon squeezed her close. “You might be too much of a free spirit to live in a convent.”

She squeezed back. “I do feel my wings are bound at times.”

Closing his eyes, Beon savored having her in his arms and the sense of belonging it gave him. He wondered if she felt it too. “Do you get that sense here at the Priory or at Bamborough?”

“Both.”

“What about right now?”

She released him and looked into his eyes again, still smiling and crying at the same time. He reached up and wiped his thumb across her cheek.

“I feel at home with you,” she said.

Beon smiled at her words because it was exactly what he wanted to hear. He had often felt the urge to kiss her, but at this moment, the desire consumed him. The feeling drew his gaze to her mouth. When Beon raised his eyes back to hers, she gave him an expectant look. He thought she might be giving him permission to kiss her, but he wasn’t sure. Beon certainly didn’t want to be presumptuous or arrogant, proving her right.

He swallowed hard, his throat going dry. “Sophia?”

“Hmm?” she asked, leaning toward him, her eyes half closed as she peered at him through a fringe of lashes.

“May I kiss you?”

Her eyes widened. “You hadn’t already decided to?”

“Well, I had, but I wasn’t sure if you would be all right with it.”

“What gave you that impression?”

“I was right,” he laughed, “you’re too much of a free spirit to live in this place.”

“Do you think the nuns would be ashamed of me?”

“No, of course not,” he said promptly, fearing he’d made her question herself.

This conversation seemed to be going in the wrong direction, and Beon decided it might be best if he stopped speaking.

Dipping his head, he kissed her lips gently. A bolt of energy coursed through his body as the waves crashed behind them. When he pulled away, she pouted, prompting him to ask, “Not enough?”

“No,” she said.

Going in for another round of kissing, he stopped holding back what he was feeling inside. His mouth moving over hers as that energy gave way to heat. She clutched at his clothes and then his hair, and a reckless part of him wished he wasn’t wearing any clothing at all. He decided then that he would never let her go and he would never let anyone else steal her heart from him...and he would never let her be kept as a prisoner at this convent or at Bamborough Castle or anywhere.

The idea that he loved her crossed his mind—had loved her for years, really—but he didn’t dare share those words with her yet, especially as he was about to leave her once again. But he vowed to return and free her once and for all.

Sophia had hoped with all her might that Beon would kiss her and now that it was happening the whole world stood still. Her heart was beating as fast as a sparrow's...especially after the exhilarating 'blind run' Beon had led her through. She truly felt as though she were flying! It reminded her of the feeling she would get in the chapel when the sound surrounded her.

Beon Everard, the one who made her feel like she was where she belonged, the one who made her feel wanted, and the one she'd loved for as long as she could remember. Yes, she thought, she had loved him her whole life, perhaps longer. Having grown up with him, it seemed as though they had always been together. Even from the beginning, even when he'd been young and obnoxiously arrogant...as if it had already been written in the book of time.

His lips were soft and his scent commingled with the salty air. Sophia would cherish this moment forever, no matter what happened. She had learned not to expect very much out of life. The apathy of her father, the untimely death of her mother, the isolation of the convent, and now her one true love sailing off across the sea to fight a war on foreign soil. She would hold tight to this perfect memory and let it sustain her, whatever the outcome. Sophia braced herself for the very real possibility that she would never see Beon again.

When he finally pulled away and looked down at her, the tears were still flowing, but she was smiling.

"Will you write to me?" Sophia asked.

"As often as I can."

"I know better than to ask how long you'll be gone...it is beyond your control."

Beon nodded and then drew her close, his hand coming up to press her cheek to his chest. It was the kind of embrace that frightened her because it felt final somehow. Fear of the unknown had her stomach in knots.

"Come," he said, "There's time for one more thing before we ride south."

Beon released her and took her by the hand to begin walking back toward Sir Lyndon and Eva. She smiled when she noticed they too were walking hand in hand.

As they got closer, Beon called out, "Ho there! Are you up for another sculpture before we depart? Something to leave behind as a remembrance?"

"Sounds like a splendid idea," answered Sir Lyndon.

Sophia found herself wondering if she would survive losing Beon, especially with yet another sculpture to remind her. Forcing such horrible thoughts from her mind, she clutched onto his hand more tightly, biting her lip to keep from bursting into tears at the idea. But then again, the wooden bird and the first sculpture had been a source of great comfort for her while he'd been away. Oh, why was she so conflicted?

"You're going to make another?" Eva exclaimed and then laughed in her hysterical way. "It's been the talk of the island. We've even had some mainlanders cross the low simply to get a look!"

"And it nearly gave the Abbot a conniption," Sophia added. What would the Abbot do if there was another?

“In that case, we’d best be extra stealthy. We don’t want to get our girls into trouble, now do we?” Sir Lyndon said.

“And why should we pay for your sins? We will deny we even know you,” Eva said, continuing to laugh.

“Perhaps we should choose a hedge on the perimeter, so as not to attract too much attention,” Beon offered.

“Ah, my young friend, we must let the shrubbery choose us, not the other way round! Artistic genius cannot be mollified!”

In spite of herself, Sophia laughed along with the others as they made their way back to the garden courtyard of the Priory grounds and the men began searching for ‘the perfect hedge.’

Sophia would admit that she found the antics between the men quite amusing. After some conspiratorial whispering between them, Sir Lyndon said, “‘Tis a fine-looking hedge, do you not agree?”

“Can you tell any difference from this one and the myriad of other wild looking hedges we’ve passed?” Sophia asked Eva.

“Um, well...if I am to be honest, the answer is no,” answered Eva, giggling.

“What are you going to sculpt this time?” Sophia asked, eager to see the creation even if she was a bit apprehensive about having it there on the grounds, haunting her.

“Let it be a surprise, my lady, for now, I think it best to bid you goodnight before you catch a chill.”

“Or worse, the Head Sister catches you out at night with two rogues,” Sir Lyndon teased. “He’s quite right, my lady, it’s best if we say our goodbyes, however difficult.”

With their final farewell upon her so suddenly, Sophia found herself rushing to embrace Beon where he stood.

“I look forward to seeing you again, my lady,” Beon said as he embraced her.

“And I you. Until then...know that you carry my heart across the sea along with you.”

Beon sketched an elegant bow and then kissed her hand. She felt Eva put an arm around her, drawing her away from a man she never wanted to let go.

As they walked slowly toward their quarters, looking back occasionally, Sophia noticed the men hadn’t wasted any time in executing their plan. Silhouetted by the moon-kissed ocean, the sound of waves rolling in the distance, they sliced away at the branches.

Chapter 12

CRUSHED HOPE

“Please, I need to see him! There may still be time!” Beon pleaded desperately.

The guards standing post outside the quarantined compound of tents housing all the afflicted soldiers refused to let him see Sir Lyndon. Drawing his blade and forcing his way in crossed Beon’s mind, but he knew these guards were simply doing their duty.

How had Sir Lyndon, the indefatigable knight who had been like a cherished uncle to Beon fallen ill? Like a nightmare, it was hard to believe it was real. Sir Lyndon was such a fierce giant, inside and out, but like so many, something small had felled him as swiftly as a fire could devour a village. Beon must be allowed to say goodbye; his guts twisted into a tangle that made him feel quite nauseous.

The war amongst countries and kings had become so overshadowed by the devastating losses from the pestilence that neither side, the French or the English, could continue the fight. The king gave orders that all were to return to England, the war was to be put on hold until this plague ran its course, or ‘wiped the French off the face of the earth for us.’

All in all, it had been a year of horror...and not only due to the massive loss of life. Ever since Beon and Sir Lyndon had surprised Sophia and Eva with a visit last summer, Beon had been stricken with homesickness for Sophia in a terrible way. The years previous had been rather glorious for Beon. He had truly become a seasoned warrior and trusted strategist for the King and his lieutenants. But the greatest glory of all had been fighting alongside his father. They had never been closer, and he could tell his father was very proud of his performance. Beon had become a man. It was completely forgotten, or at least overlooked, that he was still technically a page for he had paid his dues time and again on the battlefield. Almost all of his dreams had come true, until his luck made a dramatic turn for the worse.

Last fall, not long after he and Sir Lyndon had returned to France, his father caught the deadly pestilence that had claimed the lives of so many. Beon had watched his once mighty father wither and develop dark sores all over his body as his flesh died from the inside out. It was the most horrible thing Beon ever witnessed, and he had seen plenty of horror at war.

By the time his father passed, Beon knew he was beginning to lose his taste for fighting. For now, he just wanted to go home...home to Sophia. As more and more men died from the sweeping plague, it became clear that the fighting could not continue. Beon and Sir Lyndon had rejoiced at the prospect of reuniting with Sophia and Eva for good.

But now, one of his truest friends in this world, Sir Lyndon, had succumbed as well. They were no longer allowing healthy soldiers to commingle with infected ones. Visiting was strictly forbidden for fear of further spreading. Beon did not care. He had to at least say goodbye to his mentor and comrade, and he tried to wrestle past the guards.

“I must be allowed to see Sir Lyndon!”

The three guards shoved him back. One spoke up and said, “If you go in, you don’t come out! The decision is yours, but think hard, laddie.”

Beon had thought hard. He’d thought of Sophia. He’d thought of his mother. Knowing he couldn’t risk becoming trapped with the sick for the sake of the women in his life, Beon backed down as he hatched a plan to see Sir Lyndon without hindering his freedom.

Shoving free of the guards and straightening his tunic, he stepped back, turned, and walked across the divide that separated the living from the dying and sank onto a makeshift bench at the fire between the two.

As varying scenarios flitted through his mind, he kept a close eye on the tent where Sir Lyndon lay.

After a couple of hours, when almost the entire encampment had gone to bed, Beon stood at alert for the changing of the guard. Once the replacements arrived, he would find the right moment to sneak around the perimeter and slip inside.

Much to Beon’s surprise, however, along with the new guards came Sir Percy as well. What was he doing here at this time of night? Sir Percy was never seen outside his tent in the evenings. It was the topic of much discussion amongst the fighting men. Some joked that he needed his beauty rest. Others thought he had some sort of night sickness or a weak constitution. The only time Sir Percy was ever seen after sunset was if a surprise attack from the French roused the encampment. Then and only then would he appear, and only in full armor, including a helmet with full visor, fighting with the ferocity of ten men, per usual.

Beon was in awe of the man and distrusted him all the same. As the years wore on, Sir Percy’s abilities became more unsettling. How was it possible for a man to do what Sir Percy does? Beon would ponder, knowing that he personally gave his all on the field and his abilities were quite superior to most. Somehow, Sir Percy, despite his lack of height and bulk, managed to accomplish physical tasks that would even challenge Sir Lyndon. Mystery surrounded the man. He seemed to float above them all without a care in the world, without fear of death. Something troubled Beon about the man but he had yet to put his finger on what it was exactly.

Sir Percy was wearing a black cloak and stared at his feet as he walked. When he approached the guards at the entrance, they parted for him without a word. Sir Percy disappeared inside the main tent. Instead of executing his plan, Beon waited. Had Sir Percy not been there, Beon wouldn’t have hesitated, but something in his gut told him he'd be found out with that particular knight around.

Only embers remained of the fire when something startled Beon awake. Not knowing exactly how much time had passed, he watched as Sir Percy reemerged. This time, he had a companion, a large man, also cloaked in black, head completely concealed by a hood. Again, they both walked with heads down as if staring at their feet. As Sir Percy passed the guards with their torches, he stopped and raised his eyes slowly to meet with Beon's from all the way across the yard. Beon was so startled it caused his breath to catch. A bewildering sense of déjà vu made him think he'd seen that look before, those eyes, but he couldn't pinpoint where and when.

Sir Percy dropped his head and started walking straight toward Beon. He and his companion came to a stop to Beon's left, their faces still completely hidden.

"I'm afraid Sir Lyndon is no more. I'm sorry for your loss," Sir Percy said, his tone lacking emotion.

"What? How...so quickly? He only just became sick—"

"He decided he wanted his suffering to end," Sir Percy interjected.

Stunned and devastated by this horrible news, Beon struggled to find enough air for his lungs. "He gave up the fight? I can't believe that...I beg you, what do you mean by your comment?"

"You've seen firsthand what the infection can do to a mighty warrior, have you not?"

This question struck Beon in the gut, and for a brief moment, he hated Sir Percy for bringing up the painful memory of his father's suffering. The large man accompanying Sir Percy made to come toward Beon, but the Knight put out a hand and stopped him.

Sir Percy glided off into the night as he called over his shoulder, "I shall see you back in London, Master Everard. Safe travels until then."

Beon had reserved judgment about Sir Percy, feeling it would be unfair of him to measure his character without really knowing him, but after the callous way he'd addressed the loss of such a great warrior, Beon decided he was done reserving judgment and could now freely hate Sir Percy.

The Head Sister walked nervously into the chamber where Sophia and Eva were reading and said, "Sophia, your father is here. He has been meeting with Brother Thomas, but he bids you gather your things for a trip to London post haste."

"I'm to go to London now?" Sophia asked.

"Yes, and be quick about it, or you will draw his wrath. He seems in an awful hurry."

Sophia swallowed and caught onto Eva's wide-eyes as the Head Sister rushed away. If Father was already in enough of a mood to put the Head Sister in a dither, did she really want to go with him? Sophia saw no way of escaping it, though, and promptly set her book aside, rising to prepare for the journey.

“Could this mean a wedding or a funeral, do you think?” Sophia asked as she moved toward the door, remembering the many letters about suitors, as well as the war that had kept Beon from her these many months.

The color drained from Eva’s face, and Sophia regretted her choice of words. Of course, Eva worried about Sir Lyndon perishing in battle as much as she feared for Beon. Reaching out to her with trembling hands, Eva said, “Come, let us pray that it is a welcome home ceremony for our men at war and not—oh, I just can’t say it.”

Taking Eva’s hands into hers, they bowed their heads as Eva whispered a short prayer. The very second Eva whispered, “Amen,” Sophia left in a hurry.

When she arrived in the cloister with her small trunk in tow, her father only acknowledged her with an impatient sideways glance. He continued to speak with Brother Thomas in hushed but emphatic tones.

Brother Thomas nodded somberly to words she couldn’t hear, and panic began to rise within her.

Since Brother Thomas was the Priory expert on demon extraction as well as revealing the identity of witches and blood sucking creatures like the one she and Beon had encountered on the south road, this intensified her concerns. Could Beon and Sir Lyndon have fallen prey to that thing rather than the perils of war? With their plans to capture the beast returning to her memory, the dread within her rose.

After a moment that felt more like a month had passed, the men shook hands, and her father strode toward her.

“Come,” he said as he passed her on his way out.

Scrambling to drag her trunk along with her, she obediently followed.

The mood remained very somber among the party that traveled south to London. When it appeared to Sophia that Father had very few men left in his charge, a fraction of what normally would have accompanied him on such a journey, the worry within her intensified.

Sophia studied him, doing her best to read a man she’d never truly been able to read anyway. Not only was his detail of guards fewer in number, but Father seemed a mere shadow of his former self. He was distracted and harried and he wasn’t raging about whatever it was that had displeased him. Sophia clutched the small wooden bird in her pocket as they rode side by side, desperate for any comfort to her anxious thoughts.

The only small comfort she found in the journey was seeing her youngest brother again, Marcus, who had grown into a fine young man, resembling their mother to the point it was like being in her presence again.

Nudging her horse ahead slightly, she caught up with Marcus and asked, “What news do you have for me, Brother?”

“It’s all very sudden, according to Father. The war with France was simply called off due to the pestilence sweeping Europe. So many died there was no one left to fight. They say the plague has reached England, but Father says that it is only hearsay and not to bother with such rubbish.”

“What sort of pestilence are you talking about?” she asked, praying it wasn’t the same evil pestilence Brother Thomas and the others whispered about at the monastery.

“Some are calling it the Black Death.”

She’d heard the monks and nuns whisper of that too, but she still could not breathe freely because she did not know if the men she cared about had escaped either threat with their lives.

“Have you heard word of Marcel, Sir Beon, or Sir Lyndon?”

Marcus laughed coldly, the sound making her think of Father far more than she’d expected, and his response was just as heartless. “How should I know? None of them bother to write me. And don’t be an imbecile, Beon is still a page, therefore you mustn’t refer to him as a knight.”

At such unkind words, she couldn’t find anything else to say, and so they rode in silence for a while, so much sadness for her brother filling her heart, Sophia thought she might cry. Clearly, the absence of their mother had cost her brother dearly. Marcus was already becoming as cruel as her father.

When the silence grew to be too much, Sophia raised her chin and asked, “Why must we go to London if the war is not won?”

“The king has requested all the lords and ladies of the land attend a memorial for the fallen upon his return. It is a funeral procession as much as it is a welcome home apparently.”

Sophia felt a momentary sense of relief that one of her questions had been answered. Father had not married her off as of yet, which meant that Beon could ask for her hand now that the war was over and they could finally be together. Any relief promptly dissipated as the fear of death continued to loom, however. What if Beon was one of the many men taken by the horrible infection or the evil demon?

“Why does Father have fewer men with him than usual?” she asked, hoping the answer might explain the absence of Beon or Sir Lyndon.

Marcus shrugged his shoulders, again proving his nature had been poisoned under their father’s guidance. “Father said they were weak and fell victim to this pestilence as well.”

London was hazy in the distance as they came upon it late on a muggy afternoon. Sophia’s mouth dropped open because she had never seen anything like it. They were still a few miles away but the enormous village sprawled like an angry beast across the entire countryside. A stifling cloud hovered over it as if a storm were brewing. London was so large and looming, bustling with activity, Sophia feared to go any closer.

“Why do you stop, Sister?” Marcus asked.

“I...I don’t want to...”

“Don’t worry, I’ll protect you...and so will Father.”

She took no comfort in her brother's words. Reluctantly, she let her pony proceed. Her brother smiled pitilessly and shook his head.

"I forget that you've never been outside of Northumberland, poor thing. This must all seem rather amazing, yes?"

More sadness pricked at her heart over the loss of innocence her brother had suffered at the hand of her father.

"Yes," Sophia echoed even though 'amazing' wasn't a word she would have chosen to explain the feelings churning inside her.

"Just stay close."

What choice did she have? she mused dejectedly.

As they rode into the labyrinth called London, Sophia gaped in a mixture of awe and horror having never seen so many people crammed into one place. She never knew there were this many souls in the world.

Movement drew her eyes up to the rooftops where people were dumping buckets of filth out of windows. The stench was so bad she almost turned out the contents of her stomach on several occasions. With so many peasants living in squalor, she wondered why Father would even risk taking them into such a place.

As the riding party got closer to the castle, the villagers gradually appeared tidier and well dressed, the houses and shops, much cleaner, and the structures taller. It was all quite a spectacle. Sophia found she couldn't stop staring at everything around her with wide eyes. Even though the living conditions had improved, she still could not get used to the grotesque odor of the place.

When Sophia was finally shown to her quarters within the castle, she was completely exhausted and fell into bed, sleep overtaking her faster than usual.

She arose the next day to a room full of sunlight and heralding trumpets. Going to the window, she peered out, curious to see this city during daylight. Large crowds of people were already lining the streets below and crammed up to the castle gate. With her gaze following the road out into the distance, she noticed the king's procession approaching.

Alongside the king's coach, several of his men walked and some rode horses. Most striking about the whole affair—but in a somber sort of way—was that every man and every horse wore black. No one cheered as the procession approached the gates, reminding her of the dark event this day signified. Even the sky seemed to be mourning the loss of so many souls, and Sophia's sense of grief made her throat constrict.

Just as she was about to get dressed, a knock sounded at her door. Upon opening it, Sophia blinked when a woman rushed inside saying a bit curtly, "My name is Constance, and I am your lady's maid. We must make you presentable.”

The woman then went right for her trunk and swung it open. With a look of pure disgust upon her face, she lifted Sophia’s black gown, quite wrinkled from travel, and said, “This will never do.”

Without giving Sophia a chance even to respond, Constance took the dress and left. Deciding to stay in her nightshift, Sophia assumed the woman had gone to find something else in the proper size, and so she sat down on the edge of the mattress to wait.

Returning with another black dress of a better quality, Constance proceeded to clothe Sophia in the many layers proper ladies wore at court when not living in a convent. Constance was a very quiet person, Sophia mused to herself as the woman plaited her hair. Once finished, the somber lady’s maid led her through the corridors, which were oddly deserted. After making several twists and turns Sophia began to smell food cooking, which made her stomach rumble.

Eventually, they came to a great hall with black banners draped on the walls and long tables stretching the length of the space for hundreds of guests. Servants were bustling about with trays of food and drink. Sophia’s mouth watered at the sights and smells surrounding her.

Before she was able to start searching for Father and Marcus, a man said, “Lady Gall, what an unexpected surprise.”

Turning, Sophia found Henry de Percy grinning at her.

She promptly dipped into a curtsy and offered up a forced greeting, as she wasn’t exactly happy to see him. “Lord Percy. What a pleasant surprise.”

“Please, my lady, do call me Henry. I hope I didn’t frighten you.”

“No...I was just...well, it was just unexpected is all. Weren’t you fighting with the King in France?”

“I traveled ahead of the procession.”

Sophia forced a polite smile even though his comment didn’t make much sense to her. How was it possible to travel from France faster than the others? An awkward silence stretched out between them, and to banish it, she said, “I’ve never seen so many people in my life.”

“I am in agreement, my lady, I long to return to the quiet of Northumberland.”

“I doubt Alnwick is as quiet as Holy Island.”

“Ah yes, and how are the Brothers and Sisters of Lindisfarne these days? Still penitent, I presume? They’re not rubbing off on you are they, my dear lady, for it would be a shame to tame that wild streak I can see within you,” Sir Percy said with a wink.

“Wild streak, my lord?” That didn’t sound very ladylike, and his phrasing made her feel uncomfortable.

“Yes, you appeal to the very nature of beasts, do you not? Creatures of all kinds are drawn to you, naturally, or as I’ve heard.”

“Beasts of nature? You’ve heard this, my lord...from whom, may I ask?” Sophia asked, thinking that comment was even stranger than the last. Words like ‘beast’ made her think of monsters, and she was honestly struggling to keep the smile on her face from faltering.

“I have a wild streak as well, my lady,” he said instead of explaining who was telling him such things.

Sophia suddenly felt smothered and longed, almost frantically, for some fresh air.

Just as she was seeking an escape, doors at the far end of the hall burst open, and the other knights started to flood into the chamber.

“Shall we?” Sir Percy said, indicating the tables.

“Forgive me, Lord—or, uh...Henry, I should probably find my father and brother. They will be looking for me.”

“Of course, my lady. And I will look forward to continuing our conversation.”

He bowed, and Sophia curtsied, thinking she wasn't looking forward to any such thing. She presented one last forced smile and took her leave in a hurry, searching for Beon's head of dark hair. When she didn't see him, she next sought Sir Lyndon, as he was a head taller than most and would be easier to recognize.

When neither one of them could be found, the panic within her at their absence intensified until her head was whirling, and she felt a little dizzy. As any and all remaining air from the chamber vanished—escape became the only thing she could think about while struggling to fill her lungs.

Sophia rushed through the closest doorway, entering a large corridor, and she paused unsure of which way would take her to the gardens. Spotting a servant, she asked to know the fastest way out. When Sophia finally made it to a wide balcony overlooking a courtyard near the stables, she bent forward and sucked in big gulps of air.

She still felt breathless and knew she was fast approaching a full panic as thoughts of Beon being one of the fallen filled her mind. Letting her tears begin to fall, she braced herself against the parapet, fearing she might collapse at any moment.

As she was looking out across the courtyard below, she thought she saw someone resembling her brother, Marcel, emerge from the stables. Then a tall, man with long dark hair came into view. Beon? she thought but couldn't seem to find enough air to call out his name. With her vision blurred as it was, she couldn't be certain and worried she was imagining what she wanted to see.

Sophia dropped her head and closed her eyes, trying to clear her head as well as her vision. She drew air in slowly through her nose and then blew it out through her mouth. When she opened her eyes again, her focus fell on a large shrub in the shape of a bird and the tears returned. Desperate to get a better look, she looked for a way down to the courtyard and saw a staircase to her left. Rushing to it on wobbly legs, she hoped she could make it to the bottom before fainting.

While gripping the banister tightly, Sophia finally reached the garden and ran toward the bush. Once there, she blinked up in wonder. This was for real, wasn't it? Had Beon really so boldly carved away at one of the hedges at the king's court? Doing so at the monastery had been incredibly bold of him, but here seemed even more so. Was this simply a magical coincidence?

When it all became too much for her, and she felt black closing in around her, she knew she was falling to the ground, but couldn't do anything to stop it. Someone called out her name as she lost her grip on consciousness.

Chapter 13

WHEN BIRDS AREN'T ALLOWED TO FLY

Having caught her as she fell, Beon carried Sophia through the hallways as a servant lead them to her quarters. Marcel ran ahead to fetch Lord Gall. Once they reached her chambers, Beon gently laid her on the bed. He went to the basin, doused a linen, and wrung out the excess water. Sitting down beside her, he laid the cool cloth on her forehead and stroked her cheek.

So beautiful, like a sleeping angel, he thought. Sable tresses framed her heart shaped face. Beon was reminded of how she resembled the innocent cherubs depicted in the tapestries at Bamborough Castle, the only cheerful things to be found in the entire cold structure, aside from Sophia herself...at a time when they'd both been younger, innocent and not tainted by the realities of life. Parts of him wanted to return to that time of simplicity when the most pressing matters they worried about were mapping out the hidden passageways and running along the beach as the sea rolled over their bare feet.

Beon knew, however, that such thoughts were not practical or realistic, so he instead imagined the future he wanted, and he knew without a shadow of a doubt that he wanted that future to be with Sophia and no one else.

With her cheeks so flushed with color, Beon believed she'd simply become overheated, and hoped she'd wake up soon. She couldn't have been exposed to the plague already, could she?

The servant stood by with a bowl of broth for her to drink once she awakened, but when time stretched on, and she never roused, Beon patted at her cheeks gently. "Sophia, my lovely little dove, please wake up. I'm here. It's me, Beon."

She frowned and mumbled in her sleep, but still didn't open her eyes.

When he spoke her name once more, she groaned and then asked sleepily, "Are you real?"

With a chuckle escaping him, he gathered her hand into his and pressed a kiss to her knuckles. "Yes, of course, it's me, my lady. Oh, how I missed you... Are you all right? How do you feel?"

When she didn't respond to his questions, he frowned and patted at her cheeks once more. Thinking that getting some fluids into her might do some good, he reached for the small bowl of broth held by the servant. Beon turned around and tucked one arm beneath her shoulders to prop her up and then pressed the bowl to her lips.

Once the liquid touched her lips, she opened her mouth and drank a little, but she still didn't fully awaken. Again, she moaned, her head lulling back.

Lowering her back to the pillow, Beon handed the bowl back to the servant.

Rising from the bed to pace the chamber, he forced himself to stop looking at her mouth because wild thoughts of kissing her awake kept filling his mind. And if she did return to consciousness while his mouth covered hers, Beon knew he would not be able to resist acting on those thoughts, sending the servant away and begging her to make love to him so he could tell her with every part of himself that he loved her more than anything in this world.

Well aware of the fact that this line of thinking was inappropriate, Beon dragged fingers through his hair, wishing the temptation to act on such thoughts wasn't so great. Getting control of himself, Beon instead focused on how he could make Sophia his bride in the honorable way.

It was time to speak to her father. It was time to stand up and stake his claim. Beon would ask for her hand in marriage this very day. He would finally take her away from all the people and worries crushing her spirit, and they could live happily at Brentworth, for he was now the lord and vassal of the land. Even though he wasn't yet a knight by title, he was a lord.

Doing this sooner than later would also help his poor mother cope with the loss of Father. Sophia's bright spirit and smiling face would give Mother happier things to think on, a much needed distraction to help her heal from the heartache.

Suddenly the door burst open, and Lord Gall stormed inside with Marcel close behind. Lord Gall looked rather pale and withered since Beon had last seen him three or four years prior. However, he still had the same cold and angry glare as he scanned the people in the chamber with harsh disapproval.

"What are you doing here?" he barked at Beon.

"Your daughter swooned, and I carried her—"

"You are dismissed," he interrupted, then turned his scowl toward Sophia. "Wake her up!" he said to Marcel as he snapped his fingers.

Marcel rushed forward and slapped at her cheeks firmly enough Beon found himself grinding his teeth together. He suspected Marcel didn't mean to be so rough with her, supposing a younger brother might not consider such things, so he restrained himself from reacting.

When Sophia remained unconscious, he worried that she might still be overheated and getting her lady's maid in here to strip the confining stays and gown off her body would be the most helpful solution. With Lord Gall in the room, however, he didn't think it was possible to get her the help she needed, seeing as how it wasn't really his place. So he decided it was now or never if he was going to make a claim for Sophia's hand. "My lord, might I have a quick word?"

"I have asked you to leave, Master Everard, this is a family matter and none of your concern."

Beon's face flushed with anger, but he took a breath to steady himself and keep his calm. Understanding a little of how this man's mind worked, and that he would need to feel like he was in control, Beon dropped to one knee before Lord Gall and bowed his head. Keeping his voice firm

Beon said, “My lord, I humble myself before you and ask for your daughter’s hand in marriage. After my father’s passing, his land and title have been bequeathed to me. I can promise your daughter will have a good life in my care.”

“What is this nonsense? I have already given my blessing to Sir Percy. You are wasting your breath. Now for the last time, get the hell out of my sight.”

Beon looked up in shock. “But, my lord, I would be willing to offer you a dowry rather than the other way round. Surely that is a more attractive offer than whatever terms you’ve agreed to with Sir Percy.”

“Even if it were, the answer would still be ‘no.’ Even for all the gold in Christendom. For you, the answer will always be ‘no.’”

“What have I ever done to offend you, my lord?” Beon asked, some of what he was feeling slipping into his tone. He knew he was letting his temper get the better of him, but there was only so much he was willing to take from this wretch of a man.

“You are arrogant and self-righteous. You think you are superior to me and everyone around you. You are now and have always been dead wrong. You are a commoner. A peasant. And that is why you will always remain but a servant to me.”

Beon stood and faced Lord Gall, “My lord, I have born your mistreatment of me since the first day I arrived on your doorstep, and I have accepted your ill will with grace and dignity, but—”

“Master Everard, you will hold your tongue and remember your place, or I will have you dishonorably discharged from my service and hung for insubordination. If you care anything at all about your father’s good name, I would think very carefully about what you do or say next.”

Beon fumed. Instinctively his hand clamped around the hilt of his sword, wanting so badly to draw it and challenge Lord Gall right then and there. A number of things kept him from actually doing it, however. The first one being that Marcel was in the room and while Beon believed him to be a better man than his father, this wasn’t the best time to test out his loyalties. The next one being that if he were reckless enough to push the matter now, he risked the situation escalating out of control. Again, reasoning that it was best to keep his head and come up with another plan, Beon promptly backed down.

“I will take my leave.” He gave a slight nod and then moved for the door.

Once alone in the hallway and the door had shut behind him, he cursed aloud.

“Yes. Unfortunately for you, we have the same good taste in women.” Beon spun to find Sir Percy leaning against the wall just outside of Sophia’s chambers. “I’m afraid there are many casualties in this little game of love and war, Master Everard. You’ll get over it.”

“This is not a game, my lord,” Beon breathed, his nostrils flaring.

“Oh, I imagine you’ll find that, with time, it is all a great game of strategy.”

“We are talking about Lady Gall’s life and happiness.”

“No, we’re talking about a business arrangement between her father and myself. I also happen to be quite enamored with the lady. I look forward to awakening the wild beast within her.”

Beon sputtered in disbelief at the man’s audacity and vulgarity. “If it’s money you need—?”

Sir Percy laughed, cutting him off. “Money is not what I need, Master Everard. It is a challenge I seek. And I do admit to taking a great deal of pleasure in torturing Gall, the ignorant lout. I’m sure I will grow tired of it eventually, but until then, Lady Gall will bring me quite a good deal of pleasure.”

His callous implications towards Sophia sent Beon into a blinding rage, and he drew his sword, raised it over his head, and brought it down on Sir Percy. But the knight grabbed Beon’s wrist with a swiftness and strength that surprised him, their faces inches apart. Sir Percy smiled and shoved Beon backward so that he smacked against the opposite wall of the corridor.

“I’m going to forgive this infraction because of your obvious feelings for the girl, but let me give you some sound advice. Keep your head, Master Everard. Literally.”

Father’s angry voice greeted Sophia as unconsciousness began to loosen its grip on her, and she opened her eyes. Blinking, she took in her surroundings. As her vision cleared of sleep, she noticed Marcel listening as Father ranted about something Beon had done. While she had heard him complain about Beon in the past, she listened more carefully as she tried to remember why she was sleeping during the day and why Father and Marcel were in her chamber.

When Father looked her way and noticed she was awake, he growled in his typical way, “Make yourself presentable. You must come before the king immediately for his blessing on your marriage.”

With her thoughts still foggy, Sophia was utterly speechless as she tried to process what her father had just said.

“Marriage?” she managed to ask, frowning at how coarse her voice sounded.

“To Sir Percy.” When she stared at him, dumbfounded and trying to sit upright, he ground out, “I told you to stop dallying and make yourself presentable.”

Trying to steady herself, and trying to give herself time to process this, she scooted toward the edge of the mattress and dropped her feet to the floor. With hands braced on either side of her hips, she asked, “I don’t remember agreeing to that.”

“He asked for your hand. I agreed to it, and there is nothing more to discuss. You are now betrothed,” he said as though she were quite daft.

“I agreed to no such thing,” she argued.

Father frowned at her for so long, she began to squirm under the pressure, and then he began to laugh. It wasn’t a jovial sound at all but more of a mocking laughter that made her feel small.

Sophia opened her mouth to protest the arrangement yet again, when Marcel said, “Sir Percy is the better choice by far.”

“What? Better than whom?”

“Beon, of course.”

“That worthless boy is still a page, or have you forgotten that?” Father asked Marcel as though she weren’t sitting right there.

That’s when the memories came flooding back, and she gasped, her eyes going wide. “Beon is alive?”

Again, they stared at her.

“He’s really alive?” she repeated when the silence stretched on.

“It does not matter if he is alive or not, Sophia.”

Yes, it does! she thought, feeling elated, confused and frustrated all at once.

“Both men asked for your hand,” explained Marcel. “But Father has made the choice for you, as is his place to do so.”

“Beon asked for my hand?” she asked, her heart soaring at the thought.

Shaking his head, Father said, “Don’t look so pleased, my dear. Beon left you behind rather than challenge me when I gave him my answer.”

Again, struggling to comprehend information that did not fit what she knew of Beon, Sophia just sat there as her world caved in around her. Unable to meet their eyes, she stared down at her lap as the tears began to fall.

“Prepare yourself to meet the king so he may grant his blessing or I might be tempted to beat you back into unconsciousness for being so damn insolent. And stop your weeping. I will not tolerate such weakness.”

Shocked, horrified, and confused, Sophia continued staring at her lap, unable to control the tears that would not stop flowing as Father and Marcel left the chamber.

Chapter 14

AN EXCHANGE OF PRISONS

In a way, Sophia would say she felt like a ghost as she walked the corridors of Bamborough Castle. How could she not feel dead inside? It had been the longest fortnight of her life because she hadn't heard from Beon since learning he was alive, so what Father had said must be true. Beon must have abandoned her. She couldn't blame him, could she? Dealing with Father's rants would drive anyone away. It was foolish of her to think otherwise, and she knew that. She knew quite well this was just how things were and she was powerless to change it.

She longed to go back to the convent, but Father had also refused that request. With his face going a disturbing shade of red, she'd understood it was time for her to stop fighting it.

Perhaps she was overreacting and would be quite happy with Sir Percy, but even as she thought that, it seemed unrealistic. Despite his elevated title, handsome face, and wealth, he just didn't appeal to her. He never had, and would never hold her heart. A heavy sigh escaped her, and she let her fingers glide along the wall as she slowly made her way to the garden.

Sophia, just like any other day, walked amongst the hedges, blind to the beauty there. The roses seemed to have lost their vibrancy and scent. The birds could not catch her attention with their song. The air felt stifling. The storm clouds seemed to enjoy matching her sullen mood, as though they mocked her with their raindrops and dreary shades of gray.

However, the sky was clear and blue today, and the sun was reaching its fingers into almost every crevice of the garden. Even still, Sophia felt like a lifeless stone. The sun taunting her with its rays and saying, I'm surrounding you with warmth, and yet you're still cold inside.

It didn't matter how happily the sun shone, Sophia found that her mind naturally gravitated toward the worst possible outcome in any situation of import. But that was only because the worst possible thing always did happen. Her heart had broken when she'd heard of Beon's father and Sir Lyndon not surviving the Hundred Year War. Her heart had broken for Beon as well. She'd mourned just as she assumed he must be mourning.

With arms wrapped around herself, Sophia paused when her eyes fell onto a shadow stretching out toward her on the path. It was in the shape of a bird and hadn't been there on her previous walks. When she lifted her eyes and saw the boxwood casting the shadow, she blinked. There, towering above her and limned in golden sunshine, was a sculpture of a bird just like the wooden magpie Beon had given her so many years ago. Having abandoned the bird within a box she kept in her bedchamber, just as Beon had abandoned her, she did not have it in her pocket to compare the two.

She knew with absolute certainty that this had not been here before.

“Beon?” she called quietly, hoping he was still nearby.

Truth be told, Sophia had wanted to shout his name, but couldn’t risk such a thing if Father happened to be nearby.

When he didn’t answer, she said it again, “Beon, where are you?”

Sophia waited and waited, and he did not appear. If she lingered any longer the sunlight would burn her pale skin, a curse of having auburn hair. With her shoulders sagging and her thoughts in turmoil, Sophia decided it was best for her to make her way back inside.

When she returned to her bedchamber, feeling ill and thinking she might skip supper, she froze when she noticed a man stretched out upon her bed. In a casual pose, his arms were tucked behind his head and his legs were crossed. Sophia stepped forward to get a better look at his face.

“Beon!” Sophia clapped both hands over her mouth when she realized she’d practically shouted his name. “What are you doing?” she whispered, casting a glance toward the door nervously. When no one entered, she turned back to him and lowered her hands.

“I’m here to kidnap you.”

She glanced at the door once more. “I...um, I don’t think that will go over well with my father.”

“Your father can rot in Hell. I’m not letting you marry Sir Percy.”

“But I don’t have a choice in the matter.”

“Yes, you do.”

“You know I don’t.”

“Come here,” he said, ignoring her.

Sophia’s eyes widened at the huskiness in his voice, confused by the way the rumbling sound made her feel inside. “Whilst you lay upon my bed? ‘Tis scandalous.”

“Because you almost became a nun or because you don’t love me?” he asked, lifting one dark eyebrow.

“You know I love you,” she breathed.

“Then what are you waiting for?” he asked, his arms outstretched as he sat upright.

What was she waiting for? And why had she ever believed he’d abandoned her? Based on the look he was sending her way, the thought seemed silly now.

Moving to him, she struggled to fight off the sadness within her. Father would kill him if he found out he was here and he would eventually find out since there was plenty of evidence on display in the garden.

When she got close enough for him to reach her, his hand shot out, and he dragged her onto the bed with him. Sophia gasped, but couldn't bring herself to pull away as his arms enveloped her. She was again reminded of how his warmth could penetrate her soul even in those guarded places the sunlight couldn't reach.

She found herself hugging him back and snuggling against his shoulder. "Is this really happening? Are you really here?"

"I agree that it feels like a dream," he whispered, his fingers caressing her hair along with his breath as the heat of his exhale touched her skin. "But it's not a dream. You'll let me kidnap you, won't you?"

Worry for his safety brought her head up, and she peered into his warm brown eyes, wishing reality wasn't what it was. "Father will have you hung, or he just might end you himself."

"I'll end him first if he's foolish enough to try it."

"But my father is powerful and strong..."

"Ouch," he said, frowning at her for the first time since she'd seen him there upon her bed. "Do you really have so little faith in my skills?"

"I've lost faith in everything, to be perfectly honest."

"How is it you're the one who has lost faith when you've lived amongst people who are shining examples of conviction, when my life has been consumed by the practice of war?"

Sophia had no response for that. Partly because she was so surprised and partly because he was absolutely right.

"Your bedchamber is an absolute disaster, by the way. How can you find anything amongst so much clutter?"

She laughed, taking in the many garments littering her floor, draped over the chair beside the fire, and the collections of shells covering just about every table and window ledge available. "What? Now you're complaining about the cleanliness of my chamber when you snuck in, uninvited like a bandit?"

"Well, I am here to steal something."

"Me, as you said before."

"That's right."

"And what if I refuse for your own safety?"

He set her aside so he could rise from the bed and stretch one hand out to her. "We just went over that, didn't we? Or do I need to repeat myself?"

Sophia was tempted to take his hand, but she knew what Father was like. He would never let this be. Beon could end up dead, and she couldn't live with herself if she ever let that happen. "No," she said, folding her arms over her chest to keep from throwing herself into his arms.

"'No' we haven't been over it, 'no' you don't need me to repeat it, or 'no' you won't let me kidnap you like a proper Neanderthal?"

She found herself laughing but shook her head. "No, I'm...I'm just going to stay and marry Sir Percy...to save you."

Scooping her up from the bed, he said, "I'm not giving you a choice in the matter."

"Tell me something else I don't already know."

Beon gave her a stern look for that. "Could you be any more stubborn?"

"No, because you're easily more stubborn than me."

"I guess you're right, but that suits me just fine," he said as he strode toward the secret passageway in Mother's solar, that led to the chapel, that would get them outside unseen.

Fearing for his life, she resisted more fervently. Sophia tried to push away, but he held her fast. She beat her fists against his chest and kicked her legs to no avail. Beon simply held her, waiting, as though her thrashing about wasn't a struggle for him in the least. Finally, she stopped and said, "I missed you so much."

"And I you, my little songbird."

Just before he ducked into the passageway, he lowered his lips to hers and kissed her so sweetly she knew she would die if she lost him again.

Once they arrived at a little hunting cottage that was hidden within the woods, Beon drew her into his embrace again, crushing her tightly to his chest.

After Beon had started a fire in the hearth, he turned to face her. As she read the intensity within his expression, Sophia wasn't quite sure what to do, or how to react to him.

"Are we ever going to go back?" she found herself asking.

"Wouldn't that defeat the point of kidnapping you?"

"I guess it would," she answered. Sophia couldn't imagine what Father would do when he found out she was gone. Just thinking about it was frightening enough, so she forced herself not to.

"Are you going to kiss me again?"

"Do you think kidnappers kiss their victims?"

"I honestly wouldn't know. And I don't feel like a victim." Father made her feel victimized, but Beon never had.

"The sun has set," he said as he drew closer, lifting one hand to glide the backs of his fingers over her cheek.

Sophia bit her lip and smiled. "So I noticed."

"Should we turn in for the night?"

She glanced over her shoulder at the one bed in the cottage. "My father would not—"

"Let's not talk about that man, shall we?"

Beon was right, she didn't want to talk about Father either.

When she didn't say anything, Beon removed his boots and moved to the bed, stretching out over it. "Are you joining me?" he asked with that husky voice again.

Sophia hesitated. His earlier question about what she wanted came back to her mind. She didn't need to think for long to know that she wanted Beon in her life forever and moved forward, removed her slippers, and crawled onto the mattress with him.

They kissed for a while and they talked quietly long into the night.

Sophia wasn't sure when she'd fallen asleep. All she knew was that sleeping while surrounded by his arms and the entire length of his body touching hers, felt like the most blissful slumber she'd had since the Priory.

Sophia awoke from her dreams to an odd noise and she searched the moonlit room for the source of that sound. Rising from the shadows like a demon from Hell was Sir Percy. A patch of moonlight illuminated the smirk upon his mouth. As silently as a wraith, he moved forward to loom above them.

Reflexively, Sophia opened her mouth to scream, but with a movement so fast his arm was a blur, he silenced her and lifted a finger to his lips. "If you don't wish for me to drain every ounce of blood from Beon's body, then you will allow me to return you to Bamborough where you belong...for our wedding ceremony."

Her lips opened in a silent scream when he grinned and she saw the fangs visible within his mouth. Sophia immediately remembered the monster that had murdered the peasant on that darkened road so many years ago.

The demon, the pestilence, the creature from Hell elusively evading detection for so long, was Sir Percy.

When he bent forward and his eyes locked onto hers, Sophia felt herself going limp, any strength she may have possessed draining from her limbs. As the evil magic within his gaze overpowered her, Sophia could do nothing as this demon unraveled her from Beon's sleepy embrace and carried her limp form away into the night.

Chapter 15

IF ONE CANNOT OVERPOWER, THEN OUTWIT

Ever since that awful night when Sophia had been kidnapped twice, her anxiety had been steadily rising. Father had no idea she'd even gone missing, and he so often paid little attention to things around him that he hadn't noticed Beon's sculpted shrubs either. Just looking at them pinched her heart with sadness.

As Sir Percy had carried her through the night, Sophia had discovered a lot about his inhuman powers that shed light on past mysteries. He had traveled so incredibly fast it was as though he'd somehow used the wind to carry them along. He'd occasionally expelled his breath into her face, and the fragrance of it was so magically intoxicating, she hated herself for wanting more of it. Sophia quickly realized that he'd used this potion like breath to subdue the peasant he had taken on the road. As it overpowered her in the same way, Sophia had wondered if she was about to suffer the same fate. But as the days had passed, she'd come to believe she wasn't just food to Sir Percy.

Once they'd returned to Bamborough Castle, he'd brought her inside with more stealth than any thief, and tucked her into bed. Because of the evil magic within him, she was powerless to move or even speak. She'd fallen asleep quickly and only realized the spell had released her by the time the sun awoke her the next day.

Knowing Beon would come to take her back, she'd sent a missive with one of Father's squires explaining what had happened. She hadn't see Beon since.

Her heart ached as she pondered it, but she hoped he was wise enough to listen this time. The demon was just too powerful to be defied and she would rather remain Percy's prisoner than lose Beon to death, so she kept silent about all of it.

Since that night, Sir Percy had visited her regularly from Alnwick. Each time arriving unexpectedly during the day to make sure she hadn't tried to escape or told anyone his secret. And each time, the evil magic lurking within him remained completely undetectable, which helped her understand why no one would ever suspect Sir Percy was a creature capable of murdering that peasant. No one would ever know, which begged Sophia to question: Who else around her was a vampire? Sophia became untrusting and fearful of anyone she rarely saw at night. Of course, she was doubly sure that Percy kept even closer watch over her at night, when his powers were at their height.

She would study Sir Percy whenever he joined them for the noonday meal and conversed with her Father. For all to see, he appeared like any other human, as long as the sun was visible in the sky. His conversation with her father was always civil outwardly, but she could feel the tension between the men and knew there must be secrets involving this arrangement she might never know.

Sophia had also noted that when the sun was setting, Sir Percy would become bashful about looking anyone in the eye and would quickly find any excuse to leave. Again, she was the only one who knew the real reason why he behaved this way.

Knowing she was powerless against the monster lurking beneath the surface, Sophia couldn't help but fear him. But when he'd requested moments alone with her, he'd never been cruel, and so she believed he didn't mean to drain the blood from her body once she became his bride. What then did he have planned for her? This was something Sophia found herself wondering about often.

On the day before the wedding, Sir Percy had requested to speak with her in private, as he'd done a few times prior. Sophia boldly decided to ask the question most on her mind. "What will happen to me after we're married?"

"I shall to turn you into a vampire as well," he said casually, as though he'd simply been suggesting they take a leisurely stroll along the shoreline to collect pretty seashells.

When she gaped at him in horror, he said, "As a vampire by my side, I'll be able to spoil you with jewels for all of eternity."

To Sophia, an eternity sounded like a very long time to be married to a monster. She honestly didn't want jewels either, so the offer did not appeal to her and never would. Although, the thought did cross her mind that if Beon had been the one to make this proposal, Sophia knew she just might say yes.

"How will you do that?" she next asked, unsure if she wanted to know, but an odd curiosity she would probably regret later had made her ask anyway. When he explained, it was indeed a query she regretted.

Henry brushed his fingers along the column of her neck and said softly, "I'll simply bite you without draining the life from you." He kissed her neck and then added, "That alone will be enough."

"A vampire's kiss then?"

Amusement danced across his face at that. "Kissed by a vampire. Well put, my lady, I think I will adopt that phrase from now on."

"Why didn't you attack Beon and me when you...um, do I want to know what happened to that peasant?"

He ignored the second part of her question, which she supposed was her answer. "So bold and so lovely you were when you tried to save Beon with your bare hands. I was intrigued and enraptured."

"It wasn't because of the silver cross?"

At that question, he simply chuckled.

"How did you become a vampire?" It was another query she could later regret knowing the answer to, but, as before, Sophia was too curious not to ask.

Henry's glanced at the door. Moving toward it, he tipped his head to the side and listened for a time. Did he think Father was listening in on their conversations? Sophia wondered. Turning back to her he smiled, invited her to sit with him, which she did reluctantly, knowing she truly had no choice in the matter. "My sister, Lilith, was a sorceress."

"A what?"

"A magical being—born that way."

"Then you're a sorcerer too?"

He sighed. "No, I didn't inherit the gift. A few of my sisters did, though."

"Like Lilith."

Nodding at that, Sir Percy continued, "Ardat and Irdu are very powerful sorceresses. Lillu is a sorceress also, but not quite as gifted as the other two. I have not seen Lilith or Lillu for quite some time now."

He looked up at her and then back to his hands as he twisted a ring around his finger before he continued, "Lilith created vampires as a way to punish Benjamin. They were in love...and happy it seemed...until she told him she was a sorceress. Benjamin was rather dejected by this news because he was human. In anger, he turned his back on her and called her a 'curse to humanity.' So she took her revenge by cursing him for all eternity."

Sophia swallowed hard. "You're going to curse me?"

Her eyes widened when he laughed at her. How could he possibly think this was funny? Having lived so many years at a convent, Sophia was sure becoming cursed would doom her to Hell.

At her horrified look, he laughed even harder, and she frowned at him. "I believe it's a gift and not the punishment Lilith meant it to be," he finally said.

"How can you possibly think that?" Sophia asked unable to believe he didn't see himself as cursed. In her mind, he was horrifying.

"We're getting ahead of ourselves. Lilith had meant for Benjamin to live his life alone and isolated because he was now this vicious and bloodthirsty creature. I don't know the details, but he learned by accident that he could turn other mortals into vampires by biting them without draining them to the point of death. With this discovery, one by one he surprised all of Lilith's siblings, including me, by turning us into vampires. Can you imagine what poetic justice that was for him? She'd unwittingly given him the power to punish her own family just as she had tried to punish him."

"How did he manage to do that if two of her sisters are sorceresses like her? Couldn't they have stopped him with magic?"

Again, Lord Percy chuckled. "Little did Lilith know, but she'd made him too powerful, and he was able to overcome all of them, even the ones gifted magically. This is why all sorcerers hate vampires. They actually fear them, knowing they could be turned into vampires too."

"Cursed you mean."

"No, not cursed," he repeated. "That was yet another troubling thing for Lilith. We all decided we liked being vampires.”

Sophia blinked at him, thinking he was insane.

Lord Percy tapped her lightly on the end of her nose and said, “Don’t look at me like that. It truly is an improvement. Sorcerers who are born with magical gifts live a very long time, centuries even. Because of that, they seem immortal, but they’re not. They will eventually die or could be killed, although, not easily. Since I did not have the gift of magic, I never would have lived as long as Lilith or the others, but now that I’m a vampire, I can live even longer than her.”

“And how long have you been alive...thus far?”

“Only one hundred and eighty-seven years...thus far. And just getting started.”

When she continued to stare at him like he was a devil born from the bowels of some dark abyss, he took her hand into his. Sophia allowed it, again. Her lack of choices in life was something she’d grown accustomed to even though she hated it. She thought about fighting back, but she couldn’t get past the futility of it when she was always being oppressed by people stronger than her. With her teeth clenched together, she vowed to manage it one day. If she could not overpower those who stole her freedom, then she would learn how to outwit them.

When his thumb glided over her knuckles, she shuddered in annoyance, making him smirk. The arrogant expression made Sophia hate him even more than she did already. Could she live with such a man? Forever? Or could she talk him into draining her rather than turning her into an immortal monster like him?

Since Sophia had come to know Henry well enough to understand he would not likely agree to kill her, she next wondered if he could be killed, noticing he’d skipped over that point in his story. Sophia didn’t want this information so she could attempt to kill him, of course. Attempting something like that was too lofty a goal for her at this point. But really, so she could end herself when the time came.

Sophia paced the floor of her chamber the night before her wedding day...the night before her wedding to a creature that turned her stomach. As the hours dragged on it became plain to Sophia that she would not be sleeping at all tonight. She found some comfort knowing that at least Eva would be by her side come noon tomorrow for this dreaded wedding.

However, Eva was suffering too, and Sophia would not forget that. And conversely, while weddings were typically a day of celebration, it was not for her. How could it be? Eva knew this also. Sophia was grateful for her moral support, even if grief subdued it.

It had been pure torture to hear of Eva’s reaction to the passing of Sir Lyndon. Sophia’s heart broke for her dear friend.

She hadn’t known until now that some solace had come to Eva in the form of more garden sculptures.

Sophia had thought it very kind of Beon to travel to the Priory alone, just to comfort Eva over the loss of a man who'd meant so much to the both of them. Beon had carved a likeness of Sir Lyndon into one of the tallest hedges and stood beside it looking up at Eva's window.

Tears had rolled down Eva's cheeks as she described how Beon's face was like stone as he placed his fist over his heart.

Thinking of Beon reminded her that his gaze felt like fire when it fell upon her. And though it had been some weeks since Sophia had seen him, it was as if she and Beon's souls were communicating even while forced to remain at a distance. For years it had been that way. For years it would probably continue.

"Beon turned the grounds into a masterpiece of topiary garden art at the Priory," said Eva, drawing Sophia from her thoughts. "It helped soothe some of the pain."

Sophia's heart broke once again when she realized the sculptures he'd done might be the only legacy of their love to remain on this earth.

Eva was to be Sophia's bridesmaid for the ceremony, but she was so bereft after hearing about Sir Lyndon that Sophia felt guilty for enlisting her.

Sophia wrung her hands, biting her lip as she tried to think of a way out of this marriage. Outwit, she reminded herself, but how? She could run. Escape through the passageways and hide somewhere. But where? Where would she go? She could find Beon again...surely he would know what to do, but then she would be putting him in danger. Sophia had no doubt Henry would follow through with his promise to kill Beon. No, she must go and speak to her father one more time. Outwit, she thought once more. Could she outsmart Father?

Sophia left her solar resolutely and made her way through the cold and dark corridors to her father's wing of the castle and found him at his papers.

"Father, I beg a word, if you please," she said, curtsying.

He was startled by her presence, as if he were off in another world.

"What on earth are you doing about at this hour? You should be in bed or preparing for the wedding."

"I've come to speak with you."

"We have nothing to say to each other."

"Respectfully, Father, I disagree. If you will please hear me—"

"You have nothing to say that I could possibly want to hear, now leave."

"I am no longer a little girl, and you cannot control me."

"Can't I?" he asked coldly. "You are my daughter, and that is all either of us need know."

"Why do you treat me with such loathing?"

"How I treat you is my right!"

"I refuse to marry Sir Percy!" she shouted.

The room fell silent. The look on Father's face told her that he was equally surprised by the outburst. While she was proud of herself for speaking up, she knew she hadn't come close to outsmarting him.

Lord Gall rose from his desk and walked around the table to stand in front of Sophia. She didn't back down. She didn't care anymore.

"You will do as you are told or there will be consequences, girl."

"How could Mother have ever loved you?"

Shock and fury registered on her father's face. "How dare you! Your mother was a saint who understood me completely."

"You are so cruel and uncaring!"

"Silence yourself or I will make you regret this show of insolence."

"I'm glad she's not alive to witness your dishonorable and cowardly treatment of me. She's better off dead, and so am I!"

The back of Lord Gall's hand flew to Sophia's cheek, and she was knocked to the floor with the force. Once the stunning realization of what had just occurred thundered through her mind, Sophia's face began to throb and burn. Doing her best to ignore it, she slowly got to her feet and faced her father once again, standing as tall as she could, her legs shaking slightly.

The look in her father's eyes was that of fear, shame, and disbelief. But in an instant, the anger returned.

"Listen to me and listen well. You will marry Henry de Percy. There is no choice in the matter."

Retreating, Sophia was quite aware of the fact that she'd failed to outwit her father...but that didn't mean she wouldn't try it again while better prepared.

Chapter 16

FROM HERO TO LEGEND

Even though Sophia had sent him a letter explaining that Sir Percy was, in fact, the devil they'd seen attacking the peasant, Beon could not and would not let this end. He understood Sophia was terrified for his life, but he was determined to destroy the demon and get her back.

Beon walked along the parapet of the north curtain wall looking for the best place to lower a rope. If he and Sophia were to escape Bamborough without being noticed then the north wall was the only option as it was the least guarded and the lowest to the ground. The conventional wisdom was that if an attack were to occur, it would most likely come inland from the west or from the sea to the east. The main gate was to the south toward the heart of England and always heavily guarded, but the marshy plain directly to the north was a natural deterrent to any living thing unless you were a flock of birds.

With the castle full of guests for the wedding, including the impending arrival of Sir Percy and his brood, the trick would be keeping themselves undiscovered. But if they waited until late enough when the guards changed, Beon believed they could pull it off.

Beon had spent the past week devising an escape plan for Sophia ever since the kidnapping hadn't worked. Beon knew he was lucky to still be alive and while he prided himself on his skill with stratagems, he felt the odds were stacked against a successful getaway. But he had to try. He simply could not allow Sophia to marry Sir Percy—a vampire. Beon felt his life would be over if he failed.

Perhaps he should try and expose Percy to Lord Gall. Perhaps Gall knew Percy was the demon and was helpless to disobey his wishes for that reason. Perhaps Gall was a vampire himself. It would certainly match his cheery disposition. Whichever it was, Beon wanted to get Sophia as far as from her father and Percy as possible.

Another problem was that he hadn't been able to speak with Sophia to discuss the plan, which was imperative for the scheme to work. Knowing her as he did, Beon thought it was likely that by now Sophia had given up hope completely. For his sake, she would. But he hadn't given up yet, despite the nature of the beast he was up against.

Suddenly, he noticed movement below him, just outside the castle wall. Beon studied the darkness more carefully. The moon created some illumination on the grounds below, but mainly shadow. He held perfectly still and peered down into the dappled light of the thin tree line and the craggy rocks, the constant crash of the waves to his right.

The hair on the back of his neck stood up as a cloaked figure emerged from the shadows and slowly made its way to the middle of the grassy knoll that separated the castle from the marsh beyond. The intruder's face was concealed with a hood, and Beon felt in an instant it was the same demon he had seen on the south road. But how could it be Sir Percy? Beon had thought for certain the man was hiding in his chamber due to some fabricated ailment, as was his pattern. The figure looked up and Beon swallowed, unsure if he should call for the other guards. He was certainly safe where he was, high on the battlement, some thirty feet above the creature, but still, he wished he was armed with his garlic, silver crucifix, holy water, and stakes just to be sure.

It had been a long time since he and Sir Lyndon hunted the blood-sucking devil and the memory caused an ache in Beon's chest over the loss of his friend. Talk of the blood-suckers was much more prevalent over in Europe. The locals in France spoke as if they'd been around for ages and referred to them as 'vampyres,' which was the term Sophia had used also.

The demon below him suddenly removed his hood and Beon nearly fell off the parapet when he saw the man's face. Sir Lyndon? It couldn't be. Beon blinked and attempted to call out...to call Sir Lyndon's name, but no voice came forth.

The ghost said nothing, just stared at him. He began to feel unsteady from shock and...something about Sir Lyndon's eyes made Beon feel drowsy. He must be dreaming. It was all too unbelievable to be real. As a fog of confusion filled his mind, Beon lost his balance and slipped over the edge. The deadly consequence of this never crossed his mind until he felt himself being caught by Sir Lyndon and settled back onto his feet. Beon instantly sank to the ground since his legs just wouldn't support him any longer.

"I like this dream," Beon said, smiling up at his friend. "It's so good to see you, Sir Lyndon."

"It's good to see you too, old friend. But you mustn't look at me. And you mustn't call me Sir Lyndon anymore...you may call me Seth."

"Hmm. Is that your first name? All these years and I don't believe I ever knew your first name."

Sir Lyndon covered his face with the hood and stepped away from where Beon was sitting on the ground. After a few moments, Beon began to feel more clear-headed.

"What...did I...how did I end up down here?" He quickly rose to his feet eyeing the hooded figure suspiciously. "Am I awake? Are you truly Sir Lyndon?"

"You are awake, you just fell victim to the curse magic. Literally."

"Curse magic?"

"I cannot look upon anyone at night lest they become faint."

"You're not making any sense, man...let me see your face."

Sir Lyndon slowly turned his face toward Beon with his eyes shut. He still looked like the Sir Lyndon he'd always known.

"How is this possible? You died...you died from the plague."

“I would have died if Sir Percy hadn’t...cursed me,” Sir Lyndon said.

“He cursed you?”

“Or, rather, saved me. I’m still not sure. I have such powers now...you wouldn’t believe. He came to me on my deathbed and asked if I wanted to live in exchange for my service. I didn’t believe him. He wasn’t making sense. We’ve all seen what the infection does. No one survives. The next thing I knew, he was baring these awful fangs that hadn’t been there just moments before, and he bit me...right here.” Sir Lyndon indicated a spot on his neck.

Horror struck Beon in the gut, and he instinctively backed away. “Are you telling me that you’re now the very same kind of demon as Sir Percy? The same as that creature on the south road...a blood sucker?”

“Beon, please, I am still myself, I just—”

“Live off the blood of innocent men!”

“That’s why I’m here, listen to me, please! I can’t do it...I can’t kill...it’s not in me. I’ve been hunting game instead, and it has satisfied my thirst successfully.”

“Your thirst for blood!”

“Yes, that is the curse. The curse is that we are damned to an eternity of sucking the life out of the living. We are immortal, although our hearts stop beating at night, therefore dead, but more alive than ever we were as living men. I have the speed of six horses. I can see in the dark for miles. I can hear every sound being uttered inside the castle at this very moment. I can hear your heart beating.”

In the note Sophia had sent him, she’d only said that Sir Percy was the demon they’d seen and that he was a vampire. She hadn’t sent a letter since—probably hadn’t been able to—so Beon found he was reeling with the weight of this information. “No man should be given that power. This is the devil’s work. No man could be trusted with the weight of that kind of responsibility.”

“I believe you could, Sir Everard.”

“I am no knight, Sir Lyndon, no need to address me as such.”

“You are more a knight than any knight I’ve ever known. Kneel,” Sir Lyndon said as he drew his sword.

Beon again took a step back as his hand flew to the hilt of his own blade. “Cautious as ever, I see. I taught you well. Beon, your training is complete. Now kneel, you arrogant git, before I change my mind,” Sir Lyndon continued.

Beon could see a grin on the man’s face below his hood. If this was a dream, Beon figured he might as well play along, and he knelt down on one knee. Sir Lyndon touched the tip of his sword to Beon’s right shoulder, and then his left. “Do you, Beon Everard, pledge your life to the code of honor and discipline of knighthood?”

“I do,” Beon answered solemnly. He couldn’t believe this was happening and yet, it seemed only right that Sir Lyndon would be the one to knight him, however unofficial it may be.

“Rise, Sir Everard, and welcome to the brotherhood of knights.”

“This is exceedingly strange,” Beon remarked.

“No stranger than my next proposal.”

“And what is that?”

“Let me bite you.”

Beon laughed out loud.

“It is the only way to insure we get our women safely away from this place,” Sir Lyndon continued.

“You can’t be serious.”

“Deadly.”

“I would never... I mean how could you think that I would? Whatever you are, or think you are, you’re still bound by honor to God and country, as am I. Our debt is to humanity. That is where our responsibility lies...as knights and as men.”

“I couldn’t agree more. Beon, just imagine what we could do together. We could create our own order of knights...immortal knights, fighting against the rise of cursed magic and the harm it would do humans. There is an entire magical world beyond the one that mortals can see, Beon. A world filled with powerful and terrible creatures that I have only begun to learn about. The great mortality seems to have brought this world to prevalence. We could save countless lives.”

“But how do you know you won’t abuse such power? How do you know I wouldn’t?”

“Would you?”

“No, I bloody well wouldn’t!”

“I know. And neither will I. The curse doesn’t seem to change one’s true nature.”

Beon was thunderstruck. His head was spinning and his world upside down. “I... I need time...” he said.

“You don’t have much. What is your plan of escape? And I must ask. How is Eva?” Sir Lyndon asked with a smile.

“She mourns for you terribly. Good heavens, she’ll be happy to see you. Wait a minute...how do we explain this?”

“Very carefully. First, tell me your plan.”

Beon took a breath and began, “Sophia must request proxies for the ceremony. She will cite the fear of kidnapping by monsters along the roads in search of blood...no offense.”

“None taken.”

“Once the multiple brides are assembled, Eva included, we will have the old nurse deliver a veiled proxy to Lord Gall while Sophia and Eva use the secret passageway from her mother’s chambers to hide until all the men have been dispatched to hunt them down...thus the rope from the north wall to make it look like they left from here.”

“All very clever, but how to get them out of the castle?”

“I will leave her a page’s clothing in the passageway...then she’d catch up with me and the search party dressed as a boy. We'd eventually splinter off from the group and go into hiding."

"Where?"

"Holy Island I think is safest."

Sir Lyndon nodded his approval. "Not bad, Beon."

"Thank you, Sir Lyndon."

"Please, you are to call me Seth from now on."

"All right...Seth. What do you think?"

"I think you forget your greatest asset."

"What's that?"

"Me."

Beon's eyes went wide. "How fast did you say you were?"

"Hop on my back, the way we used to train you in the lists." Beon climbed onto Seth, piggyback style.

"Ready?"

"I suddenly feel like a lad of ten summers once again."

"Feeling immature, are you?"

"I don't mean it like that."

"Feeling young and foolish again, then?"

"I don't mean it like that either."

"Are you quite finished blathering like an idiot?"

"Do you want me to be finished?" Beon said, jesting now.

"Do you wish to live to see tomorrow?"

"That would be ideal, I think."

"Then shut up and hold on tight."

Chapter 17

OVERWHELMED

So upset over her failure in challenging Father, Sophia couldn't go back to her chamber and face Eva yet. She needed some time alone to reconsider her options, if she even had any at all, that is.

Knowing Sir Lyndon's chamber would be empty, she took the secret passageways to the door, lifted the latch, and pushed it open.

Sophia was surprised to find a candle burning on the bedside table, and for a moment she feared she'd been wrong to think it remained abandoned. But as she took in the items within the chamber, she recognized them as Beon's belongings. Beon's armor and some of his books were stacked in the corner. There were a few wood-carvings on the table along with a quill, parchment and several more open books. Sophia felt her shoulders relax a little. While she was disappointed Beon was not in the room, she still found comfort being surrounded by his belongings. And since Father had never found out about his attempted kidnapping, she supposed she shouldn't be surprised to discover that he'd still remained so close even though she hadn't seen him. Clearly, he'd done as she'd asked in the letter and kept his distance.

Thinking he was the cleverest man she'd ever known, she went and sat on the mattress. Beon will know what to do, she told herself, and she believed it with all her heart. Beon might already have a plan. She would just wait for him, and they would figure it out together.

For the first time in a week, Sophia smiled as she tucked herself in beneath the blankets. She thought about the night Beon had taught her to 'fly.' How carefree life was then. Look at her now, no matter what happened today her life was going to change dramatically. She just wanted to fly away from it all like a bird in search of warm weather.

She reached into her pocket and clutched the little wooden carving that was now and always a comfort to her, like having her mother close by.

"Oh, mama, please guide me."

Sophia closed her eyes as tears of fear and exhaustion began to run down her cheeks. As self-doubts gathered in around her, she buried her face in Beon's pillow and began to cry...disappointed in herself for not being as strong as she wanted to be.

Beon's eyes were watering as the cold night air blew hard against his face. He clung to Seth's shoulders with all his might and still felt as if he'd be blown away by the wind given the sheer speed at which they were traveling. Beon was in utter disbelief.

They'd traveled several miles in a matter of moments, and as the north wall of Bamborough came back into view, Seth slowed down.

Suddenly, nearly scaring Beon out of his wits, Seth leaped up the castle wall as easily as if he were hopping over a fallen tree in the forest, and they landed as quiet as a fox on the parapet above. Beon immediately crouched and began looking around for the guards.

"They're sleeping," Seth said.

"How do you know?"

"I told you, I can hear every sound in this castle, including the guards snoring."

"Incredible. All of this is truly incredible."

"So, what do you say? Will you join me?"

"I still...I just don't know. I need more time. You're talking about changing who I am...forever."

"I'm talking about protecting Sophia and countless others from an incredible power that could be used for evil against them."

"I see that. It is an awesome power, this 'curse magic.' So much so that it could be the vilest temptation that Satan ever put forth on the earth. Perhaps I am meant to resist it as a man of honor and truth and light."

"Don't you see, that is precisely the reason why you would make a good vampire?"

"Ha, that is a contradiction in terms...good vampire."

"I don't believe that. I can't believe it."

"Come now, man, the curse is clearly born of evil and darkness...it is clearly born of the devil himself."

"No, it was born of a witch...or a sorceress rather. Actually, I'm not sure."

As Sir Lyndon told him a tale about a woman called Lilith and her siblings, Beon's head was once again reeling. Sir Lyndon, Seth, that is, his closest ally, practically a brother, was a blood-sucking vampire! He still could hardly believe he wasn't dreaming. Had he eaten something strange before going to bed?

Sir Lyndon continued to speak, and Beon found himself clutching at his hair in shock. Did Sophia know what he now knew? And if she did, what must she be coping with? Alone.

"What became of Lilith's siblings?"

"They have become very wealthy and powerful. Vampires have the unique advantage of having one foot in the world of men and one foot in the world of magic. This 'clan' is known as the family de Percy here in England. Sir Percy is Lilith's eldest brother, Pothos."

Beon shook his head. “I suspected you were going to say that. So we’re going up against the oldest and strongest wickedness the world has ever known. What became of Lilith? Perhaps she can help us if we side with her.”

“No one knows. Many battles have been won and lost between vampires and sorcerers in the magical world, and continue to this day. Other mythical creatures have joined the fray as well, Percy says...taken sides, as it were, over the years.”

“Other creatures? Like what, pray tell.”

“Werewolves, centaurs...fairies.”

“You’ve seen these things?”

“No, no, not at all. I’m still getting used to all this myself, but I tell you, there is a whole world of magic out there...and they are the ones with the real power.”

“I don’t think I’ll ever get used to this. But I’m damn well glad you’re on my side, I can tell you that.”

“From what I gather, up until now, there have been relatively few vampires. It seems the Percy’s were very greedy with their power and have only recently started to increase their numbers. I don’t know if it is a result of the Great Mortality or the cause, but the number of vampires is growing. Sir Percy is plotting a take over...he’s slowly amassing an army of warriors like myself. His ambition knows no bounds.”

“You say he’s been creating more vampires...he’s amassing an army...he’s joining houses with Gall...sounds like he’s got his eye on taking over the country.”

“Yes Indeed, and that’s just a step to taking over all of Europe. Seth stopped abruptly as if he heard something that caught his attention.

“What is it?” Beon whispered, thinking one of the guards must have awakened.

“It’s Sophia, you must go to her. She is in my old quarters. She must be looking for you. She’s crying.”

“What?” Beon said as he turned to go, but Seth stopped him.

“Beon, I will be close by. Please think about what I have proposed. We’ve no time to lose.”

“I will.”

“I may have a plan to get the ladies out. It must be after Sir Percy has left the premises, however, otherwise he will be able to sense my presence. Oh, and you must tell the ladies not to speak or even whisper to each other once the plan is in effect...he will be able to hear them. Once they’ve disappeared, it would be best if they hid in the underground cellar to conceal their heartbeats. Wait, what time is the ceremony to begin?”

“Midday.”

“Oh, the devil take it,” Seth said as he began to pace along the stone battlement, “We must wait until nightfall before making an escape, my powers are greatly diminished during the day. My heart resumes its beating, and I am more or less human again.”

“This is madness! How are they supposed to remain hidden from a man with supernatural powers the entire afternoon until—hold on, that means Sir Percy is weakened as well, yes?”

“Yes. Yes, of course.”

“So once the ladies are discovered missing, and we all go in search of them, why don’t we find the right moment to kill this devil.”

“Since I’m still discovering what I can and cannot do, I don’t fully understand his capabilities either. Or his weaknesses. I honestly don’t know if he can be killed yet. He thinks I’m out hunting right now. When he discovers I have disappeared in the morning, he will become highly suspicious and even more alert.”

“Even though his powers are diminished during the day? But how?”

“Our senses are still more heightened than mortals, even during the day.”

“All right, so if the ladies keep quiet and make their way to the cellar, you believe they can stay hidden until nightfall.”

“Yes, I think that should work.”

“I could also leave them all of our old defenses against vampires for good measure.”

“It wouldn’t hurt. Until we know what works against them, I think it’s best to try everything.”

“All right then, we have our plan,” Beon said as he turned to leave.

“Do you think Eva will still...want to be with me?” Seth asked weakly.

Beon forced a smile. “What makes you think she’ll want to marry a dead person, old man?”

“Not dead,” Seth said defensively, “just not exactly living—oh, I don’t bloody well know, but I have to try. I love her.”

Beon nodded and put a hand on Seth’s shoulder before leaving.

Making his way back to Seth’s old quarters, the night’s events were still a whirl inside his head. Even though he was feeling overwhelmed with all of this new information, he set that aside to prepare himself for seeing Sophia again and attending to her needs before opening the door.

The chamber was cast in an orange glow from the last of the embers simmering in the hearth. Still, Beon could make out Sophia’s dark form on the bed. She had her back to the door and appeared to be sleeping.

He slowly walked over, in disbelief that the woman of his dreams could possibly be in his bed. When he leaned over and saw her angelic face, Beon was becoming more and more convinced the entire evening was a dream. How did Sophia know he was staying in this room? How could Seth have known she was here? Was Seth even real? Beon felt exhaustion wash over him at all the overwhelming and nonsensical thoughts. He wanted this to be real. He wanted Sir Lyndon to be alive, he wanted Sophia to be in his bed, he wanted to believe all this could be a reality, but there was no way. This was most definitely a dream. It was the only explanation that made any sense.

As the weight of a week of sleepless nights hit him squarely in the head, he decided to indulge the beautiful apparition before him and lay down beside Sophia. Cupping the curve of her warm body,

Beon put his arm around her. He was in heaven. Beon breathed in the scent of her hair, sea salt, and lavender. He remembered their ride in the night all those years ago and squeezed her to him tightly. Beon began to feel himself drift off into blissful oblivion when a soft voice said, “Beon?”

“Yes, my lady,” he answered sleepily.

She exhaled at his reply. “Oh, thank the heavens! I was afraid Sir Percy had found me here.”

Panicked by her possible meanings, he asked, “Does Sir Percy often hold you like this?”

“No, of course not. You’re just suffocating me with your heavy arm, so I feared you might be him.

I mean I hoped it was you. I mean, I just didn’t know for sure.”

“Are you having those pre-wedding jitters I keep hearing about?”

“Most definitely.” Beon detected a note of emotion in her voice, confirming that she had been crying as Sir Lyndon had said.

She was pretending to be strong, but he knew better. “What’s wrong?”

“What isn’t wrong?”

Chapter 18

MISPLACED LADY

Sophia must've fallen asleep crying, she thought, as she blinked her eyes open. When she suddenly became acutely aware of movement behind her, her eyes widened. She was lying on her side, facing the wall but she could tell that someone was there with her, in her bed. Was it Sir Percy, come to claim his prize? Was it actually her wedding night? Perhaps she'd blocked out the entire day's events...or was this another nightmare?

An arm came around her and squeezed. Holding her breath, she lay perfectly still. The man's arm was so strong and heavy Sophia began to feel trapped. When the person clutching her relaxed and his breathing became slow and steady, she decided to venture a peek.

Turning her head slightly, she looked over her shoulder. Reality came crashing back and Sophia remembered where she was.

"Beon?" she asked, needing to know for certain that it was him.

"Yes, my lady."

Exhaling in relief at the sound of Beon's voice, she felt the tension slip free of her body. "Oh, thank the heavens! I was afraid Sir Percy had found me here."

A long pause came before his next words. "Does Sir Percy often hold you like this?"

"No, of course not. You're just squishing me with your heavy arm and so I feared you were him and not you. I mean I hoped it was you. I mean, I just didn't know for sure."

"Are you having those pre-wedding jitters I keep hearing about?"

"Most definitely." Except it was far worse than he even knew.

"What's wrong?"

"What isn't wrong?" she asked, wondering if he could hear how upset she had been.

"Care to tell me about it?"

"Your arm is still making it difficult for me to breathe," Sophia said.

When he released her, Sophia sat up, and Beon slowly followed suit.

Drawing her knees to her chest, she wrapped her arms around her legs and rested her chin on top. "It's good to see you. Is it that obvious something is wrong?"

"It's good to see you too. And yes. Have things improved since Percy kidnapped you away from me?"

Things had only gotten worse. But just being near Beon made her feel safe again. Or safer, at least, and most of her panic receded. “Was it hard for you to listen to my advice and stay away?”

“Of course it was hard. Pure torture might be a better way of describing it. At first, I wasn’t going to stay away, but I’m not an idiot. I knew if I was to defeat Percy then I needed a better plan than just whisking you away in the middle of the night.”

“I’m sorry to sneak into your chamber... I just needed somewhere no one would find me.”

He frowned at her. “Has Percy harmed you in any way?”

“He’s only talked to me.”

“About what?”

“About his curse, which he doesn’t see as a curse at all.”

“He might be right.”

“What do you mean? How could you know anything about it?”

“Seth told me.”

Sophia looked at him and waited for him to explain, but when he didn’t, she asked, “And who is Seth?”

“Seth is Sir Lyndon. That’s his first name apparently,” he said with awe in his tone.

“You spoke to the ghost of Sir Lyndon? That’s almost more absurd than discovering Sir Percy is a vampire.”

“No, Sir Lyndon is alive and—”

Impulsively, Sophia slapped Beon soundly across the face. How could he not have told her this?

Beon blinked and rubbed at his cheek. “What was that for?”

“I’ve been grieving him...and watching Eva grieve him! Why did you keep this from me?”

Beon gaped at her and then said, “Wait a minute...slap me again.”

“You’re not making any sense at all.”

“Again, please.”

Growing annoyed, Sophia slapped him but good across his left cheek. “Satisfied?”

“Ow,” he said as he rubbed at the red handprint forming on his face.

Resisting a laugh, she asked, “Striking you actually made me feel better...is that strange?”

“A little,” Beon said, smiling. “At least I know that I’m not dreaming.”

Sophia stared at him while she tried to process the meaning of that. “We’ve been sitting here talking, and you thought you were dreaming?”

He shot a crooked smile her way. “You are here...in my bed, aren’t you? I just had to be sure it wasn’t a fantasy that only existed in my head...well, that and the fact that Sir Lyndon is alive. It’s all quite amazing. Especially since he is now a vampire.”

At that news, words failed her. When the silence stretched on, he asked, “You’re very quiet. Are you going to slap me again?”

“Should I?”

“Do I deserve it?”

“If you don’t explain yourself further, then yes.”

“Sir Percy turned Sir Lyndon into a vampire for an army he’s building. I mean, I suppose he also saved Sir Lyndon’s life. He really was dying. One bite from a vampire does it, I guess.” Beon studied her face and then asked, “You don’t seem as surprised by this as I thought you would be.”

“I am surprised that Sir Lyndon is still alive, but not about Sir Percy turning him into a vampire because he plans to do the same to me.”

“For his army?” Beon asked, sounding rather bewildered by it.

“No. As his bride.”

Anger made the muscles in his cheek flex.

“What are we to do? I don’t want to marry him...I’d rather die...”

“Please, don’t say things like that.”

She released her knees and turned to face him. Fighting a return of the tears, she took a breath, lifted her eyes to his, and admitted, “I went to Father, and he refuses to listen. I tried to be strong, but just ended up making him angrier than I’d ever seen him.”

Beon’s eyes went wide with alarm as she turned her face to the light. “Sophia! Who did this to you?” he asked, gently turning her chin with his fingers to examine the bruise.

“Father,” Sophia said, touching her cheek. She hadn’t realized it had left such a visible mark.

Beon’s face went a dark shade of red just before he slammed his fist down on the bed and the wood slats beneath them creaked under the strain as if they might snap. “I will challenge him. I will go to him and fight him to the death!”

Beon stood and made for the door but Sophia scrambled from the bed, captured his arm and pulled him back. When his face turned toward her, she kissed him.

For a moment, Beon was the only one in the world who existed. Every single worry and fear fled her mind for that blissful stretch of time.

When Sophia finally released Beon from the kiss, he said, “Let me avenge you.”

“I can’t allow you to challenge my father. I want to be with you, forever, not send you off on an errand that could get you killed. Now, what is your plan to get us out of here? You have a plan, don’t you?”

“I do. That’s all I’ve been thinking about.”

“Well, let’s hear it.”

Beon nodded and looked toward the closed door. He swallowed hard and then, practically whispering, said, “Sir Lyndon...Seth, please come to the door.”

Suddenly, a gust of wind caused the door to rattle. Once the wind calmed, the door rattled again with three slow knocks.

“Come in,” Beon said.

The door creaked open, and there, as large as an oak, stood Sir Lyndon.

Beon awoke to a loud ruckus in the dormitory hall. Soon after, a harsh pounding sounded on his chamber door. Lord Gall burst into the room with two of his guards. They scanned the room quickly.

Lord Gall was clearly furious about something. Beon's first thought was that someone had caught Sophia on her way back into the castle and she had confessed to being in his chamber. Beon momentarily felt like an idiot for not thinking of that strategy sooner. Had Sophia claimed to be 'ruined' by Beon, they would have been forced to wed. On second thought, however, Lord Gall was so desperate for money and the prestige of joining houses with the Percy clan he cared nothing for propriety. It's possible he still wouldn't have budged.

"Where is she?" he spat.

A flood of anger returned, his fingers curling into fists. Beon wanted nothing more than to punch the man in his arrogant face for striking Sophia.

"I've no idea, my lord," Beon answered, concerned for Sophia himself. Why did Lord Gall think she was missing? Had Percy taken her this time?

"You will rouse yourself and aid in the search immediately. If I find that you've had anything to do with this, you will be hanged."

Lord Gall left in bluster of clattering steel and curses. Beon quickly got dressed, wondering where on earth she could be. This wasn't part of the plan. She was to go directly back to her chamber, instruct Eva as to her role in the ruse, and then behave as if all were normal until just before the ceremony. Beon was starting to panic.

When he left the dormitory moments later, he could see the castle was abuzz with activity. Guests and guards alike were searching high and low, inside the tents set up for guests in both the inner and outer baileys, calling Sophia's name periodically. Beon stood frozen for a moment, wondering if he should grab his horse and search outside the castle, when a female voice shouted, "Over here, my lord, she's in the chapel! I found her, my lord!"

Beon dashed toward the chapel, along with many of the others who'd been searching. Please be all right, he silently prayed. As he arrived, Sophia was being led out of the chapel by a scullery maid, most likely the woman whom he had just heard shouting. Sophia looked both surprised and indignant. Lord Gall was upon her the moment he saw her.

"What do you mean by disappearing? We've had the entire village up after you!"

Sophia looked at him coldly and said, "I was praying for my salvation."

Lord Gall went to grab her by the arm, but she shook him off violently. Beon was rather proud of the stand she was taking, but he was also concerned this would lead to Lord Gall hitting her again. Beon felt his body tense as he mentally prepared to stop him if he did.

"You will return to your chambers immediately and prepare for the ceremony," Lord Gall seethed through gritted teeth.

“I demand proxy brides for my wedding. With rumors of monsters abroad, I fear for my safety.”

This statement brought whispers and grumblings amongst the crowd. It seemed they agreed with her sentiment. Lord Gall took in the audience gathered around them and acquiesced immediately.

“Then you shall have them. The bride must be safe on her wedding day.”

Beon was again impressed with how Sophia had comported herself. He considered it a stroke of brilliance to make her request a public announcement and force her father’s hand. “I hereby decree that all maidens in attendance at today’s festivities will be dressed in white and veiled.”

Sophia and her father made their way toward the great hall and into the main part of the castle as the rest of the people in attendance went about their business.

Beon had some preparations of his own to attend to. He felt emboldened by Sophia’s display of unwavering confidence and knew that she would execute her part of the plan without fear. Beon found himself highly attracted to this side of Sophia and smiled to himself as he headed back toward the stables to complete his morning tasks.

More guests arrived throughout the morning, but there were extra hands to help with the horses being brought in, so Beon took the opportunity to slip away and complete his preparations for the escape. Once back at the dormitory, he gathered up the stash of stakes, holy water, and crucifixes he and Sir Lyndon had used to hunt vampires, as well as some boy’s clothing left behind by the pages and squires who had not returned from the war. He stuffed them all into a sack and made his way across the bailey toward the kitchen to pick up strings of garlic.

“Master Everard. What a pleasant surprise.”

The cold recognition of the slithery voice sent chills up Beon’s spine. He turned to face Sir Percy and give a slight bow. “Good morning, my lord, and congratulations on your wedding day.”

“That’s very generous of you. I thank you, humbly. I do admire a man who can swallow his pride, but then I always knew you were a lad of substance, Master Everard.”

Beon’s cheeks flushed with anger as he managed to say, “You are most kind, Sir Percy, now if you will excuse me,” and he turned to leave.

“Before you go, I would like to present my sisters,” Sir Percy said, stopping him. As his teeth clamped together, he turned to face the blackguard once again.

The two women standing behind Sir Percy stepped forward, smiling. They had a sense of conceit about them and never broke eye contact with Beon as they curtsied. “Arianna and Irina de Percy.”

Beon bowed in turn. “It is an honor to meet you both,” he said, “but I thought you had four sisters, my lord. Where is the rest of your family?”

As soon as the words left Beon’s mouth, he inwardly kicked himself. Sir Percy’s ears pricked as the corners of his mouth turned up into a forced smile.

“Aren’t you the inquisitive one, Master Everard. How kind of you to ask after my kin. Our sisters have lived abroad these many years and are thus, unable to attend this blessed event.” There was an awkward moment of silence that hung between them before Sir Percy continued, “Are you traveling somewhere?”

Beon had completely forgotten about the sack he was carrying.

“Oh, no, I was told to clear out the dormitory to make more room for the servants of our guests.”

“Ah, yes, helpful to the last, aren’t we, Master Everard. I wonder if you can do one more thing for me. Call it a wedding gift.”

“I am at your service, my lord.”

“I’d like you to personally guard the front gate during the ceremony and subsequent festivities. I’m told my bride fears another kidnapping may be afoot.”

Percy smiled and Beon felt a wave of panic course through his entire body. Did Sir Percy already know of their plan? Had he discovered Seth was missing and captured him? Beon suddenly felt all alone, and now that Sir Percy intended to cut him off from the interior of the castle, he wouldn’t know if something went wrong.

“I will do everything I can to keep her safe, my lord,” Beon said, bowing his head in hopes of hiding his thoughts.

“Yes, you will, won’t you?”

Chapter 19

WITH THE DEVIL'S HELP

Sophia's heart was pounding furiously as she and Eva got dressed in their white gowns. They didn't speak a word but exchanged encouraging glances now and again. Sophia had decided not to go into the intricacies of Sir Lyndon's 'state' with Eva since time was so short. She simply told her that he was, in fact, alive, had survived, and made his way back for her. Eva had been overcome with tears of joy. Now, after hearing the scheme for their escape, she was as focused as Sophia in the task.

Handmaids and servants were bustling in and out of her Mother's old chamber, assisting the bride-to-be, as well as the number of other young women enlisted to be the bridal proxies. While Sophia had known that having multiple brides at a wedding was a fairly common safety precaution, especially amongst noble families, it hadn't struck her until after she'd left Beon's chamber how she could use it to her advantage. She might just be about to outsmart her father after all—and Sir Percy, too.

Aside from Eva, there was one more person Sophia had to entrust with her life in order for the escape to work, and that was Nurse. She was older now, but still spry...and still a loyal confidant to Sophia, like a kind and loving grandmother. Ever since Sophia's mother had died, Nurse was given charge of the household duties and overseeing the servants. Everyone in the castle referred to her as 'Madam Kemp,' but she would always be 'Nurse' to Sophia.

A beautiful woman entered the chamber whom Sophia had never seen before. She had inky black hair and striking green eyes. There was something familiar about her Sophia couldn't place. She strode right up to Sophia and greeted her with a smile.

"I regret we have never met until now, my dear. I am your aunt, your father's sister, Sabine."

"Oh, I'm very pleased to meet you," Sophia said with a curtsy.

"You are lovely, my dear...so much of your father in you, but without the hard edges," Sabine said with a wink. Sophia liked her aunt immediately. Sabine held out a parcel wrapped in linen and string. "I'll leave you now...but I wanted you to have this. I made it." With a wave, she was gone.

Sophia untied the string and opened the cloth. Inside was a beautiful bowl.

"Please put on your veils, ladies, let's see how everyone looks," Nurse commanded over the din in the room. Once all the girls had hidden their faces, the Nurse gave a nod of approval. "All right, I think we're ready. All those who are not in the wedding party, please clear the chamber."

That was their cue. Now that it was time, Sophia's palms became cold and sweaty, and her heart began to pound again. In the bustle of servants leaving the room, she and Eva ducked behind the dressing panel in the far corner. Nurse had all the brides line up two by two in front of the large wooden doorway. She placed the two who looked most like Sophia and Eva in color and stature at the very back of the line. With all the girls in front of her, facing out toward the hallway, Nurse glanced back toward the dressing panel and blew a kiss.

Sophia felt tears well up in her eyes. Nurse touched her hand to her heart and bowed her head as if to say goodbye. Then she turned away from Sophia and Eva, took a deep breath, and stood to wait for the heralds to announce the procession.

After a moment, two men dressed in the house colors appeared in the hall, stood on either side of the entryway, lifted their heralding trumpets, and began to play.

"And, forward at a pace, ladies," Nurse said.

The group began to move forward in time with the music. As they proceeded down the hall, the heralds walked alongside them, carrying the tune as they went.

Servants and onlookers filed in behind the procession until they all disappeared around the far corner in the direction of the chapel.

Thank goodness Eva was there, for Sophia might have remained paralyzed in that very spot for hours. She shook Sophia out of her trance and guided her to the armoire. They quickly stepped out of their gowns and tucked them inside a linen sack before grabbing a candle and slipping into the secret passage, wearing nothing but their undergarments.

The dark and narrow passageway was much colder with bare feet and little clothing. They hurried as quickly as they could in hopes of coming across the garments Beon had left behind sooner rather than later. Sophia had told Eva they couldn't speak a word, or even make a sound, for fear of spies. The slightest whisper and they might be detected. They were as silent as mice as they made their way through the dark and dusty passage.

While stationed at the front gate, just as Sir Percy had asked, Beon stopped the monk and his horse drawn cart as he approached. The wagon he toted was stocked with four barrels of wine for the festivities. The monk wore a rather large crucifix and a string of garlic around his neck. The wagon had quite a bit of garlic strewn about it as well.

Beon smiled at the hooded monk, and whispered, "Ho, Brother, you must be one of those vampire hunters I've heard about." The monk lifted his hood slightly to reveal a smirking Seth. "I thought vampires were repelled by garlic," Beon whispered.

"Aye, but only because of the putrid scent," Seth laughed.

“I don’t find this amusing. Will it protect the ladies or not?”

“I believe it will prevent Sir Percy and his sisters from detecting their scent.”

“You believe?”

“I hope.”

“You hope?”

“It’s a good repellent for humans and vampires alike. Let’s leave it at that, shall we? It can’t hurt to conceal the smell of human blood.”

“Well, that’s encouraging.” Beon sighed. He was going mad with worry, and this new information wasn’t helping.

“Look, I noticed I could smell nothing other than the garlic when in its presence. It should mask the lavender always lingering around Sophia. I’d wager she rolls in lavender. It’s lovely, indeed, but it makes her stand out.”

“Are—are you serious?”

“About which part?”

“The lavender!”

Seth chuckled. “Are you daft? You know I have an affinity for irony?”

When Beon just shook his head, Seth went on, “Other than being repelled by food in general, garlic itself seems harmless. I’m sure we’ll discover many inconsistencies between the reality of vampires and the folklore. Now you need to calm yourself, Sir Everard.”

Beon looked at Seth. He had never been called ‘Sir Everard’ before.

“Yes, yes. Thank you. You’re right.”

Seth put his hand on Beon’s shoulder and smiled kindly.

Beon was about to turn toward the guards at the gate and tell them to open it when a young page ran up to them.

Winded, the lad exclaimed, “He knows!”

“Be specific, boy, what happened?”

“Forgive me. When the bridal procession came to a stop before the altar, Sir Percy frowned and started whispering something to his sisters. They promptly rose from their seats, left the chapel, and then...” The lad paused to catch his breath again.

“And then?” ask Beon on bated breath.

“And then Sir Percy shouted, ‘you betrayed me, Gall! You!’ And he pointed at Gall as he said it!” the boy repeated, pointing to show them how. “And...oh! This part was scary. Sir Percy was hissing he was so angry. And then...” Again, the lad paused as his voice rose in pitch. “And then Sir Percy asked, ‘What have you done with her?’ I wasn’t sure at first, but then I thought he must be talking about the bride.”

“That’s right,” agreed Seth.

“Percy noticed as quickly as I imagined he would. Are you ready?” Seth asked Beon.

“I’m ready,” he said.

“I’m not finished, sir,” said the page.

“Forgive us. What else?” asked Seth.

“Then they called the prox...pro...p...”

“Proxy?” supplied Seth.

“That’s right, the proxy brides. They called them out into the corridor and then, Sir Percy...this part is scary too...he, Sir Percy I mean, demanded all the brides...all six of them...or were there eight? Anyway, he demanded they all take off their gowns!”

“I’m sorry, what?”

“The coverings,” said the page.

“Huh? Do you mean their veils?”

“Yes, those! He demanded they take them off.”

“Percy definitely knows then.”

“Without a doubt.”

“Am I done now?”

When Seth nodded, the page dashed off the way he’d come.

Fighting off a few chuckles at the boy’s innocence, Beon asked, “Was I that adorable when I was young?”

Seth laughed. “No, you were far too serious, I’m afraid. Still are.”

Beon shook his head and smiled as he turned to the guards and announced, “Wine for the wedding feast. Let the brother pass.”

As the gate lifted, Beon’s thoughts returned to Sophia and he swallowed hard, hoping he’d put the items he left for the ladies in the right place...much time had passed since he’d traveled the passageways.

MELEE

Eva suddenly stopped, sucking in quick bursts of air through clenched teeth. Sophia looked back at her, questioning with her eyes. Eva turned up the sole of her foot to reveal a nasty splinter. Without hesitating, Sophia knelt down with the candle and plucked the thorny wood free. The wound started to bleed immediately, and Eva gasped. Sophia placed her hand over Eva's mouth.

Once Eva collected herself, she nodded sharply. Removing her hand, Sophia gave Eva the candle. Then she reached down and ripped off the hem of her shift and started wrapping Eva's foot with the material.

Biting her lip for fear they'd made too much noise already, Sophia took Eva by the hand, and continued on. When they came to the intersection where the clothes should be, they found nothing. Disheartened, Sophia decided to keep going straight a little farther, thinking Beon might not have known exactly which passage they were using.

As worry began to cause a lump to form in the back of her throat, she saw a sack at the next intersection.

"Finally, a stroke of luck," whispered Eva.

Sophia lifted a finger to her lips and watched the passageway from which they'd just come, sure she was about to see Sir Percy rematerialize as he had done in the cottage. However, it was still daylight, and she didn't think he could find them as easily as he had at night, but that didn't mean the man wasn't crafty enough to sort it out anyway.

In haste, they each put on a tunic, stockings, and boots, along with the belts stocked with silver stakes, and strings of garlic for their necks.

"I don't think I've ever seen you look so dangerous before," said Eva softly. "But why don't we have swords instead of stakes? This is highly unusual."

Sophia shot her a look for speaking again. "No time to explain."

The trumpets were still sounding when they finally reached the little door, and Sophia silently said a prayer of thanks to Nurse for taking her sweet time.

Wincing when the hinges squeaked rather loudly, Sophia peered out and listened, making sure the corridor was indeed empty. Again, taking Eva by the hand, they ducked out from behind the tapestry and ran down to the stairs leading to the cellar.

Finding a place to crouch behind some shelves, Sophia jumped reflexively when someone at the top of the stairs said, “Four barrels? But we only sent for two. Ah well, go ahead and leave two outside the kitchen and take the other two down the cellar, if you would, Brother.”

A moment later, a monk came down the stairs carrying a wine barrel and set it on the floor. The monk removed his hood, revealing the welcome sight of Sir Lyndon as he scanned the dark room.

Sophia let out a sigh of relief.

Eva squealed happily, burst from her hiding place, and ran to him, throwing herself into his arms. As Sir Lyndon took her face into his hands, Eva started weeping. “Oh, Sir Lyndon, it is so good to see you’re alive!”

“Shhh, my love...yes, all is well. It is wonderful to see you too.”

Witnessing the reunion had Sophia in tears as well. After wiping the moisture from her cheek, she froze when the trumpet playing ceased abruptly, and all fell silent.

Sir Lyndon indicated for Eva to quickly get in the barrel. Once she was tucked inside with a lid Sir Lyndon had cut holes into, he turned to head up the stairs.

Drawing his hood up, he paused, looked down at Sophia, and said, “Stay with Eva. I’ll fetch the other barrel.”

Upon returning with a second barrel, Sir Lyndon secured Sophia inside, and then began transporting them to the wagon.

Even though she felt a bit unsteady as the barrel rocked with Sir Lyndon’s movement, Sophia felt surprisingly safe inside. But she knew this sense of security would not last.

Once the sun had set later that day and Sir Percy regained all of his vampire powers, she had no doubts he would search for her. He could find them just as he had before and Sir Percy would not leave Beon alive a second time...

Pressing one hand against the side of the barrel as the movement forced her to rock forward, a sense of panic gripped her insides at the worries going through her mind. But reminded herself that Sir Lyndon was also a vampire and could better protect them this time.

“Brace yourself, my lady,” said Sir Lyndon, his voice muffled by the wood surrounding her. “I’m about to tip you onto the cart with the other barrels.”

As she rocked sideways, rolled a little, and then settled against another barrel with a soft thump, she heard Eva ask, “What was that?”

“Just the barrel with Sophia in it. Not to worry, my love,” Sir Lyndon responded.

“Oh! What a relief! I was sure we’d been discovered!”

With a chuckle, Sir Lyndon said, “You will be found if you don’t remain silent.”

“Oh dear, I keep forgetting. Please forgive me, Sir Lyndon.”

“Please, call me Seth.”

“That’s your Christian name then? Oh, ‘tis lovely—”

“My lady,” Seth said, cutting her off. “You must be quiet.”

“Yes. Sorry,” said Eva.

Sophia had forgotten to call him ‘Seth’ as well. For as long as she had remembered, he had been Sir Lyndon to her, so she assumed she might still forget.

Sophia shifted to get a bit more comfortable, knowing she might be inside this thing for a while, but when shouts rang out, tension returned to her body. Had they already been discovered?

The barrels bounced a little when Seth took his seat and got the cart moving. As they rocked and swayed toward the gate, she prayed they would get out before anyone guessed at their hiding place. “We’re almost—” began Seth.

Almost what? Sophia wanted to ask but knew it was best to stay quiet.

When the cart rocked again, as Seth disembarked, she held her breath to try and hear what was happening.

After a long pause, Seth said quietly, “Sit tight, ladies, I must dispatch this villain.” He chuckled and then said, “Only jesting. There’s just something blocking the way.”

Hearing his footsteps fade away, Sophia wasn’t sure if he was just saying that so as not to worry them. From what she could hear—that being the constant shouts and the sharp ping of blades connecting—there could very well be several villains to dispatch.

As time dragged on with the sounds of battle going on around them, Sophia began to feel smothered in such a confined space. She was getting to the point she wanted to claw her way out when the clash of steel drew closer. Mentally fighting to slow her breathing, she tried to calm herself, lest she give their hiding place away.

Sophia barely had time to brace against the sides of the barrel when something struck the cart, and the barrels shifted, bumping into each other.

Eva squeaked in surprised, and Sophia prayed she hadn’t been heard.

Suddenly, one barrel popped free of the cart, thumped to the ground, and all of the others followed.

Beon was still standing guard outside the main gate when men came running out of the castle. He assumed Lord Gall and Sir Percy were part of that melee, but it was hard to pick them out from his vantage point.

The clash of knights continued, and Beon was relieved to see them not paying any mind to the monk and his cart of wine barrels. He could hear Lord Gall barking orders to his men to find Sir Percy. Where had the man gone if they were searching for him? he wondered as he too began scanning the grounds.

He could see the cart down near the kitchens. It appeared to be about full now, so he would wager that Sophia and Eva were tucked safely inside two of them by now.

The castle grounds were alive with combat, but from what he could tell, their plan was moving along without incident. The fact that Sir Percy wasn't accounted for did pose a problem, however, so Beon continued looking for the man.

Beon was completely taken off guard when he caught movement from the corner of his eye and realized a man was running toward him, sword raised. Quickly realizing he'd just found Sir Percy, or rather, Sir Percy had found him, Beon drew his own blade and braced for the attack.

"Where is she?" growled Sir Percy, his blade cracking sharply against Beon's as he defended himself.

"Have you lost track of one of your sisters?" Beon asked, playing dumb.

Sir Percy narrowed his eyes in anger and attacked with more vigor. The man's strength was so astounding Beon feared he might not be up to the task. He'd known Percy would be unstoppable at night, but he hadn't expected daylight to be a challenge as well.

"At first, I'd only thought you two had dallied. I'm beginning to think it was much more than that." Percy said striking with such force that Beon fell to one knee.

"I beg your pardon. What are you insinuating?"

"She'll still be mine," Percy said as he thrust forward again.

Beon ducked and rolled. Once he came to rights, he countered with a wide sweep of his blade. "Sophia will have what she wants," Beon said, "and she does not want you."

Sir Percy easily dodged Beon's sword and came down like thunder overhead once more. "You won't be able to escape me again."

"I know what you are," said Beon, acknowledging mentally that it was a bold move to call the man out, but he did it anyway.

"Do you now?" asked Sir Percy, appearing unfazed.

"I'll find a way to stop you."

Sir Percy came at him again, but with such force this time, Beon's sword was wrenched from his grip and he felt the tip of his opponent's blade prick his chest. "Not only are you young and foolish, but you're too arrogant to live."

"He's there!" Beon heard a man shout from the battlements above him.

When Sir Percy saw the mass of Gall's knights headed their way, he said, "As night falls, you'll wish you hadn't challenged me, Everard."

After watching Sir Percy disappear into the trees, Beon turned his eyes back toward Seth. The knight had started toward the gate with the horse and cart but had to pause when a group of battling knights got in his way. Redirecting the horse off of the path to get around them, Seth began working his way closer, but then stopped again to clear something out of the way.

The shouts of women drew Beon's eyes to the left. Recognizing the two females fighting against men in Bamborough colors as Percy's sisters, Beon felt regret that Gall did not know he was dealing with vampires. His men—on Gall's order he was sure—were busy trying to capture the sisters. Either the man didn't know the truth or Lord Gall was an arrogant fool. Sir Percy had just threatened Beon's life for challenging him in regards to Sophia, so this affront would certainly get Lord Gall killed. Guilt pricked at Beon's conscience for failing to do the honorable thing and alert Lord Gall to the true nature of his future son-in-law. Not that he would have listened.

With Seth on his side, Beon felt empowered. Of course, if he became a vampire too, that clash of swords would have gone quite differently. He could admit that the idea intrigued him.

Arianna and Irina displayed the same level of strength as Percy. To most it wouldn't have been obvious the sisters were immortal magical beings, even now, as they fought fiercely against men twice their size, they mostly seemed spry and clever, but Beon suspected the men had little hope of actually capturing them.

Irina finally shoved one of the knights away from her. Stumbling backward, he bumped into another cart loaded with hay. With just enough of a slope to gain momentum, the hay cart careened toward Seth's cart of wine barrels. When it struck the cart's wheel, the strap holding the wine in place broke, and all of the barrels tumbled to the ground.

Fearing Sophia and Eva might be injured, Beon started for the barrels, but he stopped when Seth signaled him to halt. Realizing if he rushed to check on Sophia and Eva their hiding place would be revealed, so he took a breath to calm himself. Trusting Seth to take care of the ladies, Beon watched in awe as Arianna and Irina dashed up the steps to the north wall and were gone before anyone could catch up with them.

BY LIGHT OF CANDLES

Beon clenched his jaw as he watched Seth inch his way through the sea of men with his horse and cart. It was taking so long, he noted the knights who had gone after Sir Percy return from the hunt empty handed and he wasn't surprised in the least.

He was learning that only an order of vampire knights like Seth could have accomplished the task. This thought brought Seth's offer to mind yet again. Seth truly did need more knights on his side to successfully fight against these powerful beings. Vampires had an unfair advantage. But was he ready to become a vampire too? Beon still wasn't sure.

"We march for Alnwick post haste. Ready yourselves for battle!" Lord Gall barked, "He's on foot for now, but could easily acquire a horse along the way. With any luck, we'll beat him there and launch a surprise attack."

"No chance of that." Beon turned his head to find Seth beside him atop his cart.

"No chance of what?" Beon asked.

"They'll make it to Alnwick before Sir Percy."

"Right," Beon said, still feeling shaken by his encounter with Percy and numb from his fear of this plan working. And although it would seem the extraordinary turn of events had worked in their favor, it had done nothing to ease his tension.

They were completely alone at the gate now. Seth handed him a monk's habit, and he ducked behind the wall to throw it on. After taking the seat next to Seth in the cart, they rode off, turning north on the main road.

"No one pays any mind to two monks, do they?" Beon asked.

"Not in my experience," answered Seth.

"Is it something you have a lot of experience with, then?" Beon asked, teasing now.

"Indeed. I'm an expert on such matters."

"Are you now?"

"Can we get out yet? I'm developing a cramp," asked Eva.

"We haven't traveled far enough to be safe, my lady. I'm sorry," answered Seth, his eyes searching the forest around them.

Beon thought he'd heard Eva sigh, but the sound was muffled by the wood. And Sophia's silence troubled him after witnessing that tumble the barrels had taken. From the corner of his mouth, he asked in a whisper, “Do you think they’re both all right?”

Seth nodded, and Beon exhaled in relief.

Silence sat between as he began to process all that had happened.

Seth interrupted his thoughts by saying grimly, “I see no other way but for you to turn. Percy will come for our women and for us.”

“I know,” Beon said.

“It is a strange feeling to be riding in the opposite direction of the battle. Seems to go against my nature,” Seth said.

They’d been traveling for a while, and Beon kept imagining what it must be like for the ladies inside the barrels. “Do you think it’s safe to set them free now?”

Seth glanced toward the sun that still rested in the sky. It was sinking toward the horizon, however, and both knew their situation would change as the sunlight diminished. “I do.”

Beon turned and stepped back into the cart. “As you were saying, I believe our fight is here now, with the women we love. Our duty is to them. We need to leave this other life behind and start anew.”

After taking his dagger from its sheath, Beon pried the first barrel open and then the other.

Reaching a hand out for each of the ladies, he hoisted them out of the barrels. Having completely forgotten they were dressed as boys, Beon was shocked at the sight of them.

Eva thanked Beon earnestly and then joined Seth up front. Still holding Sophia by the hand, they looked at each other with weary smiles as they knelt in the back of the cart.

“Bumpy ride?” he asked her.

She laughed. “Bumpy is one way of describing it.”

“Is there another?”

“Bruising,” she grumbled as she rubbed at her knees.

“And harrowing?” he offered.

“That too,” she agreed.

“Just watching was harrowing for me, I must confess.”

“I survived it, I guess.” With a heavy sigh, Sophia looped her arms around his middle and rested her head on his shoulder.

Wrapping her into his embrace, he dropped his chin against her hair and watched as the sun began to set.

Beon had thought long and hard about where they should hide. He had desperately wanted to return to Brentworth, but bringing his mother into this mess was out of the question. She had suffered enough. Besides, Newcastle was south, just like Alnwick and they did not want to be traveling the same direction as Gall. Holy Island seemed the only choice. It was certainly remote. They could take sanctuary there for as long as needed. Hopefully, the brothers and sisters wouldn’t mind, or notice, a vampire or two amongst them...for Beon had in fact decided Seth was right. He must turn so he could join this fight.

They stopped in Middleton along the way, at the tiny village of Elwick. After arranging for two rooms, the ladies went to change, enjoy a hot supper, and rest.

As Seth cared for the horse, freeing the beast from the cart, Beon watched the sun sink closer to the horizon, and he worried he'd again find Sophia gone in the morning. The fear prompted a question, "Sir Percy won't find us tonight, will he?"

Shaking his head, Seth said, "Did you forget about the garlic hung all over the cart?"

"I did forget about that."

"How could you forget with that stench?"

"You still have faith in...something so, well, so simple?"

"You've lost faith?"

"You make it sound like I've lost faith in God. Are we still talking about garlic and its vampire repelling properties, because I thought we already established that it wouldn't work?"

"I was. And I said it might."

"You're doing that 'irony' thing on me again, aren't you?" Beon said as he rolled his eyes.

"You make it far too easy."

Beon shook his head and sighed, feeling exhaustion set in.

"And entertaining," added Seth with a chuckle as he turned and started back towards the inn. "And no, I think Sir Percy will have his hands full protecting his land from Gall's 'surprise' attack. As for the garlic, I believe it did aid in masking the ladies' scent during our escape."

Once they got settled into their rooms, Beon took one look at the bed and had to lay down for a moment or two. He must have dozed off instantly because he awoke to Seth nudging him in a most annoying way and saying, "Wake up, I've got a surprise for you."

"A surprise?" Beon asked sleepily. "Is it morning?"

"No, you've only been asleep for a quarter of an hour."

"I don't understand."

"You don't need to understand. Now stop dallying and get changed. You can't come dressed as a monk."

"I can't?" he asked, blinking in confusion. "Where are we going?"

"Well, I suppose you could come as you are, but it would cause quite a stir, and you'll look silly whilst standing next to me in my fine tunic." Seth grinned broadly and ran his hands over the emerald green tunic he was wearing.

"I fear I didn't pack for a special occasion. And how could my being dressed as a monk cause a stir?"

Pointing, Seth ignored his question and said, "Put that on."

Upon the bed lay a blue tunic and a pair of black trousers. "Where did you get those?"

"Where else does one get clothing?"

Beon rubbed the sleep from his eyes while he frowned up at the man. “Is it your aim to vex me with confusion?”

“Yes, that is my goal.”

“What?” Beon asked in surprise.

“Get changed, posthaste...and do something about that pile of straw on your head that you call hair.”

Once Beon was dressed, and he’d tamed his hair, Seth patted him on the back and remarked, “Rather astounding where one finds himself from day to day, wouldn’t you agree, Sir Everard?”

“Yes indeed,” Beon said, still completely bewildered by Seth’s odd behavior.

“Come with me to church.”

“To pray?”

Seth marched out of the room without another word so Beon had no choice but to follow.

Once they stepped inside the sanctuary, Beon was greeted by the most beautiful sight he’d ever seen. Standing before him with stained glass windows, lit candles, and almost as many flowers as a May Day celebration for a backdrop was Sophia, dressed in a white wedding gown, her sable tresses plaited with little white flowers tucked in between the sectioned strands. Beon drank in the sight of her. She was mythical in his mind and he was indeed glad he wasn’t dressed as a monk any longer.

It was impossible for Beon not to match Sophia’s smile as he went to her. Instinctively, he knelt down before the woman he’d dreamed of making his bride and took her hand into his, pressing a kiss to her fingers before looking up at her.

“Rise, Sir Knight, and claim your bride,” Sophia said.

“How I have prayed this day would come. I can scarcely believe it. I...haven’t even asked for your hand...forgive me...will you marry me, my lady...will you marry me a thousand times over?”

“I will,” Sophia said and touched his cheek.

Seth cleared his throat, and Beon turned to see that a priest was waiting at the end of the aisle. So enchanted by Sophia as he was, Beon hadn’t noticed anyone else was in the room.

He noticed Eva who was also dressed in a white wedding gown, her hair styled similarly to Sophia’s.

“Shall we?” Seth asked.

Beon nodded, and the two couples proceeded to walk, side by side, toward the altar. Surreal and rather unexpected, Beon found it made the occasion all the more special.

There, as the sun’s last beams were devoured in the west and spilled in through the windows of the small church, Beon and Sophia were married.

Beon could hear the fear in her voice.

“This will be different than the cottage. We have Seth with us. And we’re smothered in garlic, remember?”

“What if that didn’t work?”

“Seth is convinced it did.” Drawing her into his embrace, he cradled her head to his shoulder and stroked her hair. “I trust the man with my life, and with yours.”

“Percy is much older. What if he knows how to elude a new vampire like Seth?”

It was possible, Beon thought. But she needed to get her mind off of these nightmarish thoughts. Glancing toward the door adjoining their rooms where he knew Seth would be on high alert for any danger, Beon let dread and doubt slide free of his mind. This was their wedding night, and he was keen to focus on what mattered now, in this moment. Making Sophia his wife was what he’d wished for these long years and now it was a reality. Loving her completely, as only a husband can, and kissing her with the intensity he felt in his heart was what he’d dreamed about during their time apart. But now, finally, the fantasy had become life. No more waiting.

“And what if—?”

“Where should I start, do you think?” Beon said abruptly so she couldn’t continue voicing her worries. “Shall I first strip this gown from your body or should I pluck these lovely flowers from your hair?”

Speechless now, she blinked up at him with those pretty blue eyes of hers.

Smiling, Beon pulled one of the primrose flowers from her hair and took in the fragrance before dropping it to the floor, then reached for another. He bent forward to kiss her while he continued blindly unraveling the plaits in her hair, uncaring of where the flowers fell.

He felt her fingers grasp onto his tunic and he smiled against her lips, knowing she was already distracted by the feelings stirring her blood rather than thoughts weighing on her mind.

Drawing away, Beon watched as auburn tresses dropped down around her shoulders, the red strands catching the flickering glow of candles lighting the chamber and the fire warming it.

Beon motioned for her to turn around and said, “I think I should start on those laces next, don’t you agree?”

“No,” she said with half a smile touching her lips.

“No?” he asked. What? She couldn’t be talking about consummating, could she?

Sophia giggled and reached for the hem of his tunic. “You first.”

Raising his arms as she drew the material up over his head, he said, “You just might be as good at dry humor as Seth.”

“Am I?” she asked so seductively, he found himself quite intrigued.

His breath hitched when she boldly reached for the drawstring of his trousers and Beon decided he was more than intrigued by this side of her, he was utterly spellbound. To him, she was as enchanting as any siren, so magical and mythical it was hard to believe she was real...and finally his.

Once he was nude, he noticed a flicker of uncertainty on her face and her cheeks bloomed with color at the sight of him, proving her purity and innocence.

“Now, may I start on the laces of your gown?” he asked. If she said no again, he would shamelessly beg.

Smiling and biting her bottom lip, she promptly turned away from him. Reaching up, Sophia dragged her hair over her shoulder to uncover the lacing.

Unable to stop himself, Beon ran the backs of his fingers down her neck before he started tugging the laces free. He smiled when a faint shudder worked its way over her body at his touch.

Piece by piece, Beon freed her of every garment she’d been wearing until it all lay in a pile beside the flowers on the floor.

A bit more bashful than before, Sophia didn’t turn to face him right away. Taking her by the hand, he said, “Let’s get under the covers before we catch a chill, shall we?”

Even as he spoke, he saw goose pimples spring up over every inch of her skin. Drawing her towards the bed, she finally turned to face him. Beon caught his breath again and couldn’t help the smile on his face, which he was sure had to be ridiculously enamored.

Without speaking another word, they snuggled in beneath the covers, and Beon savored the way they matched each other with the ardor of each kiss and caress they shared.

Sated and more tired than he’d expected to be, Beon held Sophia close, realizing he loved her so much he would be lost without her. No, he thought, changing his mind. ‘Lost’ wasn’t strong enough. He’d be devastated.

With Sir Percy still out there, Beon found he wasn’t able to hold onto the blissful feeling of peace he’d found lying with Sophia on their wedding night. She could be taken away from him far too easily unless he took Seth’s offer to create this new order of vampire knights. The risk was too great not to become a vampire.

“Can we leave the candles lit?” she asked snuggling closer to his side.

Beon knew they’d almost burned to the bottom and would be going out soon. Hoping the dwindling fire would be enough illumination to make her feel safe, he said, “Of course we can.”

“I can’t get the image of Sir Percy rising from the shadows to steal me away out of my head.”

“I can only imagine how terrifying that must have been. Sing something for me, my little songbird. Singing always makes you feel better.”

Beon could feel her smile but she remained silent, so he added, “And remember, we have Seth now.”

“A demon to protect us from a demon,” she said.

“I can’t think of Seth that way.”

“It certainly doesn’t fit the Sir Lyndon of our youth, does it?”

After pausing, Beon finally made himself ask, “What if I were to make the same change by choice?”

A MYTHICAL ROMANCE BEGINS

Waking the next morning within the circle of Beon's arms was a welcome change to the grim routine that had become Sophia's day-to-day existence. With him, Sophia felt lighter and happier than she ever had. Life had seemed so uncertain and bleak just a day earlier, she was almost afraid to believe this could truly be her new reality.

By the grim look on Beon's face, Sophia could tell he had something heavy weighing on his mind. She rolled to face him and asked, "Care to tell me what has you frowning after such a wonderful night?"

"We should prepare to leave. We're traveling on to a secret castle Seth purchased as he made plans to separate himself from Sir Percy."

Somehow Sophia didn't think their travel plan, secret or not, was the thing drawing his eyebrows together. She rose to one elbow and scooted closer, so she was looking down at him, her hair draping over his shoulder. "Since we made it through the night without Sir Percy interrupting our much-needed rest, my mood is much lighter."

This brought a smile to his mouth, and she was reminded of all the passionate ways he'd kissed her last eve, her cheeks heating as the memories washed over her.

Perhaps thinking about the same thing, Beon traced a finger along her jaw before drawing her closer for a kiss that caused her entire body to heat up.

Pulling away, he looked into her eyes and said, "I confess that my spirits are higher too, but we still have some serious decisions to make."

Sophia knew exactly what he was talking about—becoming a vampire wasn't something she wanted to talk about. Not last night, not now.

When she said nothing, Beon pressed a kiss to her forehead, rose from the bed, got dressed, and started packing up their things.

They'd only been able to obtain a second horse, so as they traveled, Sophia rode with Beon while Eva rode with Seth.

Seth had been making his case for the three of them to ‘turn’ since they left the inn, and Sophia was beginning to dread the conversation to come because she hadn’t decided what she wanted yet. While the idea of feeling safe from Sir Percy was appealing, the thought of drinking blood was not. She just wasn’t sure if she was willing to make such a big sacrifice, especially since many things about this curse remained unknown to them.

“I don’t think there’s any other way, my love,” Beon finally said after the group had been silent for some time.

Tears immediately stung the back of her eyes, because she felt like she hadn’t had enough time to ponder it thoroughly. Fighting them back before they spilled down her cheeks, she nodded her head and sighed heavily. “I know... In light of all we’ve learned the past two days...but I just.”

“Yes, there’s a world of cursed beings out there that mean us harm. It is my duty as a knight and as a husband, to protect you. And the thought of spending immortality with you by my side—well, I can’t imagine a more blissful life.”

“I’m not ready...I can’t...I mean, just not yet.” Of course, the idea of being with him for eternity appealed to her, which is why she was so confused about it all.

Beon looked at her with concern. “I understand you’re frightened, but this is for your protection—well, for our protection.”

“Please don’t make me, Beon. Not until I’m ready!”

“All right, all right, my love...not until you’re ready.”

“I will wait as well,” Eva interjected.

“Eva,” Seth said with surprise.

“I must stand with Sophia in this. She and I will turn when she is ready.”

Seth cast his eyes heavenward, sighed, and then mumbled to himself, “Agree and compliment. Agree and compliment.” After pausing for a beat or two, he finally added, “Beon, I find we have ladies who are not only lovely but wise beyond their years and therefore unwilling to make a hasty decision, even on matters as pressing as this.”

Catching on to the reference of Seth’s advice when wooing a lady, Beon nodded and said, “Indeed, so it will be.”

Sophia did not miss the fact that while the men were allowing the ladies to wait, it did not mean Beon would wait with them. She knew Beon was moving ahead with this plan. “When will you...do it? When will you make the turn?”

Beon considered her tenderly before saying, “Tonight.”

Sophia couldn’t stop the flood of tears that burst forth, and her shoulders slumped.

She felt Beon lean forward and press a kiss to the back of her head as she sat before him on the horse, his breath heating her skin beneath. “Come now...it’s not as if I’m dying. Well, not really.”

“Perhaps we should have a little funeral,” Seth said, obviously trying to lighten the mood with a little humor, but it only made Sophia cry harder.

“Sophia, I assure you, I can detect very little difference in Seth. He’s still spouting as much silly nonsense as he was before.”

Seth gaped in surprise for a moment, and then he burst out laughing. “Well done, my love, you’re a quick study in the art of irony.”

Eva let her signature high pitched laughter and Sophia couldn’t help but smile a little. While Seth’s jest had only made Sophia weep more, Eva’s finally drew giggles out of her.

“Yes, you see there? The biggest adjustment Beon will have to make is properly managing his unusual strength,” said Seth.

Sophia felt a mixture of excitement and fear as Seth’s castle came into view. It was massive with tall turrets at every corner. The dark color of the stone and the gothic details embellishing the structure made it look menacing, and Sophia imagined it might be the perfect place for a secret order of vampire knights to operate from. The cloud-strewn sky overhead reflected on the water of the inlet it overlooked, and while she would miss the sea at Bamborough, she decided this would do well enough.

“Welcome to Vyndon Castle,” said Seth proudly as he led them inside. “Once we have enough men in our garrison, this place will be lively indeed.”

““Vyndon?”” asked Beon.

“I thought it best if I renamed it, don’t you agree?”

“Sure, but why Vyndon?”

“Isn’t it obvious?”

A moment of silence had passed before Beon said, “V for vampire and the rest for Lyndon, is that right?”

“Do you have a better idea?” Seth asked, frowning at Beon’s tone.

After passing his gaze over the cavernous great hall, Beon shrugged his shoulders and said, “Works for me.”

“Great!” Seth clapped his hands. “As the daylight is waning quickly, I think it best if we prepare your last supper.”

“I’m sorry, ‘last supper’ did you say? What do you mean by that?” asked Beon.

“Well...I must confess that I left out one drawback to this curse.”

“Another drawback besides the fact that it’s a curse?” Sophia asked.

“And that detail is?” asked Beon a bit nervously.

“You will no longer be able to taste food.”

Sophia watched Beon’s Adam’s apple bob as he swallowed.

Silence settled around them before Beon squared his shoulders and announced, “Anything to keep Sophia safe.”

“Are there other ‘drawbacks’ to this curse you’ve neglected to tell us?” Eva asked. “I do fancy a good custard tart or a lovely elderflower fritelle. You know the one, it's dripping with so much honey it seems as though your fingers are sticky for a week. Just the thought of not being able to taste those only renews my decision to wait a bit."

"Other drawbacks?" Seth held onto his chin in a thoughtful pose. "To be perfectly honest, I'm not exactly sure."

The silence stretched on longer this time, but again, Beon notched his chin a bit higher and said firmly, "The two of us together could better combat Percy and his sisters. I cannot leave you alone in this."

Knowing by the determination in his voice that Beon would not change his mind, Sophia said, "As there are no servants yet, I will prepare your last meal."

This drew a smile to his face, and he looked at her with devotion. "Truly, I am grateful to have you."

Turning to Eva, Sophia asked, "Do you know how to make fritelles?"

"I do, but a recipe would be helpful."

"I stocked the larder in preparation for our arrival," said Seth.

"Shall we see what there is for us to make a fine supper then?" Sophia asked Eva.

"I would be happy to help."

Upon entering the kitchens, Sophia immediately noticed a book that she assumed would contain recipes. Pulling it down from the shelf, she opened it and found directions for making fritelles as well as oatcakes, crispels, fish pies, pike in brase, rye bread, leek soup, and spiced cabbage.

As Sophia listed off the ingredients, Eva gathered them together and set them on the big cutting board in the center of the kitchen. "Oh, just looking at all these items makes me so hungry I could eat a mangy horse, and then go back for the knight."

Laughing, Sophia said, "Oh my, you are hungry! I hope you can hold out until this feast is prepared as we only have two horses at the moment."

Sophia checked the recipes again and then went out into the garden to see which herbs were available for the fritelles, hoping to find either elderflower or clary.

Still exploring her new home, Sophia took it all in as she made her way to the kitchen garden. Planted geometrically was just about every plant she'd seen at the Priory and more. Unable to resist them, Sophia plucked a few gooseberries.

Just as she spotted the elderflowers, she heard Beon say, "This seems like a fine garden for us to walk hand in hand whilst we begin our new life together as vampire and mortal, wouldn't you say?"

Turning to face him, she laughed and asked, "Couldn't you have said man and wife instead?"

Beon shrugged his shoulders. "I see a perfect boxwood to sculpt into a bird that would delight my little dove."

He considered the sky as the colors of sunset had only just begun rising from the west. "Once we've had supper, Seth plans to make the turn..."

Sophia had plucked a few elderflowers but paused in her task at his words. “Don’t do it, please, Beon.”

“I know it’s difficult to understand. All that’s happened is so unbelievable...but listen to me when I tell you that nowhere is safe any longer. We must protect ourselves from the evil that surrounds us. That is the duty of a knight. A knight adapts and uses all the tools at his disposal to protect what he holds dear...and you, Lady Everard, are what I hold dear. I am bound by life and blood to do all in my power to safeguard you, those we love and this country. I have no choice but to take up the sword against evil. I have no choice but to follow this dark path and do my best to shed light upon it and cast out the demons that would destroy us.”

“By becoming a demon yourself?”

“What choice do I have?”

He didn’t have a choice. Her conversations with Sir Percy had been enough for her to know that. “I can’t tell you how relieved I am that I didn’t have to marry Sir Percy.”

“I find I’m equally relieved.”

She looked up into Beon’s eyes with such love brimming over in her heart she thought it might burst. Beon had grown to become every bit the man Sophia knew he would be. Sophia dropped everything she was holding and slung her arms around his neck, kissing him with more hunger than she’d ever had for food. He reciprocated with such passion that whatever fears and doubts still lingered faded like the waning sunlight.

“Come,” he said, pulling away from her.

Gathering up the items she needed for supper, Sophia followed Beon inside.

Seated at the long table in the great hall, it did seem rather sparse with only the four of them there, and Beon tried to imagine it filled with vampire knights. The last rays of sunlight spilled in from the narrow windows running along the west wall. The space was clean and furnished, but it still seemed empty. Even the fire they had built within the great hearth seemed lacking in some way.

Beon knew he needed to help Seth build this order of knights they’d been discussing. Within the depths of his soul, he knew it was part of his purpose in life to do this. To save as many people as they could from vampires like Sir Percy.

And it was somewhat uncomfortable to consume a meal with Seth in attendance when he basically just watched them eat with a bit of envy written within his expression. Beon knew he too would soon be in the same position, and as he bit into the rather delectable crispel, he couldn’t help but reconsider his decision.

Knowing it might not be wise of him, mainly because it could weaken his resolve, Beon asked, “Is food truly flavorless?”

“Yes,” said Seth, shuddering at the thought of it.

“I can’t even imagine that.”

“The textures are all you feel since the taste is gone.” Seth shuddered again.

“And that’s a problem?”

“Well, soup is just wet. Meat is slimy, and pastries are... I honestly don’t know how to explain it.”

Feeling quite satisfied with his last meal, Beon leaned back in his chair and stared at his empty trencher. On second thought, perhaps it had been a mistake to indulge in a last meal because it could make him miss food more. But no matter how he circled the problem facing them, this threat, he could find no other solution. Seth interrupted his thoughts by saying, “Ho there. Are you still with me? It seems as though you’ve gotten lost in contemplation.”

Beon chuckled and said, “Yes, old man, I’m still with you.”

“Have you decided to join me and become the first knight of our order? Am I turning you into a vampire tonight?”

Beon held out his left wrist toward Seth and said, “I’m ready.”

“Hold on,” said Seth “I’m not sure if I’ve shared enough information with you yet.”

“Such as?” Beon asked settling his arm back down onto the table.

“I don’t know how long it was between Sir Percy biting me and my transformation...it could’ve been a moment or a month.”

“Does it matter?”

“I suppose it doesn’t. But the sooner the better, I say.”

Beon offered up his wrist again but turned to look at Sophia when she suddenly took hold of his other hand. “I love you...I’ll be right here,” she said.

Seth cast a glance toward the windows as the rays of sunlight faded to black, and then he said, “Now I must ask you to look in my eyes. Ladies, it’s time for you to look away.”

Black, Beon thought, Seth’s eyes were such a dark shade of brown that they were almost black. While held within his trance-like gaze, Seth blew into his face. As a strange magic filled his lungs, it began to muddle his mind and make his limbs feel boneless. Beon sank against the back of his chair, fearing he might fall. But he didn’t care if he fell or if he died, at this point, all he wanted was a bite. Even though he was rather alarmed at that idea, he also realized he actually wanted Seth to kill him.

Seth took hold of his arm, opened his mouth with fangs now visible, and began to lean over his wrist.

“Wait!” Sophia said, grasping onto his sleeve frantically.

What is it? Beon wanted to ask, but couldn’t.

“Can vampires have children?” she asked.

Silence fell for a time, and Beon closed his eyes. With this magic clouding his mind as it was, he honestly didn’t give a fig about children. If Seth would just get on with draining him, that would suit him just fine.

“I—I’m not sure if they can. I know that Sir Percy and his sisters are quite old and they do not have children. So if I were to hazard a guess, I would say no, they can’t,” answered Seth.

Sophia tugged on his sleeve, probably trying to get him to focus on her. Beon was listening, but he couldn’t do much more than open his eyes and look at her. “Please, Beon, don’t do this until we know for certain.”

“You want children?” he managed to ask as the spell began to dissipate.

“You don’t?” She sounded hurt.

Beon bent forward and pressed the palms of his hands against his temples as he tried to clear his head. Once he felt less wobbly, he said, “I...well, I guess I hadn’t really thought of it, but I think you’re right, we can’t risk this until we know. I don’t think I could bare it if we never had any children.”

Beon glanced at Eva, and when he noticed how pale she looked, it was obvious she had just realized that she and Seth would never be parents.

Eva fidgeted uncomfortably and then rose from her seat. “I think it’s time to clear away this mess.”

“I’ll help,” Beon said. He kept his hands on the table to test his balance, but it would seem the magic had completely released him from its grasp.

Helping to gather up bowls and trenchers, they all brought it to the kitchen.

Beon stopped cold when he saw the state of the kitchen, however, because it was an absolute disaster. “Is Vyndon Castle infested with trolls or some other such creature?” he impulsively asked Seth, half joking, for only a mythical being could create such a mess.

Eva started laughing so hard, Beon feared she might hurt herself while Sophia looked extremely guilty. “Hold on. Am I to understand Sophia did this?”

And his gorgeous wife, the woman who still reminded him of angels, the woman who fulfilled all of his fantasies, just shrugged her shoulders while biting her lip.

Chapter 23

MYTHICAL BEINGS FROM HEAVEN AND HELL

Sophia was so happy Beon had not yet become a vampire that he found it a bit disconcerting. She was practically skipping as they headed toward their bedchamber. This concerned him because while he wanted to ensure they started a family first, he still meant to become a vampire knight. Was she hoping he'd changed his mind? And if she was, how would he convince her otherwise? And how many children did she want? Please, God, he prayed as she dragged him along the corridor, please not an entire brood of angelic-faced, naughty little cherubs...running about...making all kinds of noise...demanding hugs and kisses as they press sticky fingers against his cheeks...

Just before they got to their chamber, he had seriously considered breaking free of her grasp, running the other direction, and begging Seth to bite him posthaste. But as she swung the door open and turned to face him, the beauty looking up at him with such an incredibly tempting 'come-hither' look on her face, he lost any resolve he might have had. Bring on the misbehaving little monsters, he thought, because he just couldn't deny her.

While walking backward, Sophia grasped onto a handful of his gambeson and drew him in after her. Holding her eyes with his, Beon yanked the clasps running up the front of his gambeson free, shrugged out of the garment, and threw it to the side. Once he'd discarded his shirt, she silently asked for help in undoing the laces running up the back of her dress by turning away from him and moving her hair out of the way.

Making quick work of that too, it wasn't long before they tugged the dark blue drapes surrounding the four-poster aside and fell into bed. As he made love to his wife, Beon never once thought of children or vampires until after their bodies had been sated...whether by lips moving over lips, fingers linked with fingers, or just skin against skin, Beon found such contentment that he was grateful she'd stopped him from turning when she had.

He didn't yet know what it would be like to live as a vampire but he did know what life was like as a man, so how could he squander these moments just to defeat a ruthless villain? He shouldn't, and he hadn't.

As she drifted off to sleep with her head resting on his shoulder, and as the candles burned low, Beon gathered up a lock of Sophia's soft hair and wrapped it around his finger as he pondered their plans. A part of him never wanted any of this to change, but another part of him ached to fight and defend the weak just as he'd trained for years to do. The war within himself waged on.

Beon was just about to drift off to sleep when a sound from somewhere within the chamber wrenched him from the edge of unconsciousness. Everything inside him tensed as he mentally prepared for a fight.

As if a ghost had just materialized from the shadowed corner of the room, Sir Percy came into view and then moved toward the bed. Having prepared earlier by tucking weapons beneath the pillows, Beon untangled himself from his wife's sleeping form and grabbed a silver stake with one hand while he lifted up a dagger with the other. Reminding himself what it was like to be spellbound by curse magic from the vampire's eyes, Beon took great care not to make eye contact. Watching his body was the only way to track his movements.

The demon stepped closer and simply laughed. "I will admit that it was clever of Seth to use garlic to mask your scent. I would have found you sooner if not for that."

As Beon rose from the bed and moved away from it, hoping to draw this fiend away from Sophia, Sir Percy continued, "The stake will not harm me either, in case you're thinking it will."

When Sir Percy turned his face to look at Sophia while she slept, Beon lifted both weapons above his head and stepped forward.

Before he could take another step, the door flew open and smashed against the wall so hard, the handle broke through the plaster and got stuck in the wall.

In a blur of motion that was impossible to track with his eyes, Seth engaged Sir Percy. Wishing he could be of more help, Beon remained aware of the fact that Percy had found them so fast, he wouldn't likely have had time to make the turn anyway.

The vampires crashed into the wall, cracking many of the stones with the force. Bits of rock thumped to the floorboards as Beon searched his mind for some way to help Seth.

Sir Percy threw Seth toward the opposite wall of the chamber, causing just as much damage and waking a shocked and horrified Sophia in the process. Of course, how could he expect anyone to sleep through a clash of vampires right in their own bedchamber?

With her jaw-dropping and her eyes widening, it was clear it hadn't taken her long to grasp what was happening. "Don't look at their eyes," he warned when she looked toward the scuffle.

"Took you long enough," Seth said, as he and Percy circled each other like wolves.

Only because they'd paused in their fight did Beon see that Seth's clothes were tattered from battling with the vicious vampire.

"Sophia, stay there," Beon said when he noticed that she was taking up the second stake hidden beneath their pillows.

Sir Percy laughed darkly. "I've come for my revenge, and I will have it."

Eva appeared in the open doorway, and Beon wanted to roll his eyes. Couldn't these women understand the level of danger here? Beon made shooing motions with his hand, urging her to get to safety, but it seemed as though the silly woman was too shocked even to move.

Sir Percy regarded all four of them before finally addressing Seth, “I make you into this great warrior, and this is how you repay me?”

“You never knew me if you thought I would go along with your plan to build an army of monsters like yourself so that you can rule the world with terror.”

“What a disappointment you turned out to be, Sir Lyndon. You know, the Great Mortality presented a most unique opportunity for us to reign over vampires, as well as men. Perhaps the entire magical world.”

“You don’t actually think I’ll let you get away with it, do you?”

“You don’t honestly think you can stop me, do you?”

Percy turned his eyes on Sophia and said, “Your father was extremely foolish to think he could attack me.”

“What do you mean?” she asked, looking down at the silver stake in her hands, clearly remembering the magic within his gaze and that she must avoid it.

Beon didn’t have time to process what happened next until it was too late. He simply blinked and Sir Percy was there, directly in front of them, transfixed on Sophia as her fingers tightened around the stake, knuckles turning white. “Your father promised you to me,” he said as he reached out and touched the ruffled edge of her nightshift. The fact that he dared even touch his wife while she stood beside him made Beon’s blood boil.

Wanting to cleave the demon in two, and wishing he had his sword at hand, Beon thrust the dagger into Percy’s chest, only it didn’t do any more damage than tear a hole in his shirt. With blinding speed, Sir Percy delivered a terrible blow to his head, and he went down, dropping the stake as he tried to catch himself. It took him a moment to gather his wits, head bursting with so much pain it blurred his vision, Beon staggered to his feet.

Thunder rumbled in the distance, the flash of lightning illuminating the sky with a flicker of white.

In a blur, Seth captured Sir Percy and slammed him into the bed. The wood splintered, and the substantial piece of furniture was demolished in an instant. Again, both men tussled with such speed that Beon couldn’t follow their movement until Seth was sent crashing through the wall and Sir Percy immediately lit off after Sophia once more.

Beon could tell she didn’t know what to do when Sir Percy clasped onto her chin and blew into her face. But she didn’t collapse like he thought she would have. Confused as to how she had resisted the power of that dark magic better than he had, Sir Percy began to chuckle. “Clever lady, you held your breath.”

Seth returned and engaged Percy once more. The two vampires wrestled, neither one of them making any progress over the other.

Beon gaped in horror when Sophia lifted the silver stake high above her head and brought it down onto Sir Percy’s back. Again, the stake failed to pierce the man’s body, proving yet another one of their theories false. Was there truly no way to destroy the devil? As he'd watched this battle carry on, however, Beon had come to understand that if Seth had not been alone in this fight, they would have easily prevailed. As it was, they were too evenly matched. If two vampire knights of such caliber, fighting for life and love would have been enough to protect three mortals, then an entire garrison of such knights would be unstoppable.

Another flash of lightning lit up the chamber, the storm drawing closer as Beon looked on feeling utterly weak and human in this moment.

Sir Percy was able to send Seth flying into the chair beside the hearth, and he again turned toward Sophia. "I knew you were a feisty little wild thing...worth every bit of trouble, I'm sure."

Recovering as fast as he had before, Seth took the stake from Beon's hands and thrust it into Sir Percy's back. It sank in and pierced the man's heart.

Percy howled in pain and tried to pull the stake from his back, but his arms weren't long enough to reach it. Another flash of lightning flashed across the sky. The stake reflecting the light as it flickered.

As Percy's knees failed him, Seth lifted him up and threw him toward the window. Beon watched as the man's body crashed through the glass and fell to the ground below. They all rushed to the window to peer out. But to everyone's dismay and horror, his body was nowhere to be seen. "He could not have survived that, could he?" Beon asked.

"He must have," said Seth, sounding utterly astounded.

"He won't come back, will he?" asked Sophia.

Beon turned to face her and drew her up against his body when he thought she might collapse. "I certainly hope not."

"This means you're going to turn into a vampire as quickly as possible doesn't it?" she murmured against his bare chest.

Beon was about to respond to that when he noticed Eva still standing in the doorway, her eyes wide, her face drained of color, and her lips trembling.

When Seth saw her, he rushed to her side, gathered her up into his arms, and carried her back to bed.

Chapter 24

AN ORDER OF MYTHICAL KNIGHTS

“There’s something very different about you,” Beon said as the morning sun bathed the chamber in a golden hue. She and Beon were lingering in bed as they often did, both of them lying on their sides facing each other.

“What do you mean? Is this a good ‘something different’ or a ‘bad something different?’”

He laughed. “It’s definitely a good something. Hmm...I’m not sure how to describe it, though.”

Beon studied her as he pondered it, his fingers running through her hair.

A month had passed since Sir Percy had found what Seth and Beon were now calling ‘Order Headquarters,’ but he had not returned. The two men frequently speculated as to the reasons why. They all feared he was still building an army and that it was only a matter of time before he arrived with hundreds of vampires rather than confronting them on his own again.

Because of this concern, they were building their own army. In that month, their garrison of knights had grown to a hundred and fifty-two. Beon was not yet numbered amongst them, however, much to Sophia’s relief.

She was quite aware of the fact that she was the only one who remained relieved by this, however. The fact that it was a great sacrifice for Beon to wait was not a kindness she would forget. He was doing it all for her...or really for them, so they could have a family before it was no longer possible. She’d seen how he watched the vampire knights practice in the lists at night when their powers were at their strongest. She could tell Beon was dying to join them and eager to be that powerful. So not only was she relieved that he had waited, but she wrestled with a mixture of gratitude and guilt over it as well.

Having seen how Seth was able to take on Sir Percy fed the guilt she was feeling. As the threat of Sir Percy remained, she knew Beon could protect her without aid if he too were a vampire. The sense of bliss they had enjoyed fed the gratitude because it was like none Sophia had ever known.

“The rays of sunshine are casting a halo of fire around your head as it touches your auburn hair,” he said.

“Is that what’s different about me, a halo?”

He smiled and shook his head. “And I’m always reminded of strolls along the beach when I peer into your eyes.”

“I’m not used to you being so sentimental. What is this about?”

He laughed again. “I still haven’t sorted it out. It’s almost as though you glow.”

“Are you sure it’s not just the sunlight making me ‘glow?’”

With a chuckle still rumbling within him, Beon rolled, rose from the bed, and began getting dressed. “I’m sure it’s not the sunlight.”

Sophia did the same. “You do realize you’re not making any sense, don’t you?”

Once they were dressed, he reached a hand out to her and said, “Shall you we go down for repast?”

Taking his hand, she said, “It does feel a bit odd with only the two of us seated alone at that enormous table for each meal.”

“As the only mortals here, I don’t see that changing.”

“And when you become a vampire, it will be only me.”

“I’ll sit with you and pretend to eat.”

Sophia wasn’t sure how to respond to that as she tried to envisage it.

“And you will be joining me at some point, won’t you?”

Knowing he meant that she would also become a vampire, she sighed and said, “Yes, for you I will.” As they made their way to the great hall, she imagined drinking blood and knew it would be a struggle, but she felt it only right that she be willing to make the same sacrifice for Beon that he was going to make for her.

To pass the time, Beon carved every shrub on the premises into varying shapes of topiary art. Over the years, he’d found that working in the garden was always something that helped clear his mind. He was able to strategize, theorize, and look to the future of what this new order of knights could mean to the world. He’d pondered the design for their coat of arms, what colors it should be, and the motto they should hold themselves to.

He’d mentally debated what animals should represent their order. When he’d sculpted one shrub into a lion, an image had begun to take shape. As the king of beasts, portraying undying courage, Beon felt a heraldic lion perfectly suited an order of vampire knights.

Considering the shrub beside it, a fierce drake came to mind, its teeth bared and its talons raised. Once he’d finished sculpting the dragon and stood back to consider his work, he’d known this creature represented them as well. The mythical reptile symbolized a guardian of treasure, and Beon immediately thought of Sophia. But not only was their goal to guard the lives of those they cared about, but protect all mortals from creatures bent on using their unfair advantage to gain power over the helpless.

As the time for supper neared, Beon sat before the fire in the great hall and sketched out what he was envisioning for their crest, imagining the rings, banners, and tapestries they would have crafted to signify their order of knights.

Seth came up from behind him and read aloud the motto he'd just scripted along the bottom in Latin. "'Shame to him who evil thinks.'"

Beon watched as Seth moved around and sat in the chair facing him. "What do you think?"

His comrade bent forward and propped his elbows on his knees. "I think it perfectly suits the Order of Curse-Bound Knights and I can't wait to see it woven into a tapestry and hung above this very hearth."

Silently Beon added two swords criss-crossing in the center to symbolize power, freedom, and purification. It wasn't likely the Order would be able to eliminate all the vampires like Percy who would do harm in the world, but with the rise of such a 'plague,' the knights would save as many mortals as they could.

"I've been instructing the men to call you Lord Beon rather than Sir."

Lifting his eyes from the paper, Beon looked at Seth with surprise.

"I need them to respect you as much as they do me," he continued.

"But...I'm not a vampire yet and unless—" Beon couldn't ignore the fact that he was again waiting to progress as others moved ahead without him. Of course, the reason he'd spent so many years as a page was different than why he was remaining mortal.

"You will be soon enough, and we're starting this undertaking together."

Would it be soon enough? Beon wondered. Sophia wanted children, and as far as he knew, she wasn't with child yet.

As if the thought of her conjured her presence, Sophia entered from the kitchens as she wiped a white substance off her hands onto the pair of trousers she was wearing. He opened his mouth to comment on her boy's attire, but closed it when she held up her hand and said, "You've already teased me adequately for donning the male clothing...it just makes cooking so much less distressing."

"How so?" he asked with a laugh as she sat down beside him. "And why are you toiling in the kitchen when we have a cook to do that now?"

She brushed a lock of hair out of her face, leaving a streak of white across her forehead, and then gave him a sheepish look. "It's so enjoyable for me, I just can't seem to resist."

"And?"

"And I enjoy making delectable things for you to eat."

"You forgot to explain the distressing bit."

Sophia bit her lip and shot him a guilty look. "Oh, well, it's less distressing to wear trousers because I don't need to worry about my gowns getting soiled."

"Do I even want to see what the kitchens look like this time?"

"Probably not."

Finding this silly side of her charming as well as amusing, Beon looped an arm around her and pressed a kiss to her cheek, taking in the fact that she smelled of cloves, nutmeg, and sugar. “Who will you cook for when we both become vampires, my lady?”

Her eyebrows drew together, and she pouted. “Are you saying that will happen soon?”

“I’ll turn first, as we discussed.”

“I don’t know if I’m ready to avoid being close to you at night like Eva is always complaining about,” she said rather sadly.

Beon glanced at Seth before returning his eyes to Sophia. “Not to worry, my aim is to honor your wish, we’ll wait until we have a baby.”

“Speaking of nighttime,” interjected Seth. “I feel the sun setting.”

“You can feel that?” Beon asked.

“Well, I’m not sure if that is the best way to phrase it. It’s more like I know the sun is setting because I can feel the curse magic awakening.”

“That sounds alarming,” said Sophia.

Seth considered them for a beat or two before tipping his head to the side and considering Sophia more closely. “I can hear something different about you, my dear.”

Sophia’s eyes rounded. “That sounds even more alarming. What do you mean?”

“Your heart...I’ve noticed it beats...strangely these last few days.”

“What?” Beon asked, also growing alarmed at this information.

“It’s muddled...or faster. I don’t know...”

“You can actually hear it now?”

Seth nodded. “Not perfectly just yet. As it is still daylight, or dusk rather, I believe I could hear it more clearly if I set my ear against her chest. But as the magic rises, I can easily hear it from a distance.”

“If it sounds irregular to you, does that mean I’m about to die of some heart malady?” asked Sophia sounding a bit panicked.

“I won’t let that happen,” said Beon, unwilling to even imagine how he would cope at the loss.

“How could you prevent it?” she asked.

“I would insist Seth turn you into a vampire to save you.”

She shot a horrified look Seth’s way at that.

The man chuckled and said, “I think you two are getting a bit ahead of yourselves. As I said, the sound is faint at the moment. Let’s have a proper listen once the sun fully sets to put your minds at ease, shall we?”

Sophia linked her fingers with Beon’s a bit frantically as they waited.

Seth dropped his eyes to the floor as he sat before them in silence. After a few moments had past, in which the only sound to Beon’s ears was the crackling of the fire, Seth gasped in surprise and raised his head abruptly, an unusual look on his face that Beon couldn’t interpret.

“You’re making me nervous. What is wrong with me?” demanded Sophia.

“I hear three heartbeats, not two,” he finally announced.

“Three?” Beon asked.

“That’s right.” Seth pointed. “One heartbeat within you, and two within Sophia.”

Beon felt his jaw drop when he finally caught onto what Seth was saying.

“A bit slow, aren’t you?” teased Seth “Perhaps fatherhood has already addled your brain.”

EPILOGUE

FOUR YEARS LATER

While lying on her back, Sophia watched the gulls in the sky above her, swooping and dancing, their shapes silhouetted against a pale blue. Bending her knees, she dug her toes deeper into the warm sand, loving the feel of it between her toes. The melody of her favorite lullaby rose from her lips as she sang. The words of the cheerful rhyme seemed the best way to express how content she was feeling...until sand was suddenly kicked in her face.

Spitting the grains from her mouth, Sophia sat up, blinking. The frown fled her face when she watched her little girl, Nadia, waddle past, emitting a string of excited giggles and screams. Beon was closing in fast behind her, and when he scooped the girl up into his arms, he swung her high in the air before planting her feet again. Nadia continued to giggle uncontrollably as she took off running once more.

“That’s a good girl, Nadia, make him work for it! He’s growing soft!” Seth shouted from beside Sophia.

Eva laughed in her hysterically high-pitched honking manner, which in turn caused Mother Everard and Nurse to start giggling as well. The entire clan had decided to venture out for a picnic on this fine day. Ever since Beon had visited his mother and found out the king had named he and Seth Lords of the North, and given them the lands and titles formerly belonging to her father, Lord Gall, the family had decided to stay at Bamborough during the summer months. Beon had invited his mother to stay with them whenever they were there.

Having Beon’s mother in her life was like a sweet balm to Sophia’s soul...almost like having her own mama back. She was gentle and kind and loved Nadia as only a grandmother could. It was a dream come true that they were all together and it made Sophia deliriously happy, and the halls of Bamborough Castle now echoed with laughter. Sophia really didn’t know the details of what had happened to Father. She just knew that he’d attacked Sir Percy and then never returned.

Beon appeared lunging over a nearby knag with Nadia on his shoulders amidst a gaggle of titters that never seemed to cease when they played on the beach like this.

“Lord Beon! I thought I taught you how to treat a lady! Now release your daughter at once!” Nurse teased, and Sophia remembered when Beon twirled her around like that too. A fond memory for sure.

“Thank goodness you were around to instruct him, Madam Kemp!” Mother Everard laughed.

“Pardon me, but I thought I was the one who taught Beon how to treat a lady. Ask a question, agree, and compliment...the secret to success...” Seth’s interjection brought more laughter...and honking, in the case of Eva.

“You’re both wrong,” Beon said as he set Nadia free and then crawled toward Sophia, his voice going husky, “it was this beautiful creature who taught me how to treat a lady.”

“You’re a work in progress, Sir Knight.”

Sophia squealed and laughed when Beon captured her about the waist and tickled her. In the tussle, she’d wound up on her back again.

After pressing a ticklish kiss to her neck, he rose up, propping himself on his elbows. Beon peered down at her for a long moment, an unspoken question in his eyes. Before he said anything, however, he leaned closer and kissed her gently on the lips.

When the others cheered at such a public display of affection, Sophia felt her cheeks heating.

Beon released her mouth and held her gaze once more, that question still visible within his expression, and she was prompted to ask, “Dare I ask what you’re thinking?”

“Nadia turns five in a fortnight.”

Sophia frowned at that. It wasn’t a question, but then as she thought about it, she realized it was. They’d agreed to discuss his turning into a vampire again once Nadia was five years old.

A bit of panic constricted her lungs at how fast this day had come. Beon was right to ask it of her...she knew that...he’d been so patient in letting them have this time together as mortals.

Knowing there’d been recent whisperings of Sir Percy and his vampire sisters continuing to recruit more followers in hopes of returning with an army to fight them, in addition to the countless battles they’d had over the years, this wasn’t a decision they could keep putting off. The Order had thus far successfully hindered Percy’s diabolical plan to rule the world, and the ancient vampire wanted revenge.

As Beon waited for her response, Sophia looked over at Nadia playing with a seashell, and she knew it was time. She knew Beon would do anything, make any sacrifice to keep that little girl safe, and so would she.

After taking a measured breath and then releasing it, Sophia looked up at Beon and said, “Yes.”

Trailing a finger over his stubbled jaw as she processed what this change would mean, she added, “I’ll miss peering into your eyes whilst we lay in bed each night.”

“Does the idea of blindfolding you once the sun goes down intrigue you?”

She blinked at that, trying to sort out what the smirk on his face meant. “I might be curious to see what you have in mind. But what are you going to do about your magical breath?”

“I mean to keep you completely intoxicated with it.”

“What about when I become a vampire as well?”

“We’d best enjoy it while it lasts then.”

“What makes you so sure it’s going to be enjoyable for me?”

“We won’t know until we try, will we?”

“So cheeky! What am I going to do with you?”

“Could I offer a few suggestions?”

Sophia laughed. “I think you should shut up and kiss me again.”

“I find I very much like the way you think.”

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Cheri Schmidt, author of the successful Fateful Vampire Series, and Tristan Hunt, a seasoned narrator, decided to start writing together in 2016.

Having come from artistic backgrounds, Cheri as a photographer and designer, Tristan as a musician and performer, they've often joked while embarking on this unexpected journey that they are 'two creative, non-writers, writing together.' But the union has been a natural progression of two storytellers at heart working together to bring Cheri's books to life through audio over the past three years. The duo worked so well it was only natural to begin telling the stories together moving forward.

Cheri writes from her home in Virginia and Tristan writes in California, symbolic of two very different perspectives enriching the tales they tell!

WITCH'S BREW COZY MYSTERY BOOK 1

Gypsies, vamps, and weres... these are just some of the people powerful witch Claudia Crestwood and her friends protect.

In the city of Hartford, Connecticut—years before Salem, there were witch trials. Now the paranormal coexist with humans, more or less. With the help of her hippie aunt and cousins, her gypsy uncle, and other paranormal friends, Claudia stands on the line between humans and paras—helping to keep the peace.

When a human customer dies after an incident at the coffee shop, Claudia must dig into the case to protect the café and the coven. Threats have been made and what's worse, she's harboring a hunter wanted by the police in her basement. A hot and powerful wizard starts showing up in the shop when Claudia needs help and is at her worst. Intriguing and annoying... She isn't sure she can trust him and his reclusive family but it's time for her to dig deeper into the magical world.

Chapter 1

I fumbled with the grinder that had, of course, locked up right in the middle of the morning rush. Coffee and tea sounded like such a calming business, but people were serious about their coffee and not patient about waiting for it.

The sighs and mumblings of the backed-up line of customers registered, but I had to focus on the matter at hand or I'd make a mess and it'd only take longer. Magic would help, but there were too many humans watching me far too closely.

"Claudia," my cousin Iris whispered from the back.

I gave her the in-a-minute finger and turned to Brad, one of our new baristas. "Try and get that loose. I'll be right back."

"Right, boss," he said.

Vampires. I liked hiring them, mostly because they took the night shift, lived on expired blood from the blood bank, and their handsome faces brought in the lady customers who ordered the pricier drinks. This one seemed as tame as any of those I employed. But vamps liked structure and following a leader. I was so not that leader. I was a twenty-five-year-old witch with a long line of caffeine deficient customers.

"And make me a green tea with a double shot of calming potion when it gets slow," I said as I wiped my hands on a towel.

Potions were what my aunt cleverly named the shots other places used. Some were just flavor, and others had herbal benefits or vitamin mixes. Our PMS potion might get snickers from men, but the female customers swore by it.

The coffee shop remained a great cover for my coven's deeper purposes. We helped paranormal creatures who didn't want to hurt humans. We could all coexist, or so my hippie aunt believed. She was working the counter in one of her flowing printed dresses, no bra and wicker shoes.

Iris tapped her foot on the floor to get my attention and waved me over faster.

I picked up the pace and joined her. "What's up?"

"Dad has someone in the basement," she said with a twinkle in her eye.

I shrugged and admired the mermaid braid she'd put her honey blonde hair in today. She and her identical twin sister, Violet, were always on trend, even if they were hippies like their mom. Her tank dress flowed in a red paisley today.

“He needs you,” she added.

“Why? The cells are free if he needs to lock up anyone,” I replied. Hosting any werewolves who needed a secure place during the full moon was also part of the routine.

“I don’t think it’s that. Please go check. I’ll cover for you up here. I don’t have a class until ten.” She grabbed the towel from my hand.

“Good luck, that grinder likes to spit out grounds.” I was sort of happy to be free.

“Every job helps us to help others.” Iris smiled.

Her good mood probably had as much to do with cute and eternally youthful Brad as helping people. I wished I could be as cheery and sweet as my cousins about cleaning. I mean, they were like my sisters. My aunt and uncle raised me after my parents died. I was only five when that happened, so I should’ve taken more of their teaching to heart, but I still had my mom’s draw to dark magic and big powers. Strong powers weren’t bad, as long as they were used for good. I had to watch the slippery slope.

I didn’t have the sweet blonde hair either. I had pure black hair that I jazzed up with a shimmering purple strip to be more like my sisters; they had purplish names, anyway.

I walked down the stairs. The old brick building was full of spirit energy and history. Hartford, Connecticut attracted paranormal creatures because, decades before Salem, it’d had its own witch trials here. That meant witches and paranormal creatures naturally had a right to be here. It also meant we clashed with the local human population, at times.

Owning a coffee shop brought the gossip and the news to me organically. This way, our coven had a finger on the pulse of the human world just in case we needed to push the paranormal further underground for our safety. Witches and wizards were the crossover, after all. Mostly human but with the ability to develop some powers. I had more than my share.

The basement was a maze. Storage was separate. The cages were in the back. There was a small room where vamps or hunters sometimes crashed when they had nowhere else to go. Uncle Vinny had someone on the cot and was grabbing gauze from the first aid kit.

“What’s wrong?” I asked.

“Nothing, he’ll be fine. We just need to hide him here for a while,” Uncle Vinny replied.

“Sure.” I trusted my uncle but still wanted to talk to my guest and feel him out.

My uncle’s phone beeped. “I have to take this. Just give him the rundown.”

Uncle Vinny took the call and spoke his native language.

I studied the visitor. Mid-twenties, handsome, beat up and scratched but still smug enough to smile and act like he wasn’t in pain.

“Ryan Jones,” he said.

The Jones was a lie, but most hunters used fake names. “Claudia Crestwood. You’re a hunter?” I asked.

He nodded. “What’s your uncle speaking? I can’t place that language.”

“Rom,” I said.

“Like Romanian?” Ryan frowned.

“No, like Romani. He’s a gypsy. Where are you from?” I asked.

“South Carolina most recently. I was tracking a werewolf that just refused to be contained during the full moon. He kept killing. He killed his family and just didn’t care, anymore. He went into a mall just before moonrise. A couple of stores were having midnight sales or staying open around the clock before Christmas for shoppers. I had to take him out. But I was on video. I killed the werewolf, but he turned back into human form once he was dead.” He winced and put pressure on his leg.

“I know how werewolves work. So, you got tagged for murder by the local PD?” I tried to assess his wounds. “You need a hospital to check out internal injuries. At the very least you need stitches.”

“Nah, just a little rest until things calm down. You’re a gypsy witch?” he asked.

“I’m not a gypsy. My aunt is my mother’s sister; Vinny married into the family. Sorry, no gypsy blood here. You can stay, but you have to follow the rules.” I propped a hand on my hip.

“Sure,” he said.

“No meddling in my uncle’s cases unless he asks you for backup. No upsetting my coven or my family. Stay out of my coffee shop. Don’t upset my customers or the staff.”

“No problem. Relax.” He grinned.

He was sexy but used to being in control. No doubt I would be a challenge. His broad shoulders and strong arms were tempting, but you had to be tough to be a hunter. Then again, hunters often died young. My uncle had lots of scars, and he was semi-retired. Now, he acted as advisor to the younger hunters in the area.

“That’s not all. I have vampires who work here, mostly at night. They have plenty of blood supplied, so they don’t kill people. You don’t bother them or intimidate them. If you stay for a full moon, I house werewolves. You don’t antagonize them.” Some hunters liked to keep the fear in the paranormal creatures so they stayed in line. I’ve found friendship worked better than threats.

“I only hunt those who’ve killed humans and refuse to take help in containing themselves.” He held up his hands.

The answer was politically correct, but my instinct said he liked the kill. A little more Faith than Buffy.

“I never met a gypsy before. Think he’ll take me to stay with them?” Ryan asked.

“Why would he? With that smirk and the flirty attitude you’re giving me now... Those guys would beat the crap out of you if you even looked at their daughters. Gypsies are the original hunters. They’d teach you a few lessons.” I grabbed the backup first aid kit from the shelf. He’d need it.

“Original hunters?” he asked.

“Think about it. Nomads who traveled light with their families. Men went out and did the work; women stayed home—protecting their kids. It looks old-fashioned, but they all are fighters. The groups were rumored to be associated with poverty, crime, and trouble because they were hunting the creatures that lived in the shadows and hurt humans. That's not an easy life, is it?"

"No, it's not. Makes so much sense. How did I not know that?" He chuckled.

"You do, now. So, respect them and stay away because those guys travel in groups, fight anything bare-handed, and make The Walking Dead look like a vacation when they go after someone. From the looks of you, you'd mess with the wrong daughter."

"Then, I'm lucky your dad isn't a gypsy." He grinned.

I shook my head. "You don't know what my dad is. Could be worse than a gypsy. I'll send down some food, coffee, and bottles of water. Don't leave the basement."

Uncle Vinny came back. "Got a plan?"

"He can stay until you patch him up and find another place. I don't want him around the twins too much. You need to make a plan for as soon as he can travel," I said.

"I understand. Think you can heal him?" Uncle Vinny asked.

"Probably, but he needs to be stronger. He's faking strength, right now, but I can feel he's weak. Let Aunt Mandy stitch up the wounds, clean him up, then he can rest. When he's stronger, we'll do a healing session or a few." I texted an order to the sandwich shop next door. Somehow, soup seemed in order, and theirs was the best.

"Okay, I'll tell her. You arrange the food and maybe see if the vamps can spare some clean clothes. He's a mess." Uncle Vinny shook his head.

"It happens. With all the video cameras out there, your job gets harder and harder," I said.

"People see what they want to see on them." Uncle Vinny sighed and headed upstairs.

I shot the young hunter a look. He didn't appear nervous, at all.

"So, what are your powers? Breaking hearts?" he teased.

I shook my head. "Healing, potions, spells, a touch of empathic vibrations—among others."

"Loaded witch. Most of the Wiccans or pagans I meet are all talk," he said.

He wanted a demonstration. "I'm not a magician here to entertain you."

"Impress me. Scare me into obeying all your rules." He winced and grinned too fast to cover his weakness.

The flirtation was a distraction for him. He was trying to forget his pain.

I stared at a dusty bottle of Jack Daniels on the top shelf. There was a ton of coffee and tea stock in the storeroom area, but in here, there were other essentials. I focused and felt the bottle vibrate. I mentally yanked it from the shelf and countered gravity to keep it from freefalling. It floated lower and lower.

Ryan grabbed it and opened it fast. "You're an angel of mercy."

"No, that's my aunt. Be warned, if you make fun of her hippie ways or eccentric style, my uncle will feed you to the werewolves himself. He left the gypsies for her, and they may be different, but they've got the most stable marriage I've ever seen."

“Opposites do attract. Like a hunter and a no-harm doing but powerful witch.” He took a slug of whisky.

I tried not to blush. He was hot, even if he was full of himself. “If I have to do harm, I do it. Don’t drink too much. Auntie has all natural painkillers that will knock you out and keep you loopy.”

“All natural?” he scoffed.

“Cannabis, opium—hell, cocaine is all natural—it’s how you distill and use it. She won’t get you high, but your pain will be over soon,” I said.

“Send her in. But promise you won’t take advantage of me while I’m out of it. I want to remember.” Ryan blew me a kiss.

I glanced at the bottle in his hand, and it slipped and landed on his very bruised ribs.

“Damn it! Witch!” he shouted.

I walked up as Aunt Mandy was coming down. “He’s really in pain, poor dear,” she said.

“Don’t ‘poor dear’ him. He’s a handful. Thinks he’s hotter than hell and twice as tempting.”

She shook her head, her blonde hair swinging with her. “I’m sure it’s the pain. He’s acting tough and covering. The man is being hunted for doing his job and the human world just doesn’t understand. I’ll take care of him, for now. You get back up there.”

“Sure you don’t need help? He’s strong.” I didn’t want to help, but seeing Hot Hunter Guy stripped naked wasn’t the worst thing in the world. “The twins will fall for his flirting crap.”

“They’re in college—plenty of normal guys full of crap to flirt with there. If I need someone, Esmerelda can help. You don’t need to be around a hunter like him.” Aunt Mandy nodded.

“What do mean like him? He’s just a human. I lock up werewolves and work with vampires every day,” I said.

“This is a stranger. He could take advantage of younger women.” She waved at Esme.

Esmerelda, in her black cat form, darted down the stairs and sat in the entryway to the concealed rooms. The powerful witch would keep my aunt safe. Esme was deeply connected to the witch world and even taught private lessons to some in the coven. I somehow ended up in between humans and paranormal people.

“You two don’t have too much fun.” I smiled and let the older ladies get to work with the young fresh meat. My aunt was lying about the stranger, but I didn’t push it. We all took turns handling whatever crisis came in the back door.

Esmerelda was the perfect one to keep an eye on him. At one hundred and twenty-five years old, she’d lived most of her life as a cat. In human form, she looked about thirty, but as long as she lived more than half of her life as a cat—she could have all nine lives. She was also a powerful witch—the only one I knew that was stronger than me. I’d wanted to be her since I was a little girl. I loved cats and her power level.

“You okay?” Aunt Mandy asked.

“Yeah, I just don’t want him hanging around too long. He likes what he does a little too much. I think.” I had no proof, only instinct and years of living with a hunter and meeting tons of them through my uncle.

“Well, if he makes a false move, Esmerelda will turn him into a frog.” Aunt Mandy smiled.

“Frog’s legs for dinner?” I teased.

“Too far. You so got your mother’s sense of humor.” Aunt Mandy smacked my shoulder and headed down. “Go upstairs and don’t let this hunter play with your mind. Men like this are players, and they look for any opening.”

I went up. My aunt often warned me off of bad boy types. My dad probably had that streak, and Aunt Mandy was worried I had my mom’s taste in men. The only thing I knew for sure that I got from my father was my hair. My mom had been a dark blonde, but still a blonde. What else did I have from my mysterious dad? It didn’t really matter, now. I pushed the tragic history out of my mind, like usual.

Brad handed me my tea.

“Thanks,” I said.

The line had gone down with the twins behind the counter. They were experts.

Iris and Violet came over. “Is he cute?”

They were freaky good at being in unison. I envied that they were never alone.

“Cute, full of himself, and dangerous,” I said. “Stay away.”

“Come on, that’s just mean,” Violet said.

“It’s the truth.” I tried to ignore the tingle still running through me. He was a bad boy hunter, and yet, I liked the attention. Thankfully, the twins had too many people looking out for them. “At barely eighteen, you two need to get degrees and careers—not entangled with hunters.”

“College boys are no better. They want to screw everything, and then, it’s over. At least a hunter risks his life for something that matters. He understands loyalty and dedication,” Iris said.

“I’d rather see everyone working to bring the vampires and weres into harmony with humans. We can make it possible for them to be safe and live with us. I want hunters to have less work.” I sipped my tea.

Iris checked her phone. “We better head to class. But you should stay away, Claudia. Really, he’s not our type of hunter.”

“So?” I asked.

She stared at her phone. “They don’t always get gypsy ways or witches. You don’t want him to pick up on anything.”

Violet bumped her sister. “Pick up on what?”

Iris shook her head. “Nothing. Hunters always want an advantage. This guy doesn’t know us or trust us, so keep your guard up, like you told us to do. That’s all. Gotta go. Bye.”

“Bye,” Violet said with a shrug.

“Bye, study!” I called. Iris seemed to know something I didn’t. Vi didn’t seem to be in on it either. Maybe Iris was being paranoid, but Aunt Mandy had wanted me away from the guy, as well. Why?

“More tea, boss?” Brad asked.

“No, thanks. Do you have any old clothes you’d like to donate? It’s for a homeless men’s shelter. My aunt said they were low.” Lying was part of the game, but Brad might freak and run if he knew a hunter was one floor below him.

“I’ll look. I’m on again for the night shift, so I’ll bring them by. It’s okay if I clock out?” he asked.

“Perfect.” I noticed his replacements walking in the door. Lifting my cup in acknowledgement, I took a deep breath. The hunter guy would leave, and a new crisis would pop up. It was all how we handled them.

I noticed my aunt’s inspirational quote of the day on the board. “Cherish now...there won’t be another.”

There was no arguing with that. Still, I envied Esmerelda. I’d tried to do the cat thing when I was seven and again at nine. Transfiguring into a cat was just not my area. I left that to Esmerelda and Professor McGonagall. Apparently, you had to start the transfiguring routine before puberty for it to stick and the nine lives to take hold.

Then again, did I want to see this world for the next seven hundred or more years? That seemed daunting. I’d do the best I could and enjoy my time. The crew this shift were all experienced, so I headed up the spiral stairs to our cozy reading nook. Fluffy chairs and sofas flanked shelves of books, much like the first-floor seating area.

We let the regulars go up here when it was crowded on the first floor. There was another room there with all of the coven’s needs that was always locked.

I straightened the books and plumped the pillows. A couple of black cats yawned and stretched. They were actual cats; Esmerelda used them as decoys when she turned human. I stroked their fur and found the treat box.

In the midst of my cat time, I heard the raspy voice of Mrs. O’Conner. Petting the cats again, I absorbed their purring vibrations to calm me. Some of our regulars weren’t so easy to please—and some, like Mrs. O’Conner, I wished would go to the Starbucks two blocks over.

Chapter 2

Mrs. O’Conner was a regular. A woman in her sixties who wanted things her way. Her bright red wool coat was dusted with snowflakes as she grouched at my barista.

If only my aunt or cousins were working, they knew how to soothe our grumbly customer. She wasn’t the only one who was hard to please, but she liked to argue. I sort of admired her; the woman had to be around retirement age, but she was out every day doing something. She came in seven days a week.

“No, not iced!” Mrs. O’Conner snapped.

I reluctantly went down the stairs. The barista was experienced, but the woman never ordered the same drink two days in a row.

“Ma’am, you asked for the spiced cold brew. Did I hear you wrong?” The barista was experienced enough not to take it personally. She was a middle-aged woman who needed to get out of the house once her husband had retired. I hung back to see how they hashed it out.

“Hot. I want the spiced cold brew hot.” Mrs. O’Conner shrugged.

“Okay. I’m sorry; I didn’t hear you say hot.” The barista turned back and worked on the odd order.

“I better not be late to work,” Mrs. O’Conner said.

“Then, get here earlier.” Esmerelda darted up from the basement in human form and grabbed some stuff from behind the counter. She and Mrs. O’Conner snarked at each all the time.

“I’m sorry for the trouble, Mrs. O’Conner. Your drink is on the house,” I said.

“What’s wrong with it?” Esme rounded the counter and approached as Mrs. O’Conner took the lid off.

“It’s iced.” Mrs. O’Conner held it out and started to turn.

“I’ll take it.” Esmeralda got a little too close and bumped our customer’s arm. The cold liquid and ice hit Mrs. O’Conner mostly.

“Crap,” I whispered to myself.

“You did that on purpose!” Mrs. O’Conner snapped.

“No, I was trying not to waste a perfectly good drink. I’m sorry.” Esme grabbed a towel from a barista and handed it to Mrs. O’Conner.

“Can everyone calm down, please?” I nudged Esmerelda. “You have work to do.”

“Fine. Send down coffee when you can.” Esme stalked off.

I took the iced coffee and threw it away. “We’ll pay for the dry cleaning.”

“I hope I don’t catch a cold from this chill. I should get my nephew to sue you.” She took the hot cup of coffee.

“For a chill?” I asked. “Would free coffee for a month make this up to you?”

“It’s a start. I should find a real coffee shop, not some little witchy joke. Potions,” she scoffed.

“If you get the Starbucks app, you can order ahead, and they have it in writing,” I suggested.

She glared at me. “You want me to go elsewhere?”

“I want my customers to be happy. This shop is an alternative to the chains. There’s a Dunkin Donuts in the other direction. They have an app, too. We have potions and customize drinks. More flavors. More blends. You might need some calming tea instead of coffee, but that’s your choice.” I had a wide variety of customers. College kids who wanted to be counter culture. Hipsters who rejected the prestige of the brands...at times. People with illnesses came in for customer brewed healing teas from my aunt.

As long as we covered our bills, I was happy. I wasn’t about competition with the big chains. Losing one customer who made others uneasy wasn’t going to upset me that much.

She shook a crooked finger at me. “You’ll never see me here, again.”

When the door closed, some of the customers clapped. I sighed and saw the relief in the smiles of my baristas. There were plenty of places to grab coffee.

“Everyone in line gets a free biscotti or muffin for the wait. I’m running next door to get some soup and stuff. There’s a friend staying the basement spare room,” I said.

The baristas would find out eventually when they needed supplies.

I swung into the soup and sandwich place that opened early for breakfast sandwiches.

“Hi, Claudia, your order is ready.” Fred was a sweet guy pushing thirty. His shop had homemade bread and soups. The smell alone made me give up the idea of ever going no carb.

“Thanks. Can you add a couple of grilled cheeses and a turkey, ham and Swiss to those? Plus a couple pints of the potato soup?” I might as well get lunch for me, Aunt Mandy, and Esme since they’d be tired from working on the hunter.

“Anything for you.” He went to work. “They say there’s a snowstorm coming. You ready?”

“Always ready. It’s New England.” I shrugged. “Soup weather. Business good?”

I had vamps to shovel the sidewalk, and they didn’t mind the cold. I had an awesome collection of knee high and thigh high boots with soles that gripped well. I was tall enough; heels weren’t necessary. I liked heels, but in winter, I could leave them.

“Business is good. I wish I had some ancestral witch connection to market like you do. It’s genius. The witch’s brew.” He complimented me on the name of my shop all the time. But about business. He had the oddest ways of flirting I’d even seen. The guy was nice, good-looking, hardworking, but human. No wizard potential. No power.

Probably what I should be looking for, only it did nothing for me.

He hit buttons on the cash register display. “And the friends and family discount,” he said so I could hear.

“You don’t have to do that,” I said, just like every other time.

“We small businesses have to stick together. You’ve got coffee chains surrounding you. I’ve got all sorts of sandwich shop chains. Subway has soups, now. We will survive. My grandparents opened this shop.” He looked around fondly.

“I know we’ll survive. Come by for some coffee later, on the house. You can’t live on soup,” I teased him.

“Thanks. I just give you a discount; you give it away.” He took my credit card and ran it through.

I signed the slip, put my card away, grabbed my big order and headed for the door. I could’ve gotten it myself, but there was Fred opening the door for me.

“Thanks.” I left and really wished I could tell Fred that I was a serious witch. Humans just weren’t my thing. I wanted to be a powerful witch, and a guy without powers seemed dull. Of course, the flip side was that power sometimes tempted people to the dark magics.

A powerful wizard with a sense of right and wrong; was that so hard to find? Maybe it was.

I surrounded myself with ethical checks and touchstones to keep me from enjoying my powers too much that I crossed that imaginary line to the dark.

A customer held the door for me, and I slipped inside. “Thanks.”

Aunt Mandy was taking a tea break and grabbed some of the bags. We headed in the back behind the counter through the door to the kitchen. There was a break room there, as well as the usual dishwashers and sinks.

“How’s he doing?” I asked.

“More hurt than he’ll admit. I think he needs more than one healing session. There must be internal injuries.” She collected some food and other essentials. She took Esme’s food, as well.

“Esme can come up and eat,” I said.

“She wants to keep an eye on him. He’s tried to break free twice. She had to put a spell on him twice. He wants to leave,” she said.

“Let him,” I replied.

“He’s hurt. I think he’s afraid of witches, quite honestly. Most hunters have had a bad para experience that drives them to keep the peace and seek justice,” she said.

“And some just like an excuse to kill,” I added.

“He says you treated him like a prisoner,” she said.

“He’s full of crap. Scared and lashing out. Get going or your grilled cheese will be cold.” I unwrapped my meat heavy sandwich.

Another thing my hippie aunt couldn’t convert me to: vegetarianism. I found paper bowls for the soup and poured myself some. I grabbed a fruity mixer drink from the fridge that turned out to be a sample of a new flavor. Strawberry Kiwi Grape with some green tea extract.

Aunt Mandy returned with a stern look.

“What did I do, now? I’m just sitting here.” She might as well be my mom. Part of me still felt bad for my teenage years when that was my go to excuse for being a bit wild and rebellious.

“Esme says Mrs. O’Conner wasn’t happy today.”

“She only likes you or the twins. The woman is hard to please. Normally, they get it right, but Esme is the one who splashed the coffee on her. Iced coffee, thankfully.” I didn’t want to think about the hot coffee lawsuit threats.

“She needs to rest. She needs some cat time. I’ve worked her too hard this morning.” Aunt Mandy grabbed a juice and sat down.

“She’s a really strong witch.” I rolled my eyes.

“And that hunter was in really bad shape. Still is. He could’ve bled out. Vin should’ve taken him to the hospital.” She took a bite of her grilled cheese, and it helped her relax.

“I told him that. I didn’t examine the guy too closely—he was all flirty and weird. But those leg wounds...” I shrugged.

“Herbs and magic can’t solve everything. Maybe he tangled with more than one werewolf. Is that why you think he’s not being totally truthful?” my aunt asked.

I added crackers to my soup. “I don’t know. He’s not local. He needs to go back where his people are,” I said.

“He tracked the werewolf through the Carolinas, but if he goes back, they’ll arrest him. Let Vin manage him.” Aunt Mandy finished off her sandwich and started on some soup.

“He tends to take on more than he should and help other hunters. He needs to find some home for wayward hunters and park this guy there.” I took a big bite of my sandwich.

My aunt eyed the sandwich. “You don’t mind helping werewolves. Why resist helping hunters?”

“They’re human. They have everyone out there to help them. I get he’s running from a charge that isn’t fair, but he can go to the hospital here. Where he can be treated in the best way. Then, he could move on. He’s far enough away from the scene of the crime. He’s a drain on us and trouble,” I said.

“Your uncle was trouble back in the day.” She smiled like a schoolgirl in love.

“What made you and Mom want to marry hunters?” I asked.

She went a bit pale and took a drink of her juice. “I was intrigued by the gypsy culture. I thought it was just expanding my horizons with friends, but it turned into more. Vin has a good code of ethics. Not all hunters do, I admit it.”

“And my dad?” I asked.

“Well, he wasn’t a gypsy. Your mom met him through Vin. Hunters are always running into each other on a case. Your dad handled some very dangerous vampire nests. He always tried to get the lone ones to accept help. Your mom was trying to find a way to give that help. I mean, she had the potion for werewolves not to turn. But vampires needed to feed. It took time. You've advanced their goals. But we all take a risk," she said.

It was nothing I hadn't heard before. She never gave too many details. I'd asked many times over the years for more info, but it upset her. She lost her sister; I lost my parents. For me, it was a blurry memory of a big black werewolf. She'd lost her friend since childhood. I hated to push and upset her.

"Risk like that hunter. Next time Mrs. O'Conner comes in, I'll make sure you serve her. It's the only way to keep her happy," I said.

"Esme said she won't be back," Aunt Mandy replied.

"She always comes back. I offered her free coffee for a month. She'll be back in a day or two, complaining about the other places." I laughed.

"Normally, I'd agree with you, but Esme seemed very pleased and sure of her prediction. I should go relieve her. Let her get a real nap without keeping one eye on that kid," she said.

"I'll clean up, check on things out front, and then start the healing potion." I took a drink of my fruit mixer.

"Good. But I agree with what you said earlier today. Keep the twins away from him. You should avoid him, too," Aunt Mandy said.

"Why me?" I asked. "Iris acted the same way. Like I should avoid him. What's the problem? What don't I know?"

My aunt swallowed hard. "I don't know what she meant. You tend to take on the toughest jobs, and perhaps, she thinks you need a break. Have some fun. Esme can babysit him. She's seen men flirt for over a century. Nothing will get by her."

"I thought Esme took on some more witches for her private magic tutoring. She's got to be busy with them. Plus, he's in my shop. I have to be able to handle him if he acts up in the night." I shrugged.

"I know, and of course you can in a pinch. He's just the type who wants all the attention he can get, and he'll play games. Don't feed that. The vampires can overpower him if he acts up. Just lock him up. Esme may have more clients, but she'll always make time for you." Aunt Mandy patted my arm.

"Lock him up? What have you done with my hippie, always kind aunt who thought locking the cats out of the café level was cruel?" Something wasn't adding up.

She smiled weakly. "I want to trust everyone, but your instincts said you didn't trust him. I believe in your instincts. We need to help him but not let him cause trouble in our lives. Everything is connected, and he could cause waves of good or storms of bad. As soon as he shows signs of the bad, he must be contained. The cages are safe for werewolves—there's nothing dangerous about locking the cage to be sure he does what Vin thinks is best. Young hunters are impulsive and rash. He could run off too soon and get hurt again or an infection take over because he's weak. It's for his own good. Sometimes, we have to do bad things for the greater good."

I knew when to stop arguing. "That's quite a speech. Fine, if he acts up, the cage. The vamps will put him there. Just the odd well check and food delivery.”

“Vamps can do that, too. I don’t think we need to get too close to this hunter,” she said.

“You don’t want any of your girls marrying hunters?” I teased.

She waved me off with a chuckle and grabbed another juice before she left.

I left a note for our overnight baristas, who had the most free time to mix up a new blend of fruit mixer. The strawberry kiwi was too sweet. It needed more of a blackberry undertone, even with the grape in the mix.

For now, I had to mix a powerful potion. They weren’t the most glamorous part of the witch world, but they packed a punch. I debated adding a backup potion of cat got your tongue to the main one. Shutting up that hunter would help calm things down tremendously.

Chapter 3

Walking into the coven room on the second floor, I locked the door behind me. The smell of sage and other herbs ignited the witch in me. Soothing customers and keeping my aunt happy were part of my life, but magic was my purpose.

The paranormal world felt more natural to me. Part of me would love to ignore reality and the humans, but that's how problems start. Too often, paranormal creatures would avoid humans and eventually let their guard down.

Grabbing a small cauldron, I assessed what ingredients I'd need. I gathered everything for a healing potion and began to mix it. The sooner he was healed, the sooner he could get on with his life. But my aunt said he was really injured. Should I make this potion extra strong? Then, he might push himself, and he'd relapse.

He needed to sleep more than anything. I added herbs to encourage sleeping. Once everything was in, I cleaned up. Taking the cauldron with me, I locked the room and headed down the stairs.

Sure, I got a few odd looks, carrying a straight up cauldron, but the café was called Witch's Brew. Some thought it was a joke or a nod to the old witch trials. Others knew that my aunt was part of the Wiccan religion. As long as she didn't recruit, no one seemed to care.

I headed straight downstairs and found Aunt Mandy forcing tea on the hunter. Esme sat in the corner in cat form, swishing her tail back and forth.

"Is he cooperating?" I asked.

"I'll do anything you say," he teased.

"How much have you had to drink?" I asked.

"Not much. But your aunt's pain medication is wonderful." He smiled.

"That's so you can rest. The healing will take days," my aunt replied.

Esme darted under his cot and batted out a phone. One of those pay-as-you-go burner phones a lot of hunters used to make themselves harder to trace.

"Look at this. Who did you need to call?" I asked Ryan.

"I have friends. I needed to touch base. The cops are still looking for me. Can't go back. Sorry," he said with a smirk.

"This will help." I set the cauldron down.

Esme dashed off into another area and returned in human form wearing a long dress but no shoes.

“I heard you had a problematic customer. I could take care of that for you. Ladies love me.” He laughed.

“How much did you give him?” I asked my aunt.

“He was in a lot of pain when we cleaned the wounds.” She shrugged.

Esme cleared her throat. “The customer won’t return. I’ve seen it.”

“I think she might with that free coffee offer,” I said.

“I can’t explain it, but my visions are rarely wrong,” Esme said.

I knew she was right.

“Who is dumb enough to mess with witches? You could turn her into a frog,” he said.

“I could turn you into a frog. Keep you in a cage—it’d be less trouble.” I grinned.

“And miss all this?” He gestured to his body.

He was hot. They’d left him shirtless and in nothing but boxers. The wounds were extensive and all over. Deep gashes. The werewolf or wolves had gotten a hold of him for some time.

“You’re lucky to be alive. You need to sleep, eat, get your bandages changed, and go back to sleep.” I held up the cauldron.

“That sounds boring,” he said.

Esmerelda mixed the potion and nodded. We whispered the spell over it then poured it into his glass. My aunt helped him get the glass to his lips.

He got half of the potion down. “That tingles. You ladies are too strong to let some human complain and ruin your business.”

“She didn’t ruin our business. And you’re a human, so should we not help you?” I asked.

“I’m a hunter. I know all about you. I help keep the humans from going crazy and attacking the paranormal world by weeding out the evil ones like rabid dogs.”

My aunt pushed the second half of the potion on him.

“We’d rather everyone get along, but you are a necessary evil, for now,” I said.

“You don’t like me because I know too much about you witches. But you shouldn’t let regular clueless humans push you around. You’re strong.” He gulped down the rest of it.

“I’m strong enough to put you in your place if you need it. Esmerelda could smoke you into nothing with no effort.” I smiled at her.

“Don’t forget it.” She pointed at him.

“You’re very strong. I want to help you if I can. I like you ladies.” He snuggled up with the pillow and reached out.

He grabbed my hand.

“No, grabby,” I said.

“I expected more of a hands-on healing.” He pouted.

Esme slapped him across the face. “You’re doped up enough now that we can sew up the cuts, and that potion will help you.”

“Yeah, if you grab or touch anyone, I’ll have the vampires toss you out in the snow and drain you if you try to get back in. I don’t like gropey guys,” I warned him.

“You gave me all this. I’m used to pain, not drugs,” he admitted.

“Maybe I did overdo it,” Aunt Mandy admitted.

“No, don’t blame yourself. He should be at a hospital, not here. We can put him in a cage or tie his hands to the cot,” I suggested.

Esme nodded and waved her hand. Rope appeared and tightly knotted his wrists to the metal sides of the cot.

“You think this will hold me?” He smirked.

“It’ll slow you down if you want to grab someone. If you want to leave, we’ll let you go,” I offered.

“I’m not a good guest. I’m a lone wolf.” He laughed and howled.

I looked up. We didn’t need him freaking out the customers. “You’re tripping. No more pain meds. Maybe I should take your phone while you’re out of it.”

“No! I’m not a prisoner. I appreciate you letting me stay here, but I need to stay in touch with my friends and other hunters. I have to know what’s going on with my case.” He clutched the phone.

“He’ll be less happy soon.” My aunt got out a suture kit.

“You know what you’re doing?” he asked.

“I’ve sewn up my husband plenty.” My aunt pulled a chair up. “It’s really just his leg that needs it. I can tape the others together.”

“Fine.” I glared at the hunter. “Don’t give up your location. I’m not an accessory to anything.”

“I’d never endanger my helpers.” He hissed when my aunt stuck a needle in his skin.

“Just a little local numbing,” she said.

I turned to Esme. “You can go. I’ll watch him.”

Esme nodded and headed upstairs.

“Don’t worry. I won’t lay a hand on your aunt. Her husband would kill me,” he said.

“Not if I get you first. And I hide bodies better than hunters do.” I tossed the cup he’d been drinking from in the air. With a flick of my fingers, it was gone in a puff of smoke.

“Hot,” he said.

“Men.” I shook my head. All the good-looking ones were evil, human, or stupid. This guy was two out of three. I wasn’t convinced which two yet, but time would reveal all.

Chapter 4

Running into the darkness, I dared to glance back. I couldn't see the werewolf, but I heard the snarls and howls. I ran faster until my heart felt like it would explode in my chest. Finally, I found a tree and transfigured into a cat. I climbed the tree and went as high as I could without breaking a branch.

The sounds seemed to be coming closer. That only made the terror worse. It sounded like a pack was surrounding me.

"No!" I shouted as I sat up in bed. Even knowing it was a dream didn't stop the fear.

I hadn't had those dreams in a while. The cold sweat made me shiver, but I threw off the covers, anyway. It had to be the presence of the hunter.

The dreams had plagued me when I was young. As the memory of my mother's death faded, I just had nightmares about being chased by a werewolf myself. It didn't matter that my uncle had killed the werewolf that murdered my parents.

In this dream, I felt like I was chasing a secret. Maybe it was whatever my aunt and Iris were talking around. Hunters had never been a sore point, before but we'd never known any but gypsy hunters as far back as I could remember. I didn't really remember my dad... He was the only non-gypsy hunter I knew of. They were rare and not trusted in gypsy circles. Nothing clicked. The puzzle was giving me a headache.

I trudged to the bathroom and washed my face. My little loft apartment on the top floor was perfect for me. Open space done in dark greens and dark purples. I could be myself here. But the idea that there was a hunter in the basement of the building made me anxious.

Hunters were a necessary evil. Some vampires and werewolves always refused to coexist peacefully. The vamps wanted real hot blood from a human. The werewolves needed to hunt and experience their wolfie side. Or so they claimed.

Killing humans or other vampires or werewolves, that was murder. They had to be held accountable, and there was no prison to hold them. Human justice wasn't aware enough or evolved enough to understand the needs. No vampire or werewolf council existed to judge them or set down laws. The witch's council was a reassuring international body that brought order for us. The hunter problems were relatively few when they were gypsy hunters. They had their own way of keeping order. But the rogue non-gypsy hunters were more dangerous.

On the flip side, some hunters were too into their work and judged unsafe. What was to stop them from someday rising up against witches? If Ryan decided I was too powerful, would he kill me?

What had kept them in check was their loner lifestyle. They had a loose network, but they called on each other only in emergencies. At least, those were the non-Romani hunters. The gypsy hunters had a network and could easily wage a war, but they respected the right of the paranormal to live. The Nazis had tried to exterminate the gypsies, so the gypsies were not about to treat others that way.

No, the loner hunters worried me more.

I checked my phone to see if there were any issues or problems. It sucked that I slept so hard I'd never hear my text notification. Luckily, my family and staff knew to call me, not just text, if they really needed me.

Brad had texted that he'd brought the clothes for donation.

Damn!

I ran my fingers through my hair and checked in a mirror that the bedhead wasn't too awful. Finding the jeans I'd worn today on the floor, I slid them back on. I'd fallen asleep in my pink T-shirt that had the café's name on it, so I stepped into my fuzzy black cat slippers and headed downstairs.

Brad and the other baristas all wore shirts in various colors with the same logo. I liked my little coffee shop, especially now when it was quiet. Some college kids and night owls occupied tables, but there was no rush or unhappy customers.

I slid behind the counter, and Brad handed me a bag.

"Thanks," I said.

"No problem. It's quiet tonight. But rumor is you've got a guest," Brad said.

He leaned on the counter and then shifted his posture and wiped a towel across the prep area. The fidgeting told me he was uneasy.

"Have you heard anything from downstairs? He's supposed to stay down there," I said.

Brad shook his head. "Nothing. I just don't like the feel of him. The smell," he said.

Vampires' heightened senses were annoying, but it meant I never smelled burnt coffee. They always caught it first. But it made them jumpy if there was someone they didn't like the sense of.

"I'll check on him. He's injured so you could take him out easily. You're faster than humans, anyway," I said.

He nodded.

The blood. No wonder Brad was jumpy. He could smell the dried blood on Ryan's clothing. Even though they'd cleaned up and bandaged his wounds, his clothes were still there.

"Are you eating enough? I know the blood bank stuff isn't as good as fresh stuff, but with my aunt's supplements and some extra blood, you'll be fine." I patted his arm.

He nodded. "It's just tempting. Some hunters aren't so nice, and if I were to feed from a human again..."

"I hear ya, but don't." I wagged a finger at him. "I could eat nothing but candy or try meth. But that's not good for me. Killing humans hurts you."

"There are parties where humans let you drink. You don't kill them, just feed," he said.

"Creepy. And how long do you think you could just feed without going out for a kill the next day?" I asked.

"I understand what you're saying. But you eat meat," he said.

"I do. And if you want to stop the blood bank and go for pig's blood, there's a butcher up the street. Some vampires prefer that. It's fresher and not processed. Heat it up and go for it. You've got options, but if you kill a human or a cat, I'll stake you myself."

He grinned sheepishly. "I won't. But the blood smell—"

"I'll handle it." I took the bag with me downstairs.

"I thought I heard your voice." Ryan was up and waiting for me.

"Feeling better?" I asked as I pulled a worn pair of jeans and a pair of sweatpants from the bag. Digging for more, I retrieved a few T-shirts and set it all on his cot.

"Good enough. I'll need some of your aunt's magic in the morning." He sat up slowly.

"Change into these. I'll wash your clothes." I grabbed his jacket from the corner. His shirt was on the other side of the room. I found his pants under the bed.

"I'm not wearing another guy's underwear." He tossed the new clothes aside.

"I don't care if you go commando or stay down here naked. Those are your clothing options. These blood-encrusted rags need to be washed or the vamps will down here for a snack." I smiled.

He slid off the boxers, and I tried not to look. He was well-defined and muscled. I grabbed his boxers and turned for the stairs.

"Running away so soon?" he teased.

"I'm not running. I want the vamps to calm down, though. The sooner these are in the washer with a lot of soap, the better for you." I shot him a look.

He grunted and winced as he tugged on the sweatpants. "I'm decent."

"That's debatable," I mumbled.

"What?" he asked.

"Nothing. Did you pull that bandage off your leg?" I asked.

"No. It's tender but not bleeding through or anything. Wouldn't want to tempt your friends," he said.

"You don't want fight them off. Not in your condition. My aunt probably needs to get you on some natural antibiotic herbs to avoid infection." I moved closer and put my hand to his forehead. "Yeah, feels like you've got a fever."

"I'm fine. Just having hot dreams about you." He grabbed my wrist.

"That's cute. You're not that hot or charming. You're sick, and we're trying to help you."

He sighed. "You said you didn't care if I left. Now, you care?"

“No, but my uncle does. If you cooperate and appreciate the help, fine. I’m not going to turn you out to die or land in jail for doing your job. But don’t test me.”

“You’ve sent people to their death? I’ve killed. I’ve looked vamps in the eye and staked them,” he said.

“And I haven’t? I hire vamps. Not every one of them can handle being tame. If my employee slips, I stake them. Or however I see fit. That’s my responsibility.”

“Tough girl. I thought you’d make your uncle handle it,” he said.

“My uncle saved my life when I was kid. I trust him, and I’ll help. But I take care of my own messes. You don’t want to be one of them.” I poked him in the chest with my shimmering purple nail.

“No, I don’t. But I can enjoy the cat-and-mouse game. Do you turn feline like Esmerelda?” he asked.

“Not as a rule. I can transfigure, at times, but I didn’t achieve that young enough to get the nine lives ticket.” I wasn’t proud of that.

“Maybe you’re more of a dog person. Ever tried being a cute little poodle?” he teased.

“Please,” I scoffed. “I’m going. Aunt Mandy will check on you in the morning with breakfast.”

“Night,” he said.

I trudged up the stairs with the bloody clothes and went right for the washer off the kitchen area in the back. Lots of scented detergent, long presoak, heavy wash, and a note on the washer that said Private load—see Claudia before opening.

They could think it was my sexy lingerie or witch’s robes. I just didn’t want the vamps to open it up if all the blood didn’t come out in the first wash.

Brad was waiting for me when I stepped back into the café area.

“The clothes are in the wash. Spray some air freshener and brew some of the gingerbread blend. That has a strong scent,” I suggested.

He nodded. “You’re sure he’s a good hunter?”

“My uncle brought him here. He’s injured enough to not be a threat, now. But I’ll try to check into the case he’s running from to be sure. But it was a werewolf case, and with all the video surveillance, you know hunters are getting hunted by the human police, now,” I said.

“Okay. I can defend myself, but I don’t like the idea of you alone here with him.” He folded his arms.

“Aww, that’s sweet. But I’m not. The shop is always open with staff. Plus…” I held out my hand. The huge knife they used to cut up fruit for our mixers flew from the counter to my hand. “I think I’m good.”

He nodded and took the knife.

“Good work, everyone. I’m heading back to bed,” I said.

The baristas on night shift did the more intense cleaning and restocking. One stayed on the register, just in case. They murmured some sort of response but were all engrossed in their tasks.

As I climbed the stairs, I could smell the blood and sweat from Ryan's clothes clinging to my shirt. Yuck. As soon as I closed and locked the door to my apartment behind me, I stripped naked and headed for the shower.

Chapter 5

Two days later, I didn't really want to face the morning. The day before, the hunter was shivering with infection. My offers to take him to urgent care or the ER were met with glares. My aunt's antibiotic potions always worked on me, but if we'd missed some sort of internal injury or deeper infection...

I'm a witch, not a doctor!

I came down to supervise the morning rush and make myself a morning jolt with a double calming potion.

"Mrs. O'Conner still hasn't been back," said the head barista for the shift.

"She wasn't in yesterday either," Esmerelda said.

"Don't worry about her. It might take a week or two, but she gets sick of the chain stores." I straightened up a bit behind the counter then took my coffee to a quiet corner.

Esmerelda followed me. "You doubt my vision? We won't see her again."

"Okay. She'll find another café she likes better. Do you think our business is in trouble?" I asked.

She shook her head. "I think we just need a couple of signs. If we get your drink wrong, the right one is free. Another that says Hot drinks are scalding, cold drinks are frigid...sip at your own risk. Funny but cover our butts."

"All the cups are stamped with the warning that contents are served very hot." I did see the humor in her approach. "But those are funny. Why not?"

"I'll paint some up." Esme nodded.

"Maybe one that says Our baristas are only human. If you wish to curse and yell, the owner is a real witch! Please see her." I laughed.

"Love it." Esme smiled.

"How is the guest today?" I asked.

Esme's smile faded fast. "He's a pain. Apparently, there was a cut in a private area. We let him have some privacy. Well, he didn't have it cleaned and treated properly, so that's the infection. Not your aunt's fault, though she's blaming herself. Like she was going to judge his thing."

"Are we sure this werewolf he took out wasn't his ex-girlfriend?" I joked.

"It is an odd place for a fight injury. Your aunt is on the case now and smearing him head to toe with her enhanced witch hazel. That should help.”

“I just can’t believe he’s worse. I was hoping to be rid of him soon.” I sipped my coffee.

The bell over the door rang, and I glanced over. A man and a woman dressed in suits walked in and surveyed the place. Esmerelda stared at them. If she were in cat form, her back would be arched and she’d be hissing.

“What?” I asked.

“I’m going down to help your aunt.” She left calmly but quickly.

I looked back at the couple. They cut the line and flashed a badge at my head barista, who pointed me out. I took a long drink of my coffee. Was it Ryan? I had been visited once before by the police when a new hire had a sketchy past.

The duo approached me.

“Ms. Crestwood? I’m Detective Keller; this is Detective Shelley. We need to speak to you in private,” said the male cop.

“Sure. Let’s go into my office. Would you like something to drink?” I offered as I refilled my cup with black coffee from the refill station.

“No, thank you,” he replied.

I added some cream and a packet of raw sugar. As we walked to the door marked Private, I stirred my coffee. I didn’t want to alarm any of the staff so I didn’t ask all the questions in my head until I closed the door behind them.

They took the two guest chairs as I settled behind the desk. Normally our accountant was the only whom ever used this office. I wasn’t a desk type but there were times when privacy and professionalism were needed.

“How can I help you?” I asked.

“We were made aware of an incident that occurred here a couple of days ago. A customer of yours had coffee spilled on her?” Detective Shelley asked.

I hid my relief that it wasn’t about Ryan. “Iced coffee, yes. The customer was offered towels. It’s not like hot coffee. And she removed the lid; someone bumped into her. We offered to pay for her dry cleaning, her order was free, and she has free coffee for a month. I don’t think I could’ve done more for a relatively minor incident.”

“You know this customer?” Detective Keller asked.

“She’s a regular. Sometimes, she gets annoyed and goes elsewhere for a week or two. But we’re the best.”

“She’s a regular, but your barista got her order wrong?” Detective Shelley asked.

“She changed her order every day to suit her mood. She’d cycle between five different coffee drinks. Cold or hot, depending on the season. The barista misheard that she wanted the drink iced. She really went to the police over a little spilled coffee and a wrong order?” I leaned back in my chair.

“Was she a problem customer?” Detective Keller asked.

“She was particular. Not always pleasant, but some people are bears before they’ve had their caffeine. Nothing we’re not used to. We always made it right if something was wrong. She’d threaten to never come back before. I’d give her a week or a month of free coffee, and she’d come back. I fully expected to see her next week.” I couldn’t believe she’d file a complaint. “What sort of complaint did Mrs. O’Conner file?”

“She didn’t. Mrs. O’Conner was found dead at her home yesterday morning. Her husband was unable to wake her.” Detective Keller sounded as if he was reading the news of the day.

“Dead?” A chill ran down my spine. “I’m sorry. I didn’t think she was that old.”

“She wasn’t. Late sixties. However, she was a brittle Type 1 diabetic. She had some health issues as a result, as well as being insulin dependent.”

“Well, as long as it was natural causes. I’m sorry to hear about it. I’m not sure what I can do other than extend the free coffee to her family.” I felt awful for Mrs. O’Conner, but why were the police bothering with a coffee shop?

“Her husband is not convinced it was natural causes. She had spoken to him during the day about how upset she was by your shop. He’s convinced someone did something to harm her or that the extreme stress hastened her death. We’re visiting all the places she was the day before she passed, to be sure. You didn’t notice anything odd? Did she look ill?” Detective Shelley asked.

“No, not at all. She was feisty as ever. On her way to her job at the library, I believe. She was very active and came in nearly every day. Only brought her husband in a few times.” I shrugged.

“Did he like your shop?” Detective Keller asked.

“You’d have to ask him. He said he liked his coffee black and cheap from the pot at home. Mrs. O’Conner said he was military so he’d gotten used to black coffee that was bitter swill. He had no use for tea or fancy coffee drinks. She liked the variety,” I replied.

“Did she make any other threats besides not returning?” asked Detective Kelly.

“Not that I remember. People say things when they’re upset. We try hard to be a good part of everyone’s morning. We know they’re going off to work or school, and even stay-at-home moms need fuel to handle little ones. They want to be on time and have their coffee right. It might seem like nothing compared to solving crime, but a bad experience here can ripple through their day. I’m sorry if we gave Mrs. O’Conner a bad last day.” I still couldn’t fully process that she was gone.

“Did she frequently make comments about you being a witch or Wiccan? About the name of the shop?” Detective Keller asked.

“Oh, that. No, she didn’t mention it much. She’d been a customer for a couple years, now. She complained more when we got a new barista, because she expected them to get everything wrong or they were slower. We tried never to let her have a trainee. This time, I think she was just looking for things to complain about, because we’d done everything to fix the wrong order and spilled coffee. People lash out at the Witch’s Brew name, but there were witch trials in Hartford before Salem. It’s part of the history and a good hook.” I smiled.

Detective Shelley smiled back. “It is. Most people speak highly of your place. Better pricing and service. Welcoming feel.”

“That’s nice to hear,” I said.

“What are these potions on your menu?” Detective Keller asked.

“Those are just a cute themed name for shots like a shot of hazelnut flavor. We have some vitamin, herbs, antioxidants, fruits, and unique flavor mixes. To keep with the theme, my aunt thought calling them potions was a fun way to stand out. Everything is perfectly safe. We have ingredient pamphlets, and it’s on our website.” I opened a drawer and handed them a pamphlet. They weren’t the first to wonder what was in a potion. Like we were secretly selling drugs or something... I wasn’t sure what they doubted, but there was nothing that’d get me in trouble.

“Thank you,” Detective Shelley said as she took the paper.

“So, nothing happened here that could’ve caused her health issues?” Detective Keller asked.

“I’m not a doctor. I’m sure her blood pressure was up from being upset. If she was in any distress, we would’ve called an ambulance. She walked out of here like she owned the place,” I said.

“Did she have words here with anyone specific? You? The barista who served her? Others?” Detective Shelley asked.

“A friend, Esmerelda. She went to get the wrong beverage and bumped into Mrs. O’Conner. No one here was out to get her or hurt her. I’m sorry she’s gone, but I don’t know what we can do for you.” I felt like they were circling something but not getting to the point.

“We need to speak to the baristas on duty that morning. As well as this Esmerelda. Just like we’re speaking to you. Mr. O’Conner is convinced that someone hurt his wife, and that it was not natural causes.” Detective Keller frowned.

“If he didn’t insist, is that what you’d assume it was?” I asked.

“A woman of her age and with those health issues, our ME feels the odds are it was natural. Now, he will be performing an autopsy, and there will be a tox screen. They’re a little backed up from the holidays, but they’ll get to it,” replied Detective Shelley.

“I’m sorry. I understand Mr. O’Conner is upset. She was very active, but we never know when our time is up.” I wrote down the staff working that morning.

“So, you didn’t take her threats about Wiccans or witches seriously?” Detective Keller asked.

“We’ve had the odd protester over the years. People don’t mind witch talk at Halloween, but around Easter, we get a few people who need to make a statement. Generally, we talk to them and show we’re not Satan worshippers or anything like that. We have an old belief system, and the point of reminding people that witch trials happened here is so we never have that sort of thing happen, again. We tolerate all religions and races and types of people here. We’re more like nature-loving hippies in a way. We just want to be tolerated. That and some free coffee usually gets them to go home.” I smiled.

“Is there any one of your coven or staff that might take that threat personally? Someone new, maybe?” asked Detective Shelley.

I rolled over the question in my mind. Esme would be the only one to take it personally, but she wasn't new. She'd never take anything Mrs. O'Conner said to heart, anyway. “No. She was an older woman who was having a bad morning. I train my staff to ignore the moods and the attitudes and focus on the coffee order. Get it right, and the rude customers go away; the happy customers are happier. Get the orders right, and they are rewarded by us. Tipping for coffee is still very hit or miss.”

The detectives shared a look.

“What?” I asked.

“In these circumstances, we would do a courtesy death investigation. Mr. O'Conner is adamant someone did something. His wife was active, taking care of her health, and her doctor confirmed she was doing reasonably well. Of course, her body was worn harder by the diabetes. She'd had some issues already.” Detective Keller consulted his notes.

“I understand. I wrote down the names of the baristas working. Esmerelda is here, now. She's a regular and a member of my coven. She helps when we need it. Beyond that, I'm not sure how to help you. I certainly hope it all proves to be natural causes, and the family can grieve in peace.” There was more. They weren't telling me something. They didn't want to tell me something critical.

“Wonderful.” Detective Shelley took the list.

“We'll be back to talk, again, I'm sure. You can keep going business as usual but understand that we might have more questions or want to inspect your equipment,” he said.

“If the equipment had been tampered with, more people would've been made ill. No one has complained, and I drink something made by our baristas every day to be sure they are doing things right. If everything hasn't been cleaned, I can tell. Quality control.” I tapped my coffee cup.

“Still, if we find more reasons to suspect murder over natural causes—we can get a warrant, and we can take anything we need. Let's hope the ME gets caught up on things sooner so we can put this to bed. Until then, don't leave the state,” Detective Keller said.

“What? Wait. I'm a suspect?” That's crazy!

“It's just a precaution,” Detective Shelley said.

“No, why am I a suspect? Everyone but her husband thinks this is natural causes. I can tell by your face you feel like you're wasting your time. Why try to freak me out? I did nothing wrong,” I said.

Detective Keller stood. “I believe you. But still, as the owner of the Witch's Brew, we may need your help getting evidence or cooperation from your employees. There is another piece of evidence we're looking into that might support more than natural causes. It might be a coincidence. It might be a joke. But we must investigate as though it was serious.”

“A serious what?” I asked.

“We don't disclose all of the evidence to potential witnesses or suspects. If you think of anything that was odd or might help, call us.” Detective Shelley handed me her card.

“I will. I’ll get Esmerelda for you if you’d like to speak to her, now,” I said.

“Fine.” Keller sat back down.

I subtly checked that my desk was locked as I picked up my coffee cup. Dashing downstairs, I tried to breathe.

I grabbed Esme by the arm. “Tell me you didn’t have any contact with Mrs. O’Conner since she left here two days ago.”

“That old bat. Why?” Esme asked.

Chapter 6

“No, no. No name calling. Promise me,” I said.

“I didn’t see her anywhere but here.” Esme shrugged.

“You didn’t run into her at a sandwich shop or a store or anywhere and argue?” I asked.

Esme frowned. “I may have gone to the library. I teach a sewing class in their extension program. The first class was yesterday afternoon, but I don’t think I saw her. Is that a crime?”

“Good question. The police are in my office. She’s dead, and her husband is insisting it’s not natural causes. That we upset her badly that morning, and someone might’ve done something to her. But she was gone by yesterday, so you’re okay.” I rubbed my temples.

“Dead?” my aunt gasped.

“What do you know about it?” I asked.

“Nothing but what I overheard. She was griping pretty loud. Over a wrong order. Really? There are bigger problems in the world.” He grabbed his glass and drank some water.

“Guess his fever is better,” I said to my aunt.

“His fever broke overnight. But he’s still very weak.” She covered him with a blanket. “Acting like a little jerk to compensate.”

“Damn, aren’t there any wizards in your coven? Seriously, I could use a guy around.” Ryan fluffed and punched his pillow.

“I’ll send my uncle down later. Get some sleep and be quiet,” I said.

“Dead?” Esme leaned against the stone wall.

“Her health was frail. You could see it in her aura. She tried hard to keep it balanced, but the littlest thing could’ve set off her heart or her head.” Aunt Mandy tidied up.

“Head?” Esme asked.

“A stroke. Either felt like they were possible if she pushed her body too hard,” Aunt Mandy said.

“She was a brittle Type 1 diabetic. But unless we goofed and put in too much or too little sweetener, I don’t see how we’d be on the hook for it. Plus, she’d be testing her blood and taking insulin accordingly,” I replied.

“She was pissed. Blood pressure up. But that’s not something we can be charged with,”

Esme said.

“They want to talk to you. Since you were there and part of the spill,” I said to Esme.

“I’ll go, too,” Aunt Mandy offered.

“No, they only wanted people who had contact with Mrs. O’Conner that morning. And if they do want to talk to you, you were down here checking on inventory. Don’t mention auras or our guest down here. I’m already getting witch questions. Do we get protestors and who makes threats about it.” I rubbed the back of my neck.

“Mrs. O’Conner made a threat, but she’s all bluster.” Esme waved it off. “I’ll tell them.”

“Tell them just what they need. Don’t offer anything. Don’t embellish,” I said.

She turned and glared at me.

“Sorry, sometimes, I forget you’re a century older than me. But you sometimes talk too much.” I smiled.

Esme nodded. She was used to having power and respect in the paranormal world. She dealt with humans in specific ways. I didn’t want her pushing too much with the police.

Esme headed upstairs, and I helped my aunt collect the trash. We took it upstairs and straight out the back to the alley. It was blowing snow, but we tossed the stuff in the dumpster and hustled back inside.

“Are you okay?” she asked.

“I can’t believe Mrs. O’Conner is dead. I can’t believe there is reason to believe we did anything bad to her.” I went into the employee-only kitchen area and brewed myself some tea.

“They’re just doing their job. I’m sure it’s nothing. Unless you think it’s an excuse to nose around here? That they’re looking for Ryan?” she asked in a hushed voice.

I shook my head. “At first, I thought that. But they seem like it’s routine. There is something they’re not telling me. But it was all about Mrs. O’Conner. They haven’t asked anything about you or Vinny. Nothing about a stranger hanging around. Nothing like that.”

“Let’s hope they do the autopsy and tox screen and find nothing but natural causes. We can get this off our minds. We don’t need cops roaming around with Mr. Personality down there.” I sighed then sipped my tea.

“I’ll call Vin and let him know,” she said.

“No, wait until they’re gone. I don’t want anyone acting oddly. We need to be business as usual,” I said.

“The staff needs to know,” she said.

“When the cops leave. They’ll be asking what they wanted, anyway. But I’d rather the cops not be here with all the random questions. We’ve got some vampires out there. It’s not the same team that was working.” I fished my lip gloss out of my pocket and reapplied it.

My aunt patted my shoulder. The gloss was a nervous habit when I could do nothing. Then again, it was a very frigid winter, and my lips felt chapped.

I texted the baristas who were on that morning with Mrs. O’Conner to come in for a two o’clock meeting. Lunch could get a little busy, too, but there was a lull until the evening rush, and the evening brought in various groups and loners. I wanted as few people around as possible so it wouldn’t interrupt business.

Twenty minutes later, Esme walked out of my office and escorted the detectives to the door. I was relieved when she didn’t go with them.

She walked over to me at my usual table in the back corner by the kitchen. No customers wanted that table so it was my open office area. My aunt had found a project restocking the tea bags. We carried so many varieties that the baristas got overwhelmed trying to restock them during breaks, so when she needed to escape reality, she got lost in tea.

“Everything okay?” I asked Esme.

She nodded. “They want to talk to me, again. They recorded my voice.”

I frowned. “Your voice? What a headache. I’m sorry she’s gone, but what could we have done?”

Esme shook her head. “Nothing. Don’t stress about it. They’re doing their job. They’ll make a fuss to impress the family. The autopsy and tests will show she died of natural causes, and it’ll be over. It might take a few weeks, but they can’t prove we did something that we didn’t do.”

I nodded. “I’m pretty sure that’s what the witches from the 1600s said, too. We didn’t ruin their crops so they can’t prove we did.”

“Stop making good points. Ignore the humans. Let them spin their wheels. She was too old and ill. It had to be natural. Who’d want to kill her?” Esme asked.

“I don’t know. Maybe we should start checking into her life? Just in case,” I said.

“Stay out of it,” Esme warned. “But I did predict we’d never see her, again. Sometimes, my powers are wicked weird.”

I laughed. “Talk about a bad way to have a right prediction.”

“Now, let’s talk about how to break this to the staff. Because your vamps will bolt,” she said.

On the second floor, my aunt had lit a white candle and placed it at the center of the table. She burned sage just in case Mrs. O’Conner was haunting us with any negativity.

She chanted for the soul of our dead customer as the baristas assembled for the afternoon meeting.

When we were all there, I grabbed my aunt’s hand. “Would you go watch the shop? You weren’t there when Mrs. O’Conner was.”

“But her spirit might need help,” aunt said.

“You can chant or help her reincarnate down there until a customer comes in. It’ll only be a few minutes,” I said.

She nodded and grabbed another white tea light candle. We put some on the bigger tables in the evenings for a little mood lighting, but I wasn’t a fan of open flames. I had all the proper insurance, but customers could be careless. Enough witches had burned; I wouldn't be one of them.

"The twins are going to put together a gift basket for the family," Aunt Mandy said as she slipped out the door.

"People usually send flowers," replied Margaret, the middle-aged barista who'd made Mrs. O'Conner's drinks.

"We'll do that as well when we know when the funeral is. It seems you've all heard Mrs. O'Conner is dead. She didn't wake up yesterday morning. I don't have all the details, but apparently, she'd told her husband about her incident here and that she was really unhappy. The police think it's natural causes, but they have some sort of information that has them investigating until they get results back from the medical examiner."

"They came in?" asked Margaret.

"Yes, this morning. They spoke to me and Esmerelda. I had to give them all of your names, so they will likely be contacting you individually. Just tell the truth. We goofed an order. We made it right. We had a spill. We offered dry cleaning costs and free coffee."

"For a month. Too generous," Esme said.

"I'd rather be too generous than not. The point is that's all we know. I didn't see her afterward. I'm very sorry she's gone, but we didn't do anything to harm her health. She did have health issues, and odds are it will be ruled natural causes. Soon, we'll be done with the police part." I looked around. "Questions?"

"She threatened us because we're witches," said one of the younger female baristas who was also in the coven.

"She didn't do anything with it. She was just mad. A lot of people take that easy shot. Like we should magically brew things. Snap our fingers or wiggle our nose like Bewitched, and their coffee should be ready in seconds. We hear those comments all the time when someone has to wait. Don't look for trouble. Answer their questions, don't embellish or offer random comments. They have enough to do," I said.

"I can't believe they're investigating us for this. There are real crimes out there." Margaret sniffled back some tears.

"You did nothing wrong. None of us did. It's a shame, but she was a brittle diabetic. She had a lot of complicated medical issues. She was a balancing act. We did everything we could to make her happy. She didn't appear weak or ill, at all."

"I'm just nervous," Margaret admitted.

"That's okay. The police are used to people being nervous. Just admit you've never been questioned or anything before, so you're nervous. And you always have a right to have a lawyer with you if you want one." I pointed at them.

"That won't make you look guilty," Esme said.

"It's your right. It's not something they can use against you in a court," I replied.

Esme shrugged. “This is all worst-case scenarios. They’re just doing their jobs. Do your jobs, answer their questions, and don’t overreact.”

“Any questions?” I asked

They shook their heads.

“Great. Thanks for coming in. Don’t worry. Sorry for calling you in on your days off, but the police will be contacting you. Feel free to come in or call me anytime if you’re worried,” I said.

“Thanks,” Margaret said.

“We’re with you. Margaret made that drink right. Iced or hot was the only difference,” said Ellen, the Wiccan barista.

“Thanks.” Margaret nodded.

“We’re all in this together. We might get a little bad press or a few protesters. Handle that the same way we always do, only be even nicer. More patient because someone is dead. We just want her family to have peace knowing that it was natural. Now, go on with your days. Don’t let death consume your thoughts,” I said.

My aunt was a hippie more than a Wiccan. She’d chant and hope for Mrs. O’Conner’s reincarnation. I just hoped she found peace in the afterlife.

As the group wandered back to their day, I went downstairs. My aunt was working the counter as the twins filled a big basket with the basics.

Esme walked up. “Her husband is accusing us murder, and you’re doing a gift basket?”

I picked out darker roast coffees and black teas, plus a few samplers. “We can send it to her daughter. I know she mentioned a daughter and a grandson. The hubby will get the flowers at the funeral.”

“It’s a nice gesture,” Iris added.

“It is. I’ll write a note and take it over there. Esme, I want to talk to you about the library thing. And what the cops wanted to know.” I didn’t want to seem bossy, but I needed to know all the information.

“Can we help?” Violet asked.

“See if you can research Mrs. O’Conner’s whereabouts without bugging her family or the cops. Social media, maybe. I don’t know if she used it much. I’d like to retrace her steps, if we’re on the suspect list—who else is?” I was tech savvy, but the twins, who lacked magical powers, made up for it with tech skills. Violet was studying computer programming or something.

“No problem,” Violet said.

“Come on, Esme,” I said.

“I feel sick,” she replied.

“I’ll make you some healing tea. All the death talk and inquisition is hard on the spirit,” Aunt Mandy said.

“I could use some of that, please. We’ll be in my office,” I said.

“We did nothing wrong,” Esme said as we walked.

“I know. But being in the crosshairs is stressful, and we don’t know all the evidence they have.

Maybe a certain stealthy black cat could sneak in there?” I asked.

“Into a police station? I’ll end up in the pound.” She laughed.

“True. We can’t risk exposure of our actual magical powers. But we have to do something,” I said.

“Agreed. Getting rid of that hunter is job number one,” she said.

Chapter 7

After a night of tossing and turning I had to agree with Esmeralda. Having Ryan here with cops sniffing around was asking for trouble. With any luck, the police thing would be over with a few tests, but I had no control over any of that. I couldn't just sit around the café waiting for the cops to come back or call. There was a business to run. I hit the bank for our weekly deposit and change. Then, I stopped at a fast food place for some breakfast sandwiches and hash browns.

I dodged questions and concerns with confidence. There was only one place to get some answers, now. With a drink holder full of beverages, the food, and my inventory list, I went down to our visitor. He grumbled and hid under the blanket when he saw it was me.

"I have food, and I'm doing inventory. You can relax." I tossed a bag on him and set the coffees on the table. I pulled up a chair and ate, taking my preferred drink, just in case he thought I was trying to butter him up. I wasn't. He needed to eat, and I needed to do inventory. But info would be good.

"I knew you couldn't resist me," he said after a gulp of coffee.

"Resist, I can. Inventory must be done, and poor Aunt Mandy and Esmeralda have been down here enough. You sound like you're feeling better." I finished my food then wiped my fingers with a napkin. Another slug of coffee, and I was ready to get busy.

"You really hate having me here?" he asked.

"I have enough trouble with customers and the coven. I understand what happened to you, but the bravado. The flirting. The act. I can see through it. You're afraid. What are you afraid of?" I asked.

"Prison isn't enough? A charge for murder that I'm not guilty of? I mean, it was protecting innocent people and self-defense," he said.

"They obviously won't see it that way or you wouldn't be running." I pulled out my inventory tally from last month. It wasn't just a cover; I needed to do the job. I hated it and usually pawned it off on the cousins, but not this time.

He unwrapped his sandwich and sighed heavily. "The video shows me shooting the creature as it ran from me. That doesn't say self-defense but letting a werewolf loose in a mall?"

"I know. I understand that part. You can always argue he said he had a bomb, and you were defending the public."

"He didn't have a bomb. He had friends who will accuse me of murder and not stop," he said.

“Friends?” I turned and watched as he ate.

Ryan nodded and took a bite of a hash brown.

“Werewolf friends?” I asked.

“I didn’t know. I thought they might be. The moon was just rising.” He kept eating.

“So, these friends saw the guy shift into a werewolf? Why would they want you charged with murder if they saw the truth?” I asked.

“Maybe they knew and thought he was tame. Maybe they just want revenge. Maybe they were vampires or witches or some types that thought werewolves deserve to live and hunt because it’s their nature. I don’t know. But between the video and the witnesses, I can’t just go home. I want to, but I’d put my hunter buddies in danger.” He crumpled his trash and shot it at the garbage can.

“What about family?” I asked.

“Hunters aren’t supposed to have family,” he said.

“My uncle does. And everyone has family family. Like siblings and parents.”

“Except you,” he replied.

“Touché. But I had parents. They’re just dead. What about you? It’s not fair you know so much about me,” I said.

He grinned like he was getting somewhere with all his flirting. “You’ve seen nearly every inch of me. I can’t say that.”

“And you won’t. Come on. Siblings?” I asked.

“A younger sister. I won’t have her visiting me in jail for doing my job.” His face got hard, as though resolved to keep her good opinion of him intact.

“That’s sweet. Does she know what you do for a living?” I listed a new first aid kit on my list of odds and ends. Then, I wrote a number two next to it. The hunter had really tapped us out of gauze and other supplies. They weren’t used often, not since my uncle had semi-retired, but they were necessary.

“No, not really. She thinks I’m a bounty hunter. It explains the lifestyle and the guns.” He shrugged.

“I like that. Makes sense while you go after fugitive werewolves or vampires,” I replied.

“I left her a message that I’m on a hunt for a motorcycle gang that attacked a young woman. They skipped bail and went on the road together, so some hunters and I teamed up to protect people. We’ll split the bonds.” He sat up a little straighter.

“Nice story. You should write books,” I teased him.

“You get good at thinking fast and fibbing to protect others. I have to keep her safe,” he said.

“What happened to your parents?” I asked.

“My dad bailed when I was little. He went out for a drink with his buddies and never came home. Mom worked herself to death at unskilled jobs. I mowed lawns and washed cars until I was old enough to deliver pizzas. That’s how I discovered the other world.” He looked at me like I was part of it.

Was I the enemy in his eyes?

“You discovered werewolves delivering pizza?” I asked.

He grinned and nodded. “I worked late. As late as I could. This one place delivered to a college, and they stayed open twenty-four hours. I took the shift after dinner, so I did my homework, had dinner with my sister, and then went to work until the sun came up. The owner warned me to never approach anything that looked like a stray dog. They gave me pepper spray for the dogs. And a wooden stake. There were jokes about Buffy and Lestat. I thought it was a hazing joke for the new kid.”

“Until...” I prompted.

“Until I delivered a bunch of pizzas to a frat house. There were two delivery guys—that’s how many pizzas they ordered. So, I wasn’t alone, at least. They opened the door, and it was a bloody mess. People screaming. Trying to run.”

“The vampires opened the door? You’d think they’d have enough to feed on,” I said.

“They did, but they wanted more. They had some people tied up, untouched. Later, I found that the vamps were saving those. They were virgin blood. Luckily, I didn’t have that problem. I dropped my pizzas and ran. Like a fool.” He laughed.

“They caught you,” I filled in.

“Of course. The other delivery guy, Jack, he had a stake in his pocket at least. He killed a couple before they fed on him. He had bite marks all over his body.”

“And you?” I asked.

“I ran, but there wasn’t a point. Vamps move quicker than you can blink, and more and more just kept coming. There are some really bad groups called nests that hunt together. They ended up dragging me back in the house. I fought them off and ran, trying to escape. They enjoyed watching me run in a panic, circling through the house like a cornered rat. A female tried a different approach—offered whatever I wanted if she could feed. I was tempted but got lucky. I ended up in a room where some kid had been doing pot. I grabbed his lighter and torched the ugly curtains. It set off the sprinklers, but I shouted fire. Vampires can’t fight fire.” He rolled on his back and folded his arms under his head. “They took off while it was still dark. I called for ambulances and stuff. Untied people and helped. I couldn’t help Jack.” He sighed.

“That’s very heroic. I don’t know if I’d have been that brave at sixteen,” I admitted.

“You would’ve been. Tough witch like you.”

I rolled my eyes at him. “That’s how found out about vampires and werewolves. How did you get into hunting? It’s a pretty tight network.”

“Sure. Well, my boss heard about it, and he was in the network. He didn’t want his employees getting eaten. I got some more training and met some guys. They did construction and went hunting at night. Come to think of it, they might’ve been gypsies, but no one ever talked about anything but the hunt. It was like families and other stuff didn’t exist.”

Something didn't add up. "How did that help your family? I mean, hunting doesn't pay."

"That was the problem. I dropped out of high school and worked construction during the day. The guys just fudged my age. Then, at night, I could hunt, keep my mom and sister safe from those things, and we had plenty of money from my day job."

"When did you sleep?" I asked.

"I had days off from both. If you scheduled it right, the job was covered, the hunting was covered, and everyone got just enough rest." He shrugged. "I miss that."

"I'm sure your sister appreciated the effort. Now, she can take care of herself," I said.

"She's a nurse, so she does fine. I just miss my crew and my friends. I don't know when it'll be safe to go back," he said.

"Never. The statute of limitations doesn't expire on murder. You might want to pick a new home and start over," I suggested.

"They're probably bugging my sister nonstop about where I am. If I've been in contact with her. I want to go back and protect her." He kicked at the blankets.

"She's better off without you there, and you know it. I'm sure your hunter friends got her a message safely. If you resettle somewhere, she can always relocate to join you." It was sweet that he loved his sister, but she didn't need to be tangled up in his world.

"She might be getting married. I want her to have a normal life. Your uncle had a family and hunted. Was that weird?" he asked.

"He worked in a gypsy family business and hunted with his brothers. We had enough money. Aunt Mandy taught classes in yoga and meditation. She cleaned people's auras and helped them balance. She worked out of the house, so she was always there but brought in good money. It was a happy childhood," I said.

"Do you remember your parents?" he asked.

When had this gone from getting more info about his case to sharing childhood crap? I shook my head. "That's not relevant."

"Relevant to what? We're just talking," he said.

"I want to know if there is anything you're hiding. Anything I don't know. Because we have police around, now." My history had nothing to do with the present problems.

"Mrs. O'Conner's my fault? She was sick, and her number came up. Don't blame me," he said.

"I'm not blaming you. I have cops asking questions. If they want to search the place and find you, I'm on the hook for harboring a fugitive. Is there somewhere we can move you to? Cousins? Friends? Not back home, farther away. They could be tracking you. I want you to be safe, but I want my family to be safe, as well," I admitted.

"And I thought you were one of us. Brave and willing to risk your life for the right things," he shot back.

"Claudia," Uncle Vinny said.

I hadn't heard him come down the stairs.

"Have you heard?" I asked him.

"About the customer, yes. We need to talk," he said.

"Follow me. I have to do inventory." I headed for the stockroom, deeper in the basement maze.

I started ticking off the things that needed reordering.

"It's not Ryan's fault," Vinny said.

"I know. But it adds risk. Risk for him because the cops are around. If we can move him, we should. They could be tracking him down. He's been here long enough." I wanted to protect my café and people, but Ryan would be safer not staying here.

"You think the cops aren't watching this place, just in case? Moving him now would raise suspicions and questions," Vinny said.

I sighed and kept working. "I understand. We have to be careful. Why is this all happening at once?"

He put his hand on my shoulder. "We'll make it through this. I know dealing with a human death is bringing a lot of scary attention. But this could happen to any shop. They're just doing their job. You need to simply be helpful, answer the questions, and don't offer anything beyond what they want. Don't act like you have anything to hide. Ryan is doing better, but he could open up those wounds easily if he had to run. Then, he reinfects his wounds. With the cops around, we're not moving him."

He used that fatherly tone. Even though he wasn't my father, he was the only father figure I'd had growing up. He was always there for me. Protected me and treated me like I was his. My instinct said to trust his advice. I hadn't even considered the cops could be watching us.

"You're right. We don't want to draw attention to ourselves. But I think the cops believe it's natural causes. They just need the medical proof. The family is pushing for the investigation, and I can't blame them, but we didn't do anything to her. I understand they want someone to blame, but if she asked for a sugary drink, what? We're not supposed to give it to her? We were supposed to know she was a brittle diabetic?" I was paranoid enough about peanuts and other allergies.

"No, of course not. You give them what they ask for. She had the responsibility to manage her own health and all that sugar testing stuff. Getting stressed out or spiking her blood pressure doesn't mean Esme or you gave her a heart attack later that day. That's just crazy. Grieving people want someone to blame, but the law won't fall for that. You've got nothing to worry about," he said.

"The cops seemed to indicate they had some reason to be chatting with us first. They took a sample of Esme's voice. The cops will be back." I sighed.

"Did you send over the gift basket the twins made?" he asked.

I shook my head. "I wasn't sure if it might look like we were trying too hard. If her husband is accusing us and we take him something, it'll probably only make it worse. I could try with his daughter, but I don't want to look like we're trying to smooth something over."

"You'll know when the time is right. Finish the inventory and try to have a normal day," he said.

“Fine. You spend some time with Ryan. He’s complaining there are no men around here,” I said.

“You like hiring vampires instead of human men,” Vinny teased.

“They’re more loyal and do what they’re told. I have some human guys. But they’re here to work, not entertain a guy hiding out.” I shrugged.

“I’ll take care of it. Back to work,” he said.

Once he left to chat with Ryan, I used my magic to levitate the items that needed to be reordered, filling out the list as I noted the supplies that hovered above the rest. Then, I cast another spell for anything we’d need seasonally to show itself. The heart stuff popped up. Ah yes, next month was Valentine’s Day. I added seasonal goodies and cups. Love made people splurge, and we’d sell a lot of ceramic mug sets.

Right now, I’d just love to have Ryan safely moved on and Mrs. O’Conner’s case closed. Romance was the furthest thing from my mind.

Chapter 8

That afternoon, I forced myself to stop checking the Internet and local news feeds. There was no story or mention of us anywhere. There was also no obituary yet for Mrs. O’Conner. I set alerts on both so I didn’t become obsessed with checking things. Aunt Mandy and Esme were business as usual. I didn’t know how they could be so calm.

I sat in my office, placing the orders, so we were stocked for the coming weeks based on prior use. Part of me worried that bad press could hurt sales. but I wanted to stay positive. We’d done nothing wrong. and any concerns would blow over.

A sharp knock on the door made me jump. “Come in,” I said.

Margaret walked in. “There is an older man outside the shop telling people not to come in.”

“Mr. O’Conner?” I asked, but I didn’t need an answer.

“We assume so, but he wasn’t a customer. We don’t know him. No one has spoken to him yet,” she replied.

“I will. Get me a large black coffee.” I grabbed my jacket.

January could be brutally cold in the Northeast. I had my North Face jacket and stretchy gloves on and walked out front by the time Margaret had the coffee ready.

Before leaving the café, I studied the widower. The man was in his late sixties and looked flustered. I couldn’t blame him, but this wasn’t going to bring her back.

I walked out in the bracing cold and offered him the coffee.

“Mr. O’Conner, can I help you?” I asked.

“You did this. Your shop,” he said.

“I’m Claudia, and this is my shop. I know you’re upset. I was very sorry to hear about your wife. I promise you we did nothing to hurt her.” I held out the coffee, again, but he ignored it.

“Liar. You upset her. She was never coming back here.” He pointed to the shop.

“I know. She told us. We did everything we could to make it up to her. If she didn’t want to come back, fine. One spill or a wrong order didn’t kill her. She never drank the iced coffee. The only thing she drank was what she ordered. Why don’t you come inside and we can talk about this in private?” I was getting cold, even in my fuzzy boots.

He glared at me. “Fine. It’s freezing out here today.”

I led the way and settled behind my desk, rubbing my hands together. He sat across from me and sipped the coffee.

"I understand you're upset that your wife had a bad experience here. But if she was in any way sick or unsteady on her feet, we would've called for an ambulance. We don't want to lose a customer, but when she left, she was fine. There are plenty of people who can verify that. I'm sure the police will be talking to them. They already talked to me. I'm sure you know that," I said.

He nodded. "They're not done looking into things."

"Then, why protest outside of my shop? Let the police do their job first. Your wife was a customer here for years. One bad day doesn't mean we're evil. I think she'd have come back to us after a few weeks of those chain coffee shops." I nodded.

"She hated the chains. But she was so mad at this place." He shook his head. "Even if the police can't prove anything, I know it was your fault. Maybe legally I can't prove it, but this place upset her. She had a weak heart, and too much stress wasn't good for her."

"We offered a month of free coffee. What more could we do? People make mistakes. I'm sure working at the library had its stresses, too. You want to dump it all on me?" I asked.

"Someone has to pay. I shouldn't be talking to you," he said.

He put the cup on my desk and hefted himself to his feet.

"Why?" I asked.

"There is an ongoing investigation. They told me not to. I believe you didn't mean to kill her. But you are responsible for what happens here. You're awfully young to own a place like this," he said.

I nodded. Maybe I shouldn't be talking to him either. I didn't want to cause more suspicion for myself or the café with the police.

"Maybe you should leave, then. Or I could call the police and let them know you're protesting here," I said.

"I can be outside. They said not to go in or talk to you. You're right; I should leave. But you'll be dealing with my protest plenty." He stormed out.

I followed him and watched him take up the same spot.

Aunt Mandy walked over to me. "What did he say?"

"Nothing new. He said he's not supposed to talk to me. I tried to calm him down and assure him that we would've called for help if we thought she was ill. I don't think he's reasonable, now. He's stuck in his grief." I wished I knew a way to help him, not that he'd listen to me.

"I can try to help him," she offered.

"No, I know you can help, but he won't listen. He's not ready, and coming from us, it'll only make him dig in his heels more." I leaned on the counter.

"What should we do? He'll freeze out there," Margaret said.

"Give him half an hour. If he's still there, let me know," I said.

"Half an hour?" My aunt followed me up the second floor where I wanted some peace and quiet.

“He’s got a big coat and gloves on. I’m not parenting my customers or my protesters. If he’s still there, I’ll call that Detective Shelley who left her card, so she can come and talk to him. If we just call the cops, it’ll turn into a mess.” I flopped down in an overstuffed chair.

One of the cats jumped in my lap and started purring. I needed the feline therapy.

“I meditated on this last night. We must not bury our heads in the sand and hide.” My aunt took a brush to the other cat who flipped and rolled for more attention.

“I talked to Uncle Vinny. He said we can’t move Ryan. The police might be watching us for anything unusual. I think we should act normal and not meddle.” I scratched my feline friend under the chin until she shook her head.

“I understand that. But you can deliver that gift basket and speak to the O’Connors’ daughter. Maybe she can diffuse the situation. The twins have tracked down some of Mrs. O’Conner’s day, but more details from the daughter might help. And you can feel her out to see if she feels like her father or is more reasonable. If you did nothing wrong, you have nothing to be ashamed of or fear,” she said.

“But we’re witches, and I don’t know about drawing attention to ourselves.” I looped my fingers with the cat’s tail until she turned around and head butted me.

“Esmeralda insists we ignore this and stay out of it as much as possible. Let the humans sort out what happened. I agree, but that doesn’t mean we should be rude. She was a regular customer. A condolence gift basket is appropriate. I can take it over, if you prefer,” my aunt offered.

That made me feel queasy. She was sweet and would never get us into trouble, but my aunt didn’t know how not to get involved. She couldn’t help herself. My aunt cared too much about everyone. People could take advantage of her because she’d trust them and help them. My uncle and I protected her from being taken in.

“No, thanks. I don’t want to put anyone in the middle. I’ll handle it. Tomorrow. I can’t think about it today,” I said.

“You were down there talking to Ryan for a while. Everything okay?” she asked with a smile.

“Fine. We talked a bit about things. I wanted to try and find out if there was more to his story. He told me about his family and sister. He changed the subject, sort of, and I didn’t want to start a fight.” I shrugged.

“Men. Vin won’t tell me the details of Ryan’s case more than what you know. He said it’s all hearsay because the police and mall witnesses don’t know what they were really looking at. They don’t know a werewolf or a vampire from a human. Things happen fast, and they see what they believe. Their brain makes sense of what doesn’t make sense. But if Ryan didn’t want to share, that’s unfortunate.”

“He’s not my permanent problem. Once this is over, we can move him on. He can start over somewhere else. I can’t let it hurt the café or the coven.” I scratched the cat’s ears.

“You truly believe Mrs. O’Conner died of natural causes?” Aunt Mandy asked.

I’d never questioned it. “That’s the feeling I got from the police. Her age and health. If someone did harm her, it wasn't us," I said.

Aunt Mandy nodded. "I agree, but nothing is for sure, yet."

I stood and went down the stairs enough to see Margaret.

She shrugged. "He's still there," she said.

I took out my phone and called the detective. I didn't want to get the old guy in trouble, but I wasn't going to have him die of frostbite or catch pneumonia from being stubborn.

"You're sure?" my aunt asked.

"We don't need more bad publicity. He's bringing enough. If he gets sick or dies from exposure, I don't want that on my conscience," I said.

"Detective Shelley," the cop answered.

Chapter 9

I felt so human. Standing on the porch of Dana Stevens' Cape Cod-style home, I was tempted to use magic to get me out of this problem. Dana was Mrs. O'Conner's daughter, and I had the gift basket. That wasn't the worst part. Mr. O'Conner protesting outside of my café in the bitter cold was the problem. The police had talked him home the other day, but he was back there this morning.

I rang the doorbell as I made up a spell in my head. I could cast one on Mr. O'Conner to remove his anger or need for revenge. But the world had to have balance, so that anger would transfer somewhere else where it wasn't deserved or didn't belong. It'd be my fault. That would be a bad spell.

A woman about forty years old answered the door. "Can I help you?"

"Hi, I don't know if you have a minute to talk. I'm Claudia Crestwood, owner of Witch's Brew. I wanted to bring you this and tell you how sorry I am for your loss. We miss your mother's daily visits." I held out the basket in front of me, just in case she had some anger like her father.

"I'm not sure you should be here," she said.

I frowned. "I'm not trying to cause trouble. I just wanted to talk to you. Your father is very upset, and I can't seem to have a conversation with him. He's going to get himself sick standing out in the cold, protesting my shop, and I don't want that any more than you do."

"Come inside," she said.

We sat in a comfortable kitchen with white and blue checkered chair cushions, towels, and accents. It felt very country and sweet.

"I'm very sorry about your mother, but if we had any idea she was ill, we'd have called for help. She was fine when she left," I said.

Dana held up a hand. "That's not the issue."

"It's not?" I asked.

She set down two cups of coffee. "My mother had health issues. Her doctor believes it was natural. She went about her normal day, and there were plenty of people after you that spiked her blood pressure more than your little shop."

"I'm glad you understand. Your father is protesting outside the shop, and it's hurting my business. I know that's nothing compared to what you're going through, but it's not safe for him. The bitter cold and his age. We'll keep calling the police for well checks on him," I said.

"I told him that's crazy. He'll give himself a heart attack. But he's convinced someone did something to Mom. Her health was stable. She'd been diabetic most of her life, so she knew how to manage that. I think it must've been her heart or something just changed. But my father won't consider that. He wanted to grow old with her." She sipped her coffee.

"I understand. He's convinced someone hurt her. We were her first stop, and he probably heard her complain about us. Is there any way you could talk to him and make him understand?" I asked.

She smiled. "I've tried. He knows she can be harsh and irritate people. But she's worked at the library for years and been part of the garden club forever. She's had the same friends all her life. Fights and getting over the fights. Ups and downs. You're the new thing. Your shop is only a few years old. She liked the old diner that was there previously. She hated the coffee chains more than your café, but she did like trying all the different stuff without it being as pretentious."

"So, your father can't blame her co-workers, friends, garden club, and so on. He probably is friends with the husbands of the garden club members. And friends' husbands."

"They did a lot of couple things. And he likes going to the library. So, in his mind, it can't be anyone there. Even though she's made her share of enemies everywhere. I know she could be hard to please." Dana rubbed her forehead.

"I'm sorry; I'm not making this easier on you. I just wanted you to know that no one at our shop had any grudges against your mother. She tried all sorts of drinks, and the baristas liked that. They get bored with the same things every day. She had high standards, but that kept my people on their toes. She never said our place wasn't clean or stocked. That made me feel good." I shrugged.

"She was very hard to please. I wish they'd just do those tests and we could know. I know there is a backup. Life in a city. The morgue and medical examiner's office are understaffed, I guess. But that's the only thing my father will listen to. Someone in authority saying it was her heart or a stroke. Or someone else confessing they did something bad." She frowned.

"Was there any enemy she especially had a problem with lately?" I asked.

Dana shook her head. "Most of the stuff is old. History that bubbles up when they disagree. But, really, I shouldn't be talking to you while the investigation is still open."

She stood, and I did, as well.

"Your father said the same thing, I don't understand why. I think you believe me that we didn't do anything to harm her," I said.

"There were some threats made. The police are investigating. I don't know who did it or why, but it's hard to ignore. It's scary to hear them. I think you should go," she said.

"Threats against you?" I asked.

She stared at me.

"Against your mother since she died?" I asked.

“I’m not supposed to talk to you or anyone about them,” she said.

“Why would you let me in your house if you thought I had anything to do with it?” I pressed.

She walked to the front door and opened it. “I wanted to hear your voice. See if it felt familiar.”

“Does it?” I asked as I approached the door.

“Please just go. I’ll speak to my father about risking his health outside in this cold. My mother wouldn’t want that. My son only has one grandparent left.” She was near tears. This really hadn’t gone as planned.

“I’m sorry to hear that.” I stepped out onto the porch. “I won’t bother you, anymore. Please just know that no one hurt her at my café. And I certainly didn’t threaten anyone, just for the record.”

She closed the door in my face.

I climbed into my little green VW Bug and warmed up. That hadn’t gone at all like I’d hoped. But at least she didn’t believe we’d hurt her mother. There was a logical reason her father blamed us—anyone else would mean blaming a friend, and he couldn’t bring himself to do that.

But threats against Mrs. O’Conner? The voice sample from Esme made sense, now. Her voice was deeper with a bit of raspiness to it. Mine was much higher. Maybe I didn’t sound like whoever had threatened them. Wouldn’t they disguise their voice? I texted Detective Shelley that I needed more information. Trying to smooth things over might be making things worse, somehow.

Sipping hot tea, I sat at the back table in the café and waited for the detective. Mr. O’Conner was still blustering outside to keep people out. Fred from the sandwich shop next door had tried to convince Mr. O’Conner to go home or at least have some soup. The old man was stubborn. Detective Shelley walked up to the door, and they exchanged a few words.

Mr. O’Conner finally packed up and got into his car.

The detective came in and headed right for my table.

“Is that why you wanted to see me?” she asked and nodded toward Mr. O’Conner.

“No, but thank you. The other shop owners have tried to talk sense into him or warm him up, but he doesn’t listen to anyone.” I gestured to the chair opposite me.

“Want something to drink?” Ellen, one of our baristas, asked.

“Large hot coffee, regular,” she said.

“Refill, please. Thanks,” I said.

“What was so urgent?” Shelley asked.

“I tried to speak to Mr. O’Conner yesterday. He started talking but then said he shouldn’t be here, and we shouldn’t be talking. It seemed odd. Today, I went to see his daughter. Just to deliver a gift basket for condolence and talk about her father’s protest. His safety.”

“It’s interfering with your business,” she said.

Ellen dropped off the drinks.

“Thanks, Ellen.” I nodded and took a sip.

“Yes, fine. Mr. O’Conner is hurting my business and the other businesses in the area. I can handle it. Mrs. Stevens seems sure it was natural causes and her father is just grieving. But then, she said we shouldn’t be talking either. She mentioned threats. You took a voice sample from Esmeralda. I need to know the whole story,” I said.

“The investigation is ongoing, but we’ve gotten far enough along. There were threats against Mrs. O’Conner after she’d made her insults to your shop and witches. Her husband got a phone call at home. The voice sounded female but also distorted. He let the machine get the rest of the calls that afternoon. It wasn’t Esmeralda, and no one thinks it’s you. There was a note left in the mailbox, as well. That’s part of why we can’t dismiss the idea that someone did do something to Mrs. O’Conner. Without the threats before her sudden death, there would be much less reason to put people on the case.” She was choosing her words very carefully.

“I understand. She did threaten our witch theme and pagan ways. But more than a few people have made rude remarks. Especially if they don’t know the history of the city. Salem gets all the attention for the witch trials. It’s part of the history here, too, and brings in some tourists. People lash out when they’re having a bad day. I don’t take it personally.” I rolled my eyes.

“Thank you for confirming that Mrs. O’Conner mentioned something about you being witches. I don’t believe you mentioned that, at first,” she said.

I shrugged. “It didn’t seem relevant. No one has ever done anything more than a little protesting. We decorate for Christmas and Easter, as well as all the other major holidays. We’re not trying convert anyone.”

“But someone took offense to her threats and made ones of their own. Were members of your coven here?” she asked.

“Esmeralda. My aunt, but she couldn’t threaten a mouse in her kitchen. There might’ve been some customers. A couple of the staff are. I can give you a list, but I hate the idea of my coven being harassed. I can be sure of the staff that was here but not of all the customers. Plus, word travels.” I couldn’t believe someone would threaten a customer.

“I understand. But it means someone heard about her threats and had a problem with her enough to make their own threats, and the woman was found dead the next day. You see, we have to investigate until the medical examiner comes back with cause of death. We did ask the family to keep their distance and not talk to you or anyone else about it. Tried to keep the threats a surprise piece of information, but Mr. O’Conner can’t seem to stay away.”

“He’s upset. I just don’t want him to get frostbite or have a heart attack. He shouts at people and gets so worked up in the cold.” I shook my head. “I’m sure he loved his wife very much, but she wouldn’t want him to end up in the hospital.”

“Thank you for calling me yesterday. The patrol car took him home. The officer had a talk with him. I called him later on. I’m not sure there is anything we can do short of arresting him to keep him from coming back. But if he's there for more than an hour at a time, call, and we'll have a patrol car take him home," she said.

"I will, and I'll let every shift manager know, in case he tries protesting overnight. I hope he's not that crazy. What a thing for your officers to do. Our tax dollars at work. Any idea how long before we get the information from the autopsy?" I asked.

"Could be another week. The results will be accurate. They are short-staffed. And there were a lot of deaths over the holidays. More than normal need to be tested and autopsied. The tox screen should be soon."

"Odds are that'll show nothing?" I asked.

"Most likely. We talked to her family and searched her things. No sign of drugs or abusing alcohol. Someone would've had to slip her poison. But to time that so perfectly that it worked overnight? I think Mrs. O'Conner got what most of us want in a death. To go to sleep one night and just not wake up." Detective Shelley smiled.

"But she was only in her sixties. I'd like to make it to at least eighty before I didn't wake up. She didn't have cancer or any other disease that might've hastened things?" I asked.

"Being Type 1 diabetic for as long as she was, it's serious. We think of people living with diabetes all the time. So it's not a death sentence, but it weakens the body and takes a toll. Type 2 can be cured and managed easier. Type 1 is rougher. I've had quite an education from her doctor and the ME. Mrs. O'Conner had some issues medically before. Her doctor wanted her to keep active but also rest and eat healthier. So, we'll let you know when we find out about the results. And if we find out who threatened her, that would go a long way to removing suspicion from your café. If you could provide me with a list of coven members who frequent your café, that'd be helpful." She nodded.

"I'll email it to you. I just can't imagine any of them making threats to a regular customer over a bad morning. Mrs. O'Conner never would've done anything. I keep expecting her to come through the door." I sipped my tea.

"Well, now, you understand why this isn't a closed case. I wish we could clear you and all your friends, but the threat specified witches. So, it sorts of shines a spotlight on your establishment. Thanks for the coffee. Send me that list by tonight, please."

Chapter 10

That night, I called a coven meeting. Technically, I had Esmeralda send the email. Everyone assembled on the second floor at ten p.m. The café was quiet but still had some customers, so we moved into my locked room.

“Did they get the results?” Ellen asked.

I sighed. “No. The autopsy could be another week or so. Hopefully, we’ll hear about the toxicology screen tomorrow. That may or may not help. The reason that the investigation is focused on us and isn’t just standard procedure is that someone made threats against Mrs. O’Conner the day she died.”

“What?” Aunt Mandy gasped.

“Yes, after she left here but before she died. Her husband let their machine record most of them for the police. As she was leaving, Mrs. O’Conner did make some comments about us being witches and the name of the café. Well, someone called her home and made threats. Someone also left a note in the mailbox that was found the next day after she had passed away.” I looked around at the stunned faces.

“So, they aren’t just picking on us because we are witches?” Ellen asked.

“No, they are following evidence. Someone left those messages. They even took a voice sample from me the day they told us about Mrs. O’Conner. They didn’t want us to know about the threats,” Esmeralda said.

“Because we’d protect each other?” Iris asked.

“Probably. I want to know who threatened Mrs. O’Conner. Someone went to a lot of trouble to find her phone number. To find her address. They were at her house. I need to be sure that we don’t have a snake in our midst. We don’t threaten people. We don’t hurt people or wish harm on them.” I made eye contact with many around the room, hoping I could discern the guilty party...if they were here.

“You really think they’re among us?” Esme asked.

“I don’t know. We must wait out the police investigation. That means bad publicity for the café. Mr. O’Conner has been protesting outside daily. And we must hope that the medical examiner has a clear cause of death. I don’t like waiting. I’m not very patient,” I said.

“We know that,” Violet said.

“What can we do?” Aunt Mandy asked.

“We could cast a spell on Mr. O’Conner to keep him at home,” Esme suggested.

“No, we’re not doing spells on innocent people unless it’s absolutely necessary. That could backfire and make us look guilty, as well.”

“It’d make us look like witches,” someone from the crowd joked.

“Cute. But since someone did something bad in the name of witches, we should find out who. That’s my first priority because I need to know I can trust my coven.” I’d worked on the spell most of the afternoon. There was a family spell book in the back. Most witches used standard spells, but I liked making my own.

I opened my hand and a red ball of light floated from my palm.

“What’s that going to do?” asked an older witch.

“Find the guilty party. Whoever threatened Mrs. O’Conner will have the red light hover over their heads,” I said.

When I pulled my hand away, the ball of light darted around the room, reading all the individuals. It zigged and zagged briefly near every woman in the room. Finally, it darted out the window.

The twins ran to the window. “It’s gone,” they said.

“Damn. Did you put a tracker on it?” Esme asked.

“No, I just wanted to rule out us,” I replied sheepishly. I was good at spells, but sometimes, I wasn’t as good at thinking things all the way through. But Esmerelda had a hundred years on me.

“Well, it wasn’t anyone here. But the police won’t accept a spell as proof, anyway,” Ellen said.

I smiled. “True, but I feel better. I know some of you are out to defend Wicca and paganism. You want to make more of a statement. I’d understand if Mrs. O’Conner’s threats upset you. We have the freedom of religion. We also have a responsibility to the paranormal creatures out there. The magical world must be protected. At least I feel like we have that obligation. If you don’t, there are other covens focused on more traditional Wiccan things. But we don’t want witch hunts, vampire hunts, or werewolf hunts. Can you imagine what big game hunters would pay to hunt a werewolf?”

“You’re giving the humans all the power,” Ellen said.

“No, I’m not forgetting our history,” I replied.

“Then, why are you keeping a hunter in your basement? Protecting them and the werewolves is a bit of a contradiction,” said one of the members.

“I understand it’s hard to reconcile for some people. Some people believe vamps and weres should run wild. If they kill, it’s their nature. But they are sentient beings capable of making choices, and choosing to kill is a crime. I won’t tolerate it. If they kill too many humans, we’ll be at war. The humans will hunt all of us down. Hunters have controlled the killing vamps and weres for centuries. It’s not a perfect system, but it works. Sometimes, a hunter is caught on tape, and the police want to charge them. So, we’re helping one. He was severely injured. Right now, the police are watching us, so moving the hunter is not an option. Once the case is resolved, he'll move on. You have my word—I'm not running a bed and breakfast for hunters." I rubbed the bridge of my nose as tension built behind my eyes.

"Maybe the café wasn't a great cover for this. Maybe a yoga studio?" Aunt Mandy suggested.

Esme shook her head. "Yoga is too much of a trend. You'd have to change out the main offering. Pilates is more in, now."

"Fortune telling?" Iris suggested.

"The gypsies have that market sewn up. You don't want them for enemies," I said.

"Candles and incense," Violet said.

Ellen stood. "Coffee and tea is good. We do a great business, and people talk. They talk on their phones and to their friends about anything. And we baristas listen. We know who hates Trump and who secretly supports him. Who never orders anything with the witch themes—those tend to be the strict bible thumpers who like our coffee but not the theme. Most people don't care. But we get all sorts of people in here for coffee. If you go to something more new age, you lose the people we want to keep an eye on. We need to be more Harry Potter."

"Harry Potter was protested in some areas," Esme said.

"But the vast majority of kids and parents approved. It was full of witches and werewolves but made people feel good. We can do that," Aunt Mandy said.

"A Harry Potter party?" I asked.

"Maybe for Halloween. I think we can revamp the wall by the front door. That plaque dedicated to the fallen witches in the 1600s that tells people about the history—it's good, but it might be in the wrong place," Aunt Mandy said.

"Hide the truth and put out the happy fake version?" Esme asked.

"It'd probably work. Move that plaque behind the counter. Move some of the cute witches from TV and movies around, so it's a mix." Iris nodded.

"Right. What if we made up a quiz? Which witch or wizard are you? They fill out a quiz and turn it in for a free small drink and the results." Violet pulled out her phone and made notes.

"Sounds like an app," I said.

"Exactly. What, you thought paper?" Iris rolled her eyes at me.

"Never. So, campier funny witches. More 'Sabrina the Teenage Witch' and less Maleficent. Maybe Esme could sit on the counter in cat form and crack jokes like Salem?" I teased.

"We've veered off the goal of this meeting." She glared at me.

"You're right, we have. I'm sorry. The café is a cover for working with paranormal beings. Trying to keep the peace with humans by keeping an eye on them. Keeping them close rather than pushing them away. A little rearrangement of the pics can't hurt. I like that app idea. Maybe we have the TVs in the main lounge play Sabrina, Bewitched, the Harry Potter movies, and so on. Hocus Pocus, Practical Magic. There are plenty of those shows and movies out there. Get the DVDs cheap and have theme weekends. It could become a thing. I get sick of news and morning talk shows that go on all day.”

“But in the morning, people are watching the weather and traffic,” Ellen added.

“True. So, the TV over the baristas stays on local weather, traffic, and news during morning rush. But the rest can play. Heck, Charmed. Get all of Buffy and Angel. I don’t want the staff to get sick of repeats. Mix it up, cute and light. Nothing too dark. We have the TVs on, but people generally ignore them.” I looked around.

“This is more of a business decision. Which is good. But the coven is under suspicion by cops,” a member spoke up.

I had skipped over that a bit. “That’s true, and the police might contact you to find out where you were and what you were doing. Don’t be afraid. Tell the truth. No one here did it. I trust my spell worked. But understand that we’re not about attacking anyone. Any human. That’s not going to help this situation or our overall goals.”

“So, what do we do?” Iris asked.

“Esmeralda and I came up with another spell. We’re going to find out, now, if Mrs. O’Conner’s death with natural or not. Then, I’ll know best how to proceed.” I set out the medium-sized cauldron.

Esme filled it with core ingredients and stirred. “It’ll only work if we have something that belonged to Mrs. O’Conner. What do you have?”

I smiled and pulled a little plastic bag from my pocket. “Hair from her daughter’s coat. I grabbed it as I left her house.”

“That’ll work?” Aunt Mandy asked.

“The daughter belonged to her mother. We just have to phrase it right.” I nodded to Esme.

“You can do it,” Esme said.

Great, no pressure! “Life and death. Good and evil. I ask for the truth to be revealed. Was the mother of this woman taken by nature or killed by mortal hands?” I dropped the hair in the mixture.

A puff of smoke later, and the brew turned red.

Chapter 11

“Red means?” Iris asked.

“Not natural,” I replied.

“Green would’ve meant natural,” Esme added.

“She was killed. We didn’t do it, but she was killed by someone’s actions.” I leaned slightly on the table.

“Or inactions,” Aunt Mandy said.

“Now what? The police won’t take that as evidence. Even if they would, we don’t want them to think it’s us,” Ellen said.

“Agreed. We keep it quiet since it means nothing to them,” Violet said.

“We don’t want them to take it as a confession from anyone. Whoever made those threats screwed us over, but the police aren’t on a witch hunt.” I sat down.

“Now, we wait?” my aunt asked.

I shook my head. “I have a list of where Mrs. O’Conner was, more or less. Work at the library and her garden club. The twins have been stalking her social media and her friends. So, I’ll fill in the blanks.”

“You’re going to solve the murder?” Esme asked.

“Someone has to. They’re looking in the wrong places or they think it’s just natural causes. We know it’s something more. Her daughter admitted that Mrs. O’Conner could be harsh and had some enemies. It’s worth talking to people,” I said.

My aunt frowned. “It’s dangerous.”

“I agree. You need to stay out of it. Let the police spin their wheels and figure it out. It’s not us. It’s not our problem,” Esme said.

“Yeah, we can call the cops on Mr. O’Conner every time we see him. Just wait until we get the test results and the cops do whatever,” Ellen said.

“So, let someone get away with murder? That’s not right either,” Violet said.

“It’s not a paranormal crime or problem. That’s what we should be involved with,” Esme said.

“But this case threatens our coven and our work. If it comes back with evidence that someone hurt her, we could be first in line as suspects. I’d rather know who else might’ve had a grudge or a motive.

I'm going to discreetly ask some questions and see what comes up. I can't do nothing. If you don't like it, tough. Meeting adjourned." I walked down the stairs.

I was at the library when it opened with a to-go carrier full of coffee. The staff was happy, and it broke the ice.

"This is a nice treat. What brings it on?" Mrs. Drew asked.

Mrs. Drew was the head librarian and skeptical. She was a bit younger than Mrs. O'Conner but not much.

"Well, Mrs. O'Conner was a regular customer. I know she worked here. I just wondered if anyone knows what really happened. She left my shop in good health, if not happy about an order mix-up," I said.

"And that spill. She was so upset. Her husband brought her a new set of clothes from home," said Audrey, a redheaded part-timer.

"Accidents happen. I just wondered if she seemed ill to anyone else or things got worse," I said.

"The police have been here," Mrs. Drew said. "We answered their questions."

"I understand. It's just been bugging me. We're waiting on test results. But Mr. O'Conner is so angry. He blames my shop, and I'm just trying to figure out why or what we can do," I replied.

A few of the women just shook their heads and went back to work.

"Maybe we should speak alone," Mrs. Drew said.

"Sure." I followed her into her office.

"If you're trying to throw suspicion onto us, it won't work," Mrs. Drew said.

"I'm not trying to throw anything. The police seem to think it was natural causes. It's Mr. O'Conner who seems to be pushing to find someone to blame. I know Mrs. O'Conner was fine when she left my shop. I'm just trying to narrow down when she started to show signs of illness or whatever I can find out," I replied.

"I've known the O'Connors for a long time. If there is reason to think something else happened, I'm sure Mr. O'Conner has his reasons. I don't know them. But Mrs. O'Conner was very upset about the coffee spill. Once she changed, she seemed fine. She left for a lunch with a friend of hers about noon. Nothing was wrong with her," she said.

"That's good. So, nothing happened here to upset her. Nothing weird. No arguments. No enemies?" I asked.

"Of course not. She's worked her part-time for years. We have a nice calm group of people who love books. That's all," Mrs. Drew said.

"Do you know who she had lunch with?" I asked.

Mrs. Drew shook her head. "A friend. They went to the Italian place on the corner. She came back and worked until about two. That was it. She never complained of anything. Being tired or her food disagreeing with her. I've seen her get a bit ill in the past if she misses a meal or needs a bit more insulin, but she was on top of it and had all her stuff with her always."

"So, she'd been ill before. What happened? I mean, what if she couldn't take care of herself?" I asked.

"Audrey also has diabetes, so she knew how to take blood sugar. And depending on the results, it was either she'd need juice or insulin. But Mrs. O'Conner was so on top of her condition it was never necessary. She only told us because of her grandson. He has Type 1, as well. She made us all take a first aid class and gave us her own class on diabetes. We do a summer program with a lot of kids and some after school programs, as well, so she wanted to know her grandson was safe, even if she wasn't working that day." Mrs. Drew sighed sharply.

"I understand her caring about her grandson. Kids don't want to take care of themselves. But I'm sure she taught him to be responsible," I said.

Mrs. Drew tilted her head in a way that said she didn't fully agree. "He isn't so young. Eighth grade, I believe. He resents being sick. Avoided talking to her when he would come for programs. But what kid wants their grandma fussing over them when they're with their friends?"

"I understand. But you ladies aren't nurses. It's good to know what you can do, but it's dangerous to mess with someone else's medication. I don't think I could do that unless it was family," I admitted.

"I agree. Luckily, we haven't had that issue come up. The point is there was no sign of her being ill at all that day. She was cold and couldn't get warm, but a lot of people were saying that. It was bitter cold, and the wind whipped through people," she said.

"It is a serious winter. If that's all you remember, I'll get out of your hair," I said.

She sipped her coffee. "That's all. But thanks for the morning java," she said.

"Sure." I grabbed my purse and headed out of her office.

Audrey was sitting behind the desk. For some reason, I paused and wanted to chat with her a bit. She didn't make eye contact, so my instinct said there was something to talk about.

"Hi, Audrey. Mind if I ask you a couple things?" I asked.

She looked around and shrugged. "Mrs. Drew probably covered it all."

"I know. The big stuff. She mentioned you were also a diabetic and knew how to test blood and all of that. So, you might notice even better if Mrs. O'Conner had any signs that she wasn't feeling great when she was at work that day. Or if I missed something," I said.

Audrey shook her head. "She was fine. She generally wanted to be left alone and even more on that day."

"Just a bad day?" I asked.

She lifted a shoulder. "She and I didn't really get along, so she didn't confide in me."

"Mrs. Drew made it sound like you were her diabetic backup," I replied.

"That was her way of forgetting about it. Mrs. O'Conner always picked on me for my eating habits. She was rail thin, and I'm not." Audrey blushed.

She was a bit plump, but I could see Mrs. O’Conner being a bit critical. “She picked on you?”

“If I ate better, exercised more—I could get rid of my diabetes. She never could. I don’t know why it was such a big deal to her. I’ve always had bad asthma, and it made even gym class hard.” She sniffled.

“Don’t feel bad. I know she said some harsh things to me and my baristas, at times. But all that proves is she was unhappy and took it out on others. Did she have any real enemies here?” I asked.

“Well, she picked on me. Everyone else just avoided her. Mrs. Drew would be the closest thing to an enemy, but that was just Mrs. O’Conner resenting that they didn’t give her the top job,” Audrey said.

“But she only works part-time,” I said.

Audrey nodded. “She wanted the top job and full-time work. Her husband was retired, and he was older. He was on Medicare, but she wasn’t sixty-five yet when the job was decided. I think she is, now. Anyway, she wanted it for the benefits. But when they talked to the staff, no one wanted to work for her. Mrs. Drew is strict and dull but fair and not critical.”

“Much better. So, Mrs. Drew would have no reason to hurt her,” I said.

“Hurt her? We all thought it was natural causes,” Audrey said. Her eyebrows shot up in worry.

“Well, the police are looking around for clues or enemies. Maybe they know something they won’t tell us,” I fibbed.

“You think?” she asked.

I shrugged. “I’ve talked to all my staff, and no one did anything to her drink. I mean, if someone had added a bunch of sugar she hadn’t ordered, she’d have tasted it. If they’d used real sugar instead of an artificial sweetener, she’d feel it. But, obviously, that wasn’t the case because she didn’t get ill when she was here. It’d affect her fairly quickly, right? If someone did that?”

She nodded. “In a drink, definitely. But she always has her testing kit and insulin with her, so she’d just dose. She had her garden club later and dinner with her family. It sounds like she made it through all those things, so odds are it was natural causes in the night.”

“Probably. Thanks. I just wanted to be sure she didn’t get sick after she left my place. I didn’t want to ignore a problem if there was one,” I explained.

“You sound like a great boss. But I think you’re good. I should get back to work.” Audrey looked around.

“Of course, sorry. Blame me for asking a million questions. One more. Do you know who she was having lunch with that day?” I couldn’t help but try.

“A friend. Olive?” She frowned. “I think.”

“Thanks.” I waved as I left.

Chapter 12

Walking to the front door of my café, I barely looked at Mr. O’Conner, who didn’t bother trying to protest my going in.

“Please go home or I will call the police. You’re shivering,” I said as I pulled the door behind me against the nasty winter wind.

He didn’t move.

I walked into the busy café and met three people waiting for my attention with issues that had nothing to do with coffee or tea.

Aunt Mandy came up first. “Ryan is over the infection. He wants to help. To work or something. Vinny told him he can’t leave, now. Not with the police around.”

I nodded. “He can do inventory if he wants, but he’s not allowed up here.”

“If we could pass him off as a new hire, we might could move him on quicker,” she said.

“They’ll see him leave but never arrive. You think they won’t notice that? No. Sorry, he stays down there or I’ll lock him up,” I said.

Esme walked up next. “Nothing?”

“Nothing really. But Mrs. O’Conner was fine at the library and through lunch, so there’s no indication whatever it is came from us with any delay. She wasn’t sick. No one saw her dose with insulin or anything.”

“Good. The coven is grumbling about this.” Esme headed to my table, and I followed her.

Margaret came over with my usual hot coffee.

“Thanks,” I said.

Once Margaret was gone, I asked Esme, “What are they complaining about? I’m trying to make sure we’re in the clear.”

We sat, and I took a long drink of warming mocha-flavored coffee.

Esme sighed. “They think Mr. O’Conner is making such a fuss that he’s the one behind the threats. He staged them.”

“Staged them?” I asked, trying to wrap my brain around that motive.

“Before his wife died. Once he knew she was so upset, maybe he thought it’d be good to get us in trouble. So, he had someone leave the messages and write the note. He planned to have it rattle his wife and she'd go to the police. Get us in trouble, and his wife would have something to keep her busy and feel like she was justified."

"That's awful. Making up a threat. I don't see him doing that just for fun."

Esme gave me a look that said I was naive. "If Mrs. O'Conner is this much trouble for a coffee shop she's in a few minutes a day, imagine what a headache she is to her husband."

I opened my mouth, but instead of words, I drank some coffee and mulled over the idea. She didn't seem to be sweet to anyone.

"But he's so devoted to her. Why protest us now if he knows we didn't do anything?"

"He doesn't want them to find out it was an inside fake threat. Once the medical stuff comes back, he'll probably stop, and the case will close." Esme shrugged. "It's a theory."

"Well, Mrs. O'Conner's boss didn't like her much. Mrs. O'Conner wanted the boss' job and didn't get it. But the boss seems like she was stuck with the grouchy part-timer. I could twist that into a motive if I wanted to." I swirled my coffee cup to mix up the flavor.

"We could say your need to investigate is a way of throwing suspicion off of you." Esme shook her head.

"If they didn't know me, maybe. I'm trying to help people. I used all the money my parents left me to open this café so we had a place for the coven to meet and a way to tap into human conversations. I want to keep the peace and help everyone." I took another swig of my coffee.

"Well, the coven wants to believe you put the paranormal beings first. You have a soft spot for humans."

"We're witches. We're humans with powers. My aunt and uncle have no powers. My cousins think they might have some, but none have shown up, and they're eighteen," I said softly.

"We all know that. You and your mother were the powerful line. You really should be thinking about finding a powerful wizard and continuing that line," Esme said with a grin.

I frowned and slowly set my cup down to avoid dropping it. "You want to talk about me having kids? Why don't you have some first?"

"I can't. I can't spend half of my time as a cat and be pregnant. The baby wouldn't shift so I'd be stuck as a human and lose my nine lives."

"Or have a litter of kittens. Would they have your shifting power?" I asked.

"No, and I'm not having kittens," she whispered through her teeth.

We were at the back table near the kitchen. All the good tables were on the other side, and the nearest one was five feet away. The only ones who might overhear anything were staff, and the loudness of the machines and the TV piping in a witch movie made sure they couldn't overhear us.

"That sucks. Do you want kids?" I asked.

She shook her head. "My dad took off on my mom. I like men, but children are a burden," Esme said.

I bit my lip. I'd always felt like a burden to my aunt and uncle, and I wasn't even their kid. They hadn't chosen to have me the way they'd tried to have the twins. My aunt hadn't been able to become pregnant again after Violent and Iris.

"You okay?" Esme asked.

"Yeah. My aunt and uncle never made me feel like burden, even though I certainly was."

"No, that's different. That's stepping up and taking care of your family. If something happened to them, I would've taken care of you and the twins. I'm only a distant cousin of your mother and aunt, but that's what family does." She patted my hand.

"I'm only twenty-five—I'm not in a rush to have a bunch of magical kids to deal with. I mean, there isn't a Hogwarts to ship them off to." That would really be nice.

She laughed. "True. You were always moving things with your mind, just because you could."

"What brought on this baby talk?" I asked.

Esme shrugged. "I think of the future of the coven. Of the paranormal people. We need powerful people to step up like you have. And consolidating power would only help you."

"So, the paranormal world is as sexist as the rest of humanity?" I asked.

Esme glared at me. "No and yes. Wicca and many pagan religions elevate women and the Goddess. Mother Earth. But, face it, power wins. A vampire king. A pack of strong male werewolves. Those aren't things to be discounted. If you had a husband who was as strong as you, there would be less grumbling and questioning. You'd have a united front."

"I don't mind being questioned. I'm not all-knowing. I can take the input and doubt and learn from it. But if I run into any super-hot wizards worth procreating with, I'll let you know," I said.

"I have a couple in mind," Esme said.

"Then, you have some fun with them," I said.

"I have my share of fun. I'm thinking of the future, long term, and so should you," she said.

"I'm not going to live as long as you will. I'm just thinking about Mrs. O'Conner and that hunter in my basement." The twins walked in. "Oh, I need to talk to the twins. Nag me later, okay?"

Esme sighed and walked to the basement stairs. I caught her shifting out of the corner of my eye. She'd pout for a bit and get over it. I was too young to get married. There was no way I'd get married just to produce ultra-powerful little witches. Kids were a lot of work, and I wasn't in a rush.

The twins sat and removed their gloves and scarves. "Hi," they said in unison.

"Hey, sorry to drag you back here. How's classes?" I asked.

"Fine," they said, again together.

"We're done for today," Iris said.

"Cool. I just wanted to ask out about who Mrs. O'Conner might've had lunch with the day of her death. All I could get was where and the name Olive," I said.

"I got this. Get me some tea?" Violet asked her twin.

Iris headed for the counter.

"Everything okay?" I asked.

Violet nodded. “Dating as a twin is tricky. Guys don’t get it. And when they can’t tell us apart, it’s really weird.”

“Yikes, another reason I’m glad I wasn’t a twin,” I said.

“You a twin? That’d be awesome. Double the powers.” She smiled and pulled out her tablet. “I remember someone named Olive on her friend list in Facebook. Old people.”

“Facebook is old, now?” I didn’t really do social media. The café had a page that we made sure was updated, quirky, and fun, but I didn’t feel the need to share.

She laughed. “When grandparents are doing it, yes. Get Snapchat.”

“Isn’t that for sexting?” I asked.

“It’s grown beyond that,” she replied.

“I’m good. Do you have info on Olive?” I asked.

“Olive Reynolds. Widowed. Lives not far from here. Why do people put so much info out there?” She sighed.

I pulled out my phone and Googled the name. Her address popped up. “Got her. Thanks! I’d have spent all afternoon on Mrs. O’Conner’s Facebook to find that. And you guys did all the work already.”

Iris returned with two big cups of tea. “Good?”

“I got what I need. Thanks. You two stay warm. Do your homework,” I said.

“You’re such a mom. Be more of a sister,” Iris said.

I shuddered at being called a mom. “Fine. Hit a party and drink until you puke. But don’t blame me when your dad tracks you down and raises hell. He never let me have too much fun as a teenager.”

“You didn’t go to college,” Violet said.

“Vi,” Iris said.

“It’s okay. I didn’t. Esme thought it was more important for me to work on powers, and I did. But I also worked part-time in coffee shops. So, I was sort of training on how to run this. Not everyone is college material, but you two are super smart, so don’t blow it. There is plenty of time for guys when you’ve got a degree,” I said.

“Such a mom,” they said in unison.

“Thanks, I needed that.” I pulled my gloves out of my pocket and suited up for the blustery outside. “I need to go bug Olive Reynolds.”

Part of me wanted to use a truth potion on these women, but if I did, they’d remember all of the questions. If I used a memory spell on them, it might work. But they might get suspicious if they couldn’t remember what we talked about. Magic worked for some, but for now, I had to try it the human way. The house was pleasant-looking on the outside. It had a cottage feel, and the street was quiet. A murderer couldn’t live here. At least, that’s how it felt.

I knocked on the door, and a stern woman opened it.

“Can I help you?” she asked.

“I’m sorry to just show up. My name is Claudia Crestwood. I own the Witch’s Brew coffee shop.

Mrs. O’Conner was a regular customer. And I understand that she was a friend of yours,” I said.

I extended my hand, but she just looked at it.

“What about her?” she asked.

“As you might know, her husband is blaming my café for her death. I was hoping to find a friend of his to talk some sense into him. He’s standing out in front of my café, freezing. He’s risking his health for nothing,” I said.

“You know it’s nothing?” she asked.

I nodded. “I checked with the library. Mrs. O’Conner was fine there. If we’d done anything, she’s have been sick.”

“Really. There are slow-acting poisons, I’m sure.” She eyed me coldly.

“We’ll have to wait for the tox screen for that proof, but I don’t know anything about poison,” I said.

“Just potions. Why don’t you come in? For some tea. Warm up,” she said.

“Thanks.” I felt like I was walking into something I wasn’t ready for, but at least it was warm.

I stomped the snow off my boots. I was pointed to a proper living room for entertaining with no TV and uncomfortable furniture. I chose an armchair on one side of a cute little wooden table.

I cast a warming spell on my hands and feet while waiting for Mrs. Reynolds to bring out the tea. I hadn’t expected to be on the porch for so long.

Mrs. Reynolds brought out a tray with a fussy ceramic tea set that looked older than I was. She was being polite when I felt like she didn’t want me there. She poured the tea and handed me a cup.

“Thank you. So, you don’t like our potions?” I asked.

“My niece is a Wiccan. Pagan. Or whatever. She lives in New York City. Don’t think I’m prejudiced. Martha O’Conner criticized everyone and everything. Her husband, her daughter, and her grandson.” She sipped her tea with pursed lips.

“And her friends?” I asked.

She nodded. “Her friends, too. But she never was nasty enough to make anyone want to kill. She took care of herself. I suspect her husband is just so shocked. No one thought she could ever die. The woman would have a setback and recover. She’d come back stronger. We never thought she’d die before any of us. It’s a shame.”

“So, you don’t know anyone who really wanted to hurt her?” I asked.

“No. Her husband is upset and lost, honestly. She wore the pants in that family. I’ve invited him over for dinner, if that helps. I can try to help him forge a new routine. See his grandson, his daughter, and so on. He’ll need a cleaning lady. I can help him find one. And take him to the grocery store. Help him with those habits.” She sipped her tea.

“That’s very nice of you. Maybe you can help him see we didn’t do anything to hurt her. She had a bad day, but we’re not out to hurt our customers.” I enjoyed the hot drink.

“He told me about the threats. That someone left messages. I’m sure it wasn’t you. You’re a businesswoman. I understand that. I respect that. I worked in the office at my late husband’s dental practice. I know what it’s like when patients aren’t happy. Customers are the same. But someone in your little witch group got out of hand. You need to take control. Be the boss if that’s what you are.”

“I’m not the boss of all the witches in Hartford. If someone was offended by her comments, that doesn’t mean I’m responsible for their actions. Mr. O’Conner wants a scapegoat. I’m not going to be it. The police will get the results soon, but my business could be ruined before then. We’re seeing fewer customers. If you can convince Mr. O’Conner to stop protesting, that’d be wonderful,” I said.

“I’m not sure I have that sort of influence,” she lied with a sweet smile.

A shiver ran down my back. She was moving in on the widower a bit fast.

“I think if you compare it to your late husband’s business, I think he might. Some people must’ve lost a tooth or had a bad time. Things can’t always go perfectly. If those patients had protested outside of the office, that seriously could’ve ruined his reputation. Is it fair to do that to others without real proof?” I asked.

She shook her head and stiffened her spine. “Your shop has a good reputation. Martha hated seeing chains all over the city. She’d be upset if your place went under because of her husband’s grief. I’ll try.”

“Thank you.” Things had taken a turn, but if she could help and was willing to, I could use it.

Did she have a motive? She seemed to have a big interest in Mr. O’Conner, but was that motive for murder?

“How long were you friends with Mrs. O’Conner?” I asked.

“Oh, forever. High school. She and I competed over everything.”

“Did you always win?”

“It was usually a tie. I got head cheerleader, and she got homecoming queen. That sort of thing. We both married men with good careers. I was a little more set than she was, but my husband died. I didn’t want to win this way.” She poured more tea.

I checked out her jewelry. It looked like she’d won. But she didn’t seem the type of woman to kill for it. She probably wanted to win with a clear conscience. I’d gone to school with girls like that. “I never had a chance of winning in high school. The popular girls made fun of my hair and my aunt’s hippie ways. They asked what happened to my parents. They were normal, and that made them win. I never wanted to be a cheerleader. Homecoming queen? Maybe for a few seconds, but you can’t expect votes when you don’t participate.”

“No Wiccan club?” she asked.

I shrugged. “I was already in a real coven. I had two educations going on. But I’m happy, so that stuff didn’t matter in the end.”

“No? What happened to your parents?” she asked.

“They died when I was young. But I had my aunt and uncle, plus two cousins. My mom and aunt were both sort of the odd ones in the family,” I admitted.

“And you lost her. No wonder you didn’t want to join in in high school. Probably no close friends?” she asked.

“Not really. No. I had friends but not close.” I downed another cup of tea, this time without taking my time.

“I’m not surprised. You lost your parents. You were afraid to get attached to new people. Afraid they’d leave you just like your parents did,” she said.

“I had my family.” It couldn’t be that simple.

“Yes, you still had family taking care of you, and you loved them. It’d be hard to lose them. So, why add people to the list of ones who could hurt you? I don’t blame you. And, now, you’re worried your business could be taken from you.”

“Was your husband a dentist or a shrink?” I asked.

She smiled. “You’d be surprised how much people share at a dentist’s office. I held a lot of hands. Heard a lot of crazy reasons why people feared the dentist. The pain. The genetic problems. Emergencies. You see people when they are very vulnerable. No one likes the dentist unless they have naturally strong and pretty teeth. Don’t worry; I’ll talk to Mr. O’Conner. Hopefully, the police will close the case soon, but I can try to talk some sense into that man.”

“Thanks. I should get back to the coffee shop,” I said.

“Bundle up; it’s cold.” She walked me to the door.

Did I keep people at a distance to keep from being hurt? I never dated guys seriously. I dated, but I was never interested in relationships. I hiked out to my car and cranked up the heat as I headed back to the café. I had to deal with this work problem and then Ryan. When I got free time, I’d worry about friends and boyfriends.

Chapter 13

I was dead to the world when a vampire came pounding on my bedroom door. Snuggling under the blankets, I never wanted to move. After a day out in the harsh weather, I was finally warm, again.

“What?” I shouted.

“It’s Brad. You need to get out here. Your guest is trying to leave,” he said.

“Damn. Stop him. I’ll be right there.” I swung my legs out and shoved my feet right into the fuzzy boots. My flannel pajama pants, a gift from the twins, had frogs with little crowns on them. Some were making kissy faces, and some were winking. My cousins and I didn’t have the same taste, but the pants were warm. My legs always got cold first, but a long tank top worked just fine because my shoulders never seemed to get chilly.

I ran my fingers through my hair then grabbed a big black sweater, just in case the fight had moved outside.

I hustled down the stairs and found two other vamps blocking Ryan’s exit. He was at the top of the basement stairs. Perfect. Right where customers could see and hear him.

“Tell these walking dead things with dental issues to get out of my way,” Ryan yelled.

“You’re not leaving. Not with the police around.”

“I can’t stay down there another minute. I’m going crazy,” he said.

“Then, you should’ve left before this mess happened. I can’t help it. Get back down there and go to sleep.” I folded my arms.

“Hey, I tried to escape but you wouldn’t let me. I could help clean up here. I could learn to make coffee,” he offered.

“You just insulted my staff. You hunt vampires—they don’t want to work with you. I don’t trust you to work with them.” I waved my hand at him; that shoved him back a few steps.

“Big tough witch. That’s all you’ve got?” he mocked.

I went to the landline, while the vamps continued to cover Ryan, and called my uncle.

“He’s getting stir crazy,” he said.

“I know. I’m about to lock him up. He won’t cooperate.” I didn’t want to upset my uncle, but he had to take some responsibility for what he’d taken in and dumped on me.

"I'll be there in the morning and keep him busy during the day. You can't let him do something at night?" my uncle asked.

"I can't be up all night babysitting him and the vampires. That mix will not go well," I pointed out.

"Right. Fine. Do what you need to do to keep him under control. Night." He hung up.

"Great." I hung up the phone as the bell jingled over the door.

The wind gusted in, and I wrapped my sweater around me.

I nodded to the vamps to go deal with the customer. When I looked over to see who it was, I expected a college student on deadline or utility workers out repairing lines. We got a lot of cops and firemen who needed refueling overnight. Sometimes, nurses and EMTs. This man was none of those. He was in a dark suit with his hair slicked back. His watch was expensive, but there was something more. He was powerful. Not human power. My kind of power. I knew him.

He ordered a dark roast black with a double shot of no sleep potion.

"You'll be up all night," I warned him.

"I do my best work at night." He didn't smile. "You're Claudia Crestwood?"

"I am. Have we met?" I asked.

"I believe so, but it's been a long time. Your cousin mentioned you were having some human problems. I might be able to help," he offered.

"I've got two human problems, right now, but no, thanks. I can handle it. What cousin?" I asked.

"Esmeralda. She and my aunt are very good friends. Very old friends," he said.

"So, your aunt does the nine lives thing, too?" I asked.

He nodded. "That is a small group. I hear you're almost as powerful as your cousin. Or me."

I showed no reaction. "I'm strong enough. I'm just trying to handle my human problems without major magic. I don't want to untangle a mess by causing a bigger one."

Ryan watched from the doorway on the top step. I should lock him up. I cast a spell to cover my butt, any non-magical people would forget anything they saw in the shop, including Ryan.

"You're right. Some witches use magic too publicly or frequently and get caught up in trying to cover their tracks. Exposure is dangerous," the customer agreed.

"Exactly. I have a customer who died, and our spell says it was not natural causes. But the police think it was. They're looking into it. I'm trying to find the killer, so the widower will stop protesting my shop. And so I can get rid of my other human problem," I glanced back at the doorway.

"He is staring a lot. A former lover you don't like?" he asked.

I laughed. "Hardly. A hunter who got caught by humans, and my uncle is giving him sanctuary in my shop."

"Ryan Jones." The hunter stepped out from the shadows and extended a hand, introducing himself to the customer. The vampires behind the counter moved to drag Ryan down the stairs, but I shook my head at them. We didn't need a big incident in front of customers.

I tried to place the wizard. Remember his name. He hadn't been at school with me. From what he claimed about his aunt and Esme, he was one of the Killean family that could trace their line back to the Druids. They were handsome, powerful, and not very social. So far, this man hit all the marks. He was a year or two older than me, I'd guess.

"Bran Killean," he replied without shaking hands.

"Bran? Like Game of Thrones? You poor thing," I stifled a giggle.

"The Celtic name means king or raven, so it's a pretty obvious name choice for Mr. Martin since the boy chases a raven around. My middle name is no better, so Bran is it." He took his coffee and sipped it.

"I haven't seen you in here," I said.

"You sleep at night," Brad said, grinning at Bran like a fool. He'd been a step or two behind the hunter, watching him like a hawk.

I rolled my eyes. "You're a vampire, Mr. Killean?"

"No. I deal with people all day and get my work done best at night. I catnap. But I don't want to interrupt your late-night tryst." He grinned slightly.

I looked down and laughed. "Yeah. My best lingerie. Please. This hunter keeps trying to escape."

"So, let him go. Or is he a frog you turned into a prince, but he's not up to snuff?" Bran asked.

"My cousins gave me these pajamas. They're warm. This hunter has to stay. The police are probably still watching the building. It's a long story, but we saved him, and he's got to deal with helping us," I said.

"You wanted me gone as soon as I was healthy enough. I'm healthy," he said. "Help me get out of here, and I'll do anything you want."

Bran's eyebrow raised at that offer. For a split-second, I thought he might be gay. That'd be my luck. Any guy who captured my interest was gay, taken, or a bad boy, as my aunt called them.

"What could you possibly do for me?" Bran asked.

"The Killeans are a powerful magical family, Ryan. They don't need you any more than I do," I said.

"Maybe he's strong enough to make me invisible. The police never saw me enter, but they don't have to see me leave either. And make it last for a while so I can get far away." Ryan nodded.

"I'm sure Ms. Crestwood is strong enough to render you invisible. She has her reasons for keeping you around. Maybe you'd run to the police or get her in trouble, somehow." Bran shook his head at Ryan.

Then, Bran snapped his fingers. Ryan passed out right there on the floor.

"Why did you do that?" I asked.

"I was bored with him. He's a user. He thinks he's noble, but the only hunters I trust are gypsies, like your uncle. These types are in it for the kill." Bran looked down his nose at Ryan.

"I felt the same way, but my uncle brought him here. I couldn't say no. And then, the customer thing happened. I don't need him being caught by the police or followed back here if he needs something. He'll make it worse, even if I made him permanently invisible," I said.

"Then, you should keep him locked up. A human with a superiority complex is more dangerous than an untamed vampire." Bran stared at my legs, again.

"Sorry, I wasn't expecting company." I tugged my sweater lower to try and cover the goofy pajama pants. "My cousins and I have very different styles. But I can't hurt their feelings."

"Those are not from Esmeralda." He laughed.

His booming laugh sent a rush through me. "No, not Esme. My uncle's children. I was raised by my aunt and uncle. They have a set of twins, only eighteen, now. I got these a couple Christmases ago. Appropriate for a single girl or a single witch."

"Still searching for Prince Charming? There has to be a better story than that." He stepped over Ryan's limp body. "Tell me."

"I'm the boss here, Mr. Killeen, not you. Brad will get you another drink of your choice on the house for the trouble. I'll get Ryan down to a cell," I said.

"I don't need a free coffee. I need to know about the frogs," he said.

I almost turned around and snapped at him. But there was a longing, a sadness about him that made me pause. "You tell anyone, and I'll deny and make you pay."

He didn't look scared. But if he knew Esme, he knew how powerful I was. My guess was he was one of her choices for me.

"Promise," I said.

"Who would I tell?" he asked.

"Senior prom. My date was just a guy who asked me. I wasn't dating him. I didn't know him well, but it meant so much to my aunt that I go. Have the prom experience and all the pictures. It made her happy. He was all hands and lips. Like I was supposed to sleep with him because it was prom. I turned him into a frog on the ride home and sent the limo back to his parents' house like that." I shrugged.

"He stayed that way for how long?" Bran asked.

"A couple hours at least. His parents were freaking out. They thought he'd been kidnapped. They put the frog in the yard. I swore up and down he was fine when he dropped me off. A perfect gentleman, which was a lie. But I wasn't going to any after parties with him. I hinted he may have gone drinking with a few friends after he dropped me off. Finally, he turned human in the backyard. Naked. He was confused. His parents thought he'd gotten plastered and went wild with his friends. They grounded him for a week." I couldn't hide my smile.

"Transfiguration at that level. Of a human. For that long, impressive for a seventeen year old," he said.

"My aunt was mad at me. Exposure. Do no harm. Sometimes, I can't help myself, but I try not to use my powers without thinking it through." I looked down at Ryan. "I don't trust him enough to let him loose, yet.”

“Trust those instincts. We’re at war with humanity in some ways. We can never forget that,” he said.

I shook my head. “My aunt and cousins have no powers. Esme does, of course, but my uncle is a human gypsy. I don’t want to fight humans.”

“I don’t either. But if they knew the full extent of our world, we would be at war. We’re more powerful than they are.”

“Yet we don’t seek to dominate them,” I said.

“Evolution has its advantages. But I do appreciate your work here. Your involvement with humans keeps us all informed. It’s a great service, and if I can be of help to you, just call.” He handed me a card.

“I don’t inform you of anything.” I took the card anyway.

“Esmeralda does. What’s necessary. There is a network of information. We appreciate it.” He looked around. “It’s a lovely shop.”

“What do you do?” I asked.

“My family owns several businesses,” he said stealthily.

“That makes you a Soprano? Is there a paranormal mob? I never heard of that,” I said.

He laughed. “No? Well, I suppose, if there was one, we’d be it. If you cross my family, you’ll pay. Much like, if someone crossed you, he’d be a frog.”

I felt my cheeks burn. “I can do a lot worse, now.”

“I’m sure of it. We own a funeral home. A car dealership. A lawn and snow service company. A yarn and craft store my aunt insisted on that is actually turning a profit.”

“That’s convenient. Pick what you want to do, and the family buys you a business.” I knew they had money, but that’s big, big money.

“Not quite. You have to pay your dues working in a family business and make a proposal for a new one. We make our money honestly; we always have. Invest it wisely. We don’t bother others, and they don’t bother us. We do deal with humans as customers, so I understand, but we tend to use magic to resolve things quicker. Your approach is unique.”

“It sounds so calm.” I envied him.

“Your life sounds like an adventure. I hope your human death case is resolved.” He finished his coffee and tossed the cup in the trash.

“Thanks. I’m trying to solve it myself, but doing things the human way sucks.” I rubbed my neck. “I need to get this one locked up and get back to bed. I need more than a catnap.”

“Of course. But if you had something from all the suspects, you could scry for the killer,” he suggested.

“I could. But getting an item isn’t easy. And with more than one person in a location as a suspect, it would only help so much.” I shrugged.

“Do you need any help?” He pointed Ryan.

I chuckled and waved my hand. His limp body swiftly lifted off the ground. I guided him down the stairs and into a cell. I didn't look back to see if Bran was impressed or not. He wasn't what I expected from the Killean family. I'd heard they were snobs who looked down on families like mine, those with non-magical members. Also families that socialized with humans too much and willingly weren't big with the paranormal royalty. My line was old and strong, but I couldn't trace it back to Stonehenge. That stuff didn't matter to me. The idea of Bran mowing a lawn or selling cars on his summer breaks from school made me smile. Maybe Esme had better taste in men than I'd given her credit for.

Chapter 14

That morning, I had the same drink Bran had plus vanilla creamer. The caffeine jolt helped. It'd been hard to get back to sleep after such a weird first encounter. The PJs hadn't helped, but I wasn't a Goth girl. I didn't sport a witch style all the time. Okay, the frogs were lame. But it was a gift and warm.

Today, I was in all black: big black boots that went to my knees, leggings that kept me warm and a black with gray trim sweater dress that came to the edge of the boots and down to my elbows.

"Why is Ryan locked up?" my aunt asked softly as she sat at my table.

"He tried to escape last night. Attacked some vamps. I don't need him lashing out. I called Uncle Vinny. He's supposed to come over today and help soothe the savage hunter." I rolled my eyes.

"He wants you to make him invisible," she said.

"He said that last night, too. No, I can't trust him. I wish Vin wouldn't associate with non-gypsy hunters. They go rogue too much." I shook my head.

"Fine. I hope this case is over soon." She went off in a foul mood.

I wasn't in a better one. I had to meet the garden club today. I'd checked that the meeting was still scheduled, given that gardening wasn't really popular in the winter. But they still met, so I was going. They had a room at the local social center, so it wasn't like pushing in on Mrs. Reynolds in her home.

I watched the front. No Mr. O'Conner yet today, but it was early.

Esme sat across from me with a smug expression.

"What? Did you kill Ryan? I won't tell. Give the body to the cops," I said.

She pointed at me. "That's the sort of dark humor that makes people worry about you. You're normal some of the time and then sound positively evil."

"It's a quirky sense of humor. That's all." I shrugged and checked my messages on my phone.

"I heard that Bran Killeen came by last night," she said.

I nodded. "I guess he comes by a lot at night when I'm asleep. Ryan tried to run, so I had to deal with that."

"Sounds like you made an impression," Esme smiled.

"Froggy PJ bottoms and a bulky black sweater with winter boots. I'm sure I did." I put his card information into my phone. "Who does cards, anymore?"

“Polite people. You don’t have to wait for someone to put in the info and repeat it ten times. You hand over the card, and they can input the info or not. You’re smart to keep him on file.” She grabbed the card. “He’s good looking.”

“If you’ve got your eye on him, don’t worry about me. Strictly paranormal connections.” I smiled.

“Really, Claudia. You bumped into one of the men I’d love to see you with. I knew he came here, but you don’t think I could’ve maneuvered Ryan to misbehave just when Bran was about to come in,” she said.

I sat back. “I didn’t say when Ryan acted up.”

“Of course you did. Or Brad did. Someone must’ve told me.” She waved it off.

“You did something. You put a spell on Ryan to act up when Bran came within so far of the shop?” I couldn’t believe it, but it made more sense than Ryan suddenly trying to run when he knew the vampires would stop him. He didn’t have a weapon to take out the vamps. If he was serious about leaving, he’d have made a stake out of the old wooden crates we had in the basement.

Esme sighed. “Okay, fine, I did help a little. But Bran comes in so often. His aunt says how much he loves your place. The coffee, the service, and the feel of the place. I wanted you two to meet. And it’s cute you weren’t your perfectly pulled together self. You intimidate men.”

“If I do, then those men are weak. And I’m not always perfectly pulled together. Most of the time here, I wear jeans and a T-shirt for the shop with coffee stains on it.”

“Your hair is always perfect,” she said.

My black hair was thick and pin straight. “If I wanted it to curl, it wouldn’t be perfect.”

“That’s why you and Bran would be great for each other. You accept yourselves and try to help people. You’re not out trying to be something you’re not. Or pretending the world will hand you everything. Your generation has a lot of challenges, but you two weren’t coddled the way most kids your age were.”

I stared at her. “You think the twins were coddled?”

She nodded. “Your aunt never tried to change you. She guided you, raised you, but you were so like your mother and she missed her so letting you be you was more important. And you’d witnessed your mother’s death. You had scars she couldn’t erase. Trauma the twins couldn’t imagine, even now. It makes you stronger as a person. The magic, that’s impressive, too,” Esme said.

“Hardly impressive to you. But I keep trying,” I said.

“You impressed Bran. And he told his aunt already. She texted me. You need someone to push you and challenge you—that’s me. But your man should always admire you.” Esme checked her phone.

“You and his aunt. This is a full-on setup. He’s okay with that?” I asked.

“He’s a man. He thinks it’s all his idea. He ran into you, and you’re so this and that. He might have magic, but he’s still a lovable goofy man who thinks he’s the cleverest guy in the room.” She grinned.

“Then, I’ll tell him what his aunt is up to, and it’ll be done.” I picked up my phone.

Esme waved her hand and knocked my phone across the room.

“You break it, you buy me a new one,” I said.

A customer brought it over before I could go searching.

“Thanks; I’m a klutz today,” I said.

“It’s fine,” she said.

My phone rang, and Esme perked up.

I answered. “Hello, Detective Shelley,” I said.

Esme’s grin disappeared.

“Ms. Crestwood. I wanted to let you know that there was nothing found in the tox screen. No illegal drugs. No poison. Nothing, really. Her usual pain meds for arthritis and her sleeping pill, but nothing out of the ordinary. I’ve let Mr. O’Conner know, so hopefully, he will relax a bit on protesting your shop,” she said.

“Thanks. That makes me feel better. Nothing for the autopsy?” I asked.

“A couple more days. The ME was on vacation for the holidays, and so, we had a backup who was very green and slow. Then, all this cold weather, you get people dying while shoveling a drive. Or lifting salt bags into their truck. The results will be good; we just need to be a bit more patient,” she said.

“Thanks. Please let me know if there is anything I can do. Bye.” I ended the call.

“No poison. She wasn’t shot or stabbed. No one said anything about bruising.”

“Smothered,” Esme said.

“That means someone had to get into her house,” I said.

“Well, you keep doing what you’re doing. Your aunt and I will deal with Ryan. But don’t be too hard on him,” she said.

“I won’t, now that I know it’s you. For the record, Bran knocked him out—magically. I levitated him down there. If he’s complaining,” I said.

“You and Bran sound like a good team,” she said.

“I’m leaving,” I said. I went over to Ellen, head barista on the shift. “Call if you need anything. If Mr. O’Conner shows up, call the cops. It’s not even going to hit zero today.”

“Gotcha, boss,” Ellen said.

“Don’t pick that up from the guys. They’re just weird.” I smiled. The vamps called me boss, and Ellen must be hanging around with them. She was a witch with enough powers that I didn’t worry about her as much.

“They’re different and cute,” she replied.

What was it about vampires? I saw nothing cute or hot about vamps or weres. Those were things that had been done to them. Someone turned them into a vampire or a werewolf. Okay, you could be born a werewolf, but that was rare. Witches and wizards had to work at their powers and grow them. I’d rather earn my powers than be a victim. I felt sorry for vamps and werewolves...but right now, I needed to help Mrs. O’Conner and find out who’d hurt her.

I strolled into the social center a few blocks away. There were several meeting rooms and a board listing all the groups and when they met. I felt very antisocial when I saw all of the groups. Book clubs, sewing clubs, and even a beginning Wiccan class that I had no knowledge of. I took a picture of that post with my phone, so I could follow up later on.

Putting that out of my head, I found the room for the garden club and slipped in. There were five women in the room, and they looked at me carefully.

“Can we help you?” asked one of them.

“Hi, I’m Claudia. I own the Witch’s Brew café. I understand Mrs. O’Conner was a member here?”

A few of the women exchanged looks, but one patted the seat next to her. “I’m Sara. Martha was a member. She had the most beautiful roses and exotic items. Do you garden?” she asked.

“No, I don’t really. I just came by, because I was so sorry to hear about Mrs. O’Conner, and I wondered if anyone heard anything, yet. I know her husband is very upset.” I played dumb. With this many women, one was bound to want to be a know-it-all.

“He blames you,” another woman said.

“Claudia, this is Kate. That’s Joyce, Misty, and Fran.” Sara made the introductions around the table. All the women were in their fifties or sixties, except for Misty.

“I know he blames the café, Kate. But that’s why I’ve been checking up on her friends and other things she did that day. She was fine at her job at the library and at lunch with her friends. So, whatever made her ill, I don’t think it came from my shop. I really hope the police and medical tests give us the answers as soon as possible. She was a regular customer, and I’d hate for people to believe we’re dangerous or don’t care about our customers,” I said.

“No one thinks that. When tragedy strikes, people need someone to blame,” Misty said.

Fran nodded. “When my husband died, my son wanted to know why I was out shopping. Why I hadn’t been home to call for an ambulance.”

“That’s awful. I know people in grief say and do awful things, but I just wanted to make sure that no one here saw any signs of illness. Or thought there was any foul play from any direction. I know Martha had health issues, and the police seem to think that was the cause, but I didn’t know her very well. A few minutes a day doesn’t give much insight. Martha wasn’t chatty,” I said.

“No, she didn’t disclose a lot of personal stuff to strangers. But she liked your place more than the chains. She thought you needed more flowers,” Joyce said.

“Oh, she never said that to me. It could cheer things up. Especially with this weather. Do you guys have indoor gardens?” I asked.

“We work on herbs and potted plants in the winter. We also plan our summer gardens. If you want to win, you need to be creative.” Fran nodded.

“Win? Did Martha win a lot?” I asked.

“She did. But no one would hurt her over that,” Sara said with a chuckle.

“Right. Her question. No one we know wanted to hurt Martha or had a problem with her. She had a happy marriage. Her daughter was happily married with a grandson. Martha doted on him. She loved her work. She’d been a member of this club for two decades. Her flowers ended up in her church regularly. She made up baskets for funerals and such, as well. I can’t imagine anyone wanting to hurt her.” Joyce shrugged.

“Did she have a problem with the witch theme of our shop?” I asked.

Misty shifted in her chair. “She wasn’t a fan, but at one point, we talked about the history of the town. She complained there were so many witch-themed places. I’m a history teacher at the high school, and a lot of people don’t know about our history because Salem steals all the thunder and tourists.”

“Thanks for educating people,” I said.

“Do you want to stay for the meeting or do you have what you need?” Fran looked sharply at the clock on the wall.

“I think that’s it, unless anyone has anything else that they think I should know or want to share.” I felt like I was getting politely tossed out.

No one else spoke so I stood. At that moment, I realized how useful a card would be. The police had them, and Bran had them. I should order some.

“Well, thank you. Have a nice meeting. I’m going to hit the restroom and brave the snow.” I felt like I was babbling. It was uncomfortable, but I had sort of crashed their meeting without notice, and that wasn’t very fair.

I found the ladies room and used it. As I washed my hands, I noticed the door open. It was Sara.

“Sorry if they were rude. Those women have a schedule, and it never changes. Year in and year out. Month in and month out. They care about Martha, but some probably thought you were accusing them,” she said.

I dried my hands with paper towels and nodded. “Sorry, I should have called ahead or something. I get the feeling there is more to this than I know, and people are blaming me.”

“Mr. O’Conner is ruining your business. And people aren’t telling you everything. But we can’t talk here.” She handed me a card. “Call me after five, and we’ll set up something.”

“Thanks,” I said.

“I have to get back.” She slipped out.

I touched up my lipstick and put moisturizer on my hands before I left, so it wasn’t obvious Sara and I had been chatting. I got the feeling the people around here were regulars and noticed other people’s patterns a lot. Back to the cold weather. I had some phone calls to make and business cards to order.

Chapter 15

I called, and Sara was happy to stop by the coffee shop. Since I'd never seen any of the other ladies in my shop, I didn't think it would matter. Filling the biggest cup we had with tea, I tried to figure out what secrets the garden club had. The Wiccan meetings also had me itching to find out more, but I had to prioritize.

"Mr. O'Conner didn't show?" I asked my aunt, hoping that Mrs. Reynolds had worked her magic.

"Oh, no, he did. We called the cops." She sighed.

Sara walked in and gave me a quick smile. She ordered a lemon tea, and I gestured her to join me.

We went into my office because there were too many people who'd get nosy if I just went to my table. My aunt would come over and introduce herself at the very least.

"Please sit," I said.

"Sorry I couldn't just tell you earlier. Those women are sharks. They gossip like crazy about others, but if you tell anything about them, even the truth, they go on the attack." She set her tea on my desk then pulled off her gloves.

"It's fine. I hope this won't get you in trouble with the other ladies. I'm only looking for info that would really throw suspicion on someone hurting Martha," I said.

"That's just it. I don't think they'd actually kill her. But I know they lied to the police." She sipped her tea.

"Who lied?" I asked.

"Fran. The president of the club. She said she had no issues with Martha. They were like sisters. Always got along great. Old friends." Sara rolled her eyes.

"It's not true? Martha wanted to be president?" I asked.

"I'm sure she did, but Martha wasn't nice enough to people to be voted in. She thought her stuff was better. She was overly competitive and critical. It's about enjoying flowers and helping each other, not a war to see who has the best garden. Fran had to handle Martha when she got too snippy. But they have some older issues, as well. They were never really friends. More like frenemies," she said.

"That sounds like everyone Martha knew. Not really a motive for murder, though," I said.

"No, not that part. Fran got a divorce about seven years ago. Her husband found her with Mr.

O’Conner. It was insane. I mean, he seemed like such a devoted husband. Martha was always sort of the dominant one. There were fights. And canceled meetings. But Martha insisted they wouldn’t divorce like Fran. She never missed a meeting. She didn’t run against Fran for president after that. It was tense and weird. It all sort of calmed down eventually, and no one talked about it for years. But Martha held a grudge. Fran did, too. There used to be twenty people in the group, but with their tension and occasional dustups, the people left.” Sara shook her head.

“You think Fran is still interested in Mr. O’Conner?” I asked.

“I don’t know about that, but quality senior men are hard to find. Maybe they kept up a connection. I don’t know. I have no idea when she’d have had the chance to hurt Martha. I mean, we were all in the room together for that meeting. She was fine when she left. It’s probably nothing,” she said.

“Maybe. But I appreciate your honesty. I know they have the tox screen back with no results. So, I’m guessing it wasn’t a plant,” I replied.

“There are some lethal plants. But with Martha’s health issues, it’d be much easier to kill that way,” Sara said casually.

“I’m sorry?” I asked.

“Oh, sorry, I’m a nurse. Martha could’ve been given a huge dose of sugar water. Or too much insulin. Either would kill her. She was on high blood pressure meds. Beta blockers. If someone swapped out those pills, her heart would be under more strain. All of those wouldn’t show up in a tox screen.” Sara waved it off.

“That’s scary. They wouldn’t check for sugar?” I asked.

“Not unless the ME specifically ordered a glucose test. Insulin is naturally occurring in your body. So is sugar. You’d have to test for a level. I think she was on a sleeping pill, too. That could’ve done it.”

“A sleeping pill?” I asked.

“Well, some people take more than one. If you take too many, that’s a problem. Or she could miss taking her insulin or eating if she sleeps too long, then slip into a coma. As brittle as she is, her body would start to shut down. We had her in for kidney trouble once at the hospital. All the meds and everything takes a toll on the liver and kidneys that process them. She was so lucky she wasn’t on permanent dialysis. That’s where she was heading.”

I stared at her tea.

“I’m sorry; I’m not supposed to share her medical details. You knew about the diabetes. But I could get fired.” She fidgeted in her chair.

“It’s fine. I won’t say anything. I appreciate your help, but it was all hypothetical. I swear, no one will hear any of it from me,” I said.

“I never do that. I didn’t mean to tell that.” She frowned.

“It’s okay. You care about her. I wouldn’t be running around town, trying to find out things if I didn’t. The privacy stuff in this world has gotten out of control. But I know you have to respect it because it's your job." I wouldn't get anyone in trouble.

"I should go," she said.

"Thanks for coming." I walked her out then turned to find my aunt.

"Good talk?" she asked.

"Did you spike her drink with a truth potion?" I asked.

Aunt Mandy frowned at me. "Esmeralda did. I assume it was useful?" she asked.

I shrugged. "Yes and no. Nothing is simple about this," I said.

"We haven't found out who threatened Mrs. O'Conner, yet. We must have a rogue witch. Esme is trying to scout that angle while you're doing this," she said.

"You think I should stop and be more with the coven?" I asked.

She leaned in. "Pushing the issue for proof on Mrs. O'Conner only makes it look like you're afraid of being accused. Or afraid someone here did it."

"So, I should let it go?" I asked.

"I know you're trying to help to keep this business going, but the customers are getting used to Mr. O'Conner. The slow down isn't as bad, anymore."

"As bad?" I asked. "It's still fewer people every day. When he's out there, it gets really quiet in here. We need closure."

"Only the autopsy will give you that. And the police's work. You're not the police. You're not a private investigator," she said.

"I know, but I need to be sure a murderer isn't getting away. What if they rule natural causes? We know it's not," I said.

She looked down.

"What? Let it go?" I asked.

"The spell could be wrong. Maybe she did it to herself?" my aunt asked.

"Suicide? No note?" I asked.

She shrugged. "You don't know. A false conviction would be worse."

"Thanks for the advice. I have to go," I said.

"Make kind choices," she said.

I tracked down Fran. Apparently, she worked evenings at a flower shop. She stared daggers at me when I walked in.

"Do you have a minute to talk?" I asked.

She nodded and led me to the back of the shop where she worked on creating some very pretty bouquets.

"I'm sorry to bother you here," I said.

"Are you?" she asked.

“I just found out some information, and I wanted to ask you about it,” I said.

“I didn’t do anything to Martha. I’m sure someone told you about the affair. It was years ago,” she replied.

“Why didn’t you just tell me, then?” I asked.

“It’s not your business. It’s history.”

I suddenly wished I’d taken an allergy pill. My nose didn’t like one of the pollens back there.

I sneezed.

“Bless you. You didn’t seem like a flowers girl,” she said.

“Thanks. Fresh flowers could trigger allergies for customers, so we don’t have them. I knew there was a reason.” I sniffed. “But, obviously, you know a side of the O’Conner family others don’t. You were involved with Mr. O’Conner. Are you still involved?” I asked.

“No. Not for years. Marriage is a long and complicated business. Things aren’t always good. You’re too young to understand that. But it’s true. You can love someone, but all the spark and the passion are gone after kids and years of taking care of them. I ruined my marriage over feeling wanted. My ex had his wounded pride. Now, he’s in a home with dementia. That’s what he gets for that.” She stabbed a rose into a vase.

That was cold, and she still took it very personally.

“But Martha forgave her husband?” I asked.

“She did. Sort of. She didn’t want the embarrassment of divorce. There was a time when people stayed together ‘til death. They only had one child and one grandchild. They didn’t want to stress out the family and cause pain. He felt very guilty and didn’t want to upset her health. I doubt he’d stray, again. But there are plenty of women interested. He’s a good-looking man for his age with a good pension.”

“So, you don’t know anyone else he’s cheated with?” I asked.

“No. And I didn’t hurt Martha. Maybe she goofed up her meds. She was always complaining about how the mail order place was changing what generics they sent her because their medical covered the cheapest stuff. And calling them only made her angrier. I think you’re looking for a smoking gun and maybe she just was getting confused. It happens.” She shrugged.

“Right. Okay. Thanks for your time.” I rubbed my nose, trying not to sneeze again.

“No man is worth killing over,” Fran said, half to me and half to herself.

“I agree,” I muttered to myself.

I left the flower shop and sneezed a few more times. My aunt was big into flowers, but clearly there was a flower out there that didn’t like me. Another dead end for the murder investigation. I needed some tea and a hot bath.

Chapter 16

I couldn't refuse a family dinner request from my aunt. She did make the best pasta and garlic bread. Being back in the home I grew up in made me feel safe. My brain buzzed with suspects and what-ifs. The twins were helping their mom in the kitchen as I sipped tea and set the salad on the table.

Uncle Vinny walked up as the girls brought out the pasta. We sat and began dishing out the food.

"That hunter is a real handful in the basement. He's all better. When is he leaving?" Violet asked.

"I thought you guys liked that flirty pain in the neck," I teased.

Iris rolled her eyes. "He's always asking us to get him things. Or help him leave. It's weird. He's hot, but something is off."

I shot my uncle a look.

"It's cabin fever. Hunters don't like to be cooped up," he replied.

"Isn't he safe here?" my aunt asked.

My uncle sighed. "He is. He probably wants to get back to work. Check on some friends and family. That's why it's better to hold him longer. The police might be watching his friends and family. He can sit tight, for now."

"I'd still like more details on the case he was involved in," I said.

"We couldn't find much," Violet said.

"What about Mrs. O'Conner's case?" Iris asked.

I sighed. "I've talked to almost everyone she met with that day. She was fine. She had some enemies, but I don't see how they had opportunity. The tox screen found nothing. So, if it wasn't a poison that struck her down later...maybe it was natural causes?"

"You think your spell was wrong?" my aunt asked.

"I chose my words carefully, but maybe I missed something. Some other option. Or maybe it was a combination of things? If her health was really bad, then one thing could trip it, and her heart gave out. We're waiting on the autopsy, but I feel like I'm missing something." I took a bite of garlic bread and chewed it while looking for that missing piece in the case.

"I agree with Esmeralda. It's not your job. If you keep meddling in police work, you'll only get more attention," Uncle Vinny said.

I stabbed my pasta with my fork and twirled. “She was threatened for threatening the witches. Maybe that’s the lead I need to follow. Who made those threats?”

“Someone calling and threatening isn’t likely a murderer. It’s like on Snapchat. People are so cruel to each other, but most people wouldn’t actually do any of the things they threaten,” Violet said.

“Threaten. Who’s threatened you?” I asked.

Uncle Vinny sat up straighter, as well.

“No, nothing specific,” Vi backtracked.

“Don’t lie to me,” my aunt shot at her daughter.

“I’m in a few pagan groups, and one girl mocks those of us without powers. We’re just pretend witches. I blocked her.” Violet shrugged it off.

“So, no one you know personally? No one from school or the coven?” I asked.

Iris and Violet exchanged a look.

“Spill it,” Uncle Vinny said.

“We sort of kept in touch with Katrina and Lily. They left their freshman year of high school when we were sophomores, but we stayed friends on social media,” Iris admitted.

“They’re your cousins. That’s not bad.” My aunt nodded.

“Well, now, they’re sixteen, and both are getting married. Married. They’re bragging about their rings and dresses. At first, it was bridezilla stuff but normal. Then, they started making fun of us for going to college. We’re alone and going to school while they’ll be married with their own homes and everything.” Violet shoved a forkful of salad in her mouth and chewed with a vengeance.

“That’s crazy. You’re not gypsies. Don’t compare your lifestyle to theirs,” I said.

“Exactly, you’re not getting married until you’re done with college. I have nothing against homemakers or stay-at-home moms, but men don’t always stick around, and you need to be able to take care of yourself,” my aunt said.

“Gypsy men stick around. But that’s not the life I want for you. Block those girls,” Vinny ordered.

“But they’re our cousins. Your nieces,” Iris said.

“We sort of grew up with them,” Vi agreed.

“You don’t need them if they aren’t respecting your life choices. You haven’t attacked theirs,” my aunt insisted.

“I get it,” I said softly.

“You do?” Vinny asked.

I nodded. “I don’t have siblings. I couldn’t cut you guys off if you went full-on gypsy. I’d miss you guys. Family is important. The less you have, the more you see it. Just ignore their attitude and be happy they’re happy. You define happy differently. When your weddings come along, you’ll be the star of the show, and nothing will be more important. You won’t rub it in anyone else’s faces, but your single friends still might feel a little jealous. Just think long term. The wedding is one day. Then, they’re wives. They’ll have a bunch of kids and be tied down to cooking and cleaning for the next twenty years.”

The twins smiled.

“They’ll have stretch marks before they’re twenty,” Iris said.

“Kindness,” my aunt said.

“So, are we invited to the wedding?” I asked.

Vinny shrugged. “They are my nieces. Yes. But we don’t have to go.”

They gypsies hadn’t really accepted my aunt or the twins because they didn’t adopt the gypsy lifestyle. We’d been to a few weddings and parties for gypsy relations, depending on how close Uncle Vin was with them. I couldn’t believe he’d snub his own nieces.

“I don’t have to go. I know I don’t really belong, but you guys should go,” I said.

“I could always have to work,” my aunt offered.

“No, we all should go. Claudia, bring a date. It’ll make them crazy,” Violet said with a grin.

“You bring a date,” I said.

“That would look bad. Disrespectful,” Vinny said.

I rolled my eyes.

“Vi and Iris are my daughters. If I let them run wild, I’m a bad father. You’re my niece and a Gorgon. You have no gypsy blood, at all. You can bring a date,” Vin replied.

“What’s with the dating push? Esme is nagging. Now, you guys?” I asked.

“You are obsessing about Mrs. O’Conner. And your life is all about the coffee shop. You need a life,” Violet said.

“I have a life. The coven and the coffee shop are all that matter. I have a hunter in the basement. I have a dead customer. That’s a lot.” I pushed pasta around my plate.

My aunt refilled our glasses of iced tea. “You need a love life. Esme said there is a nice and very strong wizard in that Killeen family.”

“They’re recluses. I heard they’re all ugly,” Iris said.

“That’s not true. Crazy old rumors,” I replied.

My aunt and the twins shared a smile. I’d walked into that one.

“You’ve met him?” Vin asked.

“He came into the coffee shop. Apparently, he keeps vampire hours. He was nice but a bit full of himself. What does Esme know about him, anyway?” I asked.

“She’s been doing some private classes for some new or young witches. The coven classes are for everyone, powerful or not. She has some other clients,” my aunt said.

“Why didn’t she tell me that?” I asked.

“You have enough on your plate. You don’t need to do private tutoring. Your skills are still developing.” My aunt began clearing plates.

I helped her and felt better alone in the kitchen.

“Am I ignoring something?” I asked her.

“You’ve always had your own path and gifts. I never would’ve imagined you’d use the money your mother left you to open a coffee shop. If you want to follow this death case, there is a reason. You don’t want to neglect your personal happiness either.” She dished out a hot pan of brownies. “I know you’re afraid.”

I grabbed the vanilla bean ice cream from the freezer, then the scoop from the drawer. “Afraid?”
