“You lost your parents young. You were loved, but you’re afraid of letting more people in because they could hurt you. As long as you have those walls up, your power can’t expand, and you won’t really be happy. The twins can’t understand, but I do. I lost my sister.” She pinched my cheek.

“I can’t rush into a relationship because you and Esme like some guy’s powers,” I said.

She nodded. “I’m not pushing you toward anyone. But he would understand your life more than a human man. You wouldn’t like a hunter either. Certainly not a gypsy.”

“You’re right.” I followed her out into the dining room, and we served dessert.

As I entered the coffee shop, I was still thinking about how well my aunt knew me. A man without powers or gifts would bore me. A gypsy would make me want to argue gender roles. A hunter would make me question every kill he made. My dating pool of interesting men was extremely small.

Was I really that narrow-minded? A human might be interesting enough. I liked humans. There were plenty in my coven without powers.

Esme was coming up from the basement as I was passing through the main area.

“How was dinner?” she asked.

“Fine. You should’ve come,” I said. Aunt Mandy always invited Esme and tried to make her feel like family. She was distantly a cousin of my mother and aunt.

“No, I’m a loner by nature. I did have a word with that hunter. He keeps trying to use the phones and get out. I’ve put a magical perimeter up for the night,” she said.

“Thanks. So, are you giving private lessons to a Killeen? Is that why you want me to go out with Bran?” I asked.

She smiled. “Bran?”

“I’ve met him. My aunt mentioned your private lessons. Does Bran have a sister?” I asked.

“No, he has a younger brother, but he doesn’t need my help. They have a cousin staying with them, now. Her parents are traveling in Europe, and she wanted to try the college thing. She’s nineteen but a freshman. She took a year off. Her magic needs work. She has powers, but her parents thought everything she did was perfect and didn’t really push her.”

“The way you pushed me?” I teased her.

“Exactly. She needs work, but her ego is so fragile.” Esme sighed.

“That’s a shame. There’s always more to learn and always someone stronger, so ego is a bad thing to get wrapped up in.” I was taught young that hard work and intention mattered. If I let my powers go to my head, a stronger witch would put me in my place. There was a pecking order and rules to the witching world.

“How’s your human death case, Nancy Drew?” Esme asked.

I laughed. “I always liked a good mystery. But I’m stuck. No one with motive had access. They weren’t in her home that night. There was nothing found on the tox, so it had to be done fairly quickly to her. Maybe my spell was wrong?”

Esme frowned. “I don’t think so. The light left the room. Someone out there has some culpability but it might not be in the way you think. It may be beyond someone actually murdering her. She could’ve been driven to it. Something could’ve been planted or messed with in her home. I still wish I knew who threatened Mrs. O’Conner. We need to keep order or things will get worse.”

“Worse?” I asked.

“At times, humans think they must root us out. Protest and convert us. They fear us. Then, there are times when the witches feel they are stronger and they should teach humans a lesson about history and crossing people with more powers. Right now, it feels like both sides are posturing for a fight. Conservatives taking over the country. But supernatural forces are aligning. Our powers are stronger. You are vulnerable and incredibly important.”

“That’s why you want me married to a powerful wizard? Backup?” I asked.

“I’m not pushing you to do anything as serious as marriage. But networking with the powerful wouldn’t hurt you. You look too sympathetic to humans. People understand because of your parents and who ended up raising you. But they want you to understand who you are. Who your mother was. What your true potential is. Spending time with the Killeen brothers would help. The younger one is currently studying vampires in Romania, but he’ll be back in a month or so. You might like him better. He’s the same age as you and more adventurous. Bran can be a real homebody.” Esme shrugged.

“How do I socialize with them? I mean, I have a coven,” I said.

“Old witch and wizard families don’t join covens. They don’t need to. They throw parties, meet at certain clubs, and network among their own kind. I’ll bring you along next time. You’re ready. I didn’t want to upset you before,” she replied.

“Upset me? Sounds like these people are more like me.” I smiled.

“Yes and no. They were raised with magic to an extreme. They wouldn’t marry a human or do things the human way. You probably washed the dishes at your aunt’s house by hand,” she said.

I shook my head. “It was the twins’ turn. I see what you mean, though. I’ll feel like I’m behind. I already do. I should’ve been able to use those spells and find the killer.”

“Human and paranormal worlds converging makes things much trickier. We’ll open an inquiry into the threats to Mrs. O’Conner. That might help rule out witches or wizards. But it might be a human customer or Wiccan coven member who did it. Threats are easy. That would be a very human thing to do,” she said.

“You’re right. But if we can find out who did that, I’ll feel a little better. Some answers. I still need to talk to the grandson.” I was dreading it. The kid’s online presence was smug and rotten.

“You think a kid killed his grandmother? That’s a long shot. Even with a human. But stranger things have happened, I suppose.”

I picked out a tea bag. I needed something to warm me up. “Even if he noticed anything about her feeling ill at dinner. I could try talking to Mr. O’Conner, but he’s our resident protester. He probably won’t say a word.”

She poured us two cups of hot water, and we dunked our tea bags. “Can’t hurt to talk to anyone, but minors are tricky. That can get you into trouble. Now, let’s talk about how to figure out who threatened Mrs. O’Conner...”

Chapter 17

I staked out the library and hoped Harry Stevens would follow his routine. With his grandmother's death, anything was possible. Esme was right. Bothering minors was probably a bad idea. The kid had, no doubt, been instructed not to talk to anyone, like the rest of his family. But his social media proved he was easily baited. He complained about his interfering family and being diabetic. I mentioned to the librarian that I was looking for him, so hopefully she'd help me out.

I browsed the sections on witch history, which was bigger than most since the history was local and true.

"You're that coffee lady," a young guy behind me said.

I turned and saw the kid I was after. "True. You've been in my shop." He had been in with a bunch of his friends. Kids always wanted to act older. I hit him with a curiosity spell, so he'd keep talking.

"Yep. I like the frozen drinks better. Too cold, now. Then again, you pissed off my grandma. Grandpa is still mad. I know you talked to my mom," he said.

"And you're okay talking to me?" I asked.

He shook his head. "Grandma was a pain. Don't blame yourself. But I don't know anything."

"You had dinner with her that night. She seemed fine?" I asked.

He nodded. "Nagging and complaining, as always. She wanted me to get an insulin pump because I kept forgetting my shots. It's not like I'm a baby. I'm not disabled."

"Hardly. There are much worse things to have. Some kids have cancer. Managing that isn't really in anyone's control." I shrugged.

He gave me a funny look. "So, I should be grateful I don't have a worse disease? You sound just like Grandma."

"Should I be flattered or insulted?" I chuckled. "She just wanted you healthy. When grownups can't control things, it makes them crazy. My aunt still insists on brewing me this anti-stress tea, at times. Whether I want it or not."

"Why do you let her? You could just pick up and move away. Not be nagged," he said.

"My parents died when I was little. She's all I've got in the mom department. And when I am sick or stressed, it's nice that someone cares. So, you don't want the insulin pump?" I wanted to get him talking and relaxed. Maybe he'd let something slip.

"Do you think I want guys seeing that when I change for gym? I want to play sports, too. Girls don't think about the locker room. That thing makes me look like a wimp. Plus, everything I do has to go through the doctor. My mom is fussy enough. How did I get Type 1, and my mom didn't, but Grandma had it? How is that fair?"

I shook my head. "Not fair. Life sucks, at times. Like, now, you'll have to go to a funeral. I promise, one day you'll miss your grandma's nagging. Maybe not for a long time, but you will. I just wish I knew how convince your grandfather I had nothing to do with it. My coffee shop isn't behind something."

"Yeah. Mom said there was nothing on the tox screen. You'd think that'd be enough. Grandma had a lot of meds and issues. Until the final guy signs off and says what killed her, Grandpa won't believe anything else. Sorry."

The kid was less of a jerk than I thought. Certainly less cocky than he came off on social media.

"Thanks. At least not everyone in your family thinks my shop is evil." I smiled.

"My mom brews her own coffee at home and thinks buying fancy coffee is overpriced, but she doesn't think your place sucks."

"Thanks. Well, I'm sorry about your grandma. I hope the police determine the cause, and everyone can move on. It just seems odd that she was fine all day long and then suddenly died. But I guess that's life and death." I shrugged.

He nodded. "She did get confused, sometimes."

"Confused?" I asked.

He frowned. "Not like Alzheimer's confused. She always knew who we were and who she was. She took a sleeping pill, and sometimes, she'd forget what time it was and call at two in the morning. Or go online and buy shoes. Or make a bunch of cookies and eat them. She never remembered it. Grandpa had to check her blood sugar and everything to be safe. The docs tried to get her off that sleeping pill, but the insomnia was worse. Now, if you're so smart, tell me how to avoid this damn insulin pump."

I shifted my weight to one leg and propped a hand on my hip. "The best way to get adults to back off is show you can handle it the way it is. Test your blood on a routine, eat right, and take the shots on time and all that crap without complaint or slip up. All your mom cares about is your health. If doing it that way is too much of a hassle, you might decide the pump would be better. The other kids probably already know you're diabetic if you're testing and injecting. More kids will know, and girls talk. The pump might actually cut down on it. I'd look at both sides and decide what's best for your social life."

He half-smiled. "I didn't think about that. People do notice at lunch and stuff."

"And if you're on a team? I don't know how that all works, but sometimes, practices go long or there are tournament days when you play a few games. It could be safer with a pump regulating you instead of risking it. If you want to be a jock, less dependence on the testing and injections can't hurt." I smiled.

He stared at me for a second as though rolling over my advice in his head. "Maybe you're right. My mom would fuss less, which helps. Thanks. I have to get going." He headed down the aisle of books.

The kid was about image. He wouldn't hurt someone, but he resented his grandmother for sharing the disease. Maybe I was chasing crazy leads.

Mr. O'Conner was outside the café, again, protesting. I cast a warming spell on him. Truthfully, he wasn't making much of a dent in our customer base, anymore. We'd put notices out on social media, explaining the situation. Most of our customers came back, yet this man persisted.

I watched him from inside.

"Want me to call the police?" Esme asked.

"No. Let him learn we won't play his game, anymore." I removed the warming spell. "He can go home or stay. No more babying him. He may be grieving, but he can't keep blaming us. The results will be in soon enough, and we can all move on."

"No luck with the grandson?" she asked.

"He didn't do it and knows nothing. He mentioned she takes a lot of meds. It might be natural. Find any suspects for the threats?" I asked.

"Not really. Some solo witches may have heard about the insult. They sometimes come in here. But there's no way to prove it. It'd just be questioning people. They'd all deny it and resent us for doubting them. We need more proof or a confession before we accuse anyone. Your reputation has taken enough of a hit. I'll ask around to my connections, but I don't want to look like we're on a witch hunt. I know it was my idea, but we can't go about it the way you're chasing down humans like they're suspects. We have to be more subtle," she said.

"Unless they were here, they'd have to have heard it from someone who was. Ugh. I don't want to think about this, anymore. I feel like I've followed every logical angle and found nothing. Maybe it is all nothing. Natural causes and some hollow threats. I'm worried for nothing. Or I missed something." I sank into a chair.

"You need to forget about it for a bit. You're obsessed, and your mind needs a break. Come back at it with fresh eyes. Go to bed and get some rest. Watch some mindless TV or read a book. Get yourself away from this stuff." She nodded.

"You're right. I'm going to go to the movies. Not be here for a bit," I said.

"Sounds like a plan. Go. I'll cover for you here," she said.

"Thanks." I needed a mental break. The only decisions I needed to make were what to see, how big of a popcorn to buy and what flavor to add to my diet soda.

Chapter 18

The movie was okay, but the time outside of my own head had worked. I felt refreshed and somehow like I'd hit the reset button on my brain. I didn't have all the answers, but I was clearer on some things. I'd wait for the human report and see how they would handle it. Redo my spells and, if it was murder, pursue the guilty party with paranormal justice.

I waved to Brad and headed upstairs to my room. I wasn't alone. A man was bent over my nightstand, using my phone.

Magically, I spun him around. The phone fell to the floor.

Ryan.

"Didn't Esme lock you up tonight?" I asked.

"No, I think she forgot." He gave me that flirty grin.

"What are you doing here? Stealing? Using my phone?"

"Who has a landline, anymore?" he teased.

"It's for the security system. And spam calls. What did you do? Why are you trying to get away so badly?" I challenged him.

"What did I do? I killed a werewolf who was killing humans. By our laws, it's fine. All the humans see is a human body, and that's bad. Even if it's collateral damage in my job, no one understands. I want to move on. Farther away. But I need to check on my sister. You don't seem to care," he said.

"You chose your job, and you're the one who has to manage your family and work. I've got my own problems." I pushed him out of my bedroom. "Wait. Collateral damage?"

"You do have your own problems. Someone was snooping down in your storeroom. I came up here to avoid being caught down there. You don't want people to know I'm here, right?" he asked.

"Define people." I magically flung him down the stairs.

"Damn, is that necessary?" he asked.

I stepped over him and walked to the counter. "You let him upstairs?" I asked Brad.

"Um, he got spooked by Belle. The other baristas are helping her stock, so he can go back. I told him to wait in the sitting area on the second floor while I had some customers. Not to go into your private room."

“Well, he doesn’t listen.” I turned when I heard the bell on the door.

Bran walked in. Perfect timing. Why did that man always show up when I had chaos on my hands?

“Bad time?” Bran asked.

“Horrid, actually.” I smiled. I magically pushed Ryan toward the basement as Belle came up the stairs.

“Sorry,” she said.

“No, it’s not you. It’s our ever-rude guest.” I pointed to Ryan. “Jail.”

He disappeared. Once I felt him there, I went further. “Locked.”

“Impressive,” Bran said.

I laughed. “Not really. I grew up with twins who were always changing places. I learned teleportation young, so I wasn’t caught up in their tricks. They tried to blame me.”

“I can’t believe that. Iris and Violet are too sweet,” Belle said.

“Kids are never perfectly sweet. We all test the rules growing up. Belle Andrews, Bran Killeen. Belle is a gypsy witch who supplies us with expired blood from the blood bank to keep our vampires fed safely. Bran is...” I paused.

“I’ve heard of his family.” Belle blushed a bit and shook his hand. “Never thought I’d meet one.”

“A gypsy? Forgive me, I thought the women stayed at home. You’re a modern gypsy?” Bran asked.

“I guess.” Belle tugged her coat tight around her. She was cute and sweet but thirty, and in gypsy years, that was an old maid.

“Belle chose a career. I think it was a better choice than getting married at sixteen,” I said.

“I’d tend to agree with you, but I don’t want to seem anti-gypsy traditions. My family takes its share of judgment. I don’t want others to think I disapprove. We all have to do what works for us.” Bran smiled at me and Belle.

The man was a flirt. Or he was this attentive and nice to every woman? Maybe I should wait for the brother to come home? I didn’t really know either of them well.

“I’d better go. Mom always waits up. Nice meeting you,” Belle said to Bran. “Bye, Claudia.”

“Bye, thanks. Sorry about Ryan. The vampires were supposed to keep a handle on him.” I shot Brad a look.

The other barista came up from the basement. “Blood is stocked.”

“Good. Hopefully, by the next delivery, Ryan will be gone,” I said.

“Great. Are you coming to the wedding?” Belle asked as she lingered at the door.

“Probably. See you there?”

She nodded. “Mom insists. Gotta go.”

I waved. “Say hi to your mom for me.”

Bran remained quiet until she left.

“Complicated culture?” he asked.

“Yes. But I’m just a guest. Belle and her sister wanted more than to be housewives.” I knew more about the details of her family life that explained a lot, but Bran didn't need to know.

"Quite the rebels. And you're invited to a wedding?" he asked.

"My uncle is a gypsy. It's his nieces getting married. Double wedding. We're not the most popular family to go, but my aunt and uncle don't believe in cutting off family ties if they can help it. Sorry, I should go check on my horrible guest," I said.

"Your troubles tend to linger," he said.

I shrugged. "I can't force the human world to work faster."

"Want some help putting him in his place?" Bran offered.

"I can handle it." I headed down the stairs, feeling like I should invite him, but it wasn't his business or his problem.

Ryan paced in his cage. "You need to let me go. Just kick me out. You'll never see me again."

"If I believed that, I'd do it so fast your head would spin. I think you'll run back here. I don't need more headaches. Who were you calling?" I demanded.

"Does it matter? You lock me up. Cut me off from my family and friends. You hold me hostage. I could call the police," he said.

I laughed. "I'm protecting you from the police. Please do call them. I'll hand you over, at this point. My uncle will get over it."

"I need to get out of here," he insisted.

"Why? Did you kill Mrs. O'Conner? Did you think it was a favor or something?" I asked.

"No, I didn't kill her. I was beat up here that night. I couldn't even have made those threats."

"You know about those?" I asked.

"Esme vents. She thinks I don't listen. She talks to herself, sometimes. Who knows what she might've said to someone about that annoying old woman before? The threats might not even be related to the murder," he said.

"You've spent a lot of time thinking about that, have you?" I asked.

"What else do I have to do here? Oh, you're stocking too much eggnog. People don't seem to like it in their coffee. But I'd make a shake out of it," he said.

"The holidays are over, anyway," I said.

"I'd keep a minty green shake year-round. People like it. Maybe do holiday flavors in July. When it's hot and people want something cold and delicious. Peppermint and all those flavors." He shrugged.

It wasn't a horrible idea. "Thanks. Now, back to the real question. Why are you trying to blame Esme?"

"I'm not blaming her. She just talks a lot. Someone out there might've threatened the old woman to curry favor with you. Or even killed her to please you when they heard about her threats. You don't know how powerful and known you are," he said.

"Flattery crap won't work," I said.

“That part is true,” said a voice behind me.

Bran had followed me.

“What are you doing, spying on me? Nosing around my property?” I asked.

“I just want to help if I can. Esme asked if I could try and get you involved more in our world.

Your powers are known and still growing.” Bran nodded.

“Esme is more powerful,” I said.

“Barely, and she’s a century older than you. You like humans, and that’s nice, but you need to grow you powers and flex them.” Bran glared at Ryan. “This human is not worth your time.”

“You’re a stronger wizard than I am a witch. Why do you want the competition?” I asked.

He smiled. “Competition makes us stronger. You let your guard down because you’re on top. It’s good to be pushed. Challenge me.”

“Do I need to be here for this?” Ryan asked.

“I can take him off your hands for you. I promise he’ll never escape my dungeons,” Bran said.

“Not cool, dude,” Ryan said.

“Thanks for the offer, but I’ll handle my own problems.” I added a magical perimeter until morning then walked up the stairs.

Bran followed me.

“I don’t think I helped,” Bran said.

“Actually, you gave me some information that helps. Esme put you up to this. Chatting with me. Helping me. It makes sense, now,” I said.

“No,” he said firmly.

“Yes. I’m not a fool. I appreciate any help to socialize with the witching world. I don’t know why it’s such a big deal. My aunt never pushed me. Esme never did either before. What’s changed?” I asked.

Bran shook his head. “I’m not sure. I know, when your mother died, it was big news in the magical and paranormal community. She was such a strong witch. Esme promised to make sure you were connected, but your aunt kept you from the groups and activities as a child.”

“You were included in them?” I asked.

“No, but that’s my family. You don’t cultivate a certain reputation by joining in everything. I knew about them. We occasionally were allowed to do something over the summer. My brother pushed for it more than I.” Bran folded his arms.

“You have a brother?” I asked.

“Esme didn’t tell you?” he replied.

I played disinterested rather than dumb. “She mentioned someone in Romania studying and also you have a cousin staying. I didn’t retain all the details. Human trouble.”

“My brother is studying the history of vampires. Myths and facts. He’d love to meet your gypsy blood fairy. My cousin is staying. She wanted to try college but needs Esme’s magical tutoring. Her skills are lacking. Her parents let her run a bit wild and free with humans. We should really go back to boarding schools.”

“Like Hogwarts?” I laughed.

“Don’t mock it. Homeschooling and private tutors only works so well. Trying to fit into a human world makes us weak and fearful of them. We need to organize and be stronger.” He looked me dead in the eye.

“I agree there. But we can’t ignore humans. We need to know what they’re thinking and planning. Anyway, I’m sure Esme will help your cousin. When your brother comes back, please bring him by. I’d love to meet him, and Belle would, too.” I smiled.

“Why don’t we get to know each other better before that?” he asked.

“You don’t have to do anything special with me. Esme put you up to it, and it’s not needed,” I said.

“Dinner can’t hurt. Fill in some blanks about things. Then, I can escort you to the Vernal Equinox ball. My cousin says I need to get a life,” he said with a smirk.

“I’m hearing that a lot. We can blame Esme for that nugget being planted, I’m sure.” I chuckled.

“Doesn’t mean we can’t be good allies and friends—if not more. Our dating pool isn’t as massive as humans have. You might like my brother better. I couldn’t let him marry a gypsy, anyway,” Bran said.

“Let him?” I asked.

“Strong magical families have to keep their powers strong. Bring in power, not eccentricity.”

“You’re already rich and powerful,” I shot back.

“Riches can be invested, built on, preserved and grown. Power, magical power, is individual. A weak wife would hurt him,” Bran replied casually.

“Then, you don’t know much about gypsies. Many of them have the sight. Visions of the future, and the curse of a gypsy witch is one of the hardest to break. Just because they don’t socialize with your kind doesn’t mean you should underestimate me or my gypsy cousins.”

“You said you weren’t a gypsy,” he said.

“I’m not. But my uncle is, and that means I have extended family that is. I’ve known many of them all my life. I might not be as strong as you, but I know gypsy magic that you’ve never even heard of.” I smiled and picked up a cup from the counter.

Brad handed Bran his coffee, as well.

“You’ve intrigued me. We’ll have plenty to talk about over dinner. I’ll pick you up Friday at seven. I wish I could help more with your human problem, but it’s not my area. If you need anything, just let me know.”

“Thanks. See you then. And you don’t have to take me to a ball. I’m sure you have another woman you’d rather take to something that fancy.” I had to wiggle out of that.

He leaned in and smiled. “You take me to the gypsy wedding, and I’ll take you to the fancy magical ball. You're fascinating, even if you want to get rid of me. You'll see at the ball that quality dating material in the witching world is very hit or miss."

"Rid of you? It depends how narrow-minded you really are. I like humans and gypsies. I just can't believe Esme put you up to this. It's not fair to ask you to give up your social life," I explained.

"I see you as more of an expansion to my social life. Until Friday." He took his coffee and left.

"Men," I grumbled.

Chapter 19

The next morning, I came down to the coffee shop level to find Mr. O’Conner sitting at a table. It was barely six in the morning. He sipped a black cup of coffee. I gave Brad a look, and he just shrugged.

I walked up to our favorite protester. “Everything okay, Mr. O’Conner?” I asked.

He cleared his throat. “The police called me last night. I’m sure they’ll call you, too, but I wanted to let you know I’m done. They confirmed that my wife died of natural causes. Her body just shut down. Looks like it started in her brain, but her heart gave out about the same time. They think it was a stroke. Either way, it was natural. I’m sorry I couldn’t face it.”

“It’s all right. I’ve been bugging everyone in your family and all her friends to see if there were any signs. If we missed something. We’d never do anything deliberately to hurt anyone here. Whether she liked witches and pagans or not, the first rule is do no harm to anyone. I hope you believe that, now.” A weight lifted off of me. The suspicion was gone. We were in the clear.

“I do. I think you need to see something, as well.” He picked up three shoeboxes from the floor.

“This was her insulin and testing stuff.” He opened one box.

“This was her other meds. Heart and blood pressure. She took them religiously.” He opened another full box.

“I believe you, Mr. O’Conner. I’m very sorry for all you’ve been through.”

He nodded. “She also took a bunch of vitamins and supplements. The doctor knew about it. So many pills. But she took them. She kept active. But there are no guarantees.”

“No, there aren’t. Someone mentioned she took a sleeping pill. And, sometimes, it made her do things that she didn’t remember later. Do you think maybe she could have forgotten she already took her meds and doubled up on something?” I asked.

“She never did that before. She’d eat or shop online. But maybe it could’ve happened. We’ll never know, but she was a woman who wanted to live. She liked your place here. True, she complained about the witch history and pagan symbols, but our grandson loved Harry Potter when he was little. She took him to all those movies. I reminded her of that. She insisted it was different, somehow.” He sat and closed the boxes.

“I think she just had to find flaws with things in her life. We couldn’t be perfect,” I said.

“That’s true. But she liked your place better than the chains. You cared, and you have good coffee. I’m sorry I made a fuss.” He sighed.

“I’m sorry if I gave you a hard time. I had to protect my reputation,” I said.

He nodded. “I’m just going to finish my coffee and go meet the funeral director to make arrangements.”

“If you need anything, just let Brad know,” I said.

I went into my office and called Detective Shelley.

“Ah, Ms. Crestwood, I was going to call you when I got to the station.”

“Oh, right. Sorry about the hour; it’s a hazard of my business to be up with the early commuters. Mr. O’Conner was here and said it was all natural causes. I just needed to hear it from you guys,” I said.

“It’s true. Nothing toxic found in her body. Her heart and brain showed signs of system failure. The case is closed,” she said with a tempered cheerfulness.

“Did they check her glucose level?” I asked.

“Why? That’s not standard,” she said.

I heard papers shuffling. “Well, she’s a diabetic. She was on a lot of meds. I just wondered if she accidentally took too much or doubled a dose. That might explain it. But with the results in, I guess it’s all done. Doesn’t matter, now.”

“Yep. You can move on. Any protesting issues? Mr. O’Conner seemed to take the information, and it calmed him down.”

“No, no problems. He got the answers he needed. I guess I just wanted to know more. So much trouble resolved with one exam.” I sighed.

“On behalf of the city, I apologize for the delay. I know it hurt your business, but we appreciate your patience. I advised Mr. O’Conner to mention in the obituary that she died of natural causes. It might help answer any customer questions, once and for all. Can I help you with anything else?” Shelley asked.

“No, thanks. That should help. Thank you,” I said.

The human world had made their decision. Now, if they were wrong, I had to figure it out. I had to think about it and talk it through with some people.

An hour later, I invited Esme for morning coffee in the second-floor area. We sipped coffee as I told her about Mr. O’Conner and Detective Shelley. She seemed very relieved.

“So, you think my spell was wrong? That it was natural causes?” I asked.

“Oh, no, but the humans are satisfied. That’s what matters first,” she said.

Her face froze.

“Did you have anything to do with the threats or Mrs. O’Conner’s death?” I asked.

“Certainly not.”

“What aren’t you telling me?” I asked.

“I have a lot of secrets. Some I can’t tell you.” She sat back.

The truth potion worked but I had to ask specific questions to get answers.

“Who did you tell about the threats?” I asked.

“A lot of people. I was trying to find out who did it, which means you have to talk about it. But that was after.” She glared at me. “Truth potion won’t last forever.”

“I had to try. What secret do you know about me? What is no one telling me?” I asked.

She opened her mouth, but nothing came out. She held her throat like it was a struggle.

“Okay. Who did you see the day Mrs. O’Conner was here after her incident? Who would you have told in time to make the threats or do something?” I asked.

She shook her head. “They wouldn’t.”

“I remixed the potion to confirm if it was a natural death or not.” I led her into the locked area on the second floor. She stared at the cauldron.

“Do it,” I said.

Esme said the spell this time. Red for unnatural and green for natural causes. The potion turned pink.

“Unclear,” she said.

“What do you know about me that you won’t tell me? Do you know what it is?” I asked.

“I know. I can’t. I swore. A bigger promise and stronger spell controls that more than your little truth potion. Move up to the big leagues.” She laughed.

“Who else knows this secret?” I asked.

“Your mother,” she said.

“She’s dead. My aunt?” I asked.

“Yes. And uncle. One of the twins. That’s all.” She held up her hand.

“Why are you pushing me to engage the magical worlds, now? Why not put me in those groups and activities when I was a kid?” I pushed.

“They might have discovered your secret before.”

“That would be bad?” I asked.

“It wouldn’t be good.” She glanced around.

The potion might be wearing off. She was powerful enough to try and counteract it.

“Why? What is it about? My father was a gypsy?” I asked.

“No,” she said flatly.

“Did I have a sibling who was killed?” I asked.

“No,” she said firmly.

I was running out of ideas.

“Why is it okay for me to socialize now when I don’t even know the truth? I might screw up and reveal something. Shouldn't I know?" I demanded.

"You need allies and friends like yourself. Powerful and magical. Telling you the whole truth is not my decision to make," she said.

"Which twin knows?" I asked, more as a test since I knew.

"Iris," she said.

Esme rubbed her face and walked away from the potion mix.

"That was low," she scolded.

"I needed to know if you were protecting someone. All these weird changes happening right after this death. Are you trying to distract me?" I asked.

"Please. You need a social life. You need a husband. Don't you want a powerful family?" she shot back.

"But what secret could be so bad that you kept me from socializing all of my childhood? Why can't you tell me?" I pushed.

"We had to protect you. You were gifted. I promised not to tell you." She answered the questions in order.

"Promised who?" I demanded.

"Your aunt." She rubbed her neck. "Enough. It's wearing off. I'm going to brew an antidote, and you better watch out that I don't mess with your memory," she warned.

"You didn't tell me enough to bother with that," I said.

"Don't go interrogating your aunt or cousins either. They won't tell," Esme said.

"What could be so bad?" I asked.

"Maybe it's not. Maybe it's good. But it's not time to tell you. It's not for me to be the one to tell you either," she replied.

"And I thought you were family. You were my mentor." I put the potion away.

Esme left the locked room before I had to throw her out. I locked the door behind us and turned to face her. "I really thought I could trust you. I never doubted you before. Now, you're keeping secrets and treating me like a child."

"It's your aunt's place to tell you. Not mine," she said.

"So, I'll go push her." I headed for the stairs.

"No, not now. Not here. That's a private conversation." She slid past me to go back to work.

The next day, I sat at my table in the café and made notes about summer promotions. Ryan's ideas weren't so terrible. I had a few for the spring. We needed to make up a bit for the dip Mr. O'Conner had caused in our winter sales. A young woman walked into the café, and I felt her power. She immediately went up to Violet and started chatting. The shop wasn't busy. Maybe it was a friend from school?

I kept one eye on the chatting girls. Iris joined in.

“You should really join our coven,” Iris said.

“I don’t know about that,” the new girl said.

“You said you have powers. You should meet Claudia,” Violet said.

I lifted my head. The girls looked over at me. “Come on over.”

“This is a new girl at school, Serena Murray. She’s very into witches and pagan stuff. She’s majoring in women’s studies, and the witch trials are a huge part of that,” Iris said.

“How interesting. Nice to meet you, Serena.” I shook her hand. “You’ve got powers?”

She shrugged it off sheepishly. “Sort of.”

“Who are you related to? Which magical family?” I asked.

Serena went a bit pale. “Um. I’m staying with my cousins, right now. Killean.”

“I know Bran. He mentioned you but not your name, so I wasn’t sure. You’re welcome to join our coven, but I understand if you don’t want to.” I sipped my tea.

“Why?” Iris asked.

“Big magical families tend to sort of be their own coven—so to speak. They don’t join others where there are a lot of members without powers. The Killeans keep to themselves,” I replied.

“Yeah. I’m new to the area, so I’m trying to make friends. I think the twins are great. I love this place. Great feel.” Serena looked around.

“You’re welcome anytime. I have a fair set of powers myself. I’ve been busy with other things lately. Businesses are a lot of work,” I said.

“They told me. I can’t believe someone threatened this place. Rude and ignorant people really deserve to get a tough lesson,” she said.

“Thanks. It’s good to know there are some supporters. I’d love to hear more about your major. Maybe you could speak to our coven about the witch trials’ impact on women’s rights and history?” I suggested.

“Maybe, once I’ve had some actual classes. I took basics at a local college down in South Carolina. Then, my parents wanted to do this Euro tour thing. I wanted to keep studying. I traveled enough every summer of my childhood. I told them I’d meet up with them on summer break, but I want a degree. Bran is very supportive of that. He’s always after me to do my homework and giving me magical challenges.” She rolled her eyes.

“Sounds like a good atmosphere for your goals.”

“You should work here,” Violet said.

“Work?” Serena laughed.

“Vi, I don’t think Serena needs a job. The Killeans are quite well off.” I nodded.

“That’s downplaying it. But, yeah, let people who need jobs take them. I need a lot of study time and magical practice,” she admitted.

“Well, once you get the hang of it, you can always volunteer somewhere. If you want to give back a bit,” I suggested.

“Sure. Maybe a women’s shelter,” Serena said.

She had a theme, and I didn’t hate it. “An excellent idea.”

“Anyone else threatening witches?” Serena asked.

“No, that was just an annoyed customer. All cleared up,” Iris said.

I leaned in. “We try not to get confrontational with our customers. Even if they’re wrong. We try to educate and invite, not attack.”

“Of course, do no harm,” Violet said.

“Absolutely!” Serena sat. “I love the karmic balance in the world. I’d never attack anyone, but I would love to teach them about karma. We don’t go protesting their churches or beliefs.”

“True,” Iris agreed.

“What’s through that door?” Serena pointed to the basement door.

“Storerooms and basement. Nothing interesting.” I shrugged it off.

“Cool. I feel like this building is very old. Full of spirits and stories. Maybe I could research it. Maybe it was an old witch’s shop? Someone who was killed?” she asked.

“I doubt it. It was built in the 1800s, not the 1600s. It’s all brick, so it holds the history in the stone. You can research the land and what was here, certainly. It might be something, but the building isn’t quite old enough for the witch trials.” I liked the girl’s spunk, but she seemed scattered. Poor Esme, trying to get her to focus on her magical studies.

“Could I get the tour?” she asked.

“Not now. I’m afraid we’re doing inventory, and the basement area is a mess. You and the twins can hang out in the coven room or the reading nook on the second floor while it’s quiet,” I suggested.

Esme walked up from the basement, and I saw Serena freeze up. “Sorry, I have to go. More homework awaits.”

Ellen walked up as Serena bolted out the door.

“Who is that girl?” Ellen asked.

“A friend from college,” Violet answered.

“We’re back to work, now. Don’t worry,” Iris added.

“I’m not worried. That girl left us a fifty-dollar tip. She can come back whenever she likes.” Ellen grinned. The twins followed Ellen back to the counter.

“She knows how to make a good first impression,” I said to Esme.

Esme walked up. “She was here?”

“Why? Isn’t she allowed? The girl is what? Nineteen? She can come in for coffee,” I said.

“Of course. I just usually keep my private lesson students away from here. I don’t want them dropping in for help or bugging me while I’m working. Boundaries are good,” she said.

Esme still looked rattled. “You can be mad about the truth potion all you want. Until you tell me the truth about myself, the secret, I won’t even begin to apologize,” I replied.

She shot me a look of disapproval.

“If you were in my shoes, you’d do the exact same thing. You wouldn’t stop until you found the truth. Neither will I.” I shot her an icy stare.

“That doesn’t involve Serena or Bran. That family is powerful. You don’t want to cross them,” she said.

“You wanted me to get involved with one of them. Now, I need to be careful? What is the deal?” I asked.

“Just be careful. Grow your powers. Don’t spend so much time worrying about the past. Some secrets really don’t matter, anymore,” she said.

“I don’t believe you for a second.” I stalked off. Who could I totally trust, anymore? My nice little world felt much darker and more complicated than it did just a week ago.

Chapter 20

I felt a bit frumpy. Black sweater dress, purple tights, black boots and a black leather jacket. But it was cold outside. Showing skin wasn't an option. I wasn't ready for that anyway. I had a lot to talk to Bran about. But it felt more like a summit meeting about issues than a date. Good thing I hadn't mentioned it to Esme or my aunt. I met him at an Italian place on the other end of town.

"You look lovely," he said.

I took the single black calla lily he offered. "Thank you. Esme mentioned she's tutoring your cousin. I didn't want any of our family to get too excited or ahead of us. My cousins and yours are young enough to..."

"I understand. Esme never married, did she?" he asked.

"No." I followed the host who sat us in a private room. Bran took my coat and held my chair. This was a showing off date. Bran was impressing me.

"Champagne?" a waiter offered.

"No, thanks," I said.

"Burgundy wine?" Bran suggested.

"Just a little," I agreed.

The waiter handed us menus and poured the wine. "I'll give you a moment."

"You really didn't need to go this fancy, Bran," I said.

"If I'm going to do something, I do it right." He sipped his wine.

"Why did you ask about Esme?" I asked.

He lifted a shoulder. "She might be living vicariously through you. She has a long life ahead of her but half of it being feline. I don't know how she does it."

"I don't either. I thought I wanted that when I was young, but I couldn't shift to feline in time. Now, I'm more relieved I didn't." I tried the wine. It was rich and earthy.

"I'm glad you didn't either. My cousin likes you, by the way. She mentioned talking to you at the café. If she gets under your feet or makes a pest of herself, let me know." He stared at the menu.

"She wasn't a pest. She knows the twins from school. She did rush off when she saw Esme, but no one wants to be cornered by a tutor when they're out with friends or getting coffee. I'm sure she'll settle in and get comfortable.” I examined my options for dinner.

“I hope you’re not a vegetarian,” he said.

“No, I’m not. My aunt is so I can make a meal out of anything. But the Cajun chicken pasta looks good,” I said.

“Not the prime rib?” he asked.

“I prefer my steak well done. I don’t like to remember anything bled for me to eat. I’m not a vampire.” I smiled.

“So, those rumors are false.”

“You believed them?” I asked.

“No, you’re far too hot-blooded for that. I’m sure they’ll cook whatever you like however you like it.” He set the menu aside. “I hope you don’t believe the rumors about me.”

“I’m not sure what the rumors about you are. Your family is old, wealthy, powerful, and reclusive. Esme says you’re a homebody. I don’t know much else, besides what you told me about your businesses.” I sat back and waited for more.

“I’m actually quite boring. I like succeeding in business. I like when the magical world is calm and things are in order. I traveled over the summers with my parents. They moved to Ireland when my brother finished school. Couldn’t pass up an old castle.” He smiled.

I liked his smile. He cared for his family and wasn’t ashamed of it. “Who could turn down a castle?”

“It’d be much easier to manage your hunter friend in a dungeon,” Bran said.

The waiter showed up and took our order. I got the prime rib well done just to see his eyebrow arch.

Once we were alone again, I thought about a dungeon. “Do you really have a dungeon?”

“Want to see it?” he offered.

“I’m not sure. Is it empty?” I asked.

“For now, yes. Is he giving you more trouble?”

I shrugged. “He wants to leave. I want him to go. But there are issues. Finally, the cops are off of my back. We have the autopsy results for Mrs. O’Conner, so it was natural causes. I guess my spell was wrong. But I don’t know if I trust that hunter. His case is hard to get details on. Killing a werewolf who is killing humans is one thing. But I don’t think he’s telling me the whole truth.”

“Is he bound to?” Bran asked.

“No, but if he did something really wrong, I don’t want him out there as a danger to others. He landed in my basement, and I feel responsible. Why doesn’t the paranormal world handle this? Why don’t we have wizards or witches who hunt down vamps and weres who kill humans? We could handle it better,” I said.

Bran nodded. “Gypsy hunters are a tradition of the human world. They protect humans from the paranormal. We could handle the bad ones if we chose to. But I’m not sure we want to make enemies of the gypsies. There are strong witches among their numbers. They always want to be apart from other humans and from us. It's complicated."

"Why don't vampires self-police or werewolves? Like humans?" I asked.

"Some say, because they were human once, they still think of themselves as human with a little more power. Some never asked for that to happen to them. Then again, the more powerful vampires and weres believe they have a right to live how they want to live. That their nature makes them hunters and killers. Those large groups go where the carnage is so they won't be noticed."

"Like war zones?" I asked.

He smiled. "War zones. Places with rampant illness. Gypsies live in a lot of places around the world, but they move on when things get too dangerous. They'll be out of that area before you hear the word refugees. They see three steps ahead. So, then, the vampires and weres are free to feed. To feast. My brother is fascinated by it. You'd love talking to him."

"I don't want details about the carnage. I employ a lot of vampires who don't want to hurt people. They have two options. Blood bank expired or butcher blood. They attack a human, and I'll stake them myself." I shook my head.

"And werewolves? Do you help them, too?" he asked.

"Sure. If they need a potion to keep them from changing, we provide it free. If they refuse the potion or it doesn't work on them, we lock them up for the nights of the full moon. That's why I have the cells in my basement. Occasionally, we catch a newbie who doesn't know they're a were. Once they do, they can make a plan and get the potion. It works on most of them. But now, I feel like we need to police the hunters who like their job too much. Go too far," I said.

Bran nodded. "I agree. I looked into your uncle and his family. Vin was well known, and people trusted him. He's mostly retired, now, and he deserves that. The gypsies do police themselves more or less. Your friend in the basement is not a gypsy."

"No. I wonder how some of them get into it. Like my dad," I said.

"Your dad was a hunter?" he asked.

I nodded. "But not a gypsy. I've asked a few times, but my aunt just falls apart. Losing her sister nearly killed her. But I don't feel like I know much about him."

"You were very young. I was, too. I don't know anything about your father, but I'm sure we could research it. If it will make you feel better. Sometimes digging in the past only causes pain," he said.

I nodded. "It would upset my aunt. I don't know. Maybe I'll feed that hunter a truth potion and see what he really did. I won't set a dangerous man loose on the world."

"Smart. If you need help, I'm around."

"Thanks. And if you need any help with Serena, I'm here. The twins are about the same age, and I'm used to it. I guess I should've asked if you have any sisters. I've only heard about the one brother," I said.

"Just the brother. So, girls are a bit different. Serena was spoiled. She's like Scarlet O'Hara.

She'll get her way or make it her way. Her parents indulged her. She has a couple younger sisters who went with their parents. Serena wanted freedom and thought college would be it. Dorms and parties. Then, they stuck her in my custody. She needs direction and discipline."

"Wow. That's a handful. You'll put her in her place," I said.

He sipped his wine. "She's good deep down. She has the right intentions. But she doesn't always think things through. The consequences are what she needs to think about. Especially since she has magical powers. Her younger sisters aren't as gifted. Serena has powers and wasn't fully educated in how to handle them. I might need your help, as well as Esme's."

"You've got my help, but I'm not much of a teacher. Serena might have more powers than I do." I shrugged.

He stared at the wine bottle until it hovered over the table. He moved it over my glass and tipped it to refill my wine. I mentally grabbed the bottle and put it right side up and pushed back. I filled his glass then levitated the cork and plugged the wine bottle.

"Showoff," he said.

The door opened, and I hastily put the wine where it belonged as the waiter brought in our food.

Chapter 21

I'd gone on some dates in my day, but none of them ended in brewing a potion. But the vampires had texted me that Ryan was trying to escape, again.

"It needs to be strong and last. He'll fight it," I said.

Bran tossed in another handful of herbs, and the mix smoked.

I stirred it and poured it into a large glass jar.

"Got it." I mixed in some iced tea. It was triple the potion I'd given to Esme. This time, I felt no guilt.

"Ready?" he asked.

I nodded. "You carry this. I'll have my phone recording."

Bran led the way, and I followed.

"Let me go. It's over. I heard them talking," Ryan said.

He paced the cell like a caged wolf.

"One thing first. Drink this," I said.

"What are you doing? I don't need a drink. I need to leave." Ryan pointed at the stairs.

"Who were you trying to call from my bedroom?" I asked.

"Mind your own business," he shot back.

"That's enough." Bran waved his hand and Ryan was pressed back against the wall of the cell.

His mouth was awkwardly open.

Bran levitated the jar of tea potion into the cell and poured some down Ryan's throat.

Ryan coughed and gagged.

"Drink it or we'll feed you more," I said.

He garbled a question as more tea was poured. Bran wasn't choking or waterboarding him. Ryan had chances to breathe.

When half was in, I touched Bran's shoulder. He pulled the jar back and waited.

"Ryan, how many people did you kill chasing that werewolf into the mall?" I asked.

Ryan shook his head. "Things happen."

"How many humans were killed? You killed the werewolf, fine. How many humans were dead when it was done?" I asked.

“Four. They got in the way. You can’t leave witnesses. You don’t understand.” Ryan shook.

“You killed four people?” I said.

“No, four people were dead, in addition to the werewolf. I killed two. She killed two. They got in the way.” Ryan glared at me.

“Who is she? Your sister?” I asked.

He shook his head. “She was special. I have to know she’s okay. I can’t find her. I can’t get her on the phone. Her parents probably took her away. They never approved of me.”

“This is new. You had a girlfriend? Was she arrested?” I asked.

He laughed. “No, I’m sure she’s not arrested. She said to come here. Meet her here. But she hasn’t come for me.”

Bran and I exchanged a confused look. “Does she know to get in touch with my uncle?”

“No, she said she could get in, and we’d be gone. She had money saved up. We’d be long gone and far away. But it’s been too long. She’s forgotten about me or her family caught her. Let me out, so I can find her.” He kicked at the air.

“We could hand you over to the police, right now, so you better cooperate,” Bran said.

“Oh, please do. Without her, my life means nothing.” Ryan swatted at the jar.

“Who is this woman? What’s her name?” I demanded.

He pursed his lips and shook his head.

“Tell me her name, and maybe I can help you. Maybe you’ll both go to jail,” I suggested.

“A jail couldn’t hold her. She’d just leave. She’d be here taking me away if she really loved me.” He gritted his teeth together.

“I want a name or you’re not going anywhere,” I said.

“Serena. Serena Murray.” He fell to his knees, his shoulders slumped.

“What?” Bran snapped.

“He came up from the Carolinas,” I said.

“She set this all up.” Bran’s fists clenched.

“Calm down.” I grabbed Bran’s shoulder. “I had no idea.”

“No wonder she was asking about this place. The coven,” he seethed.

“She killed two people. I think that’s a bigger problem.” I stopped recording.

“You know her? Bring her to me, please!” Ryan, now free from Bran’s control, shook the door of the cell.

“Bring her to you? Do you know who he is? She’s his cousin. You’re lucky he hasn’t killed you, yet,” I said to Ryan.

“She loves me. I love her,” Ryan sighed.

“She’s a witch. You’re a human.” Bran shook his head.

“We have to do something. They killed people. Innocent humans,” I said.

Bran ran his hands through his hair. “She’d just escape a human jail with magic. She’ll have to be handled by the witch's council. But him?"

"We can send him to jail. But if she loves him, she'll take him out. She was eyeing the door today. With me and Esme here, she's not the strongest witch. She couldn't take him from us. But a human jail—she could spring him," I said.

Bran looked at me intensely. "You didn't know?"

"Know? No! I had no idea he was connected to her. My uncle brought me a hunter who needed to hide out. It's happened more than once. They were never dating a witch. Or running from murdering innocent humans. He never said anything except about a sister. I don't know how to punish a witch or him for this." I wanted to call Esme.

"You were calling her? Trying to lure her here?" Bran asked Ryan.

Ryan nodded. "I had her cell number. A couple of them. I left her messages, but she never called me back. They wouldn't give me a phone. Esme took my burner phone." Ryan shot me an evil look.

"Because she's smart. If she'd trusted her instincts, she would've turned you over to the police, but we'll handle this better than humans. You might not think so, but we will make sure you don't hurt anyone, again." Bran waved at the cell.

Ryan's mouth moved, but we heard nothing.

"Nice soundproofing. What do we do with him?" I asked.

"Her first. We need to come up with a plan that's fair. Punishment. There is a system for this, but her parents would be furious if we turned her over to the witch's council. We handle it. She's under twenty-one, so she's not fully powered or considered an adult by the council. Murder."

I knew there was a council, but I had no idea their procedure for handing out justice.

"Come on; we need to go get her, now," Bran said.

"Wait. Just wait." I took his hand and led him back to the second floor. "She was asking about Mrs. O'Conner. Why would she threaten us? Were there any other threats against witches?" I said.

"She's protective. She's studying women's studies, and the witch trials are a big part of her focus," he said.

"Right. That might all be true, even though she moved here for him. She pulled all this out of nowhere when her parents were going to be gone...then she could chase down her boyfriend and run wild with him." I couldn't believe how clueless some men could be. "Serena seems sweet and clueless, but she might have set up all of this."

"Her magic needs work," he said.

"Maybe, but her scheming is top notch. Maybe she wants more advanced lessons?" I asked.

"You think she made the threats against Mrs. O'Conner?" he asked.

"Esme was tutoring Serena. No doubt they got to talking about the incident at the shop. Maybe Serena wanted to impress Esme? Like she was standing up for witches everywhere? A few threats are nothing I'd put past a teen to do as a prank. We need to find out what she actually did. We need to find out any other crimes, to be sure. We might need more truth potion." I filled up the cauldron.

He nodded. “You’re right. Serena would want to impress you and Esme. The two most powerful witches here are under attack. She’d love to be the one who rescued you. I never thought. She’s too young for that sort of a Bonnie and Clyde romance, as well.”

“Well, we’ll get the truth out of her, and we can sit down with Esme and decide what to do about all of it,” I said.

“No, not tonight. Invite her to a coven meeting tomorrow. Make it look normal. See if someone there threatened the old woman. See if anyone is helping the guy in the basement. Then, I can search her rooms and call her parents. See if they knew about him. See if she confesses to you and Esme.” He shook his head.

“She doesn’t know us that well.” I shrugged.

“Serena has a romantic streak—she might try to play on your emotions. I just want the whole story before we try to settle on a punishment. See if she really loves that hunter jerk.”

“What do we do with him? I’ll give him to the cops, but if she lets him out...” I flopped on a sofa.

“That’s why I don’t want to rush. We need to get all the information.” He sat next to me.

“Do we need to get her parents back here?” I asked.

He shook his head. “She’s an adult as far as the human world is concerned.”

“But we can punish her without her parents’ permission? Or the council’s?” I asked.

“The council will approve our punishment or amend it, but it’ll be quieter than if we had a judge come and hear the evidence or we go there. Then, news will spread.”

“Witch gossip?” I teased.

“Exactly. Just what my family doesn’t want. Serena is smart when manipulating her family, but she’s not brilliant with magic. She probably panicked and killed whoever that was at the mall when she meant to freeze them. I just want to make sure that’s all she did.” Bran nodded.

“I think we need some tea or wine. Too bad I don’t have a liquor license here,” I said.

He grabbed my hand and held it tight. “Thank you for your help.”

I looked into his dark and caring eyes. “Thank you for yours. Crazy night.”

“Fate tends to do that to us.” He leaned over and kissed me.

I froze for a second, completely thrown off guard. But he was a good kisser...

Chapter 22

I called a coven meeting for the next evening. I told Esme to bring Serena, and Bran would make sure she came. The members assembled. It'd been hard not to quiz my cousin and aunt about the secret in my life. That was selfish and crazy. I'd lived this long without details. Right now, I had to make sure two murderers didn't escape justice.

Bran would slip into the café right when the coven meeting began. If he attended the meeting, Serena would know something was wrong. But if she tried to flee or take Ryan, he'd stop them.

When everyone was there, I stood, and the room got quiet. Serena stood next to Esme with the cousins on her other side. Serena looked around, but mainly, she was looking down her nose at the mix of people.

"I wanted to apologize to you guys. The police confirmed that it was natural causes. I'm not sure if my spell was wrong. The spell said it was unnatural causes, but there might have been other issues we don't know about. Mr. O'Conner is done with the protesting. The humans have a resolution, and I don't want to upset anyone by dragging it out to prove anything. But we would still like to find out who threatened Mrs. O'Conner. We don't want to be attacking humans for their ignorance or fear. The point of the café and this coven is to reach out and have good relations with humans. If anyone knows anything about who made those threats, I want to hear about it now," I said.

Serena scoffed.

"Excuse me?" I asked.

"Why do you care what humans think? They shouldn't be threatening what they don't understand. All their wars are out of ignorance and arrogance," Serena said.

"That doesn't mean we threaten them. We must set an example of order," Esme said.

"What do you even know about this, Serena? You're new here," I said.

"Who is she?" Ellen asked.

"Serena Murray. Of the Carolina Murrays." Serena flipped her hair.

I nearly laughed, but she was a lot more dangerous than she was spoiled. "She's a cousin of the Killeans, staying with them. Very recently. Have you meddled with anything, Serena?" I asked.

"Meddled? That old lady threatened your café and coven. I heard that through the witch network. What's wrong with a little warning that karma might get them? She threatened us. I threatened them,"

Serena said.

“You what?” Iris asked.

“I made a phone call. I had a friend make one, too, and leave a note. No big deal. The spell was just to bug her.”

“Spell?” Bran asked from the door.

“You’re supposed to wait downstairs,” I said.

“I couldn’t help listening in. What spell?” he demanded.

She jerked her chin. “Doesn’t matter. She died too soon. The spell didn’t work.”

I cleared my throat. “We already know about the mall and the hunter. Tell us what spell you cast on Mrs. O’Conner.”

“It doesn’t matter. It was a joke. The mall was self-defense. A mistake. It went wrong.” She waved it off.

“Repeat the spell,” Bran said.

Serena flinched. “Teach this bitter old woman karma is real. Give her a mega dose of her own medicine so she knows how it feels.”

“Mega dose of her own medicine?” I wanted to curse her out. The girl made a rookie mistake. Spells couldn’t be ambiguous or the worst results always happened.

“What? She was a bitter old grouch. She deserved it. She wished bad things on you guys. She was mean to you, so she deserved people being mean to her for a bit. Karma.” Serena shrugged.

“That woman died of an overdose of insulin.” I pulled up the text on my phone from Detective Shelley. “They ran a glucose test, and she had no measurable sugar in her body. She took a mega dose of insulin and went to bed. Your spell worked and was taken literally,” I said.

“No. That’s crazy. I didn’t know she was on medicine.” Serena gasped.

“Bind her,” someone called.

Esme waved a hand.

Serena tried to walk away and found herself frozen.

“Let me go. I demand you let me go. It was natural causes. My spell was a flop. I didn’t mean to kill her. I didn’t kill her.” Serena shrieked.

“What about the humans in the mall that you killed to save your hunter boyfriend?” I played the video of Ryan confessing.

She stared at the screen, and her face went red.

“That idiot!” she shouted.

“He was under a powerful truth potion,” Bran said.

“He betrayed me. That bastard!” she screamed. Then, she took a deep breath and seemed to regroup. “It was all self-defense in the mall.”

“You followed him here. You must care about him,” I said.

“He pissed off my dad. Dad threatened him if he didn’t stay away from me. I couldn’t handle being separated from Ryan. Especially when he went on a dangerous hunt. It was late, and he was going to take out the werewolf and be done. I went for backup. We didn't know there were humans in there doing late inventory. They surprised us. It was an accident." She bounced.

I laughed. She'd tried to stomp her foot but was frozen from the elbows down.

"Accident or not, you killed two humans that night. He did, as well. You both have to pay. Plus Mrs. O'Conner, goofed spell or not. We can call in a rep from the witch's council or handle it ourselves," Esme said.

"She is young," my aunt added.

"We will handle it and inform the council, but the punishment will be severe. You're all invited to the Killeen mansion tonight at midnight. We will set down punishment at that point. For her and the hunter. She's my cousin and my responsibility. The hunter came here because Serena knew she could get here and had a place to stay. She thought she could rescue him from hiding. They're my problem," Bran said.

"They became our problem, big time. Thanks," my aunt said.

"I'm sorry. I had no idea any of this was going on. I'll be talking to Serena's parents before we pass judgment. I'm sorry you ladies had to deal with this." He glared at his cousin.

"We? Who is we?" Serena asked.

"Claudia's business was almost ruined because of you. She had to babysit your boyfriend. They patched him up. You've been trying to get in here since you arrived in town, and now, I know why. A human hunter with no self-control. Claudia and I will decide what the consequences are. Esme, Claudia and I will collectively cast the spells needed so we can't undo it unless we all agree. Fair enough?" he asked.

I nodded. Esme and my aunt nodded, as well.

"No! That's crap. You can't touch Ryan!" she shouted.

"Oh, yes, we can. Or I could hand him over the South Carolina police, along with his confession. Would you like that better?" I asked.

"We could turn you over to the police for that, too," Iris said. "Murderer."

"Like I'd stay in jail. If I can kill someone with a remote spell, I'm obviously really strong. So, I'll overcome whatever you do to me." She struggled against Esme's binding spell.

I stepped up to the bratty little witch. "I really thought you were interesting. Your major. Your focus. It was all a lie to get into my café and my coven. To get your boyfriend back. What was the plan once you got him out of my basement? Run off and go on a killing spree?"

"No, I never wanted to kill anyone. Our plans were none of your business." She sneered at me. "He'd do anything for me. You have no idea what that's like. Poor single witch and her coffee shop with her hippie aunt and her friend who lives life like a cat more than a human. And those twins. How do you stand it? Surrounded by so many dull, boring humans. You have real powers, Claudia." She shook her head at me.

“I’ll take good humans over murderous witches any day.” I looked at Bran. “Can you contain her at home? I don’t want to put her downstairs with Ryan.”

“She won’t get away from me. See you at midnight.” He leaned over and kissed my cheek. I tried not to blush. In a flash, he and his cousin were gone.

“What was that?” Violet asked.

“Nothing. He’s forward. We had one date,” I said.

“Looks like a good one,” my aunt said.

“It was nice enough until we had to interrogate Ryan with a truth potion. Not exactly normal,” I said.

“But you’re a good team,” Esme said.

I shot her a look but shook off the scrutiny. If Bran and I worked out, we worked out. If not, we could still be good allies.

“Can we watch?” Ellen asked.

“No, Esme and I can handle Ryan. We’ll have enough witnesses and send the punishment to the council. They will no doubt approve it, but any alterations can be made quickly. Thank you, everyone, thanks for being here. It is good to know I wasn’t crazy,” I said.

“You were right, but that hunter... Vinny will want to kill him,” my aunt said.

“Well, he can’t. Even if we hand him in to the police, he wouldn’t get a death penalty. At most, it’d be manslaughter. We’ll give him a better lesson our way.” I flopped into a big chair as the coven meeting broke up.

“Your silence and support is appreciated, ladies,” Esme said.

Iris and Violet stood in front of me. “That girl is crazy,” they said.

“I don’t want you spending too much time with her.” I rubbed my forehead.

“Is she going to be free to roam around?” my aunt asked.

“Bran and I have to finalize the punishment. Now, we know she killed Mrs. O’Conner, as well. How could she be so reckless with her spells?” I sighed.

“I’m glad to see you’re working with Bran.” Esme smiled.

The twins grinned. My aunt nodded. So much for my private life staying private until I figured out if there was any future in it.

Chapter 23

Esme and I arrived around nine p.m. with Belle as another witness. She was a gypsy witch but a powered witch nonetheless and independent of my coven. Ryan was less cooperative, but he couldn't do much against our magic bindings. A young handsome man answered the door. A butler? Really?

"We're here to discuss the sentences of the criminals," I said.

"Miss Crestwood, please. Esmeralda." The butler bowed.

"This is Belle Andrews," I informed him.

"The master is in his library. The other criminal is being held in the solarium." He led the way.

We all followed and found ourselves in the solarium. Serena was still immobilized and shouted against her invisible bonds. Esme moved Ryan next to her so they could see each other, but both were bound in their own spells so they couldn't touch or even hear each other.

Ryan's anguish was clear, but they needed to understand what they had done was wrong. There were consequences, even if the human world couldn't prove it or understand what happened. They called Mrs. O'Conner's death natural. That gave them peace. But we couldn't let these two get away with their crimes.

I turned and the butler was gone.

"I feel underdressed," Belle said.

"Don't worry about it." I was in jeans and a sweater. Nothing fancy about me.

"Ladies, welcome," Bran said as he walked in.

The guy was still in a suit and looked at ease. Dark hair, dark eyes, and handsome features—I could do worse. He was definitely worth spending time with. Friends or more, who knew, right now

"We need to talk about what punishment we'll hand down," Esme said.

"Agreed. Well, my cousin's parents are very concerned that she deceived them. They won't be back until next year but have trusted me to hand down whatever sentence I see fit and to oversee her custody. I'd like to hear your thoughts on punishment first," he said.

I studied the cocky girl. "Bind her powers for three years. No magic. Restrict her to school, your home, and a charity place to volunteer and other acceptable close-by places only. Make her volunteer. Make her go to school. Coven meetings should be mandatory. Continue her work with Esme so she understands spells before she can use them, again. All of that for a year and then assess if she is ready for more freedom to see if she can be trusted and has learned.”

“Three years without magic?” an older man asked as he walked up.

“Ladies, my cousin Vern—a vampire,” Bran introduced.

“Hello,” I said. “Yes, three years. One for every human she killed. In the third year, maybe we could restore some basic powers to see if she uses them responsibly. But she’d need to be closely monitored. Like parole.”

“Magical parole.” Belle smirked.

“She has to be held accountable,” Esme said.

“Did I miss anything?” a handsome young man asked as he entered.

“My other cousin, Harry. He’s a werewolf,” Bran said.

“Claudia, Esme, and Belle. All witches,” I said.

Harry bowed and smiled. He locked eyes with me for a split second, and I felt an odd tingle but then Harry stared at Belle.

“I’m a gypsy witch,” Belle said.

“What about the hunter? He killed the werewolf. That’s okay. But two humans?” Vern shook his head at the trapped man.

“Killing werewolves isn’t okay,” Harry said. “There are wolf runs and natural packs where wolves can run free from humans and hunters. He could’ve captured the werewolf and relocated him to a sanctuary,” Harry said.

“As long as they don’t attack humans, witches, or wizards—that’s fine,” I agreed.

Esme cleared her throat to keep us on track. “I think Ryan needs at least two years of imprisonment. He knew his job, and that it wasn’t a free pass to accidentally kill anyone. Even if it was involuntary manslaughter, there have to be consequences. But he and his girlfriend were on a spree of some sort. He was impressing her with his werewolf hunting skills.”

“Imprison him where? Not in my basement,” I said.

“We have a dungeon,” Bran replied.

“A legit, guarded dungeon?” I asked.

“Would you like the tour? We have time before midnight,” Bran offered.

“I would,” Belle said.

“I’ll go on faith, for now. I prefer to keep an eye on them,” Esme said.

“I’ll stay,” Vern said.

Harry offered his arm to Belle. She blushed and stuck near me.

“I’ll go, too,” I said.

We followed the men.

“I’m sorry,” Belle said and looked at me.

“No need,” Harry said.

“Harry, I’m not sure how much you know about the gypsy culture. Belle is a Romanichal Gypsy, and unmarried women aren’t allowed socialize with single men. Certainly not touch them. Most girls marry very young, but Belle is a rebel. She pursued a career and helps people, but her reputation is still important,” I said.

“How fascinating. How are you two related?” Harry asked.

“My aunt married a gypsy man. Belle is his second cousin. We became friends as kids. I’m a bad influence.” I grinned.

“No, you saved me. I would’ve run off rather than marry young. You showed some of the gypsies that Gorger girls could be good and close to the family and have a job.” She loosened her grip on my arm and walked a bit faster.

“Gorger?” Harry asked.

“Non-gypsy,” I filled in.

“I can’t wait to see this gypsy wedding,” Bran said.

“You’re bringing him?” Belle asked.

“Why not? He’s never been to one. It’ll be a cultural experience,” I said.

“He’ll think we’re trash,” Belle whispered.

“No, he won’t. He’ll ask a lot of questions. Don’t be ashamed of where you came from. You don’t have to marry a gypsy, but you are one.” I patted her arm and walked ahead with Bran.

The dungeon lived up to its name. Dark and cold, the walls were rock, and there were no windows. Bran conjured a light ball, and I did the same as we wound through the corridors. Finally, a large room opened. There were cells separated by rock walls. A man stood taller when he saw Bran.

“A guard, even,” I said.

“I employ a few vampires myself. My family is old and reclusive. We aren’t perfect or sweet. Humans fear us. But we are generally good. The few exceptions who are disturbed or evil are housed here,” Bran said.

Belle and Harry walked along. I hung back.

“You don’t want to see?” Bran asked.

“Your family isn’t a freak show. I’m sorry you have to do this to any of them,” I said.

“At least look at an empty cell to be sure you’re okay with Ryan staying here for two years. We don’t deny quality food, clean water, or health care. Entertainment and luxuries are restricted,” Bran said.

I walked by a full cell to an empty one.

“I see it. I see the animal. Get it out!” the old man shrieked from the occupied cell.

Harry waved it off. “He doesn’t like werewolves. He has the sight, but no control over his mind or mouth.”

I nodded and looked in an empty cell. It was dark and gloomy, but the bed looked fairly comfortable. There was a small desk along with a sink and toilet in one corner. It wasn’t overly cramped.

“What do they do for showers? What do they do all day?” I asked.

Bran smiled. “If they cooperate, there is a shower down the hall. If they try to run, they can use the sink in their cell plus soap and a washcloth. There is a drain in the floor. It’s set up so we don’t take them out if they can’t be trusted. “

I nodded.

“As for what they do all day? They can request books from the library. But I think Ryan would benefit from some looped video rehab,” Harry said.

“Rehab?” Belle asked.

“There are people who want peace between werewolves and humans. To stop the hunting and create a better dialogue,” Harry replied.

“They should only be hunting werewolves who murder and refuse to take measures during the full moon. We have potions or confinement,” I said.

“Some werewolves want an island to themselves. Just werewolves. So they can roam free and enjoy the shift. Fight, play, and mate,” Harry said.

“Mate?” Belle said softly.

I smiled at Bran. “I’ve no objection to that sort of thing. I can’t imagine all werewolves would want that. Plenty have human family, as well as were family.”

“But is this acceptable?” Bran asked as he gestured to the empty cell.

“I think so. Thank you for offering to house them,” I said.

“Shouldn’t Serena get some time down here too?” Belle asked.

I nodded. “I think so. Even just a week or two to scare her.”

“Her parents wouldn’t like it,” Harry said.

“Tough. They’ve entrusted her to me. I think a week down here will scare her. Show her how bad the punishments could be.” Bran checked his watch. “We should go up.”

We made our way back to the solarium. An old wizard stood before the two criminals.

“Ladies, my great uncle Dutch. He is the family peacekeeper. He’ll record the crimes, the punishments, and take it to the witch’s council for approval.”

Dutch bowed. “The reading of the charges.”

As he droned on, I looked up at Bran.

“What?” he whispered.

“That kiss on the cheek at the coven meeting. Now, people think things,” I whispered back.

“Good. It was important to stake a claim before the other men in my family met you. My brother is dashing. My cousin is handsome.” He nodded.

“And Vern is eternal?” I teased.

He grinned. “Exactly. You can end things whenever you like, but I won’t have any men in my family moving too fast and snapping you up while I’m taking my time.”

“I’m not one to rush things either. But, at the wedding, you will meet my uncle who has heard about that kiss,” I warned him.

“I’ll handle him,” he said.

“Gypsy men fight dirty. A lot. Just so you know.” I was trying to find a way to say be on your guard without making it sound like I thought he couldn’t handle a fight. Of course, he could; he was a wizard.

“I can handle myself without magic if I have to. But I don’t intend to fight with anyone,” he said.

“Good plan,” I giggled.

“Shh,” Esme whispered.

“Now, the accused have a chance to speak briefly. To beg for mercy or deny a charge. First, Serena.” The old wizard waved at her.

The soundproofing came off.

“Please let me go. Bran, please. They were accidents. Things happened too fast at the mall. I was scared. And I got the spell all wrong. I never meant to kill anyone. But I need to learn, not be punished,” Serena cried.

The old wizard waved at her, and her voice was silenced. Then, Ryan could be heard.

“Let me out of here. You have no authority over me!” he shouted.

“Want to be handed over to the police? You still have warrants. You can go into the prison system,” I said.

He glared at me and began yelling threats.

The old wizard waved at Ryan to silence him.

“Both of you have been accused of ending human lives when your lives were not in imminent danger. That is illegal in the magical and human realm. The proposed penalty for each of you is as follows...”

The old wizard read over what we’d discussed.

“You’re sure you want to go to a gypsy wedding?” I whispered in Bran’s ear.

“I want to see you in a fancy dress and have a new cultural experience. The Equinox Ball will be fun for you,” he whispered back.

True, it was a fair trade of experiences. I couldn’t wait to see his face when he saw the brides’ dresses.

“If anyone present does not agree that these consequences are fair, please declare your objection, now,” the old wizard said.

The silence was clear.

“The sentences are passed. There will be three members who cast the spell so it can’t be undone by one person.” The old wizard waved us up.

Bran, Esme, and I focused on Serena first. The energy from our three spells wove red and green lights around the girl. We finished with her and worked on Ryan. Blue lights zipped around him until the spell took full hold.

The wizard had us sign a scroll and then disappeared.

“That was quick,” Belle said.

The old wizard returned. “Approved.”

“That was quicker.” Harry laughed.

“No objections?” Esme asked.

“No, they did think you could be harder on the girl. A week in the dungeon could be a month instead, but they left that to family discretion because she is under twenty-one. I’ll put this in the family files. We take custody of Ryan and Serena.” The old wizard bowed to us. “Ladies.”

He disappeared and so did the two criminals.

I felt odd. Ryan had been in my basement for so long that I felt responsible. Part of it was relief, but I also felt like I’d failed to fully understand who I had living in my building. He could’ve killed vampires or hurt humans. I was lucky it wasn’t worse.

“You okay?” Belle asked.

“Fine. Just glad it’s over. Justice for Mrs. O’Conner and those humans at the mall.” I sighed.

“We have a midnight snack set up in the small library. Tea, cheese, crackers, cake, and wine,” Harry said.

“I could use a bite,” Belle said.

Esme stared at the empty space where Ryan had just been.

“You okay?” I asked her.

“I need to see the dungeon, now,” she said.

Vern nodded. “I’ll take her. You kids go get a snack.”

We walked into the small library, which was a huge library to me, and there were footmen dressed to serve. I wanted the full tour.

A girl could get used to servants and a dungeon.

EPILOGUE

The new reality of no one in my basement and no murder to solve set in. It was nice. But now, I had a secret to uncover. The cousins played dumb. I hadn't worked up the courage to confront my aunt, just yet. We had a gypsy wedding to attend, and she always felt out of place there. Of course, Vinny's family all wished he'd married a gypsy girl.

Esme wouldn't discuss the secret, at all. The truth potion had put up a wall between us.

So, I went to the gypsy connection. Belle and her sister Vivian both worked; they lived with and supported their widowed mother. Their dad had been pretty awful so no one in the community mocked them for being old maids. They were both gorgeous girls who could've been married as teens but they didn't want to end up with a guy who was nice but turned into a drunk or worse later on. I couldn't blame them. Uncle Vin had been called to help handle their father when he'd gotten out-of-control drunk. I'd overheard some of those stories when Vin told Aunt Mandy about it.

The gypsy sisters and I met for lunch at a burger place near their employment. Vivian worked in the morgue at the hospital. She kept the zombie population down by pushing a needle into each deceased person's ear until she hit brain matter. No one noticed, but a zombie outbreak? We'd notice that!

"Belle said Bran is hot and rich," Vivian said.

"He is. And he's nice. Ethical. Smart. So far, he's nice. You'll meet him at the wedding," I said.

We placed our orders, and I sipped a strawberry lemonade.

"What did you want to talk about if not Bran?" Belle asked.

"Did you want to talk about Harry?" I asked.

"Harry?" Vivian asked.

"A werewolf cousin of Bran's. He flirted with your sister," I said.

"He was nice, but we didn't talk or anything, really. I don't even know what he does for a living," she said.

"The Killeans own a lot of businesses. I can find out. Ask Bran at the wedding," I said.

"We can't approach a single guy," Belle said.

Vivian rolled her eyes. "He'll be with Claudia in a public place. Stop being so old-fashioned."

"What did you want to talk about?" Belle asked.

“Fine. I found out from Esme somehow that there is a secret about me or my childhood that I don’t know. No one will tell me.”

“Truth potion?” Viv suggested.

“I tried it. Whatever promises or vows they made to others are stronger than a truth potion. You two haven’t heard anything?” I asked.

Belle shook her head. “Your parents were killed by a werewolf. Vin saved you and raised you.”

“And my dad wasn’t a gypsy hunter?” I asked.

“No, we understood he came to it from a family attack. That’s how Gorger hunters usually get into the work. They were attacked or someone they loved was attacked, and they get in the hunter network. They tend to be loners. It’s a bit unusual. It was said he was friends with Vin. A responsible hunter who respected gypsy culture. They ended up married to sisters, so they were family. Vin is the one who took the heat for not marrying gypsy. Everyone spoke wonderfully about your mother. We were told to be very nice to you because of what you went through,” Viv said.

“Viv,” Belle said.

“What? She wants the raw truth of what we were told. What we know. We weren’t allowed to play with a lot of non-gypsy kids, but you needed friends and people who weren’t going to ask questions about your dead parents. I know your aunt homeschooled you for a year until you were ready to go back. Then, you seemed to be okay. You came out of the fog.” Viv smiled.

“Thanks for telling me the truth. Did anyone say it was my dad’s fault or blame anyone? My mother always liked the darker side of things. She wanted to help everyone. And got too close to the weres and vamps, some said,” I added.

“You do, too. But you have a system to help them and bring them to you. You don’t go into the dark dens of a traditional werewolf pack or visit a vampire nest. You learned from her. None of it was her fault. Or your fathers. Or Vin’s. There is a reason for hunters, no matter what Harry said,” Belle said.

“Harry doesn’t believe in hunters?” Viv asked.

“We didn’t get to talk about it much,” Belle said.

“Some weres think they should be free to shift and be natural in certain areas. Boundaries set up. Hunt smaller animals. Like a wolf would. I don’t know how I feel about that. Or how it could be monitored. But if someone said I couldn’t practice magic because I lived in a human world and had humans in and out of my coffee shop, I’d fight that,” I admitted.

“As long as they don’t kill humans. There is a reason gypsies have been tasked to be hunters for generations. Our men can handle the dark side and a good fight. If they want to hunt deer or bunny rabbits, fine. Not humans,” Viv said.

“Agreed,” I said.

“We can ask around,” Bell said. “See if Mom or anyone knows anything. They won’t tell you but us, maybe they will.”

“Thanks so much. A death where hunters and werewolves were involved, someone in the gypsy community will know. But who knows what the secret is? It might be something totally different.” I sighed.

We sat back as our food was delivered. I grabbed the ketchup.

“I want to hear more about Harry,” Viv said.

The look on Bran’s face as we waited in the church said it all. The gypsy girls were dressed to party and the men to drink. Bran and Vin were the only two men in full suits other than the grooms, but that was okay.

I was in a silver dress that shimmered, but it was nothing like what the gypsy brides would be wearing.

“I feel like I’m lacking some rhinestones,” he said to me.

My cousins laughed. “Men don’t bling. Not like this.” Iris pointed as the doors opened.

The brides couldn’t fit down the aisle at the same time. Ten-foot wide fully hooped skirts narrowed to tiny waists. The bling was on the bodices, and both girls wore crowns. One dress was done in red, the other green. The trains went on and on.

“Those dresses have to weigh more than they do,” Bran said in my ear.

I nodded. “They’ll change for the dancing. The trains Velcro off.”

“I’ve never seen anything like that,” he admitted.

After the ceremony, we went to the hall adjacent to the church, and the bling only got bigger. The cakes had sparkles. The brides danced in the full gowns and cut the cake before disappearing. They came back in short skirts with bling all over.

The dancing kicked up and so did the drinking. Bran ditched his jacket and rolled up his sleeves to look less formal.

“Why are the young girls only dancing with each other?” he asked.

“Because if they dance with boys their fathers will kill them. Until they’re out and looking for husbands, there’s no contact with boys. Some girls break the rules, but this family is strict and old school.” I smiled.

“The dancing is very suggestive.” Bran looked at me instead of the dance floor. “They’re very young.”

“Gypsy kids are never kids. The little boys are little men, and the girls are women, always looking to get married. It’s their culture. But I’m glad I can dance with you and not get in trouble.” I pulled him on the dance floor.

We weren’t wild, but we did get noticed. The brides came over and dragged me to the DJ.

“You have to sing something,” the red bride said.

“No, no, it’s your wedding. You’re the stars.” I didn’t show off my singing voice much. Never outside the family. But they knew I could carry a tune well enough.

“I have to see this,” Bran said.

“It’s our day. You have to,” insisted the green bride.

“Fine.” I took the microphone from the DJ. “The song from Pulp Fiction about the teenage wedding.”

He gave me a thumbs up.

I walked to the front. “At the request of both beautiful brides, I’m going to sing something. Get ready to show off your twisting skills...”

The crowd went wild, and then, even the little kids were twisting like pros. I knew my audience. I couldn’t sing as low as Chuck Berry, but I saw my aunt and uncle get up and dance, as well as my cousins. Bran stood at the back and grinned as everyone got lost in the music. I wasn’t a gypsy witch, but I loved my gypsy cousins, and no one could party like they could. I hoped the teenage weddings would last, and Bran and I might have a shot, too.

For a few minutes, I was lost in song and forgot about the secret. Tomorrow. I’d get back on that investigation tomorrow.

A NOTE FROM THE AUTHOR:

Hi! Welcome to the world of strong witches, hot wizards, were, vamps, gypsies and more! If you enjoyed Pick Your Potion, please grab book 2: Spells to Die For: http://cheryldragon.com/ccdragon/?page_id=194

Don't be shy! Let me know what you want more of Claudia and her vamps. The reclusive Killeen clan. The gypsies...

Want more Cozy Paranormal Mysteries?

Check out the Deanna Oscar Series: http://cheryldragon.com/ccdragon/?page_id=202

Book 1 A Mansion, A Drag Queen, And A New Job

Book 2: A Club, An Imposter, And A Competition

Book 3: A Bar, A Brother, And A Ghost Hurt

Book 4: A Voodoo Shop, A Zombie, And A Party

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

A loyal Chicago girl who loves deep dish pizza, the Cubs, and the Lake, CC Dragon is fascinated by mysteries, sleuthing, as well as the supernatural.

CC loves creating characters, especially amateur sleuths who solve crimes in their spare time. A coffee and chocolate addict who loves fast cars, she's still looking for a hero who likes to cook and clean...so she can write more!

Website: <http://www.ccdragon.com>

Facebook: <https://www.facebook.com/ccdragonauthor>

Twitter: <https://twitter.com/authorccdagon>

Newsletter: <https://app.mailerlite.com/webforms/landing/o614f0>

ECHO DOWN

BRADON NAVE

Copyright notice: All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000

ECHO DOWN

Even a militia of angry immortals will not keep her from rescuing him.

Tucked away within a peculiar mountain, the small Kingdom of Evrastill is home to an elite society of immortals. Carrie, one of the Society's younger members, has endured several challenges during her days within the Kingdom.

As other members enjoy individual skills of the mind and body...Carrie has yet to acquire her skill—her magic.

Although disheartening, her lack of magic is not Carrie's primary concern. Many years before, the treacherous actions of the Society's Council led to the separation of Carrie and the object she valued above all else—Charlie.

The decades passed, leaving Carrie unaged, but changing the views and minds of those of the Council. When Carrie's plea to collect him is finally obliged, even a militia of angry immortals will not keep her from finally rescuing him.

The adventure sends Carrie and her immortal friends on a dangerous quest. With her eternal happiness at stake, Carrie will leverage everything to reclaim what has been taken from her, but is she too late?

When dark secrets and enemies are revealed, only then will Carrie learn the identity of her gift... her magic. It has been lurking within her...aching for the opportunity to be unleashed.

Chapter 1

Their voices, crisp as the autumn air filling his lungs, soothed his soul—their boisterous praise cut through the slight gusts of wind and chattering birds.

With guides on either side assisting his balance and maintaining his stability, he walked blindly toward the cheerful singing.

As always, there were no faces; no shapes or shadows.

“Happy birthday to you! Haaappy birthday to you! Happy Birthday dear, Charlie...happy birthday to you!”

Heavy clapping had him taking the hand of one of the assistants, grasping it appreciatively. Today was his day.

“Charlie, we’re going to help you to your chair over here and then we’re going to help you blow out all eighty-eight candles on this cake.”

Shuffling over the foliage, the smell of fallen leaves was quickly overpowered by sweet icing and a freshly baked cake.

Securely seated in his chair, he offered his audience a smile—assuming they were either smiling back or ignoring him.

“What’s your wish going to be this year, Charlie?” The cool palm of her hand cupped his face—comforting and soft.

“I have all I need. Thank you.”

“What then, do you want this year?”

Flooding and rampant, the thoughts poured thickly over him—so much—too much. “I’m tired. I wish to rest.”

“Right now? You want to rest right now?” The voice to his right was Jessica’s, a sweet caretaker from the home.

“No, Jessica. Right now, I’d like a piece of that cake you all have for me.”

“You heard the man, let’s not keep him waiting.”

Forks on porcelain and talk of something called Pinterest had him longing for the impromptu celebration to cease so that he might retire to a cool quilt and frumpy lounging attire.

Cake consumed and small talk had, he made his way across the yard on the arm of Jessica.

Thick and warm, the familiar scents of the nursing home were a stark difference to the fresh fall breeze outdoors. Down the hall, he made his way, past the mindless ramblings of Minerva Hopkins. Past the broadcasts of Fox News and CNN—and to his own piece of the universe. Escorted to his rocking chair, he thanked his attendant and sent her on her way.

The sweetest moments of the day were those spent drifting to daydreams. It'd been decades since he'd lost his eyesight, yet when he dreamt, each color was vividly stunning—each scene a perfectly orchestrated memory from another world.

Sounds of the hallway—medication rounds and the corralling of Minerva, chased his slumber—leaving him rocking and irritated.

Eighty-eight years...and for what? Even Minerva had visitors on Sundays—busy grandchildren with poor manners. He had nothing. There were no visitors, no framed faces for him to reference. There were no long-winded tales of younger years that he could reminisce on. There was only his chair, his dreams, and the comfort of knowing that he was organic in nature, and would soon drift eternally.

Certainly, there would be no cake for him next year, but rather a memorial brick with his name on it near the large pond the other residents spoke of and were so fond of.

Extraneous cruelty would be walking into yet another worthless year's celebration. No more birthdays...enough. Surely, an old man can rest—dream and be left in peace indefinitely.

His quilt to his chest, the chair rocked softer. His head tilted backward, he envisioned he were eleven and leisurely swaying with the winds from a tire swing—and then he was fading.

“Mr. Jacobson?” The gruff voice was Tony's, and but two feet from him. “Charlie it's time to get in bed. I have your stuff ready for you if you wanna—”

“You wake me up so I can sleep? You idiot!”

“We've had this discussion, Jacobson. You sleep in your bed through the night. I don't make the rules I just follow them.”

His nightly routine typically left him feeling undignified and helpless. Finally dressed in comfortable, loose-fitting sweats, he pulled his comforter to his chin.

“You want this light on or off, sir?”

A deep sigh and he was turning from his back to Tony. “You seriously are a moron. Get the hell out of my room before my foot makes its way right up your backside.”

“Goodnight, Jacobson.”

Morning was typically announced by cardinals just outside the floor-level window, or Minerva, screeching for buttermilk and a bus ticket.

Inhaling deeply through his nostrils, he searched his thoughts mercilessly for some fragment of a nightly venture during his slumber—no dreams were there to recollect.

“Damn you...damn everything.” Wiping his tired eyes, he found himself angry...chronically angry for waking up each morning to nothingness.

The day would be long—just like the day before it and the day before it. The frustrations associated with longing to be free of it all and having the ability to fade away just out of reach was disheartening.

Once more, he maneuvered free from his bedding—feet to the cold floor—he found his house shoes, and cautiously made his way back to the chair. If there were no dreams to recall, perhaps he could have a few moments of serenity to shake the night from his bones and enjoy the cardinals.

“Hey there, Charlie! How are you this morning?” Jessica’s voice sliced through the atmosphere, startling him just as he reached his chair.

“I’m fine. I’m going to sit a spell and—”

“Oh no, you silly goose. We’ve got walking to do, and breakfast to eat, and fellowship at nine and then some sweet junior-high girls are coming all the way from—”

“I don’t care!” The force of his grasp on the back of the chair had his fingers aching. “I...I don’t care about any of that right now, Jessica. Right now, I’d like you to leave me be.”

“Well aren’t we just a grumpy Gus? Where are your walking shoes, boy? Do you need to use the bedside commode before we walk? Two rounds today...I know you can do it. Just let me grab your cane.”

Chapter 2

Poised and statuesque, she stood among the trees outside the entrance of Evrastill. The light above her tickled the ground below, only fragments penetrated through the thick branches.

No grand grates or elaborate fixtures surrounded the entrance to the Kingdom. A society of secrecy, the tunneled opening to the mountain was humble in appearance.

For hours, she'd stood anchored, awaiting the Council's decision. Surely with the upheaval and recent scandal amongst Council leadership, her request would be approved—she asked for nothing more than other society members possessed currently.

Rustling in the foliage captured her peripheral gaze. A small squirrel scurried cautiously about the forest floor until it reached her feet and then up her body—sitting on her shoulder, it removed the nut from its cheek and consumed it carelessly from the safety of her watch.

She paid little attention to its actions—her mind consumed with the situation at hand. Would her eternity be blissful—all she'd ever begged for, or would she remain hollow and wandering ever-after?

“Why do you stand alone, Carrie?”

“Nyrobie, I felt you on my thoughts.”

Nyrobie appeared from the cave's entrance and walked to Carrie.

“I didn't mean to intrude. You had me concerned.”

“You're my truest friend, Nyrobie. I've nothing to hide, my thoughts are yours to examine as you see fit.”

Facing her, Carrie noticed an uncontrollable smile curling the lips of her friend. Nyrobie pushed one of the many small, waist-long, black, braids behind her ear.

“Tell me, Nyrobie, have you been meddling in the minds of other members today?”

“Perhaps.”

“Nyrobie!”

A full smile cascaded across Nyrobie's face, her dark complexion speckled with bits of sunlight from above. “The Council will approve your request, my friend.”

The squirrel clung tightly to her shoulder as Carrie reached for a nearby tree, supporting herself as she stared toward the ground. “You’re certain? Full approval?”

“It shall be unanimous. They’ll summon you shortly. Attempt to appear surprised.”

“Nyrobie...” Carrie extended her arms, embracing her friend as tears fled her eyes. “All this time...I’ve been waiting...all I want is my right to happiness.”

The squirrel continued nibbling from Carrie’s shoulder as they embraced.

“I know, Carrie. Let’s go get it.”

“You will be with me, Nyrobie?” She gently pushed away, examining her expression.

Nyrobie’s eyes widened as her head cocked and lowered. “I’m always with you. I’ll be with you a million years from now.”

“It may be dangerous. We’ll be so far from Evrastill, far from the Society—”

“Away from Evrastill and the Society? I’m completely sold. And I get to help my best friend obtain something as infinite as time.”

“I love you, Nyrobie.”

“And I you, Carrie. Let’s go. Councilman Aglet shall summon you momentarily.”

Carrie gently placed the chubby squirrel on the ground and followed Nyrobie into Evrastill’s entrance. The average human eye might enter the cave and look upon a damp and dangerous dwelling—nothing worth more than a curious glance prior to exiting.

Typically, any human entering Evrastill did so accompanied by a Society member. Thrill-seeking, cave-exploring humans were rarely heard of—and in the history of Evrastill, only three of them had been rescued by Society members before they perished in the vast underground system.

Deep within the mountain, the faint-blue glow of millions of crystals embedded in the mountain’s inner walls lit the path as Carrie and Nyrobie continued toward their home. The closer they got, the brighter the ambience became.

Exiting the tunnel, they looked down on the small kingdom...Evrastill...or to some, sanctuary. The Kingdom was comparable to the size of a small Midwestern town. The population was 3,776, and had been for decades.

The light cascading from the mountains’ inner walls allowed for vegetation and several streams flowed from walls and around the trees and modest stone-comprised homes.

They made their way down the stairs etched in the wall’s side until their feet met lush, green grass.

“There you two are.”

“Jerrek.” Nyrobie’s arms lifted, welcoming the approaching Jerrek’s embrace and kiss. Jerrek too, was a loyal friend. He and Nyrobie had been joined seventy-six years prior—their bond was as solid as the mountain around them.

Tall, broad, and muscular, Jerrek’s gifts were impressive. The ability to lift a one-thousand-pound boulder with one’s physical being was something most any member the Society could achieve—Jerrek had mastered the ability to do such wonders with his mind. His strength and loyalty secured his place as a future councilman within the Society.

“I hear you’ve been summoned, Carrie.” Jerrek stepped to Carrie, offering her a friendly kiss on the cheek.

“Indeed, I have, Jerrek.”

“Splendid. I’ve been wanting to venture out for something other than solitude.”

Carrie looked to her friends—both side-by-side. “Jerrek...you will accompany us?”

His boisterous laugh had his head flailing backward. “You ask silly things, Carrie. Next to Nyrobie and my parents, you are my dearest friend. You think what, you and my bride should leave Evrastill on an epic adventure while I wait here for your return? Besides...he’s my friend too. I’m going.”

“Thank you, Jerrek!” Carrie embraced him.

“Enough you two. If a Council informant sees your actions they might know I’ve pried into Aglet’s thoughts.”

As they decoupled, Jerrek lifted Nyrobie in his arms, cradling her like a child. “You’re a fool to think he doesn’t know already. The man has been breathing for nearly four-thousand years. I’m sure he’s well aware when his ideas are accessed.”

Setting Nyrobie down, he kissed her atop the head. “As well, I’m sure he was expecting it.”

“Aglet is kind, Nyrobie. The current Council Leadership will reunite our kingdom.”

“I’m sure, Carrie. Let’s hope that Aglet is kind when you stand before him. Here comes his assistant to fetch you now.” Nyrobie smiled as the three of them began walking in the direction of the Council-Hall. The building was the pinnacle of the Society. It stood as the place of judgment, union among Society members, and more recently it housed the heated evisceration of the Council.

For centuries, the Council was comprised of twelve elders—all of which were set on maintaining and enforcing a stringent code of existence on Society members.

Carrie embraced the majority of her kingdom’s laws. Many of their beliefs acted as a cornerstone for their very being. Some beliefs, however, were as archaic as the Kingdom itself.

Walking into the solid-white ivory Council Hall, she controlled her pace—her head held high as she was escorted in front of the elders. No Society member could sit on the Council prior to his or her one-thousandth year. However, by human standards, none of the Council members appeared any older than Carrie.

She stood in front of the twelve members, all robed and seated behind the historic ivory-white table.

“Carrie, my dear. You’re well?” Councilman Aglet stood. Piercing-blue eyes and shoulder-length blonde hair gave him an intimidating appearance which demanded respect.

“I am, Councilman.”

“Good. We shall proceed.” He took his seat. “For centuries, our society has existed in peace and harmony beneath the war-torn world belonging to mankind. Their cruelty is evident in bounds. Our Society has prospered, not because we have coexisted, but because we have so staunchly opposed that.”

His words had Carrie’s heart racing, believing the Council would indeed deny her request.

“Through the years our values have kept our people grounded and gracious for the gifts we’ve been given. As well, we have learned through our attempts to protect the human species, that their people aren’t entirely cruel. In fact, along with sharing similarities in physical features, our people share many of other qualities as well. Our society must understand that the average human enjoys a brief life, and during that life, they are young and viable for but a brief portion. It is impossible, by our standards, for humans to gain the maturity and knowledge needed to become anything more on an individual level in such a fleeting stretch of time. This, however, is not about that...not entirely. This is about a cultural shift taking place within our society. Each of our unified members are unified only because they are bound by something no words can accurately portray. Once unified, those couples are by one another’s side indefinitely. Carrie, if you would have come to this council one-thousand years ago, claiming to have not only bonded to a human, but asking permission to comeingle and unify...you would have been executed. Even a year ago, you’d have been laughed out of the Hall.”

He smiled at her, her respirations slowed.

“But as we move forward and advance, we must look at these situations individually. Carrie, you have proven yourself of a sound mind and a genuine asset to the Society. Without further delay, Carrie, do you understand completely what you are asking of the Council?”

Her dry throat was nearly incapable of producing the words, “I do.”

“You understand that a union of such will be forever lacking reproduction?”

“I do.”

“You understand that this human will be expected to follow the laws of the Society, just as a member would, and will be held so accountable?”

“I do.”

“You understand this human may never leave Evrastill once he enters.”

“Yes, Councilman.”

“Carrie, it has been decided by the Council that your request is to be granted in full. You may leave Evrastill with an experienced party of your choosing, collect your human, restore him, and bring him back to Evrastill where he will be offered immortality...and when you are ready...you will be unified.”

No longer able to maintain her composure, she kneeled to the floor, her trembling hand covering her mouth as her gaze remained downward.

“You will be held personally responsible for this mission, Carrie. Should anything go array, you will stand before us again.”

She only nodded—her voice had escaped her as her tears continued.

“You will be the second Society member to make such a request, Carrie. Councilman Andre can attest that such a union has worked well in his favor.”

Carrie looked to Andre as she arose. He merely nodded. Councilman Andre was a monumental influence on the movement within the Society to replace several Council members. He was also the first to become unified with a human...Elinor, a woman he rescued from the surrounding tunnels nearly 186 years prior. Elinor, Joseph, and Clark were teens when they were rescued and imprisoned for nearly fifty years until they were finally offered sanctuary within the Society. They were initially shunned as they possessed no extraordinary skills, but because humans do not age within Evrastill, the Society eventually accepted them after nearly one hundred years. It was obvious that Andre had bonded to Elinor even while she was imprisoned. Now they were unified, and his pioneering efforts had made it possible for Carrie to do the same.

“Council, I appreciate your acceptance of my request. You have my full support and loyalty. I understand the risks and will accept any consequences that may stem from this mission.”

“Very well, Carrie. You may be off on your mission.”

“I may leave now, Councilman Aglet?” Carrie stared in disbelief.

“Of course, my dear. I understand there may be some...time constraints.”

“Yes...thank you. Thank you all so much.”

“That is all, Carrie.”

Chapter 3

She sat solemnly by the creek behind her father's home. She arose from the soft earth beneath her as her father approached. His smile was tired—as were his eyes. He appeared riddled with worry.

“You look beautiful, Carrie.”

“You look fetching yourself, Father.”

As he stood by her he turned to the water. “What if I retrieved him, Carrie?”

Looking to her father, she found herself momentarily at a loss for words. “Father...you know I must do this. I'm bonded to him.”

“Carrie, you are my daughter. If anything happens to you...”

Taking his hand in hers, she pulled him closer. “Father, you know the pain of losing the one you're bonded too. If I do not go to him, I too will live with that pain for all eternity. I can't continue on without him.”

“Carrie...I have accepted whom you have bonded to. If you bring him home safely—”

“When I bring him home safely, Father.”

“When...you bring him home I will honor and respect him as your unified partner. I only fear for your well-being while you're up there.”

“Father, I am eighty-eight years old.”

“Yet all they'll see when they look at you is an eighteen-year-old human female...beautiful and vulnerable in their world. Humans...some of them, will prey on vulnerability. I've never felt more empty. Please...Carrie, let me bring him home.”

Acknowledging the fear in his eyes, she kissed his cheek. “All they would see when they looked at you is a devilishly attractive eighteen-year-old human male. And you would actually be alone...I on the other hand, will have both Nyrobie and Jerrek at my side.”

Instantly her father's expression changed slightly. “Jerrek will be with you?”

“Yes, Father. Please remember we've all been up there and among them countless times, and I've studied Humanity for ages.”

“You are always with me when you are among them. Please do not ask me not to worry. Perhaps it's selfish, but if anything happened to you...I'd be here all eternity with nothing but memories.”

“If I was always in your company while above Evrastill, I was unaware, Father. I will return to you just as I am now, but with my beautiful human man on my arm...and you’re going to love him. That’s just how it will be.”

He chuckled as he rested his hands on her shoulders. “I see your mother in you—so strong and independent. I won’t sleep until you return, but you have my blessing.”

She offered a cautious grin. “Do I, Father? Will you receive him as my eternal choice? There are members of the Society that would rather see me extinguished than unified with a human.”

“Carrie...you are bonded to him. What I think matters not.”

“It matters to me, Father. I must have your complete support, there are so many here that despise my choice, I need you now more than ever.”

His gaze turned from her and settled on the water. “When I think of him...his face, I think only of your sorrow and what the Council did to you, Carrie. I think of the equating factors and how lucky I am to have you standing here now.”

“The Council is restructured now, Father. What was once a crime is now accepted.”

“The Council is fickle, Carrie...as are humans. They may love and bond to many during their wretched one hundred years. They deceive their unifications and conspire with others.”

“Not all, Father. He has never loved another. We remain bonded regardless of time and the Council’s actions. I feel our bond just as strongly now as I did then.”

His scowl and pursed lips assured Carrie his true feelings would soon erupt. “Why? I don’t understand why a human? There are so many of your own kind here. Danny is strong and such a promising member—”

“Danny? Please do not be ridiculous. You have said it yourself, Father...one cannot choose with whom they bond...they can only let it be...forever. I must let it be forever. Please, I beg you to accept him as your son.”

His expression softened as he turned to her. “I already have...here.”

Reaching into the pocket of his silk robe, he removed a blue gem, attached to a golden chain. “Restoration.”

“You would trust me with this, Father?”

“Of course. In twelve years, you will be granted your own. You will certainly need it for the journey at hand.”

“Thank you, Father. I was certain I would have to beg Nyrobie for a drop.”

“To hold Restoration is a great responsibility, Carrie. A single drop could restore a man-depleted forest, breathe life into the dead...and heal even the most macabre wounds. Mankind has waged war for reasons far less concerning than what is in your hands. If they were to learn of your secret while you are up there, they would destroy you for it.”

“The only human I plan to engage is him, Father. This mission will be simple...my concern is the transition when I return. I feel for the next forty years or so, I will be an outcast.”

“Something you should be used to by now, my dear.” His playful smile was followed by a gentle kiss on her cheek.

“I love you, Father. I must go now.”

Standing at the base of the stone steps she and Nyrobie had descended earlier, Carrie, Nyrobie, and Jerrek faced Councilman Aglet, Carrie’s father—Tarik, and several other members of the Society wishing to see them off on their journey. The human, Clark, was among them.

Dressed in dark clothing for concealment, the only additional item she stowed was the chained gem.

“Remember your training as well as your studies. If you encounter any human other than your extraction target, be mindful of your mannerisms. Remember...if you do encounter a human they will surely assume the three of you to be young humans...naïve and easily manipulated. If you find yourself at their mercy, you must refrain from inflicting injury upon them of any sort. Be off now, and the Council wishes you the best outcome.”

Stepping out into the surrounding forest, the trio took a moment to bask in the idea of independence. Smiles overtook them, and then laughter.

“Oh, how I love you two. I couldn’t do this without you. I would be friendless without you.”

“That’s not true, Carrie...the humans, Elinor, Clark, and Joseph are quite fond of you.” Jerrek’s comment had them chuckling again.

“The cardinals will meet us at the forest’s edge. They will guide us.” With this, Carrie sprang to a low-hanging branch of a large tree, speedily hoisting herself up, she leapt from branch to branch until Jerrek and Nyrobie were no longer visible; she was at the top of the tree within seconds. Peering out over the tops of the countless trees, she spotted what appeared to be the edge of the tree line.

Looking downward, she merely stepped from the tree-top, sailing to the ground through an opening in the branches—landing with tremendous force.

“It’s this way. They’ll be there within the hour.”

In seconds the three were sprinting at speeds faster than the average sparrow can fly, bounding gracefully over downed trees and ducking proficiently under branches. They’d reached the tree line only a moment later—not a single bead of sweat adorned their brows.

“Now what?” Nyrobie looked to the sky.

“We wait for our feathered friends.” Carrie eyed the ground, sitting down.

“When we’re returning, we’ll need to take turns carrying him...otherwise we’ll be out here for days. Even the fastest human is pathetically slow.” Jerrek smiled as he sat down.

“Yes, Jerrek. I want to get him to Evrastill as soon as possible. Humans are so fragile in their surroundings. The sooner I get him home the better.” Carrie eyed the Restoration within her palm.

“It would be absolutely awful to be human...” Jerrek stared out over the surrounding mountain range as he made his proclamation. “So weak...and the aging thing is truly alarming.”

“That’s cruel, Jerrek.” Carrie’s sharp tone had both her friends looking toward her. “They know nothing else. How blessed are we that we need not have to worry of mortality and growing decrepit? How blessed are we to not age a day after our eighteenth year? How horrible it must be to awake each morning to know that one day there will be no more mornings...one day there will be nothing. And yet they persevere and carve out an existence with the little time they have. Humans may seem cruel, fragile, and even insignificant to some...but I have seen firsthand the cruelty of our own kind. And remember, the weakling you speak of is the one I am to be unified with...for eternity.”

The look on his face expressed both his shock and regret. “Carrie...I meant nothing ill of him. I meant what I said, he is my friend. I wouldn’t be here if I felt any different.”

Her anger left quicker than it had mounted. “I’m sorry, Jerrek. I know your heart.”

“Look!” Nyrobie pointed to the sky as the high-pitched calls of hundreds of small red cardinals fell upon them. The birds circled in the air above, coaxing the trio to rise to their feet. As they did, several of the cardinals swooped down, resting on their shoulders and heads.

“Your friends are beautiful, Carrie.”

“You wear them well, Jerrek.”

“Darkness will be on us soon. We shall travel to him through the cover of night and collect him before the dawn.” Carrie’s confident confession had the other two nodding in agreement. “Let’s go.”

“Carrie...what are we to do once we reach this place? We can’t walk through the entrance and retrieve him.”

“I know that, Jerrek. If my plan seems ill-planned that’s because it is. I didn’t know what the Council would decide. To grant a Society member the right to unify with a human living amongst us is one thing...to extract, restore, and introduce one is another matter entirely. I’m not entirely sure I believe this is happening.”

“And you are certain he will agree to an eternity with you, Carrie?”

“I am, Jerrek. Our bond is strongest now. I feel he is beckoning me to him.”

“Then why the hesitation, ladies? Let’s go get the boy.”

As the cardinals took flight, the three immortals darted into the trees on the opposing side of the clearing.

Chapter 4

The earthly night was all around them—strange sounds and odd smells were quite foreign. Traveling afoot, even the swiftest human would need an entire night and the following day sprinting at full-speed and without resting to reach the destination outside the mountainous and heavily wooded area—Carrie, Nyrobie, and Jerrek were approaching their destination within an hour of departing the entrance of Evrastill—their pace matched that of the cardinals above them.

The frigid air numbed her nose—something she wasn't quite accustomed to as Evrastill was ever a consistent, comfortable temperature. Soft glow of artificial light shined through the trees as the three approached a beautifully crafted building within a clearing.

“This will be your first interaction since your forced separation, Carrie. Do you need a moment to collect yourself, or at least to rest?”

“I have rested long enough, Nyrobie. My heart has never been more alive. I feel him. He's there... just there.”

“He'll wonder why you haven't come to him sooner. He'll have countless questions—”

“I know this, Jerrek. And I'll have an infinite amount of time to explain how such actions would result in my execution or worse...his end. I had to protect him from a ruthless and corrupt Council. He'll understand...we are bonded...he will understand.”

“And you are certain he will come with you, even now?”

Carrie turned to Jerrek as a Cardinal landed on her shoulder. “Yes...of course...as I said, we are bonded.”

“She speaks the truth, Jerrek. Even now he dreams of you.” Nyrobie smiled as she pointed toward the building.

“I must go now.” Turning from her friends, Carrie prompted her feathered guide to continue its navigation to him. She methodically followed the small bird across the lawn, leading to one of several windows. Peering inside, her heart fluttered to see a withered and aged Charlie, sleeping in a rocking chair. The years he'd been so painfully close, and yet pursuing him or even stealing a glance would have resulted in disastrous consequences.

A strange anxiety had loomed since finding she would be capable of securing him, and seeing him exacerbated it.

Gently opening the window, she climbed inside. Kneeling in front of the tired, haggard human before her, she took his hand and kissed it repeatedly.

Mumbling of some sort escaped his mouth, and then he was looking about. “Who’s there?”

His voice—so different yet so much the same—nearly took her breath. It had been seventy years since she had heard it.

“Charlie.”

His eyes widened as he looked in her direction. “Who...who are you?”

“Charlie...it is I...Carrie.”

With this Charlie smiled and relaxed. “I see. I’m still dreaming.”

Wiping her tears, she kissed his worn face. “No my love...this is not a dream. I have returned for you. I am here for you now, just before your light fades, I am here to assure it shines forever.”

His shaking hand reached toward the desk in front of his chair. Opening the top drawer, he slipped his finger in the opening and slammed it partially closed with the other hand. “Ah! Dammit!”

Immediately he placed his finger in his mouth. “That...that should do it. Damned if it’s the dreams or my medications. Voices and—”

“Charlie, I’m still here.”

He stared in her direction, mouth agape.

“I’m by your side now...and I will be forever if you give me that chance.”

His lip quivering was coupled with tears pooling in either eye, he reached blindly for her face. “How? How is this possible?”

“Everything has changed now, Charlie. We can love now freely.”

“You’re really here? Carrie...you’re here?”

“I am, my love.”

He reached his weathered arms forward, embracing her. “I don’t understand...”

“I know...I know you don’t but if you give the opportunity, I promise I will make sense of it.”

He cried violently yet silently onto her shoulder. “Why have you come back now? I don’t got much...much time left and...my eyes...I can’t see your face.”

“Charlie...my beautiful love. I am here to bring you back with me. And I will be doing it with the full blessing of the Council.”

“Now? You love me even now? I’m...I’m so old and raggedy. Carrie, you can’t love me when you are you, and I’m this.”

“Charlie...I have loved you since long before the day in the lilies...your face has been all that has kept me walking. I cannot go on without you.”

“Carrie...I’m tired and close to the end of my road...”

“Your road leads home with me...and it is just the beginning...please...trust me.”

Placing her hands on either of his temples, she witnessed the color of his pupils return to the dark brown she remembered.

“Oh my god! Your face! It really is you!”

“It’s me, Charlie...”

He instantly hugged her again.

“Come back with me, my love, tonight.”

“This is real? I feel like I’m on some other planet right now.”

“I am real...and if you allow me...I will restore your earthly body to the day of our last kiss...the day in the lilies. You will then return with me to Evrastill, and with the Council’s permission...we will be unified.”

“Unified? Married?”

She chuckled. “Yes my love.”

“This don’t make no sense, Carrie. How? After they took my sight I spent years in a damned mental institution...thinkin’ I was crazy myself, and wondering if I really was insane...I went my whole life without friends or family because I couldn’t shake you off my mind. And now you just show up and say all’s well? You’re certain?”

“Charlie...I was released from Evrastill’s prison, only to be shunned by my own people. I sat silently in the shadows, just hoping something miraculous would occur before you left me...and then it did. The Council is behind me...they are behind us. All you have to do is say yes and you and I will spend eternity in one another’s arms.”

His respirations hastened as he leaned forward, his hands plastered across his forehead. “This is real. I’m...I can leave with you right now.”

“Right now.”

“And...when you say eternity—”

“You remember the humans I once told you of? They haven’t aged a day since their rescue. They’re safe from time within Evrastill. You would be safe with me...in my arms for eternity.”

“Yes...yes...” His smile was fleeting and then he was grabbing his chest, his eyes widening as he looked to Carrie.

“Charlie?”

She captured him as he fell from his chair. Hoisting him in the air, she jumped out the window with him in her arms, sprinting toward the trees.

Lying him on the ground, she produced the Restoration as Nyrobie and Jerrek were quick to approach.

“Is he dead?”

“No, Jerrek.”

“He looks dead...and he certainly doesn’t look anything like the last time I saw him.”

“Enough, Jerrek! Help me!”

As they straightened him out about the fallen leaves, Carrie gently lowered the opened gem bottle to Charlie’s chapped and bleeding lips. A single, sparkling, blue drop entered the man’s mouth.

“He’s not breathing, Carrie.”

“He’s still there, Jerrek. I feel his thoughts...he’s scared.” Nyrobie’s proclamation sent tears streaming down Carrie’s cheeks.

“I’m here, my love. Please stay with me.” Lowering to him, she kissed him, their first shared kiss in seventy years.

“Why isn’t he breathing, Nyrobie?”

“I’m unsure, Jerrek.”

Carrie rested her face to his frail chest as she cried. “You will live forever in my heart, my love. Please don’t be frightened...go peacefully if you must go...and know I’m here with you.”

“This makes no sense.” Jerrek stepped forward, producing his own gem of Restoration from around his neck. Opening it while standing above, he delivered a single drop—a brilliant streaming blue into Charlie’s mouth.

Instantly Charlie’s chest expanded, his lungs filling with air.

“Charlie!” Carrie scurried backward as the three watched the human, writhing on the ground before them.

“Can’t breathe!” he worked rigorously to tear free of his dingy night gown as Carrie arose to look down upon him. The hair on his head was rapidly darkening—thickening. The muscle tone of his exposed chest and arms developed to that of a healthy eighteen-year-old man...not a geriatric human. As he thrashed about on the ground, tossing leaves and rubbish, he suddenly ceased—belly-down on the ground, breathing rapidly.

Wide-eyed and sporting the same face she’d dreamt of for seventy years, he looked to her from the ground, completely nude with the exception of the dirt and leaves.

“Ch...Charlie?”

Instantly he was grinning...not a small smile, the largest smile she’d ever seen on his face. He sprang from the ground, examining his hands and touching his body. He then looked all around him. “I can see! I can see! And look at me!” He jumped around happily displaying his agility.

“You are beautiful, my love.”

“He certainly is.”

“Nyrobie!” Jerrek laughed as he approached Charlie. “This is the Charlie I remember. With less clothing but—”

“Jerrek!” Charlie threw his arms around Jerrek.

“It is fantastic to see you as well, my friend. And this is my beautiful bride, Nyrobie.”

Charlie smiled as he walked to her. I’m real sorry I’m naked but this has got to be the best night of my damn life. You’re getting a hug too, Ny...?

Nyrobie instantly raised her arms, welcoming his embrace. “It’s Nyrobie...and I’m pleased to meet your acquaintance. You and I will be friends until the end of time, I’m certain.”

“Oh, Charlie...” Carrie walked to him, placing her hand on his face. “I have dreamt of this night since the day they took you from me. I'll never let you go again."

Their passionate kiss was completed by Charlie hoisting Carrie and twirling her. He set her down—staring at her face.

"I'm really going to get to wake up to this face forever? How is this not a dream?"

"I'm not a dream, my love. We've both lived through nightmares to get here. Now...I see your breath, we must clothe you for the journey home."

"I've never felt more alive, Carrie. I'm a damn whippersnapper again!"

"Charlie," Jerrek's tone was stern. "Until you are within Evrastill you are at risk of the elements of your world. You must find clothing."

"I have some hooded sweatshirts and sweatpants in my dresser. I'll just—"

"I've got it." Jerrek dashed to the open window, leaping inside.

"I forgot how fast y'all get around."

With Charlie dressed, the four walked deeper into the woods as they awaited the cardinals to reunite in number and guide them back.

Once they were a comfortable distance from the nursing home—the glow of the lights no longer visible, the four sat on the forest floor, Charlie appeared in either shock or awe—his thick brown hair was incredibly messy atop his head.

"Are you okay, Charlie?" Carrie took his hand, kissing the back of it as she sat beside him.

"I'm still waiting to wake up...I know you say I'm not dreaming...but...I'm still waiting to wake up."

"You're silly. This is only the beginning."

"And I'll stay just like how I am right here...forever?"

"Yes...the second you enter Evrastill...you will become immortal, as I am."

"And if I leave?"

"You can't. You will never be able to leave once you've entered, Charlie...none of the humans there are allowed to."

Charlie looked to the earth beneath his shoes—so many textures and colors he'd forgotten. "There's nothing here that I need anyway. I say that's a pretty good tradeoff...this shithole for forever with you."

Still waiting on the birds, Jerrek stood and lifted an enormous rock—it looked as though it could easily double his weight. Bringing it above his head he tossed it directly upward. It soared impressively, and as it came down—directly in line with Jerrek's head, it suddenly stopped—suspended in the air a few feet above him. Jerrek was manipulating it with his mind.

"That's incredible!" Charlie jumped to his feet.

"Of everything you've borne witness to tonight, you find my Jerrek's boastful showmanship to be incredible? Only moments ago you were breathless, dear Charlie." Nyrobie rolled her eyes as the rock was gently placed at her feet.

Charlie retook his seat near Carrie. “Will I be able to do that?”

“To do what?”

“To lift monstrous rocks with my nothin’ but my thoughts.”

“Of course not, Charlie.”

“Never?”

“No. You are human. Nothing has changed in that regard. And when we enter Evrastill, you will still be human...and that’s okay.”

He offered a boyish smirk—one with years of wisdom backing it. “I can see perfectly. And did you see how quickly I was able to stand up just then? And I can sit down on the ground without assistance...that’s all the super skill this man needs. Jerrek can keep his rocks.”

“The cardinals look to be ready.” Nyrobie held her hand out as several of the red birds flocked to the surrounding trees and to them.

“That’s outstanding. They’re not afraid of you.”

Carrie chuckled as she hugged Charlie around the waist. “Of course not. We’re not human.”

“You look human to me...how the hell do they know the difference?”

“We share a deeper connection with the living things of this earth.”

“There’s so much I don’t know...how is it that I have loved you for this long and there’s so much that’s unanswered?”

“There was so much I could not tell you then...I can now. We are bonded, Charlie. You felt me with you always...did you not?”

He laughed, shaking his head slightly. “Yea...or I just thought I was completely crazy.”

“Your parent’s home...is it not still near here?”

“No. I heard it finally caved. I haven’t been there since the night I lost my eyesight.”

“Tell me what happened, Charlie.”

Leaning over, he kissed her cheek and stood. “After your people found me, one of them fellas put his thumbs on my eyes...didn’t really hurt...but I couldn’t move a lick. Next thing ya know I’m feeling around for the matches...no matter how many I struck, I couldn’t see a damn thing.”

“Do no human harm...treacherous Council!” Nyrobie shook her head, visibly angered by Charlie’s story.

“I went to hollering. When my folks found me...I told them, Carrie. I told them everything. That I’d met a girl who’d live forever...that she was gonna convince her people to let me marry her...and that I was gonna leave for her land. I told them that we were caught before we could plead our case...and one of your people touched my eyes...blinded me. I’m so sorry.”

“Charlie...you needn’t apologize...we were young and frightened.”

“My folks didn’t believe a damn bit of it. Doctor had ’em convinced I’d got a hold of a bad batch of gut-rot moonshine, and that’s what took my sight. I wouldn’t let up so they took me to a damn head doctor. Once I told them my story...I had me a new address in the State Institution. Never saw my folks again. I thought you knew I told...I thought that's why you left me all these years—"

"We need to go...something dark lingers on the air. The birds are restless." Nyrobie lifted one of the cardinals from her shoulder, cupping it in her hands to calm it.

"Yes...I feel it as well. Let us go. Charlie, climb aboard my back." Carrie motioned Charlie to climb up.

"What? Why?"

"We need to get to Evrastill tonight and at our pace, Charlie."

"I can't let you carry me like a dang—"

Jerrek moved to Charlie, swooping him up in his arms like a sack of feathers. "We need to go, my friend. There is darkness here...it is creeping now around us."

"Silence..." Nyrobie lifted her hand while looking toward the starlit sky through the autumn-thinned branches.

Carrie watched helplessly as one of her feathered friends fell from above—crashing to the earth in the clutches of a grackle. The birds screeched and squabbled about the ground. No sooner had Nyrobie separated the winged creatures and the night was thick with the calls of hundreds of descending grackles. The black birds fell heavy on the dumbstruck cardinals as pairs of battling birds fell from the atmosphere and braches, littering the ground at Carrie's feet. Jerrek sat Charlie down, standing over him in a protective manner.

"Nyrobie! Jerrek! They're slaughtering them!" Carrie's screech was a whisper in comparison to the deafening noise around them. The ground was rolling with black and red rivals, scratching and pecking to the death. "We must do something!"

Placing her hands on either side of her head, Nyrobie closed her eyes, attempting to connect—almost instantly she was shaking her head, rushing to Jerrek. She threw her hands skyward—the cardinals capable of fleeing, did so—disappearing swiftly into the darkness around them.

Carrie, Jerrek, and Nyrobie went to work, prying the creatures from one another, freeing their red-feathered companions. Hastily they decoupled the birds until all that was left were those badly injured or no longer breathing. The ground was a battlefield of tiny victims. Some clutching to life, but most of those remaining below had lost their battle completely. The majority of the birds were red, only a few grackles among them.

"Nyrobie! Why? Why would they turn on them? This is unnatural." Carrie cried out as she collected the dead birds.

"Carrie...what I saw...those birds were of an evil agenda. Something extraordinarily sinister."

"What? No...Nyrobie the grackles have assisted me many times above Evrastill. They aren't the kindest of birds, but they are not this."

"They were led by a dark hand. There is a force against us."

"We must get back." Jerrek's panic riddled his face and widened his eyes as he looked about the forest floor. "We can't be out here like this."

“We will my love...but without the guidance of the cardinals we’ll have to find another way.”

“Nyrobie...if grackles are attacking us...who is to say humans won’t as well?”

“Calm yourself, Jerrek. We will find our way home...that is not what brings me concern.”

Placing the bodies of the birds beneath a tall tree in a respectful manner, Carrie quickly approached Nyrobie. “What then concerns you, Nyrobie?”

Kneeling down to retrieve a dying grackle, Nyrobie presented it in her hand. “This...this evil was born of our own kind. I fear it awaits us upon our return.”

“No...the Council supports us, Nyrobie.”

“Indeed, Carrie. This darkness is ancient...it’s reach far more resilient and powerful than any current Councilman’s.”

“Brennus?”

“Perhaps he and the other dismissed Council members are at the helm of this barbarism.”

“No, Nyrobie. Brennus is unswayable...but he is not evil.”

“He imprisoned you for your love of Charlie. Is that not evil?”

“I cannot see his hand in this, Nyrobie.”

“Then who, Carrie? One of the former Council members is to blame for this ghastly assault and the deaths of our small friends. Who, if not Brennus, who could it possibly be? There are few members of the Society with magic this powerful. Who might turn against us?”

“I’m unsure, Nyrobie. Can you not read them?”

“Of course not. We’re much too far from home and this is much too dark. One thing is certain...we must carry onward.”

“They’re all gone.” Jerrek stepped forward holding several red birds. “The ones that didn’t escape have perished.”

“I fear that attempting to utilize the cardinals once more will only produce the same result.”

“I agree, Nyrobie. How shall we find our way home now that we’ve sent them all away?”

“Not all of them, Carrie.” A disheveled-looking Charlie appeared from near the thicket, a cardinal perched on his index finger. “I have this little guy. His wing is hurt, but I don’t think he’s about to check out or anything.”

“You saved him, Charlie?”

“Of course, Carrie. I haven’t seen colors in decades...red this beautiful should fill the sky...not the ground.”

“That is kind. And perhaps useful. The bird can be our guide from our shoulder rather than the air.”

“Can’t you just fix it like you did me?”

Jerrek produced a hardy laugh—it bellowed through the woods. “Charlie, as much as we love the woodland creatures, we must remain strategic when dispersing such magic. We’re only granted this small amount for all eternity. I can’t be entirely certain that eternity is inclusive of battles, accidents and mishaps...but I'm willing to bet it is."

"But Jerrek...you wasted some of yours on me."

"Wasted?" Jerrek stepped to Charlie, placing his hand firmly on his shoulder. "You are my friend, Charlie. You are one of us. It was anything but wasted."

"We must go now. I feel the night is saturated in an awful dread." Nyrobie cautiously glanced through the branches and into the ongoing darkness. "I fear our mission to be the reason for this peculiar happening."

Chapter 5

With an hours' time and a brisk, human-paced hike behind them, Charlie found himself less affected by the chaotic battle scene, and more so by the countless questions coursing through his mind. Each step brought with it the realization that his body was no-longer aged and aching. His posture was no longer slumped and painful, but sturdy and strong. The sights around him—even in the nightly hours—were nearly overwhelming. It'd been so long since he'd visually associated the bark of a tree to the way it felt beneath his fingers...let alone the brilliant-red bird, perched on his shoulder.

Each object in his path, a recollection of a memory from long ago—a life long ago. Even with his sight regained, he maintained his hands in front of him, as if invisible objects would obstruct his path.

As they came to a clearing in the woods, the sound of rushing water was heard in the distance. “I’m so thirsty, Carrie.”

She smiled sweetly, resting her hand on his face. “I understand. I hear fresh water just there.”

“Carrie...when you say...deep connection...and talk about dark reaching power...I don’t understand. Can you read this damn bird’s mind or something?”

She chuckled, petting the small animal as it sat comfortably on his shoulder. “It’s nearly impossible to describe, Charlie. Mostly because we rarely find ourselves verbalizing it. I feel this creature’s turmoil, its longing to leave your shoulder and take flight...but I also feel its sense of security while sitting atop your shoulder. Likewise, he knows my heart’s intentions, that I have his best interests in mind, and that I am dependent and grateful for his guidance.”

“So...is that mind reading?”

Again, his comment had her giggling. “No, my love, it’s something else. It’s an overwhelming awareness...but no, I cannot read this bird’s exact thoughts...nor yours for that matter. That is a skill Nyrobie possesses.”

“Nyrobie can tell what I’m thinking right now?”

“If that was something she desired, yes. I’m assuming you needn’t worry.”

“Why?”

“She has no reason to.”

“And Jerrek can move stuff with his head?”

“Any object Jerrek can lift with his brawn, he can lift with his brain. It’s an extraordinary skill and makes him quite useful among my people.”

“Do all of your people have special skills?”

“To a degree...some are younger than others and are fine-tuning. We all possess some level of healing magic; it’s most powerful when used against the effects of dark magic. Nyrobie and Jerrek’s skills are quite rare within the Society.”

“I’ll never have these things...and you’re fine marrying a man that will never have a special skill?”

She paused, her glance anchored him. “You’re a human man, Charlie...and skilled at humanly things...and I wish nothing more than to be unified for all eternity to you and only you.”

No sooner did something start making sense, and then it didn’t. Each time the chaos reached a certain level of unmanageability, he focused on her perfect face.

“Charlie...close your eyes.”

He did as Carrie asked.

“Do you feel that, Charlie?”

A warm sensation—completely euphoric—mounted in his core and continued outward to the tips of his fingers and toes—his earlobes and even his scalp. It curled his lips into an uncontrollable smile as he inhaled the autumn air. “I...do.”

“That is our bond, my love. We are bonded.”

“I felt this...in my dreams...I was never crazy.”

“No, Charlie. I need nothing else from you but this. This for all eternity and nothing else.”

“O...okay.” Opening his eyes, he immediately embraced her and their lips locked. He pulled away excitedly, “I wanna get home with you. I want to spend forever with you.”

Her smile sent his heart racing faster. The same smile had his hands and body trembling the day they first laid down together seventy years prior upon a bed of lilies in the woods near his parent’s home. Their bodies became one under the setting sun—igniting every nerve in his eighteen-year-old skin. So intoxicating was the experience that the memory felt as though the event occurred just the day prior.

“We will, my love. Let’s go.”

“Carrie.” Nyrobie approached them. “Once we have quenched our thirst we will need to run swiftly.”

“The bird still guides us—”

“The bird will guide us as we run. The lingering darkness is once again rising. I’m certain an aerial assault of lowly grackles will not occur twice. Something larger may be headed our way.”

“Nyrobie...do you truly feel a member of our own Society would do us harm? An offense of that magnitude is punishable by execution.”

“I feel safe in assuming Jerrek, you and I would be left unscathed should we be encountered...but I do fear for Charlie's well-being outside the walls of Evrastill."

"That's preposterous, Nyrobie. No Society member would harm a human."

"You heard him yourself, Carrie. They took his eyesight. The man spent seventy years in the darkness. Is that not harm?"

A deep fear brewed as Charlie observed the conversation. Such talk was otherworldly and foreign to a man who'd lived a simple childhood, running barefoot in the mountainous backwoods.

"Girls...you don't really think whatever is after us is out to get me do you? I mean hell, I been beatin' at death's door long enough. I at least want the chance to see this world before I have to exit it. I want the chance to live."

"You will have that." Nyrobie's confident proclamation came with a reassuring hand on Charlie's shoulder. "We must move quickly. To the water...drink."

Maneuvering through the thicket, the four made their way to the crystal-clear river. Thousands of stones lined the bank leading into the water stream. Charlie's fear and anxiety parched his mouth and exacerbated his thirst, prompting him quickly toward the water.

His breath danced in the moonlight as it left his lips in the icy air. The rushing waters were calmest near the bank; the midsection of the river raged violently.

Squatting and cupping his hands, Charlie looked upon water for the first time in ages—clean, clear water. Bringing the refreshing, chilled river water to his mouth, he quenched his thirst.

The river's roar was nearly deafening—Charlie glanced down the waterway—tall evergreens lined either side of the river. The moon was bright and full and perfectly positioned within the sky above the trees and mountain tops in the distance. The beautifully crafted scene had him spellbound, and then she was screaming.

His head turned to see Carrie's eyes engorged with horror—pain in his arm—a flash of something from his peripheral vision—and then his entire being was at the mercy of the frigid river as he was knocked in and dragged under.

Kicking and punching blindly at an unseen source of confinement, his head arose above the raging waters to look upon his disappearing party—swallowed up in the darkness as he was carried away—swallowed up in the river. The last glance captured was of what appeared to be his immortal friends ambushed by wolves.

With each attempt at breath he felt himself choking—struggling to stay afloat in the chilling waters, as if a million tiny daggers were piercing him. From the left, a mouth of off-white teeth emerged from the water within inches from his face. Charlie had never actually seen a live wolf, but this drenched creature certainly resembled what he remembered them to be.

It aggressively pursued him in the rapids, its paws working vigorously to reach Charlie. Not drowning being the top priority, Charlie paid little attention to the animal as it moved closer.

Just as the wolf was upon him and the water's rage had reached a climax, Charlie realized the river was coming to an end...a drop. Unable to process exactly what was happening, Charlie found himself falling with the water—a monstrous waterfall. There was no time to be terrified—no time to react. His arms flailed and his legs kicked as he met the water below—

Warm and inviting, the summer sun kissed the distant tree tops—the evening hours were fast upon him. A soft breeze brought with it the smell of rain from the south.

Hopping the waist high stone wall, he ran briskly through the thick weeds and into the tall pines. Making his way to the soft-flowing river, he meandered near the water's edge. Her face was heavy on his thoughts—he rocked backward on his heels—hands in his trouser pockets as he glanced skyward.

“Charlie...”

Gowned in white, her glowingly beautiful complexion and disarming eyes had his attention captured entirely.

“You...you came.”

“Of course. My word is my honor.”

“You said you might be being watched. I don't want nothing bad to happen to you because of me.”

Her soft smile twisted his thoughts to a state of discombobulation. “What bad could stem from this, Charlie? I know only of love...you are the one. There is no way around it...what must be must be.”

“I do love...I love you, Carrie. There's just so much that don't make sense to me.”

Her finger traced gently along his jawline—her eyes lured him into her kiss—soft lips, laced with honey.

“You're hurt, my love.”

The nostalgia was rapidly replaced with the nauseating memory of the previous night. “Yea. I'm fine.”

“Your father.”

Her hand slipped between his shirtless back and the suspender holding his trousers—softly circling the bruising with her index finger.

“He...I guess he was convinced I took to his whiskey. The last thing I want is that nasty shit.”

Her eyes displayed a certain sadness—a misunderstanding floated in them. “My father loves me, Charlie. He loves me dearly. Above all else, he and my mother wish for my eternal happiness. There must be a way.”

“I don't...that's what I mean, it don't make sense when you say that. What can I do? What do you need me to do?”

“Your kind...the ones among us...were rescued from the tunnels...come away with me, my love.”

Let us say I pulled you from your doom.”

The idea of escaping his parent’s decrepit shack with her was more than tempting. Excitement mounted as he smiled—nodding his head. “But we can’t...we can’t be together there...can we? I can’t be with you like I am now?”

“Perhaps with time, Charlie, and time is of an abundance in Evrastill. Until then I will come to you when eyes are turned. Come with me, Charlie. Find sanctuary from this world of cruel things.”

There was no need to attempt to convince him, he was convinced. “When?”

“Tomorrow night.”

“Yes...yes I will. I swear to god I will.” Taking her in his arms, he lifted her to him. “You smell like...like vanilla and roses or some other type of flowers.”

She chuckled slightly as he sat her down. “And you smell like a boy who’s been working about the mountainside all day.”

“I’m sorry.”

“Come with me.”

Taking her hand, he was led to the calm water. He watched intently as her foot skimmed the flowing river. He nearly lost his breath as her gown fell from her silky shoulders and to the river stones on the bank—revealing her completely. He’d never seen a naked woman before—and what she possessed was much more luxurious than anything he had imagined. Nights alone he envisioned her without clothing, but his imagination could not compare to the beauty before him.

His heartbeat pounded in his eardrums as she stepped closer, gently sliding each suspender from either shoulder. Charlie instantly grabbed the waist of his trousers to secure them from falling to the ground below—his gaze remained affixed to her chest.

Taking a hand from his waistline, she placed it on her right breast. His head pounded from within his skull as she encouraged his exploration. His shaking fingers gently traced the outer edged of her areola.

She reached for his remaining hand, his grasp remained firm on the waistline of his pants. His uncontrollable excitement, which was apparent under the thin material of his trousers, had him hesitant to remove his clothing.

“Please...Charlie...wash the day away with me.”

Every hair on his arms stood to attention as her hands reached around him, tracing the small of his back—dancing along his spine.

“O...okay.” Slowly, he released his grasp on his pants; his free hand moved for her other breast.

Her fingers outlined the V of his torso prior to disappearing under his waistline—gently pulling his trousers downward. They slid to the ground without additional effort. He looked down to his own body—his reaction to her and the situation blatantly on display—and then he looked to her. Her gaze curiously danced over him as she smiled intently.

“S...sorry.”

“Whatever for?” She stepped closer.

“Um...I um...”

“To the water, Charlie.”

Charlie remained silent as they entered the river, stopping as the water came to her knees.

She turned to him. Soft as silk, he felt her hand between his legs. He nervously glanced downward to see her taking his excitement within her grasp.

The warmth extended from her grasp—an overwhelming euphoria reached into his core—leaving him nearly incapable of inhaling completely.

The sensation was like nothing he’d ever experienced before—the dizzying intoxication made it difficult to keep his eyes pried and focused.

He felt her lips on his just as every nerve within him came alive with pleasure. So powerful was the climax that he shook—reaching for her shoulder to remain standing upright as his knees nearly buckled.

Seconds later, after regaining his composure, he opened his eyes to find her smiling. To his surprise—the warmth remained within his core—there was no feeling of guilt or embarrassment which typically arose in the moments after pleasuring himself within his tiny bedroom of his parent’s home.

No words were spoken initially. She kneeled into the water, standing on her knees, she washed the water over her arms. Charlie watched her methodical movement, and then he sat down in the river beside her, washing under his armpits and splashing water in his face.

“Charlie...I will sleep soundly once you are safe behind the walls of my home, and away from the horrors of this land. I do fear, however that I will sleep in solitude until the strength of our love can shift the ideas of those leading my people.”

“Huh?”

“It will take time, but with patience and endurance, our love will be eternal.”

“But...if you really won’t get no older...and I will...isn’t that something you been thinking about? I have been.”

She laughed. “Charlie...there is much I cannot tell you now. Please know that when you come with me...age, death, and the illnesses of your people will no longer be of concern to you.”

Processing her comment—as well as what happened moments prior—he shook his head in confusion. “I don’t understand. I’ll go anywhere with you; I just don’t understand—”

“You will. With time you will come to know everything. Let us be happy in knowing your safety and preservation will be secured...all else will occur with time.”

“Okay...I guess.”

“Charlie...let our bodies become one. I’m unsure of when the opportunity to be as we are now will come again...let us become one.”

“You mean like...barneymugging?”

“What?”

“Like...sex?”

Giggling as she continued washing. She took his hand. “Why must such things have names? Are they not present within feeling?”

“You...you don’t wanna wait until we’re married? Don’t your people think that’s sinful?”

“Unification solidifies a bond...a bond two lovers hold...a bond that cannot be broken. It is our way of telling the Society that the bond is capable of withstanding eternity. Sharing bodies prior to unification is not undesirable in the eyes of my people...as long the bond exists.”

“Yes, of course I want to share with you.”

She moved behind him through the water. Her hands brought cool water to his aching back, she kissed the areas his father had pummeled the night before.

Her supple breast pressed to his shoulder blade worked to resurrect the exhilaration within him.

“Follow me.”

She stood from the water and he watched her walk toward the bank. He remained seated momentarily, viewing her slender figure and toned buttocks from behind.

She made her way to a bed of lilies just past the first large trees. He followed her, watching intently as she laid down among the flowers—motioning him to join her.

Laying gently atop her, unsure exactly of what to do next, he worked to place himself within her and finally managed with her assistance.

“I’ve never...”

“Neither have I, Charlie...let us be one.” Her gaze fell heavy on his as a collision of euphoria and enlightenment overtook him. It was more than simply seeing the world through her eyes—it was as if they were one being. The lilies around them were no longer simply flowers—the rich scent they exuded washed over him. The instinct to swat the insects dancing about the atmosphere was replaced with a longing to protect them—to reach for them.

Every smell carried on the air was easily identifiable. Every sound the neighboring river made was present. The sun’s warmth on his nude back and rear was the perfect temperature. The light of the world had never been more beautiful. Hyper-sensation to all his surroundings had his eyes widening—pooling with tears. “Carr...Carrie...it’s beautiful.”

“As are you, Charlie...as are we.”

Turning his attention from the distractions of the world around him, he focused once more on her face—beautifully framed within the flowers. Gently pressing himself into her, he embraced the overbearing pleasure the action produced. She was entirely correct—there were no names for this—no words could accurately describe the experience.

Pressing his lips to hers from above—the taste of warm honey filled his mouth. Every detail of the encounter was completely comforting.

The idea of withdrawing and separating had him slowing his pace...he wanted the experience to last as long as possible.

Minutes later there was no point in fighting it. Their mutual climax was blatantly imminent—still within her, her sensations were his as well. Biting her bottom lip as she inhaled through her nostrils, the couple succumbed to the breathtaking result of their actions.

He didn't move—breathing heavily he remained flat atop her, her hands resting on his back as they recovered.

"I must leave you now, my love."

"No...I want to come with you tonight."

"Tonight?"

"Please..." He rose to gaze down upon her. "Don't leave me here. I can't be here after you just took me there. I'll wait as long as I have to, to be with you, but I got to know I can see you every day."

"Charlie...there is worry in your eyes. Let it leave you. We may leave now."

"Right now?"

"Yes. If we are to travel at your pace it will take us much longer to reach Evrastill."

"O...okay. I gotta...I'll be right back. You wait right here...okay?"

"Of course."

Jumping from the lilies, he ran from the trees and to the direction of his parent's home and the toolshed behind it. Only when he felt the sun's light on areas it rarely lit did he remember his nudity. "Shit!" Running back to retrieve his trousers, he saw her in the lilies.

Once dressed, he sprinted toward the toolshed, leaping over the stonewall as dusk settled on the scene. Flinging the door open, he reached for his worn leather shoes on the floor near the shelving—he preferred to be barefoot but envisioned rugged terrain on their journey. He then opened a small wooden box on the second shelf. His grandmother's wedding ring—she'd given it to him when he was eight so that he might give it to his bride. Sliding the ring in his pocket, he turned to leave.

"An unexpected journey?" In the doorway, stepping into the shadows, was an oddly dressed man—he donned a dark robe.

"Oh! Hello...you scared me."

"You're frightened, Charlie?"

"Startled...who...who are you?"

He appeared Charlie's age, around eighteen, but his mannerisms and body language were atypical.

"Charlie...you have seen much today, have you not?"

"I don't know who you are."

“Indeed. I need you to close your eyes...tightly...and step to me.”

“Huh? I need to leave. It’s about to get dark—”

“It certainly is.”

Nothing worked. His arms wouldn’t lift, his feet remained affixed in place. He stared helplessly—completely paralyzed as the man stepped closer.

“Charlie...you are scared...I feel your fear.” His eyes—wide and piercing—examined Charlie’s face. “Fear not, Charlie, even in darkness there is beauty.” Raising his hands to Charlie’s face, the man placed his thumbs over Charlie’s eyes...the world faded to black.

Chapter 6

“They’re relentless!”

Carrie’s back pressed to Nyrobie’s as they worked tirelessly to fend themselves from the wolves. “They’re unreachable, Carrie...the darkness guides them. We have no choice.”

“Nyrobie no!”

“Carrie...they will kill us...it is their desire.”

Carrie’s foot met the mouth of one of the attacking wolves, sending the animal soaring to the rushing waters of the river.

“This is unconscionable, Nyrobie.”

“We must!” Nyrobie leapt through the air and over several of their attackers. Reaching for several river stones, she began hurling them in the direction of the wolves. The stones left her hand and flew through the air at speeds that left them invisible. They accurately met their mark with brutal force—mortally wounding each animal they struck—tearing through them and sending blood and fur across the rocks and grass. The yelps of Nyrobie’s victims filled the night.

“More descend from the mountainside, Nyrobie!” Carrie reached for a fallen branch. The staff-like weapon met an oncoming wolf’s skull with sickening results. Wounding creatures of the earth was unnatural and went against everything within her.

“Jerrek has returned, Carrie!”

“He is without him!”

Jerrek swiftly joined the women—his hands in front of him—he raised at least one hundred stones high above the three of them with nothing but his mind. The rocks remained suspended in the air briefly, before they shot toward the onslaught of approaching wolves, annihilating several in a disgusting scene of evisceration and dismemberment that had Carrie turning her head from the sight.

“Why are you not chasing the river, Jerrek? Where is he!”

“There was a fall, Carrie!” The panicked Jerrek looked about the bloody chaos as more wolves rushed to them from the trees.

“The wolves are not our only enemy this night. The forest is against us, entirely. Bears, great cats, and more creatures of the sky wish to end us as well.”

Even the roar of the approaching bear was not enough to snare her attention. “What fall, Jerrek?”

Where is he? I must get to him!”

“Behind you!” Rushing past her, Jerrek’s foot met a leaping wolf.

“Where is he!” Carrie’s scream was physically visible as it left her mouth. It rippled through the atmosphere, knocking her friends to the ground and sending their attackers flying from them. The trees closest to them swayed and rattled from her rage, massive ripples tore across the river top.

“It...it cannot be.” Nyrobie’s eyes were wide with disbelief as she stared from the ground.

“Charlie!” The second wailing sent the remainder of the wolves, as well as the approaching bear, high into the air—some pierced upon the branches, others crashed to the earth and their death or fell to the rushing waters. Hundreds of river stones tore through the air on her sorrowful screams.

“Nyrobie! Silence her!”

“Carrie! Please! You will kill us!” She looked to her friends, seemingly horrified from the ground below her. So deep and coursing was her grief that it conjured an emotion she was unfamiliar with. Carrie was not only angry—something dark had awakened within her—an ache.

As if the attacking animals suddenly awoke from a rage-driven psychosis, the surviving wolves eagerly fled the scene, leaving Carrie, Nyrobie, and Jerrek amongst a plethora of corpses.

“Carrie...look to me, my friend.” Jerrek cautiously approached.

“Silence, Jerrek! Nyrobie, can you reach him? Does his heart beat still?”

A tear escaping Nyrobie’s eye had Carrie on the verge of eruption. “Only now...his dreams are of you, Carrie. He will pass on while dreaming of you.”

“No!” The word tore from her throat, sending her friend and several more stones through the air. Nyrobie landed on her feet much further down the bank.

“Carrie!” Jerrek ran to her. “You must control it!”

Looking to Jerrek, Carrie collapsed in his arms. “Send me with him! Toss me to the river! I can’t exist without him! Not for all eternity! Not when I’ve only now regained him!”

“Carrie! Let us run with the river’s waters. Perhaps his heart beats still! You must control your gift.”

Shaking her head while pushing past him, she absorbed his words. “What...what gift?”

“Carrie...you possess the echo. If the council learns of this—”

“That’s impossible, Jerrek! That skill is ancient. There hasn’t been a member with such gifts since long before us. Such talk is the stuff of legends and myths. I’m young and have yet to learn of my skill.”

“Carrie.” He walked to her, embracing her. “Do you not see your destruction?”

She glanced about the scene, trees half uprooted, and the carcasses of several wolves adorned the broken branches high above them in a macabre and eerie scene.

“That matters not, Jerrek. I must reach him...let us run swiftly.”

Nyrobie—wide-eyed and seemingly fearful, approached cautiously.

“Carrie, my friend. Your gift is extraordinary...but if the council learns of its misuse—”

“I haven’t the time for silly words and talk of nonexistent gifts. I must go to him. Either help me or return to Evrastill.” She charged past them, preparing to run.

“We are forever at your side, Carrie.” Nyrobie walked beside her. “Let us find him.”

Chapter 7

He awoke to the smell of burning wood. His lungs ached and burned as he inhaled. Looking around without moving, he came to the conclusion he was in a thick sleeping blanket of some sort and that he was still outdoors. His aching body longed for additional heat.

He coughed as his gaze rested upon his clothing draped near the fire. It's not a dream...it wasn't a dream. Sitting up, he looked about the chilly scene—the morning hours had brought snow with them. He hadn't seen a snowflake in decades, but now they fell all around him.

“Oh...easy there, Bubba. Here, you lay on back down.”

“Wha—” Attempting to talk produced a raspy, nearly inaudible voice—strained and burning.

A solid, heavily dressed and muscular man with a thick brown beard appeared, squatting down in front of Charlie. The man brought the top of the blanket over Charlie's exposed shoulders and then pulled a stocking hat down further on Charlie's head, covering his ears.

“You with me?” There was a genuine concern in the man's eyes—he looked to be in his thirties and perhaps a hunter or woodsman.

Charlie merely nodded.

“I found you on the bank just there. Your lips was bluer than the Coors can mountains. You gotta nasty bite on your arm from some critter.”

“I...need my clothes.” His voice nearly failed him.

“Huh? Bubba your skeeters were froze solid. I wouldn't recommend you puttin' them bad boys on right about now.”

“I need to go.”

“I know ya do. My wife is on her way here now to take your butt to the hospital...you're lucky you're not dead, Bubba.”

“Charlie.”

“Charlie? My name is Austin. You relax, stay in that there sleeping bag and Brenda will be here soon to take you in to town.”

“No...please...I need to go.”

“You need to rest, Charlie. Hypothermia is serious, son.”

“Stop talking to me like a child...I'm more than twice your age.”

The man simply smiled and patted Charlie's cheek with his gloved hand. "Please...lay back down and stay warm."

The cold and fatigue had Charlie incapable of offering argument. He glanced toward the thick pillow on the ground below him and rested his head to it.

"Ny...Nyrobie..."

"Say what, Bubba?"

"I feel Nyrobie...in my head."

"I'm sure you do, bud. Just relax and rest."

Closing his eyes, he could literally feel Nyrobie within his psyche, as if she were physically there. Unsure of how such dynamics operated, he merely relaxed and allowed her full range of his current thoughts—hoping it would result in a reunion.

"Damn birds..."

Instantly Charlie's eyelids flung open. He glanced about the snow-dusted evergreens to find them littered with grackles and blue jays. Their tiny eyes all peered down upon him.

"No." Charlie returned to the seated position. "No." Panic worked to resurrect within his battered, half frozen core.

"It's okay...they're scavengers."

"Run."

"What? Bubba, I don't know if you hit your head or—"

"My name is Charlie, not Bubba, and we need to run away from here."

"Okay...we will as soon as my wife gets here."

"We need to go now."

"You got no clothes, boy...balls'll shrivel up to the size of peas if you come out that bag."

"No...you don't understand."

"He certainly doesn't, does he...Charlie?" Appearing from the morning's shadows was the man Charlie despised with every ounce of his being—the man that robbed him of a lifetime of beautiful sunsets and colorful springs. The man who took his sight.

"You..."

The man smirked—chuckling lowly as he approached. "Me."

"Now...who the hell are you?" Austin stood between Charlie and the man.

The dark-cloaked man walked to Austin, extending his hand—not in a manner of greeting—but with all digits extended separately in an odd fashion.

"Are you responsible for Charlie's accident? He could have died. You kids don't need to be out here in the elements with your silly capes and—"

"Sshh."

Charlie watched helplessly from the ground as the man placed his hand on Austin's chest.

"Fear not, mortal child...only fade. No pain, only nothing."

Seconds later, Austin collapsed to the ground—his opened eyes revealed a horrendous lifelessness—breathlessness on the snowy earth.

Charlie looked to the man in horror—he remained expressionless.

“You...you killed him? Why? He’s too young...save him!”

“Silence, Charlie. You killed him...not I. You moved my hand, I had no other choice but end him.”

“No! You...you didn’t have to do that!”

“Charlie...I feel your fear...please don’t be frightened, I will not bring you pain...only eternal slumber.”

“No! Please...I don’t wanna die like this.” The idea of never again seeing Carrie’s face had tears pooling in his eyes. His voice ceased as he looked away from the approaching executioner.

To Charlie’s surprise, the man sat next to him on the ground.

“You’re cold, Charlie.”

The tears streaming down Charlie’s cheeks were nearly painful—so frigid as they met the elements. Charlie merely nodded, looking past the man and to the trees and countless birds. He focused on the beauty of the scene rather than the terror. The sun was rising over the mountains, the snow was falling on the evergreens, and he was witnessing it all for the first time in seventy years.

“Tis an odd thing, Charlie, to find myself in such circumstances. To wish, with each fiber of my being, to ease your distress and mend your ailments, and yet I’m left with the unbearable task before me...to end you.”

Charlie shook his head softly, intentionally avoiding eye contact with his guest.

“You’re frightened...I feel it within you, Charlie.”

“Yes...I’m scared.”

“NoktakVu.”

A strange tingling sensation in the tips of Charlie’s fingers had him looking toward his hands. Seconds later, his hands, arms, lips, face and any other part of him that had previously been miserably cold...was pleasantly warm and cozy—as if he were sitting somewhere tropical.

“Better?”

Charlie filled his lungs completely—the scratchy ache was no longer there—his throat no longer stung and burned. The back pains and soreness were gone and the bite from the previous evening’s attack was absent too.

“I don’t understand. You make me comfortable...better...before you kill me?”

Charlie’s question didn’t gain an immediate response. The man looked around the scene and then his gaze rested on Charlie.

“Age...time...may produce an abundance of wisdom...but even an immortal of nearly five-thousand years may find himself perplexed. I do not wish to hurt you, Charlie...your fear brings me great despair...I do not wish to see you perish.”

“Then don’t...why do I gotta die? I been dying for years now...why can’t I live?”

“What choice have you left me, Charlie? Outside of Evrastill...and already your mindless ramblings have infected your fellow man’s ear with knowledge of our existence. That man...his death will forever affect me.”

Charlie offered a disgusted glance. “Oh, I’m real sorry for you...you’re not the one dead in the snow. All that man did was help me, and you killed him. You...whatever you are...are an awful waste of five-thousand years. You’re horrible.”

The man offered a low chuckle. “And you...you would risk the sanctity of my people? You would forsake the ancestors I walk still beside for some novelty idea?”

“You make me out to be a monster. If you’re the reason them birds turned against us...that nature turned against us—”

“My powers are mightier than the river beside you. Just like the river, they can bring life...or quell a beating heart. My powers can sway the intentions of the woodland dwellers, my bidding in turn is theirs. My powers are plentiful...the product is perfection, and I do not act alone.”

“There’s...there are more of you out here after me and them? If you’re so damn powerful, why do you need more than one of you to do what you’re doing?”

He looked to Charlie—seemingly unamused by the comment. “It isn’t necessity so much as desire. We wish to stop such putrid happenings. We long to restore our foundations to their former splendor. We will abolish the radical and despicable ideas that have degraded my people to this current state of sordid rancidness. We shall diminish and dispose of all that have opposed, even if that entails acting against every natural instinct within me. I must dispose of you, Charlie...and then Jerrek...Nyrobie—”

“No! That’s the talk of a mad man. What have they done so wrong? They’ve done nothing wrong!”

“The fact that Carrie walks freely after engaging in despicable acts with a human being is exactly why you must be disposed of! She knows not her full potential. Even now she pursues you. Co-mingling of our species is as foul and unnatural as necromancy or enticing a beast of the field to pleasure you!”

“What...what are you...look at me.” Charlie produced his hand, holding it next to the hand of the cloaked man. “I’m you. I’m not some dog or—”

“You are a mortal man.”

“But I don’t have to be...and you know that. If I go into—”

“The humans of Evrastill are but lowly parasites—their immortality is unnatural and reliant on their confinement. If not for the wholesomeness of their surroundings—the billions of life-maintaining, blue crystals of our kingdom, those humans would be dust. Your eyes will never see the blue beauty of Evrastill. You will never bask in its glory. Your age will never stand still under the power of the blue ambiance; rather, your time ends naturally with death...now. You will perish here today at the base of this mountain...you are human...you will die as a human in your own land.”

“Well...I’d say you stop flapping your gums and get it over. I’m just about done hearing your voice and I'm none too pleased that shit's gonna be the last thing I hear before you put me under."

"Ungrateful mortal." He stood above Charlie. "Rise to me...and go in peace."

"Just do what you need to do...but spare her. You got what you came for, let her go home."

"That's very noble, Charlie. You needn't worry of Carrie's wellbeing. She is destined for greatness. You feel you truly love, her?"

Peering up to the man, whose face displayed a puzzled look, Charlie sighed forcefully, nodding as he did so. "Yes. I love her more than I can put into words."

"Charlie...human love is an expression...it's more a fairytale than immortal beings residing in a mountainous kingdom for ages upon ages. Human love equates to violence, infidelity, and even war. Love to a human is just a word...the totaling factors of an evolution in animalistic instinct. Your time with Carrie produced not the bond necessary to embrace all eternity—"

"We are bonded."

The man chuckled once more. "Again...another word you shall never truly grasp, my mortal son."

Charlie clumsily stood, ensuring his covering remained secured upon his shoulders.

"From the day you placed your hands on me...took my sight...to the day she brought it back to me...her face was all that kept me breathing. I felt her every night in my sleep, like she was right there with me. When...whenever I was down I could feel her there. I feel her with me now. You can take my life...my lowly human life, but it changes nothing. That bond is there, it was there the day you blinded me, it's here now, and there's nothing you can do to break it."

The man's face was solemn—the darks of his eyes studied Charlie.

"Nestivahoon! Levushkineu keenocular, Nyrobie!" A second man emerged from the shadows of the trees. Thick, raven hair framed his olive face—his eyes were bluer than the sky above them. He wore the same cloak as the man beside Charlie—intensity laced the words leaving his mouth, a language completely foreign to Charlie. "Lemonyia, nestivahinda halvinea. DonurachVintwein!"

No sooner had the approaching man presented himself, and he was gone once more—vanished on the mountainside.

"I haven't the time for additional conversation, Charlie. Close your eyes."

"Promise me."

"What?"

"Promise me you won't hurt her."

"You are hardly in the position to negotiate, Charlie."

"I'm not negotiating...I'm begging you...please don't hurt her."

For the first time since their initial introduction, the two beings shared a gaze inclusive of something like recognition. Charlie sensed this immortal man felt the purity of his love for Carrie.

"Step away from him, Tarik." Nyrobie appeared from the riverside.

"Nyrobie..."

"I will not ask again. Step away from him."

“Foolish girl...you know of my magic.”

Nyrobie nodded politely, offering a respective smile. “Indeed. I’m fully aware of your grand capabilities. Your powers are by far more impressive than any I possess...your powers are magnificent, Tarik.”

“And yet...you would threaten me? Not the wisest choice in regard to self-preservation.”

“Tarik...your magic is bold and stunningly beautiful. Yet, your extensive reliance on it leaves you vulnerable to my physical attack. You are no match for me, Tarik. Summon each wolf, bear, and great cat of these mountains. They will not reach you before you’re broken by my hands.”

“Nyrobie...you are a traitorous fiend. You would rise against your own in the defense of a lowly mortal?”

“Charlie is one of my own...and I have already told you, I will not ask again.”

Tarik’s head cocked curiously as he moved in the direction of Nyrobie.

“Do you not see what it is you do?”

“Tarik! Do you not see? You would toss your own daughter to the wolves like scraps because you disapprove of her bond?”

“He is a human!”

“And are you not sworn by your blood to protect him? To ensure at all costs that we do all to protect his kind?”

“Their kind is a plague, Nyrobie! I would love nothing more than to protect this human...to welcome him into my home and offer him sanctuary, but their species has proven themselves volatile and unredeemable.”

“You unleashed fanged creatures of the woods upon your own daughter...what, Tarik, are you if not volatile?”

“You know as well as I she was never truly in harm’s way.”

Tarik turned from Nyrobie, marching toward Charlie. Charlie, tripping on the bedding he was wrapped in, fell to the ground. He watched in fear as the polished Tarik neared—his eyes boasting an undeniable rage. And then he was knocked to the ground from behind.

“Nyrob—” Nyrobie’s foot met Tarik’s mid-section as he crawled on the ground. The force sent him upward through the air—his arms flailing as he soared above the tops of some of the evergreens. He fell back to the earth and to Nyrobie’s awaiting attack. Charlie watched in awe as Nyrobie leapt in the air—her powerful mid-air roundhouse sent Tarik crashing into the icy river, producing a splash and nothing more. She landed with grace and poise.

“Holy shit.”

Instantly Nyrobie rushed to Charlie. “Are you okay, my friend?”

Charlie merely shook his head. He was instantly embraced by Nyrobie. “I feel your deep sorrow, Charlie. Carrie is alive...she is well and safe with Jerrek.”

“He killed him, Nyrobie.”

“What?”

“That Tarik bastard killed the man that helped me. If it wasn’t for me that man would still be alive. He’s still so young—”

“Where?”

Charlie removed his arm from the covering and pointed toward a lifeless Austin. Nyrobie rushed to the man; sitting beside him, she placed her hand firmly on Austin’s flaccid chest. Her lips muttered something Charlie could neither hear nor understand as Nyrobie rocked forward on the ground.

Within seconds the man was gasping, reaching upward in scattered confusion.

“Relax, my friend.” Nyrobie wrapped her arms tightly around Austin, securing him in place. “Just breathe...you are fine...no harm will come to you.”

Charlie couldn’t contain his smile as he witnessed Austin’s chest rising with respirations. The confused man looked about from Nyrobie’s arms.

“Hello there.” Nyrobie smiled sweetly at Austin—he continued to look confused as Charlie watched the interaction.

“My...my wife...where...”

“Your bride is fine, my friend. You are okay too.”

“The boy...the...Charlie. Is Charlie—”

“Charlie is fine as well. You, my friend, took a nasty fall and need rest.” Nyrobie gently wiped the snow from Austin’s face and beard. “You are entirely safe...you may rest now.”

Austin’s eyes closed as he relaxed into Nyrobie’s cradling embrace.

Nearly two minutes later, Charlie looked upon a snoring Austin, sleeping in the lap of Nyrobie. “You made him sleep?”

She chuckled. “No. I hold no such magic over men. Tarik’s power is truly magnificent. When applied with good intent, he can heal the most ill of humans, much like the less inspirational power I am blessed with...much like the blue crystals of my home. When Tarik’s power is expressed with mal-intention, however, I fear the effects can be devastating and long lasting.”

“Will Austin be okay?”

“The strength of my healing magic is no match for what Tarik inflicted. We intervened in time, Charlie. It will take him several days if not weeks to completely recuperate, but recuperate he shall.”

Nyrobie slid her arms completely under the soundly sleeping man, lifting him like a toddler rather than a two-hundred-twenty-pound muscular woodsman. She carried him briskly to the fire, positioning him comfortably among the bedding on the ground and resting his head on a pillow.

“We shall watch and wait for his bride to arrive...and then we too shall vanish into the surrounding.”

“Nyrobie...where are Carrie and Jerrek? There are more of them after us.”

“I know. I have been heavy on some of their thoughts. There are four of my kind that seek us now. Carrie and Jerrek are near. Your thoughts led me to you, my friend.”

“Tarik...he’s really Carrie’s father? He’s the man that took my sight all those years ago. I’ll never forget that man’s face.”

“What a foul disgrace. Charlie, the years of darkness can never be recovered. Be assured you have an eternity of fellowship and beautiful sights to behold. Your eyes will be bathed in beauty.”

“Why didn’t you know about him, Nyrobie?”

“About who?”

“About Carrie’s dad. If you know people’s thoughts, how did you not know he was against Carrie and me? How did you not know he was after us?”

“You overestimate my skill, Charlie. I do not walk about daily, collecting thoughts and invading minds freely. To enter the mind of another is comparable to entering their home. Some invite me in, they are comfortable with my presence and are insistent on my being there. Some are unaware I am there...and therefore I must lurk and sneak what I may without being noticed. And some have fortified the ability to keep me completely at bay—their thoughts are entirely inaccessible to me. Tarik is ancient, Charlie. His thoughts are locked tight.”

“I’m glad you killed him. Carrie is better off.”

Nyrobie laughed. “Killed him? Sweet Charlie, that wasn’t even a flesh wound. I’m certain Tarik is sitting scorned nearby, conjuring earthly beings to engage in what he cannot.”

“He’s alive? But...you literally whooped that man’s ass.”

“Oh...my dear friend. That was merely a jostle.”

“And the others...are they as dead-set on ending us too? They were talking some nonsense language that I’ve never heard in my life.”

“The others share the same desire as Tarik...to remove us from their equation. They speak the ancient language of my people. It is rarely heard presently and only spoken among the most ancient of the Society or when engaging in specific magic.”

“I’m certain they want to kill me. He wouldn’t kill his own daughter, would he?”

“These are former members of the Council...they will stop at nothing to preserve their idea of Evrastill and the Society. No, I do not feel he would kill Carrie. I feel there’s a darker play at hand.”

“Nyrobie...if I go to them, I honestly think they’ll be done with it. I think they’ll let you live—”

“I will hear nothing of such talk. You are one of us, Charlie. This is greater than you...it is greater than Carrie and all of us. Offering yourself as a gentle sacrifice would only amplify the intentions of our enemies. They claim to yearn for nothing more than the customs they so dearly cling to...yet they would desecrate our most sacred vows to obtain them. They turned nature on their own kind and even worse...Tarik took the life of a human being. If the Council learns of their actions, they will be executed. These rogues will stop at nothing to ensure we do not reach the entrance of Evrastill.”

Charlie looked once more to the sleeping Austin below them. “I know you didn’t have to do that, Nyrobie. Thank you.”

“If I could, I would end the death and suffering of every human of this world, but that is unnatural.

This man was ended at by the magic of my people. It was my pleasure and duty to aid him. Nothing makes my heart happier than helping them.”

“I think I hear a vehicle off in the distance.”

“Climb in my back, Charlie. Let us flee to watch from the mountainside.”

Charlie held the sleeping bag from his chest, peering down on his nudity. “I’m completely naked. I’m not climbing on anything.”

“Your clothing?”

“It’s wet and frozen—there by the fire.”

At blazing speed, Nyrobie collected the drying items. She then rushed to Charlie, tucking the clothing items and his shoes inside the sleeping bag with him. “That does it.”

“Does what?”

Nyrobie hastily took Charlie in her arms, sleeping bag and all. He clung tightly around her neck—completely taken aback. She toted him with ease as if he were made of cotton.

“Hold tightly, my friend.”

“Nyrob—”

And then they rushing from the scene. Charlie’s eyes pried just enough to witness numerous branches being avoided as Nyrobie ducked and weaved while racing through the evergreens and up the mountainside. Safe from view, she sat Charlie down. His mouth agape—he was at a loss for words.

“There...just there.” Nyrobie pointed as an awkward red box with wheels approached.

“What...what the hell is that, Nyrobie?”

“Well...that’s a vehicle, Charlie. Your people are quite fond of them. Are you not?”

“That’s amazing. It looks like something from another planet.” The red box came to a halt.

“You’ve yet to see your own people’s modern world...because of the actions of my people.”

“I’ve rode in hundreds of cars, but I had no clue that was what they looked like. What do them letters read?”

“They read Hummer, Charlie.”

Just then a brunette woman exited the vehicle and rushed to the side of Austin. She shook the sleeping man until he finally aroused to the point she was able to assist him to the vehicle. The couple did not collect Austin’s camping gear before the red box tore from the scene.

“Do you think he’ll tell her about us?”

“Oh I’m sure of it. She is his bride. I’m also certain she will find his story whimsical, enchanting, and unbelievable. She will assume it the product of the elements.”

“Yea...everyone thought I was crazy too.”

“Come, Charlie. Let us rummage through the remnants to find you some dry clothing.”

Chapter 8

“Jerrek...I have a deep sorrow within me. The darkness no longer encompasses us, it moves to strike at our core.”

Standing near a cliff's edge, overlooking the vast beauty of the region, Carrie watched the morning sun defeat the copious clouds to express its full glory.

“Dear friend...this sorrow...do you feel your bond to be broken? Do you feel Charlie no longer breathes?” Jerrek moved from the trees behind her, standing at her side instantly—his face scowled with deep concern.

“No. Our bond is ever strong. I feel security and warmth within his heartbeat. I'm certain he is with Nyrobie.”

“Why then do you worry? We will collect him once more and nothing will stop us from our destination. We will spend eternity with the ones we love most...I'm certain of this, my friend.”

Carrie hugged Jerrek. So unwavering was his companionship and loyalty that he would risk his own eternal being for her happiness. “You are the definition of friendship, Jerrek. I feel however that I have been greatly deceived.”

Jerrek instantly pushed away, his brows pointing downward—nostrils flared as his eyes ached to pull an explanation from Carrie.

“No, Jerrek, this deception is neither yours...nor Nyrobie's.”

“Your mortal's?”

“Of course not. I...I feel my father's presence near me...around me. I feel his presence in a way I can't describe, Jerrek.”

“Certainly not, Carrie. Your father—”

“My father was in full support of the previous Council, you know this, Jerrek. Let us not forget it was his Restoration that failed to revive and restore my sweet Charlie just before yours did.”

Jerrek studied the situation, his gaze settled on the snowy ground. “You truly feel Tarik could be capable of conspiring against you with such an uprising?”

“My father holds many powers, Jerrek. Where his magic strengthens, his political power lessens. I feel he has reduced to acts of desperation. I have felt this sorrow several times over during my decades. If he is not at the helm of this attack, he is involved somehow.”

“Carrie!” A chipper Charlie, dressed in very baggy clothing and toting the rolled sleeping bag, ran from the trees to her, followed by Nyrobie.

“Charlie!” She cradled his scruffy face in her hands, kissing his lips and cheeks repeatedly. “I knew you would come back to me, my love.”

“I was with you...you were with me. I felt you with me; we were back in the lilies...that day.”

She studied his face—healthy and full of life. “There are many similar memories to be made, Charlie.”

She accepted his excited embrace—he hugged her, lifting her from the ground.

“Charlie...you’re well. You do not resemble a man half-drowned and recovering from the attack of a ravenous wolf.” She turned to Nyrobie as Charlie sat her down. “Your magic now mends wounds of the human flesh, Nyrobie?”

“No, Carrie. I may only undo what dark magic has done...I did not do this.”

“Charlie, how are you walking and well? Are you not injured?”

His smile faded—his gaze never fell from hers. “He was going to kill me, but he healed me first.”

“What?” She cocked her head, awaiting his response. Her breath hastened at the thought of someone intentionally harming him.

“He healed my injuries. I’m pretty sure I had a cold, too. He took care of that.”

“Who?”

“The same man...the same man that took my sight.”

Carrie grabbed his shoulder, her grasp firm and affixed. “Charlie, who?”

“Carrie,” Nyrobie stepped closer, “it was Tarik that I came upon when I found Charlie. He is responsible.”

“No. It cannot be!”

“It was, Carrie. Your father also used his magic against a human man that assisted Charlie. I was able to reverse what he had done, but the intent was clear. Tarik was set on ending the man’s life.”

Nyrobie’s words entered her ears, yet took several seconds to penetrate and absorb. She then turned to Charlie, falling to her knees. “Forgive me! Please forgive me, my love!” She cried at his feet for but a second, and then he joined her on the ground.

“What are you doing, Carrie? There’s nothing to forgive. You did nothing wrong.”

“Your suffering was not only at the hands of my people...but my own father. He has taken so much from you.”

Charlie reached for her hand, lifting it to his lips—he offered a soft kiss. “But look what he’s given me. I have you, Carrie.”

His face, shadowed with morning stubble, and his rich, brown eyes—alive with the morning’s light, drew her into him. She wrapped her hands around him, pressing his lips to hers.

“Charlie...I will bless you with an eternity of the most beautiful memories. I cannot give you back what he has taken, but I will give you all I have. I give you all of me.”

He smiled, kissing her cheek. “Your face is the only thing I need to see, everything else is just icing. I have you...be that for ten minutes, years or thousands of years...I’m the happiest man alive.”

“Your father does not act alone.” Nyrobie kneeled to the reunited couple. “There is much magic standing between us Evrastill.”

“You’re certain he harmed a human? You witnessed this, Nyrobie?”

“I did, Carrie. His name is Austin. The man saved my life. I watched your father just...take his life with a touch.”

Carrie stood. “We have no choice. These members have proven they will recklessly disregard our most sacred vows to suit their own agenda. They are more wicked than the humans they condemn.”

“Indeed, but they are ten-thousand times more powerful.”

“That, Jerrek, is why we must stop them. We must reach Evrastill with haste and rile the Council. Aglet’s justice will be swift.”

“Carrie...your father will be executed.”

“Indeed he will, Jerrek. My father has made his decision. My loyalty is to my bond and my Council. He rivals both. Even the strongest magic cannot undo his choice and the consequences that will stem from it.”

“The only way to ensure Charlie’s safety is to reach Evrastill.” Nyrobie’s realistic proclamation had the three immortals looking toward each other for guidance.

“We have no guide, my love. How will we navigate?” Before Jerrek’s question was answered, they were interrupted.

“Might I be of assistance?” From the trees, a dark-haired man appeared. He casually strolled in front of the tree line—keeping his distance.

“Carrie! He was with him. He was one of them with Tarik!” Charlie stood, his expression a mixture of rage and fear.

“Brennus...you leave your intentions unprotected.”

“Nyrobie, I have nothing to hide. I am here to extinguish the human. Once I’ve accomplished this, perhaps we can talk reasonably.”

Jerrek maneuvered Charlie behind him. “Brennus, this is madness. Do you not hear yourself? You would end the life of a human?”

Brennus stepped closer. “He is but a blink, my young Jerrek. We are eternal. To stay eternal, we must preserve what has maintained us. Please do not resist, I will not bring your human friend pain.”

“You will not bring him anything, Brennus. Once the Council learns of your betrayal, you will be executed...you know this. Why have you forsaken your own immortality for a militia that will only be dispersed?”

“Take my immortality if it is to be spent in the presence of this vile disgrace. I will not coexist with such antics. It is as unnatural as—”

“That is all, Brennus. Go...before I kill you.”

“Jerrek...I have lived thirty of your lives...I have witnessed things that would leave you trembling like the sparrows you befriend. You will break in my hands...and you will watch as your human friend bleeds...cries...and begs for you. Or, you will step aside and allow him to return to the earth peacefully.” Brennus took an additional step in their direction.

“Enough talking.”

Before Carrie could intervene or even object, Jerrek was rushing toward Brennus. The men clashed with tremendous force—chest to chest—they met face to face, eyes level—their gazes unwavering.

With lightning speed, Brennus struck Jerrek aside the head, and then offered a tremendous side kick—sending the man sailing several feet. Jerrek landed upright—his eyes on Brennus. He charged in his direction. Fists met their mark with intense ferocity. Carrie shielded Charlie as the battle sent debris skyward.

An uppercut had Brennus falling backward. Jerrek completed the assault with a kick to the man’s midsection, sending him on a collision course with a nearby tree. He arose with maddened eyes.

Within seconds he was upon Jerrek. The attack launched on Jerrek was relentless. Each strike was strategic and left Jerrek weakening quickly—his counterattacks were consistently blocked.

“Enough!” Jerrek fell to his back his bloody hand raised, at the mercy of an enraged Brennus.

“You made your choice, my young friend. Your journey ends here.”

His mighty fist raised high, Brennus stepped to a defeated Jerrek—preparing to end his life.

“No!” Carrie’s voice sent both Brennus and Jerrek through the air. Jerrek landed safely, but badly beaten. Brennus met a man-sized boulder with incredible force. He fell to the ground and was slow to rise to his feet.

“It...it cannot be. At long last! Carrie...my dear child. You truly do hold the power of the echo?”

Carrie approached, slowly, yet confidently. She eyed her target—completely certain of her intentions. She desired to cave to it, to give into to this anger within her.

“Silence, Brennus.”

“Carrie...you haven’t the years nor the knowledge to understand what lurks within you. We will own this earth entirely, my dear. Your gift is that of an all-powerful leader. All will bow to your glory...or perish. You are a great wonder of the world...not the bride of a mortal.” His eyes were wide with appreciation.

“Bow before me now, Brennus.” Her soft command was but a mutter, yet Brennus obliged, kneeling at her feet. Her head cocked as she gazed down on the beautiful creature before her. The man who had imprisoned her, attempted to kill her beloved friend, Jerrek, and insulted her bond with Charlie. There was no attempt to quell the rage within her; rather, she embraced the anger—she found herself fascinated by where it might take her.

Her gaze still on the raven-black hair of Brennus, she allowed the mounting fury to fester—it was pleasing. “Bow before me...and perish.”

“What?”

“Perish!” Her deafening screech from above flattened Brennus on his back—sending rocks and other debris flying from around him.

“Carrie, my child...please—”

“Diiieee! Diiieee!” Raising her arms, she embraced her voice—her magnificent echo. The simple words shattered through the atmosphere, echoing throughout the land in a deafening and disastrous rage. As Carrie continued screaming, she watched her words’ work. The wrath echoed down to tear the clothing and flesh from her ancient victim, sending blood and skin from the writing man’s body and to the trembling trees surrounding the horrific scene. Within seconds there was only a bloody skeletal reminder of what was once a prominent pillar of her society—Brennus was no more—ended by Carrie, a member less than one hundred years old.

Peering at the product of her rage—the eyeless scull, absent the majority of skin and hair atop a mangled, macabre, skinned body, a disgusting feeling overtook her—a feeling of dark dread and guilt.

“Carrie!” Nyrobie ran to her. “You have killed Brennus.”

Carrie said nothing, her gaze remained affixed to the horror before her.

“Carrie!”

“What choice did I have, Nyrobie? He’d have killed Jerrek, and you and...and Charlie. He’d have killed everything I love. He left me no choice.”

Nyrobie examined the remains of Brennus; a look of disgust plastered her face. “This magic...can you contain it?”

“Of course, Nyrobie. Tend to your Jerrek. You forget you nearly lost him for all eternity.” Carrie turned from Nyrobie to see Charlie standing near a tree. His face was riddled with caution, concern, and fear.

“Charlie...my love. Forgive me. I never meant for you to bear witness to such—”

“Are you okay?” He rushed to her, his gentle touch aside her cheek offered a soothing, calming effect.

“Do you think me heartless? Do you find me vile?”

“What? No, I don’t understand what that was. But you were protecting your loved ones, Carrie. You’re anything but heartless.”

His eyes chased away any lingering anger within her. She looked once more at his ridiculous ensemble—clothing that was much too big for him—he was an innocent. She was thankful knowing she had this weapon and the ability to protect him.

Nyrobie assisted a badly battered Jerrek as they made their way to Carrie and Charlie.

“Them birds...they’re here too.” Charlie pointed toward the trees as grackles landed—spotting the tall evergreens.

“What they see, Tarik sees. He knows of Brennus, Carrie. He knows of your capabilities.”

“Indeed, Nyrobie. Perhaps their confidence fractured.”

“Carrie, you killed an ancient Society member. You annihilated him. Regardless of Brennus’ intentions, the Council will have serious concerns with your actions. To possess the gift of the echo is to carry a massive burden. You will not be allowed to leave Evrastill for this world again. You will be considered much too dangerous once the council learns of this.”

“That is not my concern at this point, Nyrobie. Once I reach Evrastill, free of those that hunt us...I may never need to leave again.”

Chapter 9

The blinding snow left the couples no choice but to delay their mindless wandering about the woods. Evening hours were fast approaching as they retreated into a shallow hillside cave. Uncharacteristically dry, the cave made a decent retreat. Carrie snuggled next to Charlie—he shivered while bundled in the sleeping bag Austin gave him.

“Nyrobie and I are going to fetch dry wood for a fire. We’ll be back shortly.”

“Be safe, Jerrek.”

“Always, my friend.”

Nyrobie and Jerrek exited the cave and into the blinding-white abyss.

“Th...that’s amazing.” Charlie’s teeth chattered.

“What, my love?”

“Jerrek looks fine...like nothing happened. Like he didn’t take an ass whoopin’ earlier.”

“Of course...it has been several hours, Charlie. We heal in minutes...not days.”

“Your people are amazing.”

“You are amazing, my love.”

His soft smile was tired—he appeared miserably cold.

“We will make it home, Charlie. All of this will not have been for nothing.”

Unzipping the bag, he invited her in with him. They laid backward—she ran her fingers through his hair as his teeth continued to chatter.

“You’re shivering, Charlie. Let me warm you.” With the bag zipped, she gently kissed him. Instantly his shivering ceased.

“You’re so beautiful, Carrie.”

“Great forces are against us, Charlie...we are lost and far from home. My father wishes you dead and I took the life of a prominent Society member today.”

“If you’re trying to make me feel better...you could try singing or something.”

“Something more enjoyable.” Her hand slid between his toned lower stomach and the waistband of his pants. His choppy inhalation was coupled with wide eyes of uncertainty. She found him completely aroused within seconds in her hand. “Do you object, my love?”

“What if they come back?”

She chuckled. “What if they do? You fear we won’t have the time?”

He grinned, propping himself on his elbow, his other hand pulling the front of his pants down—allowing her better access. “You’re right. I haven’t had sex in seventy years. This ain’t gonna take long at all.”

She gently pushed him backward and maneuvered her own garment to her ankles. Climbing atop him, she placed him within her. Instantly his eyes widened—a whimsical smirk curled half his mouth—his gaze anchored to hers.

She gently rocked; each slight motion appeared to bring him almost unbearable pleasure. Biting his bottom lip, he occasionally motioned for her to slow her pace—as if the sensation was too overpowering.

She studied his expressions—his ecstasy blatantly displayed. The men of her society lacked the character she craved. They were constantly polished, each hair on their head ever in place, lacking even a trace of facial hair—never sporadic or unmanaged. Charlie was different. She yearned for the wild, thick, messy, dark hair that had no rhyme to it. Stubble on his face, the product of a lazy day or day lost in the woods—he loved his humanity and the honesty that accompanied it.

As her own pleasure intensified, she increased her stride. Almost instantly he was leaning up to her.

“Awe! Holy—”

“Shall I...stop?”

“Yes! No! Oh my...” His head flailed backward as his grip tightened firmly on the sleeping bag.

Understanding he’d neared the pleasure threshold, she decided to take him to a place he’d never been. Rocking her hips harder sent him flying forward, gasping as his arms wrapped around her, grabbing her shoulders intensely. His repeated grunts and gasps in her ear assured her she’d accomplished the mission.

He continued panting as she slowed and stopped. “Are you okay, my love?”

He remained speechless, his quivering head rested on her shoulder as he stared toward the cave floor.

“Charlie?”

“Oh...my...holy shit.”

“I’m assuming you’re satisfied?”

He laid backwards, smirking up at her with drunken-like gaze. He brought the palm of his hand to his forehead and chuckled. “Satisfied? I don’t...I don’t even know what to say. That was amazing. It’s like...it’s like the years I spent in the darkness are melting away. My destiny is with you.”

“That good, huh?”

“I mean it, Carrie. You are my everything. You always have been. I’m nothing without you but a worthless, mortal human.”

The conviction in his eyes as the words left his mouth assured Carrie he truly felt so poorly of himself.

“Charlie...you are to be my unified partner for all eternity. I cannot stand to have you say such things of yourself. You are kind, beautiful both inside and out, and you are worth more to me than all my days—my eternity. That is not worthless.”

She kissed him once more before leaving the bedding to freshen herself in the falling snow.

She stared skyward—there were no feathered fiends lurking about the trees.

The snow fell heavy and accumulated thick on the ground. Charlie was soon beside her, wrapped still in the sleeping bag.

“I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to upset you.”

“I’m not upset with you, my love. It upsets me to hear you say such things of yourself because I know you feel they are true. To be human is beautiful...be proud of what you are. I am proud to stand next to you.”

“The things your father said...about the humans in your home being parasites, I hope your people will accept me as you do one day.”

She took his hand. “Parasites? The humans of Evrastill are contributing members of our community. To be completely honest, it’s easy to forget they are human from time to time. They’ve become quite accustomed to our ways. You, my sweet Charlie, will forever be perfect to me just as you are. My father’s words are those of a man destined for infamy and self-destruction. I can only hope the Council is merciful when they end him.”

“Maybe they’ll lock him up or something.”

“Certainly not. Above all else, a Society member must never bring harm to a human. The Council will not sway—all involved will face death.”

“I figured you’d be—”

“Charlie.” She peered about the scene. “Go back into the cave.”

“What?”

“Please.”

Charlie disappeared from her peripheral vision and into the mouth of the cave.

“I can sense you. Reveal yourself.”

The lack of response had Carrie stepping further from the entrance. “Reveal yourself now.”

“I know of your magic, Carrie.” The female’s voice was confident and clear. “I know not what lingers in your heart. I choose to remain in the shadows.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. No harm will come to you. Show yourself, Elisa.”

The slender beauty appeared cautiously—snow falling around her. Her long brown hair fell free, she donned a white gown—less than desirable for combat.

Carrie casually approached. “Elisa, you too have deceived your Council?”

A single tear left Elisa’s green eye. “Carrie...I am here on my own accord. We share respect, no?”

“We do. Can you lead us home?”

“Yes.” Elisa peered toward the ground, her face riddled with concern.

“Elisa, what troubles you?”

She wiped the tears from her eyes as Carrie walked to her. “Your father...he’s returned to Evrastill. He told the Council of your magic. He said you destroyed Brennus.”

“Elisa...I had no choice. Brennus stalked us in the hopes of killing Charlie—”

“Tarik has killed Councilman Aglet, Carrie! The Society bows to your father, his followers and their magnificence.”

“It cannot be.”

“I speak the truth, Carrie. Andre has been imprisoned and is awaiting execution. The humans have been gathered and will be escorted from the entrance of Evrastill in the morning.”

“We...we must go to them...now!”

“Yes. That is why I have come. Your father will spare Andre and the humans if you return to Evrastill...without your mortal man.”

“This is not an option, Elisa.”

“If you arrive at the entrance of Evrastill with your mortal man, the humans of Evrastill will be escorted out in front of you. All the years they escaped the wrath of aging will be upon them in a matter of seconds. They will be reduced to dust within the blink of an eye.”

“He wouldn’t dare...the Society would end him. The Society loves its human members.”

“The society is horrified, Carrie. Your father’s powers are vast...you are his daughter and there is talk of you possessing the gift of the echo. The Society is unsure of your intentions.”

“They should know my loyalty.”

“They know only that you murdered Brennus and your father murdered Councilman Aglet, Carrie. Our world is in bedlam. That is what they know this second.”

“No. I will return. We can make this right.”

“I must go...I must leave now.”

“Elisa, we haven’t a guide.”

“The last of the evening’s snow will fall hours before sunrise. Look to the sky, your guide will be there.”

“You’re certain? I cannot risk my human friends falling victim to my father’s wretched hands.”

“Look to the sky, my friend.”

“You would not guide us now?”

Elisa offered a soft smile, she then hugged Carrie. “I am not returning to my home, Carrie.”

“What? That isn’t an option.”

“I have lived one-thousand-forty-two years. I’m tired, Carrie. My time here is done.”

“Elisa, no. This too shall resolve. My father will be stopped and Evrastill will be restored.”

“Indeed, Carrie. I have complete faith. Yet my heart is weary and I am ready. Eternity is too daunting. The life of the mortals appeals to me more with each passing year. I wish to become one with this earth. I wish to rest.”

“Elisa...do not make such decisions while under such despair.”

“Carrie, I never thought I would witness such days. Our ancestors would harm humans? The same humans we’ve offered sanctuary to...and lived in harmony with. The same humans our kind are sworn to protect. How are we living in such times, Carrie?”

“Elisa, do not do this. Please, be there when the Council is reestablished. Stand with us when Evrastill becomes what it was always meant to be.”

Elisa only offered a friendly nod, turned and disappeared into the white.

Carrie returned to Charlie to find him observing curiously—still snug in the sleeping bag.

“Your friend?”

“I know her.”

“Your magic, is it something rare or special or...I mean of course your special but—”

“I don’t know what it is for certain, Charlie. I was certain my magic would present as a healing feature. The gift of the echo is something I’ve only heard in legend; I’ve never known a member to possess it. I’m uncertain what I possess is truly the echo.”

“Is it good if it is?”

“I’m unsure how to answer that. I have a new confidence and resurrected faith that we will reach Evrastill and your safety shall be secured.”

“What’s wrong then?”

“Something...something has taken residence within me. This magic, its appearance is accompanied by new emotions. I’ve felt anger before, Charlie. The day they separated us—my anger was as hot as melted iron. So many days while imprisoned I felt angry and betrayed. And when I learned of my mother’s ending...my anger had me longing to end my own existence. I have felt anger.”

She turned to Charlie, stepping closer to him. “This is different. This is a longing...some itch that I cannot ignore.”

“I don’t understand.”

“Neither do I.” She kissed his cold cheek.

Several minutes later they were joined by Jerrek and a distraught Nyrobie.

“Nyrobie, what is it?” Carrie rushed to her friend as they entered the cave.

“It is Elisa. I felt her fade. I was with her...on her thoughts. I felt her fade, Carrie.”

Carrie placed her face within her hands and cried.

Jerrek stepped forward. “We found her. We were following her but we didn’t reach her in time to stop her. She walked from the mountain side.”

“It is what she wanted.”

“What? How do you know this, Carrie?”

“She was with us briefly, Nyrobie. She told us of her intentions. She told us a great deal.”

“You could have stopped her, Carrie!”

“No...I couldn't have. Her mind was set.”

Nyrobie and Jerrek walked past Carrie.

“My father has returned to Evrastill. The society knows of my secret. Councilman Aglet has perished at the hands of my father, and the Kingdom is in upheaval.”

“No!” Nyrobie's hand slapped over her open mouth.

“Elisa promised an aerial guide in the early morning. If I return to Evrastill with Charlie, it is said Joseph, Clark, and Elinor will be escorted from the Kingdom.”

“He wouldn't! The society would stop him! We have to get to them!”

“We will, Nyrobie. The guide will be here just as the snow ceases.”

“We must take Charlie. We can't leave a human without provisions in such conditions. He'll perish.”

“I know this. Charlie will be ever at my side. If my father attempts to harm the humans of Evrastill, I will end him myself.”

The hours passed slowly. The fire was started and the night had fallen. The morning hours were now upon them. Nyrobie, Jerrek and Carrie sat around the blaze, Charlie slept with his head in Carrie's lap—she ran her fingers through his hair as they waited on the snow to cease.

“Carrie, his stomach talks. He needs to eat something.”

“Yes, Nyrobie. We should all seek nourishment.”

“Humans cannot maintain long without it. We must reach our destiny this morning.”

“Look!” Jerrek pointed toward the entrance. “The snow has stopped.”

As Nyrobie and Jerrek rushed to the entrance, Carrie woke Charlie. They all met at the cave's entrance, looking skyward—so clear and crisp—yet no guide was present.

“Carrie, the dawn will be here soon.”

“She promised, Jerrek.”

With their gazes affixed to the star-filled night, the screech of barn owl captured their attention as the bird descended.

“See, there she is.” Carrie grinned happily.

“Let us run swiftly.” Jerrek patted Charlie's shoulder. Charlie merely gave his friend a sleepy nod—he was then hoisted into Jerrek's arms.

Chapter 10

The entrance of Evrastill was lit with the first rays of the morning's sun. Boisterous voices could be heard as the four of them approached. With the job completed, their guide flew swiftly away.

"We enter confidently. This is our kingdom." Carrie walked toward the entrance with her head high—only to look upon her father—Tarik, Danny, Irena, Brindle, and several other members surrounding the frightened humans of her society.

"Father!"

Instantly he was smiling and making his way slowly toward her. "Hello, Daughter."

"Take the humans back beneath. This is madness."

He chuckled. "You've yet to see madness, my child."

"Father...please do not do this. This goes against everything—"

"Enough of that! If we are to preserve our own species and way of life, we cannot continue to commit to an existence within the shadows. We cannot continue to assume their existence is priority."

"Father—"

"No...Carrie. Have you never wondered why your Kingdom is absent a king or queen, but rather has a lowly council of fickle and spineless ingrates?"

She looked to him, curious of what his shenanigans would produce.

"Evrastill had a queen, Carrie, an all-powerful queen of the ages. Her visions were pure and untainted with our self-destructive desire to aid mankind. She too processed the echo."

"I don't believe in fairytales."

"You too shall be a fairytale if you do not hear my words and heed my warning, Daughter. She had the foresight, the power and the ability to advance our Society. If we would only see our own kind as the priority and embrace our splendor...what could we accomplish?"

"This queen, if she was so powerful, where is she now?"

"They killed her. So consumed with the ideas of old, the treacherous fools destroyed the one weapon that could have forever protected us."

"Let's say I do believe you—I don't, but even if I did—there is nothing of your agenda that I find even mildly appealing. You have reduced yourself to a murderous criminal."

“And you have followed well in my footsteps, disintegrating poor Brennus. Dear, dear. What a pitiful sight that must have been.”

“Aglet was kind, Father. What reason did you have to end him?”

“Aglet was a fool, Carrie. He would lead this Kingdom into an eternity of slavery. How is it natural to continue to protect these foul beings that only destroy their earth and wage war against their own kind? Why must we continue to lurk and—”

“What would you propose? That we wage war on them? Do you not hear yourself, father?”

“Do you not? You should sit high upon the throne of eternity—leading your people to greatness. The world of opportunity dances upon your fingertips yet you use them to caress a mortal.” His hand raised slightly, he motioned to his followers in the cave.

“Carrie, you have been blinded by a toxic idea that these creatures are equal. Look upon them now...they are not equal.”

Carrie looked past her father to see the three humans led by Danny from the entrance of Evrastill and into the morning’s light.

“Father, no!”

“Watch as the years of hiding away like common roaches comes back to them like a sea of vengeance. Watch as they age to dust in a matter of seconds!”

“They ain’t aging at all. You stupid idiot.” Charlie stepped forward, pointing toward the frightened humans.

“You see, Father...another fairytale. Get them back inside...where they belong, and then I will speak sensibly with you.”

Tarik stared, dumbfounded by the fact the humans were still young and vibrant. “Take these scavengers into Evrastill as my daughter has demanded. She is to be your queen.”

“The remainder of my party will enter as well, Charlie included.”

“Charlie may join the other humans within our prison, behind our stone and locked-tight for all eternity...yet, he will be granted eternity.”

“It is you who will be locked tight.”

“I haven’t time for theory, Carrie. Charlie may take refuge within our confinement. That is my only offer.”

Carrie turned to Charlie. “It would not be an eternity, my love. This is but a blink. You will have comfortable shelter, food, and warmth...and most importantly, you will cease to age another second the instant we enter.”

Charlie’s face was racked with concern. “What if he kills me, Carrie? I’d rather die in the snow and ice than let that bastard kill me.”

“I will not. If you scurry along promptly like a good little roach, you will be spared to live a meaningless existence with your fellow humans.” Tarik stepped aside, motioning Charlie to join the three humans being ushered in.

“Join them my love. I will be at your side tonight. My father is many things but he is not ignorant. He will not harm you while I breathe.”

Tears welled in her eyes as Charlie was ushered away with Clark, Joseph, and Elinor. “He has not eaten since we restored him. He needs nourishment. He’s very chilled from our journey and needs warmth—”

“Your precious pet will be fed, watered, and tended to. We have other business at hand.”

“Where shall we convene, Father? By the soft waters near your home? Perhaps you might lie to me once more.”

“Don’t be foolish, child. We speak only at Council Hall. There is much work to be done.”

Chapter 11

Walking through the darkness of some cave, Charlie could hear only the strange language he'd heard before and the soft tears of the female human just a few feet before him. It was nearly completely black. A soft glow ahead of them became brighter—soon the backs of the party-members' heads were visible.

As the others descended, Charlie looked over the soft-blue lit, Evrastill. Clad with beautiful trees and lush grass, the community was breath-taking.

He was motioned from behind to descend the stone stairs, and so he did. The air was warm and inviting and the scents were pleasant—fresh and natural. The sound of soft-flowing water was abundant. Walking down the stairs, he gazed upon several homes—all modest in size, but beautifully crafted of mountain stone. It was the most beautiful scene he'd ever laid eyes on—even in dreams.

“Hold!” Jerrek turned to Irena and Brindle at the front of the party. “How could you? You despicable beings. How could you do this?”

Shaking his head, Brindle ran from the scene—retreating.

Irena smiled. “Move, coward.”

“I'd advise you to watch your words when speaking to him, Irena.” Nyrobie's expressionless face came within inches of Irena's. Irena's hair was black, her face a pasty white, and her eyes a soft blue. She was gorgeous, but there was a distinctive danger to her.

“Irena...these humans are your friends. We've walked next to them for over a century.”

“They are human, Nyrobie. Councilman Tarik speaks the truth. The time of change is upon us.”

“Tarik is not of the Council and you are not of my Society. You disgust me.”

Nyrobie rushed to a crying Elinor, embracing her. “You are okay my friend. This will pass.”

“Nyrobie! I thought surely, I would perish. Why could they? I don't understand?”

“We must keep moving!” Irena prompted the humans to continue. Charlie smiled hesitantly as he walked by Jerrek and Nyrobie.

Approaching the building—sturdy yet inviting, Charlie found himself taken aback. He was expecting something rugged, heavily guarded, and perhaps hostile-looking. The Evrastill prison was a modest-sized, stone building. They entered to find a singular room with several odd, crescent-shaped beds and open washrooms. The area smelled fresh and clean.

“Elinor!” A brown-haired man ran to Elinor, embracing her as the couple fell to the ground. It appeared as though two eighteen or nineteen-year-old kids were reuniting, but Charlie knew their combined age was more than likely staggering.

“Did they expose you to the outside world, my dear?”

“Yes! I was so fearful.”

“Yet it didn’t occur? You didn’t end in dust?”

“Silence! Or this day will end in your separation.” Irena smiled as she walked to Charlie. “You... you’re the one she craves? You are what she desires above all else?”

Her firm fingers grasped either side of his face as she examined his features. “You are aesthetically pleasing.”

Unsure of her intentions, Charlie felt his anxiety mounting.

“You’re fearful?”

Swallowing hard, he nodded. “Yes...yes, ma’am.”

“I will not harm you.” She released him. “You’re hungry...are you not?”

“No, ma’am.”

“Here there are nuts, berries, warm pita breads, honey, and eating leaves. Eat and rest. I imagine you will be here a while.” Irena left the building, the beautiful stone door locked behind her. There were no windows to peer from. There was only this large room and these people he’d never met.

“You must be the human, Charlie.” The brown haired man who’d been crying approached.

“How’d ya guess?”

“I didn’t guess, my friend. You possess hair upon your face and chest. You are human.”

Charlie buttoned the top of his oversized flannel. “Who are you?”

“I am Councilman Andre. This is my bride, the human Elinor. This is her brother, Joseph, and this is Clark.”

“I’m Charlie.”

“Charlie, you make the fourth human to join Evrastill. I’m displeased you must join us under such circumstances but I am certain all will end as it should. Please, come and quell your hunger. You are among friends here.”

Eying the delightful spread of assorted breads, berries, nuts, and honey, Charlie realized he hadn’t physically seen food since before his sight was taken. He walked to the table, gently grabbing what he believed to be a strawberry. He placed the plump morsel in his mouth. The taste was overwhelmingly delicious. He ravenously reached for the bread, shoving an entire piece in his mouth while his other hand dipped into a bowl of blueberries. “This is...delicious.” His words were muffled.

“Eat all you like.” Clark stood next to him. The man had light-brown hair and appeared poised and maintained like Carrie’s people, not like a human man. “And you...you’re human, like me?”

“Indeed. I have a few years on you I’m sure, but I’m human just the same.”

Andre stood near Charlie, smiling happily. “It warms my heart to see a hungry human eat. Please, forget your manners and fill your belly.”

Charlie did just as Andre asked. The array of food was nearly addictive and had him filling his cheeks and talking with his mouth full.

Andre cleared his throat. “As I suspected...you three were safe to venture from Evrastill. This further plays into my theory.”

Charlie, still chewing, wiped his mouth and walked to the others. Their gaze on him had him feeling foolish for devouring so much prior to proper introductions.

“I was horrified, my love.”

“As was I, Elinor. Yet I had the suspicion that you would return in one piece and unaged. There is no instance in the history of Evrastill of such an occurrence. I believe the tale of dust was merely a myth to establish parameters and keep you three corralled within these walls.”

“Why? Why would we ever want to leave here? This is our home.”

“I know that, Elinor. While lobbying for your freedom from prison many years ago, I entertained a radical idea...I planted a seed within certain Councilman’s ears. What if the Society, this magnificent and mythical population, were merely an evolution? What if we are merely the product of this glorious mountain’s vast greatness...and perhaps a group of lost humans? Is it not possible that with thousands of years within this mountain’s maintaining atmosphere that special abilities develop? Some of our members do not develop special skills until they are over two hundred. Who is to say that you as humans will not eventually develop some skill under the magic of the mountain? Furthermore...who is to say that we as members of the Society are anymore immortal than humans without the glory of the mountain? You returned today rather than diminished to nothing as they so strongly believed you would. Our kind age within this mountain to the beautiful and vibrant age of eighteen years old, we then stop aging all together. Joseph...Irena, you were both eighteen and nineteen years old when you were rescued from the tunnels. You haven’t aged a day since joining us...but Clark. Clark, you were but fifteen when you entered Evrastill, and you aged beautifully to an eighteen-year-old man, just as our kind do, and then you too stopped aging. This further fuels my belief. My people are not the god-like creatures we’ve so convinced ourselves we are. We are merely the product of an extremely special mountain, and an extremely lucky group of humans.”

“So...you think I might be as fast and strong and what not as your people someday.”

“No, Charlie. That is not what I am saying. I believe the Society’s people have evolved to what they are presently by the assistance of the mountain’s powers and several thousands of years. I do however believe that our population is in fact human in a much advanced form. Therefore, it would not be foul, unnatural, or anything other than a choice for a Society member to bond and unify with a, pardon my expression, common human.”

“What are they gonna do to us?” Charlie sat on the floor, removing his shoes.

“Tarik has a sordid agenda...one that I do not understand. He foolishly demeans the beliefs that bond this society together. We have always looked after and cared for the human population from afar.

As mankind's technology and blood-lust grew...we diminished our role within their world, yet we have never struck out against them in any fashion. To harm a human is as unnatural as water falling to the sky. It should make no sense to the mind of a Society member. Yet...here we are. The four of you are imprisoned, and the three of you spent your morning believing you would be executed by the morning's fresh air. This is poisonous and eviscerates what it means to be a member of this society. Tarik's mind has twisted itself into something even he cannot recognize and I fear his infectious ideas have recruited a wretched following."

"The Echo...what about Carrie?"

"Tell me, Charlie. What did you see while you were at Carrie's side? Be truthful and lacking of exaggeration. I am skilled at detecting manipulation by your kind."

"I wouldn't lie to you. I'll never lie to you."

"Go on, Charlie. Tell me what you witnessed."

Chapter 12

Within the Council Hall, Carrie found herself seated on the opposing side of the table she'd stood in front of when the Council granted her request. Completely alone, she maintained her composure—resolving to appear confident in her every action. Her fingernails clicking atop the immaculate table echoed throughout the broad room. Creaking slightly, Carrie's gaze fell upon an opening door and an entering Danny. Danny was a creature of beauty, yet his eyes had always held a certain uneasy and distant darkness within them. It was of no surprise to Carrie to find him on the opposing side of the present situation.

“Carrie. You don't still your clothing for travel. Might I fetch something more comfortable... something more becoming?”

“Danny, why do you linger? You are of little significance here. Your role is complete; you may excuse yourself.”

His gaze set upon her like a wolf—ready to pounce and craving the sweet rush of blood. Short, dark hair and darker eyes, he was cunning and agile—but Carrie was less than concerned with his presence.

“You...you are less than a century old, Carrie. Some do not find their bond until they have walked five hundred or more years. How do you know I could not be?”

She casually rose from her seat, chuckling. “Because he is, Danny. Say what you will of my bond, but it shall stand as strong as this mountain.”

“You're a fool to think such things. Eagles do not fly in the company of sparrows...let alone nest with them. You are the rarest of the rare. You deserve an eternity of greatness. Fly with me, Carrie. The bond will develop...and grow. Fly with me.”

“I would rather fly face first into a jagged hillside than in the company of a wretched being such as you. If you truly are an eagle...then I too am a sparrow.”

“Why would you speak so cruelly to me, Carrie?”

“You are as bendable as water—willing to flow in any direction, regardless of the destination. Have you no conscience? Do you not foresee where your actions would take this society? So willing to throw away all we are, and for what?”

He strolled to her, smirking. “Your father's words are the truth, Carrie. You simply refuse to hear and accept them.”

“Accept this as your final warning, Danny. Leave this hall...crawl back to your empty home...and do not stir when my father summons you. Do this...and I will spare you.”

His laugh filled the room—his head flying backward dramatically. “Silly, Carrie. You kill one ancient fellow and you think you can butcher all who oppose you. I find this comical.”

“Brennus wasn’t laughing.”

Danny’s expression changed, his gaze hardened—his upper lip twitched slightly. “Brennus was a friend, Carrie. I will hear no more of this. The weak of the Society are locked away within their homes, tucked tightly with their weak-minded beliefs. Only those that envision greatness roam about Evrastill on this day. I will not retreat. You will come to see your father as the visionary he is.”

“Danny...I do not hate you. I do not wish your existence to end prematurely. This rebellion will be within our history for all time. Do not let your time end in infamy, Danny.”

“Leave us, Danny.” Tarik entered the room.

As their gaze broke, Danny walked from the room, shutting the door behind him.

“It would seem as though we have some discussing to do, Daughter.”

“Indeed it would. Please...address me as Carrie. I wish to preserve the familial titles for those I consider such.”

“Sit down, Carrie.”

As she took her seat, he approached. “What a world would it be if our kind walked freely in the sun’s glorious light...every day? To expand our reach from this mountain and devour the earth’s gifts the way they were meant to be. What a world we would live in if we were the primary species. There is only a simplistic set of values that distracts us.”

“Values? My longing to assist mankind is instilled in my very being, Father. It is as natural as longing to taste clean water and fresh air.”

“What has this offered you in return, child? You are a prisoner of this mountain. Our kind is shunned and forced away from the stars...the clouds...and the humans that are left to enjoy those things continue to poison their world. Assisting that is unnatural, Carrie.”

“No. Here are my terms. Release Andre and the humans. Once the Council is reestablished, they shall decide the fate of you and your rogue crew. I will ask for leniency if you release them now and halt this crazy charade.”

“My dear...you are in no position to be presenting terms. You possess a gift you are unfamiliar with. You find yourself slowly becoming one with it. Do you not?”

“This magic is powerful, yes. You will face its wrath if you do not cease this traitorous nonsense.”

He chuckled lowly as he meandered closer—his hands clasped behind his back. “Carrie, your human friends are comfortable. If you threaten me once more...I assure you they will be anything but content.”

“I am not threatening you, Tarik . I’ve spent the majority of my existence longing for what was just within reach...my only desire in all the world. My dreams were ever-consumed with his face...with our love. I need not power, nor any riches of this mountain or this earth. I long for a simple existence under the safety of a just Council, and with my unified bond.”

“Pathetic...truly uninspiring. The Queen stares idly at her throne before turning from it to dirty her hands in the garden gathering herbs, merely hours before giving herself to a mortal.”

“I wasn’t finished. I am not threatening you. If you so much as mention harming him even once more, you will scream under my voice as it ends you.”

“Carrie, do come with me for but a moment.”

She reluctantly obliged her father; rising from her seat, she followed him from the Hall—remaining several feet behind him. As they stepped out into the community, the same community Carrie was entirely familiar with, Tarik smiled and raised his hand toward the mountainous walls as if he were presenting them to her for the first time.

“You, my dear, possess a rare and powerful gift. The echo has been said to have the ability to crush entire armies. It is mysterious, grand, and largely unexplored. I challenge you now, Carrie, end me. Loose your splendorous rage upon me. Watch me diminish to nothing...and watch too the walls of this kingdom implode under your glory.”

Carrie’s vision bounced about the blue-beaming inner walls of their kingdom. What if he is correct? Would my gift destroy this kingdom if unleashed?

“You see, my dear. If you truly love and care for your people...you will contain what lurks within you, regardless my actions. You will come to accept your true identity. You will embrace it. There is no escape. Compliance is the only option.”

The cruelty and conviction in his tone had Carrie’s throat tightening.

“Irena!” Tarik’s forceful summoning was answered within seconds. Irena appeared behind them from within the Hall.

“Yes, Tarik.”

“The human, Clark. Fetch him promptly.”

“Indeed, Tarik.” Irena vanished instantly.

“Father, no, please. Clark is my friend; he’s guilty of nothing. Please do not harm him.”

“Perhaps you shall heed my future warnings, Carrie.”

A deep dread clawed from Carrie’s core. The thought of Tarik bringing harm to Clark was unbearable. A few moments later, the human Clark was presented in the grasp of Irena. The man’s gaze remained anchored to the ground—his face wet with tears.

“Father...do not harm him. I beg you.”

“I am Father once more I see. I will not harm him. Irena will end this human, and you will bear witness to his final breath.” Tarik’s words had Clark crashing to his knees, unable to maintain his composure.

A concerned Irena looked toward Clark, and then to Tarik. “Tarik, why is this necessary. These weaklings are of no concern to our cause. He crumbles at your words like a coward—what threat could he possibly present?”

Carrie watched in horror as Tarik presented a dagger from beneath his cloak.

“He is weak, dear Irena. Are you? Does your loyalty to our advancement go beyond your words?”

“Of course, Tarik. Your vision is mine.”

“This human...of a human world and of a human mind...is one of many that will hinder our process. End him now with a humanly weapon.” Tarik tossed the dagger to Irena.

“Rise, and meet your end like a man.” Tarik’s demand was met with Clark attempting to stand—his fear shook him. Although his tears continued, he attempted to appear brave.

“Run him through, Irena. Let his heart welcome the blade of his people.”

“Father, no...don’t do this!”

“Silence, Carrie.” Tarik held his hand up in opposition.

Irena stepped to Clark, raising the blade. “I...I feel his fear, Tarik.”

“As do I, Irena. You are greater than that. Run him through.”

Irena glanced once more to Tarik—the blade met the ground before her. “I cannot, Tarik. I long to cease his fear.”

Tarik gave a boisterous, forced laugh. “Too weak, Irena. Your loyalty thus far has been highly appreciated; however, you are of no further use to me. Your journey ends with this human’s.”

The anger...the white-hot rage within her, was aching to erupt. She longed to allow her voice to control the madness taking place before her, and send her father flying. Her physical attack would need to suffice. She leapt between a frightened Irena and her approaching father. So forceful was the backhand she delivered, that it sent Tarik sailing toward the surrounding trees.

“Carrie!” Irena appeared horrified. “Your strength is unimaginable. It is true. You possess the great gift.”

“Irena. I need you take Clark back to the prison. Release Andre and the others and retreat deep within the tunnels. Andre knows the alternative route to the surface.”

“Carrie...I have heard of wicked things that roam about the tunnels.”

“Wicked things roam here. You are not safe here. If we are to battle these foes, it must not be at the destruction of the Kingdom. We will travel the back way to the surface...and they shall follow me to their end. Go.” Carrie then looked to a highly shaken Clark. “You are okay, my friend. Your journey does not end this day.”

“I am weak. I do crumble.”

“We are all weak when faced with illogical madness. Even kings can crumble, Clark.” She wiped his tears and hugged him briefly. “Not this day, my friend. We have a society to resurrect. I need you.”

He offered a hopeful smile as he and Irena turned for the prison.

Methodical in her approach, Carrie entered the thicket in search for her father. She found him fractured near the mountain's wall. Peering down upon him, she wished only to end him and his treachery. "Your pain is extensive, Father."

"Your power...is glorious, Daughter. The capabilities just waiting to be unmasked."

"Close your eyes, Father." She stood confidently above him—her gaze piercing his as his body remained motionless below her.

"I'm healing, Carrie. I'll be upright within minutes."

"No. Your journey ends here. Close your eyes."

"Carrie! How could you?" Danny appeared. His eyes wide with shock as he looked upon a wounded Tarik. "You would kill your own father?"

"Danny...I warned you."

"And I have a warning for you, wench. Step aside or meet my magic."

Danny rushed to the aid of Tarik. "Sir...Irena and Andre have escaped with the humans."

"They leave Evrastill for the earth above?"

"No...it is believed they delve into the tunnels."

"Let them...they are doomed to peril."

"Tarik, Andre knows the tunnels well."

"Indeed. He should be mindful of what lurks within them. They will fall to the clutches of darkness, or end by my hand."

Carrie stepped closer. "Father...what evil resides within the tunnels?"

"Look around you my dear...what do you see? There is much beauty here. This kingdom is bathed continuously in the brilliance of the blue crystals."

"Speak swiftly, fool! I haven't the time for theatrics."

"Even deeper within this same mountain...the crystals shine just as boldly...yet they bask the surrounding walls in a wicked glare. The residents there are...charming."

"I do not believe you. We are all that reside in this mountain. Only bats and stranded bears roam the tunnels."

"Indeed. So much of your own world you are ignorant to."

"I should say the same of you, but enough talk. You die now, Father."

"Spare me...I ask you as your father. Please do not end my days now."

Carrie peered upon her father, rapidly healing, yet broken before her. "To spare you is to spare your agenda as well. How can I collect my friends...only to deliver them to this lunacy?"

"Carrie, if you descend into the tunnels beneath this kingdom...there will be no return. Andre is a fool to venture there."

"I believe nothing that leaves your mouth, Father."

"He speaks the truth." Nyrobie appeared—eyes wide and her mouth agape. "Tarik...your injuries leave you unguarded. Your thoughts are as vulnerable as a mouse at dusk within an open field. You are truly despicable. End him now, Carrie."

“Nyrobie.” Carrie walked to her disturbed friend. “What did you see?”

“She’ll never see again!” As an enraged Danny charged at Carrie’s closest friend, his throat met Carrie’s grip—slamming him to the ground below her.

“I...warned...you.” Both hands wrapped tightly around his throat. A sickening popping noise resounded—the whites of his eyes shaded a slight pink and then a brilliant bloodshot red. So broken was his neck within her grasp, that it resembled a stocking full of sand rather than the muscular neck of nearly nine-hundred-year-old Danny. Carrie rose to Nyrobie.

“Carrie...your father has escaped.”

“We haven’t the time to track him now. We must collect our friends from the tunnels.”

Nyrobie’s eyes filled as tears streamed her face. “Oh, Carrie!”

Carrie embraced her friend. “Nyrobie...we are at war with these fiends. I had to end Danny.”

“That is not why I cry. I know your father’s crimes. They are vast.”

Carrie studied Nyrobie’s face. “What? What crimes, Nyrobie?”

“Your...your mother, Lady Victoria, she did not meet her end accidentally.”

“No! You cannot speak the truth!”

“I do. She opposed your imprisonment and your father’s disapproval. He ended her in the tunnels.”

“No...my own mother? It’s not possible.”

“I’m so sorry, Carrie.”

“I’ll kill him. I will end him in my grasp!”

“Carrie! He spoke the truth. We are not alone in this mountain. Something malicious resides below us. I fear our loved ones are in great danger.”

“Andre is ancient, if such evil exists, surely he would know of it.”

“Let us go to them, I’m not willing to take any chances. Jerrek is waiting for us now.”

Chapter 13

Chilled and damp, the tunnel was a never-ending cave of dangerous, slippery darkness. The musky smell reminded Charlie of hay bales when they were left to rot in the spring rain.

The only light source was a soft glow from a lantern Andre carried. Joseph, Clark, Elinor, and Charlie were followed by Irena. It appeared the remorseful woman was at a loss for words—perhaps she was mildly fearful. Charlie was fearful, yet the familiarity that came with near-darkness was comforting.

Each step outside of Evrastill was a step away from her and their new beginning. So much uncertainly loomed in the confined, hollow tube.

“Mind your step. The path becomes treacherous around the bend.” Andre charged on as the others shuffled behind him.

“Andre...I am wary of our destination.” Irena’s call was heard from further behind the party. She had stopped walking.

Andre halted the party and turned to her. “Irena, of all things to be wary of, you choose physical destination? What of your choices today? What of your cruel words? Keep walking.”

“I’ve heard things. Strange tales. I do not wish to venture further.”

“My dear, they are not tales. Do as you wish.”

“You would lead us to our doom, Andre?”

“I would lead you from it! You would fear what lurks in these caves yet pay not mind to what resides in your heart. Do your choices not make you wicked? Are you not evil?”

Irena appeared dumbfounded. “I oppose your views...this does not make me—”

“Were you not present when they led my bride from the entrance this morning?”

Her eyes widened. “That was not my choice.”

“Yet you stood idly by as three innocents were marched to what they believed was their death. What are you if not wicked?”

An odd breeze drifted through the tunnel—it carried with it a scent completely foreign to Charlie. It was clear Andre took notice as well. His expression sharpened as he held the lantern higher above his head, his gaze bouncing about the walls.

“Keep moving...or stay still. Either way, be silent.”

The party continued their trek—slowly, yet steadily. They were soon to an opening—a large cave with several tunnel openings leading from it.

The opening was tall, and a faint sound of rushing water was heard in the distance. Andre looked about the area; a strange purple hue tinted the walls of the cave, tiny glowing crystals illuminated the area—all a rich violet.

“An...Andre. What is this place?” Irena moved to his side, her fear detailed in the basking light from all around.

“We must keep moving beyond this place. We are unsafe here.”

The breeze was now a gust—as if someone had opened the front door on a blistery autumn afternoon—and then it was still—stagnant and still.

Charlie looked about the frightened party, the backs of their heads shivering in fear. Then his eyes settled on a new member—someone had joined them.

Elegant and poised, the cloaked woman slowly approached from the opening of one of the tunnels. Her dark hair was tucked under the hood of the cloak. “Ty-lahoon-hyzin.” Her soft voice had an eerie quality as she approached Andre.

“Milady, we wish safe passage. We seek only hours of refuge.”

As she cocked her head in the light of the lantern, Charlie stepped back in horror. Her flawless face boasted two pitch-black eyes...as if her entire sclera was a dark pupil. She lacked basic expression and moved oddly.

“You seek refuge here...in the dark...of the mountain?” Her question was but a whisper.

Andre kneeled. “We are at your mercy. We flee tyranny.”

Peering down on him, her gaze suddenly broke—she stared directly at Charlie. “Humans...you are in the presence of humans.”

She walked to Charlie, her frigid hand gently cradled the side of his face—saturating each nerve in fear. He stood motionless as the woman...creature, traced his jaw with the tips of her icy fingers.

“Beautiful.” Her accent was unidentifiable—her entirety was something unreadable. “You quiver.”

She moved from Charlie to Elinor. She studied her beauty, gently pushing loose strands of hair behind her ear. Her attention then focused on Joseph. The man closed his eyes as she stepped to him. “This creature...marvelous.” As she moved to Clark, her face came within inches. Her slender hand rested aside his cheek. Her lips rested passively to his—he visibly shook by the interaction. She seemed to be inhaling his breath. Witnessing the event was horrifying.

“Awe. Tyranny.” She gently kissed Clark’s cheek and then turned sharply to Irena. “Insidious.” Irena trembled as the cloaked woman approached. “Payment.” She reached for Irena’s arm.

“No! No...please...Andre. Andre, please!”

Andre motioned the group toward the tunnel behind the commotion. Irena screamed in fear as Charlie ran by.

“Don’t leave me with this! Please!”

The group darted past a screaming Irena—helpless in the clutches of her capturer.

They rushed into the violet ambiance—the tunnel tightened briefly and suddenly it was open and nearly as tall as it was wide and seemed to extend indefinitely. Here there was vegetation too, not trees, but thick vinery all about the walls. Smaller caves aligned this massive mother cave and no well-crafted homes existed here.

An odd scent hung heavy in the air—strange noises were all around them—Irena’s screams echoed in the back.

“I’m frightened, Andre.” Elinor cradled her face into Andre’s shoulder.

“They won’t harm you...you’re human. Cast your gaze forward—don’t look to them.”

Their hastened pace had the violet glow retreating—the screams and strange noises fading. Soon only the soft glow of Andre’s lantern was lighting the cave.

“Who are they? Have they always been below Evrastill?” Elinor’s words were chopped with fear.

“Perhaps, my love. They are wicked. Some ancients say it was the Mountain that poisoned them... others believe it was they who poisoned this part of the mountain. Legend says they were Society members...scattered thousands of years ago. They are rarely spoken of.”

“What will they do with Irena?” Elinor pulled on his sleeve.

Andre’s eyes saddened—his gaze diverted. “They will end her...cruelly and in a most macabre fashion. They despise our kind and feed from weakness and treachery. Irena will beg for her death before it is finally granted.”

“No! We gotta go back then. You said they won’t hurt humans. We can’t let them—”

“Charlie, that small township is saturated in dark magic. My power is trivial in comparison. There is nothing to do but run from her cries.”

“We could beg them. Maybe if we beg and—”

“They lack common feeling, empathy. They are truly monstrous beings, Charlie.”

“But they won’t hurt humans?”

“It is said they find beauty in humanity...they find beauty in the evil of humanity. They appreciate the cruelty and brutality displayed by mankind throughout the ages.”

“I keep hearing how cruel my kind is...but my whole life has been one big slice of shit-pie because of what your people did. Your people are just as cruel, you just don’t have the nuts to fess up to it! And now you’re just gonna walk away while that girl begs for us to help her?”

“What would you have me do, Charlie? Their numbers are staggering, their magic is ancient and comprised of an evil I can’t even begin to comprehend. There is nothing to do but spare ourselves from hearing her screams. Keep moving.”

Minutes later they found themselves walking parallel to a modest cave river. Andre’s light was fading, yet it appeared there was a soft glow from the further ahead, perhaps a small opening from the mountainside.

Charlie looked to Clark—the man appeared disturbed, saddened, and tired.

“So...what do you do if you get sick or something? Is there a doctor or something?”

Clark smiled. “There is no illness in Evrastill. The Mountain is constantly healing.”

“Oh...that must be nice. I can’t count how many doctors I had.”

“Charlie...” Andre looked back to him from in front. “Mankind as a whole has always attempted to distance themselves from nature. They demolish grand forests to construct grand buildings. They intoxicate themselves with manmade chemicals and call them cures. These cures are merely interventions to manmade conditions. The further man separates from nature, the greater the depletion of nature’s protection. The illnesses present in man today were not so prevalent even one hundred years ago. Their world is so vastly different from the human world I knew of.”

Charlie took a moment to absorb his words. “So...in all the thousands of years...only two of your members have ever had the idea to marry people from outside of Evrastill?”

Andre smiled. “Certainly not. Yet our Council was stringent, Charlie. Society members that violate Council law are at risk of being ended.”

“But humans are cruel.”

“I love your tenacity, my friend. You and Carrie share a common boldness.”

“What are we going to do? What’s the plan? We traveled all night to get to this place, and now I’m in some damn cave walking away from it...it’s cold as hell...I wanna see my girl, and I’m done with this situation.”

“Stop here.” Andre turned to the group. It was clear there was an exit further up as daylight worked its way in. “Tarik has many supporters. They must be stopped before we can return to Evrastill.”

“Why run? Why not fight, Andre?”

“Tarik is powerful, Charlie.”

“You’re not?”

“We are safe here for now. No one knows the tunnels as well as I. Tarik would be a fool to venture through the purple glow.”

Chapter 14

“I feel as though our world is glass...it’s fracturing around us. We’re helpless to watch it shatter.”

“No, Jerrek. Glass may shatter, yet in its state of integrity it is capable of holding something of substance. Our world is a thinly woven sheet of lies. We watch now as they become unwoven—exposing Council secrets and Society deceit.” Carrie was confident in her proclamation as she led the trio into the tunnels.

“What shall we do, Carrie? We have no plan.”

“My plan is simple, Nyrobie. I have what my father wants. He will follow me, I will destroy him.”

“How are you so confident?”

“I have waited seventy years to rescue Charlie...nothing, even a militia of mystical immortals, will keep me from him. Certainly, not the coward that ended my own mother. He will scream under my rage.”

“Do you hear that?” Jerrek rushed in front of Carrie.

“I feel Irena! She is horrified...in pain.”

The three began sprinting toward Irena’s cries of agony—into the violet violence.

They entered the oddness, taken completely aback by the ritualistic scene.

More than one hundred cloaked figures stood around a terrified Irena. She was hoisted high upon a stake—her arms bound above her head—her legs tied tightly as well—suspended above strategically placed firewood.

“Carrie! They plan to burn her alive!”

“They will do no such thing, Jerrek.”

The crowd parted as the three walked through the middle and toward a bound, bleeding, and naked Irena.

“Release her...now...you atrocities, or you will perish.” Carrie stood confidently in front of Irena as a woman appeared holding a torch boasting a purple flame.

“Shen-iv-oknek.” The solemn woman—eyes blackened and angered—raised her arms.
“Take them.”

Seeing Irena in such turmoil had Carrie's rage boiling. "Back!" Her voice sent the woman and several others falling backward and scrambling as she peered down upon them. "Jerrek, unbind her!"

The crowd of evil immortals stared blankly—many crouched and backed away while speaking the language of old.

Jerrek worked feverishly—Irena was freed and clutching him within seconds. Jerrek held her tightly as she trembled. Backing away from the crowd and toward an exiting tunnel, Carrie looked once more to Irena's face—riddled with horror.

"Go...I'll be there briefly."

"Carrie, they are evil—"

"Go now, Nyrobie!"

Jerrek carried Irena away—Nyrobie by his side. Carrie walked confidently back toward the cloaked crowd.

"Disgusting...worthless, sinister things. Meet me now. This is the price for your wickedness!"

Her scream had many figures slamming into the surrounding walls. Crystals and large boulders alike fell from all around—crushing the fleeing beings below. Carrie loosed yet another scream—it rattled every wall around her. Dust and screams filled the area in a deafening end. As it settled, Carrie stared at the gray splendor—speckled with fading bits of purple. All was silent. In a blanket of dust and debris, Carrie looked upon her work...her own magnificence. Her father was correct—she was a queen—an unstoppable weapon.

Walking to the edge of the scene, she removed a cloak from the bedlam. Turning from the carnage, she walked toward the cave opening and to her friends.

Approaching them, she was met by a shocked Nyrobie.

"Carrie! What have you done? You destroyed their entire people."

"This is true. All that harm my friends shall perish."

"We know nothing of them!"

"We know this, Nyrobie!" Carrie pointed toward a crying and shaking Irena. "They would have burned her alive had we not arrived when we did. What others have met their end in such cruel ways at their hands? Their end was justified and merciful. They should have perished in their own flames."

She kneeled to Irena. "How severe are her injuries, Jerrek?"

"Physically...superficial."

Irena hastily wrapped her arms around Carrie's neck. "For...forgive me. Please forgive me. I never knew such cruelty could exist."

"You are forgiven, my friend. Such cruelty still exists in the heart of my father and his followers. Solidify your stance now, Irena. War...large and small...has no room for disloyalty."

"I'm with you, my friend. I...I do not agree with your views entirely, but I do not wish to inflict fear on the humans. I have never felt fear like I have today. I never want to impose that on another being. Please know you will not have to question my loyalty."

"I know. Irena, how did they capture you?"

"They didn't. Andre allowed them to take me as payment for passage. He gave me to them. The... the things they did to me."

Carrie stood in shock. "He handed you to them?"

"Just before he fled."

"Come...let us find our party." Carrie wrapped the cloak around the distraught Irena; the four of them continued their journey toward the surface of the mountain.

Within a few minutes, the soft words of her human companions were entering Carrie's ears. Carrie ran toward the party. Andre and the humans appeared shocked by her presence.

"Carrie!" Charlie leapt from the ground, rushing toward her. Grabbing either side of his cold face, she kissed his lips. His frigid fingertip traced her cheek as they separated.

"Charlie...you're so cold."

"Yea...it's really chilly down here." His teeth chattered as he spoke.

"Carrie, I am pleased you have joined us." Andre approached cautiously with Elinor at his side.

"Indeed Councilman. My party of four joins you." Her gaze set heavy on his as Jerrek, Nyrobie, and Irena appeared.

Charlie looked to Irena. "You're okay! Holy shit!"

"Explain your actions, Andre." Carrie's command was clear and confident.

Andre stood firm and erect. "You would ask a Councilman for explanation?"

"What Council do you see here, Andre? What kingdom? I ask you to explain your actions as a man would."

"There is nothing to explain! Irena and your foul father would lead my bride from the safety of her home and into what she thought to be her end? Irena suffered nothing at my hand. I merely turned my back on a traitorous creature. Had I not...I to might have perished by their cruelty."

"Cruelty...Andre, they had her bound upon our arrival. They carried flames to the stake with the intention of setting her ablaze. Had we been but a moment later she would have burned to death."

"Traitors of our Society suffered the same fate only several hundred years ago. I agree...their barbarism is despicable, but the fate of Irena is not what concerns me."

"Were."

"Were what, Carrie?"

"They were despicable. Once we rescued your sacrificial offering, I annihilated their entire community. They scrambled and died beneath my glory."

"What? Carrie...their people are as ancient as our own. You ended them all?"

"I did. What were they, Andre...the truth. I want the truth of everything and I want it now. What were those people...did our society truly have a queen upon a throne...and what gift grows within me now? Speak only the truth, Andre."

Andre, with Elinor by his side, turned from Carrie. "To end an entire people is monstrous. There was so much of them we were yet to learn and understand—”

“You just said the beings were ancient...yet you’d require time to study their maleficence?”

“They are us, Carrie—immortals of the mountain. Where we embrace an existence of purity and goodwill, they bathed in something entirely different. They are at one with their wickedness. Perhaps their existence brings about a balance. Perhaps they are necessary.”

“Their existence, it seems, would bring about torture and the death of my people. That is not necessary. That is not balance. That is deplorable and now it is no more.”

“Carrie—”

“The queen, Andre. Is this legend?”

Turning once more toward Carrie, his expression softened. “Come, let us sit and talk. There is much to discuss.”

In a circular form, next to the river of the poorly lit area, the group sat. Andre appeared nervous as he cleared his throat. “Before my beginning, Evrastill was ruled by a bloodline. The Council in place was there only for guidance...supportive in nature. The outside world was completely different and the humans above were nomadic and appreciative of our assistance. They shared our love of nature and took only from it what was needed. The Society thrived on assisting and caring for mankind. It is in our nature to guard and protect them.”

Andre took Elinor’s hand—inhaling deeply. “I’m not entirely sure how the Queen came to the throne—it is said her father, the King, lived during her rein. Much of the record of that time is no longer existent. It is said that when the King ruled...the guiding Council learned of his daughter’s gift and the power within it—the echo. The King was dethroned and Princess Iris was crowned Queen. As Queen, Iris was less than one century old. She was unfamiliar with her gift. The Society was unfamiliar with her gift. Her power only grew. The Council had a wayward agenda...Tarik was of this Council. Their ideas to leave Evrastill and take the world under the power of their Queen soon reached the ears of the former King. When he opposed...he was ended in silence.”

“My father’s treachery spans across thousands of years!”

“Perhaps, Carrie. Tales twist with age—just as roots and branches do. There is more to this tale. When the Queen learned of her father’s death—only then did the Council learn of the true destructive capability within her gift. Her rage was uncontrollable. Much of Evrastill fell to her wrath. Homes crumbled...innocents were crushed...hundreds fled to the tunnels—never to be seen again. Legend says once they settled, they’re immortal grief poisoned the crystals in that area of the mountain—turning them dark and wicked. Others say the unlucky settlers merely took root within the dark of the mountain—and the mountain poisoned them. Either way—they were once us.”

“And I ended them.” Carrie felt her eyes well with tears.

“Your father, Tarik, nearly saved Queen Iris from her end. He attempted to escape with her into the tunnels as well. In her darkest grief, she was useless to raise defense. The all-mighty echo was silenced with a humanly dagger before Tarik could evacuate her.”

“Why...why would she leave with my father?”

“He was family. Carrie...Tarik was the King’s nephew. You are of the blood.”

“What? No!”

“It is true. The Council has worked diligently to protect the secret. A cousin of the King, Lady Lira, was found to possess the echo merely one thousand years ago. She identified her madness and inability to control her gift.”

“I know of Lira. I remember tales of her and her echo.”

“Before she ended her own life, she allowed the Council to explore the echo in a structured way. The echo is by far the most powerful gift a Society member can obtain. It develops early, matures rapidly, and is seemingly difficult, if not impossible, to control once its power reaches full force. Carrie, I fear your gift shall be your end.”

Carrie felt Charlie’s arm around her shoulder, his cold hand pulling her into him. He made her feel safe—solid—bonded. “No...that’s not going to happen to me. Andre...were Iris or Lira bonded?”

“No. There has never been mention of a bond or unification.”

“I am. I have all the reason in eternity to control my gift. I have Charlie.” She stood. “We will draw our enemies from our home. They will be brought to justice and a just and kind Council will be put in place. All will be as it should be.”

“Tell me, Carrie...how should it all be?” Andre stood. “Our Society...your Society is drenched in secrecy. There is much of your own history that is foreign to you.”

“Tell me of my mother, Andre. What do you know of her end?”

His gaze narrowed, his lips produced a tiny ‘o.’ “I know only of an accident within the tunnels, Carrie. This I promise. She heavily opposed your imprisonment but had to have known of the leniency behind it.”

“Leniency? I was imprisoned for—”

“I know well of your history, Carrie. I was there. Throughout the history of Evrastill, other Society members found guilty of the same crime were executed. An ulterior motive was behind your life being spared.”

“What ulterior motive?”

“You...your father...are the only living members of the bloodline. The Council knew this. They knew if they ended Tarik for attempting to hide Lady Lira, or ended you for your disgrace, the echo and all its brilliance would potentially be lost for all time. If the Council could control the echo...they could obtain the world and all its glory.”

Carrie turned from Andre. “This gift...this echo...its power is immense but it does not hold the ability to take the world.”

Stepping closer to her...his eyes widening, Andre rested his hand gently on her forearm. “Carrie...you haven’t a clue of what grows within you. When the Council reconstructed, you and your...situation, were of the first topics discussed. Your absurd request to rescue Charlie...a human of the outside world...was granted so expeditiously because we could not risk your wrath had you possessed the echo and lost your bond to age. It was unanimous. The new Council simply hoped he'd be collected...you'd return and live a simple eternity."

"That is all I want."

"It appears your father and the former Councilmen long for an alternative future for you. They know of your power. The gift of the echo initially appears during great adversity. Afterward, the gift's power grows within and is released as emotion. The Council thought surely...your mother's death would ignite the gift within you. They were thankful it did not."

"This entire time! Andre...I've respected you my entire life."

"Had I told you of this...what good would have come of it? Perhaps your execution or mine?"

Carrie placed her face within the palms of her hands and wept. She was soon in the embrace of Charlie. She welcomed his touch...scent and presence. "If it were not for you, Charlie...I would return to the fiends with eyes as dark as onyx and end myself. How could my entire existence be comprised of such falsehoods? Nothing holds truth."

The flat of his palm rested against her sternum—his lips pressed to her head. "Remember this, Carrie."

Almost instantly she felt the warmth of their bond as she peered through blurred vision to her partner, Charlie. "You...you are my family, Charlie." She looked to Nyrobie and Jerrek. "As well as you." Turning back to Charlie, an odd idea had her gaze diverting.

"Andre. You long to secure my eternity of peace and tranquility?"

"Indeed, Carrie."

"Splendid. You are of the Council. Unify the two of us...here and now."

Andre smirked. "Now...amongst vespers and masked in the remnants of your recent retaliation?"

Carrie peered to her dusty attire, and then to a grinning Charlie. "Now...among my dearest friends and my eternal bond."

Andre stood poised and firm—his hands clasped in front of him. "As you wish, Carrie."

Charlie's cold lips pressed to her cheek—the hair of his face traced along the side of hers' as she inhaled. The entire day had been the definition of dysfunctional, and now it was ending in their union. She hadn't any idea of what the near future had planned for them or if unification would be an option in even a few hours' time. The time was now. They'd waited long enough. The couple stood to be unified.

"Since the dawn of our people, nothing has been more sacred or everlasting than the union of two bonded members of our Society. Members that unify, do so because they believe the bond they share is as durable as time itself. Many unified members of the Society have ceased counting their years within the mountain—so staggering is their age that tallying it is tiresome and pointless. Their love and bond is as strong this day as it was the day of their unification." Andre smiled as he nodded toward Carrie and a shivering Charlie.

“Today, we are in the presence of yet another bond. This bonded pair believes wholeheartedly that their coupling will withstand all time and they too shall tend to their love as long as this mountain stands tall. As a member of the Council, I am here to unify this bond in the eyes of the Society. Carrie, take the hand of your chosen bond.”

Carrie confidently reached for the chilled hand of Charlie, bringing it to her lips as their gaze met.

“Before us now is unification. From this second forward, you are unified under the mountain, before the Council, and within the Society.”

Charlie’s lips met hers’ as Nyrobie’s soft cries entered her ears.

“Enjoy this, beautiful...who knows where we’ll be this time tomorrow.” Charlie chuckled—their lips only inches apart.

She studied the darks of his eyes—each adorned with a touch of inpouring light. “We’ll be with one another always, my love.”

The enchanted moment was interrupted as Clark approached—his body shivered. “I’m miserable.”

“Carrie.” Andre looked about the floor of the cave. “They will not be able to last the night without fire.”

“Build your fire, Andre. You will not reside in darkness long. I’m resurfacing now to beckon my father and his followers. We will return home this very night. I will beckon him alone.”

“No.” Jerrek stepped forward. “I will accompany you. I feel that is best.”

“I agree.” Nyrobie confidently stood next to Jerrek.

“Very well.” Carrie hugged Charlie. “Jerrek and I will end this war...have faith in that.”

Chapter 15

She'd never looked upon Evrastill's entrance in such a way. It was home...yet her home housed a sinister pestilence within it—her father. All that remained unanswered...all the injustices that lingered around his existence were within the same walls she'd resided behind her entire life. She'd hugged the neck of a mongrel—kissed his cheek, and sat down to dine with him for nearly a century.

The snow was nearly blinding—thick and abundant on the ground and in the sky. The atmosphere was still—no bitter, biting wind—only soft-falling flakes.

“I've never understood the allure of the cold.” Jerrek kicked shin-high snow from his path. “Humans seem drawn to it. They play in it and some even prefer to reside in it continuously. It's very cumbersome and uncomfortable.”

“It is pretty...but of all things some humans are drawn to...snow is not the one I find most questionable.” She smiled at Jerrek as they remained still in front of Evrastill—as frozen as their surroundings.

“It's nice to see you smile, my friend.”

“This day has been long. I feel it will live on my heart all eternity, Jerrek.”

“War is only beautiful in poems and victory cries—never in present tense.”

As their gaze broke, her smile faded. “War should never be amongst...war should never be.”

“Carrie...your father is reckless. He would use you to not only further his agenda...but catapult it from some maddened idea and into action...to strike out against mankind. What choice has he left us?”

“I know, Jerrek.”

“His following...they're completely corrupted by his message. How long have they been plagued by these destructive ideas? We must stop them—”

“He killed my mother, Jerrek.” She assured her gaze was as firm as her tone. “He will die...that is not in question. Please remember it is not your father we are here to end...and it is not your childhood that was a complete lie.”

Jerrek offered a hesitant half smile. “For...forgive me, Carrie. Might I remind you that your childhood was not a complete lie. I've been your friend since you were thirteen years old, and you have been sneaking off to collect ladybugs and play on tire-swings with Charlie since you were fourteen. None of that is false. When this is done...when this day ends...you will have a family...know that, my friend—my sister.”

She immediately embraced him as the snow collected momentarily on her lashes.

“Hello.” A voice from behind them cut through the silence—masculine and clear.

Carrie jumped and turned. “Talan. Why are you here?”

Talan was younger than Carrie—he had yet to find his gift—yet possessed extraordinary battle skills in a physical sense. He was strikingly handsome with light-brown hair and green eyes.

The intense look on his face did not showcase something sinister; rather, he seemed to be hurting...angered. An apprentice of Brennus, Carrie hoped Talan was not there to avenge his former instructor.

“This is my home.” As he stepped forward, his lip quivered, as did his nostrils as they flared.

“Talan, what are your intentions? Transparency please.”

“My intentions?” His fists balled at his sides—veins bulging in his forehead and forearms. “I should ask you that, bitch.”

“Talan—”

“He was like my father. If it...if it wasn’t for him I wouldn’t even be here. And I knew Elisa...” His hand moved to his eyes, covering them momentarily before wiping his tears. “I know Elisa is gone. She was...she was my friend, Carrie.”

Watching his tears fall—hearing his voice crack—brought on an immense guilt within her. She’d known Talan since he was a toddler.

“This is your fault, Carrie. You did all this. My home will never be the same and I hate you for that.”

She stepped closer. “Talan...you would follow the madness of Tarik...my father? You would strike out against mankind—”

“This isn’t about your dad! Or humans! I’m friends with Joseph and have been for years! This is about what you have done and the consequences I must suffer because of it. I hope Tarik wipes you from this planet and I hope he does it with a smile.”

The words leaving his mouth—coupled with the pain in his eyes had Carrie longing only to offer some form of comfort—not engage in battle...but then he was charging at her.

Before she could raise her arms in defense, Jerrek was in front of her—matching punches and body blocks. Grunts and yelps of pain echoed through the atmosphere as the men fought.

Talan’s talent was obvious as he was more than capable of matching Jerrek—a man twice his age. He soon tired however. His weakened guard resulted in a debilitating blow from Jerrek’s right fist.

Talan fell backward—unconscious. The massive strike had his body slamming into the snow-covered earth.

All was silent momentarily. Carrie watched the breath leave a victorious Jerrek’s mouth in the chilled air and to the sky.

Her attention was turned to the treetops above them. Hundreds, if not thousands, of grackles peered down upon them. The birds sat silently—all watching from the branches. Carrie shivered at the sight of them. “Jerrek...we’re being...Jerrek!” Carrie looked to see her friend preparing to deliver a death blow to the head of an unconscious Talan. He halted at the screech of Carrie.

“Yes?”

“What is this lunacy? You would kill an unconscious man?”

“He is with them, Carrie.”

“No...he is understandably distraught. If we end all that oppose our views, we are as monstrous as them...are we not?”

“Are we not here to end those that oppose our views, Carrie?”

“We are here to end treachery and collect traitors. This young man is the definition of neither.”

At their feet, Talan coughed, spit blood from his lip and turned to his side as he whimpered.

Carrie cautiously crouched to him, touching his shoulder gently. “Talan...I am sorry for your loss. Please know if I could end your suffering, I would. Elisa was kind...I too shall miss her for all eternity. Please...please know that had I not ended Brennus...he’d have ended my friends and all that is dear to me. It wasn’t for sport.”

Talan’s eyes were pried—pouring a constant stream of tears—his expression stoic with his face flesh to the snow. “I know...yet it doesn’t make it hurt any less.”

“Talan...I need to know you will not strike out against us again—”

“Why have you spared me? Why? If you truly have the power to take the world...why spare an insubordinate, gift-less nobody?” He turned to her—his gaze begging for an explanation.

“I wish not to take the world...but to live in ours and in peace. You are somebody...you are Talan, and I hope to know you centuries from now.” Her words seemed to melt the anger in his eyes.

Jerrek offered him a hand, assisting him from the ground while Carrie helped him dust the snow from his shoulders and attire.

“Talan...please, go home. Go to your home and close your door. Sip tea and wait for my visit once this is done.”

His gaze diverted, Talan merely nodded prior to dashing into the entrance.

Several seconds later, a lowly chuckle resounded from the shadows of the entrance.

“Such a merciful Queen...if only you’d shown such control when the life dear Danny was within your grasp.”

“Father?”

“Indeed.”

“Do not be so coy as to compare your puppet Danny to Talan. They are men of completely different virtues. This you know. Danny was as ghastly as you. How long have you been crouching like a common crow?”

“I am everywhere, Carrie. I am within the lowly fox—seated just beyond your view. I am in the shimmered grackles—high above your head. I am in the rabid bat—frothing and helpless on the cave floor and staring in the direction of the remainder of your party...waiting for reinforcements.”

“What?” Carrie stepped closer to the entrance as Jerrek’s face developed a look of intense concern.

“Silly girl, Carrie. You would leave your loved ones at the mercy of the winter’s chill...and all those that dwell about the shadows—now conjured and aching to do my bidding. They will pour down on them numerously...relentlessly...and rip them to shreds.”

“No! We will go to them.”

“Tis too late, Daughter. The wolf is at their door. Wolves rather. Wolves, coyotes, great cats, and badgers...all collaborating to devour your precious pet and all around him. Behold my gifts, Daughter...my glory is magnificent too...no?”

“Father, please!”

“Please, Tarik! Nyrobie...my bride!”

Tarik presented himself, grinning smugly. He held his hand up, his index finger summoning them as he turned for the entrance of Evrastill.

Charlie

The blazing fire’s heat had Charlie’s cheeks feeling as though they could crack open. His chest, legs, and belly enjoyed a toasty-warm reprieve from the winter’s rampage. His butt, back, and the backs of his arms remained cold—but he didn’t mind. His fingers had sensation, as did his nose—things were on the up and up.

“So...besides prison...what else is there to do in Evrastill?” Charlie smiled happily.

Elinor giggled. “Well, we have social gatherings...a community garden...themed dances and several committees.” Elinor was very well-spoken. “I teach humanities and have for years. Charlie, when things...when things settle...perhaps you and I can discuss some of the nuances taking place now. I would love to introduce them to my curriculum.”

“I would love that. I haven’t seen much of my world...but I can tell you all about the things I’ve heard.”

Joseph cleared his throat. “Clark and I like to race and jump hurdles...things like that. It’s only with one another as our non-human friends travel at speeds that are incomprehensible to us. It’d be nice to have a third party.”

“Yes. Definitely. I’d love to.” Charlie looked at the group sitting around him. He felt a sense of belonging—a sense of pride. “I’ve never really...I’ve never really had a place that I felt was home...ya’ know? I want this place to be home.”

Nyrobie's smile was large as she reached for his hand. "It will be, my friend. It will be for all eternity."

Before he could respond, a splash from the icy river caught their attention. Something had fallen from the opening in the roof of the cave.

Party members stood in an attempt to identify what it might have been, but it seemed to have been washed away.

"Snow?" Charlie walked from the fire to the river.

"I don't believe so, Charlie. Come back." Andre grabbed Charlie's arm and led him back to the fire.

A rustling from the opening above had the party looking toward an onslaught of snouts peering into the cave. Before they could process the oddness of the situation, wolves, bobcats, panthers, coyotes, and badgers began falling through the opening and to the waters below. Many were immediately washed away—yet others were effectively making their way to the bank.

"What is this insanity?" Elinor's scream was but a whisper next to the deafening cries of the animals. They continued coming in at a ravenous pace.

"To the tunnels! Into the tunnels!" Andre guided them as drenched cats and wolves dragged themselves ashore—exhausted—yet steadfast in pursuit.

Nyrobie, Andre, and Irena lingered behind the scrambling humans as more drenched animals made their way to the rock-slab shore.

"You sure you don't want to run away, Irena?" Charlie heard Andre ask.

"Why not just feed me to them as sacrifice, you cowardly bastard."

"Silence! Both of you!" Nyrobie's demand was solid. "These creatures are guided by the dark hand of Tarik. Their palate will not discriminate...we will all perish if we fail."

"Ahead, the smaller cave to the left of the river! Into it!" Andre's command had the party scrambling as they ducked into the darkened cave. Charlie raced ahead. He, unlike the remainder of the party, was at home in the dark. It wasn't dark long. They were soon overlooking a small canyon at the opening of the mouth of the tunnel with nothing but a slippery ledge to walk upon along the side of the inner wall of the mountain. If Charlie were to slip—the result would certainly be death by drowning in the icy water at least one hundred feet below—if it were even deep enough to break his fall without significant injury.

"Move, Charlie! They're coming!" Joseph prompted him from behind.

He cautiously slid along the jagged wall, looking over the mystical scene below. Peering back, he was thankful to see the remainder of the party following. Before his gaze returned in front of him, he witnessed a drenched wolf leap from the cave opening to its end below. The splashing sound the creature's body made when it contacted the water was horrifying—it was followed by another and another. It wasn't until a sly bobcat attempted to halt and keep from falling that the animals realized the sudden end and certain death at the opening of the cave. Once they collected their wits, they continued their pursuit.

Nyrobie's swift kick sent the bobcat sailing and plunging to the water far below. "We must hurry! We can't fight them like this!"

Charlie was thankful to see the ledge widening as he scurried along it. His optimism was short-lived as his gaze fell upon additional four-legged fiends approaching from the opposite direction. They had found them from an alternative route and now the party was trapped upon the ledge.

"Shit! They're coming this way, too!" His fingers ached as he attempted to grip the wall behind him—his gaze diverted from the creature coming to end him. He inhaled deeply and looked to the roof of the cave—lightly lit with small blue crystals. Closing his eyes, he awaited his executioner. He'd certainly fight back, but without a doubt he was confident he'd plummet to his death. All was silent.

Charlie looked to his right to find a bewildered-looking wolf attempting to turn around on the narrow ledge rather than lunge for him. It was as if the drive to taste his blood had left the animal—and all the animals behind it.

"They're attempting to retreat!" Andre could be heard from the other side of the group.

"What happened?" Charlie leaned out, attempting to make eye contact with Andre.

"That is to be determined my young friend. Be still. Their bloodlust may return. Be mindful and ready."

Chapter 16

“Enough! We’ve ventured inward enough, Father! I beg of you! I must have assurance!” Carrie fell to the feet of her father at the last step of the stairs leading into Evrastill. She cried before him—violently, finding it nearly impossible to inhale the sweet air around her.

“A future queen would not weep at a peasant’s death, Daughter. A future queen would merely order additional peasants to remove the remnants prior to rot and infestation.”

“Oh no...” She whimpered at the idea of his demise, yet felt their bond alive within her. “Father please! I beg of you! I will do anything you ask of me. You have my word.” Her proclamation left her in spurts and cries as she remained affixed to the grassy earth below.

“I ask you to rise, Carrie. Conduct yourself properly as a queen would.”

“And I...I beg you...please...I cannot stand until I know you will spare him. Lock him away if you must, but please spare his life.” She peered to him—her eyes pleading.

“If, dear Daughter, I agree to chain your pet to the wall for all eternity rather than end him in the jaws of those surrounding him currently...you will forever bow to me.”

“Yes! I will do anything you ask, Father. Spare him...spare him and you have my solid word as a member of this Society. I will not forsake you! Please spare him!”

He chuckled lowly as he kneeled. “You are many things, Carrie...yet I’m certain you’re anything but a liar. It’s a deal. Your human is spared.”

Her face met the grass in an exhaustive release of relief.

“And to prove that I’m not completely horrendous, I’ll spare the pathetic lives of your friends. They too may reside in chains for all eternity.”

“The wolves...and cats. What about—”

“They stand at bay. You will walk with me. We will speak sensibly. You will accept the remainder of my terms and only then will your traitorous bunch be collected and marched to their eternal residence.”

“As...as you wish, Councilman Tarik.”

“Ah...I do enjoy the tone and the sound of that...but it is King Tarik, my dear.” He stood as Carrie looked to him. He gazed about the Kingdom.

“King of Evrastill today...King of the world tomorrow. All will bow to me, my sweet Carrie. All will know my wrath if they do not. Our kind will take the earth and in turn the earth will prosper as it has never prospered before.”

“How can you be so certain, Father?”

“I have you, Carrie. I have the echo.”

“How can you be certain of such prosperity?”

“To rule is to ruin...depending on your point of view. The task of elimination is never beautiful...but we cannot continue to wait for mankind to end themselves...they’re killing our earth in the process. Genocide is now, my precious Daughter. Let us bring balance and peace.”

“I feel...I feel ill, Father.”

“Indeed. The task at hand is overwhelming and—”

“And against all we’ve ever known, Father. You cannot expect to act on this effectively. It’s unnatural.”

“Carrie...my beautiful, broken princess. Humanity is unnatural. Humans despise nature—they run from it. For a human to return to nature he must first adorn himself with humanly trinkets and manmade comforts...anything but natural. They destroy nature, and have the gall to despise locusts, rats, and flies as pests. They are the pests, Carrie. They are the disease. Let us purify the earth of them. The only humans remaining will be those tucked away within our chains and stone...a reminder for future generations of the lowly creatures that once butchered the world and their own kind.”

“My mother...I know...I know what you did.”

Tarik’s smug smirk and cocked head had Carrie wishing she could mentally remove his skull from his body.

“Her gift...a gift of greenery. Such a waste. Indeed, your mother was entirely pathetic. She took great pride in her ability to grow green grass in seconds...sprout trees in moments. I worried you’d be as lowly yet something told me you’d be brilliant and all powerful.”

“She was brilliant, Father!”

He chuckled. “Nope. She was weak. They all are, really. Look at Jerrek. He stands afar, unsure of what intervention to apply...hoping none will be necessary and his life will be spared. Your mother...she loved the odd tunnels. She loved exploring. She screamed when I threw her mercilessly from the cliff side. Her broken body soon surrounded by the...darker immortals. They delighted in her misery. I didn’t stay to witness her actual demise. I’m sure it was quite colorful. They’re rather creative down there.”

“Enough.” Her heart raced—eyes bulging as she felt the fury raging within.

“Careful, Carrie. We wouldn’t want to make a mess here like you did with our...” He laughed loudly. “To our friends in the dark of the mountain! Such glory, such magnificence! All will come to know us as the only option. All will bow or endure their end!” His hands raised high as Carrie looked upon his madness. “At long last! And it is my own seed...my spawn! Am I not a champion? Am I not worthy of a godly title? Rise with me, Daughter. Let us assume our positions among the great! Infamy, honor...it matters not what history says...we are living history...we will walk still when the pyramids fall from age and ruin.”

“Know this...Father.” Carrie stood, fists balled, chin lowered, gaze affixed to her father’s stunned expression. “Your breath...each and every one of them, is completely dependent on his. The very instant my Charlie fails to exist, so do you. The deal will be broken...broken before me...screaming and scrambling beneath my rage as you are reduced to nothing...whilst still breathing, until you are not.”

Her words were not immediately answered. Tarik broke gaze—staring toward the ground.

“Only today...this very day, do I really know what you truly are, Father. I have seen monsters. Monsters exist because they have purpose. You are the parasite. You’ve waited in the shadows...lurking and conspiring. You haven’t the skill or magic to fulfill your cruel will, and so you raise your hands to the crystals as if you possess my gifts. You possess nothing but a girl who wishes live in peace and unification. I bend to your wickedness not by choice...remember that as you parade your enthusiasm.”

“Dear, dear, Daughter. Such a sharp and hurtful tongue. Cruel words leave quite a nasty sting—”

“You threw your bride—your bond—from the side of a cliff to be tortured by foul beings. Do not speak to me of cruelty!”

“You imbecile. Have you truly been as blind as your idiotic weakling all these years? I have never felt a bond. Not a single day.” His low tone was coupled with a face lacking any sense of expression.

“Wha...what? I don’t understand?”

“Without your mother...Lady Victoria...there could be no you...no chance of the echo’s brilliant return.”

Carrie stared at her father for seconds—seconds felt like decades. “You...you unified my mother without the bond...” Tears streamed her cheeks as she turned from him, her hand covering her quivering lips. “And then you ki...killed her?”

“Indeed!” He slapped his hands together proudly. “How is that parasitic? That, my dear, is innovation.” Pointing his finger as he said this, he continued. “So ungrateful...so unappreciative. For you’d be lacking life had I not...would you not.”

“How? Why would she agree to this?”

“What choice would she have, Carrie? Many Councilmen and Society members longed for your arrival. She too believed in the cause.”

“Please...stop speaking.” Carrie gagged, as if she were on the verge of purging. “You’re a complete hypocrite. You would speak poorly of humanly decisions...those of spousal betrayal...yet you betrayed our Society and our ways long before you threw your bride to her death. You were never even bonded to my mother...I am nothing but your weapon of destruction.”

“Come now, Carrie. Don’t fret. Much more favorable than the bride of a mountain mortal...”

wouldn't you agree? You are the future queen of all the earth, you have only to take it.”

Chapter 17

Avoiding gravity and the bewildered beasts on either side of them, the party remained steadfast aside the cliff. The air was much warmer in this area and the atmosphere was much better lit. Charlie attributed both to the presence of the sparse blue crystals in the walls and cave roof. There were nowhere near as many as in Evrastill, but their existence here seemed to play some role in the tranquility.

All was silent with the exception of the water below and the scuffling of paws surrounding them. As if the animals were at a loss as to what to do. The wolf closest appeared confused—nearly frightened and longing to run—yet would bare her teeth if Charlie inched in her direction.

“How long can we persevere in such a way, my love?” Elinor sounded exhausted from a few feet down, next to Andre.

“As long as we must. We haven’t the strength nor the numbers to overcome this. If Tarik wanted our blood spilled, we’d be gutless now.”

Charlie peered once more down the line of refugees to Nyrobie. Great despair gripped her expression. “Nyrobie! Are you...what’s the matter?”

Their gazes met—tears streamed her face. “It is Carrie. She is with Tarik and her heart aches greatly.”

“Is she in danger?”

“All in Tarik’s presence are in danger, Charlie.”

“Nyrobie! Is he going to hurt her?”

“No...no, it appears as though negotiations are at hand.”

Charlie’s back returned to the wall. Reflecting on the events that had led him to the climactic and indescribably odd scene he was playing a part in. He couldn’t help but place blame on himself. Imagining Carrie’s grief—her turmoil—it was more treacherous than the pink fangs to his right. “We need to go to her, Nyrobie.”

Charlie attempted to step around Joseph, pebbles fell from the ledge and to the rushing water below. He shivered, knowing there would be no kind-hearted mountain man to pull him to safety this time if he fell from his friends.

“Charlie!” Nyrobie’s tone startled him. “What are you doing?”

“Coming to you.”

“No, you are certainly not. Stand next to the wall and be mindful of your surroundings, my friend. We did not risk our lives to rescue you, only to have you end yours in an act of stupidity!”

Her words stung. He looked to her once more and then wriggled in between Joseph and Clark to remain silent.

His gaze on his worn sneakers—a feeling of defeat overtook his emotions. He only wanted to be with Carrie—nothing else could make anything better. Small commotion had him looking to his left to see a remorseful-looking Nyrobie by his side.

“Charlie, forgive me my friend.” Her hug was uplifting. “I am worn and the hours from my home have felt like centuries. Forgive my tone.”

They shared a smile as they separated. “It’s okay. I’m beat too. None of us know what comes next. I understand.”

“I’ll wait here with you.”

As Nyrobie stepped left, looking for a spot to snuggle into, she lost footing on the slippery, crowded ledge. She was falling merely one second later. Charlie watched her frightened face swallowed up in the water. Instinct—friendship—loyalty, whatever had Charlie jumping after her; he did so before he could think it through. His arms flailed as the screams of the party roared behind him.

Even before his submersion he was well aware of the ignorance behind his heroism. Nyrobie was incredibly strong and would likely survive this with ease...Charlie understood as he entered the frigid waters he would likely not.

He plunged deep into the rapid flow, fighting with all he had to reach the surface. It never came. Blurred vision—and then his lungs were burning—burning with icy gulps of cave-river water as they filled. His limbs grew heavy...lifeless; he sank into darkness...and unlike before...Carrie was not there to comfort him...this was his end.

Carrie

Trailing her father, his ramblings initially settled on deaf ears. It wasn’t until he mentioned an expedition from the Kingdom that she took heed to his words. Talks of isolating and alliance formation had Carrie once again feeling nauseated...and then, as they paralleled a gentle stream, something dreadful sprouted within her core. This was not the echo...oh no...this was something else entirely. This was an absence, an absence of something more valuable to her than eternity itself. This was an amplified grief that no poems or paintings could accurately portray. He was gone...Charlie was dead, she felt their bond diminish within her, leaving her hollow and open for grief to enter and fill.

“Awe...” Hitting her knees, clutching the soft grass, Carrie caught the attention of her father. He rushed to her.

“Why, whatever is the matter?”

She remained incapable of speech, nearly incapable of inhalation.

“Daughter...are you ill? Why are crouched and poorly?”

There was nothing left. From her peripheral vision, she witnessed Jerrek charging toward her. It all felt slow—as if she were submerged.

“Carrie! Carrie...what is wrong!” Jerrek’s voice offered no comfort. There was not comfort to offer. “Carrie, talk to me, my friend! Please.” Jerrek hit his knees before her, embracing her tightly. “What have you done to her, Tarik?”

“Don’t be a fool, boy. I’ve done nothing.”

“What have you done to her...?”

Carrie squeezed Jerrek’s hand firmly as her piercing gaze fell heavy upon her father’s. Looking once more to her friend, she attempted to muster a warning. “Ru...run.” She shook as she spoke.

“What?” Jerrek was clearly taken completely aback.

“Run...Jerrek. Leave...now...run...”

“Carrie I can’t leave you with—”

“Ruuuunnnn!” Her screech set Jerrek sailing toward the exit of Evrastill. He landed violently against the steps. Once his wits were collected, he hobbled from his home and out of sight.

“Daughter...we had a deal, my dear.” Clearly terrified, Tarik stepped backward.

Carrie rose to her feet—grass still clutched within her hands. The strength of her gift was something different than before—it was deeper, nearly all-consuming.

“He was precious to me...a pest to you...but absolutely precious to me. You...you long to conquer the world...yet you would criticize mankind for doing the same thing. I longed only to hear his laughter, kiss his smile...his...his beautiful smile. To feel him in my arms...hear his heart beat against mine. I wanted a small home, a smaller garden. I craved simplicity.”

“Carrie. You’re...you are floating, my dear. Come to me now. Let us talk. Perhaps Charlie may roam freely. Chains and stone are quite—”

“Do not play coy with me, father. Charlie breathes no more. He is gone. Our bond is broken.” Carrie looked below to see her feet suspended above the ground. She felt the echo dancing within her throat, waiting patiently to be unleashed. It was present also within her fingers, toes, eyes and every inch of her being. She was the echo—she was her own gift.

“Summon your followers, Father.”

“Carrie...Daughter, your human...Charles is alive. I haven’t—”

“His name was Charlie, you bastard. Remember that as your end falls upon you.”

“Carrie please! If Charlie met his end...it was not by my doing! I assure you, all those summoned do stand at bay.”

“The echo! Beautiful!” Carrie heard a man’s voice as several townsmen ran to the scene. Their faces bathed in delight as they stared up to her.

“Fools! You follow this wretchedness?” She pointed toward her father as the onlookers collected—all smiling and embracing one another.

“We will take the world!” was shouted.

At least one-fifth of Evrastill’s population had congregated—a hideous following of her father’s. They’d conveniently presented themselves for slaughter. She looked upon them—even sheep have purpose and individuality—these supporters were as pliable as the branches of willow trees. Knowing she could paint the blue crystals red with their essence had a calming effect...calming, yet not comforting.

“Deceivers of Evrastill...is this what you’ve lusted for? Your Queen?” Her question had many clapping, some crying happily.

“We would leave our walls...march to the vast lands around us. We would wipe the world of insignificance and our time would be now...now and for always.” Raising her hands and her gaze to the blue haze above her, she listened to the cheers below, her father’s being the loudest.

“Idiots!” Her fury knocked the majority to the ground—sending rippled waves through the plush, green grass. They stared up to her in horror.

“We are not the conquerors of the earth...we are not the dealers of death and destruction. You would follow one fool to soil your hands in the blood those you are sworn to protect? Would those actions differ from your interpretation of mankind’s treachery? Hypocrites...all of you.”

“We’re not hypocrites!” A defiant bystander jumped to her feet. “We’ve been stripped of our purpose—locked away within the mountain to rot!”

Her words and their meaning were clear. The people of Evrastill had long been limited in their ability to leave the walls of their home—with their interaction with mankind nearly completely reduced, it was only natural for some animosity to form. Perhaps some had felt imprisoned, unable to act instinctually.

“I assure you...all of you before me. You are not the pawns of Tarik. You are not capable inflicting pain on human flesh...bringing tears to human eyes...ending human life. If you feel in your truest heart you are...step forward.”

The crowd, many of whom remained on the ground, seemed to absorb the reality within her words. None moved forward as Carrie hovered closer to her father.

“Look upon me now, my people...my Society. Look upon your queen. Queen for but a day. This day shall be marked in our history as the end of this treachery...and the end of the echo.”

“Carrie, what madness is this?” Tarik’s eyes widened as Carrie loomed closer.

The scream created sent the majority of bystanders sailing from the scene. Those that anchored themselves to trees or watched from afar witnessed a scene of pure horror. Pinned beneath her extended shriek was a helpless Tarik. His struggles to escape were ineffective. Clothing, skin, blood, and entrails fled the bones of the once prominent Society member—her father—her mother’s murderer.

And then even his bones met the surrounding trees and stone walls prior to her silence. Onlookers stared in horror—some ran—others approached as her feet met the soft grass.

“You may...you may take me. I will not resist...I will not fight you.” Her face rested to the grass as other Society members encircled her, chattering amongst themselves.

“Th...thank you.”

Carrie peered upward to see a smiling face...several smiling faces.

“Our Queen has ended the tyranny! The great Tarik is ended!”

Carrie glanced upon a new crowd. Several Society members assisted her from the ground, lifting her to her feet.

“Queen Carrie...you will lead us back to greatness!”

“What? No...no I will not. The Council must reunite.” Attempting to turn her attention once more to the overwhelming sorrow festering within—she only then realized it was no longer there. “I don’t...I don’t understand.”

“Understand what, Queen Carrie?”

“Stop...stop calling me...my bond is unbroken? How? He breathes?”

More members gathered in a massive crowd as an uncontrollable smile curled her lips. Something unexplainable had occurred—her bond had been resurrected.

Looking to the entrance of Evrastill, Nyrobie appeared, toting a shivering Charlie as she raced down the steps.

Carrie fell to her knees, sobbing relentlessly. “Go! Send a search party to collect Councilman Andre and the remainder of the group!”

“Of course, my Queen!” Carrie didn’t even look to see the man responding. The Society seemed to crave her guidance. She rose, racing to Nyrobie.

“What happened?”

“We were ambushed...forest creatures within the tunnels. I fell to the waters...he followed trying to save me.”

As Nyrobie placed him about the grass, Carrie was instantly by his side. “And you restored him? Nyrobie you—”

“No...my gem was lost within the river, Carrie.”

Carrie looked to Nyrobie. “How can that be? I felt our bond break...I felt him end.”

“Elinor taught me from a text book long ago. Human medicine. Cardio pulmonary resuscitation. I’d explain it to you, but it involves the exchange of breath, so I will spare you the details.”

She was incapable of speaking full sentences, incapable of controlling her tears. “Nyrobie...I love...I...love—I” Carrie wrapped her arms around Nyrobie’s neck.

“I know, my friend. I love you too. Can we finally get this boy home?”

A shivering Charlie offered a slight smile—his teeth chattering as Carrie planted kisses on his cheeks while holding his head in her lap.

Within seconds, he was lavished with warm blankets and even hot tea from various Society members.

“The party has been dispatched, Queen Carrie.” The man’s hasty proclamation caught Nyrobie’s attention.

“Queen Carrie?”

“Eh...yes. We need to talk, Ny.”

“I’m gone for but a moment and you’re now royalty? Please, tell me everything.”

Carrie smiled as she tucked the warm blankets around Charlie’s shoulders, cradling his face in her palm. “Yes. Come home with me. The day has been eventful.”

“Carrie...your father?”

Carrie couldn’t control her smirk. “It would appear as though...I am an orphan, Nyrobie.” Her smile had Nyrobie’s eyes as wide as her grin.

“Carrie! You didn’t!”

“I did.” She bit her lip as Nyrobie covered her mouth with her hand.

“Carrie!”

“I had no choice.”

“You ended his followers as well?”

“No.”

“And why is that?”

“I didn’t want to, Nyrobie. Is that wrong?”

“No. No, I think it’s fantastic. Your father, however, was an ailment. Come, let’s get this man to bed and talk over tea and make sweet soup.”

Carrie’s modest home was clad with spices and herbs, beautiful carrots and other roots were about the stone countertops.

Heavy stone and wooden furniture was in the living, dining and, sleeping areas. Nyrobie, Charlie and, Carrie sat happily at the dining table. Carrie’s gaze only left Charlie’s face long enough to sip her tea. She watched him devour four bowls of hot soup.

“Tomorrow I’ll officially introduce to your new home, my love. And perhaps some new clothing.”

“You don’t think I look fetching in this blanket?” His mouth was full as he spoke with a smile.

Jerrek walked through the door of Carrie’s home. Nyrobie instantly rushed to him. “My love. They are all safe within the Kingdom?”

“Yes. Andre, Elinor, Clark, Joseph, and Irena are being fed at Council Hall as we speak.”

“What? How odd.” Carrie stood, making her way to Jerrek. “Forgive me, my friend.”

“Whatever for?”

“Slamming you mercilessly into the Kingdom’s stone entry.”

“Oh! Yes, however could I have forgotten about being tossed like a rotten radish?” His smile assured his sarcasm.

“Tell me of these happenings at Council Hall.”

“I will...but first.” Jerrek walked to an eating Charlie, leaning over he hugged him tightly. “My friend. I thought I would never see you again.”

“I owe you all my life...several times over.” Charlie stood, wiping his mouth, and keeping remaining snug in the blanket.

“We did it.” Jerrek looked to Carrie, Nyrobie, and Charlie. Only then did it occur to Carrie that he was correct—they had.

“Yes. We did.” Carrie once again walked to Charlie, hugging him tightly around the waist. Her ear pressed flat to his chest took in the beating of his heart—young and strong.

“There is to be a celebration, Queen Carrie. As we speak, our friends are being pampered and fed and this evening the crown of old is to be placed atop your head.”

Carrie looked to Jerrek, unsure if his words were a witticism of some sort. “Crown?”

“Carrie...the Society intends to see you as their true leader. Even your father’s followers are at the Hall now, petitioning for leniency.”

“Leniency?”

“Sentences, not words, Carrie.”

“This makes no sense, Jerrek. A council...the Council is the only option. And what leniency? My father’s puppets have nothing to fear of me. I pity them; I do not wish to end or imprison them.”

“Elect a guiding council, Carrie. Lead—”

“No! I do not want this, Jerrek! I have all I want. I have you three...my family. I need nothing more.”

Nyrobie stepped forward. “Carrie...perhaps it isn’t only about what you need.”

“Nyrobie.”

“You proved today that you have the strength to control and secure the gift within you. That gift is the key to our Kingdom’s eternal safety. How can you not assume your place as our rightful leader... knowing you are of the blood?”

Carrie turned from them, defeat pushing her toward a nearby chair. She then looked to a grinning Charlie.

“This Society would never crown a queen unified to—”

“They know of and support your unification, Carrie.”

“What did you say, Jerrek?”

“They know of your unification. Times are changing, my friend.”

Boisterous voices could be heard from outside of her home—odd instruments and even singing. “They’re preparing to celebrate...me?”

“They’re preparing to celebrate us, Carrie! And Evrastill. This is could be the home we have always wanted. Your visions, your dreams could come alive. Take this gift and this crown and Kingdom and let us prosper eternally.”

She said nothing in response to Nyrobie’s statement. She merely stood methodically and made her way from her home and to Council Hall.

Never before had so many eyes glanced over her. Once a prisoner of the Kingdom, now they beckoned her to the throne.

“Please! Please, be merciful in my ending. I fear pain!” A woman named Maggie approached—red-faced and frantic. She was of the crowd supporting Tarik. The woman slumped and sobbed at Carrie’s feet as several other sobbing faces gathered around.

Leaning to her, Carrie rested her palm atop the back of the crying woman’s head. “Please stand, Maggie, and do not fear your end by my hand.” Carrie stood to face the crowd. “The purpose of a Kingdom is not to control by death and stifle individuality by stringent law. Do not fear me...do not beg for my leniency. Support me while I support you. Let us do what we were meant to do. The world above us is not so shambled that it lies a barren wasteland. There is much beauty there.”

Members from the Hall exited to hear Carrie’s words. Nyrobie and Jerrek were also in the crowd, as well as Charlie—wearing semi-damp clothing.

“Let us explore ideas, effective ways to return to what we are meant to do. Let us return to the surface sporadically to assist those creatures we love so much, not to take the earth for ourselves. To rest is to rust, and to rust an eternity would be torturous...agreed?”

Clapping and cheering became deafening. Carrie raised her hands and it was once again silent.

“Let us delve into celebration this evening. The day has been long...we have lost members, and some are mourning those losses. Tomorrow, let us elect a knowledgeable council of effective and proven leaders...enough talk of queens and crowns—”

Before she could finish her sentence the crowd was in outrage. As Carrie scanned the faces, she was thankful when her gaze met Andre’s. He walked swiftly to her.

“Andre”

“Carrie, my Queen.” He kissed her cheek.

“Please, you must convince them. I’m a simple—”

“They are already convinced, Carrie. So am I.” He smiled, producing a gemmed crown, elegant and finely polished. As he placed it upon her head, she inhaled deeply and simply let it be. She was queen. Queen Carrie.

“People of Evrastill. I present to you...our first queen in ages, Queen Carrie!”

The crowd erupted in cheer. Of all the happy faces, Carrie sought only the face of her partner, Charlie. She made her way to him as instruments played and couples began dancing around the Hall.

The celebration was in full swing.

“You’re beautiful.”

“You are beautiful, Charlie. Will you love me still with this silly thing dressing my head?”

“I’d love you with a nest of woodrats dressing your head.”

She grabbed his face with both hands, pressing his lips to hers. To feel their bond break was the worst sensation she’d ever felt. Holding him now was magical.

The evening was wrapped in dancing, a feast of various foods of the Kingdom, beautiful music, and much fellowship.

Carrie introduced Charlie to a plethora of delicious foods. She loved his expressions as he tried each new dish. They danced and mingled and made countless introductions until she noticed his eyelids looking heavy.

“Might I walk you home, husband of mine?”

The enchanted smile he gave her in response to the question would forever be painted on her memory.

“Yea...let’s go home.”

He patted his belly and yawned loudly as they made their way through the door. No sooner were they atop the soft bed and he was snoring softly. She knew he must have been exhausted. She kissed his cheek and climbed into bed with him, snuggling up to her unified partner at long last. She’d leveraged so much to be next to this sleeping human. She studied his scruffy face, kissing his cheek—clad with prickly stubble.

Running her fingers through his thick, brown hair...she thought of all the memories they would make...the life they would share. Her eternity was only now beginning...and she couldn’t be happier. She too was tired—dreadfully tired, yet she found herself longing to watch him a moment more. Her face to his chest, she too succumbed to the day’s exhaustive efforts.

The morning came with the crystals shining as brightly as Carrie had ever remembered. She awoke in the same position. She looked to see Charlie staring at her.

“Oh...good morning, my love.”

“Awe...my arm...there we go.”

“Are you injured, Charlie?”

“No...my arm was asleep but I didn’t want to wake you.”

He kissed her forehead and offered a sleepy smile. She wasted no time, her hand worked its way beneath the quilt and between his legs.

“Oh. Well...good morning to you too, my Queen.” He grinned, resting his hands behind his head.

“Clearly, you do not object.” She toyed gently with his nether parts while casually working free of the bedding.

“No ma’am. Do you mind wearing the crown?”

“Oh, hush, silly thing.”

As she climbed atop him, maneuvering him within her, his eyes instantly fluttered in ecstasy.

“Go...go easy on me.”

“As you wish, my love.”

“No...we do not have bacon or any other meat here...so silly.”

His dramatic, saddened expression had her laughing. “How could you eat salted flesh, fried within its own fat? That sounds absolutely awful.”

“It’s absolutely delicious.”

“Do you not enjoy the food here, Charlie?”

“Holy shit, yes. I’ve never tasted anything as...there is nothing that tastes like that up there. Everything here is so damn good.”

“Splendid. Are you done eating now? We can head to the hot springs.”

“Hot springs?”

“Yes. The springs. Unless you enjoy bathing in chilled rivers. The hot springs are—”

“You all just bathe naked in front of each other?”

His comment had her chuckling. “No, silly. There is privacy there, and a constant supply of fresh-running, hot spring water.”

“Oh. Okay.”

“I’ll grab us some coal and a cleansing bar.” She kissed his cheek and left the kitchen. A pounding on the front door had her hastily returning.

She wasn’t surprised to find Andre and Elinor there; rather, she was taken aback by the look of concern upon either of their faces.

“Do come in, my friends. Whatever is the matter?”

“It is Elinor. I fear she is ill.”

“Ill?”

“No herbs are working. She’s been lightheaded and...I fear she came across something humanly during our venture to the outside world and within the tunnels.”

Elinor boasted a pale, exhausted look.

“Andre, human illness of any sort cannot flourish here. Please, fetch Nyrobie.”

Andre left to fetch Nyrobie as Carrie situated Elinor upon cushioned seating piece.

“Carrie...I’ve never felt...I feel awful.”

Moments later Nyrobie and Andre returned—both completely concerned.

“This makes no sense, Nyrobie. She appears ill. How might illness be here now? There is no pestilence in Evrastill.”

“I know this, Carrie.” Nyrobie, cautious in her approach, kneeled to Elinor, placing the back of her hand to her forehead. “She is without fever.”

Nyrobie closed her eyes, they fluttered beneath her lids. Her eyes then opened wide, her hand slapped across her mouth. “It...it cannot be.”

“What? Nyrobie...what is it?” Andre leaned, pleading with Nyrobie for answers.

“Impossible.”

“What is impossible, Nyrobie?”

“Andre...your bride is with child. I feel his tiny thoughts.”

Gasps overtook the room as Elinor leaned forward—grinning largely. “With child...I am pregnant?”

“Yes. You are. Andre...how can this be? We cannot—”

“My theory is correct!”

“What theory, Andre?” Nyrobie’s question had all eyes settled on Andre, waiting on the man’s response.

“All this time...for ages the Council has led us to believe we are completely different. We are not. We are the same, only at different points on the evolutionary scale.”

“You’re...you’re saying this baby will actually happen?” Elinor wept as she asked this.

“Yes...I believe so, my love.”

Carrie looked to Charlie—they shared a wide-eyed whimsical grin.

“Which leads me to believe the remainder of theory to be true as well. Our kind cannot leave the mountain to take the earth and expect our immortality to follow us. We are powerful and immortal only because our environment allows us to be. We are forever eighteen years aged only because of the odd, blue crystals shining down on us. We are human...advanced...but human.”

Carrie gasped, crying as she raced to Charlie. “I’m so happy!”

Andre kissed his bride. “As am I! I am to be a father! I thought this would never occur!”

Elinor shook her head. “If the Council learns...couples must have been granted the blessing of the Council prior to—”

“You have the full permission and blessing of the Queen, my friend.”

Carrie’s words melted any anxiety from Elinor’s expression.

“I beg your pardon, Nyrobie...did you say, he?” Andre’s beaming smile had the room smiling with him.

“Perhaps...my apologies.”

“Are you certain?”

“I am, Andre. He is strong...healthy within your bride.”

Elinor erupted in tears of joy. “A baby boy? Am I dreaming? I could actually be a mother?”

The couple embraced, shedding tears as the idea of potentially raising her own youngsters had Carrie’s thoughts racing.

“This changes so much, Andre.”

“Yes...it does, Nyrobie.”

Charlie walked to the happy couple from the kitchen. “What if...I mean...will you be...?” Charlie scratched his head—his hair was incredibly messy. “What if he’s like me?”

Andre offered a curious grin. “Like you?”

Rocking on his heels—his face flushing—Charlie cleared his throat. “What if he’s just...regular? What if he’s like me?”

Andre stood, still smiling. He moved to Charlie, placing his hand on Charlie’s shoulder. “Charlie...you, my friend, are anything but regular. I would be honored to raise a son with such integrity and morals.”

The men shared a glance before offering one another a masculine hug, complete with a back slap. The reality of the situation began to settle. Andre was correct—they were one—they were all human.

Chapter 18

The Council Hall was buzzing with excitement. The entire Kingdom appeared rejuvenated and ready for the new era.

Seated at the Council table was Andre, Jerrek, Nyrobie, and nine new faces to the Hall. Carrie watched them mingle briefly before approaching.

“Ladies and gentlemen of the Council...I am pleased to have you with me today. I believe this union will be prosperous and in the interest of our Kingdom.” She swallowed hard, pacing slowly in front of the table.

“I’m new to the Crown...this you know. Many of you are new to the Council. Yet our lack of experience leaves us ambitious...eager for answers and action.” The smiles and nods confirmed her statement.

“As we move forward, we must do so collectively. There are many questions left to be answered. How did we get here? How long have we been here? Perhaps we’ll never know. If the crystals feed our immortality and provide our magic, do they also feed our desire to aid and protect the humans of the earth above us? These legitimate enquiries should have been answered many an age ago...and yet they were left for us to unriddle. How exciting is that, my friends?”

Carrie anchored herself centered of the table, her hands behind her back, she peered down upon her newly elected Guiding Council.

“There is value in the secrecy of our existence. I will not debate that. Our home is lavished in natural gifts that would be completely depleted in a day’s time if the world above learned of their existence. However, we must get back to what we so desire, to what is ingrained in each of us. We must get back to the art of aiding our fellow humans above—acting once more as guardians.”

Her comment had each member of the Council grinning largely.

“Through training, education, and perseverance, we can once again become what we were so long ago...the protectors of those that walk the earth.” Carrie began pacing once more. “Such a task will be delicate and require much collaboration. This is why you sit before me. The stringent Council selection regulations of old, no longer apply. An eclectic alliance of ancient and young alike will lift this Society to places we’ve never been.”

Andre’s face beamed with pride as he looked to Carrie.

“I am humbled to serve alongside each of you. I know without a doubt that Evrastill will blossom and grow and I look forward to being with you centuries from now as we perfect our passion and expand our reach. So now, let us rise—we have rested too long. Let us stretch the ache from our bones and shake our stale minds free of the ways of yesterday. Let us rally, form committees, have intellectual debate, and take in the wisdom of our earthly-human allies. Let us celebrate in knowing that we have the tools and the mindset to accomplish our desires...and that is to act as the protectors...the guardians of those above. Stand with me now, my Council. Let us leave this quiet Hall for the boisterous voices of our people. They crave something loud; they crave something different. The time has come. Let us give it to them.”

Several Years Later

Tears—thick and sappy—streamed his face, trailing their way to his quivering chin. The cowering sun set not only on the day...but on the remainder of his fading hope. He hurt. It was a physical hurt looming in his core. Turning once more toward the sun, he shouted with all he had through the snow-covered trees. “Alyssa!” His breath left him and danced in the chilled air.

The incoming storms had hindered the efforts and reach of the search parties. Two nights with the temperatures reaching sub-zero was basically a death sentence for an inexperienced twenty-four-year-old hiker. Blake knew this, yet he couldn’t bring himself to walk away—to descend the mountain.

Hitting his knees, he cried violently. “Why? Why the hell did I bring...bring you...why? I can’t...I can’t live without you!” His cries carried across the still atmosphere, only the crows for company.

The previous evening, he’d gone to collect firewood among the surrounding trees. Even with years of outdoors experience, he lost his way back to her. When he finally reached their camping quarters hours later—she was gone...the note she left said she was looking for him.

Married two years prior, Blake cherished his wife more than life itself. Thoughts of going through life without her had him longing to merely lie down and rest indefinitely.

“Please...I know I...I haven’t prayed in forever. Please don’t take her from me.” His soft cries were nearly inaudible. His aching throat begged for something other than the bitter, biting air he inhaled.

“I’ll do anything...take me. Take me right now...just...don’t take her. Please, she’s already fought so hard. You know how hard she’s fought! Don’t...Please don’t take her away from me.”

Crouched with hands clasped, he continued his desperate plea—his face stung with nearly frozen tears. An intense, nauseating reality overtook him. He had to leave the mountainside...he had to leave now...and he had to leave without her.

Standing to his feet, using a tree for support, he slapped himself in the face. “I hate you. So, stupid! I hate you!” Two steps later and he was vomiting the coffee and water he’d drank earlier. His nerves shook through his snowsuit as he worked to place one foot in front of the other.

As he walked, his tears fell to the snow below him. Her hypnotic laugh, the way she looked in the morning light just seconds before she woke up. She was his perfection. Thoughts of her being frightened, cold, and alone had him crashing to his knees once more. “Dammit! Please! Ally!” His voice cracked and nearly gave out on him as he called for her.

His tears continued melting the snow as the sun said its final goodbyes. Wolves called in the distance—part of him hoped they’d surround him and make short work of him. He inhaled deeply, coughing a few times as he did so. “You will always...always, be my everything, Ally Taber. You are the most inspiring, courageous, strongest human being I have ever known and you will always be in my heart...I love you...for...forgive me.” Resting his head and fists against the compacted snow, he continued crying. Knowing his mother and father would miss him dearly should he perish too, he lifted himself from the snow, and continued down the mountain.

Nearly an hour later—after each dream and near-future plan blatantly replayed in his mind—his eyes settled on the two-lane black-top, curving and hugging the mountainside as he cautiously maneuvered his way through the few remaining trees.

The sky was now pitch-black. The wind was picking up and the snow was falling heavily. The distant motor of a road plow could be heard.

Removing his glove, Blake took his phone from his snowsuit pocket. He now had one bar of service...and eighteen voicemails—the majority being from his mother. He sighed as he walked to his icy Jeep across the road. The frozen handles made it nearly impossible for his aching fingers to open the door.

Inside, he prepared himself to deliver the news...he’d failed them. He’d failed her. He’d failed everyone. Alyssa was gone. The thought of saying something so cruel seemed surreal.

The thought of his mother’s comforting voice on the other end of the line had him hesitantly pressing call on his touchscreen.

“Oh, my God! Blake! Baby?”

Even at twenty-five, Blake was a proud momma’s boy. His mother’s voice was all it took to send the man cratering. “Ma...Mamma!” He cried out into the phone—incapable of holding it to his ear.

“Blake? Blake!”

Nearly twenty seconds later, he’d gained enough composure to press the phone to his ear and deliver the dreadful news.

Shaking, his phone met his face. “I...I lost her, Mamma.”

Soft cries on the other end had him resting his head to the steering wheel.

“No, baby boy, you didn’t. She’s okay...she’s here.”

His mother’s words made no sense, but had him sitting straight up. “What? Mom! What?”

“Blake! Ally is okay. We’re at Memorial in the Intensive Care Unit now. She’s...she’s gonna be okay, baby boy."

"Oh, my God! Oh, my God! How? How, Mom? I'm coming now! Right now!"

"Blake! You listen to me, young man. You better drive sensibly on these roads! Don't think you're too big for me to bust your little ass!"

His cheeks hurt he was smiling so hard. "Mom...she's really there...she's really okay?" He cried as he asked.

"Yes...yes, Blake. She is sleeping now. She is okay. You are okay. We are all okay."

"I love you so much, Momma. I'm on my way now."

The thirty-minute drive to the hospital felt like an eternity. Blake's heart was happy, his foot danced nervously atop the gas pedal as he neared the hospital.

He didn't walk briskly, he ran through the front door, tears streaming—his eyes as wide as his smile. Tearing down the hall and through the double doors and to the first nurse he came to. "Ally Taber?"

"What?"

"Alyssa Taber?"

"Oh...and you are?"

"Her husband." His happy proclamation had the kind nurse leading him to room eighteen.

Rushing through, past their parents, he took her hand, collapsing to his knees and wailing at the bedside. "I...I'm so sorry! I love you so much! I'll never...I'll never let you go again!"

"It's okay. Hey, boy. It's okay...I'm good."

"How? How did they find you? When? I've been searching all day."

Blake felt his mother's hand upon his shoulder. "They found her at the base of the mountain...wrapped up, cozy and warm by an extravagant fire...delirious, but she's coming around."

"I'm not delirious, Mary. I told you...I was rescued. A young man, Andre. He spoke so eloquently with like a...British accent or something. He just...carried me through the blizzard down the mountain and waited until the snow crew saw the fire. He could run faster than our car, Blake."

Her voice was scratchy, her eyes were sleepy; she was perfection...his perfection. "I'm sure he can, beautiful. I'd love to thank him someday. I...I thought I lost you."

She chuckled. "Lost me? Nah boy. I beat leukemia's ass...you think a goofy mountain is gonna keep me from you? I love you, Blake."

"I love you too, Ally. I love you too."

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Bradon Nave was born and raised in rural Oklahoma. He attended a small country school during junior high and high school, and graduated with only three people in his class. After graduate school, he decided to devote his spare time to his passion of writing. Bradon currently lives in Piedmont, Oklahoma, with his wife and two young children.

www.bradonnave.com

www.facebook.com/bradonnavebooks

twitter.com/BradonNave

CROSS

D.A. ROACH

All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

CROSS

Ray Cross wasn't a hero; he could die too easily. But some things are worth risking death...

Ray Cross was born with a genetic disorder, resulting in a fragile body; his organs and blood vessels will rupture with any hard impact, so standing up to his best friend's controlling boyfriend could kill him.

Ray's life in Midland, MI gets decimated when his parents reveal they are not his real parents and his real father, a king from a secret land hidden in the far north of Canada, is dying and wishes to meet his son.

With his doctor and newly-met twin, Ray travels to the forgotten village of Yardis, where magic, myth, and corruption are abundant. But the longer Ray stays in the village learning the truth of his past and reconnecting with his father, King Vintras, the more he discovers an evil force threatening the king and his village.

But there's more than the king and a village tied to Yardis and Ray. He finds friendship and more from a band of brothers who are part witch, dragon, and healer. With new alliances and new abilities, Ray wars with himself on playing it safe or risking it all to save the ones he loves.

Can Ray rise above his fragile disorder to become the hero for once in his life?

Chapter 1

The bell rang, and I hurried out the doors, positioning myself in plain view where I could watch for Derek. Leo hurried over, urging me to let it go and let him handle it. Leo had always handled it, keeping the peace or laying the threats to keep me out of harm's way. But I had had enough.

Derek, emerged from the school wearing a smug smile with Lauren by his side. "Well, if it isn't Elmer himself! I heard you wanted to have a word with me." He said in a mocking voice.

I hated when he called me Elmer. Derek had given me the shitty nickname after I had messaged Lauren, urging her to leave him. To this day I don't regret sending that message. The controlling jerk had no right to cut me out of her life. In retaliation, he had heard the analogy I had told others about my genetic disorder. "I look normal but the glue, or collagen, that holds me together is faulty causing me to be fragile. It's like comparing a house made with screws and nails to one held together with Elmer's glue; they look the same but one can break and fall apart easily."

Lauren shot me a sympathetic smile as she tugged at Derek's hand, pleading for him to leave. He pulled out of her grasp and approached.

Leo came up on my left and quietly urged. "Cross, let it go. He's not worth the risk. Let it go."

"Yeah Elmer, better let it go. Like you always do. We wouldn't want things to escalate." He mocked. "You and your fake diagnosis have everyone fooled but me. I know the truth; you're too much of a chicken shit to fight. You let your oaf fight your—"

I charged past Leo and clocked Derek as hard as I could across his jaw. The skin on my knuckles split open instantly, revealing the bone beneath and unleashing a river of blood. I didn't care; I had landed a solid hit. Derek stumbled back, losing his balance and falling to the ground with a dumbfounded look. A crowd gathered to see the melee. I began to charge at him again, but Lauren and Leo grabbed me and pulled me away.

Beep, beep, beep! The alarm clock blared next to me, pulling me from the unbelievably realistic dream. My hand shook as it reached over to quiet the alarm. 6:45AM. I studied my hand, relieved it was intact. I hated being fragile, especially when I had to take crap from Derek Mavericks each day. "Ignore him, reason with him, explain your disorder." Yeah, none of it worked. I needed to borrow someone's normal body for an hour so I could kick Derek's ass and be done with him.

Today was my birthday, but unlike most kids on this planet, I did not enjoy celebrating getting another year older. With vEDS, another year older meant a step closer to an early death. I was still struggling with the tragic news regarding the death of my online friend, Nick Mitchell. We chatted often about vEDS, as we had that in common, and often compared notes. But he was gone and here I was, turning another year older.

After a quick shower, I grabbed my backpack and headed downstairs where Mom flitted about the kitchen and Dad was reading the paper and drinking his coffee.

“Hey, birthday boy! Happy birthday. Mom made breakfast,” Dad called to me.

“Happy birthday, sweetheart,” Mom called over her shoulder.

“Thanks. Did you save me any bacon?”

Dad pushed the plate of meat my way. “You okay? You look...” He narrowed his eyes.

“What?” I narrowed my eyes back at him.

Mom turned from the stove to look at me. Her expression dropped and she hurried over, putting her hand to my forehead to check for a temperature. “Ray, you look sickly.”

“Geez, thanks. I love you too. No, really, I feel fine. Tired, but I just woke up.”

“Maybe that’s it. You look paler, and your circles look darker. I’m glad we’re seeing Dr. Jonas this afternoon.” She returned to the eggs.

“Oh yeah? What time’s the appointment?” Dr. Jonas was a specialist that helped manage my collagen disorder.

“Right after school. Just head home, and we’ll leave once you’re here.” Mom said without turning around. “Are you having trouble sleeping?”

“No. But I’ve been dreaming a lot, and they’re pretty action-packed. Maybe if I dreamt of taking a nap I’d look more rested,” I joked.

Dad laughed, but Mom didn’t. “Here, eggs are done.” She brought the eggs over right as I reached for the orange juice. The back of my right hand connected with the hot pan for just a moment, but it hurt like hell. “Oh, Ray! Are you okay?” Mom returned the pan to the stove and returned with a wet wash rag. “Here, put this on there.” She helped me drape it over my hand. “Leave that there for a bit while you eat, then we’ll put some Silvadene on it.”

I peeked at the blistered skin and replaced the cloth. “Bad timing huh?”

Mom fixed the plate of food and poured my drink. “It was not the best way to start the day.”

After breakfast, my mom took off the rag and dried the wound with a paper towel. Then she dressed it with Silvadene and bandaged it. “Better hurry or you’ll be late for school.” She leaned forward to kiss my forehead.

I waved goodbye and started off toward school.

Midland High was in walking distance from my house, and in the two and three quarters years I had attended it, I could count the times I had to be driven on one hand. But on days like today, when the sun shone bright in the sky and the temperature was in the mid-seventies, I was glad we lived so close. I turned onto Swede Avenue and walked on the sidewalk that led to the school. A few cars passed by, but our high school started an hour before most places of employment. The houses here were simple brick and siding homes. Their architecture reminded me of the house I saw on the Brady Bunch show when I was a kid. Some neighbors cared for their yards; their perfectly painted fences framed manicured lawns and flower beds. Others seemed to do nothing more than mow their “grass” which consisted of mismatched weeds and bare patches.

A large and fast moving shadow crossed the ground beneath me. I looked up expecting to see a stealth bomber or at least a huge cloud. But the sky was clear and cloudless.

Oof! I collided with a kid that looked a couple of years younger than me. “Sorry.” Where the hell had he come from? He shot an annoyed look my way before continuing away from the school. He didn’t look like anyone I’d seen around Midland. He wore grey cargo pants, a tattered red tee, and had a shaggy haircut. I shrugged it off and continued on my way.

With a couple of days before spring break, the teachers went easy on us and filled the class time with movies or busy work enforcing the most recent lesson.

Mrs. Burke turned off the ancient VHS recorder, ending today’s Romeo and Juliet lesson. “Tomorrow we will finish the movie and discuss how it compares to the text.”

At some point in the movie, I had tuned out and focused on Lauren Crosby who sat a few chairs ahead of me. Lauren and I had become close friends in middle school when she transferred in and struggled with adjusting. Her locker had been assigned near mine, but she never managed to open it. We’d joke that an evil witch had cursed her to forever be locked out of her locker, but I didn’t mind helping. And as time had passed, I had become closer friends and more attracted to her.

A crumpled piece of paper flew onto my desk.

“Score.” Derek chuckled from behind me.

I shouldn’t care what the paper said, but curiosity got the better of me.

Keep your eyes off my girl Elmer!

It was a warning from Derek Mavers, school jerk and Lauren’s boyfriend since Freshman year. I hated him.

The guidance counselor had encouraged my parents and I to be forthcoming about my condition, insisting it would make the other students sympathetic instead of cruel. Most were compassionate and respected my limitations, sometimes even offering to help make something physically easier for me, like carrying my heavy backpack. But there were a few, like Derek Mavers, who had no care for anything besides themselves. They took pride in dominating others and letting others’ misery feed their egos. Derek and his crew acted like a bunch of noisy alpha male baboons who owned Midland High.

I drew a hand giving the middle finger on the paper and lobbed it back at Derek. He opened it, and judging by the sour look on his face, I had pushed a button. He pointed his finger at me and drew his finger across his neck, threatening my end. I smiled to show I wasn’t afraid, though this was the farthest I had ever challenged Derek. I wondered how far to push it.

I turned back around in my seat and locked eyes with Lauren. She had stolen my heart in sixth grade, and to this day, a simple smile from her would drop me to my knees, even the sympathetic one she wore now. I couldn't help but smile back at her as I thought, Yeah, your boyfriend is a dick, especially to me, but I'm not the one who has to kiss his ugly mug.

When the bell rang, Derek knocked my books off my desk as he walked past. "My bad." He muttered as he kicked my biology book to the front of the room with feigned innocence.

"Jerk." I knelt to pick up my scattered books and flipped Derek off. He turned in time to see it.

Good.

His mouth quirked up in a half smile, amused at my passive aggressive return.

Mrs. Burke came over with my biology book. "Don't let Mr. Mavers rattle you. He enjoys causing trouble."

I wasn't in the mood for adult advice. "Thanks," I answered while putting the book in my stack. "See ya tomorrow, Mrs. Burke." I walked out of her class to join the current of students flowing through the halls during passing period.

Lauren found me at my locker. "Hey, happy birthday. Listen, I'm sorry about Derek. He can be awful sometimes."

"Sometimes?" I chuckled to myself as I shoved my books into my locker. "You don't have to apologize for him. I'll never like the guy, and he'll probably always be a dick to me."

She reached out and gently touched my bandaged hand. "What happened?"

"Burned myself at breakfast." I pulled my hand away and shut my locker. I wished we could have more moments like this where we could chat and be together as we had in the past. "You deserve better than him." My teeth raked over my bottom lip as I debated holding my tongue or saying what I really wanted to.

Lauren looked at me, as if she anticipated what I said next.

"I should have asked you out in eighth grade when I had the chance. I would have made you happy." But I had felt so unsure of myself at the time and hadn't thought I'd make good boyfriend material. I had also been terrified at losing her friendship; any attempt to change the relationship risked losing it.

"I am happy." She sounded like she was trying to convince herself.

"Are you?" I knew the real answer. She and Derek had started off happy, but he'd become more controlling, especially when it came to our friendship. It had become a sore spot for them.

Derek came up from behind and punched the locker next to mine, startling both of us. "Looks like this conversation is over. Remember what I told you, Elmer?" He poked his finger into my shoulder hard enough that I knew I would have a bruise. "Stay away from my girl." He grabbed Lauren by her elbow and hurried her down the hall, scolding her for disappearing on him.

Lauren looked back at me, the sadness in her eyes left me regretting my confession. I didn't want her pity; I wanted her to dump him and find someone better than Derek—anyone but Derek.

“Looks like someone’s been poking the hornet’s nest again,” Leo said from behind me.

Leo and I had met sophomore year at lunch. He was bigger and more muscular than most sophomores at our school, making him and I an unmatched pair. My disorder kept me from building muscles. I had suspected the other students kept a wide girth from Leo because of his intimidating size and looks, but that didn’t scare me.

“What did ya do this time?” He nodded toward Derek.

“Nothing. Derek’s being a possessive jerk like usual and pissing all over his territory to mark it.” My remark made Leo laugh.

“Come on, or we’ll be late for bio.”

Leo’s friendship had come at a time when Lauren and Derek had grown closer and the distance between Lauren and I had become greater. The two had started dating our freshman year, but midyear Derek started isolating her from me and controlling her social media. She stopped taking my calls and replying to my texts besides occasionally sending, “Beat it, loser!”, which obviously, Derek had sent.

I had acquaintances at school, but Lauren had been the sun in my rainy day. Her carefree way and sweet smile made me forget I had a life-threatening disorder. But as Derek pulled her farther away, my depression and anxieties about my disorder grew. My parents worried for me, more so than usual. I assured them it was temporary and I just needed time to get over not having Lauren in my life. But it was easier said than done. Every emotion I felt seemed amplified in her absence.

My parents let me be for a while, but eventually my mom had had enough. One day, towards the end of summer, my mom came in my room and said, “Something has to change. You’re been a hermit all summer, holed up in your room and cut off from the world—it’s not healthy.” She made me promise that if my social life and mental well-being hadn’t improved by October, I would see a shrink.

I didn’t need a shrink, and to prove it, I put forth a solid attempt at being more social. The perfect opportunity came when I walked into fifth period lunch that first week of school and saw Leo Palkin, a kid I’d never seen before, sitting by himself.

I chose a seat across from Leo and said hello. In fact, I said hello several times with increasing volume to be sure he heard me, but he never responded. Finally, when the bell rang, Leo stood with his tray and grunted in my direction. Some might have seen that as a negative response, but I saw it as progress.

Over the next few days, I managed to get Leo to speak actual words to me. Granted, they weren’t the nicest words, but “I don’t need a lunch buddy,” was better than nothing. After much persistence, Leo finally realized I was not going away and he finally dropped the tough guy act, well, at least with me.

After bio, Leo and I headed out the side doors.

“Where’d you park? Back lot or side?”

“Back.” Leo led the way to his old yellow Volkswagon Bug. He’d inherited the clunker from his uncle. It had over 180,000 miles on it and plenty of rust, which Leo decided to cover with stickers.

“I love how you turned your rust bucket into a piece of propaganda.” I tried to smooth one of the stickers that had started to peel off. “This one’s barely hangin’ on.”

“Crap. Seriously? Which one?” He unlocked his side.

““Strangers have the best candy’.”

“Oh man, that one’s my favorite. I’ll have to put some glue on that when I get home.” Leo got in and reached over to unlock my side. The engine sputtered and coughed, trying to even out so he could put it in gear.

“Wow, she purrs like a kitten.” I snickered.

“Watch it, this baby takes your butt home each day.” He warned as he pushed on the gas pedal to try and help it settle. While I could walk to school in the morning, by the end of the school day, I was exhausted and the few blocks felt like a few miles. “Remind me to give you your present. It’s in the trunk. Happy birthday by the way.”

I chuckled. “Thanks, I almost thought you’d forgotten it.”

“Nah, I was just makin’ ya sweat.” Leo turned onto my street and slowed when we noticed a black BMW in my driveway. “Looks like you’ve got company. Want me to go in with you?”

“No, my dad’s car is in the driveway. Could just be his friend.” I didn’t recognize the car, and my parents didn’t have many friends. They mostly socialized with neighbors.

Leo parked on the street by my mailbox. “Wait here while I grab your gift.” He ran around to the trunk and returned a moment later with a square-ish box. “Open it,” he insisted as he shoved it into my hands.

I tore the paper and opened the brown box. “Candy cigarettes? No way! Where did you find these? Wait, there’s like fifty packs in here!”

“Twenty-four, actually, twenty-three to be exact. I had to try a pack for myself. Of course, I can only blame you since you insisted I try some the first chance I get,” he confessed. “Anyway, I remember you telling me how you remembered riding your bike to get some from the convenience store. Seemed like a happy memory from your childhood, and I saw these while shopping for new headphones. I had to get them for you. Funny thing is you can’t just buy one pack, you have to get twenty-four or nothing.” He chuckled. “Happy birthday.”

“Thanks man. Best gift ever. It’s been years since I’ve...” I stopped mid-sentence when I saw him, the kid I collided with this morning, walking between our yard and the Ritter's yard. He didn't see us as he turned and headed north up the street. I sat frozen in my passenger seat staring after him. What was he doing here?

"Hey man, you okay? You seem kinda spooked." Leo set his hand on my shoulder, pulling me from my thoughts.

"Huh? Oh, no. It's just that guy. I've never seen him before, and this morning I bumped into him, and now he's here."

Leo turned and searched out the front window. "What guy?"

I looked back and he was gone. "Where'd he go? He was right there! This guy walked between our yards and up the street. Where the hell did he go?"

"Is he a new neighbor or something?"

"No. I don't know. This morning was the first I'd ever seen of him." I unbuckled and got out, looking up and down my street but seeing no sign of the kid. Leo looked at me like I was crazy, but something struck me as odd about the stranger.

We entered through the unlocked front door and could hear voices coming from the kitchen.

"You will tell him tonight." The male voice giving the command sounded familiar. "I'll come for him in a week. It will give you time to say your goodbyes. We can't wait any longer."

I heard my mom sniffle as she agreed. Leo looked at me with a questioning look, but I shrugged, feeling as clueless as he looked.

"I am sorry you cannot join us. King Vintras does not want any confused feelings during this important time." The familiar masculine voice paused. The people from the kitchen came into the living room. Dr. Jonas froze when he saw Leo and I. "Raynar, good to see you. Please excuse me." He hurried past us and out the front door. Why was he here? We'd only ever seen him in the clinic.

My dad emerged from the kitchen, surprised to see us. "Hey, I didn't hear you come in."

"Does that mean our appointment is canceled?"

"Oh, yeah. He came by to chat with us, but the appointment is canceled." My dad seemed flustered.

Mom came around the kitchen corner wiping at her eyes. "Hi, honey," she cleared her throat. "I didn't hear you come in. Dr. Jonas was just here meeting with us about an upcoming trip." She walked over to the front window and looked out to the street below. "We'll tell you all about it..." She became overcome with emotion, pushing past my dad as she hurried down the hall, slamming the door behind her.

"Is she okay?" Leo asked.

"In time, hopefully." My dad looked down the hall where my mom had retreated. He turned his focus back to us and asked, "How was school?" as if nothing had happened a moment ago.

"Fine." I answered. "What's wrong with Mom? And what did Dr. Jonas want?" Mom's cries could be heard down the hall.

“We’ll talk about it over dinner.” He smiled reassuringly only the smile never touched his eyes. “I’m gonna go check on your mom. Good seein’ ya, Leo.” My dad retreated to the master bedroom where Mom had closed herself off away from the world.

Chapter 2

The overcooked roast and underdone broccoli casserole foreshadowed the tense discussion attempted over the evening meal. It began with pleasantries, “How was your day, do you have any homework?” Mom asked without pausing between the two questions.

To test my suspicion that neither of them would be tuned in enough to care what I answered, I replied with, “Fabulous day at school, thanks for asking. We had a sub for biology today, and you wouldn’t believe who it was...Satan. Yep, the man in red, pitchfork and all.” There was no response so I continued, “He assigned us six chapters in our books and told us to slaughter six animals tonight.” Both of my parents sat, pushing their food around on their plates as though I had said nothing at all. I dropped my utensils onto my plate, “Enough. Just say it. What shit bomb did Dr. Jonas drop on you today?”

They both turned silently toward me. They didn’t laugh or scold me—they didn’t do anything, and that made me even more worried. The last time my parents were this lost in their heads was the night they told me about the prognosis of my vEDS. They had taught me about my fragile body from as young as I could remember, but that night was the first time they’d ever told me that I would probably not live a long life. Forty-two years was the average life span according to statistics from a few years ago. I knew that statistics didn’t apply to everyone, but I still couldn’t help feeling like someone had stamped an expiration date on me. “Best by November 11, 2042,” like I was a piece of meat from the butcher.

“Ray, we have something we have to tell you.” Dad reached over and took mom’s hand in his before continuing. “We are not your biological parents. You were born in a remote village in the far northern regions of Canada, in a place not seen by most. Your parents loved you, but they could never be together and they were forbidden to keep you. Your father ordered us to take you far away and keep you safe. We brought you to Michigan and cared for you.” He looked to my mom who stared down at her plate.

“You’re joking.” This was the last thing I expected to hear. “You are not my parents?” I waited for a response from them but the room remained silent. “Neither of you?” Mom shook her head but wouldn’t look at me. “Why did you lie to me and make me think you were my parents?”

Silence.

“What the hell?” I stood, knocking the chair back, and stormed off to my room, slamming the door behind me.

Why did they lie for all these years? Or had I assumed they were my parents and they never corrected me when I addressed them as such? Either way, they deceived me. This was nuts. I raked my hands through my hair trying to clear away the emotion and think consider the facts.

So, I’m some illegitimate son of two young and dumb teens. it happens. It sucks, but it happens. These two people, who I had thought were my parents, cared for me for years despite not being my actual biological parents. Why? And what happened to my real parents?

My phone buzzed in my pants’ pocket. Leo. He seemed to have a sixth sense for when I needed him.

Leo: You okay?

Me: Hardly. Just got a bomb dropped on me.

Leo: ???

Me: Told me they aren’t my real parents.

Leo: WTF!? I’m coming to pick you up. Be there in 5.

Me: K

I pocketed the phone and took a deep breath.

Knock, knock. “Ray, it’s Mom, can I come in?” Her voice was soft and sympathetic.

I opened the door. The woman who I had called mom for years stood before me with a sad and worried look on her face. She stepped forward and wrapped me in a hug, holding me for a long time. I couldn’t tell if the hug was for her or me. “You are my son and you will always be my son. I don’t care what anyone else says. I raised you and loved you like you were my own flesh and blood, and the bond that connects us will never break.” She pulled back, and held my face in her hands. The tears she had shed left white trails down her colorful cheeks. “We love you. We always will. This doesn’t change that.”

“Why did you lie?”

“We were told to keep you safe. Our village had been attacked, and we took you and fled to Michigan, far from the happenings of home. We chose not to tell you to protect you. We couldn’t risk you going back and trying to find your parents, not till we knew it was safe. I’m sorry we deceived you, but I am not sorry that you are safe and alive.”

“Why tell me now? What’s changed?”

She sat on the corner of my bed. “Our people are free, but your father is dying. He wishes to meet you before he passes. Jonas will take you next week to meet your him.”

“Jonas? As in Dr. Jonas?”

She nodded.

“Why not you or Dad?”

There was a knock at my door, and my dad peeked in. “How’s it goin’ in here?”

“Okay.” Mom answered.

“Ray, Leo’s here.” My dad stepped aside and my friend came into my room.

“Hey, man.” Leo looked between my mom and I. “Ready to go?”

“No, Leo. Ray, we’ll talk about this later.” Mom hurried out of the room, seemingly glad for the interruption Leo had provided.

“I won’t bring him home late, Mrs. Cross.” Leo called after her, then turned to me. “You ready?”

I let out a breath. “Yeah, let’s get out of here.”

Leo and I drove around town and finally parked at Chippawassee Park to hang at the Skate Park. The sky was dark, lit only by the pale moon’s light. The park had closed hours before, but neither of us cared.

“They want me to go to some village far up north to meet my real dad. I guess he’s dying and asked to see me. What I don’t get is why does he care now, after all these years?” I folded my legs under me while Leo dangled his over the bowl.

“I don’t know. I’m still struggling with the fact that your parents aren’t your real parents. Completely mind-blowing.” Leo shook his head. “You gonna go?”

“I guess. Dr. Jonas is supposed to take me next week.” I threw a pebble onto the grassy area adjacent the skate area.

“Not your parents, or whatever they are?”

“Yeah, I don’t know.”

“Hey Cross. What else is eatin’ at you?” Leo studied me. “You can’t hide that shit from me. You’ll feel better getting it off your chest.”

I told him about Nick’s recent death from vEDS and how bad it sucked to worry that I might die young. We didn’t say much more, but I was glad to have his support.

Leo dropped me off at home. I wasn’t surprised to find my parents in bed watching the late-night news on their bedroom TV. I knocked and creaked the door open.

“Hey, you okay?” My dad asked.

I shrugged. “Yeah, I guess. Wanted to let you know I was home.” I turned and shut their door, then got myself ready for bed.

I pulled out my laptop and Googled “northern Canada climate”. Maps of Canada showing highs and lows filled my screen with the word “sub-arctic” written across them. Summers had mild temps with a high around 85F and winters dropped as low as -40F. One of the pages stated that with cool and short summers, the natives relied on wildlife meats and berries for food. The population in the area was scarce, probably due to the cold temps, poor growing conditions, and lack of modern resources. Which led me to my next Google search: “wifi Canada”. A map appeared with cell towers along the U.S. and Canadian border, but there was only a smattering of towers in the north.

“This is going to suck.” I shut the laptop and fell back on my bed, thinking about how this would go on record as my worst birthday to date.

Chapter 3

The next morning Mom checked my burn. It looked redder than it had the day before. She phoned Dr. Jonas and sent him pictures of the wound. He told her some tricks to try at home and prescribed an antibiotic for me. Once we picked up the medicine, my mom dropped me off at school entrance and hurried off to her job.

I started up the long front walk hoping that I was late enough to miss first period. Something in my periphery caught my attention. Near a tree, a few yards away, stood the kid I had collided the other day. His hands were deep in his pant pockets as he stared at me with interest. I realized I had stopped and stared back at him. What did he want? “Can I help you?” He didn’t reply. I walked toward him cautiously, not wanting to scare him off. When I was about ten feet away, he blew a frigid breath toward me, stopping, no, freezing me in my tracks. At first, it felt like a cold breeze, but the longer I stay stuck, frozen mid-step by this unnatural force, the more the coldness took hold. And like the winter days of my childhood, when I’d stay out too long building snowforts and sledding, the chill sunk deep into my bones and I knew it would be slow to thaw.

“That’s far enough.” He warned.

“What the hell did you do to me? Why can’t I move my feet?” I tried to push or pull out of the frozen position but had no luck.

“No good will come from your travels with the Guardian. Larkin will kill any who threaten his plans.” He turned and disappeared between two large pines. My feet remained stuck in place. Crap! I reached down and wrapped my hands around my frosted ankles. They were cold and hard, as if they had been pulled from the freezer. The warmth of my hands thawed them enough to free me and cause me to fall into the grass. And soon, the strange burning sensation that often occurred after coming indoors from the cold covered my skin. The effect felt dry ice, cold and frozen one moment and gone the next.

I lay back on the grass and shut my eyes as I tried to regain my grasp of reality. The warm sun that beat against my eyelids dimmed, and I opened my eyes to a clear, cloudless sky. A large shadow crossed the ground, similar to the one from yesterday. I checked the sky again, but I could not see what had cast this fast moving shadow.

With my legs thawed, I ran toward the pines where the kid had retreated. But he was gone and I was left wondering if I magically woke up this morning in a different dimension.

The rest of the day blurred past. I didn't focus on anything during my classes. Instead, my brain tried to sort through the nuggets of information presented to me couple of days. I wondered who the flip was Larkin and what were his plans? And who was this person I kept bumping into with magical abilities?

"Cross? Earth to Cross?" Leo waved his hand in front of me, pulling me to the present. "Geez, where are you today?"

"Sorry, I have a lot on my mind with the trip coming up."

The bell rang, announcing the end of the school day. "Here, borrow my notes." Leo handed me his notebook.

"Thanks, man."

"Come on. We'll talk on the way home." Leo decided we needed a stop at the local ice cream parlor. We ordered our ice cream and took a seat at a booth in the corner of the shop.

"Weird things are happening man. I dunno." I shook my head.

"Like what? Stuff besides your parents?" Leo licked a drip as it slid down the cone.

"Like that guy I saw the other day. I saw him again."

"Oh, yeah?" Leo wiped his mouth, "Is he our age? Younger? Older?"

"Younger by a few years. He told me I shouldn't go on the trip and that if I do, Larkin will kill anyone who messes with his plans."

"Who the flip is Larkin?" Leo looked as shocked as I felt.

"Beats me."

He pointed his spoon at me. "Okay, I figured it out. The dude is a loon. Probably off his meds and fixated on you for some reason." He spooned a bite of ice cream into his mouth. "Call the cops next time you see him."

"But how would he know I was about to take a trip?" I rubbed at my forehead, trying to make sense of it all.

"Don't over think it man. Go on the pilgrimage to the frozen wasteland, do whatcha gotta do there, then come home back to your boring life in Midland. You'll stress yourself out wondering and worrying about everything." He took another bite and continued with a mouthful of ice cream. "Seriously, pay no attention to Mr. Few-Fries-Short-of-a-Happy Meal."

"He froze me. Like flat out used some magic shit on me."

Leo stopped working on the bite in his mouth and gulped it down hard.

He probably thought I was the crazy one. "I'm not kidding. I was coming at him outside of school and," I shook my head, "I suddenly couldn't move—foot in mid-air and all."

"Bullshit." He didn't believe me.

"Not kidding."

"Okay, new theory, you're the crazy one." Maybe Leo was right, maybe I was crazy. He drove me home without another word about the strange things going on in my life.

Mom greeted me when I came into the kitchen. “Fend for yourself dinner.” She fixed herself a leftover tuna salad sandwich and sat at the kitchen table. “Your father’s working late tonight.”

“Okay.” I made myself a steaming cup of Chicken and Wild Rice soup. “Can I ask you some questions?” I took my seat across from her.

“Sure.”

“Why do they stay up there, in that village, far from civilization? I mean, if my biological father is in poor health, why wouldn’t someone take him to a hospital?”

She nodded but seemed reluctant to tell the story. “I’m afraid you may not believe me.”

“Try me.”

Chapter 4

Mom told an incredulous tale that a week ago I would have never believed, but after the recent events in my life, especially the ones involving magic, her story didn't seem as far-fetched—well, except the part about me having a twin brother named Torin and being the son of a king. I made her repeat that to be sure I hadn't misheard.

She went on to talk about my parents' forbidden love and the conflict it caused that ended in us being separated from our birth parents and the village being hidden away from the world. It was a lot to take in, and while I asked a few basic questions, I also remained fairly silent as I tried to wrap my brain around this new info.

"I thought you'd be more surprised or disbelieving." She studied me from across the table. Neither of us had had a bite of our food yet. "It's not every day that your mom tells you that you come from royalty and that the village was cursed by a scornful witch."

I nodded. It was a lot to take in and my brain attempted to fit these new puzzle pieces into the others I had. I decided to tell my mom about "Mr. Few-Fries-Short-of-a-Happy Meal," as Leo called him.

She seemed unsettled and shot off a few texts to my dad and Dr. Jonas while I ate my lukewarm soup. "Dr. Jonas thinks it best if you to come straight home from school from now on. No going out without one of us. It's important you adhere to this, Ray. We aren't sure who it is or how they found out about the trip. I mean, if he had wanted to hurt you, he had his chance. You were caught off guard, and he used some form of magic on you. We should feel lucky he only issued a warning."

"Yeah, but the trip is still on. Right?"

She nodded. "We may change when you leave to something last minute to limit the info of your departure getting out. Plus, Jonas and Torin will be with you. I'm not sure Jonas has told Torin about you yet. Probably best to sit on that information till we know for sure."

"I don't get why you kept that a secret from us." I could have at least known my blood brother this whole time.

"Jonas thought it best to keep you both separate. You know, we never knew how long we would be away. We had hoped it would be no longer than a year, but time stretched on without word from the village, and we just did the best we could. I think he still held onto the hope that any day we would return to Yardis, our village. Your father and I gave up trying after Jonas continued to be resistant. Maybe we should have tried harder.”

I wish they would have but saying that wouldn’t change anything now. “How exactly is Dr. Jonas going to protect me from magic?” He was fit, probably in his forties, but what could he do in a fight against someone with freeze-abilities?

“Jonas, your father, and I were the strongest and most able warriors in the village. In fact, we were out on a mission beyond the boundaries when the spell was cast; that’s how we didn’t get trapped in there with everyone else. Jonas also has knowledge of potions, which can counteract some magic. You’ll be safe traveling with him.”

“I don’t want to go. My life is here, not far away. I’m sorry; I know that sounds selfish, but I’m being warned not to go on this trip and the little voice inside of me is telling me to sit my butt down in Michigan and stay put.”

Mom looked at me sympathetically. “You have to go.”

“Why? Why do I have to go?”

“Because your father is dying, and he has asked to see you.” She spoke in an even and controlled voice. “He is our king, and we took an oath to protect you until he summoned you.”

“He’s not my king.”

“Maybe not, but he is your father and you will go with Jonas to meet him because he is a part of who you are.” She reached across the table and took my hand in hers and gave it a squeeze.

I let out a breath, accepting defeat.

That night I barely slept. I tossed and turned as I stewed over the supernatural world begging to pull me into it.

The next morning, Leo studied my face. Concern lined his features. “You look like hell.”

“I’m tired. Couldn’t sleep.”

He snapped a picture of me and showed it to me. The image was haunting. Dark circles lined my already deep-set eyes, and I looked paler than normal. “Shit. I look as bad as I feel.”

“You should’ve stayed home and slept the day away.” Leo pocketed the phone.

“Nah, I can’t miss. The trip will eat up a few days and I don’t want to repeat senior year if I don’t have to. I’ll be fine.” I reassured him.

“Okay, I’ll see you at lunch.” Leo patted my back and headed down the hall.

I knelt down to search my messenger bag for what I needed for math.

“Hi, Ray.” Lauren. I’d know her voice anywhere. I stood and couldn’t help the smile that crossed my face. “Are you okay?” She looked as worried as Leo.

“What? Oh, yeah. I’m tired but okay.” I looked around for her boyfriend as he seemed to shadow her. “What’s up?”

“Derek isn’t here today. I feel I never have a chance to talk to you with him around.” She smiled. “I miss it.”

“I’ve missed it too.” I didn’t want to overstep my bounds. “School going okay for you?”

“It is. Hey, do you wanna grab a coffee sometime and catch up with each other?” She had a hopeful look on her face.

“Sure.” What was I doing?

“Great, how about today after school?” She shrugged as she asked. Was she trying to take advantage of Derek being absent so she wouldn’t have to explain anything to him?

Shit. I should say no and head home like my parents asked, but this was a golden chance to spend time with Lauren without her overbearing shadow. “Yeah, okay. Today works.”

“Great. Meet me at the back doors after school. See ya.” She hurried down the hall, smiling and looking happier than she had in a long time. Somehow accepting the invitation felt worse than poking the hornet’s nest known as Derek with a stick. This felt like taking that nest, shaking the shit out of it, and then slamming it to the ground to stomp on it. Derek would find out, and then there would be hell to pay.

Coffee with Lauren had turned into one of the best afternoons I’d had in a long time. The conversation flowed as if no time had passed between our friendship.

“Are you happy with him?” I asked.

She took a moment before answering. “Most days I am. He’s good to me, but his insecurity makes him keep me close.”

“And shuts you off from the rest of the world,” I added.

“Not the rest of the world, just you. He’s threatened by you, Ray. I think he’s jealous of how close we were.”

I hadn’t expected that. I had presumed Derek was just an ass and a control freak, simple as that. But now that she mentioned it, I had seen Lauren hang out with a few friends.

“And here we are. What do you think he’d say knowing we were having coffee together?” Would she tell him or keep this secret?

“I’m sure he’d be upset, but he’d just have to get over it.” She sat a little straighter and tilted her chin up in a defiant way making her look even more adorable that she already did.

“Well I’m glad we did this. I missed us.”

“Me too.” She smiled. I had never stopped loving Lauren or hoping that one day we would find our way back to each other. “Come on, I’ll drive you home.”

We paid the bill and Lauren excused herself to the bathroom.

“I can see it in your face.” The strange teen leaned against a nearby booth behind me. “You have every intention of going to Yardis. Why?” He pushed off and took the seat across from me.

“Who are you?”

He gave a half smile, then looked away. “No good will come of it. Stay away.” He stood and left the store.

“Who was that?” Lauren slid back into the booth.

“Just some guy I met a few days ago.” I didn’t feel like getting into the lengthy story with her. “Come on, I gotta get home.” I had already broken the rule of coming straight home and it landed me a visit from the guy I was trying to avoid. I considered texting my parents to tell them about the encounter but decided since I was safe, I’d wait and enjoy the last bit of my time with Lauren before facing their angry or concerned words.

Lauren pulled up to my house, and I noticed Dr. Jonas’s car parked in my driveway.

Worry took center stage as I wondered why he was here sooner than he had planned. Had something happened? Were we leaving early for the trip up north? How long would we be gone? All of these thoughts cycled through my head. Dr. Jonas had cargo tied to the top which led me to believe the trip was happening today.

I caught Lauren studying me. Her face morphed from curious to concerned, and to be honest, her expressions reflected what I felt inside.

“Ray, what is it?” She set her hand on my shoulder and rubbed it gently. Her familiar touch soothed me.

“I have to go away for a while.” I took her hand in mine. “I’m glad we went out today. It felt like old times. It’s been awhile since I’ve felt this happy.”

She smiled and my heart melted. “Me too. I forgot how easy it is to be around you. You’ll always have a piece of my heart.” She squeezed my hand. “When will you be back?”

“I don’t know. We’re going up to Northern Canada. I’m hoping I’ll be back right after spring break, but I honestly don’t know how long this will take.” I looked at Lauren and wondered how this trip would affect our relationship. Would my time away help or hurt our chances of being something more besides friends?

“But you are coming back?” Her focus shifted between me and my house.

I didn’t know the answer to that, so I said nothing.

“Ray?” She waited for me to look at her. “Why did you never ask me out?” Why did she care about this now?

Screw it. I was leaving, and there was a chance I might not return. What did I have to lose? What risk was there in telling her how I felt? “I didn’t ask you out because, as much as I loved you, I didn’t want to risk our friendship. It was the one good thing, my life preserver, that I had during the crappy rough waters of middle school. I didn’t think I could survive without it.” I couldn’t look at her. “It was selfish and safe, but I chose to have you as a friend rather than lose you all together.”

She scoffed, “So I ended up with Derek, who has shut you and I out of each other’s lives.” I still couldn’t look at her but I could tell she was shaking her head. “Your plan backfired, Ray. To get the things you want in this life, you need to step out of your comfort zone and take risks. I know the vEDS makes you extra careful about things, but you can't live your life treading water. That's not much of a life. Take the risk and see where it takes you. Good or bad, at least you'll be moving forward and living this life you've been given to the fullest."

I had closed my eyes as I listened to her honest thoughts. She had always been the one who reminded me to stop worrying and enjoy the adventure before me. She had reminded me to live.

She squeezed my hand, "Ray look at me."

I opened my eyes and turned to face her, but found myself kissing Lauren. While I'd been lost in her words, Lauren had moved closer and caught me in a kiss. It took a moment for the initial shock to die off and let my hormones kick in. Her lips were soft and velvety, dancing gently over mine until I could no longer feel them. I opened my eyes, missing her lips already. Lauren sat before me, blushing. "I've been waiting five years to kiss you, Ray Cross. That is how you take risks!"

My head was muddled and the words for this moment had hidden themselves away, deep in the recesses of my mind. I settled on, "If I was nice, I'd care about Derek and how this affects him, but I don't really give a shit. Right now all I wanna do is kiss you again." I leaned over and pulled her closer for a longer but less nervous kiss.

As she sat back, I noticed her cheeks had flushed. "I'll figure Derek out. Good luck on your trip, Ray. Come back to me." We pecked one more time, before I exited the car.

I watched Lauren drive off before heading inside. "Let's go and get this over with," I told myself.

My parents came out of the kitchen, followed by Dr. Jonas and another high school-aged kid. He had a good two inches on Dr. Jonas and was built like a footballer.

"Raynar, this is Torin, my dependent and your twin brother." Dr. Jonas clapped his hand on the tall teen's back. "Please pack your essentials into a duffle bag. Your mother already has your medications and medical supplies ready."

"Hey." I nodded at Torin. He returned the nod but said nothing more. "Nice to meet you. I've never seen you around Midland High School."

"I don't go there. I homeschool with private teachers," he answered.

"Ahh." I turned to Dr. Jonas. "Why are we leaving today? It hasn't been a week since you came by."

"Lysa and Jaron told me your encounter with a magic user. We decided it was best to make the trip now in case our initial plans had leaked to an outside party. We want to avoid any ambushes set to deter us from our course." I wondered if Dr. Jonas knew that kid had visited me today.

"Okay, give me a moment and I'll collect my things." I headed to my room and began shoving things into a bag. Besides clothes and toiletries, I packed a journal and one of my favorite books that seemed fitting for this trip, The Hobbit. A duffle bag didn't hold much. I took a final look around my room, hoping I'd return soon to my life in Michigan.

"I'm ready." I walked into the living room and tossed down my bag.

"Ray, we'll call the cellphone company and see if we need to do something to get you some service up there. You might want to power down your cell in case it's awhile before you stop and can charge it," my dad suggested.

Mom grabbed something from the entertainment center and approached. "This is for your father, King Vintras. It's a photo book showing you as you've grown throughout the years." She handed me a book wrapped in a sheer cloth, tied with a string. "And this is for you." She opened her right palm revealing a gold necklace with a rectangular medallion with an ornate symbol that looked like the fletching of an arrow carved into it. Both my parents wore this charm. "It's your father's. It is the Web of Wyrd, a powerful symbol that represents all parts of life—past, present, and future—being interconnected and influencing each other. The Guardians of our village wore them—they are spelled to hold three memories. Here, try it." I had assumed the necklaces were nothing more than a symbol of my parents' love for each other. She urged me to bow my head down making it easier for her to clasp the necklace around my neck. The medallion felt lighter than it looked. "Now, hold the pendant in your hand and say 'Vennex'."

I held it and repeated the strange word Mom had said. And for a brief moment, I saw Mom, Dad, and myself playing like a GIF on the computer screen. I was learning how to ride a bike, only I saw it through my dad's eyes. My parents high-fived and cheered as a young me wobbled about on a bike. I felt the sting of the slap, smelled the hot pavements. I sensed Mom's worry like I'd never felt it, and Dad's pride swelled in my chest. Tears pricked my eyes, and I quickly wiped them away, disguising how I felt by looking at Dad and saying, "You were totally crying there. This is just your memory."

Dad stepped toward me and pulled me into a hug. "Yup. I was. But I wanted to remind you that sometimes all you need is a little confidence and a gentle push." He pulled back and ruffled my hair. "You'll be fine with Jonas. Come back to us soon. Love you, kid." "Love you too Dad."

Mom's fingers played with an identical medallion hung around her neck. "You can load two more memories in it. Hold the medallion and think of the memory you want to store in your mind. Think about the emotions, the sounds, smells, all the things that pull you back into that moment. Then say, 'Virale'. It also will allow you to speak and translate any language."

"Thank you." I kissed her cheek. "We have to go." Dr. Jonas urged.

Mom wrapped me in a hug. I could feel my shirt dampening from her tears where she cuddled into my chest. "I love you. Stay safe." She placed a gentle kiss on my lips, then she turned toward Dr. Jonas, "Jonas, please be safe."

He nodded his answer and lead the way out to the car. My dad wrapped me in a tight hug and said his farewells. Torin, who had claimed the front seat, glared at me through the windshield as I rounded the car. I didn't know him, but the vibe he gave off was less than welcome. Was Torin and Dr. Jonas as close as I was to my parents? Even though they weren't my biological parents, they had raised me with love and care and I never once doubted their affections for me.

Chapter 5

We rode in silence, only the sounds of the wheels turning on the rough pavement and the wind rushing past filled the car. Dr. Jonas drove us over the Mackinac bridge to a town in Canada called, Sault Ste. Marie. He nearly hit a pedestrian when a self-driving Google car pulled up beside him. Torin and I shared a laugh when Dr. Jonas confessed he had never heard of such a thing and first thought it was a ghost piloting the vehicle.

My parents had insisted I keep my passport active, though I had never understood why since we had never travelled outside of the U.S.. But now the reason was clear: a passport was needed to cross from Michigan into Canada, where the village of Yardis was located.

Dr. Jonas parked in the empty lot behind a small Italian café. “We’ll grab a bite before starting off again.”

I powered on my phone and listened to the cacophony of alerts anxiously awaiting my attention. Beeps and buzzes sounded for almost a minute. Torin and Dr. Jonas stopped dead in their tracks and turned toward me with baffled looks on their faces.

“Sorry.” I shrugged and continued past them into the restaurant, scrolling through my notifications. I had several comments on Instagram and a few on Facebook. I had a text from Mom that said she loved me and several from Leo.

Leo: How’d the date, I mean coffee, go with Lauren?

Leo: ????

Leo: This place is so friggin’ quiet. Dad’s workin’ late tonight. Where u at, bro?

Leo: Tried callin’ you. Where you?

Leo: Ray????????????????????????????

I saw I had missed three phone calls from him and there was a voicemail. Before checking it, I shot off a text.

Me: Leo, I’m on that trip with Dr. Jonas and my twin. Had to leave earlier than planned. We’re up in some Canada town called Sault Ste. Marie. Torin is like a Bizarro version of me. Reminds me of Derek. Hopefully trip won’t suck.

Finally, a waitress greeted us and directed us to a table along the wall. The table had a red and white checked cloth, paper napkins, and hard plastic water cups. “Here’s the menu. I’ll be back to take your order after I finish up with them.” She nodded toward a large party at the front of the restaurant. Besides them, there were only a couple of tables occupied.

My phone dinged.

Leo: YOU'RE ALIVE!!! Thought maybe you fell off the face of the Earth. When will you be home?

Me: IDK

Leo: I'm guessing no cell service where you are headed.

Me: Probably not—my parents said they are calling cell company to see about service but idk

Dr. Jonas and Torin ordered their drinks, and the waitress waited patiently for me.

Me: Gotta go, text you when I can.

Leo: Stay safe.

I powered off my phone and apologized to the waitress. “Sprite please.” I looked over the menu and when she returned with our drinks, we placed our orders. Torin and the doctor did not say much to each other, and I wondered if they were always this quiet or if they had a disagreement. “Dr. Jonas—”

“Please, call me Jonas from here on out. That’s what everyone where we are going calls me,” he corrected.

“Jonas...so you took Torin as your son?” I wanted to test Jonas and see his reaction, maybe get an idea of how things were between him and my twin brother.

“I am Torin’s Guardian, not his father.”

Torin shifted uncomfortably in his chair at Jonas’ words. I imagined my own father’s answer to that question and knew he’d proudly say he was my father, even if biologically he wasn’t. Torin stared off in the distance, his face emotionless, despite a growing tension I could feel between him and Jonas.

“When I became Torin’s Guardian, I had no idea how long we would be away. The barrier spell was impossible to break. I anticipated a year, but as time ticked on without word from the village, I had to start making a life in Michigan as I continued researching ways to bring the spell down.”

“That must have been hard, moving far from what you know, trying to start a new life.” My own parents, or Guardians, at least had each other during that time.

Jonas cleared his throat. “The first year with a young baby was difficult. By the second year, I put Torin in daycare and pursued my medical degree—things got better. I think we needed that time apart.”

Torin pushed his chair out and walked over to the old jukebox near the door.

“I homeschooled him to give him the best education I could. He did well; he’s a smart boy. As he got older I started combat training and hunting with him. I knew one day we’d return to Yardis and it would be important for him to have those skills. I wanted him to be ready for whatever future was expected of him, and I think he is.”

I looked over at Torin, who was glaring at Jonas. Our upbringings were completely different. “So even though we're twins, he doesn't have vEDS. I mean, he doesn't look like he has it and I'm not sure he'd still be alive after combat training..."

"No Raynar, Torin does not have vEDS. Yours was a random mutation, a true anomaly." As much as I would never wish this disorder on anyone, including Derek Mavers, I also hoped to meet another that faced its challenges. The internet groups helped me not feel alone, but there is something to be said about meeting someone just like you in person. A heavy guitar filled the restaurant, and Torin returned to his chair without a word. Perhaps it was the vEDS that made my parents raise me different than how Jonas raised Torin. Maybe my fragile state steered them far from combat training and survival skills and instead, had them guiding me gently toward doing my best in their loving care. Whatever the reason, it made me thankful for being paired with my parents instead of Dr. Jonas. They were not my biological parents, but they'd always loved me as though I were their own.

The waitress returned with our plates of pasta and bread and asked if anyone wanted refills.

I still didn't know if Torin knew we were twins. "What about your mom?"

Torin looked up at me as he swallowed a piece of bread. "What about her?" He stared me down with an annoyed glare. Rather than push my luck, I shut up and ate a bite of spaghetti. "I never knew her," he said.

Jonas said nothing but continued eating.

"I'm sorry you never knew her. I couldn't imagine life without my mom. She's made my hard days easier."

"This is bullshit." Torin threw down his napkin and pushed off from the table. "You never knew your mom—at least your real mom! I'm over the happy little family reunion. I need some air." Torin stormed out of the diner.

Jonas pushed his food around on his plate, giving it far more attention than it deserved.

"What aren't you telling me?"

He didn't answer.

"I know there is more to this and I haven't figured it out yet."

The bell above the cafe door dinged and I turned, thinking Torin would come rejoin us, but instead I froze when I saw that mysterious kid I'd bumped into back home. What was he doing here? He hurried toward the restrooms.

"Do you know him?" Jonas asked as he followed my eyes as they stared after the teen.

"No, I—" I never got to finish my sentence. A muffled argument that grew louder drew Jonas's attention. He stood and hurried outside. I followed.

Torin and another teen I had never seen before yelled back and forth. Jonas approached them with his arms out in an attempt to calm the situation and figure out what was happening. "Hey, hey! What's going on?"

The café bell rang and out came the Few-Fries-Short Guy. He looked at me, and by his expression, he was caught off guard. The yelling from Torin and the other kid pulled his attention away and he ran over to the argument.

“Ren! Let it go. Not here, not now.” Few-Fries-Short urged as he pulled at the other teen arguing with Torin. Torin towered over the kid; he was smart to urge the other kid to back off.

“Lay off!” Ren shouted back. “We tried it your way, Fenick. It didn’t work.” Ren snapped his fingers, causing a spark that quickly formed an arc of flame directed toward the side of the building.

BOOM! The ground shook and a huge fire blasted skyward.

“No!” Jonas ran to the side of the building where the explosion had originated. Torin punched Ren in the jaw causing him to stumble backward.

“Let’s go!” Fenick pulled Ren away from the fight he seemed eager to continue. Ren fought Fenick but finally gave in and ran away with him.

Torin and I caught up with Jonas. He helplessly stared at the fireball that was once his car. The extra gas filled canisters Jonas had packed for the remote parts of the trip fueled the huge inferno. All our supplies and personal items were gone.

“Your meds are in my bag.” Jonas patted the black backpack on his shoulder. “But the rest of your stuff was in the vehicle.” He shook his head.

Torin came up next to us and cleared his throat. “They’re gone.” I wasn’t surprised to hear this as Fenick seemed to evaporate into thin air each time I had encountered him.

Jonas spun and shoved Torin. “What did you do? Huh? Who the hell was that guy and what did you say to piss him off?”

Torin pulled away defensively, “Look, I don’t know who that was. He went on about wanting us to turn around and leave well enough alone. I told him to mind his own business, but the hot head wouldn’t let it go. How was I supposed to know he’d do this?” Torin motioned to the blaze.

“I knew the other one, or at least I’d seen him before,” I said.

Jonas and Torin turned and faced me.

“He said the same thing, that we should not be heading back to Yardis. Maybe it’s a trap.”

“Nonsense. They are just two punk kids causing trouble. Probably trying to scare you off.” Jonas concluded.

“Two punks with mystical talent,” Torin muttered, earning him a cross look from Jonas but a “you’re not wrong” look from me. Why was Jonas downplaying this? Torin and I exchanged frustrated glances.

Jonas pulled out his billfold and handed a few bills to Torin. “Head in and pay the bill. I’ll...deal with this, then we’ll settle in for the night at that inn over there,” he nodded down the street, “and start off in the morning.”

“What about our stuff?” Torin asked.

“It’s replaceable. We’ll get new supplies at the local shops before we head off again. We’ll have to find another way to Yardis though.” Jonas ran his hands through his hair in frustration.

“What should I do?” I asked.

“Keep a look out for those two troublemakers. They owe me a new car and an apology.” Jonas pulled out his phone and dialed 911. The few people outside of the café had come to watch the blaze at a safe distance. Thankfully, no other cars were parked out back.

I turned on my phone, snapped a shot of the blaze, and sent it to Leo.

Me: Lost our ride.

It took a moment for him to respond.

Leo: WTF! Well it’s not a party till you torch the car. What happened? You okay?

Me: Yeah, I’m fine. My stuff is gone—nothing big, except some pics and my novel.

Leo: What happened?

Me: Too complicated to text. Promise to tell you when I get home.

Leo: K. That mean you’re headed home now?

Me: I don’t think so. Spending the night in this town, then heading off, somehow, tomorrow.

Leo: K, stay safe and go roast some marshmallows! Make the most of the moment. Lol!

Me: Ha! Nice. Bye.

Chapter 6

The night at the Inn was uneventful. I phoned home and told my parents about the explosion. They were concerned, but I reassured them everyone was okay. Jonas called for a morning charter flight to some place north of here named Fort Albany. He and Torin shared a bed and let me have the other one to myself. We stayed up watching latenight TV until Jonas turned it off and reminded us of a heavy travel day tomorrow. The red neon Inn sign, glowed bright through the thin curtains.

“Hey Torin? Know why they just call this place Inn?” I asked.

“Because they couldn’t afford more letters for the sign.” We both burst out laughing at his answer.

“Alright you two, go to bed.” Jonas ordered before rolling over and going to sleep.

In the morning, I awoke to the sound of hushed voices. I stayed still, and peered through my eyelashes at Jonas talking at Torin. I couldn’t make out what he said, but I didn’t miss Torin say “I’ll do my best. I understand the importance.”

Jonas shook his head in frustration. “You’ll do your best,” he mocked. “This is not a time to try; this is the time to succeed. Whatever it takes.”

Torin clenched his fist at his side then stormed out of the hotel room. I stirred in bed, letting Jonas know I was awake. He went about getting ready without addressing me.

Once Torin returned a half hour later, we headed further into town to get essentials for the rest of our travels. We downsized to backpacks as the store didn’t have any duffel bags. It didn’t matter; I had no intention on staying any longer than I had to. My Little Debbie Oatmeal Crème Pies were replaced with Jos Louis snack cakes. Unfortunately, Duncan Dop’s Shop did not have a copy of The Hobbit to replace mine, so I settled for a Choose Your Own Adventure book, figuring it was a novice read but better than the trashy romance novels they stocked. Jonas paid the bill, and at some point, he must have called for a cab, because we walked out of the store to find a yellow cab parked at the curb.

The ride to the airport wasn’t long, though Jonas grumbled in his front seat about having to change our flight plans. And that we had to cross back into Michigan to get a different plane to our next destination, Fort Albany. I Googled Fort Albany, Their web page was terribly out of date. I zoomed in on a black and white photo of a bunch of kids in old fashioned clothes. The photo reminded me of the kids in that Our Gang DVD mom had borrowed from the library. I showed the picture to Torin.

He looked closer at it. "Who are those people?"

"Kids from Fort Albany."

His eyebrows shot up in surprise. He scrolled up. "First Nation Communities" he read the banner at the top.

"Hey Jonas, how remote is this village?" I asked.

"Pretty remote."

The nervousness that I often battled sent my heart beating faster and made my breathing quicken. As much as I was up for an adventure, the worry of being so far from a qualified hospital petrified me.

"Hey man, it's gonna be okay." Torin said quietly so Jonas wouldn't hear. "Don't worry." I wondered if it was a twin thing, him sensing my unease, or was it that obvious this bothered me?

At the airport, we made our way to the charter planes where Jonas chatted with a guy a moment before telling us to follow him. We boarded the plane which was small but luxurious. Two white leather chairs faced each other and a white leather couch faced the two chairs. Torin claimed the couch and stretched his large frame across it. "You know you'll have to sit up and buckle in at take off," Jonas reminded him.

"I will. Hey, Cross, if you need to tag off and lay down for part of the trip, let me know," Torin offered as he folded his arms behind his head.

"Thanks, I'll let you know." I had been wrong; Torin was nothing like Derek Mavericks. He may have started out cold but the more I got to know him, the more I could see he actually cared about others. "This is impressive. I've never flown before, but if it's always this nice, I'll have to insist on doing it more."

"Ha," Jonas chuckled. "Even I don't travel this fancy. This was the only chartered flight willing to go to Fort Albany. It cost a pretty penny, but we gotta get there."

Our flight was a little over six hours and while the takeoff was terrifying, the ease and speed made it my new favorite way to get around. Torin and I swapped seats and took turns napping on the couch. We offered it to Jonas as well, but he said he was comfortable resting in the fancy leather chairs. The landing was a little rough, but we had made it there safely. Jonas thanked the pilot who had radioed ahead and asked for a driver to help get us further along the path.

"You the fellows that needed a lift?" A middle-aged man called to us from a black sedan.

We approached the car and Jonas asked the driver to take us to the nearest place to stay. It was a long day of traveling, and Jonas thought our hike would be more manageable after we rested. The driver pulled up to a convenience store and advised us to grab some soups, snacks, and drinks as there weren't any nearby restaurants. Torin and I waited with the driver while Jonas did a quick shopping trip. We then continued on to a lodge. The place was medium sized and probably housed twenty or so rooms. The décor was generic at best. White walls, wood doors, basic furniture, nothing fancy or ornate. But it was clean and it had a kitchen for us to heat up our food and a shower to get clean.

We each had our own bed. I crashed early and slept like the dead. In the morning, Jonas made us oatmeal and told us we had half an hour to pack up. We packed our gear and snacks and checked out. The car from yesterday was parked out front waiting for us. Jonas walked up to the window and passed him a small piece of paper. “Good morning. Take us here, please.”

The man typed in something from the paper on his phone, then shook his head. “Your information is wrong. There is nothing out there. This is over thirty miles north west of here, in the middle of nowhere” He held the phone out to Jonas. “See? No roads lead to it. Perhaps you’ve made a mistake on the coordinates.”

“It is not a mistake. Take us as close as you can, please.” Jonas insisted as he climbed into the passenger’s seat.

Forty minutes later, the driver pulled to the side of the road. “This is the closest I can get you.”

Jonas leaned forward and studied the dash-mounted cellphone. “But it looks like the road continues another mile or two ahead. If you take us—“

“No. This is as far as I am permitted.” The driver interrupted. “The treaty forbids me to enter their land.

“The Swampy Cree Treaty?” Jonas asked.

“You know of it?” The driver turned and looked at Jonas suspiciously.

“I’ve heard of it. I thought it was just a legend.” Jonas played it cool, and the driver bought his act.

“No, it’s a real thing. When the Yardinians first came many moons ago, they were wild and hungry for a life of their own. They had no king and no way to enforce any rules so they took what they wanted and did as they pleased. Finally, my people had enough and fought hard to drive them out. We pushed them to the confines of the Great Oaks and the treaty was born. They were to elect a king and respect the boundaries, and we were to leave them to their region and not interfere unless the treaty was broken. My people believed they would only survive another winter or two but somehow they’ve made it much longer than that.” The driver explained.

“The Yardinians still exist?” Jonas asked, even though he knew the answer.

“They do, though, come to think of it, it has been many years since I have come across one. Of course, it’s been awhile since I’ve been up in those parts. The Missus found us a place south of here so I only come up to this area to help with transportation from time to time. I used to run into them at the Trading Post near the Gylos Settlement. If you don’t mind me asking, what brings you to these parts?”

“Just visiting.” He turned to Torin and I. “Grab your packs.” He handed some folded bills to the driver and thanked him. Once we exited the car, Jonas hurried over to the driver side window and knocked on it. The driver rolled down the window. Jonas opened his palm and blew gently. A purplish dust invaded the driver's air, causing him to slump back into his seat. Jonas wiped his hand on a cloth and shoved it into his pocket and returned to lead us. "Let's go."

Shit! Did he kill the driver? "What did you do to him?"

"He's sleeping. When he awakens, he won't remember meeting us or how he got here." He said as he headed toward the forest with Torin close behind him.

I found myself stuck next to the taxi, worried for the driver.

"Raynar, let's go! He will be fine. If he wakes and sees us, I'll be forced to use something stronger that could kill him. You wouldn't want that, would you?" Jonas threatened.

No I wouldn't.

I looked back at the cabbie. He appeared to be peacefully sleeping, his chest rising and falling with each breath. I hurried over to Torin and Jonas. "I'm not used to this mystical stuff. Thought you might've killed him."

Jonas laughed. "I'm a doctor Raynar; It's my job to help people, not kill them."

"Dr. Kevorkian was a doctor," I muttered.

"Dr. Who?" Jonas asked. Torin chuckled, apparently having heard about the assisted suicide doctor or laughing at the nod to the epic sci fi TV show.

"Nevermind." I didn't bother explaining the reference as I followed him to God knows where.

Chapter 7

Torin and Jonas strode ahead easily, hacking away to clear the way. I had a harder time and they had to repeatedly stop and wait for me. The uneven ground, dotted with rocks and large tree roots, proved to be taxing on my body. And I soon realized the Swampy Cree Treaty must refer to this area as at least half of it was wet and swampy.

“No wonder there aren’t any roads up here.” Torin stopped and sat on a log as he waited for me to catch up while Jonas scouted ahead. “They’d have to bring in all kinds of dirt and materials to build up the ground. It’s so wet and mucky in these parts.” The bottom of his jeans were soaked. “Almost there Cross. It’s less deep on the left.”

“Thanks. I’ll only say this once because it needs to be said. This friggin’ sucks.” I stepped down into the wet and muddy terrain and nearly lost my footing.

Torin chuckled. “I’ve been on worse treks, but yeah, that wet shit is more than I signed up for.”

My entire lower half hurt, including my toes. My muscles had never worked this hard before. I had to keep my balance, turn left, climb, and crouch, and the worst was the “wet shit,” as Torin had put it, that made my legs feel like I had twenty pound weights attached at the ankles. My poor legs didn’t want to take another step and I worked hard to will them into action. Each time I stopped, I lifted my pants legs to check the bruises on my legs. They were darkening; I knew I’d be out of commission for a few days once we got to this village. My body was not made for this type of activity. It also didn’t help that years of playing it safe left me with weaker muscles. I was overall less fit than most males my age. But Torin and Jonas waited patiently, never once complaining about my frequent stops.

Focusing on my surroundings instead of my pain seemed to help. Thousands of evergreens of various types stretched as far as I could see. Small pockets of snow had collected on the branches, shielding the ground from the recent snowfall as there was only a minimal accumulation where we walked. I noticed the sun had past the midpoint of the sky and continued its slow descent, making me estimate it was early afternoon. The air here was fresher and colder than Midland.

After a few hours, the forest gave way to a large clearing where a small wood building sat at the edge of the tree line.

“It’s still here.” Jonas turned to me with a smile on his face. His expression quickly changed to concern when he saw me. "I'll fix you up inside."

I nodded, glad we'd made it to this shack as I wasn't sure I could go much farther.

"Think anyone is in there?" Torin asked.

"I hope, but the only way to know is to go and find out." Jonas started toward the building.

The grassy clearing was even ground, but those last steps felt harder than any of the others I had previously taken. I made it to the weathered wood steps, sat down, and removed my shoes. I let out a big breath, enjoying the freedom from the confines of my sneakers.

Jonas peeked through the window and tried the door, which opened with ease. He and Torin entered, but I remained in place, not sure I could move unless I absolutely had to.

"Can I help you?" A male voice asked from within the building. The three chatted, but I couldn't make out the conversation specifics. Honestly, I didn't care about the specifics, as I didn't have much say in things. The conversation seemed light and friendly. I leaned back and relished in the warm sun soaking into my pores. The temperature in the clearing had to be at least fifteen degrees warmer than the wooded areas. I propped my feet up on my backpack to help give my blood vessels and heart a moment of peace. If they weren't throbbing with pain, I'd probably have fallen asleep. Not a cloud in the sky existed to disrupt the warm blanket the sun provided me.

But a moment later, a shadow crossed my eyelids and my warmth disappeared. I opened my eyes to see a large flying beast bat its wings and fly over the shack.

"What the...?" I couldn't see it anymore. I was curious and scared as hell at the same time. I got to my feet and hurried to the back, not bothering with putting on my shoes. I rounded the corner of the shack, but saw no beast, only the guy named Ren who had destroyed our ride a few days ago. Crap! Torin and Jonas were in the building and they were bound to cross paths with Ren. Another large shadow crossed the ground and I looked up in time to see a large scaled beast that resembled a dragon land in the woods behind the house and exit as a human. As he neared, I could see it was Fenick, the guy who had frozen me in place. This was too unbelievable for words.

Torin and Jonas...

I hurried to the front of the building where Torin, Jonas, and a tall teen with shaggy brown hair stood at the top of the stairs looking around.

"Torin! Jonas!" Their heads snapped my way. "We need to leave."

"Raynar, this is Poe." Jonas motioned to the new guy. "He's a healer. We need to look at your injuries."

"I'm okay. We really need to go." I urged as I sat and began putting my shoes back on. "Let's go." Only no one followed me down the stairs.

"Raynar. Come here." Jonas commanded. "Let Poe have a look."

The door opened behind him, and Ren came out onto the front porch. "Poe, we're back. Fenick and I..." He stopped when he recognized us and his expression turned from pleasant to feral.

Poe placed his hands on Ren's chest. "Backup Ren. These are guests and he's hurt." Poe's voice held authority.

Ren let out a snarl but stepped back against the shop door, hands clenched at his side in restraint.

“Please, come in so I can check it out.” Poe kept his hand against Ren’s chest and motioned with his head for us to enter the shop. Jonas went in first. Torin followed. My eyes were trained on Ren, who had pushed Poe’s hand off of him and ran off into the green landscape. A moment later, a large reddish dragon, the size of an SUV, emerged from the foliage. Its wings, which extended a good fifteen to twenty feet on each side of it, beat hard, helping the beast arc high in the air before it circled back and sped straight for us.

“Duck!” Poe yelled out as the dragon opened its mouth blasting a fiery blaze in our direction. Thankfully no one got burned, but the heat from the blaze had been intense.

“Ren’s in a mood” Fenick appeared in the doorway next to Poe.

“When isn’t he?” Poe answered before stepping forward to yell after the dragon. “Cool off, Ren, and be back by nightfall. And don’t you dare burn down the shop!” The dragon flew out of sight.

I grabbed my pack and followed Fenick into the building with Poe closing the door behind us. Poe walked me over to a padded table in a back room and asked me to sit on it. “Sorry—no one else in the room. It messes with the energy.” He shut the door, closing him and I off from the others. I couldn’t help feeling like a lamb being lead to the slaughter, yet I didn’t feel alarmed. In fact, I felt completely calm and relaxed.

“Let’s try this again.” He extended his hand to me. “Hi. I’m Poe.”

“Ray.” I took his hand and shook it.

“Ray. Let’s put the bullshit aside and cut to the chase. I can heal you, but I need to see your injuries.”

I pulled off my dirty socks and hiked up my pants so he could see my lower legs.

He returned with a wet wash rag and cleaned the dirt from my skin. He winced as he took in the damage to my legs and feet. “Shit. Did you fall or something? You’re pretty bruised up, and then there is this thing on your ankle.” He pointed to a hematoma on my outer ankle bone.

“No. I didn’t fall. I have a condition that makes everything in me fragile, blood vessels included.” I took in the rainbow of colors smattered across my skin and the bubble of blood the size of half dollar that grew in the same spot as my previous ones, only this one was far bigger. This was the worst my legs had ever looked.

A few years back, my parents had taken me to a hematologist to ask about the recurrent hematomas. The doc hadn’t seemed concerned and had said they were inevitable with my fragile vessels. He had recommended rest and elevation to help them go down.

“Lucky you.” Poe scratched at his head. “But I can fix this.” He walked over to a cabinet and took out some supplies and set various bottles and wraps on a nearby table. “So what’s the deal with you guys and Ren? You know each other?”

“We ran into him and Fenick in Sault Ste. Marie. He torched our ride.”

Poe shook his head. “Shit. He’s a hot head. Fenick and I spend a lot of time picking up his messy pieces. He’s impulsive and annoying, but he’s not all bad.”

“Could’ve fooled me.” My skin warmed. Poe’s hands, which seemed to be glowing with a white light, enveloped my legs. He rubbed gently at the lower half of my leg as the intensity of the light and heat fluctuated. I sucked in a breath to help with the pain.

Poe looked up at me for a moment, the light dimmed with his distraction. “Sorry, almost done. Think you can you push through?”

I nodded, and he returned his focus to my legs. As the heat intensified, I joked, “I didn’t know you’d be cooking my legs for dinner.”

Poe laughed at the joke and then it stopped. My legs and feet tingled as if both had been put to sleep. “Is that it?” I looked down and saw my skin had a strange appearance to it, almost like a snake shedding its skin.

“I need to wrap them. But this is a good sign. Many blister from the treatment but this dead skin... that’s not typical. We don’t see this until the next day at the earliest. But I’m gonna wrap them anyway with this ointment to prevent infection.” He wrapped my legs in a wet gauze that had a woody smell to it. I looked like a mummy, but Poe pulled my pant legs down to cover most of the bandaging. “You can move around if you gotta, but try to sit with your legs up as much as possible.” He looked up at me and saw the question on the tip of my tongue. “You guys need to stay till tomorrow. We have plenty of beds on the top level.” He took the dirty towel to the sink. “I’m sorry about your ride and my brother’s temper. Ren will be back by nightfall, but you won’t have to worry about him while in the shop.”

“Why is that?”

“This shop or some call it, a healing outpost, was built long ago by a member of a nearby peaceful tribe called the Gylos. The Gylos healed others and stayed clear of the wars around them. The Gylos wanted to put good energy back into the world so they provided healing, magic, and tinctures to anyone in need.” He walked over and pushed against a large wooden vertical beam. “This shop was crafted and spelled to foster peace within it and protect those who sought shelter. Once you stepped off the front porch, the gloves came off and fights resumed. But as long as you touched a part of the spelled structure you were safe from enemies. People from all around would come here for healing and to trade for special goods they couldn’t readily find in their region.”

“Are you part of that Gylos tribe?”

Poe turned toward me. “Half. My father was Gylos; my mother was not. But now I’m all that’s left of the Gylos.”

“What happened to them?”

“They were massacred.” Poe showed no emotion despite the strong words he spoke as he opened the doors, revealing Torin and Jonas reclined back in chairs with their feet propped on a nearby table.

“Hope you don’t mind. We helped ourselves to some tea.” Jonas held up his mug.

“Not at all. You guys are stayin’ the night. My tinctures need some time to work on Raynar’s legs.” Poe walked over to a refrigerator near the back of the store.

Fenick came out of a back room, whistling while tossing and catching an apple. “Hey Fen, gimme a hand with these sandwiches. They’re stayin’ the night, and we’ll help them get off in the morning.”

Fenick’s face dropped at the news and he ceased tossing the apple. “But I thought...”

Poe shook his head slightly, but enough that I saw it. “Here’s the bread and meat. One for each of us please.”

Fenick said nothing more and got busy constructing sandwiches. I joined Torin and Jonas in a chair and propped up my feet.

“How are they doin’?” Jonas sat forward and touched the bandaging.

“Okay. They stopped hurting after he did the light ray thing to me.”

Jonas nodded and sat back.

“What did he do to you?” Torin questioned.

“He zapped my legs with this bright light. It felt like an intense sunburn. Then he wrapped them and told me to elevate them when I can.”

Torin’s eyebrows shot up. “Did it work?”

“He said it looks good, but we’d know more in the morning.”

Torin shook his head, though it surprised me that this seemed unreal to him. Surely, he’d seen or heard of strange healing practices with Jonas being his Guardian but then again Torin and Jonas had a different relationship than I had with my parents. “I gotta get some air.” Torin pushed off and headed out the front doors as Jonas and Fenick brought over a tray of food and drinks.

“Is he not hungry?” Poe glanced to the door where Torin exited.

“Just keep one aside for him. He won’t be gone long.” Jonas put a sandwich and some chips on his plate, then sat back. “How’d you get chips up here?”

“Dragon power.” Poe laughed. “What? It’s true. We make a trip to some of the nearby towns and trade tinctures and medicines for odds and ends every few months. Helps to have dragon shifters for brothers.” Poe smiled at Jonas. “Fenick traded for a bunch of chips last time. At first I was mad, but the customers we’ve had all bought a few bags.” Poe popped one in his mouth.

“Does Malon still come around here?” Jonas asked.

Poe grabbed a soda and took a sip, “He died a few weeks ago, they all died.”

“The Gylos? The whole tribe?” Jonas sat forward, concern etched his face. “That’s impossible. How?”

“It was a massacre. I’m all that’s left, and I’m only half Gylos.” Poe looked like he was about sixteen years old. His shaggy hair and grunge style would have fit in at Midland High.

“Half Gylos? How is that possible? The Gylos didn’t allow mating outside of the tribe.” Jonas looked about the room. “The massacre—”

Poe nodded, answering Jonas’s unfinished question. The young teen suddenly seemed so much older as the weight of his controversial existence and the bloody aftermath weighed heavily on him. His shoulders slumped and he left out a long breath. His birth, the broken rule of mating outside the tribe, caused discord within the tribe, leading to the end of the tribe.

Jonas rubbed his stubble in thought, “But how did they...”

The shop’s front windows lit with a fiery blaze on the other side of the glass. We hurried to the door. Torin stood on the lawn in front of the shop and flung large rocks at the dragon before him. “Try it again, asshole.”

The dragon answered with another blast, catching Torin’s shoe on fire as he dodged the fiery breath. He yelped and stopped to pat it out. “Come on, switch back to your wimpy human self and fight me fair.”

The dragon let out a loud roar, shaking the ground around us.

“Enough. Ren, stop.” Poe ran out with Fenick following close behind him. Poe positioned himself between Ren and Torin. He turned to Torin. “Get inside the shop and all this will stop. Go, now!”

Torin stood there, looking like he wanted to continue the battle till one of them was bleeding or dead.

“Torin, now!” Jonas’s voice was calm but authoritative, and Torin listened. He jogged over to the shop where Jonas caught him by the arm. “Are you all right? Any injuries?”

“I’m fine.” He pulled his arm free and shoved past Jonas, probably pissed that he was asked to stand down. Jonas followed after him while I stayed back to watch Fenick and Poe calm Ren down to the point he could morph back into human form. Ren finally retreated to the trees several yards away and emerged from the forested area clothed. He passed his brothers without saying a word and rudely pushed past me into the shop. Poe followed him while Fenick hung back with me on the porch.

Fenick leaned against the porch post. “He’s got a temper. He had no clue you were staying the night. I guess the sight of your friend pushed him over the edge.”

“He really doesn’t like us, huh?”

“He doesn’t like most people. But yeah, he sees you all as a threat.” Fenick stood a few inches below my nearly six-foot stature. Of course, he was younger and had more growing to do before he topped out. He had an athletic physique but was less muscular than Torin. And his skin had a tanner complexion than my own.

“So, he controls fire and you have the freeze ray?”

Fenick laughed. “Yeah, I guess you could say that.”

“What about Poe?”

“No fire or ice for him. He can heal.” Fenick motioned to my bandaged legs. “That’s a Gylos ability. He also can see things—some things, before they happen. That gift came from our mother’s side of the family.”

“If your mom was not a Gylos, what was she?”

“Something completely different.” He pushed off the post and headed inside, leaving me on the shop porch with more questions than I had started with.

Chapter 8

I couldn't sleep. The couch I laid on was plenty comfortable, but I had too many questions in my head. Torin slept restlessly in his bed while Jonas lay peacefully sleeping with his back turned toward both of us.

I checked my watch. 3:25AM. Maybe I needed to pee. I walked quietly down the hall toward the restroom, careful not to wake others. Quiet murmurs slipped through the closed door near the bathroom. I paused and leaned in to listen a moment, wondering if one of the dragon bros was talking in his sleep.

"They're a threat. You said so yourself!" I could make out Ren's angry voice. "Why did you heal him? I mean, seriously, we don't need them making it to the village."

"I healed him because it was the right thing to do. They have done nothing to us—and just because the others have hatred for us, does not mean these three will feel the same." Poe, the calmest of the three, was in there working to subdue Ren's anger.

"You said your vision had them in the village warring with the armies of King Vintras. You saw something happen to one of us, something bad." Fenick sounded calmer than Ren but still concerned.

"I never said something happened to one of you." Poe calmly corrected.

"You didn't have to. Your whole demeanor changed when you talked about the vision." Ren's voice grew louder.

"Shh!" The others shushed him.

"Which one of us dies?" He lowered his voice, but there was sadness and fear beneath Ren's anger.

"Just stop Ren. You're getting all worked over this. My visions aren't perfect and you know this. If any one thing changes, even the smallest detail, the outcome is altered. And I can't just summon visions to see if they've changed."

"Mom said you might get better control of them now that the Gylos tribe and their magic was gone. She thought the magic you inherited from her would become stronger," Ren added.

"Well, I think she was wrong. If anything, it's been harder to get a read on what I'm seeing."

"Yeah, but we need you to try." Fenick sounded worried. "This vision involves us dying by their hands."

“I never said that.” Poe corrected. “I said I saw them arrive and visit the village. Then I return to our shop...” There was a small choke to his voice. “Okay, fine, yes, I did see... I saw both of you... But I never saw the cause of death. And besides, you’ve met them.” Poe answered. “Do they seem like murders to you?” No one answered, so Poe continued with a sterner tone. “Right. Listen, I’m not happy you two took matters into your own hands. If Mom finds out you two went rogue, she’ll tether your wings.” Poe cautioned. “Ren, I paid Jonas for the car and supplies you torched. You’ll have extra shifts in the shop to pay me back for the damage you caused in Sault Ste. Marie. And next time you blow up a car, pick a cheap one.”

Where was their mom anyway?

“And if you head past the outer oaks, stay together—always.” The sound of footsteps on the wood floor within the room reminded me I shouldn’t be eavesdropping.

I hurried back to our room instead of continuing to the bathroom. I peered through the cracked open doorway, waiting for the others to enter their respective rooms before heading back down the hall. I didn’t want them to suspect I had heard their discussion.

“Night, Fen.” Ren said as he passed our door.

“Night.” Fenick answered as he retreated to his room.

I waited a moment longer, and when I was sure the hallway was clear, I headed for the bathroom in hopes it was all I needed to attempt sleep again.

Chapter 9

The morning sun blazed through the small square window, shining directly on my face. After trying different positions and covering my head with the blanket, I gave up and accepted that there would be no more sleep for me. Torin slumbered peacefully across the room, but Jonas's bed was empty.

I kicked off the covers and headed toward the stairs but froze when Jonas and Poe emerged from the room across from the bathroom where the meeting of the brothers had taken place. Poe turned and headed back into the room while Jonas approached me, motioning me to come closer.

"We depart in twenty minutes." Jonas spoke in a low voice. "Poe is sending Ren on an errand. He fears that Ren is too emotionally unstable and doesn't trust what he will do to us outside of this structure. Once he leaves and the coast is clear, Poe and Fenick will help us get to the village."

I followed him into the room where he hurried over to Torin and stirred him awake. "Pack up. We leave in twenty minutes."

"Where's the fire?" Torin's voice was hoarse with sleep.

"Poe doesn't want any drama with Ren. He's sending him out on an errand and asked that we don't leave the shop till he gives the word." Jonas shoved his clothes into his bag.

"That dude is wound too tight." Torin shook his head.

"He is. Complete opposite of Poe." I unwrapped the bandage from my hand to see if my birthday burn had healed and found new skin where the blistered wound had been. It looked great. I wondered how my legs looked after the night of healing. I worried today's travels would undo his healing. "Jonas, is the village far from here?" The thought of making a journey similar to yesterday's made me shudder.

"It is, but you won't have to worry about that." Jonas answered.

A knock at the door interrupted my next question. "Jonas, it's me." Poe called through the door. "Can I come in?"

Jonas stood and let Poe in.

"I wanted to check on Ray, see how the legs are." He walked over to me and pulled up a foot stool close to me. "How are you feeling?"

"Good. Felt good to sleep and not be trekking through the forest all day."

Poe laughed as he began unwrapping my left leg. “I bet”

“I already filled them in.” Jonas came over to my side.

“Good. Ren is gathering a few things but should be gone soon.” He looked up at me. “No pain or itching?” Poe asked.

“None.”

I hoped the bruises would be almost gone and maybe the hematoma drained and flat, but I was shocked to see a shell of dead skin covering the part that had been wrapped.

“What the heck is that?” Torin came over for a closer look.

“Dead skin. Nasty, right?” Poe answered as he took out a washcloth from his pocket and wet it with a small water bottle. “Yell if it hurts.” He looked up at me for a moment before rubbing the wet cloth on my leg. The shell cracked and fell to the floor, revealing healthy, unmarred skin beneath it.

“Holy...” I stared at the smooth even colored skin. “Poe, I think you need to come back to Michigan and live with me. I could use someone with your talents to fix me up on a regular basis. With my fragile nature, you’d be one busy guy!”

Poe laughed. “It looks great. For someone who breaks easily, you also heal better than most.” Poe looked to Jonas. “Is that a thing with his condition? Quick healing?”

Jonas shook his head. “No, not typically. In fact, healing usually takes longer in vEDS patients.”

“Well, glad I could help. I’ll come let you know when Ren is off. Sit tight.” Poe gathered up the bandages and debris before heading out of the room.

Jonas lifted my leg into his lap to inspect my skin. “This is remarkable. There is not a single blemish on your skin. What did he do to you in that room? I’ve seen you after a week at camp, but you looked a hundred times worse yesterday. I don’t understand how he healed you in a day.” He examined it from all angles. “Nothing!”

“He used some sort of light energy from his hands and then wrapped the legs with some gauze that had some special liquid on it.” Unfortunately, I didn’t know any exact details about how Poe had healed me. I wondered if living near Poe and his healing powers would make me less anxious and scared of my disorder. Jonas had always patched me up and had reassured me that, if we had enough time to get to the right surgeon, I could survive a vascular event. Unfortunately, some of the patients I had met in the online support groups thought otherwise. In fact, sitting here while my fragile body healed got me thinking about my friend, Nick, and the aortic dissection that had ended his life only a few days ago. I was hard not to lose hope when a tragedy strikes so close.

I had logged on to a vEDS Facebook group to ask about a strange thing that happened with my eye. The next post that came through on the newsfeed read “Prayers for the Mitchell family. Their son Nick passed suddenly last Friday.” Passed suddenly... My heart broke and I felt like vomiting. There never seemed to be a decline with vEDS. I had talked to Nick on Thursday, the day before he died. He had gushed over this girl he had fallen in love with and had talked about asking her to marry him. Nick had graduated college a year ago and was the only guy near my age in the vEDS online group. I had never met him in person, but we had grown close from chatting often online. I couldn't relate to the girls in the group or the mom's that were scared to lose their kids, so Nick and I became fast friends.

Nick had told me to take care of my body, listen to what it was telling me, and had encouraged me to fight to get Lauren back in my life. I had dismissed his advice on Lauren and joked that he was a lovesick fool. But he persisted and reminded me that love, true love for someone, made getting out of bed and facing the day, the disorder, and all the crap that came with it all worthwhile. Love for this girl made him want to fight past the physical pain and push aside the self-doubt that nagged in the back of his head. She had inspired hope in him and I secretly wished I could find someone as he had.

But the news of his death had sent me into a depression. My hope for a happy and semi-long life died with Nick that day. And ever since that day, I felt like a ticking time bomb, worried that any little thing, even a sneeze, would set me off and be my end. Nick took the meds, saw the docs, and followed the same protocol I had been instructed to follow, and still he died.

I felt lucky for having people who got me. Leo and Lauren had never accused me of faking my disorder; they also didn't treat me different than others my age.

I closed my eyes, thinking of the kiss Lauren and I had shared. She looked beautiful, with the afternoon sun creating the perfect lighting to show the yellows and blues that made Lauren's eyes a gorgeous hazel color. My fingers found the pendant. "Virale."

"You have a Guardian's charm." Jonas sounded surprised.

"My parents gave it to me."

He pulled his out and showed me his and smiled.

"Jonas, how did you know the barrier spell was gone?" He nor my parents mentioned how they found out it was time for us to return.

"Live satellite image website. This site is updated daily. I check it daily and one day it was not there, the next day I could see the village. I watched it for a few days to be sure it wasn't a temporary change before mentioning it to your parents."

Knock Knock Poe peeked into the room. "Ren is gone and Fenick is waiting. Let's go."

We grabbed our bags and followed Poe to the clearing behind the shop where a large, greenish dragon stood watching us.

"He'll take you past the outer oaks, to the farthest boundary of your village, but he will not stay with you. Head north and you find the king's stronghold." Poe escorted us to a rectangular metal frame with what looked like a two-by-four bench across it. Ropes dangled down from the top bar for us to grip. This contraption sat a few feet away from the dragon. Poe sat on the bench and demonstrated how to hold on. He wrapped his arms around both ends of one of the ropes. “Your job is to hold tight. It’s not high tech, but it’s the best we have and the fastest way to get far distances fast.”

We took a seat on the bench with our packs on our backs. Poe helped ensure we were tethered in as best we could. Fenick, in dragon form, watched Poe, and when he gave the signal, Fenick took flight. He batted his wings hard to gain altitude, then banked right, heading back toward us. Poe stepped back and advised, “Don’t, let go.” Fenick swooped down, opening his claws and grabbing the top of the frame. In an instant, we were airborne.

Soaring high above in this open structure was a cold and terrifying experience, especially without seatbelts to hold us. Everytime Fenick banked, my bottom slid to the end of the seat, forcing me to hold onto my arm restraints a little tighter. The frozen wind stung my face and made my eyes water. The others seemed to be having the time of their lives. Torin let out an excited holler and Jonas had the biggest grin on his face. I could only guess that I looked as horrified as I felt.

Fenick, thankfully, did not fly wild. He made careful moves as he gracefully changed direction. The terrain below was a sea of mini-lakes and evergreens.. The further we flew away from the shop, the colder the air temperature became and unfortunately, it was not a quick flight.

“You doin’ okay over there Raynar?” Jonas asked.

“I’m okay. Leave me be.”

Torin chuckled from my left. “You’re doin’ great Cross.”

Jonas added, “I see the outer oaks up ahead.”

I glanced down and saw what looked like a partial ring of broccoli crowns. “You mean that dark green curve?”

“Yep,” he answered. “Be ready and hold on tight as we land.”

I didn’t think it was possible to hold on any tighter.

Fenick circled and flew us along a narrow shore of what seemed to be a dried up riverbed before lowering us toward the ground. I closed my eyes and braced for impact but it never happened. Instead, the movement of air around me slowed and shifted. The soft sound of feet hitting sand drew my attention. Torin and Jonas stood beneath me, as Fenick hovered me above the drop point. What the hell? This was too high to jump. I’d end up covered in bruises or worse.

“Come on Cross, jump!” Torin urged.

“No. I can’t.”

Torin looked from me to the ground and back again. I expected him to comment on how I should try it and that it really wasn’t high at all, but he bit his tongue. “Fenick, can you lower down further?” The dragon descended a few more inches. “Cross, I think that’s as low as he can get. Jump and I’ll catch you.”

“No. You can’t. You’ll squeeze my organs.” This had been embedded in my brain—stay safe, no matter what.

“I won’t. I promise. Jump and I’ll be a soft landing for you.” Torin encouraged.

“It’ll be alright Raynar, there’s no other way down.” Jonas urged. “Tuck in on yourself to keep your mid-section safe.”

I looked around, and there truly was no other way down. Anxiety flooded me and the inner voice that advocated for me in dangerous situations screamed for me to stop and not do this stupid thing. Was there another option? Yes. I could return to the shop with Fenick and wait for Torin and Jonas to return. But wasn’t the point of the trip for me to meet my biological father? And who the hell would help me disembark once I got there? Jonas was one of my physicians that knew my disorder and the restrictions, still he urged me to jump. I swallowed hard and released my grip on the ropes, curling in on myself as advised.

I felt the impact as I collided with Torin’s hard body. Oomph! Torin lay on the ground, and my body rolled off of his. Jonas rushed to our side. “Raynar, Ray, are you okay?”

I rolled over and sat up. “Yes, I think I’m okay.” I shook my finger at Torin. “You are not a soft landing.”

Torin laughed as he sat up. “And you are like a friggin’ cannonball.”

Jonas checked me for injuries while Torin waved to Fenick’s winged figure retreating above the foliage.

“Jonas, I’m good. I know my body and nothing feels off.” How did I come out of that jump unscathed? I’d jumped from shorter distances and ended up at the hospital getting scanned and accessing the hematomas that quickly grew. But somehow I was fine. “Let’s go.”

Jonas stood. “Fair enough. Torin, let’s head out.” Jonas found which way was north and lead us northeast into the thick forested area. We walked for almost an hour on terrain that seemed easier than the previous hike. “This used to be a tributary that fed into a larger body of water. The Yardinians planned to export and import good from here using boats. But a difficult winter altered the waterways and this once flowing river was turned into what you are currently walking on.”

Torin bent down and rubbed the sandy soil between his fingers. “So the import/export business?”

“The dreams for a successful port town dried up with that river bed.” Jonas stopped and held his hand out “Hold up, I see something.” He scaled the short tributary wall and jogged over to a tree that seemed to have an old cotton sash tied around the trunk.

“This is the boundary to the village.” He called to us and motioned for us to join him but once we got close he held out his hand again halting us. Jonas took careful steps beyond the tree. “Years ago, this place had a spell around it, trapping all within these boundaries. The people and buildings within it had been cloaked so that they were hidden away from the world.” He motioned for us to follow him. “Seems it’s gone.”

“How come you weren’t trapped inside with the others?” I noticed other trees yards away with a similar sash marking the boundary.

“I got lucky. Your Guardians, sorry, I mean parents, and I were on a mission outside of the boundary. We came back and it was as if an invisible shield encapsulated the village. We couldn't get in, and they couldn't get out."

"What about Torin and me?" I presumed we were infants when this happened, and since we were the king's sons, we were probably kept close to our parents. "How did you get us out of the village and to Midland? Does the barrier not work on us or somethin'?"

"I'm not at liberty to tell you all the details. That is something for your father to tell. All I will say is that neither of you were within the village boundaries when the spell was cast."

I looked to Torin who shot me a confused look that probably mirrored my own. Why were we not with our parents at that time? And whatever happened to our mother? "Did you know our mother?" I asked.

"I wouldn't say I knew her." Jonas said nothing more as he picked up his pace leading us northeast through the woods.

Torin matched my pace as I trailed farther behind. "Is he always so vague?"

Torin chuckled. "When he's talking about our history and this place? Yes. Glad I'm not the only one annoyed by his short answers."

"Right? It's like 'Jonas, how was the Earth made?' And he'd answer, 'Very carefully.'"

Torin laughed harder than I'd seen him laugh before.

"Shh. Keep it down you two." Jonas shushed us as we caught up with him. "I think we're getting close; I smell a fire." I could make out the faint smoky scent on the next breeze that whooshed past.

"Watch out for traps." Jonas tossed a medium sized stone toward a pile of leaves and the leaves flew into the air as a large rope net scooped up the stone, suspending it from the lowest branch of the large tree. "They set more traps closer to the village. Stay close." Jonas advised. "I know what to look for as I helped set the traps when I lived in the village." As we continued, the smoke scent grew stronger and we could hear murmurs of voices.

Jonas came to a stop and looked narrowed his eyes. "It's not changed one bit." He muttered. I came up next to Jonas and looked past the furthest tree, where the thatched roofs of a few buildings could be seen.

"Come on. Welcome to Yardis!" Jonas exclaimed as he smiled and led us toward his childhood home.

Chapter 10

As we walked past the first wooden building, we came to a common area that resembled a marketplace. People with shaggy haircuts and tattered clothes sat crafting different items such as necklaces, knives carved from bone, and various textile goods, while others packed up carts with cloth bags and various household items. We looked out of place in our neat and colorful modern clothes. It didn't take long for the villagers to notice us. Work stopped and eyes turned to us in curiosity.

A man who looked a few years younger than my dad came over and squared up with Jonas. Jonas did not cower; he stood firmly in place, his eyes trained on the approaching man. His body tensed the closer he came. The man had six inches on Jonas and, based on his physique, appeared to have more upper body strength. His face had a deep scar from his eye to his chin and his hand rested on the hilt of the sword that hung from his waist.

Torin looked ready to pounce as he stared down the man, clenching and unclenching his fists.

"Jonas." It wasn't a question. The approaching man recognized Jonas. "After all this time, you've found your way back to Yardis. I thought you had long since forgotten us." There was a bitter edge to his words.

"Kaden, you haven't changed one bit, just as ugly as I remembered. Except now you're a lot bigger." Jonas looked Kaden up and down. "And stronger."

Kaden's mean expression melted as he suddenly burst into a hearty laugh and clapped his arms on Jonas's shoulders. "Indeed, I am! I'm afraid I can't say the same for you. You look pretty much as I remembered, except I see a lot more skin where hair used to be." Kaden eyed Jonas's receding hairline and chuckled, "It's good to see you my friend."

"Good to see you too." Jonas pulled him into a hug. Torin relaxed his stance and I took a breath, relieved there would be no altercation.

"Who are these two lads?" He nodded toward Torin and I.

"Their parents are Yardinian. But these two were born in the outside world. When I learned the barrier had been taken down, I promised to take them with me to see Yardis. Hopefully they will better understand the history of their people." Jonas had twisted the truth, but I wasn't surprised as he had previously twisted other tales and omitted info about Yardis and its people. The challenge was deciphering what was fact from fiction.

“Who are your parents? Perhaps I know them.” Kaden approached Torin who seemed unsure how to answer.

“We are twins; our parents are Jaron and Lysa Cross,” he answered, which surprised me. Why did he claim my Guardians as his parents instead of Jonas? Perhaps it was the simplest answer to stop the line of questioning.

“They were Guardians, weren’t they?” He looked toward Jonas who nodded. “Sorry, I was a teen when the barrier occurred. Well, welcome to Yardis. Come, we’ll have a drink and meal. There is much to catch up on.” Kaden started off toward a large building and Jonas motioned for us to follow. Some villagers continued with their work while others followed us with their stares. “How different does the village look to you?” Kaden pushed open a large wooden door, revealing a dimly lit tavern.

“The buildings look the same, perhaps more worn, but that’s expected with time. How are your parents? Your father was part of the Guardian watch with me,” Jonas asked as he set his bag down and took a seat on a wood bench.

“They both died along with many others. A sickness spread through the village the winter after the barrier cut us off from the world around. Our medics worked to save those infected, but we had limited resources within the boundary and some of the medicinal herbs had become scarce. King Vintras ruled that no more of medicines would be used to fight the infection, they would only use them to keep the patients comfortable. Those that were weak died, and those that were strong lived,” Kaden explained.

“I’m sorry about your parents.” Jonas said.

“Thank you.” Kaden continued. “Living in this bubble for all these years has been challenging. Those that were young or born after the barrier had been placed fared the best as they’ve known no different than the life they already lived. But the older generations have suffered. Many lost hope and failed to accept the invisible walls that held us from the rest of the world.” Kaden motioned for the barmaid. “You know, it’s a strange thing that happens when you cage those that had once been free. But stranger still, when you set them free again; anxiety and depression are often found in place of their once strong spirits.”

The barmaid came to take our orders and our conversation resumed. “And you? How have you managed with all of this?” Jonas asked.

“I am a survivor, as all Guardians are. I am used to change, and I welcome it. The only thing I dislike...” Kaden nodded toward some guards dressed in uniform sitting at a table across the room, “is them.” The table of men wore grey tunics with a red band across their left bicep.

“The king’s guards?” Jonas sounded surprised. “What about them? They weren’t such a big deal back in the day. The Guardians did most of the patrolling and held more power as far as security goes.”

“It’s changed. With the barrier up, the king’s guards took a position of power. The Guardians roles

had to be redefined as there was no danger from outside. Our job focused on hunting and trapping and the King's guards took up security. Larkin, Vintras's son, manages them. Honestly, that kid was always trouble. I think Vintras put him in charge of the guards just to give him something to do." Kaden shook his head. The barmaid returned with our drinks. Kaden took a big swig before adding. "Biggest mistake our king could have made."

I wondered if Kaden disliked the king's guards because he was envious of their status in the village. With the shift in importance making the rank of king's guards higher than Guardians, there was good argument for bitterness.

"What's so bad about them?" Torin asked.

Kaden leaned forward, keeping his eyes on the king's guards, and lowered his voice so that it was barely audible. "They, or he, hungers for control. With the barrier gone, people want to leave. But if they go, the village and kingdom will fall. And that is a problem if you are a prince, waiting for your father's last breath so that you may take the crown and throne for yourself." Kaden let out a loud and satisfied belch and returned to normal volume. "Drink up, then I'll show you where you can sleep." Kaden tipped his cup back to drink anything left in his mug. I finished my spiced berry juice that reminded me of cranberry with a hint of honey.

Kaden led us through the village center and down a small alleyway before stopping at a small stone and wood house "It's not been touched since Kyra passed." He opened the door and walked into the building. "It's not much, but there's a bed, blankets, and it provides shelter from the cold nights."

"Who was Kyra? The name is not familiar to me." Jonas asked as he looked around the scarcely decorated single room home.

"She was a few years younger than myself. She trained to be a Guardian but abandoned her pursuit as the king's guards became more powerful." Kaden bit his bottom lip. There was a sadness about him as he spoke of Kyra. "She was one of my students, but hunting and gathering in the small confines of the barrier wasn't enough for her... She wanted more."

"Were her parents Guardians?" Jonas asked.

"Her father, Tanus, was a Guardian."

"I knew him. He was a few years older than me." Jonas seemed excited to recognize the name. "Is he still alive?"

"No." Kaden shook his head. "He also passed from illness several years ago."

"How did Kyra die?" I shouldn't care, but I found myself curious about the cause of someone's passing, especially someone young.

Kaden cleared his throat. "Kyra organized a group to leave Yardis. She talked about finding a new life in the free world. The king's guard held a public execution to teach others that leaving Yardis was wrong,"

"Vintras signed off on that?" Jonas scratched his head in disbelief. "Why? Why would he order something like that?”

“I don’t believe he did.” Kaden pushed off from the wall he had been leaning against and headed for the door. “Anyway, you’re welcome to stay. I had better get back.”

Jonas looked more concerned than ever but approached Kaden with his hand out to shake. “Thank you friend.”

They pulled close into a man hug and then Kaden left.

Jonas turned to us. “I don’t like what I’ve heard. A lot has changed since I left, and I don’t know what we’ll find at the king’s stronghold. We’ll need to be cautious. Now, let’s leave our bags here and head to meet your father, King Vintras.”

Chapter 11

In my mind, I imagined the king living in a grand castle sitting upon a grassy hill, with grey stone walls reaching for the sky, turrets on each corner and flags raised high in honor of the king and his people. But the Castle of Vintras looked far from what I had imagined. Its basic structure reminded me of the Texas Roadhouse over by the Walmart in Midland, only this place was much bigger. “Hmm, I expected something more...castle-y.”

Torin chuckled next to me. “Is that even a word?”

I shrugged.

“I’m with ya, though. Suddenly, I’m hungry for a steak and some rolls with sweet cinnamon butter.”

I looked at him in disbelief. “And a bucket of peanuts.”

Torin laughed and clapped me on my back.

“Very funny you two. Look around you. Without concrete mixers and heavy equipment, building anything this solid and large was a challenge. It may not be castle-y but it works.” Jonas sounded a little defensive. But the king’s “castle” was impressive. Stones formed a solid foundation around the entire structure and also framed the main entrance and windows. The rest of the structure was several stories high and made from solid logs and was topped with a thatched roof.

Guards walked along the rooftop spying down at us, holding some unseen object in their hands. Jonas noticed them and looked back to Torin and I. “Listen, I have no idea what it’s like in there, but we should mind Kaden’s warning and be cautious of Larkin and the guards,” Jonas warned, speaking softly.

Two of the king’s guards stood on each side of the large wooden door, spears in hand, swords hung from their waists. Leather armor protected their vulnerable parts.

Jonas stepped before them. “We are here by the request of King Vintras. I am Jonas, and I am here with two young men he has asked to meet.”

“One moment.” The guard on the right turned and entered the building, closing the door behind him. The other guard stood directly in front of the door staring at each of us. He looked younger than Jonas but older than Torin and I.

The door opened a short moment later and the second guard returned. “You may enter. Follow me.” He led us into the building which opened up to an airy central room with tall ceilings and large colorful tapestries hanging from the walls along with, animal skins, antlers and a bear’s head mounted above what looked to be a stone fireplace. Large wood beams stretched across the interior of the thatched roof, while narrow windows did an impressive job of illuminating the large room during the day. Large wooden chandeliers with several candles hung from the beams above. One was centered over a long wooden table with about eight chairs placed around it. I wondered if the candles would provide sufficient lighting for the large room in the evening hours.

“This way.” The guard led us up the staircase and down a short hall to a set of double doors that had another set of guards on each side. “These are the king’s visitors.” One of the guards opened the door, revealing a bedroom larger than my parent’s room, with a large square window on one wall. The massive bed, crafted out of ornately carved wood, occupied most of the room. A man with grey hair and a short beard sat up in the bed studying us. Another man, dressed in a white tunic sat to his left reading a book, paying us no attention.

Jonas fell to one knee and bowed his head. “My lord, it has been a long time since our last meeting.”

“Jonas.” The man’s voice sounded rough. “Come. Have you brought my boys?”

Jonas rose. “I have. Both have grown into fine young men as they’ve recently celebrated their eighteenth year.” Jonas motioned for us to follow him as he walked toward the bedridden man. “This is Raynar. Jaron and Lysa have cared for him these years. And this is Torin, my responsibility.”

The king looked older than Jonas. His pale face exaggerated the dark shadows under his eyes. Deep wrinkles lining his face told of the village’s troubled past and his worries for its future. He took Jonas’s hand in his.

“Thank you for doing this, for caring for my children and bringing them back to me.” His eyes filled with tears. “I am so eternally grateful.” He shook Jonas’s hand and squeezed it before looking past him at the two of us.

Jonas took a seat by the large window while Torin and I stepped closer.

“Thank you for making the journey. I have thought of you both often, wondering if you are well and what you might be studying. I would like to spend some time getting to know you both over the next few days and letting you ask questions of me. I’m afraid that I do not have much time left, but I would like to get to know you both before my time ends.”

My fingers found the charm that hung from the chain around my neck.

The king noticed, “You wear a Guardian’s medallion. Did Jaron and Lysa give you one of theirs?” I nodded my answer.

“They were excellent Guardians, as were you, Jonas. Those were different times, better times. I wish I could have been a better king to my people.” He looked at Torin and me. “I wish I could have been a father to you both.”

The door opened behind us and in walked a tall guy about our age with three king’s guards behind him. His white hair was short with longer messy bangs pointing in various directions. His pale blue eyes matched those of the king's. They narrowed as he took in everyone in the room. "What is this father? Who are these outsiders?"

"Larkin! Come, we have visitors." The king motioned for Larkin to come closer. "I want you to meet your brothers, Torin and Raynar."

Larkin looked at us both, then fell into a fit of laughter. "Oh father, it seems the medic has given you too potent a dose. You're delusional. I am your only child. These intruders fool you. Guards, seize them!"

His guards started towards us but the king called them off. "No, no. Stand down!" He commanded to the guards. "Larkin, you are wrong. They are my guests, and I speak the truth. I know this is shocking news, but it's truth. They were born outside of the barrier and have returned to me now that we are free. You should rejoice. You have brothers, Larkin!"

Larkin did not appear to be rejoicing at our appearance. His jaw worked with agitation as he glared between Torin and me.

The elated king smiled. "I only wish you had known them all along, but Malora..." He shook his head at the memory. "But now that the barrier is removed, we can get to know them."

Larkin approached Torin and me, sizing us up. "I apologize for my father. He has been ill for some time, and I'm afraid his medicine has played a trick on his mind. My mother died in childbirth. There are documents stating such, and my grandparents never spoke of any other children. I'm sorry if he has troubled you."

"Your mother, Shara, is not their mother." King Vintras corrected.

Larkin's demeanor shifted and he shot an icy glare at the king. "I see. You are full of surprises today father." He bit out before storming out of the room, the three guards followed, closing the door behind them. A loud crash sounded from behind the wooden doors.

"I'm sorry for his rudeness. This is news to him, and he needs time. I refrained from telling him and maybe that was a mistake. But I wanted to be sure you both were alive and well before I revealed the truth. Forgive him." The king began coughing and reached for a cup made out of bone and took a sip. "Henrick, are there rooms for our guests?" He asked the medic.

A man with reddish hair who looked to be in his thirties looked up from his book. "Every room is taken Sire. But I can make a place in one of the storage rooms where they could sleep."

"No, thank you. We have accommodations in the village." Jonas answered. "In fact, we should probably head back and get some provisions for the week." Jonas stood and approached us.

"Very well. I would very much like to have a meal with one of my sons this afternoon, if you think that's possible." The king looked to Henrick. "Am I cleared to eat in the great hall?"

"Let me check." Henrick came over and pulled back the covers. He pushed one finger on the king's shin and removed it. The indentation remained as if the finger was still compressing the skin. "You're too swollen. Lunch will be served in here with your feet elevated." Henrick helped the king get into a comfortable position and propped his feet upon some pillows and animal skins.

“Torin, stay with King Vintras. Tomorrow Ray and the king can have time together. See you back at Kyra’s this evening.” He clapped Torin on the shoulder. “It is good to see you, my lord.” Jonas bowed his head to King Vintras.

I nodded toward the king. “Nice to meet you.”

“You as well, my son.” The king smiled at me with a genuine happiness that could be seen in his eyes.

Jonas and I stopped back at the house to retrieve his bag before we headed out in the village to pick up dried meats and mushrooms to snack on back at the house.. Jonas offered them coins he still had from when he’d lived here but gave them an option of trading their goods for a jar of honey. Many opted for the liquid gold, One woman broke down in tears as she explained they hadn’t had honey since the barrier spell went up as it physically kept them from maintaining the hive. I knew of the many uses of honey as Jonas had encouraged my parents to use it for many of my cuts, coughs, and stomach upsets. Although the small jars of honey seemed like treasure, a few bees would be worth so much more to the villagers.

Several older Yardinians recognized Jonas and warmly greeted him. They asked questions about life outside of Yardis. Some seemed curious to see these modern sights with their own eyes while others spoke nervously of the different life that existed many miles away. A few of the men pulled him close to whisper secrets of the village in his ear.

All the while the king’s guards patrolled the village, taunting and bullying the craftspeople.

The village of Yardis looked like something out of a medieval encyclopedia. Yet there was no cosmic portal that had spit the village out into our modern century. No, Yardis existed in this remote location where roads did not venture and civilization had deemed it uninhabitable. They had made a place for themselves here and had managed to survive even without the help of modern technology.

Jonas and I dined at the same tavern where we had shared a drink with Kaden earlier. There were more patrons this time of day, and thankfully, they seemed appropriately staffed as we did not wait long for a beverage.

“What’s the history of Yardis?” I asked Jonas. “Like how did this village end up here, far from the rest of the world?” Many more questions spun around my head but this seemed to be the one I was most curious about.

“We are descended from Vikings and came over from Scandinavia many years ago. Our people, the Yardinians, disagreed with the radical beliefs of the new leadership and made the decision to sail to the New World in search of a place to call home and where we could hold onto our beliefs and old ways. Our ancestors crossed the ocean and navigated the waterways to this area. They struggled at first because they were a small group and building a place where they could manufacture goods to trade with other lands took time. For the first few years, they focused on surviving, establishing the village, and building relationships with the natives. Our people were not liked by the local tribes.

They saw us as wild, barbaric people pushing our way onto their lands. And they were right. The first Yardinians to step foot on this soil were led by no one. There was no order or civility—they took what they wanted, when they wanted, and it angered the natives. But the natives rallied together with a shared goal—drive out the barbarians. They pushed us to the land within the circle of oaks and created the Swampy Cree Treaty, which stated that we elect a king and enforce rules for our village and they, the neighboring tribes, will leave us alone in peace.”

“Interesting.” Hearing the Treaty mentioned again made me think about our driver and wonder what his version of these stories would be.

“Honestly, before the barrier spell, we were finally making positive strides.” Jonas stared off remembering a time years ago.

“What were the radical beliefs that prompted their departure?” I asked.

“The new leader believed our misfortune with crops and hunting was due to our inadequate offerings. He ordered a seasonal human sacrifice and those that were against it, packed up and sailed across the country to start their new lives.” Jonas took a sip from his cup.

“What happened? What or who created the barrier?” I asked.

“Malora. She was a witch who lived in the northern wood outside of the village boundaries. King Vintras’s father, King Erik, disliked magic users outside of our race, but he especially disliked Malora. I couldn’t tell you why, though some theorized that her hut was too close to the village, while others believed she’d tried to trick Erik into wedding her. All I remembered was the hatred he had toward Malora. Many of the villagers followed the king’s lead blindly, and hated her and her daughter, many except your father. Your father was always a kind man who cared for all, even back then when the village was full of hate for anyone different.” Jonas set his cup down and motioned for the barmaid.

She refilled his drink, and then brought over two bowls of stew.

“What made the barrier disappear after all these years?” I asked.

The doors of the tavern flew open and a patrol of about ten guards entered, rushing toward an occupied table at the back. They grabbed the seated patrons and stood them up. One protested, and a guard quieted her by slitting her throat. The tavern crowd gasped while the guards removed the rest of their prisoners from the building.

“What’s happening?” Jonas asked the passing barmaid.

“They are part of Kyra’s rebellion. I’d cautioned them to halt their plans, but they had decided to move tonight while the village sleeps. And now they have been caught.” The barmaid shook her head and walked away.

Jonas looked around at the chaos in the tavern. “Let’s get out of here and lay low at Kyra’s. We can eat some of our jerky we picked up earlier there.”

I followed him out of the tavern. The prisoners lay in a line on the ground, their noses in the dirt, arms stretched out before them. A guard stood by each with their swords drawn in front of them.

“What is this? Frey!” A woman ran to one of the smaller prisoners and fell to her knees beside them. “What crime have they committed?” She yelled at the guards. “Frey is just a young boy, swept up in the excitement of his friends. He has not wronged the king or this village. Please let him go.” She begged as tears fell from her eyes.

A guard ran over to remove the woman. She latched onto her son and became dead weight to the guard.

“Why is this not done? Why do they still live?” Larkin came to stand in front of the guards. “It was a simple command. Assist those wanting to leave Yardis. I tire of hearing the chatter of people so eager to leave our village. Do you know what awaits you outside this boundary? Death. You will never make it to civilization before the wild beasts or frigid temperatures take your life. You want to leave this village, this sanctity that has provided for you and sheltered you from the harsh world around? Well, let me assist you in your departure.” In a flash, he drew his sword and thrust it into the back of young Frey. The others that lay on the ground hurried to their feet, trying to get away, but each were met with the sword’s edge and dropped to ground to draw their final breaths. Even Frey’s mother was lost in the slaughter.

Jonas took a guarded stance in front of me but he surprisingly had not tried to stop the guards. Why had no one spoken up for the injustice that had played out before us?

“Jonas,” I whispered, “do you think we’ll have any problems leaving at the week’s end?” Would Larkin prefer us gone and welcome our departure, or would he restrict us as he has the other villagers? A chill shuddered up my body, and I leaned over and vomited, but it was not enough to expel the horrifying images of the slaughter I had witnessed.

Jonas helped me stand straight. “I was just wondering the same. Come on, let’s get to Kyra’s.”

Chapter 12

Torin came in an hour or so after Jonas and I. We stayed up most of the night talking. Torin had no knowledge of the public slaughter that had happened at Larkin's hand, though he had seen the blood outside of the tavern.

Torin's account of his time with King Vintras contrasted with the violence of our evening. He spoke of a peaceful king who felt he had failed his people. Years had been spent trying to undo the spell that had caged the people and changed the way the villagers lived. The Yardinians had to inbreed animals for enough food and double up in houses to make room for growing enough to make up for what they could no longer gather. We'd noticed the herds of chickens and goats when we'd arrived, roaming freely throughout the village—and the smell of their poop everywhere.

"King Vintras spoke of two women who he loved dearly. Larkin's mother and our mother." Torin looked toward the only window in Kyra's home. His eyes squinted a moment before turning back toward us.

"What did he have to say about them?" Jonas inquired.

"He asked that I not say anything more. He would like to share the story with Ray, and I promised I would honor that." Torin stood and grabbed another hunk of cheese and returned to our small circle of chairs. "Sorry. I know you must be anxious to learn about this. He asked that you," he pointed his cheese at me, "join him for lunch tomorrow."

Jonas stood and patted my back. "I will accompany you, as I have some medicines that I have brought from home that might help the king's health." Jonas turned toward Torin. "I'm not sure if I should have you join us or allow you to explore the village tomorrow. After what we saw this evening, I'd feel better if you weren't alone. Maybe I can have Kaden escort you around."

"I don't need an escort nor do I want one. You have trained me well. I can handle myself in difficult situations. You know this." Torin stood abruptly, knocking the chair back as he stood.

"But Yardis is a different from everything you've grown up knowing. There are different rules. You did not see the executions." Jonas shook his head as he recalled the horrid memory. "I won't have you at risk. This is not up for discussion. I'll ask Kaden to guide you. If he is not available, you will remain with us."

Torin looked like an angsty teenager rebelling against his father.

Jonas must have noticed it too. “Torin, this isn’t about if I trust you or if I think you are strong enough. The king’s guard did not exist in my time. They have more power and are more militant than the Guardians ever were. Larkin seems to be pulling the strings behind the scenes. I have no idea how he has made such aggressive moves and remained unchecked.”

“Wait, you think King Vintras is unaware of Larkin’s actions?” Torin questioned. “But how? How can Larkin do these things while the king still lives?” It didn’t make sense to me either. “Doesn’t anyone stand against Larkin and his minions?”

“After what we saw tonight, I’m afraid not. Those that stand against Larkin are dealt with in a swift and deadly manner,” Jonas answered.

The sun shone through the single window. I had slept fitfully, tired and troubled from everything that happened yesterday. Every time I closed my eyes I saw Frey’s panicked eyes go blank as death took hold of him.

We cleaned up and headed out for our meeting with King Vintras. Kaden was helping clean up the remnants from last night’s bloody massacre as a small crowd of mourners watched and laid offerings of wood carvings, stacked stones, and personal items where their loved ones had been slain. Four king’s guards silently stood. I was surprised they were not mocking the mourners or forcing the villagers to leave the pools of blood as a macabre reminder of their power and message. “Cross us and be struck down.”

“Kaden. We have business with the king, but I wondered if Torin could stay with you during that time. Perhaps you can show him around and teach him about the village?” Jonas asked.

“Sure. We need to finish our job here. Grab a bucket and roll up your sleeves.” Kaden pointed to a wooden bucket near a building entrance.

Jonas patted Torin’s back. “See you at the evening meal.” Torin’s face was twisted in revulsion as he carefully stepped around the dark crimson mess.

We headed to the king’s home and this time, the guards allowed us in immediately. “Follow me.” The guard said as he led us up the stairs. As we reached the top landing, Larkin entered the open common area with several guards. Our eyes met as he gave me a most unwelcoming look.

Jonas looked over his shoulder and quietly said, “Make no waves and stay off his radar.”

I nodded in agreement. After seeing the cold and heartless side of Larkin last night, I worried for the many things he could order his guards to do to us. We represented the world outside of Yardis, the world he wished never existed to tempt his villagers away. What would keep him from laying his blade into each of us to send another message to his people?

King Vintras was deep asleep when we entered. The medic stood by the large window, looking out at the grounds below. “Henrick,” Jonas called to him.

He greeted us. “Welcome back. The king has been asleep for some time, but I expect he shall wake soon.”

“I wondered if you and I could speak.” Jonas asked. “I have medicines that might help the king, but I’d like to hear your observations on his condition and examine him first.”

“Of course. All my notes are in my room down the hall. Raynar, do you mind waiting with the king?” When I agreed, he continued, “Good, if he has any discomfort, my room is the one at the top of the stairs.”

Jonas and Henrick left and closed the door behind them. I pulled a chair closer to the bed and took a seat. Torin had said Vintras seemed like a kind king. He slept peacefully with the covers pulled up around him. There was more grey than light brown in his hair and beard. He looked older than my parents and Jonas, though they all spoke as if they were all close in age.

I pulled out my phone and powered it on. The start-up jingle caused the king to stir but not fully awaken. I muted the sound as I walked slowly around the room, hoping by some miracle, I could get a signal. No luck. I returned to the chair and checked my notifications. Two missed calls from my dad a few days ago And a text message from Lauren.

Lauren: About the other day—I can’t stop thinking about our kiss. Glad I took the risk. When will you be back? I miss you.

I couldn’t stop myself from smiling. I powered my phone off and pocketed it.

“Must have reminded you of someone you love. You look happy.” King Vintras lay awake, watching me with a smile on his face.

“A note from a girl back home,” I answered.

“It must’ve been hard, coming here and leaving those you love. But I am grateful for this time with you.” He pushed up to a sitting position. His grayed hair stuck up in all different directions, and he worked to smooth it down without much success. “Is it any better?” I shook my head causing him to laugh hard. The laugh became a coughing fit that ended with him gasping for breath.

I rose and hurried to his side. “Do I need to get Henrick? Water?”

He shook his head and put his finger up for me to wait. After a moment, his breath became steady. “I’m all right. Raynar, sit, we have much to talk about. What have you been told about me and Yardis?”

“Not much. I learned you are my father and the people who had raised me were Guardians under your father’s rule. I also know there was a spell cast on this village, trapping everyone within the boundaries, and the spell was recently lifted, though I have no idea how or what lifted it. I also know you are ill and wanted to see us. That’s about it.” I debated telling him about Larkin and the horrid event that occurred the other night. I knew that would take the conversation on a different path, and with the king’s poor health, I wasn’t sure if sharing such news would push him over the edge, guaranteeing Larkin’s place on the throne.

“That’s the basic information. Do you know anything about your mother?”

“No. Torin told me nothing.”

“Good. I was young when I met her, just a prince. My father and I didn’t see eye to eye, and we definitely did not share the same views on witches and magic users outside of our people and beliefs.” He must have noticed my eyebrows raise. “Yes, I said witches. Your mother lived on the outskirts of the village, beyond the circle of oaks. Her mother, Malora, was a powerful witch and her dislike for non-witches matched my father’s hatred for witches. I often wondered if that’s what drew us together.” He let out a long sigh and looked off into the distance. “Meina was beautiful and exotic looking with her long black hair and dark eyes against her olive skin—the kind of beauty that made you stop breathing. Have you ever met someone that does that to you?” I nodded as I thought about Lauren. “Your mother was more than beautiful. She was kind, smart, passionate... The more I got to know her, the more in love I fell.” He started coughing and adjusted his position in bed. “It’s been almost eighteen years since I’ve seen her. I do not know whether or not she is still alive. If this decrepit heart hadn’t confined me to this bed, I’d be out there searching for her. But seeing you and Torin, how Torin has her smile and you have her dark eyes, it’s brought back a flood of memories.” His voice quivered as he looked away. “I loved your mother with all my heart.”

“Have you asked your Guardians to search for her?”

“Since the barrier has come down? Yes.” He faced me, his eyes appeared red and wet. “But there has been no sign of her. My Guardians returned to report a family of First Nation natives now occupy her house. They were questioned but had not seen Meina.” He looked down at his hands. “Anyway, your mother and I would meet in the forest. We’d talk for hours and explore the world around us. But she was lonely and angry with her mother for bringing her here and banning her from mixing with villagers. What was she to do all day with no one to talk to or play with?”

“I can’t imagine how lonely she must have felt. Why didn’t they move to a place where they would be accepted?” I tried to imagine King Vintras as a young boy, running off through the forests with a forbidden girl. It made him sound rebellious and made me want to hear more.

“Malora could have cared less about moving to a peaceful place,” he said. “She cared only about isolating themselves. She saw us as the intruders despite the village having been here for many years before she arrived.”

“So the village was here first but she came along and tried to kick you guys out of the area? She’s only one person.”

“Yes, but she’s a powerful witch from a strange people. Besides the barrier, she had tried countless times to cast us out. We’d suffered from days of extreme temperatures, infestations, terrible diseases, each disaster took many lives but we remained, rebuilt, repopulated and each time we came back stronger. However, the barrier, her most successful attack, did away with us. We were imprisoned for over seventeen years while she was free to do as she wished without worry of any attack on our part.” He shook his head.

“What finally broke the barrier?” I wondered if King Vintras had his own magic user who reversed the spell since he didn't seem to oppose witches.

"I do not know. Henrick had tried for years to break through or weaken the barrier, but he had no luck. Eventually I stopped badgering him and accepted that this was our fate, that we'd never be free again. But after seventeen years, a young boy, playing tag with his friends, unknowingly ran past the boundary and barrier. The others didn't know what to do and cautiously joined him. Once they realized the barrier no longer existed, they rejoiced and ran back to tell their parents, who then reported it to me. No one knows when the barrier spell broke. We had come to respect the boundary and stopped testing it for weakness years ago. Then less than two weeks ago, we find, by accident, the spell removed." He broke into another coughing fit and pointed to a mug of water on the bedside table, which I handed to him.

Once his coughing ceased, I asked, "But you don't know what caused it to come down?"

He shook his head.

There was a knock at the door. Henrick and Jonas entered and greeted us. "King Vintras, Jonas would like to examine you. Would that be all right with you?"

"I have medicines that may help your condition." Jonas added.

"Yes, of course." The king motioned for them to approach. "Excuse me Raynar. Please stay; I'd like to finish our conversation when this concludes."

"Okay." I walked over to the window to keep out of the way. The king's room overlooked a large stone courtyard where guards were positioned at each entrance. In the center of the courtyard grew a small tree with red berries.

"Do you see the tree in the center?" The king asked. "Those berries are probably the sole reason I am still here today. No offense Henrick." Henrick did not look up at the king's mention of his name. He and Jonas were busy speaking their medical lingo. "It's true. They have potent medicinal uses in them. Henrick makes me teas and a relish from them. A little each day and sometimes more when I am swollen, helps to keep the Henrick away." The king joked and this time Henrick leveled him with a stare. "Tell me Raynar, do you have this tree where you live?"

"No. I've never seen one before today."

"I'll ask cheeses and meats with Rowan relish to be part of our mid-day meal. It's sure to cure whatever ails you." He chuckled and coughed.

"That would be nice if it was that easy, but I'm afraid it isn't." If Rowan berries cured vEDS, I and the rest of the patients would gladly grow and ingest the berries daily. But it was highly unlikely. "Jonas?" He looked up at me to let me know he was listening. "Rowan berries, are they safe for me to eat?"

"Why must you ask Jonas? It was a joke. You are young and free of medical worries, unlike my old, used up self." The king chuckled but stopped when he saw Jonas and I looking at each other, silently deciding if now was the right time to tell the King about my condition. He shrugged one shoulder up, letting me know the decision was mine to make.

“What is it? You both speak no words yet an entire conversation has transpired here before my eyes.” The king’s curiosity was peaked.

“I have a condition that causes my body to be fragile.” I rolled up my pant leg and the king gasped at the sight of my leg. They did not look different to me as I had seen them every day since I was born but others remarked that I had old man legs. The skin was mottled, showing the mapwork of blood vessels beneath the almost translucent skin. The king reached his hand toward my bare leg but quickly withdrew it.

“It’s okay. It looks strange but doesn’t hurt. See?” I rubbed my hand along the skin.

“Jonas, is this true?” The king asked.

“I’m afraid so. But Raynar takes excellent care of his body. He has yet to suffer vascular complications,” Jonas answered.

The king stared back at me. “Did I give this to you?” His voice was thick with emotion as he wiped at his eye.

Jonas set his hand atop the king’s. “Sire, there is no reason to beat yourself up with worry over how Raynar came to have this condition. I can assure you that your health issues and his are different. Raynar does not want your pity. He is here, and he is healthy. Please enjoy him and get to know your son. He is a wonderful human being, and he works hard to stay healthy and strong.”

Jonas, for as long as I had known him, always held me to a high standard and never showered me in praise or compliments. But hearing him talk about me and my disorder in this positive way filled some of the cracks inside of me, making me feel better about myself.

“And Torin? He didn’t mention any condition when we spoke yesterday.” There was sadness in the king’s eyes and I had to look away. I didn’t want him to be sad for me, and I didn’t want to be reminded of the seriousness of the vEDS diagnosis.

“Torin does not have the condition.” Jonas answered.

“Thank heavens.” The king replied. Thank heavens no one else we know has this God-awful disorder. It upset me, hearing the relief he felt that I was the only one affected by it. Lucky them. They could go on and live their lives free of the worries that plagued me. Torin could lift weights, join a sports team, attract the girls with his good looks and big muscles. If I lifted more than five pounds, I risked an aortic dissection or muscle tear; even sit-ups were not allowed. I was envious of Torin and all the other males my age who could stand tall and strong, compared to my five-year old boy physique. I wouldn’t wish this disorder on my worst enemy.

“Okay, I think this little white pill will help.” Jonas opened a pill bottle to show the king a pill. “You’ll want to swallow it whole in the morning with your meal. It will not make your heart problem go away, but it will help ease your discomfort and swelling and buy you some time.” Jonas set the bottle of pills on the bedside table. “Good day, Sire. I will leave you both to your visit. Raynar, see you back at Kyra’s.” Jonas nodded at me.

“Oh, I haven’t seen Kyra in some time. She’s one of my best Guardians. Do tell her I said hello and would love a visit.” The king clearly had no knowledge of her passing or his son’s involvement in it. Henrick stilled and shook his head slightly, letting us know we shouldn’t speak of it. Jonas and I looked at each other noting the power shift in the village. Larkin had the reins and Henrick was either on Larkin’s team or wanting to protect Vintras from worry and stress. I didn’t know which was true.

“I will. Good day.” Jonas nodded and left; Henrick followed him out.

“How long has it been since you’ve seen Kyra?”

“I don’t know. Time passes differently when you are bedridden. Maybe a few weeks. Why?”

“Just curious. I wonder if you could tell me more about my mother. How did you meet her?” I wanted to know the story of how Torin and I came to be.

“My father, your grandfather, was a stern king with many rules. He was strong and no one dared cross him, but I was young and adventurous. He forbade me from venturing past the boundary. He said it was dangerous and no place for a king’s son. Now that I am older and look back at that time, I believe he made these rules so he did not have to assign people to watch me. The village was very busy, trying to build goods for trade and develop a working port for the ships to come in and out from. Unfortunately, we lost the port after a very bad winter. The tributary thawed, but the waterways had shifted. My father and his men had more important things to consider and couldn’t be troubled with a young boy and his adventures.” The king smiled. “But, there was a vast world around us, forests, lakes, and caves that needed discovering!” He sounded like an excited kid as he spoke of the land he had wanted to explore.

“You sound more like an explorer than a king, no offense.”

“I feel more like an explorer than a king.” He chuckled.

“My best friend was a Guardian in training and on his off days, we’d venture out past the boundary. But one day, while he was training, I snuck past the boundary on my own and I came across your mother. Her name was Meina. She looked different from the First Nation natives and our own, I had never seen her before. As you can imagine, growing up in a small village, you come to know everyone.”

A knock at the door interrupted his story. “I’m sorry, Sire. The lunch meal has arrived,” the female guard announced.

“Thank you, Evie.” She moved aside and two older women entered, carrying two trays of food.

“Good day, Sire.” One of the older women said as she bowed.

“Good day, Helena; good day, Freya. Thank you for this meal.” The king kindly addressed them, and the ladies left the room. “Let’s see what the feast is today.” He removed the lid and the plate of food looked delicious. There were fried eggs, pickled onions and carrots, a half a chicken, and cheese. “You’re in luck! They’ve brought cheese and Rowan relish.”

I removed my lid and found a similar meal. “This looks delicious. A meal fit for a king.” The king chuckled at my remark.

“Helena and Freya are the best cooks.” He popped the yolk of his egg and took a bite. Once he swallowed, he continued his story. “Meina had been out collecting Chaga mushrooms. They are these large black wrinkled mushrooms that grow on birch bark. Henrick tries to get me to eat them at each meal. They’re supposed to be good for my heart, but they taste like dirt. Anyway, she saw a bear. She was scared and young, unsure of what to do. She knew she shouldn’t run, but when she saw it, her brain told her to run.” He shrugged. “The bear chased her until she fell down this forest ravine. He lost interest, but poor Meina was injured. I found her huddled near a fallen tree in that ravine, both knees bleeding badly and a twisted ankle. Despite looking tossed about from a storm, she was beautiful.” His face lit up as he recalled meeting Meina.

“So, what did you do?” I spread the Rowan relish on a piece of chicken and tried a bite. It tasted bitter, like grapefruit and cranberries. My face must have puckered because the king laughed.

“Raynar, it may be sour, but it’s better than a dirty mushroom and it is excellent for your health.” He spread his own relish over a hunk of chicken and took a bite, making a satisfied sound. “Suffer through it. You’ll thank me later.”

“It’s not bad. It’s just my brain expected something sweeter. The sourness surprised me.” I sipped my water to wash it down.

“Anyway, I approached her slowly because she looked scared.” The king sipped his drink. “I told her I wanted to help, and I asked her to wait there for me. Then I took my water skin from my pack and helped wash and bandage her knees while she told me what had happened. Because she had twisted her ankle, I had to help her get back to her small home in the forest. The next chance I had to run out near the ravine, I took it and found Meina at the top, reading from a family journal. She later confessed that she went there with hopes of running into me again.”

I finished the meal and sat back, satisfied and full of the delicious food. “So, you had regular meetups in the forest after that?”

He nodded. “We dreamed of building a life together. She spoke with her mother about the village and tried to change her opinion of the Yardinians. And I spoke to my father and mother about magic users and the benefit they could bring to the village. But no one besides Meina and I cared about making a change and unifying the two groups. Stubbornness and a fear of outsiders kept them from considering the possibilities.”

“That’s a shame.” I tried to put myself in his shoes. I thought about Lauren and how frustrating and difficult a relationship would be if her parents and my parents were against us coming together. Of course we weren’t together, but thinking this way helped me understand their situation.

“Then Meina told me she was with child. So many emotions flowed through me. I loved her and now we would have a baby born out of that love. But our love was forbidden, and I was not an average villager. There were expectations. My father had become ill and the medic gave him several months to live. I spent less time with Meina and more time learning how to rule a village.”

“But you saw her still, when you could?” I couldn’t imagine feeling torn between my dying father and the upcoming birth of my child.

“When I could, which wasn’t often enough. Each time we met, her belly seemed to double in size. We eventually found she was carrying two children and that was a lot for Meina’s small frame.” He adjusted himself in bed.

“How did her mother take the news of her pregnancy?” King Vintras’s family was probably none the wiser about he and Meina, but she could not hide that she’d slept with a man and was with child.

“She did not take it well. In fact, that was when Malora increased her efforts to attack Yardis and try to drive us away. Houses were set on fire, severed animal heads were hung from trees within the village, and Yardinians that got too close to the boundary had curses placed on them.”

“What kind of curses?” All this magic and mysticism in this world, not some parallel universe, fascinated me.

“Blindness, craziness... The most terrifying curse happened to a woman who chased her wandering child back within the boundaries. She returned to the village, terrified, and told of seeing Malora near a tree trying to entice the child to come to her. The woman grabbed the child and hurried away, looking back at Malora as she ran. Malora stood, finger pointed at them, mouth muttering some incantation. The next morning the girl awoke to find her mother lying next to her, dead with spiders crawling out from her mouth—hundreds of them.” He shook his head at the memory.

“They came out from her mouth?”

The king nodded. “The poor child had been bitten so many times that she died the same day from the horror and the pain.”

“That’s terrible. How old was she?”

“Maybe seven. Anyway, my father wanted no truce with Malora. In fact, he had ordered her dead. I feared the hunts for her would lay Meina and the babies in danger, and I pleaded with my father to call them off. But he never did. Malora must have spelled the territory around her home, cloaking them, as no one succeeded in finding them.” The king lay down, pulling the blankets up beneath his chin. “I’m sorry; I’m getting tired.”

“Do you need anything?”

“No, thank you. I need to finish the story before sleep overtakes me.” He cleared his throat and continued. “A few months had passed, and I knew that you and Torin must have been born. I desperately wanted to see you with my own eyes and to see Meina, the mother of my children. “I wasn’t sure how the cloaking worked; I only knew that countless times before, when I had escorted Meina home, her house stood in this spot. Physically, it was still there. I could feel the wood of the exterior walls beneath my fingers, but it was completely invisible. I called Meina’s name, but she did not appear or answer. I tried the door and window, but neither budged so I hid behind a bush and waited. Finally, Malora returned and uncloaked the house to enter it.” He took another long sip of water and blinked his eyes a few times. I was arguing with myself about wanting to hear the rest of the story and wanting to let the poor, sick man rest when he finally continued, “I could hear Malora and Meina arguing about something and the babies crying. I needed to hold them. I waited, and after a while, Malora left. The house began to fade before my eyes and I ran for the door, making it just in time.

“Inside that house was my own version of happiness. Meina sat trying to soothe one of you, and she froze the moment our eyes met. She looked to the door with fear in her eyes, as if her mother would soon return and find us. She told me her mother was taking them far away from Yardis. She had begged to stay and work it out with the villagers, but her mother would not hear of it. The other baby began crying. She handed the calm baby to me while she picked the upset child into her arms and spoke gently to it. She was a loving and a perfect mother, right from the start.”

I tried to picture what the king spoke of and I wondered why my mother did not keep us. Why were Torin and I sent to Midland when our father saw that our mother was so good to us?

“I’d made a decision to leave the village and run off with Meina and the babies to make a life for ourselves. They were my life. They were what mattered. They were my family. But Malora returned and the moment she saw me there, holding one of the babies, she flew at me. Meina stepped between us and pleaded for her mother to stop.” The king began coughing again, and the fit seemed to pain him.

I sat up and handed him his water again, and he waved for me to sit back down.

“I’m all right.” He sipped some water. “Malora and I argued. I told her about my father dying, and I promised I would be a different king. I promised that Meina would sit by my side and our children would be treated with respect and loved by all in the kingdom. I meant it.” His expression darkened. “But then she tricked me. She agreed to let Meina and the babies have a life with me and said she believed my words.” His eyes filled with tears as he recalled the memory. “I loved her, but the witch took her away from me.”

“What do you mean?” What had Malora done with her daughter.

“She told me she would wait, that she wouldn’t leave and take Meina with her. Once I was king, she’d let Meina and I marry—I just needed to bring a proper dowry for Meina. If Meina tried to warn me not to trust her mother, I missed it, too blinded by the hope she had seeded in me.” He sighed. “Once I returned to the village, I learned my father had passed in my absence. I wanted to return for Meina immediately, dowry in hand—give the witch anything to have Meina and my children—but now I had responsibilities for seeing to my dead father’s wishes. I confided in Lysa, my father’s most trusted Guardian, and asked her to bring a chest of treasures in trade for Meina and the children.” The king started coughing even more, splashing water on the skins covering his bed, but he waved me away when I tried to help. “Lysa returned with the chest and grim news. The small home in the forest was found uncloaked and abandoned except for the two crying babies lying in soiled clothes in their small wooden beds.”

“Did she wait to see if Meina would return? Maybe she jumped to conclusions and got it wrong? Maybe Meina was coming back,” I suggested.

The king shook his head and slid his cup onto the table beside the bed. “She waited and waited; she didn’t bring me the news until that evening. She changed the babies soiled clothes and made sure they were secure in the shelter of the home and returned for my instructions.” He shook his head. “Malora took my love away from me and her babies. I sent Lysa, Jaron, and Jonas to retrieve the babies. But when they returned, the barrier spell had been cast, and they were closed off from the village.”

Clapping came from behind me. Larkin must have snuck into the room at some point. He pushed off the wall. “Beautiful story, Father, no wonder you are so happy to see your new sons. Makes my mother seem like a consolation prize.” Larkin was without his guards.

“Larkin, do not question the love I had for your mother! You don’t know my heart. I loved your mother, but I also loved Meina. Both were smart and beautiful women, and both gave me sons that I love with my whole heart.” The king tried to sit up in bed but struggled. The afternoon had been emotionally and physically draining on him. He fell back on his pillows, coughing with his eyes closed.

“How much could you have loved this Meina? You moved on so quickly, taking my mother as your wife.” Larkin challenged. He said my mother’s name with an edge that made me hate him more than I already did. I never wanted her name to cross his lips again.

The king tensed. His mouth narrowed into a thin line as he met Larkin with an expression far more menacing than a father staring down at his errant child. For a moment, Larkin cowered, but he quickly donned his mask of indifference and left abruptly, slamming the door behind him.

The king let out a breath. “He feels threatened by your presence.” The king shut his eyes. “That is enough storytelling for today. I must rest.”

I rose and helped pull the covers around the king. He grabbed my hand. “Raynar, thank you for coming to see me. It means everything to me, to see you after all these years.” His hand squeezed mine and I tightened my grip as well. “Tomorrow I shall like to see you and Torin here together.” He loosened his grip and patted my hand before he turned over to sleep.

I let myself out of the king’s stronghold and walked back to Kyra’s. I thought about the Vintras’s story, and I wondered, where my mother had disappeared to and why had she not taken Torin and I with her? I walked through the village with my mind chasing around multiple theories; I felt the watchful eye of the king’s guards on me.

Kyra’s house was empty. I expected Jonas or Torin to be home by now, as the evening meal soon approached. I lay on my makeshift bed and let my thoughts wander to Lauren. Listening to the king’s tales of his young love made me think about the lost chance I had with the girl I loved.

The last pep rally of our 8th grade year had started. Lauren pushed past several kids and wiggled her body next to mine. Greg Jones grunted as his personal space shrunk by half because of her bold move. She didn’t bother apologizing to him.

“What’d I miss?” She beamed. It was only May, but she managed to already have a summer glow about her.

“Hey, nothing. Everyone’s still too loud for them to get it started.”

Principal Donaldson stepped up to the mic and commanded silence. After a minute, the crowd quieted enough for the rally to begin. Lauren laced her fingers in mine as she had countless times before, but as everyone’s attention was trained on the cheerleaders that bounded across the gym floor, she pulled our hands to her lips and placed a gentle kiss on the back of my hand. My face warmed and my insides turned to goo. This was new and a bold move by Lauren. I could feel her eyes on me, trying to gauge my reaction. I met her stare as firecrackers of excitement exploded within me. I picked up her hand and placed a soft kiss on the back of it, showing her that I liked this step forward.

But I had blown my chance with Lauren and instead of moving forward as she had tried to lead us, I had pulled away. It hadn’t been a week since my parents had stamped the vEDS expiration date on me. Forty-two the magic number that, from that day forward, would make me cringe. They had taught me from day one how to advocate and stay safe with my fragile body, but this had been the first time they had ever shared the average age of death in patients with vEDS. They’d regretted telling me the moment they saw my face fall. Sure, they had tried to cushion the blow by telling me of some had lived beyond that number and had reassured me it was just a number. Yes, it was just a number, but it was a low number.

Would I live long enough to marry, have kids, make a life for myself? Would I make it past forty-two or would I die in my teens as many males with this condition had? Reflecting on my diagnosis and its prognosis kicked my anxiety into high gear. If Lauren had been there, she’d have done something abnormal to get my brain thinking about something else.

Lauren was my happily ever after. She was the only girl I cared about and envisioned sharing my life with. But how could I condemn her to my short and tragic future?

I was so good at blowing a good thing. Once, she’d tried to get me to talk about what was bugging me and why I’d pushed away instead of taking the next step forward. But there had been so much to sort through, so many emotions and I’d needed to find the answers within myself before sharing them with her.

Unfortunately, it took longer than I had hoped, and when Freshman year began, Derek had taken an interest in my girl and had not been timid about taking the relationship to the next level.

“Raynar! You are here!” Jonas stood in the doorway with Torin beside him. I hadn’t heard them come in, but I was glad to see that they were okay.

“I am. I came here after talking with the king. Where were you two?” I asked.

“After meeting with Henrick, I went to look for Torin. Unfortunately, the king’s guards were taking him somewhere to be questioned. Kaden found me and helped me locate Torin. Unfortunately, it also put us in the crosshairs and we were pulled in and questioned as well.” Jonas explained as he kicked off his boots and sat on the edge of his bed.

“What did they ask you?” I looked to Torin who turned his back to me while he changed into a clean shirt.

“They wanted to know why we were here and how we got here.” He turned and sat with his legs folded beneath him.

“You didn’t tell them about the dragons, did you?” I worried for Poe and his brothers.

Torin shook his head. “No. I told them we tapped our heels and wished to see King Vintras, and it worked.”

Jonas chuckled at the boldness of Torin. “You’re lucky they didn’t kill you on the spot.”

Torin laughed. “They didn’t catch the Oz reference. But Cross, we plan to leave tomorrow. If we wait much longer, I’m worried we may run into trouble leaving this place.”

“The king wants to see us both tomorrow, at the same time,” I told Torin.

“You both shall see him in the morning.” Jonas declared. “Then we will leave by afternoon without any announcement. Understood?”

Torin and I nodded in agreement of Jonas’ plan.

Chapter 13

The next morning, we packed our bags so we'd be ready for a prompt departure this afternoon.

"Do not tell anyone we are leaving today. We don't want to raise any alarms." Jonas cautioned us. "Let's grab a bite before heading to see the king." We headed to the tavern and sat at a table close to the door. Jonas waved to the barmaid who had served us the last time we had come in. She looked at us but turned a cold shoulder and walked away. Jonas pushed away from the table and approached the bar to have a word with a gentleman who appeared to be the owner.

Kaden came in and met eyes with Torin, then turned to leave without acknowledging us. Torin's look of disbelief turned to one of concern. "Ray, something's up. I have a bad feeling about this." He spoke in a low voice. "Get out of here and run. Hide somewhere, and we'll meet up with you at Kyra's and leave together."

"What? No!" I argued quietly. "Nothing has happened. We've done nothing wrong."

"We are a threat to Larkin and his ways. If something happens to King Vintras, we will be dealt with under Larkin's power. Something is up and the safest place for you is far from here in hiding. Now go!" Torin gritted his teeth and scanned the room, assessing any potential danger.

I stood and exited the building, and then I ran as fast as my feet would carry me. I ran in the direction opposite of Kyra's house.

A deep voice announced, "King Vintras is dead. Long live King Larkin. Seize them." Sounds of a scuffle broke out behind me, but I didn't stop to look back as guards chased after me, shouting to stop.

"I've got him." An approaching female guard dove and got ahold of my ankle. I fell to the ground, tugging and kicking to get free. Three more guards, weapons drawn, were only a few yards away. I gasped and fought. My captor now held her dagger in her free hand. I was gonna die. All this time I had worried about dying by the hands of vEDS. And there I was, facing an execution by blade.

I wanted more from this life.

I landed my hardest kick in the guard's face. She grabbed her bleeding nose just as the other guards arrived.

An explosion rocked my body. Every cell felt stretched to the point of popping. I did not enter Death's door peacefully; I rocketed through as if my presence there was long overdue.

As I floated high above the ground, I remembered hearing people on YouTube recount their near death experiences. Some spoke of floating above the scene of their death, as they watched emergency crews try to resuscitate them. The guards below stepped back and pointed at me with panicked expressions. Could they see me? Surely not. I saw my White Pony T-shirt in shreds on the grass near the female guard who had held me. My jeans lay in pieces nearby. Where the hell was my body?

“Get the archers! Hurry!” One male guard commanded. “Shield wall!”

The remaining handful of guards on the ground formed a circle with their shields encasing them in a layer of protection.

“What abilities does this dragon have?” The one commanding everyone asked.

Dragon? I bent my head and saw scaled limbs and a long, deadly looking tail extending behind me. I wanted to fly higher and found the mere thought was enough to propel me where I wanted to go. I soared high above the ground and circled back to the scene below. The guards crouched lower to hide their vulnerable bodies. Arrows flew at me from a distance and one landed in my thigh. I howled in pain, only it sounded like a monstrous roar, frightening me. I needed to land somewhere safe to tend to my wound and figure out a plan for saving Torin and Jonas.

I flew over the circle of oaks that marked the village boundary. The landscape beneath looked different from when Fenick brought us. If only I could find my way back toward the shop that Poe and his brothers kept, they could help me.

I circled the of oak ring and noticed more and more guards congregating and shooting arrows at me. I widened my path, careful not to stray too far and lose my bearings.

“One who flies in circles is either lost or protecting something.” A female voice said. I turned and saw a large sea-green and silver dragon fly up next to me. She flew all around me as though she was studying me. “You’re new. I can tell by your irregular flight pattern.” She flew so close I thought she would hit me and I swear she sniffed me. “You’re a hybrid and you’re wounded. Come. Follow me.”

She took the lead, and soon I recognized the clearing behind the shop. Remembering that Ren and Fenick dressed in the nearby bushes, I landed awkwardly on a tree in that same area, snapping the wood in half under my heavy weight, causing me to fall to the ground. I lay on the forest floor, naked and once again human. Shutting my eyes, I let out a deep breath. I was alive and surprised that I had survived the trauma I had put my body through.

“Are you alright?” The female voice called from far away.

“I’m alive.” I covered my privates with my hands in case she approached.

“Naked?” she asked.

“Yep.”

She laughed and threw a set of wadded up clothes in my direction. They landed a short distance away from me. “Try those.”

I rolled over and scooped with my good leg to get them. “Thanks. Not sure the pants will work with this arrow sticking out of my leg. Any chance you could go in the shop and ask for Poe?” I worried about moving too much, unsure how close this was to my femoral artery. Maybe as a dragon I could handle injury, but my human form was fragile. I had years of knowing what actions could be deadly, and this qualified.

Poe appeared through the foliage, his eyes wide in shock. “Hey, I didn’t think I’d see you, or this much of you, this soon. I heard you’re part dragon! No wonder you healed so quickly last time.”

“Poe, right now all I can think about is this arrow. Help me get it out, and we can have a long talk about dragon life.”

Poe laughed and knelt down beside me. “Deal. There’s not too much blood so it probably missed the important stuff. Close your eyes and don’t open them till I tell you.”

“What? Here? Now?” I asked.

“Yes. I don’t have the man power to get you in the house. Now, close your eyes or you’ll mess up the spell and end up with half a leg.”

“Seriously? Shit.” I shut my eyes tight. His hands wrap around my thigh and the skin warmed with his magical ability. Then I felt a tug at my thigh and heard a snap. “What are you doing? Why is my leg getting cold now?”

“Ray, relax—almost done.”

“Have you done this before? Are you qualified? I’d feel better if you could just cut it short and get me to a hospital.” I panicked. I knew with my vEDS that I needed to have skilled hands operating on me that understood and anticipated complications, not a teenager with backwoods magic.

I thought of the story Beth Miller had shared on our Facebook support group. She was a mom who had lost her daughter at age fifteen to vEDS. Her daughter had been undiagnosed at the time and had gone to the ER with severe abdomen pain. They’d spent too long getting blood tests and ruling out common causes and finally had found a perforated colon. They’d taken her to surgery, but she’d died on the table. Her tissue had literally fell apart as the doctors had tried to repair her. For years, I had been told that all surgeries, unless life-saving, were out of the question, but they recently revised the precaution to state that non-elective surgery was safe if performed by a skilled surgeon with knowledge of vEDS. Removing an arrow from my thigh qualified as non-elective since I could not go through life with a rod of wood through my appendage. But I also knew that Poe, number one, was not a skilled surgeon or really any surgeon, and two, had limited knowledge about my rare condition.

My fingers found the Guardian’s medallion around my neck as I let it transport me back to my youth and the day I learned how to ride my bike. The spell of the medallion was powerful; I could smell the fresh cut summer grass, hear kids playing, and feel the wind on my face.

“Take a big breath in…” I did as Poe instructed, and then he pushed and pulled at my leg making me sick to my stomach. “It’s out.”

I rolled to the side and puked.

“I have to keep pressure on it.” He pushed down hard on the wound.

“Dammit! It hurts.” My voice choked.

“Yep, but I have to slow the bleeding.” I opened my eyes to see Poe covered in sweat. He turned toward the shop and yelled, “Mom?”

“What?” The woman’s voice sounded far away.

“I need my supplies, Mom. Bring me water, gauze, a wrap and the tincture in the blue bottle.” He looked back down at me. “You doin’ alright?”

“Yeah, the cold sensation helps with the pain. She’s your mom?”

“Yep.” He nodded.

“Makes sense. Are you part dragon too?”

“No, my dad’s genes are dominant in me. My ability to heal came from him. What I wanna know is how are you part dragon?” Poe asked. A magenta colored cloth approached, drawing Poe’s attention. “Better cover your junk. Here.” Poe handed me the sweatpants which I laid across my privates.

“Here.” She handed him a small basket with the supplies. “How is he?” His mother was beautiful. She had very few wrinkles and a slender figure that appeared to be somewhat athletic. She had dark eyes and her brown hair was accented with silver streaks.

“Good. He’s a fast healer and the arrow head came all the way through and was intact.” Poe poured water on the wound and handed the bottle to me encouraging me to drink the rest. He dabbed at my thigh with the gauze till the bleeding had slowed, then he coated a wrap with the pungent tincture from the blue glass bottle and wrapped it snug around my thigh. “Smells awful but works like a charm.” The smell reminded me of rotten eggs. “Glad you gave him Fen’s joggers; Ren would have gone ballistic if you sacrificed his,” Poe said. “Here.” He handed her the garbage and supplies. “Take this in, please? We need a guy’s minute here.”

After she left, Poe helped me pull the clothes on, then hoisted me up to a standing position. “Take it easy, today. Tomorrow you can move around more but nothing crazy. After that, depending on how fast you heal, you may be ready for normal activity.”

I hobbled toward the shop with Poe supporting some of my weight. “Poe, I’m curious, did you use magic to remove the arrow or did you yank it out?”

He turned to me with a smile. “Yanked it.”

“Dammit, I knew it.” I shook my head and chuckled.

“You wouldn’t have let me near that thing if I you’d known I was gonna yank it out. Would you?” He cocked his eyebrow.

“No. Probably not. Thanks for getting it out.”

“You’re welcome. Let’s get some food in you and set you up somewhere comfortable so you can rest. Then you can tell us what happened and where the others are.” We entered the shop, and Poe helped set me up in a comfy chair where I could prop my feet up onto a table.

His mom returned with a bowl of some sort of stew that had better flavor than the Yardinian stew. “Here, if it’s not spicy enough I can bring over some spices.”

“No, it’s fine. Tastes better than what I had in the village.” The flavors were stronger and the meat was more tender.

“Fenick and Ren bring us back spices from further south when they travel and trade with others.” She took a seat next to me and extended her hand toward me. “We haven’t properly met. My name is Meina.”

Meina—as in King Vintras’s Meina? My heart stopped beating. My mind raced to connect all the dots while a million words that begged to be spoken became lodged in my throat.

“What is it? You look troubled.” Her expression softened with concern.

I thought of the king’s stories. This woman seemed about the right age. But if she was the one the king spoke of.. “Do you know King Vintras?” I cut to the chase.

She blinked and considered what I had asked. “I have not heard that name in years. How do you know it?”

“He’s my father. I met him a few days ago. He spoke of a girl that he loved named Meina.” Tears welled up in her eyes. “He spoke of you.” She nodded and covered her mouth with a shaky hand. I reached over and took her free hand in mine. “He said you are my mother. Is that true?”

A sob bellowed out of her as she nodded her head, too upset to speak. I leaned closer and put my arm around her, wrapping her in as much of a hug as I could.

“I never thought I would see you again.” She looked into my eyes and smiled. “And here you are, right before me like a dream come true. What do they call you?”

“My name?” She nodded. “My name is Raynar Cross.”

Her smile grew bigger. “They kept the name I gave you! You have a twin brother that I had named Torin. Do you know of him?”

“I do.” My tone of voice sounded dismal.

“What? What is it?” She noticed and became alarmed.

“He and the Guardian who has cared for him these years were taken prisoner in Yardis.”

“Yardis? Have they committed a crime against the king?”

“No.”

She looked relieved. “Well then it is a mistake. Does the king know that Torin is his son?”

“He knows, but as I fled, I heard a guard announce that King Vintras, had died.” Meina’s eyes widened. “His son Larkin has taken power. The villagers fear him and the king’s guard.” Meina stood and began pacing the room as I continued. “With the barrier lifted, he must feel threatened that all will flee and seek freedom, so he forbids the villagers to leave and executes those that plot a safe passage away from Yardis. After the king’s guards announced the passing of King Vintras, they were immediately ordered to seize Torin, Jonas, and me. But Torin had sensed something was up and begged me to run and hide.”

My mother turned to face me. She smiled, but her eyes looked sad. “I loved your father. I don’t know what he told you about us and you and Torin, but he was a kind and loving man. I wish with all my heart that I could have seen him once again before he passed.”

Poe entered the room and when he recognized his mother was upset, he hurried over to her. “Mom, are you okay? What’s wrong?” He wrapped her in a hug.

“Sit. We have much to tell you,” she urged.

Over the next hour or so, Meina and I told shared the story of my parents with Poe. I added the latest details about Torin and Jonas being held captive and expressed my concern that Larkin could kill them at any moment. Poe did not say much as he listened intently. When we had finished, he cleared his throat and said, “Let’s make a plan to kick Larkin’s ass and save my brother.”

Chapter 14

Later that evening, when Ren and Fenick returned, we shared the stories with them and made a plan for saving Jonas and Torin. Thankfully, due to the spell or Ren actually listening, he managed sit through the conversation without losing his cool.

After the evening meal, Poe checked my wound and we were both surprised to see how much it had healed. He rewrapped it with the smelly tincture and a new wrap and said he believed I'd be as good as new in the morning. I was thankful my body seemed stronger and healed faster, because I didn't trust Larkin and worried that there was no reason to keep Jonas and Torin alive much longer—if they were even still alive. The sooner we got them out of there, the better.

The plan was simple but dangerous. We needed to create a diversion to draw the guards and hopefully Larkin away from the castle area where I assumed Torin and Jonas would be held. The rest of us would help free them and attack Larkin. We didn't get detailed as we knew we'd have to improvise based on what Larkin and the guards did.

Fenick gave me a crash course on how to quickly change between dragon and human forms while Ren tried his best to piss me off enough to activate any special powers I might possess. He said strong emotions made it easier to transform, but after he grabbed me with his talons and dropped me into the small pond near the shop for the third time, Poe called it off. Ren changed back into human form laughing hysterically. The jerk took pleasure out of poking at me. The short training session left me better at transforming, but confident I did not have any mystical powers like fire or ice breathing, as my brothers possessed.

Poe patted me on the back. "Maybe healing is your power?" Poe suggested.

"I don't know. Honestly, I feel stronger. It's nice to not feel like I'm falling apart from doing simple everyday tasks."

Ren walked past and threw a towel my way. "Good try, buddy. Anytime you wanna have another go, let me know." He smirked as he walked away.

"Sorry about him. He's prickly on the outside but has a good heart." Poe yelled after Ren. "Hey! Tell Fenick and Mom we leave in a few minutes." Ren continued walking and raised his arm and gave a single wave, letting Poe know he heard.

"What do you think caused the change? I mean I had never changed into a dragon before."

Poe thought for a minute. “I don’t know. Maybe it changed when I healed you, like some inner switch got flipped allowing you to access the inner dragon. Or maybe there is something about this land. I don’t know, and we may never know. But I’m glad we got another badass dragon on our side.” He fist-bumped me. “Let’s go. We have a big day ahead of us.”

We headed into the shop and had a quick bite to eat. Then we grabbed some bags that Meina had packed with medic supplies, water bottles, basic weapons, and something called pemmican which consisted of fat, seed, meat, and dried fruits.

Fenick carried the contraption that Meina and Poe rode on. Ren held the bags while I was free to focus on not crashing. The plan was for Fenick and Ren to create a distraction. Poe would wait in the shadows, ready to heal either of them. Meanwhile, Meina and I would find and free Jonas and Torin.

Ren led us to the safe area on the outskirts of the village where Fenick had dropped us off a few days ago. Meina and I took one of the bags while Poe kept the other and continued on with his brothers.

Meina, my mom, reached out and grabbed my hand.

“Are you nervous?” I asked her, trying to imagine how hard it would be, seeing my children enter into danger without me being nearby to help them fight.

“I am. These people do not like our kind. At least they didn’t when I knew the village. I worry for my sons even though they are strong and capable. I guess mothers never stop worrying for their children. Even you and Torin, all these years I held you both close in my heart, thinking of you often and wondering...worrying about your fate.” She squeezed my hand and then released it. “We’d better get moving.”

She led me a different way toward the village. We stopped in a wooded area near the village’s house of worship. The building was larger than the tavern and plain in design except for the large runes carved in the structure’s wood. The king’s stronghold was beyond the temple.

“That’s it there.” I pointed ahead. “There are guards at the main door and several in the main room.” I knelt down next to Meina, who looked nervous but patiently waited and scanned the area.

“Get ready. I see Ren.” She gripped the bag tight in her hands. The sound of arrows cut through the air drawing my attention to the sky where two dragons swooped from opposing sides toward the stronghold. Fiery breath came from what I assumed was Ren. His flight pattern looked aggressive as he dive-bombed guards, picking them up and tossing them from high up. The other dragon breathed it’s icy breathe to extinguish the fires that broke out on the structure and flew to the courtyard behind the building where he released another frozen breath. “That’s it,” I said. “Let’s go.”

Meina ran faster than I thought she could run. She scaled a wall at the back of the stronghold like a monkey and then leaned down from the top, extending her hand to me. We were in the courtyard at the rear of the stronghold. I expected more resistance on this side of the wall, but another pass from Ren and Fenick disabled the guards. They stood like statues, frozen by Fenick’s frozen blast.

“We don’t have long before they thaw.” Meina did not head for the backdoor of the building, instead she scaled a small wall and entered the palace through a window. I followed with far less grace than she exhibited. Once inside, we stayed in the shadows and noted the positions of the few guards. Worry lined their faces as all of their attention was toward the outside, where one of the dragons let out a ground shaking roar. “See that door over there?” She pointed across the room to a single wooden door with a draw bar and a guard beside it. “That’s got to be it.”

“How are we going to get in without being seen?”

Meina set the bag down and handed me a deadly looking dagger. The handle was carved from bone and the seven-inch blade was narrow and made to pierce organs. “Make the hit count, immobilize with a hit to the leg or take them down with a thrust to the heart.” She must have recognized the doubt I wore on my face. “I know you are worried and have probably never fought with weapons before, but they will not hesitate to use theirs on us, and we must try and save your brother and his Guardian.”

She was right. I only hoped that when I needed to use the dagger, I would have the confidence to do so. There was a pounding at the door, as if someone was trying to come through with a battering ram. The guards stood frozen in place, all eyes trained on the entrance.

“Let’s move.” Meina grabbed the bag and snuck toward the barred door. I followed close behind. The knocking stopped, freezing Meina and I in the shadows.

BAM!

The doors splintered and the red dragon tossed a bloodied guard from his jaws into the room and let out a roar. Meina and I hurried to the barred door, both of us assuming it was a dungeon, as the guards fought the dragon. Even the one at the door rushed to help, not even seeing us as he ran by. Meina paused and looked at Ren, worried for her son. The red dragon released a scorching breath. Guards on fire screamed, running about the room as parts of the wooden structure ignited. The others hurried to extinguish the flames. Fenick replaced Ren in the doorframe and sent an icy breath into the room. The brothers worked in concert to accomplish the goal with minimal casualties and damage. It was an impressive sight.

Meina and I pulled the bar free, and we entered a stone walled room with two doors on each side and one straight ahead. We cautiously but quickly searched our way down the hall. One door led to another set of wooden walled rooms that housed supplies such as firewood, animal food, weapons, and what looked like a small collection of gold and silver artifacts and coins. The last room held what we sought.

Torin looked up from the wooden pillory that imprisoned him. “Cross! You made it out!” King Vintras lay on an animal skin on the ground beneath the second wooden pillory that held Jonas who looked beaten.

Jonas weakly raised his head revealing one eye swollen shut and a split lip. “Thank Freya,” he muttered as his head fell.

Henrick sat beside the king with his feet in stocks looking relieved to see us. “The king, he is not well. He needs medicine.”

I used my dagger to free Henrick while Meina used a tool to pick the locks on the stocks and pillories.

“Who is this?” Torin nodded toward Meina as he rubbed at his now free wrists and walked over to Jonas.

“I’ll tell you later. She’s on our side.” I didn’t want to delay our escape.

Meina freed Jonas, who fell to the ground. His back of his shirt had a pattern of rips; the skin beneath was striped with open wounds. Had they whipped him?

Torin fell to his knee beside him. “Dad!” He helped roll Jonas onto his side.

A weak smile crossed his face as he touched Torin’s face.

Meina had given Henrick a tincture for King Vintras, and then came over and handed her water skin to Jonas, instructing him to drink. Jonas lifted his eyes and blinked. “Meina?”

She looked surprised but didn’t seem to recognize Jonas. “How do you know me?”

Torin studied her with interest, probably piecing together that she was our mother.

“I was a Guardian, and I once spied Vintras meeting with you deep in the woods outside of Yardis.” Jonas sounded weak and tired.

“I had no idea he had been followed.” She blushed.

Jonas smiled weakly and closed his eyes.

“Dad!” Torin shook Jonas’ leg till he slowly opened his eyes.

“I’m tired son. I just want to rest.”

“We need to get you out of here.” Meina and Torin tried to help Jonas stand, but he was too weak and fell to the ground. Torin hoisted Jonas over his shoulders.

Henrick leaned over Vintras, shaking his head as he held Meina’s now-empty tincture bottle. “The king still struggles for breath...”

“The village needs to see him alive,” I said, moving to help Henrick lift a wheezing Vintras, who didn’t even seem aware of being moved. “When they see that Larkin and his men imprisoned their king, they will revolt against him.”

“We need to—” Henrick began.

“Henrick...” The familiar voice of Larkin sent my heart racing. “You’ve always meddled in my plans, bringing him back from the brink of death again and again and again. I should have killed you. But I was foolish, wanting to keep my father alive long enough to show him that I made his kingdom great again.” Two guards flanked Larkin, swords drawn. In the small room, they could still block the entrance while keeping the points of their blades inches from Torin’s and my throats. Behind them, the sounds of dragon battle still filtered—but even if Ren and Fenick had taken out the soldiers, could they fit down the small hall Meina and I had come?

“Larkin, you could never make this kingdom great.” Henrick transferred the king’s weight all on me and pointed at Larkin. “You dishonor all that your ancestors have created. People chose to follow them because they were good strong leaders.” Henrick was letting it out. “They didn’t force people to stay as you are. They didn’t need to. You are not fit to lead these people; you only wish to keep them as obedient pets.”

Larkin seemed to vibrate with fury as Henrick spoke. Henrick did not see the blade coming. Larkin thrust his dagger deep into Henrick’s heart and turned the handle to inflict more damage. “Farewell, you opinionated, weak, waste-of-life.” Larkin withdrew his blade and kicked Henrick down and turned toward the crowd. “Who’s next?”

My anxiety pushed my heart rate high. Larkin grabbed Meina by the throat. “Let’s start with the pretty one. Perhaps we’ll have a little fun with her first.” Larkin drew his own blade, disarming Meina as she lunged at him. He nodded at the guard on me, and he stabbed. Balancing the king in my arms, I could only back away to avoid my throat being cut by his blade.

Meina gasped, meeting my eye.

In that moment, Larkin grabbed her around the neck. She stomped on his foot, and he tightened his hold, nodding to the other guard on Torin, weighted down by Jonas. “Ah, ah, ah,” Larkin said.

She stopped fighting, realizing how easily two of her sons could be killed. “Bastard,” she growled at him.

“A feisty one!” Larkin chuckled. “But really, aren’t they the bastards? Abandoned by both you and my father?”

Meina buckled in his arms, as if she’d fainted. As he tried to catch her limp form, she snapped her head back and into his face. He staggered, dropped his sword, and released her, grabbing his mouth with his hands. Blood and spit streamed from between his fingers. Meina kicked the knee of the next-nearest guard—the one on me.

I used that half second to lower King Vintras gently to the ground. It was macabre, but Henrick’s body served as almost a pillow.

Meina turned back to Larkin, but he was ready. He backhanded her across the face, knocking her to the ground. “You bitch,” he spat blood on her as he spoke. “How dare you do that to your king?”

“You are not my king!” she spat back.

As she tried to stand, he kicked her side and recovered his sword.

I exploded into my dragon form. Rock walls crumbled on each side of me, making more room for me to move. Unexpected sunlight made me blink. Torin’s and Meina’s voices shouted shock and alert, but I hardly heard them. My only focus was on Larkin who had his blade pointed at my mother’s throat.

He looked up at me, eyes wild. “Come any closer and I’ll—”

I didn’t let him finish. I snapped his head off with my razor-sharp teeth and spit it across the room. I felt the stabs of swords; the two guards, surrounded by rubble, attacked me blindly. Meina and Torin hurried to get Jonas and King Vintras out.

Once they left and I no longer had to be careful of my friends, I let loose on any guard who came at me. Once my attackers lay in a bloody pile, I changed back into human form and stumbled into the now-exposed courtyard. I collapsed, unable to will my limbs to move another inch. The pain from the wounds seared. I closed my eyes and focused on breathing.

I lay there wondering when death would end my pain. Finally, I felt it's strong arms wrap around me and hold me close, lifting me away from danger, from life. I felt comfort in those arms as they carried me to a place far away.

Chapter 15

Heaven, or maybe it was Hell, surprisingly looked a lot like Poe's shop. Leo—Leo?!—sat asleep in a chair next to me. Kaden and Torin chatted across the room and I swore I could hear my parents' voices in the distance. Had we all died in the battle?

"Leo?" My voice did not sound like my own. I tried again after clearing my throat. "Leo!" My big friend stirred awake, and once he got his bearings, he looked at me with the biggest smile I had ever seen him wear.

"Holy crap, he lives!" Leo beamed.

"How are you here?" Whether or not I was alive or dead, Leo should be back in Midland.

"I made the trip with your parents. I guess they got sick of me coming over every day and asking for news about you. We arrived this morning. They said you were in bad shape then they brought you here." Leo shook his head.

I looked down at my arms that had clean wraps around each forearm and wondered what the skin looked like beneath them.

"Hey! Hey! Cross is awake!" Ren shouted as he entered the room. "Dude, you are a rock star in my book! Mom told us what happened in the dungeon." He nodded his head with approval. "Totally badass. I'm gonna get Poe. He wanted to know the moment you woke up." Ren's new found respect for me surprised me but I also welcomed it.

Poe entered. He looked tired but happy to see me awake. "Finally! I'm glad to see you awake, brother." He grabbed my hand and held it. His grasp seemed weaker than normal.

"Are you okay?" It concerned me to see him like this. How much had the battle taken from him?

"I am now. You saved the village. You're a hero, and the hero has to live. But you took a beating—came in here pretty torn up. I don't know if you were too weak to heal or if your vEDS played a part, but it was a struggle to keep you alive."

"That's crazy. Thanks for saving me." I squeezed his hand.

"Anytime. Hey, I heard you bravely took out Larkin and his guards. I'm proud of you man. Glad you're back." He leaned down and gave me a hug. "I'll go get Mom. She wants to see you." Poe left, and Kaden and Torin came over.

Torin gave me a masculine side hug. "Cross, you were a beast out there! You snapped Larkin's head off and spit that jerk across the room. It was epic!”

“I wish I could have seen that.” Kaden remarked.

“Me too.” Leo added. “I can’t believe you’re part dragon.”

“Yeah, but since you’re a commoner, we’ll have to kill you at the end of this week to ensure his secret is safe.” Torin threatened.

“Funny. I’d like to see you try.” Leo countered. The two exchanged a threatening look before bursting into hearty laughter.

I thought back to Larkin’s sword at my mom’s throat. I had just met her after all these years, and I was not about to let some homicidal control freak take her out of my life. “I thought he was going to kill Mom. I remember thinking I had to save her and get him off of her, but I was afraid I’d hurt her in the process or I’d not move fast enough to save her before he...killed her.”

“So, you ripped off his head.” Leo chuckled. “Maybe you should do that to Derek the next time he’s a jerk to you.” Leo stood and excused himself to the bathroom.

Poe returned with my biological mom. She had tears in her eyes as she came to sit on the bed next to me. “You saved my life.” The tears fell from her eyes as she cuddled into my chest. I wrapped my sore arm around her.

“I couldn’t let him kill you. I only just met you, and the monster wanted to take you away from me.” Now the tears flowed from my eyes. She looked up and wiped them away. Coming in behind her were the two people whose voices I swore I had heard before. “Mom? Dad?” Seeing them here in Poe’s shop, seemed like a dream. Even though Meina was my biological mother, Lysa and Jaron had loved me as their own child. They would always be Mom and Dad to me.

Meina gave me a soft smile and kissed my forehead before stepping aside to let Jaron and Lysa step closer.

“What are you doing here?” I asked, wondering if they knew about the trouble we ran into at Yardis.

“Fenick came for us,” my father said. “He told us you were injured in battle and said Poe needed those that love you to surround you while you heal.”

“Yeah, I needed all the help I could get.” Poe added. “It helps to draw from that positive energy that only love can give.” Poe readjusted himself in the chair next to the bed, slumping with his arms folded across his chest and eyes shut.

“I’m glad you’re here. Where is Jonas?” I didn’t know what had transpired in the village after I fell unconscious or what had become of the others we rescued from the dungeon.

My mom, Lysa, came over and brushed my hair aside. “Jonas is well. He’s downstairs getting cleaned up. He told us how brave you were.”

I had faced my fears, but so had many others. “We all fought. In fact, Meina and I would have never gotten to the dungeon if Fenick and Ren hadn’t created a diversion. And Meina fought like a skilled warrior—fearless and agile. The success of the battle was not because of me; it’s because we all fought back.”

“True,” Jonas stood in the doorway, his hair looked wet and his face looked older. “But the villagers are free because you took down their corrupt leader and helped rescue their king.”

“Jonas!” It was good to see the man who had cared for me during the trip to the village. He was alive.

“Good to see you, Raynar.” He looked about the room. “I see you’ve drawn quite the crowd.” Jonas laughed as he approached.

“What happened? The last thing I remember was fighting the guards. And then getting out to the courtyard. And...thinking I was dead.”

“I came back for you,” Torin recounted. “You were in bad shape. I worried I was doing more damage as I picked you up to carry you. But I had to get you to Poe. Once the villagers saw their king was still alive, they fought against the remaining guards. Poe began healing you and our father, King Vintras, while Fenick and Ren got the others out of the area. Then they returned to bring you both here.”

“Neither of you would have made it back to the shop without some initial healing,” Poe added, his eyes still closed.

“Did King Vintras make it?” I asked.

“He did. Mom has been by his side pretty much non-stop since he arrived.” Torin rubbed the back of his neck.

“He has heart failure and was without his medications,” Jonas explained. “Henrick could do nothing to help him after they were imprisoned. The king’s health has declined, but I’ve given him some modern medications and he grows stronger. The medications are not a cure, but he is stable.” Jonas had sympathy in his eyes. And while the news was hard to hear, I was glad King Vintras was alive.

“What about the village?” I asked. With Larkin gone and Vintras’s failing health, I wondered how unstable life for the villagers had become.

Kaden came over. “Some have chosen to stay while others are ready to explore the land further south. The king will need someone to help him manage the village. There is much to rebuild after the battle. In fact, he has mentioned that either of you would be a great successor and would like to speak with you both.”

“Oh, I’m not sure the king would want me, the dragon who bit his son’s head off, to rule with him. Better send Torin.” I nodded to my brother who stood at the foot of my bed.

“Turns out I have some of that dragon blood too.” Torin confessed.

“You turned into a dragon?” I wished I had seen it.

“No, I wish.” Torin sighed.

Jonas explained, “He was the only one who came out of battle without any scratches or wounds. I took a sample of his skin and found he’s coated in microscopic scales. It’s like he’s wearing a suit of armor.” Poe opened his eyes and sat forward, resting his elbows on his knees.

“I need some of that.” With my vEDS, a suit of armor would help keep me from most injury.

“You have that.” Poe answered. “I checked your skin too once I found Torin had this mutation. The more I’ve had time to think on it, the more I believe your dragon genes activated when I healed you that first time. Jonas wants to retest you for vEDS when you get back to Midland.”

“If he goes back.” Torin added. “The people need a ruler who will treat them as fair as Vintras. Who better than Cross to lead them.”

“You would be better than me.” I countered. Torin was a natural leader. “Jonas has groomed you to be a strong leader. I saw that from the moment I met you. You had the fight and perseverance above the conflict.”

Torin turned to Jonas. “Is that why you’ve kept me at an arm’s distance my whole life?”

Jonas bit his lower lip and nodded slowly. “I knew one day you would be needed here. I trained you and taught you the best I could, and I was careful not to get too close to you.”

“Did you ever think about what I wanted?” Torin’s voice had a strong edge to it.

“You are a king’s son. You and Raynar are born of royal blood. Our village—” Jonas was interrupted by Torin.

“I wasn’t even born in that village! Visiting there a few days does not make it my village.” Torin shook his head. “You told me we were coming here to meet our dying father. That’s it.” Torin shoved Jonas in the chest. “I don’t want to rule a village. All I’ve ever wanted is to be your son. Why couldn’t you be that for me? Why couldn’t you be more like Cross’s parents?”

My heart broke for my brother. He stormed off down the hall with Jonas following after, shouting for him to stop and talk to him. The door to the shop slammed a moment later.

I turned toward my Guardian parents, “How come you raised me different than how Jonas raised Torin?” I wondered if they doubted my ability to rule when they learned I had vEDS. The worry was always in my mind that people took pity and didn’t expect much from me. Sure, I had limitations because of the fragile disorder, but I was still a person with a sound mind, and with dreams, hopes, and beliefs.

My dad looked down at the ground a moment and then met my eyes. “Jonas had warned us not to get close. He told us that as soon as the barrier lifted, we were to bring the king his children. None of us had any idea it would take as long as it had to lift the barrier, but your mother and I aren’t sorry for the time we had with you or how we treated you. We’ve loved you since the first day we held you in our arms.”

My mother grabbed my hand. “As far as the vEDS is concerned, yes, we have cautioned you about dangerous activities to avoid, but we’ve always helped you find a safe way to do the things you’ve wanted to do. When all the kids at swim lessons were diving off the diving board, we had the instructor teach you the Ray Cross Pencil Dive. It was a way you could go off the low boards with minimal risk of injury. And all those times you wanted to ride your bike around the neighborhood with friends, I wanted to put you in a bubble to keep you safe. But instead we bought you a walkie talkie so you could be free and check in from time to time. We know you are capable of great things and we have never for once doubted that you could lead the people of Yardis.”

My dad set his arm on my mom’s shoulder. “Why do you think Jonas wouldn’t let us go with you to meet the king? He worried we would cloud your judgement about staying and becoming the next king. It killed us not to go.” He shook his head. “But he was right. We grew too close to you and you needed to decide this on your own.”

I tried to swing my legs out of bed but found I was hooked to some tubes. “Hold up.” Poe held me back with his arm. “You have a catheter in. Let’s clear the room so I can remove it and get you checked out.” Poe urged everyone out of the room.

It was odd knowing he had to put a catheter in me. “How long was I out?”

Poe returned with a small bucket and a syringe. “Two days.” He lifted the blanket and within a minute, the catheter was removed. He pulled off the tape holding the piping to my leg and pulled the blanket over me. “Listen, I don’t know about this king business but I know about choices—make this choice for you, not anyone else. You’re at the crossroads and you get to choose which path to take. Your choice.” He wrapped up the medic supplies and excused himself to dump the bucket and wash his hands. He returned a moment later and shut the door behind him. “Seems Torin took off somewhere. Needed to blow off some steam.”

“Yeah, they really need to talk it out.” I added.

“Agreed. Now, let’s have a look at your wounds.” He began unbandaging my left arm.

“How did you know how to do this?” I motioned toward my privates.

“I have all my father’s notes on healing. Thankfully they were very detailed.” He laughed uncomfortably. Glad I wasn’t the only one weirded out by catheter bit. “Unbelievable.” He set the first wrap on my blanket. A pink line with slight bruising was all that remained on my bicep. “This had a huge gash in it.” He grabbed a jar from the bedside table and spread some ointment on the scar. “I had to pack the wounds before I could transport you back here. After I cleaned the wounds, I stitched you up but you healed so quick, I had to take the stitch out the very next day. I’m starting to think healing is your special power.”

“Oh yeah? Why is that?”

“I checked the wounds yesterday and they were almost closed, but a wound that large should have taken a normal person ten days to heal, probably six days for Fenick and Ren. But you healed up in one day!” Poe unwrapped my other limbs and put ointment on each of the scars. “I’m glad they didn’t hit any organs or blood vessels. You got lucky.”

“Why was I out cold for so long?” He had said I was out for two days.

“I don’t know. I can only guess it has to do with this rapid healing thing you got going on.” Poe closed the jar and wiped his hands on a towel. “Come on, Mom said she’d heat something up for you when you were ready.” Poe led me downstairs which seemed surprisingly empty.

“Where’d everyone go?”

“Good question. Here, sit and I’ll look around.” Poe checked the lower level and finally returned with our mom behind him.

“Poe says you might be up for some warm food.” She looked tired.

“It’s okay, a bag of chips will do. If they still have some” I didn’t want to trouble her. “Is everyone else gone?”

Poe grabbed two bottles of water and a bag of chips. He tossed them at me as he sat across from me. “Ren and Fenick took them to Yardis and then headed out to look for Torin.”

Our mom brought over a tray with sliced bread that looked familiar and smelled heavenly and two bowls of a stew. “I had made this yesterday. I think stew always tastes better the next day as all the ingredients marinate in each other.” She said with a warm smile. “Lysa and Jaron brought this bread for you. I think they called it Wonderful Bread.”

I picked it up, took a bite, and tasted heaven. “I have missed carbs so frickin’ bad. And not that it matters but it’s Wonder Bread, though it is pretty wonderful. Here try some!”

Meina ate the piece I had torn off for her. She did not seem as elated as I was over the non-nutritious hunk of starch. “Thank you, it was...soft.” She picked up the other bowl and tried to hand it to Poe.

“Mom, I already ate,” Poe protested politely.

“You should try some Wonder bread. It’s wonderful.” I laughed and Poe joined me.

“Seriously, Poe, you need to rebuild your strength. This will help. Eat.” She pushed the bowl into his hands. “Now, please excuse me, I want to return to Vintras and see if he needs me.” She smiled and retreated to a room on the right side of the shop.

When she was no longer in sight, Poe sat back and opened his water and took a long drink. “I didn’t think she would ever be happy again. But having this time with the man she had loved has brightened her spirits.”

“What happened? I mean with her and your dad?”

Poe let out a forceful breath. “Long story. Mom always seemed to be the unwanted child. The Yardinians hated magic users and tried to run off her and her mother. And the Gylos would not accept her because it went against the Gylos law to marry outside the tribe.”

“So, wait, how many are in this Gylos tribe?” If the tribe was small, they’d be inbred and look pretty messed up.

“There were about two hundred. My father came from the Gylos tribe but he fell in love with my mother. They didn’t have a problem with breeding outside of the tribe but when my parents decided to marry, the Gylos turned their backs on him, well most of them. He had a few friends from the tribe who would come check on him and trade goods.”

“Why did that matter? Why were they allowed to mate outside of the tribe but not marry? Makes no sense.”

“One word—Religion. Marriage in the Gylos tribe is sacred and marrying outside the tribe is blasphemy.”

“So what happened? To your Dad?”

“One day my mother went out to bring in the linens that had been hung up to dry.” He closed his eyes and tilted his head back. “I remember hearing her screaming followed by a thunderous roar. I ran to the window where I saw a large dragon attacking an army of Gylos.”

“Was your mom the dragon?”

He nodded. “I’d never seen her transform before. It terrified me. At first I thought the dragon had come and ate my mom. But by the end of the battle, she turned back into her human form. It was hard to understand. The Gylos were supposed to be peaceful healers yet they came here picking a fight.” He took in a breath and looked at me. “The Gylos charged at her, attacking her first and the battle begun. When it was over, they were all dead—every Gylos male, including my father, who had hurried to her side to fight beside her.”

“The Gylos killed your father?” I tried to imagine Poe watching this from an upstairs window as a young child.

“No.” He was silent as he looked down at the ground and said, “My mother killed him, on accident.” Poe did not look up as he rubbed at his left eye and let out a long sigh.

“I’m so sorry. When did this happen?”

“It was a few weeks ago.”

“Did you and your brothers help fight?”

“Ren and Fenick were out doing the trades. My father ordered me to stay inside. He told me he was going to speak peacefully to the men and worried my presence would only complicate things. I should have never listened to him.” He shook his head and tears fell. “I should have run out there and alerted my mom, made her aware that he was there.”

“Stop,” I put my hand on his shoulder. “Don’t do this to yourself. You don’t know that it would have changed anything. It might have made it worse.”

“I felt so helpless, standing there as my parents fought these men, as my father died.” Poe probably hadn’t had much time to grieve and vocalize the emotional event, but I could see the tension leave his body the more he opened up. “All of this over a religious law...”

He wiped the tears away. “Yeah, so when the Gylos women came to collect their dead, one came forward and apologized. Her husband had been a high council member and had incited the violence after his son had announced his marriage to a commoner. The council had been outraged with this news. So, the dad had decided to scare his kid by making an example of my family.”

“But you weren’t living within the Gylos tribe, were you?”

“No, but it didn’t matter. They came to crush all that was good in my father’s life and punish him for a choice he made years ago. Only they never anticipated facing a dragon.” He took our empty bowls to the sink and rinsed them before returning.

“That’s terrible.” Religion was good for many things, like uniting people with similar beliefs, and providing hope and purpose. But sometimes, like this instance with the Gylos, I didn’t agree with religious law. I didn’t understand why two people in love, living peacefully in the world, should be attacked, “Meina has been through so much.”

“She has. She’s been lost without him, spending more and more time away from the shop. I’ve had to look after Ren and Fennick and keep things going here.” He plopped back into the seat across from me.

“No wonder Ren and Fenick listen to you as they do.” I stretched my legs, they felt stiff from laying still for a few days.

“When they do.” Poe corrected. “Can’t believe Ren torched your ride.” He shook his head.

“Me neither. I guess Torin pissed him off.”

Poe laughed. “Not hard to do that with Ren. I swear that kid was born pissed off.”

“Can I go see him?” I nodded my head toward the room where King Vintras and Meina were visiting.

“Yeah.” Poe stood and held his hand out to help me up. “I’ll be around if you need me.”

I walked to the room and knocked on the open door. My biological parents held hands and laughed about some shared moment. They turned and greeted me.

“Raynar, come here son.” My father said as he motioned for me to come closer. “Sit, sit.”

I took a seat next to my father, across from Meina, my mother. “How are you?” I asked.

“Oh, I’ve been better.” He chuckled and coughed.

“You look better. I’m sorry about Larkin. I should have done something different, injured him instead of—”

“Raynar if you hadn’t, he might’ve killed me,” my mother said. “You acted quickly to save me. I’m alive because of you.” Her voices sounded thick with emotion.

My father said nothing, but tears filled his eyes.

“Anyway,” I stood to leave, “I’m glad you are okay, both of you.” As I stepped into the hall, I heard my father call to me.

“Raynar!” I turned to see my father trying to sit up in bed, my mother helped him. “Raynar, you mustn’t carry this burden. Your mother is correct, your quick thinking saved both of us. I am sad. I loved Larkin and wish this would have ended differently. My heart is broken over his betrayal.” He choked back his emotion and shook his head. “Never in my life would I have thought he would lock me away to take control. He knew my health was failing. Who does that to their own flesh and blood?”

My mother lifted his hand to her lips and kissed it.

“I think he worried that if villagers left, he would lose control and the village would fall apart. Did you know he murdered Kyra and the others that attempted to leave?” I asked.

He lowered his head and nodded. “I do now. Kaden told me yesterday.” He shook his head. “I had no idea such atrocities happened by my own child while I wore the crown!”

“He made those choices, not you. He was responsible for his actions. You were bedridden and unaware of his doings. Had you known and turned a blind eye, then you would be partially responsible.”

I heard the front door open and familiar voices filled the shop. I peeked over my shoulder. “Looks like Torin is back.” I stood and patted my father’s leg. “I’ll come back later to check on you.”

“Raynar? Thank you.” I turned to look back at my father who wore a grateful smile. I nodded and left to see who the other voices belonged to.

“Hey, look who has joined the living!” Ren pulled a shirt on.

“Hey.” I looked around but didn’t see anyone else. “I swear I saw Torin come in.”

“Yeah, he’s upstairs getting some clothes on. Turns out he can morph too. Came back naked as a baby to a pile of shredded clothes!” Ren laughed as he grabbed an apple and took a bite. “Where’s everyone else?”

“Most went to Yardis but Poe, Meina, and King Vintras are here.” I answered.

Torin followed Fenick down the stairs wearing the biggest smile. He looked as if he had just come off his first thrilling rollercoaster ride. “Did you see that loop I made? It was so frickin’ amazing!” Torin finally saw me “Cross! I flew so fast. It was unbelievable!”

The new ability pleasantly distracted Torin from his previous sour mood. Hopefully he could have a civilized chat with Jonas when he returned.

“Welcome to the Dragon Club.” I shook his hand. “I can’t wait to see you in action. Congrats. It’s pretty amazing being up there in the sky.”

Torin pulled up a chair. “Glad to see you up and around.” He saw the bottom of one of my red scars sticking out from under my T-shirt sleeves. He lifted it for a better look. “Wow. This looks nothing like it did a day ago. Poe has a talent.”

“He’s pretty amazing.” I agreed

“Hey, don’t inflate Poe’s ego.” Fenick hollered. “He’ll get all full of himself and then we’ll never hear the end of it.” He walked over and knocked king’s door and entered, greeting his mom and the king as he shut the door behind him.

Ren chuckled. “He’s right. Torin, you decide if you’re gonna stay put or head back to Midland? You’re welcome to stay with us.” Ren had warmed up to us. Seemed we worked our way past his prickly exterior to his softer, loyal side.

“Thanks, I appreciate that. I’ve given it some thought but haven’t decided anything. I’m waiting to hear what the king has to say; Ray and I are supposed to meet with him later. Maybe he’ll sway me.” Torin nodded toward me. “What about you Cross? You stayin’ or heading back?”

“Like you, I need to hear what our father has to say before I decide.”

“How about we chat with him after dinner?” He suggested.

“Yeah, that’s a good plan.” I wondered if the others would be back before then. We spent the rest of the afternoon outside. Fenick and Ren worked with Torin on dragon skills while I watched on from the porch. They had great tips on how to transform quickly. I was anxious to try some of their suggestions, but Poe'd advised me to wait another day to allow my energy to return to normal.

The three brothers took to the air to practice some maneuvers and flying longer distances and collected the others from Yardis. My parents approached holding hands and looking happy. Jonas nodded at me; he wore a troubled look. Kaden must have stayed behind in Yardis as he was not with the group. They stopped and greeted me before continuing in to help make supper.

"Jonas. Can we speak a moment?" I wasn't sure if he'd be open to my insight on his and Torin's relationship, but I felt I had to try.

"Sure." He pulled up a rocking chair next to mine. "What's up?"

"I wanted to talk to you about Torin."

"Oh?" His expression looked both curious and concerned.

"You've raised Torin different than Lysa and Jaron have raised me. I heard you explain why you did and I don't want to judge you or compare us both. But now he is eighteen, and he'll be out in the world making his own decisions. Life can be hard but no matter how hard it gets, it's nice to feel loved and have a soft place to land at home." Jonas sat quietly listening. "He's met King Vintras, he knows the crown can be his if he truly wants it, but in the end, I'd bet he'd give it all up to feel truly loved by you."

"I do love him. I just have not openly showed it to him." He confessed as he picked at the skin around his thumb nail.

"I know you love him. I'm just not sure he knows that. I think it would be all right if you let the wall down and told him how you feel. I think he needs to hear that."

Jonas nodded his head. "You're right. I just hope it isn't too late. Thanks, Raynar." He stood and squeezed my shoulder lightly.

"Hey Jonas, what caused the barrier spell to finally break after all this time?"

"I've been asking around and making notes, and I've concluded from the timing of events that the spell breaking coincides with the death of the Gylos males. Malora must have gotten the spell from the Gylos years ago, using it to cloak and cut the village off from the world. Spells tied to the life force of an individual are potent and if the male Gylos all contributed to the spell, it would be enough to encapsulate the entire village as it did. Once the massacre happened, the spell broke."

"But the Gylos don't like magic users, why would they team up with Malora?" I felt confused.

"No," He corrected. "The Yardinians under your grandfather's rule did not like magic users. The Gylos did not marry outside of their race, but they had no issues with magic users. Malora must have convinced them to help her cloak the village and trap them away from the rest of the world." He picked at the skin next to his thumbnail once again and squinted his eyes. "There was tension between the Gylos and Yardinians. King Valos, your grandfather, saw the Gylos as magic users and had ordered all trade to cease with them. I don't remember much, but I remember there was hatred between the tribe and the village. I remember hearing my parents and their friends speak ill of the healing tribe. They talked as though they were evil and unworthy.”

“And if Malora approached the Gylos with her own issues regarding the Yardinians...”

Jonas nodded, agreeing with where my train of thought led me. “But the women and children of the Gylos tribe survived. How did the spell break if they were still alive?”

“We can only assume that the spell was tied to the life force of the males in the tribe. Gylos women have no powers and their children do not come into their powers till they hit puberty.”

I wondered what would happen when the Gylos youth grew into their powers. Would there be war between Poe’s family and the Gylos? Would the children who had lost their fathers try to attack Poe and his family? “But Poe is part Gylos, and he spoke about being trained in healing. He’s still alive, shouldn’t the barrier still be up and active?”

”But Poe wasn’t alive when the spell was cast, his life force is not tied into the barrier spell.”

The sound of my brothers’ wings batting overhead announced their return.

“Have you spoken with your father? About who the crown will pass to when he dies?” Jonas asked.

“Not yet. Torin and I will speak with him after dinner.”

He nodded. “Thanks for your input on Torin.” It was obvious to me that he loved Torin. I overheard him call Torin “son” the other day, which was more endearing than the other times he addressed him. Now he needed to help Torin understand how he felt.

“You’re welcome. It sounds like they’re headed this way. I think I’ll head in and help with dinner. See ya.”

Torin and Jonas spoke on the porch while the rest of us pushed the tables together and prepared the food. Then we all gathered and shared a meal together. When dinner concluded, the others cleaned up while Torin and I visited our father for our talk.

We helped the king get settled in and exchanged small talk before the king got to the heart of the matter. “Raynar, Torin, you both are next in line to inherit this crown. I do not have long before that day comes, and I would like to know what your feelings and thoughts are about acquiring it and the responsibilities that come with it?”

“Well, I’d be honored to take the crown and guide your people.” Torin sounded all formal as he sat up straighter.

The king narrowed his eyes and studied him a moment. “I see. Now Torin, tell me what you truly feel, not what I want to hear.” The king saw through his bullshit.

Torin cleared his throat. “The truth is I am not sure I am the best person to wear that crown, and if I was, I’m not sure I’m ready for that responsibility. The people of Yardis don’t know me, and I don’t know them. I can’t imagine they’d loyally follow someone they’ve just met.”

The king considered this and thanked Torin for his honesty. “Raynar, what about you?”

“Honestly? I thought I was coming here for a week or two and then returning home to Midland where my home and friends are. The thought of wearing a crown and ruling a village never crossed my mind.”

“And what about the riches? It’s not much but some of the items are old and one of a kind.” The king took a sip of his water.

“I think the riches should go to help the Yardinians who want to relocate get started in their new lives,” Torin suggested.

“Interesting idea.” Vintras said between coughs. “What do you think Raynar?”

“I agree with Torin, use it to help those wanting to begin a life outside of this area. And maybe keep some back for those that stay behind. They have a lot of rebuilding to do.”

“Very well. I’m surprised neither of you have interest in the crown at this time.” Our father laid back onto the pillow and closed his eyes a moment. He looked tired. “You both are very different from Larkin, who had a thirst for power. I suppose we could have the village men battle it out as some of our ancestors did.”

“Have you considered Kaden?” I suggested. “The villagers know him and he helped us when we came to the village. He’s a Guardian and knows about fighting and survival, and he knows the land well.”

Vintras opened his eyes and looked at me. “Kaden is an interesting suggestion. I’ll consider this.” He closed his eyes again.

“We’ll leave you to rest,” Torin said as he stood.

“Thank you, my sons.” Our father pulled the blanket up around his neck.

We exited the room, and I motioned for Torin to follow me. I had questions only my mother could answer.

“Meina, may we speak with you?” I asked.

She nodded and led us to the front porch. “I wondered when we would get a chance to talk.”

“I’m sorry... I’m not sure what is appropriate to call you. I mean days ago I learned my parents were really Guardians and my biological parents lived in this remote part of Canada. I want to call you ‘Mom’ but it feels strange,” I confessed as I pulled up a rocking chair.

“Call me what feels natural to you. Meina is fine if you aren’t sure.” She assured me as she settled into her chair. “It’s strange for me too. I didn’t know either of you, or your father were still alive.”

“Can you tell us what you remember?” Torin asked.

“Very well.” Our mother told almost the exact tale our father had shared with us, only she added that she had tried to tell Vintras to not trust her mother when he left. Tears fell from her eyes and she quickly wiped them away.

“What happened?” Torin asked.

“Once the babies were born, my mother laced my meal with a truth potion. I could not stop the truth from pouring out as she interrogated me. I wanted to cut my own tongue! I told her Vintras was the father of my children and I told her our plans to run away.” She messed with the hem of her shirt as she recalled the painful memories. “She trapped me in that house and cloaked it so no one would find it. But one day, she was careless and hurried off before checking that the house fully cloaked. Your father had been coming regularly, searching for a way in. That one day she was careless he slipped in before it cloaked.” She smiled at the memory. “I remember how surprised and elated I felt when he walked through my front door that day. He was this brilliant sun shining through the clouds.”

“What then?” I tried to remember my father’s side of the story.

“We should have just run away right then.” She sighed. My mother returned and became very angry when she saw your father holding one of you. He calmed her and explained his plan to bring me and the babies to court once he was crowned the new King of Yardis. My mother played along and told Vintras that if he brought a proper dowry we could marry. But then she tricked me into leaving the house without my babies, telling me she needed help fetching the water from the stream. She said her back was sore.” Meina walked to the edge of the porch and leaned against a support beam. “She had never transformed in front of me before nor revealed her dragon abilities to me. But I found myself high in the sky being carried further and further from my babies and my love. From up high, I could see the barrier seal Yardis off from the world and cloak them. All I could think about was my children. Who would protect them? Would they die?” She sat back down in the chair and rocked for a minute or two before continuing. “I only remember fragments of what happened next as we flew through the air. I remember feeling powerful and angry, only stronger. I remember the sound of something ripping and a pained roar. And then she fell to the hard ground below and did not move. I hurried to my mother’s side but she was already gone. I’d killed her.”

“I’m so sorry.” I couldn’t imagine living with that tragedy on my hands. And then I remembered she’d also accidentally killed her husband, too. So much pain.

“Why must everyone be so divided?” she continued, wringing her hands. “Vintras and I loved each other—you two are proof of that. But the people all around us had to take that love and turn it into war.” She shook her head. “I’m so sorry for what this has done to your lives. I never intended on making your lives so difficult.” She choked back a sob.

Torin walked over and wrapped her in a hug. “It’s okay, Mom. So much of what happened was out of your control.”

She patted his arm that he had coiled around her. “Thank you, Torin.” He released his grip and returned to his chair.

“There were so many emotions. I remember feeling out of control, blind with rage, and sick with guilt. I walked all day, naked and alone. Finally, by nightfall, I found the uncloaked hut. I expected to hear screaming babies as I approached but there was only silence. You were nowhere to be found. I searched everywhere until exhaustion took over me. In the morning, I awoke to Ivan covering me with his tunic.”

“Who’s Ivan?” I wondered.

“Sorry, Ivan was your brothers’ father. He brought me to this place and let me stay as long as I needed to in one of the rooms.” She looked down at her hands. “He was a kind man who cared only about helping others.” He opened this healing outpost and trade shop to all. He also was a carpenter who crafted some of the best furniture. He made these chairs and all the furniture in the shop.”

“This area is not very populated, business must have been spotty.” I only knew of the Gylos and Yardinians and wondered if other tribes existed near the shop.

“It was, at times, but I helped bring back goods, like cakes, fruits, and linens, from towns further south. He charged a high price for those rare items and that’s how he stayed in business. Most that show up at this outpost are from local tribes or hunters and trappers passing through. Anyway, I left after a day and returned to my empty house. But being there alone, with two empty cribs—it was too much. I fell into a deep sadness. Ivan came to check on me and insisted I come stay with him until the sadness passed or I found my babies.” She smiled. “He was a good man to me and a good father to the boys.” She rocked slowly in the chair as she stared out into the darkening sky. “The Gylos learned about our relationship and our boys. They held a trial and found your father guilty of breaking their law. They exiled him.”

“That’s a pretty steep price for love,” Torin chimed in.

“Yeah, it’s not like he murdered someone or stole something. His only crime was loving someone outside of his tribe. And yet, they rejected him.” It seemed ridiculous to me.

Our mother explained, “Marrying outside the tribe broke their religious law. It could have been a worse punishment, but instead they chose to let him be if he left the tribe.”

“So why did they attack him years later?” Torin scratched at the stubble growing on his chin. “I mean he had his family here and a life of his own, why come at him?”

“To make an example of him. When the man on the council learned his son was set to marry a commoner, he did what he could to scare his child away from that decision. But in the end, they both died along with many others, including my Ivan. I had no idea Ivan had come to my side to fight with me. When I transformed to human form, I saw him laying at my feet in a pool of blood. His eyes, were void of life. The weapon that had delivered the fatal blow...” She looked at her own hands that trembled. “He died by my own hands. A deep claw mark had shredded his heart. I’d killed the man I loved and the father of my children.” She cried hard. I came over to hug her, Torin joined us.

“Shh.” I soothed her. “You wanted to protect your children, as all mothers should. You had no idea what they would do. Had it been one man approaching to talk, that would be a different story, but an army of men approaching means war.” I reasoned with her. “I’m so sorry that Ivan died in that battle.”

“He probably wanted to keep you safe and got too close,” Torin added as he patted her back.

We eventually calmed her and she stood. “Thank you both for listening and understanding. I did not raise you, but the people in there did a fine job of teaching you kindness.” She nodded toward the shop. “Well, we’d better get in.” We headed up to our room to retire for the night.

The next day Poe deemed me well enough to travel home. King Vintras asked Kaden to prepare to be the new king and lead the people of Yardis when he passed on from this life. Kaden accepted the honor. Torin and Jonas stayed back to help with the rebuilding and relocating of villagers. King Vintras told them their presence bought him peace of mind, knowing his people were cared for and that Kaden had time to learn the strengths and weaknesses of the village.

Kaden demoted all the surviving king's guards to positions of hard labor and rebuilding of the village. He wanted them to have time to think about what is important and consider their consequences of blindly following orders of a tyrannical imposter. He assigned the Guardians to protection duties, as they had once before when my parents had lived in Yardis.

In the end, only a quarter of the village decided to try life outside of Yardis, where there were more towns and people. A few others worked with Poe and his family to bring goods that would make daily life easier to the village at reasonable costs. I headed home with my parents and Leo to finish out the school year.

Chapter 16

It was strange being back in my room in Michigan. The face in the mirror was my own, but something had changed. I felt different—taller, stronger, or maybe wiser. Whatever it was, I was not the same Ray Cross that had walked the halls of Midland High a few weeks ago.

Kids that had barely paid me any attention prior to my trip seemed to notice and greet me as they passed. “What’s up, Cross.” Mike Jensen, one of the smart, cool guys fist bumped me.

“Sup, Mike.”

Leo saw the exchange and approached with a confused look on his face. “Did that just happen or am I dreaming?” He pointed to Mike who was already half way down the hall. “I didn’t even know he knew your name.”

“Me either.” I laughed.

“It’s good having you back. This place was a snore without you.” Leo patted me on the back while we walked to our last class. “Hey, I heard you and Lauren kissed before you left.” I stopped walking. How did he hear about that? I hadn’t told anyone. “Is it true? Derek’s probably heard. You’d better make sure I’m with you when school gets out.”

“Who told you?”

“Damn man, it is true. You’re playing with fire. Leslie asked me if it was true.” Leslie was Lauren’s closest girlfriend, but giving her that title was a stretch since most of Lauren’s time was spent with Derek.

“And you said...?”

“I asked her what drug she was on because you wouldn’t be stupid enough to do something like that when Lauren and Derek were together.” He shook his head in disbelief. “Listen, I’ll have to get my other books from my locker after class. You should come with me. At least for a day or two.”

“Leo, look, I know you’re worried, but he’s never tried to hurt me, at least physically. Plus, I may not be as fragile as I was a few weeks ago. Jonas has to run some tests when he returns, but I feel less fragile.” I probably could have tested my own fragility by inflicting a small injury upon myself and monitoring how I healed.

“Okay, listen. At least don’t leave the school without me. Wait for me by the front doors.” He must have seen the reluctance on my face because he resorted to pleading. “Cross, do it for me man. If—if something were to happen, I'd live with guilt the rest of my life. For me."

"Okay, front doors." Lauren wasn't at school today and Derek hadn't treated me any different earlier in the day during class. He didn't know. He wouldn't have been able to keep his cool during the whole period without showing his anger in some way.

I didn't like Derek, and I never pretended to. It wasn't a jealousy thing. He wasn't a nice guy, at least to me, and before the kiss, I had never done anything to earn his hatred and bullying.

Maybe things would have been different if he hadn't been such a control freak and worked to keep me out of Lauren's life. Or maybe Lauren and I would have kissed anyway. Lauren and I were good together. Our friendship had been strong and the love we had for each other was not the fast, intense and all-engulfing love of a crush, but the slow burning kind that could stand the test of time.

But Lauren had kissed me. She made the move and crossed the relationship line. Of course, I didn't try to stop her. But now we had to deal with the aftermath. Sooner or later, Derek would find out and there would be a confrontation.

As our bio teacher droned on, my phone buzzed in my pocket.

Lauren: Ray, Derek found out about the kiss. I'm out sick, but Leslie blabbed and said he's pissed. I'm so sorry. It's my fault let me handle him. Wanted to give you a heads up.

I showed it to Leo, who's eyebrows raised with worry. Seemed we'd be having a chat about that kiss sooner rather than later.

"You're coming with me to my locker." Leo pointed at me as he commanded.

When the bell rang, I followed my friend to his locker. The halls slowly emptied as the students left to head home. There had been no sign of Derek, and I hoped we wouldn't see him. Lauren was the one in the relationship with him, and I didn't know where she wanted to take this relationship.

Leo and I lingered longer inside the school on purpose in hopes Derek would give up if he had wanted to confront us outside. We didn't wait long, maybe five or ten minutes longer, just enough to thin the crowds.

"Good plan. Looks like there's just a few kids waiting for rides. My car's in the shop, so I'll walk you home." Leo unlocked his bike from the bike rack and walked with me as we set off for my house. It was an unseasonably warm day for late spring in Midland. The sun shone bright without a cloud to hide behind and the temperature must have been in the mid-eighties. "Feels like summer."

"It does. It's a lot warmer here than in Yordis."

"No kidding." Leo chuckled. "Shit. Look." He nodded ahead at the corner where Derek and two of his friends stood watching us intently. "Keep walking and don't engage them."

"Took you long enough. What were you two doing? Making out?" Derek and his buddies crossed the road and stood a few feet before us, blocking our path home. His friends laughed at Derek's condescending wit.

Leo and I stopped. This was happening now, and there was no avoiding it. We could run, but they'd probably catch us, and if they didn't, we'd still have to face them the next day or the next.

“What do you want Derek?” I needed to face this head on.

“I want to know if the rumor is true. Did you kiss my girlfriend?” No one laughed now.

“It’s true.” I didn’t elaborate or apologize.

He looked away a moment. When he turned back he narrowed his eyes. “See, this was why I didn’t want you anywhere near her. You had feelings for her all this time, and you couldn’t respect our relationship.” His words were ironic as he wanted me to respect their relationship, and yet he didn’t respect my friendship with Lauren.

“You know, I’m glad you mentioned that.”

“Cross!” Leo warned quietly. “Don’t engage.”

Unfortunately, Derek heard him. “Yes, Cross, don’t engage.” He mocked. “Let your big buffoon fight your battles for you like always.”

Leo pushed his bike into the grass and stood ready to throw a punch beside me. “Come on Derek. You tryin’ to pick a fight? I’ll fight ya.”

I grabbed Leo’s tense forearm. His fists clenched tight at his side. He shot me a side glance, and I released his arm.

“Grab him.” Derek motioned for his two buddies to act. They attempted to grab Leo, but my friend put up a fight. Leo took Jimmy McDaniels out but Reggie Fox had Leo pinned with his knee in Leo’s chest. I ran over and dove at Reggie, knocking both of us to the ground. Reggie rolled over and punched me in the jaw before I could get on my feet. Leo stood and looked ready to pounce on Reggie. Reggie faced him, ready for the attack, but Derek came up behind Leo and kicked the back of his knees dropping him to the ground. Reggie started toward Leo, but never made it as I tackled him. I pinned him, holding down his wrists.

Reggie began howling in pain. “Stop, stop, let go!” His words became whimpers. “Please. Stop.” My left hand turned white and small crystals covered the back of it while and my right hand glowed red. What was happening? I let go of his wrists and found clear blisters emerging out of his reddened skin in the area I had held him. What the hell?

I sat back on my heels looking at him with shock, trying to understand what had just happened while Reggie curled in on himself holding his wrists close. “Are you okay?” I asked

When I reached out to touch him he pulled away and screamed, “Don’t touch me!”

I raised my arms to let him know I wouldn’t touch him. My hands had returned to normal.

“Cross!” Derek yelled my name. I turned to find him holding a knife to Leo’s neck.

“He’s bluffing.” Leo knelt on the ground, one armed pulled behind his back, the blade resting against his skin.

“Let him go Derek. This has gone too far. Put the knife away and let him go.” Inside, I warred with the dragon wanting to surface and end this situation. It wanted out, but the image of Larkin’s decapitated body came to mind. I did not want to kill Derek; I wanted him to let Leo go.

“You went too far with Lauren.” He pointed the knife at me as he yelled the words. Leo took a chance to get free. He rolled forward, pulling Derek, who had hold of his arm still, with him. They tussled on the ground, both trying to gain the upper hand. The silver blade flashed above, below, and it was hard to keep track of it. My hands began changing temperatures again. I held them together before me in hopes the opposing temperatures would cancel each other out. The left hand turned white while the right had a reddish glow. I could feel the two temperatures pushing against each other, violently warring to not be affected. It was too much, like taking two very strong magnets and trying to force the two positives together. I squeezed the hands together for a moment before they blasted open with something that looked like a horizontal tornado shooting out of them. The spiral blasted Derek over forty feet away from the scene. The tornado disappeared, but my hands still had polar opposite temperatures. Derek stood and shook himself off, then stormed toward us angrily. I put my hands together again and felt the strong repulsion. Then I pointed my clasped hands at a nearby garbage can and released the tornado once again. The metal cylinder flew at Derek, throwing dirty diapers and half eaten food upon him. "Get out of here, and let Lauren choose who she wants. Jerk!"

"Holy crap Cross, I think you found your power." Leo laughed with a shocked look on his face.

Derek took off in the opposite direction leaving Jimmy and Reggie. Leo and I helped them both up and drove them to a hospital. They agreed to keep what they saw quiet. Of course, we told them if they blabbed about it, there was a good chance they'd be committed to the mental health ward. After all, who would believe a teen could shoot tornados and burn and freeze someone with his bare hands?

We headed to my house where my mom bandaged up Leo. She cautioned me to learn control over my powers and to not share them with commoners if I could help it.

We fed Leo supper and then I walked him out. "Leo, you're crazy as hell, but the most loyal friend a guy could have. Thank you for always having my back." We hugged briefly.

"You're welcome. You're like my brother. I'll always look out for you, even if you're Mr. Tornado and don't need me."

"Ha! Get outta here. Love ya, man." I gave him a shove. He waved as he got on his bike and rode home. I peeked my head in and told my mom I needed to talk to Lauren. She reminded me not to be home late and told me to watch in case Derek surfaced.

Lauren lived several blocks over. I walked up her front concrete steps and rang the bell. Lauren answered. "Ray, what are you doing here? Is everything okay?"

"Yeah. Are you okay? You weren't at school."

"Oh, my aunt died and the funeral was today. Are you sure you're okay?" She asked again, this time studying me closer.

"Can we talk?"

She nodded and came out to sit on the steps with me. "What's going on?"

"I need to know about your feelings for Derek. Do you still want to be with him? And please tell me what you truly feel and not what you think I want to hear." I looked away and fiddled with my nail beds.

“I care about him, but I don’t love him anymore. After we went out the other day, I realized how much I missed having you in my life. He would never allow us to know each other, and that’s not okay with me. Not any longer.”

“I didn’t mean to break you up.” I shoved my fingers through my hair. “I just want you to be happy.”

“Ray, stop. Look at me.” She waited until I looked into her eyes. “I don’t want him to control me. If I want to be friends with you, then I will.”

“But what if I want something more?” I grabbed her chin and pulled her into a kiss. Her breath tasted sweet like vanilla, and her lips were soft and velvety. “Derek and I had a...chat.” She pulled back far enough for me to see the worried expression on her face. “He’s promised to let you make your own choice of who you want to be with.” I stood and walked down the stairs. “If you even want to be with either of us.” I turned toward her. “Goodnight Lauren.” I left her sitting on the front steps looking breathless and beautiful. I walked away, grasping the guardian’s pendant and chanting the magical words to immortalize this memory as one I could recall in great detail when I wanted.

I made it home, but ten minutes after I arrived, Lauren came over and told me she chose me. Leo and I befriended Jimmy and Reggie as they lost interest in being Derek’s little soldiers. Derek left Lauren and I alone. We were careful to not be over affectionate in the presence of others, especially Derek.

Jonas returned the next week with reports that King Vintras was declining but comfortable and happy with Meina by his side. Torin was due to come back the following week as Kaden had a good grasp on how King Vintras ruled. Jonas retested me for vEDS and happily reported that I no longer had VEDS. He theorized that my dragon DNA had lay dormant for many years as my body worked hard to repair the damage it faced on a daily basis. Once Poe healed me, the dragon DNA had an opportunity to take over like a virus and clip out the faulty DNA.

Each day I grew stronger, both physically and mentally. I worked to quiet the worries that vEDS had planted in my head over the years, valid concerns that meant life or death to me at one point in my life. I spent time with my father sharing stories of our lives with each other before he eventually passed. I was glad I got to know the kind man that did not judge people for their difference. In that time, I grew close with all my brothers and mother, extending my circle of loved ones and getting to know them all better. And in the end, the small group in Midland helped some of our villagers with open minds and adventurous hearts, start new lives for themselves in Michigan.

The End

For more tales by D.A. Roach, check out:

Rarity - YA Drama

Between the Bleeding Willows (Book 1 Demon Hunters series) – YA PNR

Within the Darkest Hollows (Book 2 Demon Hunters series) – YA PNR

Newsletter

(http://eepurl.com/chb_Rb)

Website

(<https://daroachfiction.com/>)

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

D.A. Roach grew up in the south suburbs of Chicago where her family had settled after immigrating from Lithuania. Music, movies, tennis, and art were her past times as reading was not a hobby explored or encouraged in her house. It wasn't until after graduating from college that she began reading for pleasure and found herself buried in a book and off on some fictitious adventure.

Her first attempt at writing came after chatting with her dental hygienist about an upcoming vacation, where she planned to visit the people who had once helped her family during a crisis. The hygienist, in awe of the story, urged D.A. to write a book about the tale to pay homage to the kind souls that helped her family. With the help of a print book retailer, she documented the events and emotions she experienced and sent it out into the world. It was not a bestseller by any means, but readers began reaching out and thanking her for the heartfelt story. Moved by the effect her words had on readers, D.A. penned another novel and discovered that as much as she enjoyed reading stories, she loved creating them even more.

Thank you to my street team, who always has my back, my AMAZING editor Trisha Wooldridge, my PA Madi Wilde for keeping my head on straight and working tirelessly to keep the promo going, Kimberly Vanderbloom for letting me lean on you when I felt unsure of myself.

For more information or to donate to VEDS research, go to <http://www.ehlersdanlosnetwork.org/>

Read More from D.A. Roach:

<http://daroachbooks.blogspot.com/>

ALCHEMY WITH BENEFITS

KATALINA LEON

Copyright July 2017

Author: Katalina Leon

Cover design: Andy Atkins

Supervising editor: Becky Johnson, Hot Tree Editing

Content editor: Liv Ventura, Hot Tree Editing

Proofreader: Kristin Searce, Hot Tree Editing

Red Jaguar Press

Copyright notice: All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

ALCHEMY WITH BENEFITS

What happens when a wacky witch collides with a sexy brujo from a taco truck?

Estele “I meant to do well” Esposito is the worst witch in the San Buena enchantment community. When she casts a spell it goes batshit wacky with disastrous results.

Everything changes when a sexy brujo, who drives an enchanted taco truck, shows up with a mysterious warning that he is her new protector. Too bad Estele hates brujos, but when an evil djinn threatens the community, Estele has to put trust issues aside and enter an alliance with a brujo to save the city.

Want the perfect alchemical recipe for hilarious chaos? Mix romance with Estele’s brand of loopy spellcasting, hexed food, a ghostly sea captain with questionable vices, a priceless gem of infinite power, malicious djinn bent on world domination and thousands of innocent people trapped at a county fair—what could go wrong?

Note: This title is number 3 in the Sorcery by the Sea series, but it really should be number 2. The storyline directly follows Fredi and Gus’s story in HOODOO BLUE, Sorcery by the Sea, book 1. Estele’s story can be read alone, but reading her hijinks in Hoodoo Blue, first will make it better.

Contains strong language. Mild sexual situations.

Chapter 1

There were no appointments necessary at the LuLu Beauty Academy by the Sea. A cheerful pink banner advertised “Walk-ins Welcome,” but that didn’t mean casual clients could expect to be pampered. Requests for specific operators would be denied. Most regular customers wouldn’t bother to ask. On entry, patrons were asked to sign waivers. An ominous plaque on the reception desk stated that “all work shall be done by STUDENTS.”

The intrepid ones who used vocational schools as part of their beauty routine knew you got what you paid for—or more accurately at the LuLu Beauty Academy, you got what you didn’t pay for.

So, on that sunny August morning, the blood-curdling screams of horror echoing from the building weren’t completely unexpected.

Viewed from the outside, the windows of the clinically tidy vocational school writhed with the silhouettes of panicked people desperate to escape. The screams within reached a glass-shattering crescendo, then fell silent as one by one bodies slumped to the floor in heaps.

Oops, time for full disclosure.

The LuLu Beauty Academy by the Sea hid one crucial fact from the unsuspecting public. More than haircuts, mani-pedis, and ombré dye jobs were being offered. At the back of the rambling mission-style compound, one sub-floor down, was San Buena’s preeminent school of sorcery and witchcraft—the Master Mage Magic Academy.

The secret school within a school provided the perfect place to mask the comings and goings of would-be aestheticians, witches, warlocks, and fiends. The false front had been in place for decades and the two schools seldom mixed. For the most part, members of the LuLu Beauty Academy were oblivious to the near proximity to occult danger. Most of the time they had little to worry about. Thanks to caution and strict protocols, Miss Dahlia ran a clean Mage Academy.

Unfortunately for all involved, one incompetent student was enrolled in both schools, San Buena’s most vexatious, sure-to-fail, scatterbrained witch ever born into the West Coast Enchantment Community—Estele “I meant to do well” Esposito.

Ashamed and once again needing assistance, Estele picked up her phone and called her best friend and sister in Wiccandom, Frederica De la Cruz, aka Fredi. The call was answered on the second ring. Estele stammered, “F-Fredi! I need your help right away. I’ve done it again.”

“What have you done?” Fredi sounded blasé. “Did you cast another wacko love spell that hit a speed bump?”

“No. It’s worse than that. I was trying to infuse a transformation enchantment into a crystal and—”

“Wait a minute.” Fredi became wary. “It’s Thursday morning. Aren’t you in beauty school? If you’re in public, let’s not talk enchantment over the phone. It’s not safe.”

Estele stomped her foot in agitation. Tears welled in her eyes. “Fredi, I screwed up bad! This is an emergency. Can you come by the LuLu Beauty Academy and lend me a hand?” Her voice quivered. “I’ll throw in a deep conditioning hair treatment if you can help me resuscitate the others.”

“What others? Why do they need resuscitation? Jeezus, Estele, what have you done?”

“Miss Esposito!” Miss Dahlia stormed along the hallway, jaw set, gaze hard, arms swinging with determination. The substantial woman was a professor of metaphysics. She presented the perfect image of elderly indignation, a blur of lilac hair and frumpy blouse marching into battle in sensible shoes. “Estele, why, oh why do you insist on practicing magic outside the classroom without the necessary supervision?”

Estele cowered. “Hold on.” She spoke into the phone. “Fredi, are you still there? Gotta go.” She clicked the phone off, feeling nauseous. “Miss Dahlia, I’m so, so sorry. I cast such a teeny-weeny spell I didn’t think anyone would even notice.”

Miss Dahlia shook a finger under Estele’s chin. “What a disaster! A beautician’s Armageddon! Young lady, when one’s hair transforms into writhing serpents and a penetrating Medusa stare of doom shoots from your desk-mate’s eyes, it’s unsettling to say the least. I can’t imagine the horror those poor ladies just went through. Lucky for us, if I should even use the word luck, the last woman just looked in the mirror and gave herself the Medusa-meltdown stare and turned to stone. Everyone is lying on the floor in a state of suspended animation. It’s now safe to enter the room.”

How could it be safe? She’d witnessed the event up close; the disturbing images would haunt her nightmares for years. It was awful to know she’d done this to others. “We’re going inside? Really? Do I belong in there? What if I make things worse without even meaning to?”

Miss Dahlia grabbed Estele’s arm. “You and I are walking in there as a team and we are going to make things right, even if we have to work through the lunch hour. What incantation was used?”

“I’m not sure. Gosh, I’m so shook up it’s hard to think.” She tried to concentrate but nothing came to her. Adding to the mental fog, she was hungry too. This was unacceptable. Why didn’t her brain work like everyone else’s? And when would she learn to take care of herself so she could avoid this sort of thing? “That’s probably why I mixed up my spells in the first place. You know, low blood sugar. During the hair demonstration on instant dreadlocks with texturing cement, I was fiddling around with an incantation to bring crystals to life. What was I saying? Lithe? Lively? Lothario? Lethal? What’s the Latin word for stone?”

Miss Dahlia appeared mortified. She closed her eyes in what appeared to be utter exasperation. “‘Lithos’ is the word you are searching for. Miss Esposito, when are you going to give metaphysical studies the serious attention they demand?”

She winced. Lately, she’d been trying to do better, but this stunt proved her efforts were wasted. “I’m so sorry.”

“Sweetheart.” Miss Dahlia softened her tone. “Historically, the Esposito witches are challenged enough. You don’t need to add to the dubious legacy by misspeaking poorly worded incantations. A witch must live by the rule of three. What we do for or to others will be visited on us threefold. Do you think the ladies upstairs enjoyed being turned into Medusas with live snakes dancing on their heads? No. They did not. You must learn to be careful and logical with your skills. Don’t throw a careless spell out there and hope it’s not just—” She drew her lips tight. “—a flying turd tossed into a blender.”

Estele wrung her hands. Panic set in. What she’d done was unforgivable, but if she got expelled now, she might never get past this point in her life and end up making things worse for everyone. “Will this incident be reported to Headmistress Witch Griselda? I hope not. You see, I’m already on academic probation.”

Barely repressed rage left Miss Dahlia trembling. “Estele, I’m the one who put you on academic probation. I did it for your own good. And the answer is no. I will not be reporting this latest indiscretion to Headmistress Griselda. She has enough to deal with in her dotage without adding wild young ladies with tattooed limbs turning our quiet seaside community into a Greek tragedy. She’d die of shock!”

“I’ll bet there’s not much that would shock Witch Griselda.” Turning her foot onto its side, Estele stood like a contrite five-year-old, hoping this would be the last time she’d have to plead but fearing it wasn’t. “You’ve always been kind to me. Do we have to tell anyone? Please help put things right before these ladies suffer any more than they already have.”

“I’m going to help you because you’re dangerous!” Miss Dahlia’s brows rose to points. “I’m sorry, Estele. I should not have said that, but the truth is you are too unpredictable to kick out of school. You have the power to do grievous unintentional harm, but lack the discipline to refine it. You’re in limbo, my girl. I can’t trust you to stand on your own and I can’t... I guess I just can’t trust you, period. Your track record with magic is bat guano. For the safety of all, as long as you’re a public menace, you will remain under the supervision of the Master Mage Magic Academy.”

Relief washed over her. “Hurray!” she shouted.

“No, not ‘hurray.’ Don’t you understand? This is a punishment.”

“Really? But I like being here.” Ever since her mother left town, her friends at the academy were her only family.

Rolling her eyes, Miss Dahlia tensed. “I feel punished. Now let’s go inside the LuLu Beauty Academy and start unraveling the wicked little spell you cast. How much of it do you remember?”

“You’re asking me what I remember? My memory is as full of holes as a pair of Crocs. What if I can’t remember? Those poor ladies inside don’t stand a chance, do they?”

Wrapping an arm around Estele, Miss Dahlia gently led her forward. “It will be all right. Try to remember the exact words you used. We’ll do this together.”

With a loud poof! Witch Griselda materialized within a cloud of mist at the end of the hallway. “Where’s everybody going?” Her scratchy voice was like the chirp of a cricket. She stooped, looking ancient in a tattered gray cloak, and clutched a gnarled staff with a ruby the size of a plum embedded on the tip.

Miss Dahlia appeared flustered. “Everything’s under control, Griselda dear. Wouldn’t you rather be at home enjoying a nice cup of tea and watching Wheel of Fortune?”

“No.” Griselda had a lazy eye that wandered. “I heard screaming and I thought there might be an opportunity to have a little fun.”

“Nothing fun here,” Miss Dahlia insisted. “Perhaps this would be a good time to feed the cats?”

Griselda snarled, showing crooked teeth. “The cats are blimps. Fat as toads. A ten-minute fast would do them good.” She pointed the jeweled staff at Estele. “Who’s the tattooed lady?”

She was used to daily reintroducing herself to the semi-senile headmistress. “Estele Esposito. I was Estele yesterday too.”

Griselda horse laughed and in the blink of an eye teleported from the end of the hallway, landing inches from Estele’s face. “Miss Esposito, the troublemaker? This is the same girl whose spell made everyone in the downtown business district walk backward, talk backward, and pull their pants down instead of up, am I right?”

Miss Dahlia looked defeated. “This is she.”

Griselda threw her arms into the air. “I may have drunk too much mercury in my tinctures over the years and gone mad as a badger, but why are we not recognizing this girl as Wiccan royalty? She’s fabulous! So creative. So unpredictable. Who else would turn a box of tampons into an army of little men?”

Jumping to her defense, Estele blurted, “I didn’t mean to—”

Miss Dahlia interrupted. “That incident and its embarrassing repercussions shall never be discussed again in polite company.”

Griselda elbowed her way closer. “Well, it’s a good thing I’m not polite company! I’m a frigging old witch who’s seen it all. I went to the buttered toast races on Prince Bertie’s plump thighs, slipped the tongue to King Leopold, and played a naughty game of French postcards with Teddy Roosevelt. He loved it. That’s how long I’ve been around, and I say Miss Esposito has talent!”

Miss Dahlia faced Estele. Pointing to her forehead, she mouthed, “Heavy metal poisoning.”

Griselda pushed past them and waddled down the hallway, thumping the heavy staff on the linoleum floor every step of the way. “I can’t wait to see what Estele has done this time.” Placing her hand on the LuLu Academy door, she turned. “Have all our students been moved to a minimum safe distance?”

“Yes.” Impatience creased Miss Dahlia’s face. “I sent everyone out of the building for an early lunch.”

This wasn’t the first time she’d screwed up when hungry or confused, and it had to stop. Even the thought of a mayonnaise-barren, bland tuna sandwich off the icky food truck that always parked near the school made Estele’s stomach growl. “Before we start... um... correcting my mistake, should I, like, grab something to eat first? I think being hungry contributed to the problem and that’s why I made the mistake. Maybe for everyone’s safety I should—”

“No, you’ll work on an empty belly.” Miss Dahlia followed Griselda into the LuLu Academy. “Let’s get on task.”

Griselda hobbled into the room first and surveyed the damage with a cackle of delight. “Holy Gorgons! What a mess.”

Estele and Miss Dahlia followed. The room was cluttered with fallen women who had been turned into statue-like lumps of ashy pumice. Many appeared distressed, their mouths distended in silent screams. All had crowns of snakes on their heads.

“Look at this!” A harsh burst of laughter sputtered free of Griselda. “It’s Pompeii after Vesuvius erupted! They’ve all been turned to stone. How amusing. Classic spellcasting. You just don’t see quality work like this anymore.” She leaned over the crumpled form of a woman curled on her side to poke at the cobra headdress. “This one has a Hindu vibe. Miss Esposito, what were you intending to accomplish here?”

A stab of shame cleaved her heart. Wasn’t this exactly the kind of disaster her mother predicted she was capable of? “It’s sort of complicated to explain, but I meant well.”

Miss Dahlia circled the room, counting heads. “You must have had some clear intention to cast an incantation this forceful?”

Estele dug into her pocket, pulled out a polished crystal the length of her palm, and held it up to the light. “It’s my godniece’s fifth birthday this Saturday. I saw the inclusions inside the crystal and thought, wow, it looks just like a dragon. Then I thought wouldn’t it be cool if the dragon inside the crystal came to life and did a little birthday dance for my niece? Honest to Goddess, that’s what I was thinking. It was supposed to be a fun surprise for a little girl.”

Griselda clutched her heart with a talon-like hand and stared heavenward. “A sweet gesture gone shockingly wrong! Estele’s gifted. She’s a sacred weapon and should be turned against our enemies.”

“So.” Miss Dahlia pursed her lips in concentration. “You were thinking dragon, reptile, dancing, stone—”

Estele cringed. “Ya, and I was hungry too, so I may have been thinking flame-broiled. I should never attempt spellcasting when I’m hungry. I feel horrible about what I did. Maybe I shouldn’t be here when these poor women wake up? They’ve probably seen enough of me, don’t you think?”

“Hold on. Don’t go anywhere. We are going to correct this problem and free these ladies from their current plight before anyone goes anywhere. Watch and listen.” Miss Dahlia raised her hands dramatically. “Petra desolati sunt et mens obliviscatur.”

Estele wished she had a better grasp of Latin. Of course, that was a big part of the problem; she miscast spells and hurt people she never meant to because she got the wording wrong. “I wish I had your focus. I hate being a witch who does harm. What did you say to them?”

“It’s a spell to dissolve the stone and cause the mind to forget. With any luck, these unfortunate ladies will have no troubling memories of this incident.”

“I hope you’re right.” Crushing guilt crept up on her. Thank Goddess Miss Dahlia was here to contain the worst of the damage. What if she had been here by herself? All these women would be lawn ornaments. “Won’t they wonder where the time went?”

Miss Dahlia shook her head. “Let me set the record straight. A typical trip to a hair salon is a black hole of missing time on the best days. No one will question an extra half hour. Trust me.”

The women’s ashy exteriors crumbled away. They began to stir, blink, and cough up little puffs of soot.

“We have a lot of cleaning up to do!” Miss Dahlia waved her hand over the women who were struggling to their feet. “Abluo, oblitus! Cleanse and forget!”

Magically everyone’s clothing came clean and the piles of ash evaporated into the next dimension, but their hair was damp and lank.

“Gloriously pathetic!” Griselda cheered. “They look like flea-dipped kittens. No one will believe they spent the morning at a beauty school getting their hair done.”

“I’ll take care of this.” Looking agitated, Miss Dahlia motioned for Estele to take hold of Griselda’s hand. “Would you be so kind as to take our headmistress outside and get her a snack from the food truck?” Behind Griselda’s back, she mouthed, “I need a moment alone.”

“Sure.” Obviously, she couldn’t be of much help in this situation. Maybe someday that would change. Hooking her arm through Griselda’s, Estele steered the old woman toward the front door. “Come along, Grissy, we’re stepping out to get something to eat.”

“From where?” Griselda struck a bug-eyed attitude that made her look completely insane.

“Food truck, Aunty.” She used the most polite tone she could manage with the sole member of the Master Mage Magic Academy who saw her potential.

The old witch banged her staff on the ground as she walked. “I hope they have pickled pigs’ feet.”

Estele pushed the door open. A fresh ocean breeze bathed her face. “Best to have a second choice in mind, so you won’t be disappointed.”

The parking lot was full of people, mostly strangers who appeared to have arrived from nowhere. The usual nondescript white food truck that showed up during lunch breaks to serve soggy sandwiches mummified in yards of cellophane was missing. In its place was a massive, chrome-trimmed, tricked-out truck with a bright mural depicting psychedelic cacti and wild-eyed coyotes. The words “BRUJO TACOS” were painted across the front in vibrant shades of orange and purple.

Lively salsa music and wonderful aromas floated in the air.

“Holy Hecate!” Estele cried. “Who are these folks?”

Griselda tapped the staff faster as she hobbled. “I don’t know and I don’t care. The food smells fabulous.” She squinted. “Am I reading the signage properly? Does it really say ‘brujo’? When I was a girl I was once smitten with a dashing brujo. He was a versatile wizard from the mountains of Oaxaca, Mexico. His name was Santi—such a handsome devil, with soul-piercing black eyes. He taught me to enjoy chapulines, fried crickets. They were quite tasty, more so than you might imagine. I fancied him and hoped we would marry, but Santi rode off with Pancho Villa and that was the end of that.”

Estele felt a frown pinching her brows together like a vise. “Typical brujo. Here today, revolution tomorrow.” She paused. “Grissy, how old are you?”

Griselda stared at the mural on the food truck. “To be honest, I don’t remember.”

They came to the tail end of a long line of people waiting to order food. The earthy scent of chilies and green onions roasting over an open flame enticed her senses. “Wow, something smells great.”

A student from the Master Mage Academy turned to face her. The usually taciturn Emily shoveled food into her mouth while attempting to speak. “The dishes are amazing!” she mumbled. “This is my third time in line. I started with the shrimp Veracruz soft tacos, wrapped in blue corn tortillas with mango salsa, and wolfed them down. For the second round, I ordered the shredded carnitas in molé verde with grilled green tomatillos and cilantro-lime rice. So delicious, and it smelled like a meaty margarita. I think I’ll get the chicken chipotle enchilada with the red molé and garlic Cuban black beans next. Everything is so fresh and full of flavor!” She fell silent as she licked a bit of spilled sauce off her sleeve with a look of rapture.

Estele’s empty tummy rumbled. “What a novel idea. Someone’s finally done it. They’re serving real food from a food truck.”

Another classmate, a dour young warlock named Hector, stood at the front of the line. When he heard Estele behind him, he turned. “Hey, Estele!” He broke into an uncharacteristic smile along with some fancy footwork. “Wanna dance?”

She waved him off. “Not now.” When she’d first met Hector at the start of the summer semester, he had impressed her as being the sullen stalker type, but smiling and animated he was cute in a Goth boy sort of way. “I think I’ll eat first.”

Emily darted out of line. “I’ll dance with you, Hector!” The two of them twirled to the side of the line and broke into an odd hybrid of salsa dance and shuffling Goth postures choreography.

Glancing at Griselda, Estele grinned. “Two less bodies in line. Good for us. I’m starving.”

People filed past holding heaped plates of delicious-looking food so colorful they resembled mosaic art. Everywhere, people were laughing, talking, eating, and dancing, which was not how the LuLu Beauty Academy parking lot looked on a typical weekday. Something was up. “Aside from being edible, I wonder what the big attraction is with the food.”

The front doors of the beauty academy opened and one by one Estele’s former victims staggered dazed and confused into the noon sunlight.

“Look!” Estele prodded Griselda. “Miss Dahlia is finished doing whatever it was she did.”

In complete silence the women congregated near the back of the line, looking vacant and not altogether free of whatever spell of forgetfulness had been cast upon them. They huddled together like glassy-eyed sheep.

Estele whispered to Griselda. “Are they going to be okay to drive? I feel terrible about what I did to them. Maybe I should treat them to a cab ride home?” Each woman’s hair was coiffed bouffant-style and sprayed stiff with flammable amounts of lacquer. “They all look like Miss Dahlia’s 1962 yearbook photo.” Her nostrils flared. “There’s enough Aquanet in the air to punch a hole through the ozone. They’re probably hallucinating from the fumes. I think I should call a cab company right now.”

Griselda sneered. “Who cares about the hair spray! At least they don’t have death-ray eyes and live reptiles sprouting from their scalps.”

“Shush, Grissy.”

“I know!” Griselda pounded her staff on the warm asphalt. “We shall tell all the students of the beauty academy they passed their retro hairdo exams with flying colors.”

Customers at the front of the line were served and walked by holding various tantalizing delicacies garnished with wedges of fragrant lime or dusted with golden sunflower petals.

Estele stepped closer to a chalkboard to read the dizzying array of choices. Everything sounded interesting, but she was in the mood for something hearty and simple. When she reached the front of the line, a striking man in his late fifties with a cloud of silvery hair drawn back in a ponytail leaned out the window. He had glittering up-tipped eyes so pale a shade of hazel they appeared a faint gray.

“You look like a wild coyote,” Griselda blurted.

The man had a broad smile that beamed joy. “Thank you.”

Griselda’s hunched posture straightened to a surprising height. “I’ll bet you’re full of all sorts of mischief.” For a fleeting moment an enchanted veil of glamour shimmered around her and a bit of her former Hell-wrath beauty shone through. She appeared majestic and elegant with flowing red hair.

Seemingly dazzled, the silver-haired man stammered, “Señora, w-what can I get you?”

Griselda pointed at a plate of stacked items set near the man’s elbow. “I want one of those gift-wrapped green packages.”

The gentleman nodded. “These are Oaxaca tamales. Sweet corn masa wrapped in banana leaves, stuffed with garlic carnitas, black beans, and red molé.” He smiled, making the corners of his eyes fan. “Moist and full of flavor. Very popular.”

“They’re huge!” Griselda squealed. “I like packages that are long and thick. I’ll take one.”

He deftly assembled the tamale on a plate heaped with black beans, a scoop of confetti-like corn, and pineapple salsa, ending with a beautiful purple orchid set atop the glossy green banana leaf. He presented the plate to Griselda. “Enjoy.”

Griselda slid a large-denomination bill across the counter with a wink. “Keep the change, honey cake.”

Just as Estele’s turn at the window arrived, the man raised his palm. “Excuse me. I’m due for my break.” He turned and disappeared from sight.

“Wait!” she cried. “Come back. I’m not picky. I’ll take anything. Dang it!”

Another man appeared at the window. This one was in his twenties with wavy black hair pulled away from his rugged face. Sweeping brows framed warm, up-tipped eyes that had the same spicy sparkle as root beer. He flashed a brilliant smile that revealed a fetching dimple. “Hi, cutie, what can I get for you?”

Her jaw dropped. No words came out. The guy was her idea of a stunner. Tall, dark, and dreamy, complete with lots of artistic ink on his heavy forearms. She was left mute.

While he waited, he rubbed his hand against the rakish black beard stubble on his jaw that brought the word “pirate” to mind. “Do you need a minute, or do you know what you want?”

“I want you.” Estele clamped her hand over her mouth in horror at the uncensored moment of honesty. “To recommend something.”

“We just got slammed.” His voice was as deep and gritty as brown sugar. “Most of the specials sold out.” He looked her over. “But I think I know what you would love.”

She’d already mentally unbuttoned his shirt and tossed it on the ground. “You’re not a mind reader, are you?”

He offered another blinding smile. “No. I just meant I can make you something delicious that I’m 99.9 percent certain you’ll enjoy.”

“Phew!” A nervous giggle burst free. “You know we do have some actual mind readers around here.” She pointed a thumb at Emily, who was dancing up a storm with Hector. “I’m pretty sure she can, but she’s the type who’d never come clean about it.” Estele lowered her voice. “She’s a psychic lurker.”

He stepped away from the window and set a large tortilla on a round iron. “I know what you want.”

Estele craned her neck to peer into the truck. “What are you making for me?”

“Do you like zucchini?”

“Yes.”

“I’m making you a squash blossom quesadilla.” He held up a fistful of saffron-gold star-shaped flowers. “Have you ever had these grilled in food? They have a very delicate flavor. I only have a few, and I was saving them for someone special.”

“And I get them?” She squealed. “I’m honored.”

Picking up a short, curved blade, he sliced slender chunks off what appeared to be a huge ivory coil of cheese.

“That’s a big old hunk of mozzarella.”

Looking amused, he continued to work. “This is quesillo from Oaxaca. The flavor is buttery, and the texture has more bite than mozzarella.”

The cheese was placed on half the warm tortilla, the squash blossoms arranged on top in a fan pattern. He folded the tortilla and brought the top of the iron grill down. After a minute, he opened the grill to brush a little butter on one side and flipped it. The cheese bubbled. The grill was brought down again to finish the job. A luscious fried zucchini-like smell rolled off the truck. When he opened the grill, the quesadilla was golden brown with toasted cheese rimming the edges and crispy bits of orange squash blossom peeking through. Using a cleaver, he chopped it into easy-to-manage wedges. The whole thing was loaded onto a plate heaped with cool green guacamole, a dark roasted chipotle salsa, and a big fresh squash blossom sitting atop all of it like the golden star on a Christmas tree. He handed it over with a look of pride.

She salivated. “It’s beautiful! I can’t wait to taste it.”

His eyes gleamed. “That will be six dollars, please. Five if you tell me your name.”

She was flabbergasted. “Me?”

A hearty laugh burst free of him. “Yes, you.”

Holding up the squash blossom, she grinned. “My name is like this.”

His gaze narrowed as if deep in concentration. “Your name is Squash? That’s sort of sad.”

She laughed. “No. Look at the shape. My name is this shape.”

His brows knit. “Flower?”

“No. Look at the perfect five-point pattern. My name is Estele—it means star.”

“Pretty name.” Leaning out of the truck to make sure no one was within earshot, he rolled up his sleeve to reveal a delicately inked gray-work portrait of the classic 1950s pinup Betty Page. “Estele, you look just like my fantasy girl.”

Looking closely, she marveled at the artist’s skill. The tattoo was so well executed it looked like a black-and-white photograph. It was retro and true to raven-haired Betty’s look in every way, except the tiny Betty wore the same sort of chunky combat boots Estele preferred to wear on weekdays. “Hey, she stole my Doc Martins.”

“Yes, she sure did.” His gaze locked on hers, and for a few breathless moments he stared. Neither dared to move or speak.

She was the first to break the gaze, lifting the plate. “Thanks. This looks really good.” Taking long strides, she headed toward the front steps to sit down and eat.

“Estele!” He leaned onto the counter and called out to her. “Did you forget something?”

She searched her thoughts. “I don’t think so.”

“Are you sure?”

“Yep, I’m sure.”

“Okay. Let’s do it this way. When you finish your lunch, come back. I’ll have a treat ready for you.”

“What kind of treat?”

“I’m not telling.” He laughed. “You’ll have to come back.”

Poor guy, he was flirting with her and didn’t know what was good for him. Maybe she should wear a warning sign. Object is more dangerous than it appears in your rearview mirror. After the harm she’d done this morning, she had to take measures to avoid a repeat of today’s disaster. Never again should others suffer because she was such a ditz.

Sitting on the front steps, Estele was cautious about not choosing an unfortunate angle that would provide everyone with a clear view up her short skirt. More than once on these very steps, she’d unwitting played Sharon Stone, providing passersby with a Basic Instinct moment. “Maybe my brain is defective,” she muttered.

She picked up a wedge of quesadilla. It was still molten hot, and she dunked it in salsa to cool it down before taking a bite. The cheese was crispy at the edges and gooey rich at the same time. The squash blossom was tender and tasted like a summer garden, and a tortilla toasted with butter was never a wrong idea. The entire thing culminated in one rocketing moment of delicious sensory overload. “Blazing broomsticks! This is awesome!”

A lady with a towering beehive hairdo appeared startled when Estele shouted. Her hands flew into the air and she shrieked as her magically induced stupor broke. “Oh my!” She turned to confront Estele. “I know you. I remember you.” A look of terror swept over her gaze. “You did things to me. Bad things....”

Another woman with her hair sprayed rigid into a semipermanent flip pointed at Estele and screamed. “Snakes! Doom! Evil!”

Estele stood. She couldn’t even finish her damned lunch before the problems started again. Opening the front door, she poked her head inside the academy. “Someone tell Miss Dahlia the forgetfulness spell wore off!”

It was too late. Chaos broke out in the parking lot. A dozen women with hair teased a foot above their heads gave in to bouts of hysterical shouting or stomping on imaginary snakes. It got so out of control the students of the Master Mage Academy fled indoors.

Miss Dahlia showed up and like a loyal border collie herded the traumatized ladies back into the school. “Time for a second round of spellcasting.” She shot Estele a scathing look. “Miss Esposito. When subjects are under a heavy enchantment, you must monitor not only your tone of speech but the volume as well. A loud voice is like having ice water dashed in the face. Enchantees are so impressionable. Do try to be more careful in the future.”

“Yes, ma’am.” This time would be different. Now she was on high alert for possible missteps. She sat down on the steps and finished her lunch, which was so delicious it was easily the nicest thing to have happened to her during this entire shitty summer session. Using a plastic spoon, she scraped up the last traces of toasted cheese and salsa, licked it, and then tossed the paper plate away.

A blue mood crept up on her. She was getting into trouble more often. People were getting hurt. A reckless, foolish witch was not what she wanted to be. Wiccan-based witchcraft the way she'd been taught by her late grandmother was all about love and connecting to the world, not scaring people and fucking up. She was almost twenty-two; it was time to get grounded and figure things out.

She needed a long heart-to-heart with her best friend, Fredi. Fredi was responsible, levelheaded, and a far better witch than she'd ever be. What was even more impressive, at least in the compassion department, was that Fredi had experience with magic getting out of bounds and knew the personal cost.

The lunch crowd eventually left the parking lot and a rising sense of shame overwhelmed her. Her mistakes were the sort of faux pas little witchlings made when they were learning, not the sort grown enchantresses committed.

"Estele!" Mr. Dreamboat called from the food truck. Leaning out the window, he crooked a finger. "Come over here, cutie."

Holy moly, that spicy daub of salsa is talking to me. Poor guy.

Did he really think she was a cutie? Maybe he was crazy too? Fascinated by the shimmering blue-black highlights in the man's hair, she took slow steps toward the food truck. The closer she got, the more dazzled she became by his coppery skin and megawatt smile. This gorgeous guy was a freaking show horse.

He offered a paper cup in his outstretched hand. "I made this special for you."

Accepting the cup, she felt it was heavy yet saw it was only half-full. A sprinkling of crimson rose petals floated on top. When she tipped the cup, the dark viscous liquid the color of coffee flowed slowly. "What is it?"

"Something unusual. This is my version of Oaxaca hot chocolate. It's sort of a compilation of the New World's greatest hits melted together in one cup."

Her heart raced. This fabulous man had done something nice just for her. "What's in it?"

"At home I would use different ingredients and more of them, but I had to make do with what we had available on the truck. First there's semisweet chocolate. I melted it and added a shot of fresh espresso, grated smoked vanilla bean, cinnamon, plus a good-sized pinch of powdered ancho chili, topped off with a dash of heavy coconut cream to get it all to liquefy. I had to use a wooden spoon to stir it, but it's best to use a wooden molinilo and really whirl the mixture to get it frothy." A beautiful expression bathed his face. "Go ahead, try it."

She tipped the cup. The rose petals arrived first and kissed her lips like the silky skin of a baby's cheek. The chocolate was rose fragrant, thick, and flowed over her tongue like tepid lava. The espresso's toasty aroma and slight bitterness hit first. The sweet, earthy fragrance of the vanilla lingered. The chocolate was so rich and smooth that it came as a surprise many seconds later when the heat from the cinnamon and ancho chili powder kicked into high gear and left her face flushed. "Wow! This is magical stuff. This is...." Lost in sensation, she gave up trying to find the perfect words.

“Alchemy?” He winked.

“Yes! That’s the exact word. It’s alchemy.”

“I’m happy you enjoyed it.” He handed her a tiny piece of brown paper folded into the shape of a teardrop.

She reached for the paper. “What is this?”

“Open it,” he urged.

Estele unfolded and unfolded the piece of paper, which was much larger than expected. When she was finished, it revealed a paper heart with the word “VALENTINE” printed across the top, a cartoon sketch of a charging bull and a phone number scrawled beneath. “It’s August.” She grinned. “A little early or late for Valentine’s Day, but thank you.”

He shook his head. “My name is spelled like Valentine, but pronounced Val-en-teen. I’m Valentine Del Toro. I go by Val. That’s my phone number. Maybe you’ll call me sometime?”

Estele stood frozen, looking back at Val. “Oh, I get it. I forgot to ask your name! I’m such a ditz sometimes.”

He smiled and looked like he wanted to say something but remained silent.

The dude was gorgeous. Why did he have to show up today, while a huge magical mistake was still fresh in her mind? When would she get a break? “You have a nice name.”

Hope flickered on his face. “Thank you. So do you. You liked the food?”

She stared. This guy made it hard to breathe or think. Why was she reacting this way? “I loved your food.”

“There’s more where that came from. Maybe we’ll meet again soon.”

Did he mean it? “I hope so. Will you be here tomorrow?”

He turned to the side and his thick lashes cast shadows on his cheeks. “Probably not. The regular food truck will be back. Today was a temporary thing. We were just filling a need.”

So it was now or never? Why did this feel like an important meeting, one she shouldn’t take for granted? She started to get nervous. “Where do you usually work?”

His gaze returned to Estele and made eye contact so strong, she felt pinned to the spot. “San Diego.”

Was she sensing a solid spark between them or was that just wishful thinking? “Wow, that’s hours away. What brought you all the way to San Buena?”

“We were called here on an emergency.”

Val was just passing through; soon he’d be on his way. “I see.”

He pointed to the brown paper heart in her hand. A faint smile curled his lips. “You should call me.”

She glanced down at the number. An odd feeling, as if fate was finally knocking on her door, overwhelmed her. Why not be brave and do the unexpected? “Do I have to call? Why don’t I invite you out right now? The quesadilla and chocolate were so good. As far as novelty goes, you don't have any culinary competition around here. Maybe I could take you out for a drink at the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge sometime? No pressure. Totally casual." Her thoughts raced. "Wait! No! We shouldn't go to the Voodoo Hoodoo—" What an idiot she was. After her last stunt, she might not be welcome at the lounge.

"Why?" Val's eyes lit. "I love the name. It sounds exactly like the sort of place I'd want to go."

When would she learn to separate her private life from the enchantment community? "I have to warn you—the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge is eccentric. Perhaps we should go someplace else?"

His eyes sparkled. "I like eccentric."

She held a hand up to shield her eyes from the brilliant gleam of the truck's chrome. "We could get injured."

He leaned forward on his elbows. "Then I insist we face the danger together. Are you free tonight?"

"Yes," she said breathlessly.

"Then let's meet. I'm new to San Buena. Where is it?"

Drawing a deep breath, she pointed down the street. "Two blocks north. There's a giant neon martini glass on the sign. You can't miss it. What time?"

"I have a lot of prep work on the truck. It will take a few hours. How about seven?"

Feeling giddy. "Okay. See you at seven, Valentine. I mean Val."

"I'm looking forward to it." He smiled and ducked inside the truck.

Chapter 2

Estele walked into the LuLu Beauty Academy prepared to face a tense afternoon of dirty looks.

On the first floor behind a glass door, Miss Dahlia had gathered all the affected students and patrons of the LuLu Academy and placed them under a thrall. The group sat frozen in the classroom as Miss Dahlia walked amongst them, whispering spells and sprinkling enchanted herbs above their heads.

When Miss Dahlia saw Estele standing near the door, she frowned and motioned for her to move on with a brisk wave of her hand.

Witch Griselda materialized at Estele's side in a poof of steam and a thump of her staff. "You should go home, dear. Let us put things right." Pointing a bony finger at the brown paper heart, she grinned a yellowed smile. "I see you've already made a romantic conquest at the taco truck. How exciting. I can't wait to see what happens next. Enslaving lovers is so much fun! The scorching memories I have of wandering hands on buggy rides. Scandalous. Do young people still court in the back seats of buggies?"

"No."

The edges of Griselda's eyes drooped like a bloodhound's. "That's a pity. Bouncing in a carriage behind a horse's ass was mighty fun, and quite the conversation starter when the horse broke wind. How do young ones meet nowadays?"

"They swipe right on Tinder."

Alarm animated Griselda's face. "Tinder? Watch out! You're a witch, dear, and witches burn. It would be prudent to stay away from tinder, wooden stakes, hay bales—anything flammable. Avoid dunking stools as well. You never know who's going to freak out and go Malleus Maleficarum on you and bring down the hammer."

Estele held up Val's note. "I invited a man for a drink at the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge. Aunty, was that a mistake?"

"Not a mistake so much as rushing things. If a lemming is already headed for the cliff, there's no need to fire a starter's gun."

What the hell was the old gal babbling about? "Headmistress, I don't understand. Was I wrong to invite an outsider to San Buena's enchantment community's private watering hole?"

"Yes and no." Griselda's eyes bulged. "If a love affair is meant to be, it will happen. If it's meant to end in disaster, it will. We're all held captive in the hands of fate. Live with it. You're young and pretty in a wacky sort of way. It's likely you'll have many foolish lemmings running over your cliff to their doom."

Yes, it was a weird compliment, but that was how Griselda saw the world. Cheered, Estele smiled. "Thank you, Aunty. You always say the kindest things."

"You're welcome, Estele. Now go home before someone dies."

A pinch of shame needled her. "Aunty, I don't mean to hurt others, but I do. All my friends walk on eggshells waiting for me to do the next stupid thing. I love my friends. I care about people. Why doesn't my magic reflect that?"

Griselda leaned close. She patted twig-like fingers against Estele's arm as her lazy eye wandered. "It will. You've had so many emotional setbacks in your young life that you've not yet come into your full power. Love, especially self-love and self-respect, would do you a world of good. When you learn to harness all that's wild, pure, and free within, your magic will become formidable. You could be a witch without equal."

Wiser than Miss Dahlia? More competent than Fredi? The words were so welcome, tears hovered in her eyes. "Really?"

"I'll prove it." Reaching to the top of her staff, Griselda unscrewed the polished ruby. "This is the Heart of Hecate. It's been passed or plundered between witches for centuries. I won it unfair and square in a power showdown with a German sorceress at the close of World War I." Pressing it into Estele's hand, she muttered, "Because I respect you, I'm going to let you hold on to it for a little while just to see what its powers can do for you."

With her hand trembling, Estele gasped for breath. "Is that a good idea? The Heart of Hecate is priceless and powerful. Aunty, even I don't trust me."

"Experience teaches trust. I'm fricking ancient, but even I don't expect to walk the earth forever. The enchantment carried within the stone is potent and demands responsible action. I'll consider this a short-term experiment. Let's see what you can do when the pedal hits the metal."

"Whoa, I don't like the sound of that." She shook her head. "The ruby is warming. My palm is tingling. Is that normal? It's not going to burst into flames, is it? I have to go on the record as saying I don't feel good about this."

Griselda gave the stone a gentle tap. "Examine the flawless exterior. The gem was once a raw, clunky rock covered in lesser material. Its now-brilliant crimson core didn't shine, but someone saw its hidden potential and little by little polished the dross away. The Heart of Hecate is lovely now, beyond price. The value is in what it is, not what it was." One eye went left and the other pulled right. "Put the ruby in your handbag and for Circe's sake, girl, don't allow any misfortune to befall it."

Estele dropped the stone into her fringed leather pony express bag. "Now I'm scared. What if some creep wants to steal it? Won't someone notice it's missing from your staff and ask questions?"

"You'd be shocked at how unobservant most people are. Odd as I am, I walk the streets almost invisible to the people beside me. Not ironically, now that you possess the ruby, you will be surprised at how observant you'll become. That's what the Heart of Hecate does. It brings the world into vivid focus, and focus is exactly what you need, my dear."

"I'll do my best to protect it. Thank you for your trust, Aunty."

"Don't thank me yet. There's stormy weather ahead. Lots of bumps in the nights. Hang on to your broomstick!" Griselda pounded the staff on the floor. "Off I go. I TiVoed Wheel of Fortune. Goodbye." Poof! She disappeared in a burst of steam.

Clutching the purse under her arm, Estele glanced from side to side to see who may have witnessed the past moments in the hallway.

There was no one around.

"Pheew!" Turning, she decided it was best to avoid the Master Mage Magic Academy for the rest of the day and go straight home. In fact, she should probably avoid outdoor activity and social contact of all kinds while she was possession of the stone. Now she was honor bound to steer clear of trouble.

As she walked into the parking lot, an uncomfortable thought arose. "Valentine," she mumbled. "Oh crap. I'm going to have to cancel our date." Looking around, she saw the food truck had already driven off the lot.

"That was fast." She felt instant relief at not having to confront Val and tell him on the spot that she couldn't meet him for drinks.

But another thought followed. She wanted to learn a little more about Val. He seemed like such a nice guy, grounded, generous, and just the sort of man she longed for in her life. The decisive feeling was so intense she paused. For once she was having an unmuddled thought, and it felt as welcome as morning sunshine pouring through a kitchen window. Reaching into her purse, she touched the ruby. "So, it's okay to meet Val for a drink?"

The gem warmed to the touch. A sense of confirmation rolled off it.

"Wow. This is amazing. You're going to help me by doing all the thinking? Thank Goddess!" She gripped the ruby. "What should I wear?" The image of ripe, juicy cherries popped in her mind. "Okay," she grumbled. "You want me to dress like a cherry strudel? Can't say I'm 100 percent sold on the idea."

Approaching her bright red VW Bug, she unlocked the driver-side door and climbed in. The rearview mirror was hung with colorful purple, green, and gold Mardi Gras beads and crystals. She put the key in the ignition and turned the engine over. The sound of the car's engine was always friendly and chirpy, like a chubby hamster leaping onto its exercise wheel.

Putting the car in reverse, she backed up, then drove to the edge of the lot.

The LuLu Beauty Academy was located off Oceanside Boulevard, which was a busy main drag with direct access to the freeway, a commuter train platform, and beachfront hotels. Hectic on a slow day, it was congested as hell with summer tourists.

She watched oncoming traffic and waited for a green arrow before inching onto the street, but as soon as she was in her lane, a car roared through a red light and came barreling toward her.

Swerving aside at the last second, she watched in stunned horror as a vehicle filled with jeering clowns zipped past, nearly nicking her bumper.

“Watch where you’re going, bozos!” she shouted.

The clown driver flipped her off with a giant foam finger and continued speeding over a bridge toward the fairgrounds.

She shook her head. “Clowns? Why are they running red lights? Where’s the urgency? Did somebody say call in the clowns—now!” The incident disturbed her.

Putting her phone in speaker mode, she called Fredi.

Fredi picked up immediately. “Hi, Estele. I was wondering when you were going to call back.”

Turning onto a quieter street lined with palm trees, she started to relax. “I’m headed home early today. Fredi, you won’t believe the weird day I’m having.”

“I might.”

She shifted into third. “No. This is beyond even my normal.”

“What’s going on?”

“For starters, a car full of clowns just ran a red light and almost hit me.”

“Hit you with a pie?” Fredi giggled.

“No, hit me with a speeding car. They were headed toward the beach. I hope an enraged sea lion eats them.”

“The beach at Oceanside Park?”

“Yes.”

“The setup for the county fair starts today. Gus can’t wait. He’s such a kid when he talks about fair food. He’ll eat anything fried on a stick. I hope he won’t ask me to go on those horrid rides.”

“You’re nuts, I love fair rides!”

“You’re not a plus-size gal trying to squeeze down the funhouse tube slide. My last visit to the funhouse wasn’t much fun.”

Estele smiled at her reflection in the rearview mirror. “I had a really delicious lunch.”

“Wow, that was an abrupt change of topic. I’m happy for you.”

“This amazing taco truck showed up today, out of nowhere, and the food is out of this world. One of the guys working the truck is super cute. He made me eat flowers—”

“Flowers or flour?”

“Flowers. Big golden flowers, grilled. But that’s not the weird part. He likes me! We’re going to the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge tonight. And then out of the blue, for no reason, Witch Griselda took the Heart of Hecate from the top of her staff and gave it to me for some sort of experiment. It’s in my purse now. Can you believe it?”

“Whoa, whoa, whoa!” Fredi shouted. “Slow down. I’m going to deal with the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge first. Estele, what the fuck are you thinking? If you like this man and have any hopes of seeing him again, don’t go to the Voodoo Hoodoo! It’s a trouble spot, and I’m not saying that because of that thing you did to me and Gus.”

“I know, you’re right.” She drove up a steep street that wound up the hillside and provided a clear view of the Pacific Ocean and the Channel Islands beyond. “The other reason to stay away from the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge is that Sidhe the Fae swings like a pendulum and my new guy looks like a hot Latin pirate fantasy, but Val sort of has his heart set on it, so I guess we have to go.”

“Val?”

“Yes, his name’s Valentine and he’s a total hunkmeister!”

“Sweet.” Fredi sighed. “I’m scared to ask, but I have to. Why the hell did Witch Griselda give you the Heart of Hecate?”

“I have no idea. Oh, Grissy flirted big-time with one of the men on the Brujo Tacos food truck. Did you know that when she puts on a glamour she looks like Florence Welch from Florence + the Machine? It’s awesome!”

“Why would Headmistress Griselda give the Heart of Hecate to you?” Fredi sounded peeved. “I was one of the Master Mage Magic Academy’s youngest honor roll students. I graduated the program when I was only seventeen.”

“Griselda didn’t give me the ruby. It’s a loan. Some sort of test.”

“I’m sorry, Estele. I didn’t mean to sound bitter. But jeez Louise, what a once-in-a-lifetime privilege. I wonder what Grissy’s up to. Mercury poisoning may finally be pulling the rabbit out of her hat.”

Estele laughed. “I’m home, Fredi. I’m going to sign off and climb into a bath. I’ll call tomorrow, okay?”

“Before you go, did you say ‘brujo,’ as in wizard?”

“I did,” she said sheepishly.

“Be careful. Something about this odd combination of events is causing me alarm.”

“I’ll be cautious. Bye, Fredi.” She steered onto a steep driveway and her little VW coughed its way up the almost vertical incline as she parked beneath a modern cantilevered apartment building perched on a landscaped terrace. The architecture was sleek and stylish, the height of modern sophistication when it was built in the late 1960s. The panoramic view of the crescent coastline and Channel Islands was the sort usually reserved for millionaires.

On her touch-and-go waitressing salary and the modest student stipend she received from her grandmother’s estate, there was no way she would have ever been able to afford a fab apartment like this—except the building was batshit haunted.

No Indian burial grounds here, though. Those were located in downtown San Buena beneath an unassuming city park. This glass and chrome Bauhaus masterpiece was built on the razed foundations of a rotting Victorian asylum. In yesteryear, the syphilitics, the criminally deranged, the opium addicts, and the just plain loony were sent to the house on the hill and for the most part forgotten.

Now the attractive apartment complex had the dubious distinction of being one of America's most haunted locations. In fact, it was nearly impossible to hold renters to their leases. Most didn't last a week. Lucky for the enchantment community, the landlord was willing to slash the rent to maintain the fiction that the building was perfectly inhabitable. But she knew better.

Running up a stark black staircase that created the illusion the slender steps floated unanchored in space, Estele reached her second-floor apartment, unit thirteen.

Yes, it had been ill-advised of the planners to call the largest corner apartment unit thirteen. For certain it was haunted, but the sparkling steel and chrome Jetsons-style kitchen and ocean view were to die for. Too bad so many other weirdos had already died there first.

The moment the key turned in the lock, she opened the door and heard a drawer slam shut.

"Captain Manx!" Estele shouted. "Are you rifling through my dresser drawers again?"

No answer.

"Captain, I know that's you." The ghost of a nineteenth century Scottish sea captain haunted unit thirteen. For a number of complicated reasons, Captain Manx had ended his days in the house on the hill.

She entered the apartment with caution. "For shame, Captain! A lady's personal things should be off-limits. If we have to share the space, at least show me some respect."

A silver-bearded wild man dressed in a tattered pea coat, canvas pants, and a wool cap materialized seated on her kitchen countertop. "Greetings and salutations, bonny Miss Estele." He grinned, revealing shocking red and black stains on his teeth incurred from a lifetime of chewing the mildly narcotic beetle nut from Southeast Asia.

"Don't 'bonny' me. I heard the drawer shut. What have you been up to while I was gone? Open your coat, show me."

Looking sullen, the captain unbuttoned his jacket. His barrel chest was covered in silver hair, mermaid tattoos, and a lacy pink polka-dot bra.

"Aha! You know that's mine. Take it off."

Scowling, he removed the coat and slid the bra straps from his shoulders. "A body don't mean no harm by it. I only borrowed the bit of feminine finery on a lark."

"But it's still rude and nasty. My nice things come back to me reeking of stale sweat, pipe tobacco, and whatever it is you're doing with whale oil."

"Aye, whale oil is nature's most conducive lubricant for—"

"Be quiet!" Clamping her hands over her ears, Estele mumbled, "I don't want to know."

The captain handed her a scrawled note. "Here's a list of a few things we're in dire need of. If you would be so gracious as to retrieve them on your next sojourn to a medicinal emporium, I would be deeply indebted to you and prepared to praise your name in gratitude from here to the Milky Way.”

“Medicinal emporium? Why won’t you just say Rite Aid? By the way, you’re already indebted to me, and dead for over a century. Why do you keep asking for things from the drugstore?”

Throwing his hands into the air, the captain frowned. “I’m bored.”

She read the list. “Laudanum, two pints—”

“Aye, better make it three pints, my little raven-haired kitten of sea.”

“Please don’t call me that.” She glanced back at the list. “One cask Macau-brewed gin with extra Tonka bean, cocaine tincture—double strength, Bombay snuff, opium dumplings, black rum and canon powder for the making of sea-grog, hashish-infused Turkish delight, a rat....”

Setting the list on the countertop, she shrugged. “A rat? Captain, was there any substance in the world that didn’t become one of your vices?”

He answered with a dramatic chin drop. “I’m proud to say that despite a pronounced predilection toward parsnips, I was always able to practice moderation with my consumption of root vegetables.”

Bracing her hands on the countertop, she sighed. “Dare I even ask what use you have for the rat?”

A frown tugged at his brows. “Nothing. I just miss being around rats.”

Backing away from the counter, she paced the kitchen floor. “Listen to me carefully. I’m going to take a bath.”

“I’ll join you! I could use one myself.”

“No. I want some private time without interruptions. After my bath, I’m going to do a little homework and relax, because tonight I have social plans.”

“Aye. Might we expect a toothsome young lad to do some parlor calling?”

“No, at seven o’clock I will be meeting a man downtown for a drink.”

He winked. “Earning waterfront wages, are we? Flashing your knickers to gents for two pence?” The captain’s lips pouted beneath a walrus mustache. “Perhaps this is an illicit convergence of some sort involving a lonely longshoreman?”

“Wrong on all counts, Captain. My God, what a dirty mind you’ve got. We call them ‘dates.’ It’s a chance for people to get to know each other without necessarily having to exchange money or proposals of marriage on the first meeting.”

He shrugged. “I don’t understand the modern world. Social commerce between the sexes used to be so simple. In my day, when men and women met, it was always for one of three options. Marriage, money, and what was the third...?”

“Captain, if you behave yourself and lie low for a little while, I promise to buy you a bottle of rum. Even though you’re a freaking ghost and can’t even drink it. I’ll leave the cap off so you can sniff it to your heart’s content and get high on the fumes.”

Shivering with delight, he grinned, baring crimson teeth. “Bonny lass! You’d do that for me?”

“Yes, but I expect quiet and privacy in return. Do we have a deal?”

“Aye, my wee trollopy grog bunny.”

“Don’t call me that!” She walked to the bathroom, entered, and closed the door. The Zen-like room was decorated with black marble and sleek fixtures. A narrow window faced onto a private garden filled with Jurassic-era tree ferns. She turned the chrome faucet. Water bubbled into the tub. Uncorking a special bottle of Circe’s Secret bath gel that Fredi had made last Christmas, she drizzled the fragrant viridian-green fluid into the bath. Without meaning to, she added too much. The clean scent of lavender and poppy filled the air as the suds nearly overflowed the sides. “Oops!”

Turning the water off, she twisted her shoulder-length black hair into a topknot, undressed, and climbed into the tub. The water was warm, the view beyond the window soothing. As she slipped lower into the suds, she closed her eyes. All her cares fled.

And then she woke to Captain Manx hovering over her.

“Hey!” She jumped, causing a big splash. The water was cold. “What the hell? I wanted some privacy!”

“Miss, don’t you have a planned rendezvous with a lad at seven bells?”

“Yes.”

“It’s a quarter of the rose to seven now.”

“Holy guacamole!” Estele reached for a towel. Where did the time go? “Get out, I need to get dressed!”

The captain bowed. “I’ve taken the liberty of laying out tonight’s trousseau for you.”

“What? I know you mean well, but please stay out of my closet.” With the towel wrapped around her, she drained the tub and shuffled into the bedroom. The broad window facing the ocean revealed the sun was low in the sky. The first moments of brilliant pink sunset reflected off the waves. The freeway was congested, and there appeared to be a lot of activity taking place at the fairgrounds. Dozens of brightly painted big rigs dominated the parking lot.

Glancing at the bed, she saw a complete outfit arranged exactly the way it would look on her body, laid with obvious care across her mattress. A strand of crimson Bohemian glass beads topped a white retro dress with a cheerful cherry print. A dainty pair of red platform shoes with faux cherries on the toes completed the set. The combination wasn’t bad at all. She slipped the beads over her head and knotted them.

“Miss,” the captain called through a crack in the door. “If I might be so bold as to suggest, the red satin push-up brassiere and lace tap pants would make convivial companions to the fruity dress.”

“Thank you, Captain. Would you please close that door?” Opening the underwear drawer, she saw the satin tap pants set on top and reached for them. “Just this once, I will take your advice.”

“You’re welcome, miss. I’m delighted to be of service to a landlocked siren such as you. After tonight’s jaunt to the seamier side to partake in alcoholic beverages in the company of a stranger, is there any chance you might bringing me home a packet of Morpheus powder to compose my nerves?”

She wriggled into the underwear. “No. Sorry. Nobody sells Morpheus powder anymore.”

“Dribbling damnation, the world’s a bleaker place because of it.” He released a long hiss of disappointment that sounded like a teakettle come to a boil.

There was little time to get ready for a date with someone as terrific as Val. With energy Estele sped through the simplest tasks as fast as possible. While zipping the dress, she darted into the bathroom to apply cat-eye liner, scarlet lipstick, and give her hair a thorough brushing. Picking up a pair of manicure scissors, she gave the straight line of her short bangs the slightest trim.

Hurrying out of the bedroom, she discovered Captain Manx peering into her purse. “Captain! A lady’s handbag is a sacred space.”

He stared into the depths of the bag with his face slack. “What is that?”

She took hold of the purse. “I have no idea what you are talking about.”

“The stone.” He appeared stricken. “While you were dressing, it started to glow inside your purse. I saw its crimson beacon shining and walked over to investigate and...”

“And what?”

His lips trembled. “I touched it. Barely a tap, and horrible memories arose. Unbearable things I don’t want to remember, ever.”

“Like?”

The captain’s eyes turned liquid. “The drowning rats on my ship weren’t rats at all.”

Remembering Griselda’s comment that the Heart of Hecate brought clarity, she paused. Maybe the poor old captain was finally dealing with what had brought him to the asylum in the first place? “This sounds like a conversation we should have after I return.”

“Or never. I don’t wish to remember that part of my life.”

“Well, this is the afterlife.”

He gazed at her purse with dread. “Must that foul object remain in this dwelling?”

Closing the purse, she moved it away from the captain. “I’ll take it with me. You won’t be bothered by it. While I’m away, promise me you’ll be good. No mischief, please.”

“Aye,” he grumbled.

Walking out the front door, she locked it. “My Goddess, the things you have to put up with to get affordable rent.” Descending the steps, she felt real excitement. The plastic cherries on the straps of her shoes looked festive. She was grateful the captain had encouraged her to wear something girlier than she might have chosen on her own.

Opening the driver-side door of the car, she tossed her purse on the passenger seat and climbed in. Inserting the key, she smiled at the cheerful sound of the indestructible VW’s engine. Putting the car in gear, she headed down the steep driveway and drove west along the hillside road that wound its way toward the downtown area. The setting sun blasted through the windshield and made her squint.

On such a balmy summer evening, finding a parking space near the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge would be a challenge. She reached for the Parking Fairy talisman that dangled from the rearview mirror. Using enchantment to maintain a personal minion to locate parking spaces in crowded multilevel structures and urban areas had been one of her better ideas. She grasped a green fluorite crystal attached to a long strand of green beads and muttered, “Parking Fairy, I summon thee.”

The glove compartment opened. An emerald spark appeared and zipped around the interior of the car.

It was always such a joyful sight when the fairy appeared. “Fae, look at these shoes. Aren’t they cute?”

The green spark did a fly-by, gliding over the gas pedal and making tiny meowing sounds.

“Thank you. The shoes are new. I appreciate your vote of approval.”

The Fae droned a loud irritated machine hum that sounded like a drunken wasp in an echo chamber.

“Calm down, Fae. Don’t get so pissy. I didn’t mean it. I always forget the Fae hate thank—” She paused. “You-know-what. Jeez, the no-thank-you tradition seems so archaic. Why can’t you accept that I want to thank you for your help?”

Buzz, buzz, buzzzz buzzzzzzzz! Hysterical, high-pitched hornet-like humming followed by bursts of spitting green sparks stung Estele’s bare ankles like the strike of mini bazooka shells.

“Ouch! Stop already. Parking Fairy, accept my apology. I’m sorry.”

The Fae answered with a soft meow and a cascade of glittering green sparkles.

“Apology accepted? That’s the sweet Fae I love having on my dashboard. Now listen carefully. You need to find me a decent parking space near the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge. There is no way I can walk far in these shoes.”

Rolling the window down, she waited for the fairy to exit and zip ahead. Within seconds the tiny green ember zigged and zagged in front of her car before speeding ahead and disappearing into the distance.

Estele waved. “There she goes! Find me a good parking space.”

Chapter 3

Val sat the bar of the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge listening to a couple of shrunken heads set atop shot glasses having an odd conversation. Technically he wasn't "listening." He was mentally eavesdropping. The dried and enchanted human heads from Borneo were wary of his presence and cautious not to say a word aloud, yet he was certain they were conscious entities capable of speech.

The kitschy Tiki lounge was a weird place for sure. Large fish tanks filled with electric eels provided most of the ambient light. The murky-looking counter setup with its many hand-labeled apothecary bottles appeared better suited to a waterfront bar in nineteenth-century Rangoon. The place crawled with supernatural vibes that were impossible for any sensitive soul to miss.

A tall, slender man with long platinum hair and sparkling green eyes hovered behind the counter, staring at him from the corner of his eye like he expected trouble. The man was extremely seductive and off-putting at the same time. He wasn't even sure how that was possible.

Green eyes leaned closer. "Are you certain I can't make you something special to drink?"

"I'm meeting someone." Val glanced at his watch. "I want to give them a few more minutes." It was 7:36. Estele was late. He began to worry she might not show, and that would be very bad. Bad for his personal mission, and very unfortunate for the community at large. He needed Estele.

"Sid!" a woman called from the back door of the lounge. "Sidhe, can you hear me? I need a reward for my Parking Fairy!"

Mr. Shifty behind the counter, presumably named Sid, removed a small saucer from the shelf, dropped a sugar cube into the center, and soaked it with a liberal drizzle of emerald green absinthe. The brisk herbal scent of anise filled the air. He carried the dish to the back door.

"I'll set this on the dashboard for my Fae." The woman sounded breathy. "No worries, I won't say those words you don't like even though I really appreciate your kind gesture."

Val recognized the owner of the voice as Estele. Relief washed over him. She was meeting him of her own free will, no enchantments or inducements of any sort. He'd played fair with her today, offering only good food and an encouraging smile. Nothing underhanded or hidden in the sauce, just fresh Oaxacan cuisine served straight up, no wizardly chaser.

Even more promising, by feeding her Parking Fairy within earshot, Estele had just tipped her hand about being a card-carrying member of the enchantment community. That alone may have spared him hours of cloying conversation trying to ascertain if she was “out” or not. Obviously she was. True, she hadn’t seen him yet, but it would seem natural he’d overheard her from his place at the counter. This was a time-saver. Now he could get what he wanted from Estele even faster.

A minute passed. Estele walked into the lounge with a bright smile on her ruby lips and a cloud of glossy black hair surrounding her face. He froze, breathless; she looked beautiful, and more womanly than the dejected-looking punk pinup he’d first glimpsed this afternoon in the LuLu Beauty Academy parking lot.

So far the prophecy was true. The sense of fate clicking into place was exhilarating.

Estele made eye contact and shot him a parade queen wave as she approached. “Hey.” Sliding onto the barstool beside him, she said softly, “I’m sorry I’m late. You won’t believe this, but I fell asleep in the bathtub.”

A fresh scent hung in the air. He leaned closer to sniff. “You smell like lavender. All is forgiven.”

Her lashes fluttered. “How long have you been here?”

He rubbed the stubble on his chin. “Since 6:50. I got here a little early.”

“Damn! I’m sorry. I owe you a drink, don’t I?” She tilted her head ever so slightly toward Sid. “Let’s move away from the bar and take a private booth.”

He stood.

Estele looked up. “Wow, either you’re very tall, or I’m very short. Sadly, I think I’m very short.”

“You’re perfect.” He laughed. His gaze swept over her. Even in high heels she was tiny—a proverbial pocket Venus. He could pick her up and carry her with ease if he had to, or stuff her in a duffel bag and make a run for it, but he hoped matters would never come to that.

Adjusting a large purse on her shoulder, she lowered her voice. “Before we walk away from the bar, we should order our drinks and watch Sid as he blends them.”

He wondered why she emphasized “watch” so sharply.

Overhearing Estele, Sid looked up with a distinct smirk on his lips. “Oh please! Estele, you’re the one we all have to keep an eye on.”

Estele huffed. “I’m not the one who served Lust Slave Rum Punch Zombies by the bucketful to a busload of Austrian tourists. Only good thing I can say about that incident is at least it happened far from home. Those poor folks won’t forget their walk on the wild side anytime soon.”

Sid shrugged. “That’s what they asked for. The Voodoo Hoodoo lounge and its Lust Slave Rum Punch Zombies came highly recommended in the Austrians’ guidebook.”

Estele blew Sid a pantomime kiss. “Sneaky bastard. You’re the one who wrote the recommendation. No wonder you’ve got such a bad rep. Even though I love you like a brother, I will watch you like a hawk while you blend our drinks.” She turned to face Val, her big blue eyes wide. “What would you like?”

Thinking Estele didn’t even look old enough to drink, let alone the rest of what he had planned, he began to worry somebody may have made a big mistake. “I don’t know. What are you going to have?”

“I’m having a Cuban mojito.”

Mojitos were a current favorite of his. At least he couldn’t fault her on taste. “Sounds good. I’ll have one also.”

Sid set two heavy tumblers on the countertop. “Behold, the glasses are clean.”

“Let me double-check.” Estele waved a hand over the top to cast a sanitation incantation. “Yep, they’re free of magical residue. Continue.”

Setting a sturdy glass pitcher on the counter, Sid spooned a flurry of fine-grain sugar into the bottom, adding fistful after fistful of fresh mint leaves until the drink began to look like a salad.

Then Sid reached for a bowl full of limes. Each lime was selected, given a harsh squeeze, and rolled mercilessly against the countertop beneath the weight of his palm before being cut in half and juiced. The lime juice was added to the pitcher and a thick wooden stick with a rounded head was used to crush the mint and muddle it all together. The mashed mint leaves released their cool, fragrant aromatic oils into the air. White rum was poured over everything, along with a splash of club soda and a scoop of crushed ice. The pitcher of jade green liquid was stirred and pushed toward Estele. “Cuban-style mojitos. Enjoy.”

Estele reached for the pitcher. “Thank—” Biting her lip, she was quick to correct herself. “I meant, this looks delicious, Sid. I know we’ll love it.”

Slipping a few bills from his wallet, Val set them on the countertop and took hold of the pitcher.

Estele’s jaw dropped. “I was going to buy the drinks.”

“First round is on me. Where would you like to sit?”

She motioned toward a grass hut in the far corner, lorded over by a scowling Tiki. “Over there.”

Leading the way, she walked in an ultra-feminine, hip-swinging Marilyn Monroe type of saunter. He followed in a semihypnotized state, hoping his tongue wasn’t hanging out. The dress and shoes flattered her figure and poured gasoline on his lust-starved libido. Part of him wished she’d worn combat boots and baggy jeans instead. It would have been more practical.

Taking a seat in the booth across from Estele, he pushed one of the tumblers toward her and poured.

She set her purse on the table.

As he poured the drinks, his hand felt strange. An odd sensation started in his palm and traveled up his arm. Soon every tiny hair on his forearm was standing straight. All his training alerted him to the possibility of a metaphysical ambush. Something was askew.

A red glow emanated from inside Estele’s purse, casting a rosy tint against the wall. “Estele, I think your phone is on.”

Peering inside her purse, she winced. “Uh-oh.” Hurriedly, she moved the bag under the table.

Why did she look so surprised? “What was it?”

She pushed the handbag farther away, a nervous smile fluttering on her lips. “Nothing.”

“Nothing glows red?”

“I’m holding on to something for a friend.” She sipped the mojito. “Um, this is good, which reminds me, I have to remember to buy a bottle of rum on the way home.”

Was she nervous because this was a date, or was something else going on? All his senses screamed something else was going on. “If it’s important, maybe you should write it on your hand.”

“That’s a good idea.” Digging through her purse, she reached for a felt pen and scrawled “RUM” on her thumb.

“What’s the rum for?”

Shifting on the seat, she appeared uncomfortable. “Nothing.”

Okay, what was with this woman? “More nothing? That’s a lot of nothing.”

She took a long swallow of mojito. “It’s for something, but I can’t say.”

Picking up his glass, he took the first sip. Fresh, minty, and tart, and the generous amount of rum warmed his throat. The whole thing burned like green fire going down and spread through his limbs like the tide rushing ashore. A moment of light-headedness followed. He started to feel the antsy shaken can of soda sensation, like he wanted to get up and do backflips across the room. His heart raced and he couldn’t stop staring at Estele, wondering if it might be a good idea to drag her under the table and cover her in kisses. Without doubt she was the most attractive woman he’d been near in a long while.

Then a sobering moment of reality hit. It occurred to him that the effects he was feeling were more than a little white rum could produce. “You look beautiful,” he blurted. “I feel really bad about this. I let you think tonight was a date, but it’s not.”

Estele clutched the tumbler. “What is it, Val? What’s wrong? You look odd. Why are you staring at me like that?”

Honesty was not part of the plan, at least not at this stage. The less Estele knew, the safer she’d be. Talking would ruin everything. His throat tensed as he willed himself to remain silent, but the words kept coming. “I wanted to speak in private so I could recruit you.”

Damn! Why did I say it out loud?

Leaning forward, she laughed. “Recruit me? For what?”

Staring at the tall glasses sweating on the table, he muttered, “Something’s not right.” Thinking quickly, he removed a silver chain from around his neck that had a tiny filigree dagger as a dangling ornament. He held the chain above the tabletop and watched in suspense as the blade spun in a circle, then pulled strongly toward the pitcher.

“Whoa!” His jaw dropped. “Look at that. I’m getting an enchantment reading that’s off the charts!” He glanced at Estele, who looked dumbfounded. “How well do you know the bartender? The tumblers might have been clean of spells, but the pitcher he mixed the drinks in isn’t.”

Estele stuck her head outside the booth. “Sid! This isn’t funny. What did you do to the drinks? Be honest, is there a mojo on the mojitos?”

Sid scoffed from behind the counter. “It’s a mild attraction spell. It won’t do anything to the two of you that wasn’t already happening. Don’t be so uptight. I get so frigging bored trapped behind the bar.”

“Sidhe!” Estele became enraged. “This is an abuse of magic. I should report you to the enchantment committee.”

Dismissive laughter rolled out of Sid. “Estele Esposito plans to report a magic violation to the committee? Holy crap, I want to be there to see their faces. I did you a favor, sweetie. You’re sloppy and you need to be more cautious. Did you even notice this guy’s a full-fledged brujo?”

Estele looked surprised in a bad way.

Val froze, feeling guilty. “I was just getting ready to mention it.”

Hurt shone in her eyes. “This afternoon, you had a couple opportunities to mention you were a brujo.”

“I didn’t know I needed to. What the hell, I’m working in a food truck with the words ‘Brujo Tacos’ written in orange lettering across the front. It’s not exactly classified information.”

She raised her palm in annoyance, and her voice trembled. “I never take that sort of thing literally! If a sign says ‘Wizard Dry Cleaning,’ I don’t assume the business is owned and operated by actual wizards. You didn’t enchant my lunch, did you? I thought you were such a nice guy, and so good-looking. Of course, it’s too good to be true. Man, this got weird fast.” Reaching for her purse, she looked peeved. “Bummer. I’m going home before things get worse.” She stood.

He grabbed her wrist. “Wait! Don’t leave. Not yet. Let’s talk.”

She held the purse to her heart. A bit of red glow seeped out through the zipper seam.

“What is in your handbag that glows crimson?”

Locking her arms tight around the purse, she turned away. “None of your business.”

The look of anger on her face tipped him off that this was not going to be easy. “We got off on the wrong foot, and I’m sorry about that. Please sit. Give me ten minutes. I just want a chance to explain.”

“Forget it. I shouldn’t even be talking to a brujo.”

He looked at her with his best puppy in the pet shop expression. “Please.”

She sat. “Okay, but only ten minutes.”

Pointing to the pitcher, he drew a tense breath. “We both drank. How much trouble are we in? Does that guy know what he’s doing in the enchantment department or is he just a dabbler?”

A frown creased her brow. “He knows what’s he’s doing. If Sid says the spell is mild, it is.”

“I couldn’t figure him out. What is he? A warlock?”

“No.” A sarcastic laugh burst free of her. “He’s not human. Tonight Sid is wearing his hair down, so you can’t see his pointy ears. Sidhe the Fae is a demoted demigod punished by the Queen of Fae. He used to be a Prince of the Forest Realms and Supreme Calvary Commander during the Fae Crusades. Now he owns a Tiki bar.”

Whistling. “He must have fucked up bad.”

“Big-time,” she whispered. “We should keep it down. Sid’s hearing is as sharp as a tack.”

“Really?” Resting his elbows on the table, he was drawn to Estele like iron filings to a magnet. At that moment she looked like a streetwise Snow White in a snug cherry-print dress. He wanted to pull her onto his lap and feel her melt in his arms as he kissed her throat. That reaction came out of nowhere and boded ill for his dignity. “So, is it safe to say any ‘attraction’ we might be feeling toward each other is due to the enchanted mojito?”

“Speak for yourself. I’m sort of pissed off at you. If I’d known you were a real brujo I would not have eaten your food, or agreed to meet you here tonight.”

“But I didn’t know that. I was going to tell you.” Her words were cold water dashed in his face, but he still wanted to put a hand on her thigh, even if she slapped him for trying such a poorly timed stunt. “What have you got against brujos anyway?”

“Can’t trust them.”

“How many brujos do you know?”

“It’s what you don’t know about a brujo that causes the problems.”

“That doesn’t sound very open-minded or PC. I thought the enchantment community practiced inclusive nonjudgment of different magical lifestyles?”

“They do.” Her words sounded clipped. “I just don’t care for brujos. Even big handsome ones like you. So there.”

“Fair enough.” He sat back, reached for the tumbler, and took another sip. “I’m going to live dangerously and drink the freaking mojito even though a weird Fae cast a spell on it. It’s delicious, and to be honest I was already feeling attracted to you this afternoon. So what the hell, a little extra attraction spell in the booze isn’t going to make too big a difference in my night. I can see how this is going to end.”

Estele didn’t touch her drink. “How does this end? Tell me. I’m interested to hear your opinion.”

“We get up in a few minutes, walk away from each other, and innocent people die.” He compressed his lips and willed himself not to speak the words. Or I put an enchantment on you and compel you to help me.

“Put the drink down,” she urged. “You’re getting a strange gleam in your eyes.”

Taking another sip, he spoke slowly. “Estele, why don’t you trust brujos?”

The red glow escaping her purse intensified and pulsed like a beating heart. “It’s a personal matter.”

The personal matter looked like the colored lights in a disco. “What the hell is in your purse?”

Estele looked appalled. “I’m not going to tell you, so stop asking.”

“I’m trying to understand this. Did I do something to intimidate or scare you?”

“Scare me?” Her eyes flashed. “Ha! Don’t flatter yourself. I see scary stuff every day, most of it my doing.” She reached for her mojito. “I’m not even scared to drink Sid’s cocktail, because now that I know you’re a brujo there’s zero temptation to give in to attraction, which is not how I felt about you this afternoon. Believe me, I was on the hook.”

Was she teasing him or insulting him? It was such a shame. Estele was so cute, exactly his type. “So, it’s strictly my brujo-ness that’s causing an issue?”

“Honey, it ain’t your big brown eyes or your rocking bod causing red flags.” Covering her mouth with her palm, she appeared shocked. “Whoops, nix that. I need to be quiet.”

He set the tumbler down. “Maybe if you knew me a little better, you’d feel differently.”

“Val, my mother used to say, ‘No one really knows a brujo. It’s all superficial machismo and secrets.’”

“That’s harsh. Why would she say something like that?”

“Because she was briefly married to one.”

Wow, that brought the curtain down on Act Two. “Oh.”

Estele’s pretty little face looked like a China doll, ready to shatter to bits. “Yep, my daddy’s a brujo. I don’t remember him and I have no idea where he is now. I was still in diapers when he went bye-bye on me and my mom. No love lost.”

“I’m sorry for you. It doesn’t sound good. But it’s discouraging to hear that one man, who you admit you don’t know, has determined your opinion of all brujos.”

“A father is a pretty important man. Who he is, what he is, counts.”

“I know.” He crossed his arms over his chest. Just thinking about it brought a stab of pain. “My father is a dentist in La Jolla, California. Upscale clientele, drives a shiny black Mercedes. He was horrified that I willingly chose the path of brujo. He wanted me to go into cosmetic dentistry with him. I couldn’t do it. I felt the ancestral calling and asked to be apprenticed to my dad’s younger brother, Tio Bruno. Bruno’s the older man working the truck with me. He’s an amazing wizard and a very ethical person. I wanted to learn the art of food magic, alquimia de sabor—alchemy of flavor—from him.”

Estele squinted in Val’s direction. “There’s such a thing as specializing in food magic? I’ve never heard of alqui—what did you call it?”

“Alquimia de sabor—alchemy of flavor. It’s a specialty or predilection of brujos.”

She took a sip of her mojito. “Interesting. You learn something new every day. What does a food alchemist do exactly?”

“The inherent magic of the plant and animal kingdoms are harnessed into a form of enchantment consumed and appreciated by the aesthetic body—the senses. The alchemy of flavor works on many levels. It can break down barriers between people. Open the heart. Certain flavors or scents can even transport the spirit back in time. It seems simple, but it’s powerful stuff.”

“So instead of tools of power like a wand or crystals, you work with food?”

“Yes, mostly food, but I do use a few magical tools.” He hadn’t realized how tense he’d been until his shoulders relaxed. “You don’t seem as upset as you were a few minutes ago.”

Leaning back against the booth, she shrugged. “I’m not.”

That was encouraging. “What about you? The cat’s out of the bag. We’ve both come clean about being members of the enchantment community. What sort of magic do you practice?”

“I don’t know how to answer that. I’m a witch and you’re a brujo. We’re not really part of the same community, are we?”

“Okay, I’ll reword my question, separate but equal members of the enchantment community.”

She placed her hands on the table like she was going to pounce. “Want the truth? I don’t know what I’m doing! Even my best friend describes my style of spellcraft as ‘batshit wacky.’ I’m a danger to my friends and loved ones. What I intend to have happen and my actual results never match up. Most of the time I’m a freaking disaster!”

“I think you’re being hard on yourself.”

She glanced away in disgust. “Trust me. I’m not.”

He sensed an opening and rushed in. “I went through a difficult phase too. When I started my apprenticeship to Tio Bruno, I was twenty-two and had just finished four years of college. Most apprentices begin practicing in their teens. It didn’t come easy. In many ways, I had more to unlearn. I vividly remember a few times that Tio Bruno almost gave up on me.”

With a tilt of her delicate head, Estele appeared to be studying him. “How old are you now?”

“I’m twenty-six.”

“You mastered the art in only four years? I’m twenty-two and I’ve been a bad witch my entire life.”

He laughed. “I never said I mastered the art. I became proficient enough to know I should continue to the next level.”

“Which is?”

“For a brujo?” He clasped his hands in front of him and hoped he didn’t appear terrified. “Magical partnership with an ally.”

She nodded. “You should adopt a rescue dog. They’re grateful, smart, and I hear they make excellent allies. I have a friend who volunteers at a pet shelter. I could hook you up with a paw-tastic ally.”

Swallowing hard, he continued. “Estele, I was hoping to recruit you.”

She rolled her eyes. “Me? What are you thinking? A dog might be more teachable.”

“I disagree, and I’m not sure I need to teach you anything.”

Her brows lifted. “I’m confused. I feel like I’m being set up here. You think I’d make a good magical ally? That’s just evil or extremely foolish! Either way, something’s not adding up. You’re too handsome. Too easy to talk to.” She leaned across the table and poked him in the chest. “Look at all this muscle. Is this even real? Or is it a spellcast exterior glamour? I’ll bet you’re really a bony little 103-year-old perve-toad.”

Her odd form of flattery made him want to burst out smiling, but he was afraid to come off smug. “I’m into weight lifting. I have to stay active. I work with food all day.”

“Another thing.” She pointed to a tattoo on her arm of an Irish Claddagh, a heart clasped between two hands. “Is your name really Valentine? Or was that a made-up thing to get my attention? I’m asking because all my friends know the heart is my lucky totem.”

Reaching for his wallet in his back pocket, he withdrew his driver’s license and set it on the table.

She picked up the license with dainty fingers, tilting it to make the embossed hologram flash. “It looks official. Valentine Del Toro. Male....” She smirked. “Obviously. Born October 27. That makes you a Scorpio. I’ll consider myself warned. According to the California Department of Motor Vehicles you are indeed twenty-six years old. Current residence is listed as 113 Larkwood Lane. Black hair, brown eyes, six-foot-four, 203 pounds.” She returned the license. “Taken as a whole, very provocative reading. You’re really six four? I’m barely five two. I can’t even imagine what being so tall would feel like.”

“You see a lot of crooked hair partings.”

She touched her hair. “Really?”

“Your hair looks lovely, and the part is perfectly straight.”

“The license says you live in Mission Beach. Two hundred miles and untold agonizing hours in urban traffic make the distance a very impractical commute. Why would a brujo show up in San Buena today to serve lunch?”

“Tio Bruno said we were called here on special assignment.”

“This afternoon, you said it was an emergency. Who called you?”

He shrugged. “The universe? There were many signs, portents, and dreams calling us here.”

“Signs and portents? That sounds like double talk for bitch-I-haven’t-told-you-anything.” Estele picked up the pitcher and poured more mojito into her glass. “Should we finish this off? I need a drink.” She emptied the last of the contents into his glass. “Go for it. What the hell.”

Raising the tumbler to toast, he clinked his glass against hers. “To battle we go. Hell is closer than we think.”

She wrinkled her nose. “That was a weird toast to make.”

“It’s the truth. Haven’t you sensed power building in the last few days? There is a great vortex of evil forming under our feet. I feel it churning.”

Tipping the tumbler to her lips, Estele took a long gulp. “You’re joking, right?”

“No.”

“Uh!” She set her empty glass down. “Why did I finish my drink? Now I have to sit here thinking, ‘What a gorgeous guy. Too bad he’s a nutjob.’”

“Estele, dark forces are at work. They mean to do great harm to the city of San Buena. I came here to find my ally and do battle against malevolence. It’s true.”

“Okay.” Estele heaved a tense breath. This evening was turning into a sticky tar pit of unwelcome weirdness. When was she ever going to meet a nice guy and have it work out? “Do you always talk this way?”

Val smoothed his palm across his wavy locks. With his hair pushed back, his rugged cheekbones were clearly displayed. The arch of his full lips turned downward, lending his dramatic facial features a certain sobriety. His gaze smoldered. The dude had to know he looked hot. “Talk how?”

“All high and mighty. Like you’re the final word on the subject. Thank-God-I’m-here type of thing.”

“Am I doing that?”

“Yep.” Good Goddess, Val was dressed so nice too. An earthy red shirt the color of garnet and ink-washed jeans. Fancy leather-tooled boots. Jeez Louise. Her typical date usually dressed like a beach bum in ragged shorts and flip-flops. She fixated on a thick silver cuff inlaid with a large chunk of finest chocolate-veined turquoise. She suspected it was a wizardly power tool or object used to store enchantment.

“You’re staring at the cuff.” He lifted his wrist. “Do you see the coyote pattern? Coyote is my totem spirit. The cuff was made expressly for me.”

“Coyote suits you. You do know San Buena has a very active and diverse enchantment community? I shouldn’t even be telling you this, but this afternoon you parked your taco truck right in front of the Master Mage Magic Academy, which is sort of a vocational school for adult witches and warlocks. Don’t you think that in a town filled with Lycans, Druids, and Wiccanites one or more of us would have picked up on the ‘vortex of evil building beneath our feet’? Dude, don’t insult us.”

“First, Tio Bruno and I knew about the Master Mage Magic Academy. We sensed magic being practiced and drove straight to it. We even paid off the other food truck to get him out of the way for a little while. Second, evil is sly. As you say, the enchantment community of San Buena is active and strong. It presents a tempting target for dark forces who would wish to move in and exploit the situation. My guess is an attack on San Buena has been planned over many months, perhaps years. Slowly, in subtle increments, small amounts of evil have accumulated below in a bubble of malevolent energy. It was done in such way that one who lived here would never notice. Only an outsider looking in would sense the danger. A crucial stage has passed. I assure you, the threat is imminent.”

Chills rippled up her arm. “Eww. And what exactly do these dark forces want?”

He lowered his voice. “Estele, they want you.”

“Me? You mean they want the witches of San Buena.”

Rolling up his sleeve to display the pinup girl in combat boots, he thrust his arm forward. “The prophecy says they want you.”

She grew flustered. “Nonsense! Whose prophecy? Anyone can make up a prophecy. Why should I be listening to any of this? Your story is all jacked-up.”

“The prophecy was told to me by an old bruja, a wisewoman who lived in the mountains of Oaxaca. Her prediction marked the end of my apprenticeship and the beginning of my ‘first flight,’ or first time working in the field with a power ally. I was told to go north, find my ally, and that we would walk into battle together. I was given a permanent mark so that I might always be bonded to my ally. An appointment with an ink-wizard was made.”

“Wait!” she interrupted. “Ink-wizard? Is there such a thing?”

“Yes. An ink-wizard is a mage who specializes in enchanted tattoos and sacred marks. Not all of them show on the surface of the skin, but mine does.”

She pointed to the Wiccan symbols tattooed on her arm. “I love ink! I gotta find one of those ink-wizards and finish this sleeve.”

“Receiving my mark was a solemn occasion. For my sacred mark, I was expecting something powerful, along the lines of an eagle, a storm cloud, a scorpion, but instead....” He pointed to the Betty Page tattoo on his forearm. “I got a pinup girl as my ally. Now the evil ones want you.”

The breath left her body. Did he mean it, or was she being suckered into a tall tale? “It can’t be me. I don’t believe a word of it.” She glanced around the thatched booth. “I’ve never been so grateful in all my life to not have a shrunken head sharing our table. They’re so gossipy. I don’t want anyone to know any of this. I’ll admit I’m capable of causing plenty of trouble on my own. I don’t need nasty rumors following me around that I’ve somehow been earmarked by evil to do harm to the community. I’d never do that.”

His brows knit together. “I believe you. If you were ever to commit evil, it would be because you were tricked into doing so. That is why the fates have sent me here as your protector and ally.” He thumped his fist on his chest. “I am your living shield. Evil will have to go through me to get to you. I will not allow you to be compromised. From now on, I shall be at your side—constantly.”

She gasped. “Hold on a minute! Wow, this date for drinks took a fast, hard left. What are you talking about?”

“Malevolent forces may try to use you. I am here to make sure that does not happen. I am your personal caballero, knight-errant. From now on, you will remain in my line of sight and within earshot. I will sleep at the foot of your bed like a loyal servant until imminent danger passes.”

“Ha!” She laughed. “This is a joke, right? Brujo humor gone astray?”

Val’s dark eyes remained earnest. “This is no joke. I am sincere. Place your hand on my heart and you will know I am sincere.”

She drained what was left of the mojito. “Baby, this isn’t going to work. I’m not that gullible. Seriously, what would dark forces want with me? I’m a magical hit-and-run accident in progress.”

He leaned across the table, his gaze intense. “I disagree. You have tremendous potential.”

“You really think so?” Then, remembering she had the Heart of Hecate, a priceless ruby of power, in her purse sobered her. Was it possible Mr. CrossFit-brujo-ha-ha wanted the stone for his own undisclosed purpose? In folklore, wasn’t coyote the ultimate trickster? If ever there was a time to be discreet, this was it. But how would he even know about it? With the monster rock in her purse, she was vulnerable as hell, and wondered why in all witches-dunking-stool-damnation kooky old Griselda handed the gem to her. All of this was too much to fathom. “You seem to have a clear overview of the situation. So tell me, where is it?”

Val’s gaze narrowed. “Where is what?”

“The bubble of malevolence.” Her tone was abrupt.

A somber expression etched a ridge between his brows, he pointed. “West. Where the land meets the sea. Great tension is building and we must suppress it.”

She glanced over her shoulder, the tiny hairs on the back of her neck standing. Something about the way Val said it and the look on his face finally broke through her resistance. It registered that he could be telling the truth.

In a flash she had one of her strongest psychic moments ever. In a fast-forward blast of images, she saw them working together as a team to battle a threatening mushroom cloud of grinning clown faces. The terrifying image left her shaking. As weird as matters appeared, it seemed likely she was being paired with a brujo to accomplish Goddess-knew-what.

“You’re pointing toward the fairgrounds. They’re setting up for the county fair. Are you telling me evil is coming to town served fried on a stick?”

Chapter 4

Estele watched as Val stood with outreached hand. Dark and formidable, he looked exactly like the sort of demon force he professed to be battling.

“Come with me.” His voice was low. “We’re done here. There’s not a minute to waste.”

Her stomach rumbled. “No dinner? I’m hungry. I don’t remember agreeing to anything. What are we doing?”

“Recon. Good intelligence is essential. A bubble of malevolence is just energy. It needs agents on the ground to carry out tasks. I want to see what we’re going up against.”

“Slow down, Speed Racer! I’m not even sure what my contribution to ‘we’ is. Maybe we should formulate some sort of plan before we jump into the fray? I’m not afraid to admit that I’m an incompetent witch, and until you prove different, you’re not my live-in caballero. You’re just some guy from a taco truck.”

He looked disappointed. “Estele, a moment ago I sensed you believed me and let down your guard. For a minute we were in agreement. It was a huge step toward bonding as allies.”

She waved her hand. “Nix the bonding. Val, you’re a nice guy. You’re good-looking and a great cook, but you need to understand a brujo is the last person on earth I would trust. Drama and weirdness naturally gravitate to me. I don’t need a tricky brujo to lead me into yet even more trouble.”

“So, your weak spot is self-doubt?”

He said it with such certainty. Damn him. “Is that any of your business?”

“Estele, you had a moment of clarity. You trusted me. I felt it, and now you’re talking yourself out of it. I can say from experience that trusting your initial impulse will bring better results in your magic.”

“Sounds like a public announcement from the brujo advisory board.”

His face remained calm. “Be as sarcastic as you like. Say it out loud and burn through your resistance. When you’re ready, we will work together.”

“Your face is so stoic. You really believe we need to fight evil as a team, don’t you?”

“I do. I might add, you owe it to the innocent people in this community to remain open-minded. They’re the ones who will be caught unaware. When we’re finished with the task at hand, you may formally dismiss me. Should you choose, you'll never have to deal with me again." He extended his hand. "I want you to be brave and honor your instincts. At this moment, we are charged with an important task."

Drawing a deep breath, she sensed Val was right. Part of her wanted to trust him. She couldn't say exactly why; it was more of a feeling, a shiver in her bones. Clasp his hand, she grabbed her purse and scooted out of the booth. "Okay. I'll go with you to the fairgrounds, just to check things out. But I'm not going to walk for blocks along the railroad tracks wearing these shoes. Forget it. Who's driving?"

"We need to take your car."

Terrific. They were doing recon on her dime and the demons, if there were any, would be scratching the paint off her car. "Use my car to hunt demons? Why?"

"Tio Bruno dropped me off. I don't have my truck with me. I couldn't drive separately and keep an eye on you. Until the crisis passes we do everything together, understood?"

"Everything everything? You can't possibly mean that."

"I do. Please hand me your car keys."

"Excuse me? I'm capable of driving my own car."

"Very well." His hand moved to the middle of her back and gave her a gentle nudge toward the door. "Go ahead. I stashed my gear behind the bar. I must retrieve it."

She stepped aside and watched as Val approached Sid.

Sid leered. "Hey, brujo. You. Me. The storeroom?" He winked. "At least think about it."

The line of Val's mouth drew taut. "May I have my duffel bag?"

Sid disappeared behind the counter and emerged holding a large bag. "So, tell me the truth." Sid shot her an insinuating look. "Maybe you'd rather take Estele into the back and peel that dress off her?"

Val looked appalled. "Why are the Fae so ridiculously horny? I'm not even going to answer that question."

"Whatever." Sid allowed the bag to drop from his hands onto the bar with a loud thump. "Whoops, it slipped."

Claiming the bag, Val frowned. "I hope you didn't break anything."

"If I did"—Sid pouted—"I'll kiss it and make it all better."

Val scowled, turned, and followed Estele outside the lounge. When he saw the VW a look of discouragement crossed his face. "Yours is the teeny car?"

"Yep."

"I might need to buy food and equipment to fight evil."

"How much food and equipment? The back seat is filled with my beauty school supplies and magazines, and the trunk is the size of a bread box, so when you shop think freeze dried and concentrate." She unlocked the passenger side door.

He opened the door, setting the bag behind the seat before climbing in. “We will need to make many trips.”

“Where?”

“We will discuss a detailed battle strategy later. We will work this out together.”

“We, we, we. You sound like one of the three little pigs.” Walking around the front, she opened the driver door and climbed in. “Oh Goddess.” The dashboard was covered in hundreds of tiny sugary footprints. Parking Fairy had partaken of the absinthe and danced up a storm. She turned toward Val, who was settling his big frame uneasily into the seat and fastening the seat belt. “Can you reach the back seat and hand me the packet of wet wipes? My Parking Fairy gets everything so sticky.”

He felt behind the seat. “Here they are.” Handing the packet to her, he leaned forward to examine the dish with its puddle of emerald liquid and grainy mound of partially dissolved sugar. He dunked his fingertip into it and tasted the absinthe. “Sid stocks the good stuff.”

“Sid makes the absinthe himself.”

“I should have guessed. Fae love anything herbal.”

Estele lifted the saucer with care. “I’m sure Parking Fairy has drunk her fill by now and fallen asleep. Technically this is driving with an open container. I better give this back to Sid.”

His knees bumped the dash. “I’ll be here.”

Exiting the car, she hurried back into the Voodoo Hoodoo lounge, being cautious not to slosh sticky absinthe onto her hands. She set it on the counter. “Sid, my Fae’s had all she can handle. She’s probably snoozing in the glove compartment by now.”

Looking mischievous, Sid peered around the corner. “Where’s your Latin lover?”

“He’s not my lover.” She was quick to deny it, but felt a thrill when she said it. “Val’s waiting for me in the car.”

Taking hold of Estele’s wrist, Sid gave it a squeeze. “Be careful, Estele. I jinxed the mojitos hard. Before you arrived, I tried tempting tall, dark, and indifferent to meet me in the storeroom. When that didn’t work I even tried provoking him to fight with me. No go, he didn’t take the bait.” He appeared troubled. “Who says ‘no’ to Sidhe the Fae? See what I mean? The brujo’s not reacting normally.”

Her jaw dropped. “Sid! That’s so wrong. You promised the spell was mild.”

“Yours was. I’d be surprised if you felt anything at all. I cast an XX chromosome hex. It should only affect a male.”

“Why did you do that?”

A look of suspicion hardened Sid’s brow. “I couldn’t read him. I had to do something to bring his guard down. He’s an outsider up to something.”

She braced as a wave of confusion gripped her. “Wait. Are you saying you didn’t cast an attraction spell? I think there was quite a lot of mutual attraction going on between us.”

“I said that as a distraction. You were already feeling attracted to each other. It was so obvious. Why bother with more? I cast a candor spell. I wanted the brujo to open up and tell the truth.”

“Maybe that’s why the conversation was so odd. Val’s got some pretty strange ideas, but he seems okay. He’s a food alchemist. Can you believe it? That guy can really cook.”

Sid leaned close. “What are some of his strange ideas?”

“He asked to sleep at the foot of my bed, and he thinks there’s a vortex of evil brewing beneath the fairgrounds that’s preparing to attack us.”

Sid blanched. “There is! I felt it too. That’s why I was alarmed when a rogue brujo showed up today out of nowhere. I thought he might have something to do with it.”

Estele tapped her hand over her heart. “You felt it too? Why am I always the last to know? Sometimes I feel so incompetent as a witch.”

With urgency, Sid pressed a tiny vial into her hands. “Take this in case you need it. A brujo can be slippery as fucking mercury.”

She stared at the vial with trepidation. “What is it?”

“A tried and true Fae enchantment. It’s the undiluted version of what I snuck into the pitcher of mojitos. A drop passes his lips and he has to tell you the truth. But be careful, this one doesn’t have the XX exclusive factored into it. This potion could affect you too, so don’t consume it.”

“That doesn’t sound kosher.”

“Estele, you’re the one walking off into the night with a brujo you know nothing about. Don’t you think you owe it to yourself to find out what he’s up to?”

She slipped the vial in her purse, her guilty conscience already bugging her. “Okay, but I can’t promise I’ll use it. Are there side effects?”

“Aside from stream-of-consciousness honesty, it can make you sleepy.”

“It might be useful.” She pulled away. “I better go. Val will wonder what’s taking so long.”

With an abrupt move, Sid wrapped his arms around her and gave her a quick kiss on the cheek. “Estele, you’re a good person. You always mean well. You’re not incompetent, you’re just unpracticed.”

Her heart pounded. Kind words from Sidhe the Fae? This was a first. “Wow, Sid. Where did that come from? You never say anything nice to anyone.”

“That’s right, and if you tell anybody I did, I’ll deny it and put a hex on their drink. Now go. I suggest you slip big coyote a truth bomb ASAP and find out what he’s up to.”

She walked away, but turned. “You know, Sid, I could just ask Val what he’s up to. He might tell me.”

A hiss of disgust sputtered past Sid’s lips. “Why the Fae world should fall and the human realm rise is a total mystery to me.”

Estele returned to the car. Val tilted his head to see past the strands of beads and clutter she hung from the rearview mirror. He flashed one of his winning smiles.

Opening the driver door, she climbed behind the wheel. “What’s the grin for? A minute ago you looked so serious.”

“You’ve been gone for more than a minute. It gave me a little time to think. I’m not sure that I was clear earlier, but I want you to know I’m not disappointed you’re my ally. It occurred to me that I have might sounded that way. You’re a surprise. A dynamo of a witchlet.”

“Witchlet?” She slid the key in the ignition and started the car. “I hope you’re not equating me to Gidget, the girl midget of witches. That’s not PC. I’m a grown woman. Height is not a consideration in the enchantment community.” She put the VW in gear and reversed out of the parking lot.

“Which way are we going?”

“The fairgrounds are on the other side of the freeway next to the beach. There’s only one narrow road leading in that comes to a dead end. Not a lot of choices.”

“Um.” He looked thoughtful. “It sounds like it would be easy to trap large numbers of people.”

“That’s a cheerful statement.” Driving across the highway overpass, she steered the VW over the railroad tracks. “Most people take a bus or shuttle to the fair and avoid the traffic jam altogether.” They turned right on Seaside Lane and drove past several large beachfront hotels. The sun had set and a fat waxing moon was on the rise.

The sprawling parking lot of the fairgrounds was brightly lit and filled with big rigs circled like a wagon train around the midway. The loud hum and strong scent of diesel generators hung in the air. Teams of carnival personnel worked together with the precision of an insect hive to assemble the largest rides first.

She drove to the edge of the lot and parked. Getting out of the car, she looped her purse over her shoulder and strolled around the front of the car. “I love the county fair. The thought that something could go wrong is awful.”

Climbing out of the car, Val followed her. “That’s why we’re here. Let’s take a look around. Maybe we can prevent a tragedy.” He offered his hand. “If anyone asks what we’re doing here, we’re just a couple walking on the beach. Okay?”

“Who would believe I’d walk on the sand in these shoes?”

“Take them off. I’ll give you a piggyback ride.”

“You want us to goof around like we’re on a fun date? That’s going to feel weird after all the ‘ally’ stuff you told me.”

“It’s the least suspicious thing. Besides, we look like we belong together on a date.”

“We do?” That was buoying. Val was a cut above the type of guys she usually attracted. She clasped his hand. “Okay. Where do we start?”

Lifting the chain over his head, Val removed his necklace and allowed the tiny silver dagger to dangle. With a slow wobble, the blade spun counterclockwise and then pointed for a gravity-defying moment toward a group of men assembling a Ferris wheel. “The strongest reading seems to be coming from over there.”

She scanned the area. “Is the pendulum reacting to the workers or the bubble of malevolence?”

He clasped her hand and took long strides headed toward the heart of activity on the midway. “I don't know yet. Let's get closer and find out."

Her ankles trembled. "Slow down, Seabiscuit, you need to bring that gallop to a trot. I can't walk that fast."

Val halted until she caught up. "Sorry. I got carried away. There's a tang in the air. Do you feel it?"

She turned her face toward the sea. "No. All I feel is a salt breeze."

"Something's going on. There's ozone in the air. Lots of it. This is definitely the epicenter."

A low rumble like a whale call groaned beneath her feet. Pressure built in her ears until they ached to pop. A ripple passed through the ground and spread outwards. For a moment, it felt as if the solid asphalt of the parking lot had turned to pudding. "Wow! What was that? I definitely felt that!"

Lifting his chin, Val glanced around. "Dark forces are rising to the surface. This is what I've been talking about."

They approached the trucks and crewmen offloading and assembling the carnival rides. The teams of men looked preoccupied as they worked. The shrill whir of power tools was deafening.

"Hey!" Val shouted to a man seated on a forklift who appeared to be waiting for orders. "What's a typical setup? How long does it take to put a Tilt-A-Whirl together?"

The man stared straight ahead with a vacant face and unblinking eyes.

Val persisted. "Has it been a good season? Is fair attendance up?"

The man remained glassy-eyed and unresponsive. Only the tiniest tick of a pulse beneath his ear indicated he was a real flesh-and-blood human and not a carefully crafted wax mannequin.

Leaning closer to study the man's face, Val glanced at her. "What's wrong with him?"

Suddenly the man came to life. He blinked and his mouth opened. "Stand back!" The command was barked as he put the forklift in gear and drove behind a big rig.

"That was odd." Still clasping Estele's hand, Val walked toward a pair of workers kneeling on the ground assembling a steel barricade. The men worked in silent unity. The task appeared to be a simple assembly effort. One man placed a bolt while the other drove the bolt deep with a pneumatic drill. What was remarkable was the uncanny concentration and precision with which the work was accomplished. There were no wasted movements or conversation. No facial expressions. A machine-like rhythm built. The two men were almost breathing in unison, like synchronized swimmers.

Val knelt beside them. "You guys really know what you're doing. How long have you been on the carnival circuit?"

Neither man looked up. Even though they were a couple feet away, the men did not acknowledge them in any way. They continued their work uninterrupted. Place-bolt-drill. Place-bolt-drill....

Not giving up, Val kept at it. "Who owns this outfit?"

Nothing. The men ignored them, continuing to place-bolt-drill like automatons.

She felt a shiver of worry. "Maybe we're the problem?" she muttered. "They don't seem to be able to see or hear us. Do you think it's possible we slipped into another dimension or some other tricky state of being?”

Val shook his head. “Wow, that’s even crazier than something I would say. Even if we were ghosts whispering on the wind, would this behavior look normal to you?”

“No, but—”

“May I help you?” a stern female voice boomed from behind them.

Estele was so startled she jumped. “Uh!” Turning, she saw a middle-aged woman with her head swaddled in a pink turban paired with a flowing rainbow-hued tie-dyed caftan.

The woman stepped closer. What might have been a beautiful face looked harsh beneath caked makeup and the greenish glow of a carnival sign. “This is a restricted area. If you’re not part of my crew, under contract, and fully insured, I’ll have to ask you to leave.”

Feeling bold, she glanced at Val. “We’re part of your crew.” She squeezed his hand. “Isn’t that true, honey bear?”

The woman narrowed her Cleopatra-lined eyes. “We have a complete crew. I don’t remember seeing either of you dropping off applications at Luther’s office. Who are you?”

“Estele Esposito....” She stalled. “I’m your new psychic medium.”

The woman shook her head and frowned. “No, you’re not. You’re looking at this fair’s only psychic.” Her voice rose. “I’m Madame Shamansky, the all-seeing eye of destiny.”

Estele pushed ahead on a hunch. “Have you checked with Luther? This is a big county fair. There is definitely room for two mediums.”

Wearing a sour pout, Madame Shamansky picked a bit of crimson polish from her fingernail. “Well if Luther says it’s okay, then that’s how we’ll work it. Just for the record, I prefer you use your own tent. I don’t like sharing the stage. I have only two rules. First rule, don’t forget I’m this outfit’s star psychic—always have been, always will be. I am an awe-inspiring woman of mystery. On the midway, you don’t talk to me. We do not get friendly. Rule number two is don’t forget rule number one. Got it?” She pointed at Val. “You, on the other hand, can get as friendly as you like. Just don’t let Luther know about it.” She winked. “What do you do, handsome? Besides look like a toothpaste ad, that is.”

“I work a food truck. Tacos.”

“Rrrrw.” Madame Shamansky lifted her hand in a mock cat claw. “Sounds yummy. Love me a little Latin spice. I’ll be coming around for a taste. Count on it.” She leered. “Do you have a name to go with those broad shoulders?”

He looked bashful. “Valentine.”

“Be mine!” Madame squealed. “I’ll tell you what. I won’t mention to Luther that you two missed the afternoon crew orientation if you won’t mention to him that I’m a cougar on the prowl. Live and let live, right? Though I have to warn you, when provoked Luther can get somewhat homicidal. You don’t want his anger directed at you. Trust me on that. I watched him go off today on the roadies. Scared them stiff.”

Sensing an opening, Estele blurted, “What did Luther say to the roadies to make them feel threatened?”

Madame tilted her turbaned head. “Wouldn’t you like to know.” Crossing her arms, she glared at Estele. “So. You’re a psychic. Prove it. Go ahead. Give me a reading.”

She quailed. “On you?”

“No, the dinosaur in my pocket. Of course I meant me. Before I let you set up shop on the midway, I want to see what you can do.”

Estele glanced at Val and saw he appeared concerned. “Do you have somewhere we can sit? I do my best readings when I’m relaxed.”

Madame Shamansky shot a sly sideways look at Val. “Let’s go to my trailer. I want you to know where you can find me, day or night,” she emphasized. “It’s very comfortable. Plenty of room to stretch out.” With a swish of her caftan, she turned and led them across the asphalt, dodging over electrical cable and scurrying crewmen. “So, are you two an item?”

A long, uncomfortable pause followed.

“Yes,” Val asserted.

“No!” The contradiction flew out of Estele’s mouth at the same moment.

An amused cackle burst from Madame Shamansky. “Yes. No. Which is it?”

Looking at Val for a hint about what to say, she was surprised by the utter neutrality of his poker face. She whispered, “How could we be an item? We just met this evening.”

Madame Shamansky sauntered ahead. “Honey, have you ever heard the saying, ‘Those who hesitate, meditate on the foolish things they regurgitate’?”

Estele stubbed a toe stepping over a thick coil of cable. “What does that mean?”

Madame smirked. “It means you’re going to regret not staking a claim on this dreamboat when you had a chance. That’s my psychic prediction.”

Estele dug deep into her purse, searching for something, anything, she might use as a magical tool to impress Madame Shamansky. Her natural psychic abilities were sharp, but she doubted Madame would enjoy hearing anything truthful she might have to say. She needed a prop or gimmick to work with. Her hand brushed the Heart of Hecate, causing a full-body tingle. At the same moment, her gaze focused on Val. He looked steady and strong. For once she was so grateful to not be facing a challenge alone, as had happened too often in her life. With her fingertips brushing the ruby, it became crystal clear that she was ready for a dependable life partner. Someone she could respect and trust.

Wow, that was unexpected.

Val leaned close as they walked and whispered in her ear, “How are you going to pull this off?”

She turned to glimpse the sparkle in his eyes. “I’ll improvise.”

Val gave her hand a light squeeze. “You’re doing so well.”

“You really think so?”

Madame Shamansky shouted over her shoulder. “I hear whispering. I hope I’m not missing something naughty.”

Pawing the contents of her bag, Estele groped around. “Nope. I’m just keying in for your reading.” There was no way she’d risk taking the ruby from her purse. Her fingers came to rest on an open pack of gum and the vial Sid had given to her.

A moment of conflict tangled her thoughts. It was totally underhanded and unfair to use Fae enchantment to get the truth out of someone. Then again, this was a serious situation. The safety of San Buena was at stake. Was using Sid’s potion any worse than the times she’d done something similar with a botched hex? Not really. After all, there was a bubble of malevolence rumbling below her feet. If Madame Shamansky was an innocent person, telling the truth wouldn’t hurt her. On the other hand, if she were actively involved in an evil scheme, it would be good to know.

With caution Estele twisted the vial open and allowed a few drops to trickle onto the open pack of gum before capping the vial.

“We’re here.” Madame came to a halt in front of a large trailer with a pair of flirty eyes painted on the side along with purple script lettering that read “The All-Seeing Eye of Destiny.” She turned to confront Estele. “What’s your tagline? We’ll need to make you a sign.”

Sucking in a deep breath, she spoke the first words that came to mind. “Um... ‘Estele—Seer of the Akash.’”

Madame pursed her lips as she opened the trailer door. “‘Seer of the Akash.’ Not bad.” A wave of patchouli incense floated from the trailer. “That will work. Come inside.”

Val hesitated. “Should I wait out here?”

Grabbing Val’s wrist, Madame dragged him toward the steps. “You most definitely need to go inside. Get in there and wait for me on the bed.”

Dutifully, Val stepped into the trailer, stooping to avoid smacking his head.

Estele lingered at the door. Drawing the pack of gum from her purse, she held it up for Madame Shamansky to see. “Madame.” She wrinkled her nose. “What did you have for dinner?”

With a dramatic gesture, Madame Shamansky tipped her face skyward. “Tuna salad on an onion Kaiser roll.”

With a dip of her chin, she offered the gum. “That’s what I thought. You might want to freshen up.”

Reaching for the gum, Madame mouthed the words, “Thank you.” The stick of gum was stripped of its wrapper and chomped between her teeth. She chewed with the same grinding jaw movements as a horse. “Go in.”

Estele climbed the steps with Madame close behind, Shutting the door after she entered.

“I know it’s warm, but I’d like a little privacy.” Madame Shamansky fanned herself. “There’s always some nosy clown hanging around.”

Scanning the trailer, Estele was impressed that it appeared much more spacious on the inside. The compact interior, plain utilitarian kitchenette, and tiny bathroom were decorated in vivid colors and rich textures that lent the space a bohemian vibe.

Val perched on the edge of a foldaway bed draped in purple veils.

“Welcome to Xanadu on wheels.” Madame gnawed on the gum. “This is great gum. Can I have another piece?”

Estele felt a jolt of worry about Fae dosages. “Um... uh, sure.” She pulled the pack from her purse. “Here.”

Madame took another piece.

Val opened his hand. “I’d like one too.”

She recoiled. “No. You wouldn’t like it.”

He nodded. “I’m sure I would.”

Shaking her head, she sat on the bed. “You don’t want this. It’s girly gum.”

“Girly gum?” He thrust his hand out. “Now I insist on trying it.”

“Val, that’s not a good idea.” She shot him a warning stare, but he didn’t take the hint. “I was saving this gum.”

He took the pack from her hand. “I’ll get you more later.” Shucking the wrapper, he folded the stick of gum between his teeth and chewed. “Oh, it is good.”

Biting her lip, she watched in horror as Val chomped the candor-spell-infused gum, adding to the dose of Fae enchantment he’d already imbibed with the mojito.

Madame Shamansky munched away with a dreamy expression on her face. “You know what this gum reminds me of? Those flat boxes of tart candies they used to sell in movie theaters. God, I loved going to the movies when I was a little girl. Back then my dream was to be an actress. Everyone said I was pretty enough. A talent scout told me I looked like a young Ava Gardner. That was back when people knew who Ava Gardner was. I tried acting. Even came close to getting the lead on a few big auditions. The few jobs I got were mostly movie-of-the-week crap, but every now and then I got handed a plum script. I played meaty character parts like ‘woman dies dramatically in elevator’ or ‘bystander crushed during panicked stampede.’ The last job I got was in The Poseidon Adventure 2. Not the original with the Shelly Winters swim scene, the other one. Then I met the late Mr. Shamansky and married a carny twice my age. What the fuck was I think—”

The candor spell had kicked in big-time. Estele interrupted. “Are you ready for your psychic reading?”

“No.” Madame was busy chewing. “Who cares about a psychic reading anyway? I already know what’s going to happen to me, and it’s not pleasant. By the way, my real name is Marge. All of a sudden I feel like I just need to talk, air my thoughts. You don’t mind listening, do you?”

Val leaned in. “I feel like I need to talk too. I’m hungry. We skipped dinner, didn’t we? You know what? I think the incense is too strong and it’s giving me a headache.”

She gently hushed him with a gentle nudge. “Let me finish with Marge. Then we can leave and get something to eat.”

Looking as innocent as a five-year-old, Val said, “I think Marge is a nice woman. She’s a little sad. I feel bad for her.”

Afraid Val would spill the beans, she patted his hand reassuringly. “Val, please let me do all the talking, okay?”

Marge went misty-eyed. “Thank you, Valentine, for being so sweet. I get zero sympathy around here. Especially from those damn clowns! Those nasty bastards. Everyone thinks running a professional carnival is so easy. It’s not! My God, the horrible things I’ve had to endure. I’ve practically sold my soul to Luther.” She clamped her hand over her mouth. “Holy shit, what am I saying. I can’t talk about Luther! It’s not allowed. Why did I even mention him?”

Val smiled at Estele. “The first moment I saw you, walking toward the taco truck, I thought, ‘She’s probably a flake and she’s trying too hard to look like somebody else.’ Then I realized I was looking at my tattoo come to life. I got so excited. It felt like it took forever for you to reach the front of the line. I think the retro thing really works for you. You’re adorable. You know what else I like about—”

Turning toward Val, she pantomimed zipping her lips. “Shush, please.”

The ground rumbled. The trailer shook. A low moan floated past the window.

Marge looked startled. “Was that an earthquake? It seems like we’ve been having a lot of earthquakes all day. Am I the only one noticing them?”

Grabbing Val’s hand, Estele stood. “I think we should leave.”

Bam, bam, bam! A fist pounded on the trailer’s tiny door.

“Who is it?” Marge leaped to her feet.

“It’s me, Sparky,” a gravel voice sounded from outside.

Marge cautiously drew the door open.

A clown with a red nose, blue wig, and a yellow polka-dot jumpsuit stood on the steps. He peered inside the trailer with a mean glare at odds with the happy smile painted around his lips. “The boss wants to talk to you in his office.”

Marge bristled. “Excuse me? Technically, I’m still the boss. Tell Luther I’ll be there in a minute.”

Sparky’s gaze swept over Estele. He looked annoyed. “Luther said now.” He turned and headed into the shadows.

Estele grabbed hold of Val’s wrist and made a move toward the door. “You have important things to do. We’ll be on our way.”

Marge’s face drooped with disappointment. “You’re leaving? Don’t go. I was enjoying the company.”

Val dug his heels in. “I want to stay and visit with Marge. Look at her, she needs someone to talk to.”

“But we have errands to do. Remember?” She coaxed Val out of the trailer. “It was lovely meeting you, Marge. We’ll talk again soon.”

Marge pouted. “If you’re serious about the job, you’ll show up bright and early tomorrow morning.”

Estele was careful not to commit.

Marge waved them out. “You’d better go. Luther has the patience of a two-year-old. I have to lock the trailer. I remember a time when I didn’t have to.” After securing the door, she hurried away.

Estele and Val stepped into the warm evening air, stirred by a faint breeze. Beneath blinding bright lights, workmen buzzed around the fairgrounds with forklifts and power tools, bringing the midway to life.

Marge walked toward a hulking black trailer with red flames painted on the sides. Climbing the steps, she knocked. The trailer door opened. A weird vibe rolled through the air like a silent shockwave. It was dark inside the trailer, and impossible to see more than a silhouette of a large man, as broad as a bull, blocking the doorway. Marge entered and the door shut.

Estele pulled Val behind Madame Shamansky’s trailer and peered across the midway. “I couldn’t see very well, but did that guy look human to you? He’s built like an Orc. I didn’t even see a neck on him.”

Val’s nostrils flared. “Something about Luther is off.” His gaze focused on Estele. “I’d sure like to unzip your dress. You look soft.”

“Val, the less you say right now the better off you’ll be. I have a confession. The gum was sprinkled with—”

Sparky approached them and stood with his hands on his hips, frowning in a clownishly exaggerated expression of outrage.

Estele acknowledged him. “What do you want?”

The clown stomped his huge red shoe on the ground, making a loud slap, while holding up two fingers. He stood frozen, in silence, glaring at them.

“I don’t understand what you’re trying to tell us.” She took a guess what the two fingers meant. “Go in peace?”

In a burst of agitation, Sparky fluttered his arms in the air, stomped his foot, and again held up two fingers.

“I get it!” Val jumped in. “He wants to play charades. First word has two parts?”

Sparky bobbed his head idiotically in agreement.

“All right!” Val cheered. “Two words—go!”

Holding up one finger, Sparky continued.

“First word!” Val shouted.

Sneering while making obscene motions with his hips, Sparky pantomimed a classic dirty dog maneuver of humping an invisible partner.

“Eww.” Estele looked away. “I don’t want to see that. Now I need eye bleach.”

“Copulate!” Val blurted.

The clown scowled. His hip-pounding motions grew more vulgar.

“Screw?” Val sounded uncertain. “Naughty monkey mambo? Fuck! It’s fuck, isn’t it?”

Sparky nodded like a fool. He held up two fingers.

“Second word?” Val blurted.

The clown pressed his flattened palms together and allowed one to slide past the other and drop.

“Fall?” Val imitated the motions. “Slip?”

The motion was repeated, but this time Sparky allowed the top hand to slide across before lifting into the air.

“Fly? Float? Take off?” Val got very animated.

Sparky pointed in approval.

“I get it.” Val clapped. “The words are fuck off!”

More wild head bobbing from Sparky, followed by two more raised fingers. He stomped behind a stack of pallets and returned holding a cream pie. Menace burned in his eyes.

“Run!” Estele squealed. “The bastard’s going to throw a pie at us!”

Sparky held up a palm as an indication to halt. He then calmly set the pie on the ground, squatted low, and allowed himself to plop onto it with a loud squish. Cream oozed out of the plate and onto his baggy pants.

She was perplexed. “What the hell does that mean? Is he threatening to squash us with his ass?”

“No! I think he’s showing us that he killed the pie.”

Sparky’s face lit with joy as he pointed enthusiastically and made a spinning motion with his fingers.

Val squinted. “Rhymes with pie?”

More clownish head bobbing from Sparky.

“Okay, I get it now.” Val rubbed his hands together. “The message is fuck off and die. Or fuck off and die—you’re going to be squashed like pies?” He shook his head. “Maybe he just doesn’t want us to come back to the fairgrounds?”

Sparky pinched his red nose and made it beep, beep in the affirmative.

“Aha. I was right.” She searched her purse for the hexed gum. “Under threat of death, the psychotic clown doesn’t want us coming back. I see nothing ominous or suspicious about this message, do you?” She offered Sparky a piece of gum. “Live a little, Bozo. Thanks for the heads-up.”

Accepting the stick of gum, Sparky turned and duck waddled into the shadows.

“That was weird.” She stared. “Do you think Luther sent him to scare us?”

Val shuddered. “Clowns creep me out. When I was a kid, I used to hide from them at birthday parties. Why am I telling you this?”

“Maybe we’ve done enough recon for tonight. Val, I need to tell you something.” Taking his hand, she led him toward the car. “Let’s leave before you start telling people the truth.”

He walked at her side. “Why would I do that?”

“I did something foolish.” Steering him past a crew of workmen who ignored them, she hustled him across the midway. “On my way out of the Voodoo Hoodoo lounge, Sid slipped me a vial of candor spell. I sprinkled a few drops on the pack of gum. That's why Marge opened up and started talking like she's my new best friend. You consumed some of the enchantment too. I'm so sorry. I tried to warn you."

He looked hurt. "I came to San Buena as an ally to you. I want to protect you, so you can do your job. Why would you feel the need to hex me? Have I presented myself as dishonest or untrustworthy?"

Now she felt terrible. "No. But you're a stranger, and strange things have been happening. In my book, being a brujo earns you double points for suspicious motives."

"Really?" His brows dipped. "Until today, I had no idea brujos had such a negative image. We need better PR, maybe a public service announcement? How long will the candor spell last?"

"I have no idea. It's likely to last a few hours."

His gaze fixed on her. "Then you should take advantage of it."

Arriving at the car, she unlocked the passenger door. "What do you mean?"

"Test me. Ask me questions while I'm under the influence. I'm not afraid of an honest answer."

"Val, I didn't intend for you to fall victim. You seem like an okay guy. I was hoping the all-seeing eye of destiny might have something helpful to say about matters at the fairgrounds. I definitely felt the wicked vibe. There are some seriously odd things going on here. The roadies are acting like zombies. Not one of them has even turned to look at us. And what's with that Luther character? I get the feeling he's the one we need to know more about."

Standing close, Val touched her arm. "Estele, I'd like to know more about you. Would you be angry if I kissed you?"

She leaned breathless against the car. "That's not a good idea."

He brushed his fingertips against her cheek. "Why? It seems like a good idea to me."

"Because there's a great big shadowy figure stomping toward us and I think it's Luther."

Chapter 5

A tingle of electricity crackled in the air. One by one the generators ground to a halt. The lights in the parking lot dimmed. All machinery stopped. The fairgrounds went dark and silent. Work stopped. The rumble of heavy footsteps like those of a stone giant shook the ground.

A shiver of primal fear rippled down Val's spine. "Get behind me." With a firm shove he put himself between Estele and the unknown. Staring into the shadows, he fought a sense of rising panic. "Where is it? I can hear it but I can't see it."

Estele clung to his back, quaking. Her warm presence would have been a treat were it not for the feeling of dread.

"With the lights out," she whispered, "I don't see it anymore. A minute ago, I thought I saw movement near the trailers. It was a massive shapeless hulk."

His furtive glances delivered no useful information. He was here to protect Estele and he was not doing a good job. The ground beneath his feet trembled as if heavy equipment was moving earth. "The moon's up and we're standing in an open parking lot. If it's as big as it sounds, why can't we see it?"

Estele pointed over his shoulder. "Something's lurking in the shadows behind the trailers. I think it's avoiding the moonlight."

Boom, boom boom....

The asphalt beneath their feet flexed.

Attempting to sound calm, he mumbled, "Do you have the car keys in your hand?"

"Yes." Estele's voice cracked.

Stealthily opening the passenger door, he climbed in. "Get in the car and start the engine—now."

Taking mincing steps as quick as her high heels and tight dress would allow, Estele scurried to the driver side. She unlocked the door and leaped in. Staring out the windshield with eyes wide, she gasped. "Whatever that thing is, it's headed straight toward us. I keep thinking I can see something, but it doesn't quite take shape."

Waaaahhhh! A screeching howl like a desert wind roared toward them. The loose suspension on the VW made the car sway.

She turned the engine over.

In front of them, a mass of black smoke congealed in the air, taking the shape of a charging beast with two horns atop its head. The uncanny creature pawed the asphalt then thundered toward them, making the ground shake.

“Go, go, go!” he shouted.

“Holy crap! What is that thing?” Estele hit the gas and cranked the steering wheel. With an explosive backfire, the car sputtered in a half circle. The smoke beast overtook them, slamming into the VW with a loud growl and a burst of noxious-smelling sulfur. The cab of the car was engulfed by a murky haze that left them coughing. A second later the black smoke vanished, leaving a foul rotten egg scent behind.

“Good Goddess!” Estele wheezed. “Roll down the windows. Whatever that was, it’s worse than a fart from Hell.”

Gagging on the nasty fumes, Val opened the window and fanned the smell away. “If there was any doubt before about the presence of evil at this location, it’s gone now. We know with certainty that dark forces are at work here.”

Her hands trembled on the wheel. She made a few erratic zigzags as she drove across the parking lot toward the exit. “What a stench! I’m going to have to wash my hair and burn this dress.”

“I’ll help you do both.” He said it too eagerly. The thought of stepping into a warm shower with Estele to massage fragrant suds through her hair sounded amazing. The task would be performed with intense devotion and dragged out as long as possible. It had been so long since he’d touched anyone tenderly. Alchemical training and preparations for first flight—or, more accurately, first flight with an ally—had demanded all his energy and time. Now here she was, his new ally, cute, curvy Estele, the Wiccan star.

She looked annoyed as she steered onto Seaside Lane. “Why are you looking at me like that? We just escaped a stampeding Hell beast and you look like you’re having horny thoughts.”

He glanced away but it did nothing to stop his X-rated thoughts about Estele. “I’m sorry. I can’t help it. It’s been ages since I’ve been around a woman I found so attractive and even longer since I got—” The VW backfired like a shotgun as they crossed the freeway overpass and thankfully drowned out his confession.

“It’s okay.” Her tone softened. “I’m not angry, I’m just surprised. That thing at the fairgrounds got me spooked. Did you feel how much power it summoned? How are we going to fight something like that?”

Had his training prepared him for anything of this magnitude? No. He was better prepared to be a sous-chef than to attempt to do the work of a saint driving menace from the land. He hung his head with a sigh.

“Please tell me that sigh of defeat is not your answer?” she chirped. “You dragged me into this. I can’t just forget what I saw. We need a plan. What are we going to do?”

Turning toward the main business district, they approached a small store with a neon sign that read “Liquor King.” Its flashing gold crown shone like a beacon.

Estele pulled over and stopped. “Oh I forgot. I have to buy rum.”

Still shaken, he looked over his shoulder to assure himself a smoke beast wasn’t sneaking up behind them. “Now? Could it possibly wait?”

“I can’t go home without it.” Looking annoyed, she dug through her purse, retrieved her phone, and clicked the screen. “While we’re here, I’m calling my friend Fredi. She’s got crazy-brilliant Wiccan skills and she’ll know what to do.” She paused. “Hi, Fredi! I’ve got you on speaker.”

“Estele?” Fredi sounded cagey. “Is everything okay? Why am I on speaker?”

She leaned back in the driver seat. “I’m sitting outside Liquor King and I have a brujo in the car with me—”

Fredi gasped. “A brujo? Seriously? Are you all right? This isn’t a kidnap situation, is it?”

With cherry-red lips pursed, Estele shot Val a sideways glance. “No, nothing like that, but we are facing some challenging issues.”

The long pause before Fredi spoke betrayed her wariness. “What sort of issues?”

“The brujo is under the influence of a candor enchantment.”

“Estele, did you cast the spell?” Fredi’s disapproval was clear.

“No!” Estele waved a dismissive hand through the air. “Cross my heart. This is one of Sid’s concoctions. I gotta say it was subtle and came on fast. He had no idea what hit him. Sid’s craftsmanship is faultless. Hats off to the Fae.”

“So, what’s the problem?”

She rolled her eyes. “My new friend sort of blurted that he was here to suppress evil and I’m his magical ally or something like that and there’s a bubble of malevolence welling under the fairgrounds coming to kill us all.”

“Whoa! Slow down.” Fredi’s voice rose. “Bubble of malevolence? What does that even mean?”

“It was freaky!” Estele squeaked. “I experienced it firsthand. This dark force literally made the earth shake, then took the shape of a devil bull and overwhelmed my car’s interior with a gagatrocious fart smell.”

“Your night sounds rather challenging,” Fredi drawled. “I don’t even know where to start.”

“Suffering Circe! Fredi, you don’t believe me, do you?”

“Estele, I believe some of it. You mentioned some weird stuff. The hellacious fart smell? I’m hoping it’s a case of embarrassing misunderstanding and not that Hades has busted its front gate and accidentally released its wickedest inmates.”

Val shrugged. “It wasn’t me. I’m under a candor spell. If I did it I’d have to say so.”

“Ooh, who’s Mr. Velvet Voice?” Fredi’s tone instantly softened.

“That’s the brujo!” Estele grew more excited as she spoke. “Fredi, meet Valentine Del Toro. He’s an abracadabra with a saber.”

“Alquimista de sabor,” Val gently corrected Estele. “An alchemist of flavor.”

“A food wizard?” Fredi almost shrieked. “Oh my Goddess, I’ve always wanted to meet one of you guys! This is so exciting. Where did you do your apprenticeship?"

At least Fredi seemed impressed with him. Too bad Estele didn't feel the same way. "The highlands of Oaxaca," he said softly.

Fredi squealed with delight. "My grandparents are from Oaxaca! The food is good, isn't it? Do you know how to make the seven molés sauces?"

He mustered his most dignified tone. "Yes, I do."

"I can't wait to tell Gus. I've turned him into a molé addict."

Estele spoke loudly. "Fredi, I'm going to interrupt to ask you directly, can you help me break Sidhe's candor enchantment or not?"

Fredi paused. "It depends how the enchantment was cast."

"Val got a double dose. The first was slipped into a Cuban mojito and the second was a concentrate from a vial that I dripped onto some wintergreen gum."

"Both were minty products?" Fredi sounded all business.

"Yes," Estele said.

"Well then you're going have to use mint to counteract the spell. Treat like with like."

Estele's brows met. "Fredi, don't force me to figure it out. I might screw it up. Just tell me exactly what to do and I'll do it."

Fredi spoke slowly and clearly. "You're already at Liquor King, right? Pick up a bottle of peppermint schnapps, or a box of chocolate peppermint patties, and cast a hex-vex-redirect on it. Just don't overdo it."

Clapping her hands, Estele cheered. "Fredi, you're a genius!"

"Thank you, I do my best. There's something else you said that was odd."

"Gosh." Estele fussed with the strap on her shoe. "I say a lot of odd things. Which one are you referring to?"

"You said the dark force took the shape of a bull and overwhelmed your car?"

Estele drew her purse protectively under her arm "Yeah, I did."

"Well doesn't 'Del Toro' mean bull?"

"Oh, you're right." Estele wrinkled her nose. "Wow, Fredi, I just got the chills."

"That means the dark force or whatever it was you encountered at the fairgrounds knows Val's name. It might have been a taunt."

Estele glanced at Val. "Fredi's right. How do you explain that?"

The knowledge that he was way out of his depth sank in and struck his confidence hard. "I can't."

Slipping the key out of the ignition, Estele dropped the key ring into her purse. "Thanks, Fredi. I'm going to sign off and go inside the store."

"I hope what I had to say will be useful. Call me tomorrow if you need me. Good night." Fredi hung up.

Estele dropped her phone into her purse. "See what I mean about Fredi being smart? She's sort of my guiding light. I want to be just like her when I grow up.”

Val looked at her liquid eyes and delicate face. “Estele, you are a grown woman.”

“I meant when my magic matures. I’d like to be more helpful and less dreadful to the general public.”

He thought about her statement. She didn’t look like public enemy number one. Why would she refer to herself that way? What had the poor girl done to cause such a lack of self-confidence? “It will come with time.”

Her stomach growled. “Oops.” She patted her belly. “It sounds like an angry raccoon.”

Val laughed. “I’m hungry too. I see a market across the street. Why don’t I get some groceries and make us dinner?”

She blinked. “You’d cook for me? Wow, okay. This is sort of a first.”

Leaning into the back seat, he grabbed the duffel bag and unzipped it.

“What are you doing?” she asked.

He reached into the bag, dug deep, and pulled out a gray-green bundle of twigs lashed together with white thread.

She stared in confusion. “Please tell me that’s not dinner.”

“It’s not.” He lifted the bundle to eye level. “It’s a sage wand. We’ve had a brush with dark forces. Before we go near others, I’m going to cleanse us. The smoke will release any lingering evil residues and neutralize the brimstone odor.”

“I’m all for that.” She depressed the car’s lighter, waited for it to heat, and handed it to Val. “Light up. My grandmother burned sage too. Every time she and my mother had a fight, she’d smudge the house. A lot of sage got burned. I think she bundled dried lavender into the mix too.”

Val held the red-hot lighter to the dry sage and blew on it. The embers lit immediately and glowed orange at the tip. He mumbled a few sacred words while fanning a cloud of fragrant white smoke in her face.

Coughing, Estele drew back. “Boy, that wad of twigs puts out heaps of smoke.”

“It’s balancing.” He waved the smoldering wand over her head and around her shoulders. “I gathered and dried the leaves myself.” He puffed on the sage. Copious amounts of smoke billowed into the air. The interior of the VW filled with an opaque haze.

Glancing over Estele’s shoulder, he saw someone walking toward them. Seen only in silhouette, a large man approached the car and rapped his knuckles on the window.

Estele rolled the window down and gasped a breath of fresh air. “Hello, Officer.”

The police officer was a young, clean-cut man. His nostrils flared as he leaned closer. “What are you smoking?”

She answered with confidence. “Officer, we’re not smoking. We’re smudging away the evil that stunk us up at the fairgrounds.”

“Seriously?” The officer wrinkled his nose as he tugged on a pair of disposable gloves. “May I see what you're 'not' smoking?"

Val handed the officer the sage wand.

The officer sniffed it. "Whatever. It smells harmless, but you are parked in front of a public no-smoking zone. Would you please extinguish the 'smudge' and move on? The owner of the liquor store has already received a complaint." He returned the wand to Val.

Estele smiled at the policeman. "Thank you." The moment the officer walked away, she rolled up the window and turned toward Val. "If you're going to make us dinner, why don't we go straight to the market? I can buy peppermint patties there, or Thin Mints." A dreamy expression washed over her. "Or chocolate mint ice cream. Honestly, I could have ice cream for dinner and be totally okay with it."

"Don't you need to buy rum?"

"Damn. I almost forgot about the captain. He's probably rooting through my underwear drawer right now."

"What?" He had no idea what she was talking about and was beginning to question the whole ally-prophecy thing in general. "Who's the captain?"

"Never mind." She reinserted the key into the ignition and turned the engine over. It chirped. Estele put the car in reverse and did a haphazard three-point turn out of the parking lot. Stomping on the gas, she drove over a row of cement berms, then crossed a double yellow line, interrupting two fast-moving lanes of traffic as they poured off the freeway.

His mouth gaped in a silent scream. The headlights of oncoming cars swerving to avoid a collision left him paralyzed. Car horns blared their disapproval. He sank lower in the seat. "You just did a highly illegal maneuver in front of a cop! What were you thinking?"

She pulled into the market's parking lot and checked the rearview mirror. "The policeman's gone. I don't see him. Why is everybody honking?"

With eyes closed, he willed himself to not yell in her face, "What the hell is wrong with you?" Since he was a boy, he'd always been the serious student and champion of order and tradition in a chaotic world. Why had fate paired him with Estele? Yes, she was super cute, but she was also a disaster ready to implode. Could this be a test?

Opening the car door, he stood slowly on stiff legs. He was far too big for her damn car.

Estele got out of the VW and strolled toward the market's automatic doors.

He followed. A burst of cool air greeted them.

Once inside the store, she looked around. "This isn't my regular market, but I'm pretty sure they have a liquor department." Glancing at him, she paused. "Do you need a basket?"

There was a row of carts jammed together. Taking hold of one, he fought to break it loose from the pack.

"Are you going to shop shop?" Her brow rose. "Should I just go and get what I need?"

Struggling to compose himself and his conflicted feelings, he shook his head. "We better stick together.”

“Okay, caballero.” She shrugged. “But it would be a lot faster to do our errands separately.”

He pushed the cart down the first aisle. “More dangerous too.”

Her hand brushed the cart. “How so?”

Before he spoke, he took a look around to make no one was within earshot. “My best guess is we’re only half a mile from the fairgrounds.” He pointed to the floor. “The bubble of malevolence is practically under our feet. Just because we don’t see anything out of the ordinary doesn’t mean it’s not there and we’re safe.”

She hunted through her purse, looking for something. “What are you expecting to happen?”

Good question. What did he expect? “I don’t know.”

“Let’s start with an easier question.” She steered the cart into another aisle. “What are you making for dinner?”

“What sort of kitchen do you have?”

Estele picked up a box of kids’ cereal and read the label. “Oh it’s a gorgeous kitchen. Steel appliances and black granite countertops. There’s a nice view of the ocean as well.”

“I meant what sort of equipment have you got?”

“A coffeemaker, a cookie sheet, forks, spoons, a couple steak knives, bowls, and a large saucepan.”

“That’s it?”

“Oops, I forgot the blender. That’s all I need. I don’t really cook.”

He was scandalized. He had no idea what to prepare and decided he’d better keep it simple. “What do you want?”

“After being chased by a smoke demon, comfort food sounds good.”

She eyed all the junky kids’ treats in the aisle, and for some reason it made him grin. “What’s your idea of comfort food? Please don’t say Froot Loops.”

“My grandmother used to make me a big bowl of pozole after school. I loved it.”

Estele looked so wistful as she said it, his heart opened to her just a bit more. He loved his grandmother too. She was an excellent cook and his inspiration for his current career as an alquimista de sabor. “You love your grandmother, don’t you?”

“I did. I do.” Her chin dipped. “My abuela Lena raised me. She passed away almost three years ago and I’ve sort of been drifting since.” She huffed a deep breath. “Not that I wasn’t drifting before.”

“Things could get better.”

“Yeah, right. I’m psychic, you know. I can clearly see what’s right or wrong for others and if their relationships are going to pan out or not. It never fails, except where my own life is concerned. I have zero inner guidance. It’s like I’m living inside one big blind spot.”

Estele brushed her fingertips across the tattoos that covered one arm. “After my grandmother passed, the grief was bad. She was like my mother, roommate, and best friend rolled into one. All of a sudden I was on my own. I wanted her with me, always, so I got her story tattooed on my arm.” She pointed. “See those dates hidden inside the heart? Each of those is important. All the magical symbols stand for the sort of beneficent magic she practiced. Lena always thought Betty Paige was so pretty, so I even started wearing my hair like Betty. After a lot of pain and effort, the memorial sleeve was finished. Only then I remembered that my abuela hated tattoos.” She threw her hands into the air. “See what I mean? I’m hopeless.”

“But you did it from your heart, right?”

“Yes.”

“Then you’re definitely not wrong or hopeless. It’s just how you do things.” He paused. “By the way, I’m making pozole for dinner.”

A sun-bright smile burst across her face. “Thank you. I’d love that.”

Impulsively, he rolled up his sleeve and displayed his pinup girl. “As you can see, I’m proud of my ink. No judgment from me.”

Estele studied the portrait of his “ally.” “Excellent work. The artist is so talented.” She leaned closer. “What do the initials E.E.E. stand for?”

“Initials?” Val looked down to see what she was talking about. Shocked, he saw the script letters E.E.E. clearly displayed across his pinup girl’s snug blouse. He’d spent countless hours gazing at the damn tattoo and had never seen them. “What the—” He stared, then licked his finger and tried to rub the letters away. They didn’t smear. “Those weren’t there this morning. I’ll be damned. What’s going on?”

“Oh well.” Estele rolled her eyes. “E.E.E. is not so bad. I can think of worse initials to have tattooed on my skin. Just to put it in perspective, it could have been P.U.”

He turned the cart down a so-called international foods aisle stocked with ramen noodles and soy sauce. “I’m looking for hominy.”

She pointed to a bottom shelf. “They sell it in sixty-four-ounce cans.”

The monster-sized can was loaded into the cart. “Too bad we’re not cooking for a school cafeteria. I wonder if they sell aluminum soup pots here.”

“I’m sure they do in the baking supply aisle.”

Squatting, he took hold of the can and hefted it into the cart. “Where’s the spice aisle?”

With eyes bulged, she looked blank. “I have no idea.”

Estele wasn’t even trying to be logical or helpful. She tested his patience, so he decided to test her. “Are you sure? Think about it. Use your skills.”

A more serious expression crossed her face. She closed her eyes and appeared to tune in to her thoughts. “Aisle four. They have soup pots too. I saw them in my mind’s eye.”

“Good work.” A sense of relief washed over him. Maybe there was a way to tap into Estele’s latent talents. “You answered too quickly the first time. Slow down and check in with yourself.”

An uneasy laugh burst free of her. “Yeah, right. People are going to wait for me to come to a decision? I don't think so."

"Why not? Especially if you're right." He turned down aisle four. "Look." He pointed to a display of cookware. "Soup pots and spices. Proof you know what you're doing."

"Cool." She appeared unsettled by her success, and he couldn't figure out why.

He selected the largest lidded pot and headed toward the spices. Colorful bags of dried chilies, ground cumin, and oregano were tossed into the cart. It was safe to assume she didn't have anything on hand, so he added a few staples. Pushing the cart further down the aisle, he stopped to pick up several cartons of chicken stock. "I prefer to make it from scratch, but what the hell. This is a comfort food emergency. I need carrots and onions too."

Estele pointed over her shoulder. "That way."

"Psychic guess?"

"No. I saw stacks of produce."

He steered the basket toward pyramids of cantaloupes and limes and added some fresh fruit to the cart. Onions, carrots, fresh garlic, and cilantro were selected next.

She grinned. "Looks so homey, like real grocery shopping should. My basket never looks like that."

"I need a few more things. What about breakfast?"

Surprise registered on her face. "What about it?"

"We'll be hungry in the morning, and I have a feeling tomorrow is going to be a tough day. Another trip to the fairgrounds. More recon. I should get some eggs."

"Eggs? I usually just have coffee, which I have plenty of." She glanced up at him. "You're really spending the night at my house?"

"Yes. For your protection."

She scanned the contents of the cart. "Gosh, we're buying a lot of stuff. If you're going to make pozole, don't forget the carnitas. We should swing by the butcher case."

"Point the way."

Standing at the front of the cart, she pulled it toward the back of the store like a tugboat guiding a cargo ship safely into harbor. "Ah, the liquor aisle. I'll get some rum."

He reached for a quality brand. "Dark, white, spiced rum?"

"I don't think it matters." She shrugged. "It's not for drinking. The captain's only going to sniff it."

Sniff it? What the hell was that about? "Okay. You choose."

She selected a pint bottle and added it to the rest of their groceries. "Let's get the dark."

He was unclear on who this person was and it occurred to him that it might turn into a security problem. "Who is the captain?"

"My roommate."

"Trustworthy?"

"Not a bit. I can't turn my back on my things for a minute, but he is sort of sweet."

The captain's presence, whoever he was, was an added complication in an already tricky situation. Why had he not considered this obstacle sooner? "How will the captain react to you bringing me home?"

"He'll be shocked of course. The captain's old-school."

He smelled the unmistakable ammonia-tinged scent of seafood long before he saw it. At this time of night in a neighborhood market, the selections were picked over. Several whole sea bass lay across the shaved ice, their glassy eyes staring into space. The butcher's case had empty spots. A whole pig's head sat on a tray with its snout open as if it were grinning.

"No, no, no." Estele wagged her finger in front of the head. "We are not taking the piggy-head home with us. It would give me nightmares."

"Don't worry. I'll get some ground pork." He rang the service bell and waited. No one came. "Maybe they're closed?"

"Here's some ground pork." She reached into a refrigerated case. "This will work."

"It's better fresh." He leaned over the counter. "Hello, is anyone there?"

In the back room, the lights flickered and went black.

She looked around. "Are we the only people in the store? We are. There's no one at the checkout stand. This place is deserted. That's weird."

A scuttling sound in the back room grabbed his attention. "What's that?"

"I don't know." She sounded scared. "I can't see anything back there. Sounds like a giant rat flopping around on the floor."

"It's not a rat." The hairs on his neck stood on end. He took hold of Estele's arm and slowly moved away from the case. "Look."

The sea bass were flopping back and forth on the mounded ice. Their mouths gaped as if gulping air. The pig head opened its eyes, pitched its ears back, and squealed a hideous screech.

"Holy pork!" Estele screamed in horror and staggered back. "The meat case has been reanimated! Run for your life!"

From the shadows, a clown in a blue polka-dot suit with green hair appeared from behind the case. A smeary red grin split his face in two before he grabbed Estele's wrist. "Come with me!"

She resisted. "Val, help me!"

With a hard yank, the clown knocked Estele off-balance and dragged her behind the counter. She thrashed wildly, trying to escape. "Let me go, asshole clown!"

Val threw a couple punches, but the clown dodged them with ease, as if he knew in advance where each punch was headed and had all the time in the world to step aside.

In desperation, he picked up a sea bass and used it to smack the clown's fluffy wig. Splop, splop. The fish made a horrible wet sound on contact with the clown's head.

The clown was struck across the face and stumbled to the floor, landing on his hands and knees. His body convulsed and contorted as his human shape morphed into something animal-like, and then he raced away on all fours like a rat scurrying into the night.

This was like his worst nightmare come to life. Val tossed the fish back onto the ice and knelt at Estele's side. "Are you all right?"

Her face was pale and her eyes wide. She pushed up from the floor and stood on wobbly legs. "What the hell just happened?"

He scanned the market. It was eerily silent. "We have to get out of here."

She rubbed her wrist. "What a grip that creep had! That hurt."

His instant response was guilt. He'd screwed up. Protecting Estele was his sacred duty, and he was doing a piss-poor job of it. With a gentle hand on her back, he guided her forward and pushed the cart with the other. "Keep walking. I'll leave a note on the register."

"We're not going to pay?"

"There's no one here to give the money to. Hurry. I don't want to stay here a second longer than we have to."

"You mean we're just going to walk out the door with a cart full of groceries?"

"Yes."

"That's looting."

"It's practical. Look around. There's no one here. Do you want to wait at the check stand for the clown to return?"

She shuddered. "No. I've had enough of that jacked up jester."

He stopped at a cashier station and scribbled a quick note on a pad.

"Are you mad? What are you doing?"

The pen was running out of ink. What else could go wrong? "Leaving my name and phone number."

"You're volunteering your personal information? Don't mention me. Believe it or not, I don't have a criminal record, and I'd like to keep it that way."

"I'm sure we're on a surveillance camera. Hopefully, the psycho clown will show up too. Don't worry, I'll return tomorrow and pay for everything."

They passed a candy display. "Ooo. Junior Mints." She tossed a box in the cart. "What the hell, I need them. We're probably already in a lot of trouble anyway."

"Why should we be in trouble?" He burst through the automatic doors and hustled the cart into the parking lot. "We were shopping and minding our own business. Bozo was the one who assaulted you. We're the ones who should be calling the cops, except I don't think they'll believe us."

Chapter 6

Running in high heels from violent clowns with stolen groceries—could the day get any crazier? Even by her standards, this was a new low. Estele’s wrist ached where the freak bozo had grabbed her, and despite the balmy evening, she shivered from nerves.

She unlocked the passenger door while keeping a wary eye on Val. “Unload that cart as fast as you can. I need to go home.”

Val brought the cart to a halt. “What was that look for?”

Without meaning to sound snappish, she did. “A disembodied pig’s head screamed at us, and you beat a man to the ground with a fish. I’m a little weirded out right now and I feel like I need a shower.”

He sniffed his shirt. “And a change of clothes.” Packing as many small items as possible into the soup pot, he thrust it in the back seat. Everything else was tossed behind the seat.

Opening the driver side, Estele slipped behind the wheel and slumped forward.

Val pushed the empty cart aside and climbed into the VW. His knees bumped the console. “I know what your car reminds me of. It’s like flying economy.”

As he buckled his seat belt, Val stopped to examine her wrist. His eyes filled with concern. “Good God, you’re bruised.” He brought her wrist to his lips and gave it a gentle kiss. “Poor thing, you’re shaking too. I promise, if I ever catch that clown, I’ll make him sorry.”

His expression was so genuine she paused and allowed it to soak in. No one looked at her that way. It was wonderful and unsettling, but with a priceless ruby in her purse this probably wasn’t the time to develop soft feelings toward a brujo. She had to remain on guard. “Would you even recognize that guy if you saw him again? I’m pretty sure I wouldn’t. You can’t randomly grab clowns off the fairgrounds. What if you get the wrong one?”

He shook his head. “That bastard had no business grabbing you.” His brows sank as he looked at her like she was something fragile set in harm’s way. “Are you sure you’re good to drive? You’re pale and you might be in shock.” He unfastened his seat belt. “Switch places with me. I’ll drive.”

“Wait.” Could this be a brujo trick to take control? How easy would it be to pretend to care, earn her trust, then play into all her little-girl fantasies of having a strong man in her life? She’d always longed for a protector, but never dared admit it. “I’m fine. Don’t worry about me.”

He picked up her purse and moved it toward the back seat.

“Stop!” She panicked when his hand lingered near the zipper. What if the ruby glowed and gave itself away and he looked at it? Griselda had entrusted her to defend it. “I want to keep it in my lap.”

“While you drive?” The purse hovered midair. His crooked smile was all too charming. “It’s a big bag, and it looks like it’s ready to slide to the floor and get caught beneath the brake pedal.”

“It won’t.” She firmly took hold of her purse and set it in her lap. When she turned to grab her seat belt, it plopped onto the gearshift. Sheepishly, she set it back.

He untangled the purse strap from the shift. “Are you sure about this? I can hold it on my lap. Safe and sound.”

“Don’t touch it!” Damn. The only thing she’d accomplished was to call attention to her purse. When would she learn to play it cool? She gathered it close.

“What are you being so protective of? What have you got in there, more sneaky spells? Perhaps a sleeping philter to knock me out with?”

Suddenly the whole incident felt terribly awkward and she was full of regrets that it had ever come up. “I wouldn’t do that to you.”

“Actually, you would.” He stared straight ahead. “You dribbled a candor spell on the gum.”

“The spell wasn’t aimed at you. I did try to warn you. Sidhe was just looking out for me in his own ill-advised way.”

He settled uneasily on the seat and made the springs squeak. “I’m here to protect and assist you. Fate has paired us together. I wish you would trust me.”

She waved her hand in front of his face. “Earth to Val! We just met. My trust doesn’t come easily, especially where a brujo is concerned. Slow down, dude.”

Val glanced at her sideways. His keen dark eyes reflected the colorful glow of a neon sign. For several tense moments, unsaid words built behind taut lips like water behind a dam. “What can I do to earn your trust?”

“I don’t know.” Inserting the key, she turned the ignition. The VW rumbled. Being more cautious than usual, she waited until she had the advantage of a green light to pull into her lane. “It’s not a check-this-box type of question. All I know is my weird day got ten times weirder after you came onto the scene.”

“I could say the same thing about you.” His expression softened. “For the sake of San Buena, let’s try to get along and figure out this situation.”

She hit the gas and the car sputtered only slightly faster. “I’ll try.”

“You’ll succeed. What would help in the trust department? I’m still under the effects of the candor spell. I have to tell the truth. Ask me questions and I’ll do my best to answer them.”

Tall, dark, and confident, Val looked like the sort of man women chased. “Okay cray-cray caballero. Are you currently dating anyone? Hold on! Strike that. How many women are you juggling?”

He laughed. “None. Cross my heart. I’m not seeing anyone. God knows I’m ready to. During the last two years of my training in the highlands of Oaxaca, I had to commit 100 percent. The opposite sex was strictly off-limits. What else?”

She glanced in the rearview mirror. “What’s in the duffel bag?”

“Change of clothes, toothbrush, and power tools.”

“Power tools, like a chainsaw?”

“Shamanic power tools. Stuff like sacred herbs, crystals, a medicine bag, and divination tools to stalk power with, and I always travel with a set of quality culinary knives.”

She nodded. “I suppose that’s plausible.” The palm-lined street provided a dramatic foreground against a starry night. Too bad she was spending a lovely night interrogating a brujo.

“Go ahead, ask me more.”

Aha, now she had him. “Are you up to something?”

Looking puzzled, he rubbed his jaw. “What do you mean?”

Why was she bothering to ask when she already knew the answer? “You know, am I going to get hurt?”

Val shrugged. “I promise I have nothing harmful planned.”

Steering onto a roller-coaster-steep street, the VW chugged up hill, forcing her to shift into third gear and then second. “What about unintentionally?”

“I’m not sure what you mean. Unintentionally, like if I stepped on your foot?”

“No! I meant you could draw me in, get me to like you, do nice things for me—”

“Like make pozole?”

“Yes! You just popped into my life, calling yourself a protector and maker of comfort food, and then....”

“What are you afraid of, Estele?”

Should I even be saying this crap out loud? The words stuck in her throat. “I’m afraid that if I give my trust, you’ll take it and then disappear. Men do that sort of thing.”

“Has that happened to you before? I’m sorry if it has.”

Even as she said it, she recognized her mother, Mara’s, sour tone in her words and regretted opening her mouth. “Brujos are everything that’s wrong about the enchantment community, with a hefty dose of machismo factored in.”

“Whoa!” He threw his hands in the air. “That’s pure bigotry. I’m not going to let you say that without a correction. Some brujos are macho, but I’m not.”

His beard stubble, the heavy silver cuff on his wrist, and pointy-toed cowboy boots said otherwise. “You look macho.”

“I’m a food wizard, for crying out loud. I’m more nacho than macho.” He became sullen.

Poor Val. He seemed sincere. Why couldn’t she shut her mouth? “I know exactly what to expect from you. Brujos burst onto the scene, take charge of the situation, and poof, they’re gone, leaving everyone guessing. No further involvement with the consequences of their actions.”

“Are we talking about me or your father, because I’m getting confused.”

Obviously, she was the consequence of her father, Ernesto’s, actions. The thought had been weighing on her since she was old enough to realize she was a living reminder of her mother’s biggest mistake. She almost hit the brakes. “You’re right! My bad. It’s just you’re the first brujo I’ve had contact with in a long while. Everything I’ve been holding inside sort of spilled out.”

“I’ll have to do my best to put brujos in a better light, won’t I?”

“Understatement. I don’t even know why I said all those things. I wanted to shut up but I kept yakking. Do you think I got a contact high from that candor spell? Is that even possible?”

Val shook his head. “I have no idea.”

Silence hung in the air. He looked peeved and she was sorry she’d blurted so much. Her difficult past wasn’t his fault.

“Where do you live?”

She pointed toward a row of sparkling lights high atop a ridge. “On Pacific View Drive.”

“I’ll bet you can see all the Channel Islands from there.” His tone softened.

“Almost.”

“It must be nice.”

“It’s pretty in sunlight, but I like it best in fog. Everything’s soft, out of focus, and feels close.”

He smiled but looked sad. “Sounds beautiful.”

Glancing at Val sideways, she couldn’t miss the fact that he was brooding. Why was she so insecure with men? Was this something she could change about herself? She hoped so.

“I was scared to come here today.” Val stared out the window at the hillside lights. “I didn’t know what would be asked of me or what I could offer to the situation, but I had faith I was walking into a just cause. More than anything, I was scared that my ally might be disappointed that fate had assigned a food wizard as her protector. You’re a legacy witch. You were born powerful. I was not. I stand at your side, in your shadow, ready to help.” He turned. “Does any of that sound macho to you?”

“No.” Was that the candor spell speaking? Would he have volunteered any of this on his own? Did it matter? The road wound up the hillside. The VW sputtered as it climbed. On such a clear night, the ocean sparkled all the way to horizon. As they approached her apartment building, Estele grew uneasy. She didn’t entertain, and certainly never a brujo. Who knew what was lurking beneath his warm exterior? For sure he was tempting, but possibly not so good for her. She swung the car into her parking space and set the brake. “We’re here.”

Val looked into the back seat and frowned at the chaotic jumble of groceries. “I’ll unload the car. I don’t want you to make multiple trips up and down the stairs in those heels.”

“Thanks.” Hooking her purse over her shoulder, she got out and locked the driver side. “I’m in apartment thirteen.” She held the delicate handrail as she climbed the pseudo-floating black stairs.

How long had it been since she’d had a man over? Wait... she’d never had a male visitor at this apartment, and she'd lived there a full nine months. Since her academic struggles at the Master Mage Magic Academy and LuLu Beauty had begun, her social life had tanked.

As she drew nearer to the front door, she heard the distinct sound of footsteps rushing away. Slipping the key into the lock, she called out, "I'm home!"

Opening the door cautiously, she peered inside. A dresser drawer in her bedroom slammed shut. "Captain, what are you up to?"

"I'm just slipping into a bit of pretty!" he grumbled in the bedroom.

"Those 'bits of pretty' belong to me, so take them off and put them away. We have company."

"I'm starved for company." The captain sounded elated. "Who is it?"

"The young man I met for drinks."

"That was fast!"

"Don't make assumptions, Captain." Estele shuffled across the living room, making sure the soles of her shoes made lots of noise. She knocked on the bedroom door. It was always wise to give the captain plenty of warning before opening a door. Jeez, the degrading things she had to put up with in her own home. "My hand is on the knob. I'm opening the door. Am I going to be upset?"

A finger tapped Estele on the shoulder. She jumped and turned. "Captain! Don't sneak up on me like that."

Looking completely unapologetic, he grinned. "Sorry to startle you, my frolicsome spring lamb. Where's the young lad?"

"Downstairs, gathering groceries. God only knows what's taking so long." She hissed softly. "I have a favor to ask. Could you not show yourself?"

"Why?" He appeared crestfallen. "No visiting with the lad?"

Estele glanced toward the front door. Val wasn't even in the stairwell yet. "Captain, I need your help."

Sweeping his arms through the air, he made a grand gesture. "My help is offered with an open heart."

She whispered, "My young lad is a brujo."

The captain's expression remained neutral. "What's a brujo?"

"In my case, a brujo is a person of uncertain standing."

His eyes glittered in recognition. "You don't know if you can trust this young man? He could be like those dreadful Pressmen at the docks, acting friendly, buying drinks for sailors, and then pressing them into service aboard rat-infested ships for unpopular wars."

"Exactly."

"And you want me to float around the apartment in a disembodied state, watching him and reporting my findings back to you."

"Yes, Captain. You hit the nail on the head."

"Will I be asked to hit him on the head? I will if you want me to, it's not a problem, but we should have an exit strategy ready. If I am called to commit violence, I will require a soothing dose of opium tea after my exertions.”

“Captain, I don’t have any opium tea on hand, and I wouldn’t know where to find any.”

“Laudanum-infused elderberry wine?”

“No to that as well.”

“Do you still want me to hit the lad? Perhaps crown him king with an iron pike?”

“No. Please don’t hit him on the head. Val hasn’t done anything to deserve it. Your unbiased observations are just a precaution.”

“Ah. The situation is clear to me now.”

“Just stay close, but don’t show yourself. That’s all you need to do.”

“Understood, my saucy turtle pie.”

Turtle pie? Was there such a thing? Yuck.

“You can depend on me. I’ll remain as invisible as a darkened lighthouse in a pea-soup fog.” The captain’s image shimmered and faded until he disappeared.

Val stomped up the stairs and appeared in the doorway looking like an overburdened pack mule, with his duffel bag looped across his shoulders, a cooking pot cradled in his arms, and a multitude of shopping bags dangling from his wrists. “I loaded the groceries into some plastic bags I found stuffed in the back seat. Where should I set this stuff down?”

Estele pointed toward the kitchen on the far side of open-plan apartment. “Set it down anywhere.”

He ambled over to the kitchen area and plopped the pot and bags onto the countertop.

The moment the items were out of his arms, Estele hunted through the chaos looking for the chocolate-covered mint patties.

Once she found them, she moved the green-and-white box away from everything else and made a whirling motion with her hands, like a paddle wheel spinning. “There’s probably a better spell than this, but I’ll try it. Hex-vex-redirect. Reverse the candor spell!” She threw her hands in the air. “I hope that works. Eat one and find out.”

Picking up the mints, she gave the package a gentle shake. “This box isn’t even a third full. What’s with that? Deceptive marketing, that’s what.” Tearing the package open, she shook several mints into her palm and offered them to Val.

He took one and popped it into his mouth, closed his eyes in bliss, and bit. “I always loved these things.”

“Is that the truth, or are you still under an enchantment?”

“It’s the truth.” He smiled. “And I’m going to continue telling the truth, candor spell or not. Estele, I’m going to prove to you that brujos can be trustworthy.”

“Fair enough.” She ate one too. The sweet aromatic mint caused a cooling sensation against the roof of her mouth.

Val unzipped his duffel bag and pulled out a leather parcel of culinary knives. He unrolled the kit, exposing an impressive display of cutlery, then walked to the sink and washed his hands. “Do you have a cutting board? I’ll start the pozole.”

Did she own a cutting board? Probably not. Did one come with the apartment? Maybe....

He started washing vegetables in the sink. “Well?”

She glanced around the kitchen. “I’m thinking.”

From the corner of her eye, Captain Manx partially materialized and pointed to a cabinet above the stove. Oh no. The old guy just couldn’t stick to the program. Behind Val’s back, she waved her hands, hoping to shoo the captain away.

Val stopped and sniffed the air. “Have you cooked fish recently?”

“No.” She shot the captain a death stare.

“That’s funny. For a moment I thought I smelled something oily like fish.” He sniffed the air like a bloodhound. “No, it’s a smoky smell....” He stepped closer to where Captain Manx had materialized. “It’s faded. I don’t smell it now.”

Captain Manx partially materialized behind Val, grinning and dancing in a circle.

“Get out of here!” she shouted.

Val turned. He looked surprised. “Get out? You want me to leave? Estele, I’m here to cook for you.”

She shrugged. “You’re fine. You don’t have to go. I wasn’t even talking to you.”

“You weren’t talking to me?” He pressed his hand to his chest. “Who else is here?”

If the captain didn’t stop dancing a jaunty jig, she was going to lose it. “No one!”

Val rolled his eyes. “You’re hungry. You need to eat. Any more thoughts on where that cutting board might be?”

“Look above the stove.”

Val opened a high cupboard and removed a cutting board. “Aha. You do have one. That’s a good thing. This kitchen is a showplace. I wouldn’t want to scratch the counters.”

The kitchen window provided a spectacular view. City lights sparkled below and the moon rose over the ocean.

He rinsed the board and set it on the counter. Val placed a freshly washed carrot and onion in the center and reached for a large knife. With deft motions he scraped, peeled, and chopped the vegetables into two piles and then started peeling and crushing cloves of garlic.

Estele watched the mound of garlic grow. “That’s a lot of garlic. Are you expecting a vampire attack? We’ll be breathing fire. It’s a good thing we have the mint patties or else this apartment might not be big enough for the two of us.”

He glanced up from his work. “This is a beautiful apartment. Do you mind me asking what the rent is?”

“Um.” She hedged. “I sort of get a special deal.”

Val peered inside the refrigerator. “Special deal from family? You must have a rich uncle.”

“No, it’s a community thing.” How could she explain that a ghost captain had led her to the perfect rent-controlled apartment and made her promise never to tell anyone about it? She looked over her shoulder just as Captain Manx opened her bedroom door. “Wait! What do you think you’re doing? You’re not allowed in there.”

The captain vaporized.

Val shut the refrigerator and turned. “Sorry.”

“No. Go ahead. It’s okay,” she apologized. “You may open and close the refrigerator as often as you like.” Now, she sounded like a nutcase.

With raised brow, Val studied Estele’s face. “Thank you for that privilege, but what’s the point? There’s not much in there. A jar of mustard and half an apple? What are you living on?”

“I told you, I don’t cook.”

He appeared concerned. “But you must eat, right? There’s no food in there.”

“You didn’t check the freezer. There’s plenty of Hot Pockets in there.”

“You can’t live on that stuff.”

“Yes, you can. Besides, I’m always broke.” She shrugged. “And I don’t know what I’m doing in the kitchen anyway. I could burn soup. So I usually grab fast food. Arrest me.”

“Estele, you need to learn to take care of yourself. What good is a glass-and-chrome Architectural Digest dream apartment if you have to starve to live in it?”

She had to defend herself or else come off looking like a child who needed adult supervision. “Actually, my rent is very reasonable. My refrigerator is bare because I refuse to buy fresh food I know I’ll waste. As I already said, I’m not a cook.”

The corners of his mouth twisted. “Lucky for you I am, and a good one.”

She glanced away. Typical brujo arrogance. He was going to tell her how to live.

Val washed the soup pot, added a splash of oil, and set it on the stove to heat. Once the oil was hot, he added the garlic, onions, and diced carrot, stirring them until they turned golden brown. A rich aroma filled the house. He diced the carnitas. “This is going to take a little while. Shall we have something to drink while we wait for this to cook?”

“Sure.” She dug through the stack of groceries set on the countertop and found the pint of rum beneath the stack.

The captain partially materialized at her side. “Aye, my old friend rum! Spin the cap and tip the flask and whisk me liver to glory! The favorite liquor of the Caribbean gods of the sea.”

Estele mouthed, “Go away.”

The captain swiped his hand in front of Val’s face. Val continued stirring the pot and adding spices to the pozole. “Lass, I don’t think the young gentleman can see me. He doesn’t seem to have your gift of second sight, my dear. I’d have to fully materialize for him to see or hear me.”

“What if you’re wrong?” she whispered.

Val looked up. “Wrong about what?”

“Nothing.” Estele pressed her lips shut.

The captain peered over Val’s shoulder. “None of the former occupants of this apartment could see me unless I fully materialized. The young gent certainly knows his way around the galley! I would have traded my good eye to have him as cook aboard my fair ship, the Lady Alice.”

Val smiled at Estele. “Are you okay? You sort of have a funny look on your face.”

“I’m fine.” She wasn’t.

Val eyed the rum. “You wouldn’t have any cola on hand, would you? We have limes, we could make Cuba libres.”

Captain Manx stared wistfully at the rum. “I would prefer we put the rum and limes to better use as Cannon Fodder Sea Grog.”

“I don’t even know what that is.” She slapped her hand over her mouth.

“A Cuba libre?” Val smiled. “It’s just Coke and rum with a squeeze of lime.”

“Sea Grog!” the captain bellowed. “I want Cannon Fodder Sea Grog!”

She turned on the captain. “Don’t be so demanding.”

“Whoa.” Val returned to stirring the soup. “I thought I was being easygoing.”

“It’s not you.” She winked at the captain. “It’s just I want Cannon Fodder Sea Grog.”

“Okay.” He wiped his hands on a dish towel. “How do you even make that?”

She stared at the captain.

He rubbed his chin. “Shiver me timbers, it’s been over a century since I last made it. I’ve forgotten so much.... As I recollect, first grab a lime, not too rotten, and roll it roughly against the ship’s deck as if you’re angry at it. Don’t be afraid to show the fruit who’s in command.”

“Juice a lime,” Estele muttered.

Crowding closer, the captain continued. “We’ll need treacle syrup, preferably made from Bombay cane sugar served from a gold tin, but if we don’t have any, it’s not essential. Simple syrup really is simple. After all, we’re talking about sugar and water here, nothing fancy. If you don’t have any simple syrup on hand, steal some from your neighbor’s hummingbird feeder and don’t be a lily liver about finding a few dead bugs in your beverage. Several drowned ants never hurt anybody.”

“Dissolve a little sugar in hot water.” Estele reached into a cupboard. “We’re in luck, I actually have sugar.”

Val put his hands on his hips. “All right, what else?”

The captain bit his lip. “Fresh gunpowder, fistfuls of the stuff. You can’t have too much, unless you don’t care for the taste of gunpowder, in which case it’s already too much and this libation would not be recommended. Oh, and the jewel in the crown, rum, lots of it. Let’s not kid ourselves, you can’t overpour the rum.”

“Gunpowder,” she blurted.

“Gunpowder?” Val froze. “You meant spices, right?”

“That’s exactly what I meant, and I am going to let you pick the spices because you’re the chef.”

Estele batted her lashes. Good save.

“Do you have a pitcher or something I can use to mix in?” Val lowered the flame on the stove.

Not entertaining much was catching up to her. She was unprepared. “I have a few plastic tumblers.”

“Plastic? Egad no!” the captain sputtered. “I-I’d rather drink from the moldering rim of a splintered barrel or an unwashed communal tin mug below deck, anything but plastic. Am I asking too much for a cheerful porcelain pitcher garnished with flowers or sprigs of fresh mint? Sometimes even a barnacled old salt with a beard as fouled with flotsam as a pelican’s nest enjoys pretty things now and then.”

Estele turned her back to Val and whispered, “I’m not Martha Stewart. I don’t own a porcelain pitcher. At least I remembered to bring home your beloved rum. Do I get credit for that?”

“Aye, bonny lass, I don’t mean to be such a grim-grouch. You did the rum right and proper.”

Val set a wooden spoon aside and laughed. “You two argue like you’ve been married for sixty years.”

Estele gasped. “What? Can’t a girl talk to herself?”

Val pointed to Captain Manx. “There’s a whiskered old man leaning over the sink. When were you going to introduce me, or are you going to continue talking to him in front of me, thinking I won’t notice?”

“You saw him all along? Why didn’t you say something?”

“I was waiting to see how you would handle the matter. The captain is your houseghost, not mine. We’re still working on basic trust issues, aren’t we? That’s okay, I’m patient.”

She paused. What sort of brujo was Val? Even gifted members of the enchantment community came and went from the apartment and remained oblivious to the captain’s presence if he chose to remain out of view. “I’m sorry. Captain Manx is sort of my little secret.”

The captain’s cheeks flushed. “Bless the cockles of yer heart, my cooing turtledove, for saying so, but do you think the lad knows about that other secret?”

Her jaw dropped. Was the captain going to blurt something inappropriate about the ruby? “What other secret?”

The captain coyly rolled his eyes. “You know... my irresistible attraction to donning the silky finery of the fair sex?”

Val blinked. “I know now. I’m standing right here.” He turned toward Estele. “I’ll be honest. I’m disappointed. We’re supposed to be working together as a team to battle evil. Why try to keep a secret that’s so obvious? Did you think I wouldn’t notice that you share your home with a chatty ghost?”

She winced. “You actually see him, not just the translucent shade of a man or floating mist?”

Val appeared troubled. “Yes, I can see—and, I might also add, smell—an old guy with a crazy beard and stained teeth.” His gaze focused on Estele. “It’s crystal clear that he belongs to another realm. I was wondering when the hell you were going to say something.”

“Aye, the crimson stains would be the unfortunate side effect of beetle nut.” Captain grinned. “It calms the howling lonelies, but it’s not conducive to a winning smile. I’ll admit that.”

Val walked to the cupboard and removed a mason jar. “Is this all you have?”

Estele joined Val at the far counter. “I’m sorry I wasn’t upfront about my living situation. Technically speaking, the captain isn’t ‘living’ anywhere, but that’s splitting hairs.” He looked hurt. Could she learn to be a little more trusting? Now Val thought she was sneaky and foolish, an unflattering combination. “Give me time. Trusting a brujo won’t come easy.”

He turned and stared into her eyes with his firebrand gaze. “Time is the one thing we don’t have. You were at the fairgrounds and the abandoned market. You saw what was happening to San Buena. Smoke beasts? A squealing pig head on ice? Clown assault? Did any of that seem normal to you? The bubble of malevolence is building toward critical mass. It could erupt to the surface at any moment. The entire city could be affected. Can you even imagine what is coming?”

Estele shook her head. Suffering Circe, if she was San Buena’s best hope against a megaton demonic force of unimaginable power, their goose was already cooked. Feeling defeated, she mumbled, “That mason jar isn’t a drinking glass, it’s a bud vase.”

His jaw dropped. “Is that all you have to say to me?”

Now what? She was in over her head and then some. “I don’t know what to say or do. I’m not the person to put in charge of the safety of others.”

“We can’t hide from this thing. Trouble will erupt. Let me know when you’re ready to confront the issue.” Looking disappointed, he stared at the jar. “Do you have two bud vases we can drink from?”

Chapter 7

A guarded silence settled over Estele and Val that neither dared to disrupt. Val returned to the task of preparing supper.

Estele watched as he mixed drinks and pattered over the pot of soup, stirring and adding seasonings.

After some fuss and creative thinking, Estele managed to transform a large kitchen island into an attractive dining table, complete with a centerpiece of chunky white candles surrounded by tiny tea lights.

Her apartment had never looked or smelled so homey. This was nice—maybe too nice. Part of her dreaded getting used to homemade meals prepared by a handsome man and then losing the privilege.

Val ladled the steaming pozole into two large mixing bowls. He sprinkled grated jack cheese and squeezed wedges of fragrant lime on top, and served them both.

She pulled a tall chair up to the island and perched on the edge of it. The soup looked and smelled wonderful. “Thank you.”

“My pleasure.” He carried another tall chair to the island and sat opposite Estele. “I had to improvise a little, but I think things turned out well.”

Dipping a spoon in the pozole, she sampled the rich broth. It was the perfect balance of salty, tart, and spicy. “It’s good.” Dare she say as good or better than her grandmother’s pozole, although Abuela Lena’s pozole had been made with a heartbreaking amount of love when she needed it most.

Val tasted his soup. “Ah. It turned out nice.”

“It’s great.” The bits of pork were browned and redolent with garlic, melt-in-the-mouth tender.

Picking up a mason jar, Val raised it in a toast. “To allies.”

Estele picked up her jar and clinked it against his. “Cheers.” She sipped the spiced rum Val had concocted. It was mildly sweet and refreshing. “Oooo, this is good too.” Turning, she reached for a custard cup and poured a trickle of her drink into the dish. “For the captain. He’ll enjoy this.”

Looking puzzled, Val brushed a lock of black hair from his brow. “He’s a ghost. No mouth. No gut. How can he drink that?”

“He can’t.” Sliding off the chair, she walked over to the corner of the room and set the cup down on an end table. “When he’s ready, the captain will enjoy the rum on the etheric level. He’ll sniff it, hover over it, and absorb its essence.”

“You like the captain, don’t you?”

“We share an apartment. I have to make an effort to get along. Besides, he’s sort of a dear old pest.”

“You’re not afraid to call him a pest?” Val glanced around. “Where is he now? I expected him to hang around while I made dinner, but I didn’t get the sense he was near.”

She returned to the table and picked up her spoon. The pozole was thick with hearty hominy and juicy pork. It was the ultimate comfort food. “I don’t know where the captain goes when he’s unmaterialized, or whatever you call it when ghosts remain invisible. Maybe he inhabits another dimension, but the bottom line is he shouldn’t be here at all. The poor guy died when Queen Victoria was still on the throne and he deserves to move on.”

His dipped his spoon into the soup. “Why doesn’t he?”

“He’s trapped here. It’s like he can’t face the fact that he died in an asylum.”

“Asylum?”

“This apartment complex is built on the razed foundations of a nineteenth-century asylum.”

“Ah. Now I get it. A ward full of crazy ghosts equals cheap rent.”

“Yep, you guessed it. But not every unit in this building is as haunted as unit thirteen.”

Val sipped his spiced rum with a languid expression on his face. “Are there other ghosts in this apartment?”

“Yes, and there are some mean ones too, real Amityville Horror types, but the captain chases them away. He’s been my gatekeeper.”

“It sounds like you two need each other.”

“Me and the captain?” She laughed. “He doesn’t really need me. He doesn’t need anything. He’s dead, but he doesn’t want to face it. Between you and me, the captain’s a terrible addict, and now he seems to be addicted to life. He can’t give it up. I don’t see him being able to abandon ghosthood and peacefully cross over anytime soon.”

He pointed with his spoon. “Is the captain trapped here? Do you think he can leave this apartment?”

“Oh sure, he can leave the apartment. I know he takes strolls to Cemetery Park at the bottom of the hill, where he’s buried, but he prefers to spend most of his time here, where he lived.”

“He visits his own grave, so he definitely knows he’s dead?”

“Of course he knows he’s dead! I tell him all the time. I constantly remind him, ‘Captain, you don’t need any more curare lozenges from the apothecary, you’re dead! Enough already.’”

Val shrugged. “I suppose he’s hanging around for some reason. He’ll figure it out.”

The pozole was so delicious she quickly reached the bottom of the bowl.

“There’s more.” A proud smile curled Val’s lips. “Would you like seconds?”

She slid her empty bowl toward him. “Yes, please.”

Taking her bowl in hand, he walked to the stove and refilled it, garnishing it with grated cheese and lime. “Seconds are the highest compliment to a chef.”

“You’re a good chef.”

“I’m an alquimista de sabor.”

“That’s right.” She nodded. “An alchemist of flavor. It sounds so official, like it carries authority with a preset pay grade. You’re lucky. I’ll bet the title comes with some respect too. When you say the term ‘witch,’ especially to people outside the enchantment community, it becomes a catchall phrase. ‘Witch’ doesn’t really tell you anything. What sort of witch? What level of skill? A witch could be an exalted sorceress who can turn a hurricane offshore or just some Goth chick who smokes clove cigarettes. You never know.”

He dipped his spoon into the bowl and ate a heaping mouthful of pozole. “What sort of witch are you?”

“An incompetent one.”

A look of concern knotted his brow. “Why do you say that?”

“Because it’s true.” She continued spooning soup into her mouth. Oddly, talking about it wasn’t hurting her appetite in the least. It was a relief to say it. “I am a terrible witch and it’s sad, because I want to be a good one. I really try. My heart is in the right place. I would never dabble on the dark side or take advantage of someone, and yet I just keep fucking up!”

“You sound a little self-pitying.”

“No! That’s not it at all. I feel sorry for the innocent people who get caught in my crosshairs.”

His gaze dropped. “What have you done that was so awful?”

Where should I start? “Just this morning, I accidentally turned a salon full of women into stone statues, and once they were magically revived, they woke screaming. That was today. Last week I—”

“Wait. You turned the women to stone? You have that much power? That’s incredible! You didn’t do it maliciously, did you?”

“Of course not. I was distracted and I made a terrible mistake with my spellcasting. But that’s part of the problem, I’m always distracted.”

“What distracted you today?”

Her shoulders tensed. “I was hungry.”

“I could have taken care of that.” Val lifted his hands into the air. “Maybe that’s why I’m here, to ground or balance you.”

What was his angle, wiggle his way into her life and solve all her problems? Why her? “I’m used to being on my own.”

“But that’s not how allies work. Allies are catalysts and add exponentially to the other’s power. Alone, an ally is like an electric cord without the electricity.”

“I’m not convinced I’m anybody’s ally or their electricity.”

Val pushed his sleeve back and pointed to his pinup girl tattoo. “Then what is this about? I was given this tattoo as a sign that it was time to seek my ally. That's you, there's no doubt about it. Even the initials E.E.E. have appeared. What's your middle name?"

"Ernestina." Things were getting a little intense. Did he really expect her to come through for him on a professional level? Talk about setting himself up for disappointment, he was doing it in spades. She waved his comment off. "There's no guarantee E.E.E. stands for Estele Ernestina Esposito. It could be Eldora Ezmae Earwax or Edwina Elberta Eggbaum..."

"And Eldora and Edwina are witches living in San Buena who happen to dress and look just like you?"

"Um... there is no Eldora Ezmae Earwax or Edwina Elberta Eggbaum living in San Buena."

"Exactly. I got the call from my spirit that trouble was afoot in San Buena. The sense of trouble came through clear as day."

"Like firing up the Bat signal?"

"Yes, it was an internal Bat signal. The call went into the void, and I felt it in my heart and saw it in my mind. Tio Bruno felt the call to come here too. We drove the taco truck straight to the Master Mage Magic Academy, and you walked out the front door. We were meant to meet and be allies."

Poor guy, he looked so sincere when he said it. She cringed. Didn't he know the Esposito witches were cursed? Their magic went astray and their husbands ran away. Nothing ever went right for them. "You seem like a nice guy, Val. I'm sorry I've been so standoffish with you. Listen carefully, because I'm telling you this for your own good: you don't want me for an ally. Whatever good you try to accomplish, I'll manage to undo in a spectacular fashion. You spill a glass of water, I'll cause a flood." She pushed the empty bowl away. "I loved your pozole. Thank you, but you should find another ally while there's still time. There's no way the safety of San Buena should be in my hands. Look around. I don't even have a pet. I'm scared I'll screw up!"

He grasped her hand and looked into her eyes. "Estele, there is no other ally. It's you. You have to help me expose and neutralize the bubble of malevolence. We can do this. Have some confidence in yourself."

"Confidence? I'm not delusional. I know what I am and what I can expect from myself. Trust me, I disappoint me every day."

"Why is that?"

"Because I love people. I want them to like me, and I just keep doing things that frighten everyone or make them angry." Terrific, her voice was trembling and she sounded like she was eight years old. "When I'm spellcasting, everything starts okay, but then I get distracted. Power builds under the surface. I'll think, 'Wow, is all this juice really coming from me?' There's this high, a feeling of taking off, like a condor swooping over a canyon. The rising wave of power overwhelms me every time. Things start to happen. I start seeing results. Then I'll think, 'Maybe I can't handle a double-black-diamond slope. Maybe I should take it down a notch.' There're too many thoughts in my head at once and bam, I remember I'm a fuckup and sure enough, I fuck things up."

Val took her hand. “You sound like a frightened child.”

“Sorry.”

“Don’t be sorry.” He brought her fingers to his lips and kissed them. “Estele, you’re not a child, and you don’t have to be afraid to wield power. Uncertainty is something that can be conquered.”

“Easy for you to say.”

“I’ve been afraid too. I was afraid to alienate my family or make a bad choice. Telling my mother and father that I wanted to study and become a brujo caused endless fights. My father is still patiently waiting for me to snap out of it.” His lips smiled but his eyes were sad. “Committing to the path and apprenticing can be lonely. Doubt walks at your side every day. But if you know that you were born to do something, stop listening to doubt. Do what you were born to do and do it well.”

“But I don’t do it well....” He was talking to her like she mattered. She set down her spoon. The pozole had to be enchanted, because every mouthful brought sweet memories of her grandmother to mind. Abuela Lena’s presence grew so intense it was as if her spirit had been conjured to fill the room with a loving feeling of peace and belonging. No one else had ever loved her so completely, not even her mother. At that moment, thinking of Lena was almost too much to bear in a bittersweet way. “Your cooking is inspired. When you practice magic, no one gets hurt—they just get happy and full.”

“Thank you, but I’ll never have the skill or talent to turn someone to stone. You are exceptional. If I had your level of power, I would be over-the-moon enthusiastic and ready to learn how to harness it.”

She gently pushed the empty soup bowl away. “Trust me. You’d never want to be me.”

“Now you’re just feeling sorry for yourself.”

“Actually, I feel sorry for the people who get caught in the wake of my magic.”

Crossing his arms in front, he leaned onto his elbows. “Maybe I can help you. I can do more than cook. I have some wizardly skills and I’m a good teacher. Let’s do a beginner’s exercise in allies training. Do you want to try?”

“I have no idea what you want me to do.”

Val slid forward on his elbows, gazing into her eyes. “It’s a simple magical team-building exercise. Something we could do together that uses our strengths to advantage.”

“Like what?”

He waved a hand through the air in an arcing loop. “Name a magical practice that you can do.”

“Spellcasting.”

He frowned. “I’m not good with raw spellcasting.”

“Apparently, neither am I.”

“My magic has to be grounded in the senses through taste, scent, sight, etc.” He picked up a soup spoon. “Let’s start with this. Something I can touch.”

She sighed. “Please don’t say ‘there is no spoon.’”

“I was going to invite you to cast a motion spell on it.”

Red flags waved. “Why did you choose a spoon? Don’t go Uri Geller on me.”

“I’m not asking you to bend the spoon. I’m asking you to move it.”

“For safety’s sake, I usually avoid enchanting metal objects. Metal is too conductive and magnifies the enchantment in unpredictable ways, at least for me. Miss Dahlia says, ‘With metal, even a whispered spell will ring like a bell.’ I’ve managed to get myself into trouble with something as innocent as bobby pins, so I’m cautious now.”

“What happened with the bobby pins?”

“I was styling a lady’s hair. Her daughter was getting married on the beach and I wanted her updo to stay put. I enchanted the bobby pins to give them a little extra grip, and instead the hairpins started to behave like territorial hornets. They flew around her head and wouldn’t allow anyone to come close to her hairdo without getting stung. Even the lady couldn’t touch her own hair. She came back to the beauty school in hysterics. I felt bad. I was just trying to help. There was a brisk ocean breeze that day, for crying out loud.”

“Estele, try to relax and enchant the spoon.”

“Cast a motion spell? Me? This is the part where someone loses an eye. That spoon could end up zipping around the room like an unguided missile.”

“It won’t.”

Her stomach ached just thinking about it. “How do you know?”

He grasped her hand. “Because I’m going to sit at your side, holding your hand, and we’ll cast the spell together.”

“Okay.” Their fingers tangled. Val’s hand was warm and reassuring, and she wanted to believe him. “Do we have a safe word or way to neutralize the spell if it goes bad?”

“Nope.” His dark eyes glittered by candlelight. “Once we start down the ski slope, we’ll have to work together to not break our bones.”

“I’ve never skied and that’s a terrible mental image to have. I can just see myself, out of control, careening toward an icy cliff.”

“But you won’t go over because I won’t let you. I’m your safety net.”

“How so?”

“You’re my ally and I’m yours. Our skills complement each other. Your weaknesses are my strengths. It will be all right.”

This gorgeous guy had no idea how bad things could get. “It hasn’t been all right in the past. I’m not even convinced we are allies. This whole thing is still pretty far out.”

“This isn’t the past. You’re not doing this alone. Things will be different with me.”

Was he mad or ignorant? “You do have confidence in yourself, I’ll give you that.”

He gave her hand a gentle squeeze. “Enchant the spoon. Command it to rise.”

Oh man, he really didn’t know what a Pandora’s box he was opening. Hopefully, he really could protect them from the worst of the fallout. She mentally summoned all her knowledge of levitation and flight along with every tutorial Witch Griselda, Miss Dahlia, or Fredi had ever performed in front of her. Surprisingly, her thoughts were crystal clear. Perhaps having the Heart of Hecate in her purse and Val's encouragement was helpful after all? She pointed at the spoon and sang her best James Brown impression. "Get up! Get on up—"

Untouched, the spoon rose vertically, twirled on its end, and started to hop around the table.

She stared in shock. "Look! It's working."

He smiled. "So far so good. Can you make it fly?"

She winced. "I was afraid you'd say that. Me making it fly is not a good idea."

"Do it. Don't be afraid."

She lifted her hand into the air like a mime and made her fingers flutter like a bird's wing. "Fly little spoon, fly!"

The spoon chaotically zipped around the table, knocked over a lit candle, splattering hot wax everywhere, and then struck Val in the side of the head.

"Ouch!" Val ducked the unmanned utensil as it headed toward a window and tapped frantically against the glass as if trying to escape into the wild. He grasped Estele's hand and said calmly, "You can't just shout 'fly!' and leave it at that. Guide the spoon with your intentions. What do you want it to do?"

"I don't know!" A distinct red welt had already formed on Val's temple. It had to sting. That was her fault. Damn. She was too flustered to think. "I suppose I don't want it to hurt anyone."

"Then say so."

Talk to the spoon? Why did he have to look so smug when he said it? What a day she was having. "Spoon, be careful. Don't be a jerk, and watch where you're going."

The spoon's erratic movements stopped. It bobbed above the sink midair in a holding pattern.

Val looked pleased. "It's waiting for your next command."

Okay, this wasn't so bad. The situation had started to get out of control, but Val had forced her to focus and reel it back in. A first. "What should I tell it to do?"

"It's up to you. What do spoons do best?"

She laughed. "They go to the freezer, open the door, flip the lid off a pint of chocolate-ripple ice cream, and they bring a scoopful back to the table."

The spoon did exactly as Estele commanded and returned to the table laden with ice cream.

Estele eyed the floating treat with caution. "Who goes first? We should be careful. What if it just lashes out and chips a tooth?"

"It won't." Val opened his mouth. "I'll go first."

The spoon floated close and allowed him to take the ice cream without incident. He squinted and winced.

"Are you all right?" She held her breath in suspense.

"Don't worry, I'm fine." He swallowed. "I took too big a bite and gave myself brain freeze. The spoon was perfectly behaved because that was your intention.”

“Oh my God!” She was so happy with her achievement that she clapped. “Spoon, go and get seconds. I want some too!”

The spoon went to the freezer, scooped up more ice cream, and returned to Estele. She ate slowly. “I love this stuff. I could have had a pint for dinner—and sometimes I do.” She licked a drip from the side of her lips. “How did you do that, Val? How did you get my wayward magic under control? You’re like a witch whisperer.”

His grin was a mile wide. “It worked because we did it together. Doesn’t anyone ever sit down with you and talk you through a new form of spellcasting?”

She thought about the many ways magic had been taught to her. “Boy, that’s hard to answer. There is a curriculum at the Master Mage Magic Academy, but it’s more of an adult independent study program. We check in with the headmistress and show the final results, but so often I get off track at the very beginning of a new spell and blow it.”

“How do you blow it?”

“I don’t know. The enchantment seems to grow a mind of its own and just gets away from me.”

“How can that be if you created the enchantment in the first place?”

“I don’t know! It didn’t used to happen—as much. When I was little, I was pretty good with magic. My teachers even put me in an advanced class with older girls. That’s where I met my best friend, Fredi. Now there’s a talented witch. Totally grounded. Fredi’s going to marry a hot-ass lycan.”

“That’s interesting.”

“A witch marrying a lycan?”

“No, that you used to be good with magic. What happened to your confidence?”

“I made so many scary magical mishaps that I guess I lost it.”

“But when and why?”

She stared at the open freezer and the pint of chocolate ripple longingly. Talk of the past was painful and sure to push all her buttons. “Do we have to talk about this stuff now?”

He rose and walked toward the freezer. “Will there be a better time to stop feeling like a failure in life?”

“I suppose not.” She stared at the ice cream. “Wait. Let me see what I can do on my own.”

He stopped and leaned against the countertop, arms crossed. “Do it.”

She crooked her finger. “Chocolate ripple, come to mama.”

The pint rose from the freezer, floated to the makeshift kitchen table, and landed softly. She could hardly believe her eyes. “Look! I did it and nothing went wrong along the way.”

“Why do you think that is?”

“Because it was a simple spell. Levitation, A to B. How could I screw it up?”

“Estele, you didn’t screw up because your intentions were clear. You wanted ice cream on the table and it came at your command. I have to say, I’m impressed. I wish I had kinematic sovereignty over physical objects.”

“What?”

“I wish I had the magical power to lift things with my intentions.”

“Yeah, but you make a killer quesadilla.”

“Still, I couldn’t do anything like what you just did. You’re amazing.”

“Really?”

“Really?” He flashed that megawatt smile again. “Why do you look so surprised that I’m impressed? Don’t people tell you you’re amazing all the time?”

“Um... no. Never. Most of the time they just want me to undo whatever it was that I did to them by accident.”

A look of awe flooded his face. “I predict that’s going to change.”

Holy guacamole, he was looking at her like she was something wonderful. “I hope you’re right about that. I’ve never thought of myself as anything particularly special, except for someone’s special problem type of special. It’s hard to stand out around here. San Buena’s got a lot of talented witches, wizards, and Fae, and just about everything else.”

His posture straightened. “You know that the enchantment community of San Buena is well-respected all over the world, don’t you? The core community of witches and warlocks who went west and settled here are living the magical version of the American dream minus the Early American witch persecutions. I’ve always wanted to come here and check it out.”

“Seriously? I didn’t know that, but I don’t travel much. What am I saying, I haven’t traveled at all.”

“I heard stories about San Buena during my apprenticeship in Oaxaca. It made me homesick. I was so amped when Tio Bruno told me this morning that we’d been called into action and were driving to San Buena.”

“Why don’t you finish this off?” She handed the melting ice cream to him. After the luscious pozole there was no need to overdo the sweets. “You’ve had a long day. You must be exhausted.”

“Yes and no. This is what I trained for all these years, and I was pretty damn excited to meet my power ally.”

Estele pushed away from the table. “You must be so disappointed to get paired with a dud witch like me. You should see what my friend Fredi can do. Nothing is too complicated for her. She can put any situation right.”

“Fredi sounds great, but I’m still glad I got paired with you.” Val looked at her like she was the only person in the world who mattered. He dipped the spoon into the ice cream and took a bite, leaving a smidge of chocolate on his lip.

She reached out to wipe it away, then leaned close and kissed his lips instead. His mouth was soft and responsive. Breathless, he closed his eyes. She flicked her tongue and stole the bit of chocolate from his lips before pulling away. “For a brujo, you’re a pretty nice guy.”

“Just nice?”

“I’m trying to give you a chance. I don’t have many guys in my life.”

His gaze skimmed over her. He smiled with approval. “I find that very hard to believe.”

“Believe it.” She huffed. “Guys don’t stick around. Once they see me do something wacko, they get scared and slink off.”

The look on his face was as earnest as an apologetic preacher. “Do you think you might be scaring them away on purpose?”

She blinked nervously. “Why would I do that?”

“Because you don’t trust them to hang around. It’s easier to chase them away than be surprised or hurt when you get dumped, isn’t it?”

“Whoa, you sound like my mother. I like being in control. If that means I’m alone some of the time—strike that, most of the time—so be it.”

He scooped up the last bit of ice cream from the bottom of the carton and licked the spoon. “You’re lying.”

Why were brujos so infuriatingly stubborn? Crossing her arms over her chest, she squeezed them together so tightly her fingertips tingled from impeded blood flow. “What would you know about it?”

“I’m intuitive.”

“I’m psychic, so I knew you were going to say that.”

“I already know you don’t have a relationship with your brujo father, but what about your mother? You just mentioned her in an antagonizing way. Do you get along with her?”

Meddling mystic, why was he dredging this up? Her personal life was a sticky mess. “My mother, Mara, and I barely talk. From the age of thirteen, my grandmother raised me. At puberty came that magical day when my powers came on hot and hard. My mom said I was starting to act like my dad and she didn’t like it. Things got pretty emotional and crazy, fast. My mother couldn’t handle it, so she dropped me off on my grandmother’s doorstep with a suitcase and hit the gas. I suppose no single mother wants to raise a teenage witch who’s out of control. Tell me, why do you want to know this crap?”

“Because you’re my ally in power, at least for as long as you need me, and you have so much potential.”

“I don’t know about that. I’m a remedial student at the Master Mage Magic Academy and I’m on academic probation.”

Val leaned closer and brushed his hand against hers with gentle, rhythmic strokes. “You’re on probation but you haven’t been kicked out, because I’ll bet there’s someone there who sees your potential too.”

Witch Griselda’s name hovered on her lips, but she stopped herself from saying it. Why drag the poor old gal into this? What did she really know about Val? Sure, he was a nice guy and made scrumptious food, but what if this was a setup? For Circe’s sake, she had an enchanted ruby the size of a baby's fist in her purse. She owed it to the old gal to watch her ass. "We're in my community and my home, and I'm doing all the talking. Why is that? You're the unknown commodity, my caballero friend. I'd rather hear about you. What's your family like?"

"All right. I'm happy to share. My mother is a schoolteacher of American-Irish descent. She's from New Jersey. My father is of Mexican descent, born in Los Angeles. I'm the oldest of three children. I have a sister who is an RN and lives in Colorado. My baby brother is still in college. He'll be proudly joining my father's cosmetic dentistry practice when he graduates with flying colors, because he was born to be a dentist. He loves it in a way I certainly never could. What else do you want to know?"

"Girlfriends?"

"You already asked about that earlier, remember? There are none, and no one recently."

"First love?"

"Really, you want to know that? I was eighteen. It couldn't possibly be of interest to you."

"Wrong." Maybe Mr. Perfect would say something unflattering and she could let go of the crazy idea that was creeping up on her that Val was some sort of ideal boyfriend material. "I would love to hear about it."

"My first love was named Darla. She was the lead guitarist in her own Goth band and went by the name 'Darkla.' Yes, I know it's corny, and she knew it too. She was three years older than me. We met at the Coachella Festival and I followed her around like a puppy. She opened up a whole new world to me of music and art. We got inked together. That was when I began to seriously question if I belonged in my father's dentistry practice or not. Until that spring, that's where I'd been headed. I always knew there was something more, and Darla gave me the confidence to be who I needed to be. We both moved on for the right reasons, but I'll always love her for shaking me up and showing me a different path."

Had she ever been in love so much that her life had changed because of it? No. Was there something missing in her that prevented such a miracle from taking place? Maybe. "What happened to Darla?"

He arched a brow. "Something shocking."

She braced for drama with bated breath. "What?"

"Darla stopped being Darkla. She went back to college to become an investment banker." He shook his head. "I warned you it was shocking. That was at the same time I had committed to apprenticing with my uncle. Darla the banker couldn't see a future with a brujo in training, and that, ladies and gentlemen, is the sound of the other shoe dropping."

"I'm sorry. Was Darla the one?"

"She won't be the last, trust me on that. So far, I've been willing to wait for the real thing. Plus, Tio Bruno forbade me to get involved with anyone during my apprenticeship. He reasoned it would not have been fair to my training or the girlfriend. I believe he had a valid point."

“So there haven’t been that many women in your life?”

His smile crooked to the side. “A few. I’m not a monk.”

“Yes, but you look like a hunk. It really proves first impressions might be wrong.”

“How so?”

“You look like a heartbreaker.”

“So do you.”

“Uh, not really. Nobody falls in love with me, and I’m not the sort who falls in love.”

“Don’t say that.” He reached across the table and smoothed her hair. The gesture seemed so endearing and natural. In that moment, it was easy to believe that he might actually care for her. “You never know what’s going to happen. When you woke up this morning, did you know you’d be asked to fight a malevolent bubble of evil?”

Estele laughed. “No, I didn’t. I shouldn’t be laughing at something like that, should I? I was thinking, if the threat to San Buena is so serious, why aren’t we sounding the alarm? Shouldn’t we be giving our best local witches and warlocks a heads-up about incoming?”

“We will.” Val nodded. “But I want to devise a battle plan first. Tio Bruno told me today was the day to meet my power ally. That was you, of course, a huge step in my life.” He placed his hand on his heart. “As I’m talking to you, I’m getting a better idea of our strengths and weaknesses as a team.”

“I understand that we are a team, but what about everyone else?”

“San Buena’s enchantment community is ready to go. We’re the team leaders. Tio Bruno told me that my ally and I would lead the charge. I’m going to act on that.”

“Good grief.” Her stomach knotted. “What if your uncle’s wrong? I am not team leader material. We gotta call Fredi or Miss Dahlia, anybody, and tell them what’s happening so they can prepare.”

His eyes turned liquid with emotion. “Estele, I’m your protector. You can trust me to have your back.”

“I want to trust you.” She leaned closer. “But I can’t even trust myself. This plan with me as a damn team leader seems outrageously risky. Yes, you have my back, but is it safe to have me at the front?”

By candlelight Val’s face was lit dramatically in a way that showed off his steep cheekbones and lush lashes. “The brujos of Oaxaca have been steady, dependable members of the enchantment community for hundreds of years. With innocent lives at risk, why would they send me here to fail? Estele, there must be something very special about you. This is not an accident. You’re in the right place at the right time, and you’re being called upon to step up and bring your A game. Let me help you accomplish that.”

Wow. She gazed into Val’s beautiful eyes. He almost made sense. Would she be an unprofessional ally if she kissed him again? His mouth looked like cushioned temptation. Seriously, would it do any harm to wrap her arms around his neck and really kiss him just for the hell of it? She pressed closer, a whisper away from his beautiful mouth. “Is this allowed?”

Val's hand settled on her nape, cradling the back of her head. His eyes glistened. "Come closer and I'll show you."

Breathless, she brushed her lips against his.

Captain Manx materialized at Estele's side screaming a frantic warning. "Bonny miss, something wicked has followed me home! We're under attack! I can't hold it off. Batten the portholes and drop below deck!"

The room shook. The candles guttered. A tremendous gust of wind blasted the front door open with a deafening slam! An ominous black tornado blew into the apartment, knocking furniture aside, and took the shape of a giant grasping hand. The hand reached for her purse, and in the tumult the purse toppled to the floor and opened. The ruby pulsed inside, casting crimson light against the wall.

Estele jumped in terror. Holy frijoles! Whatever it was, it wanted the Heart of Hecate. There was no way she would allow failure on her watch. Without thought for her safety, she bolted toward danger, shouting at the smoke beast, "Oh no, you don't, you stinky rotten-egg thing! Get away from my purse!"

The hand turned and reached for Estele's throat, poised to throttle her.

"Oh shit!" She stood frozen to the spot.

"Estele!" Val leaped in front of her. "Get behind me. I'll protect you."

She clung to Val's waist. "What can a food alchemist do? Make it a snack? We need hardcore magic to fight an enchantment this strong."

He flung his arms wide and stared the smoke beast down, like he was staring down a grizzly bear. "I'm your shield. I won't let it near you." Baring his teeth, he snarled, and the beast retreated.

The smoke beast floated into a corner. For a moment it hovered in place, looking like little more than a swirling cloud of sooty particles.

Estele peered from behind Val. "Uh! I've been inside overflowing porta-potties that smelled fresher than that thing's breath. Open a window and shoo that stink bomb out of here."

The smoke beast coiled itself into the shape of a giant snake. Its swirling body circled them, filling the room. The hood of a king cobra appeared, and its forked tongue flicked the air.

"Move!" Estele darted forward, throwing herself in front of Val. "It's getting ready to strike."

Val jumped between Estele and the beast. "Let it! I'm not intimidated."

The cobra swayed back and forth, hissing. Its cavernous jaws opened into a void of unfathomable darkness. Evil laughter that sounded like an ominous cackle from the lowest levels of Hell rolled out of its mouth.

Val blanched. "Okay, now I'm a little intimidated. What are we dealing with? Do you know what this is?"

"No, but I know what to do." Estele dropped to her hands and knees and crept across the floor toward her purse. Once it was within reach, she snatched it and grasped the ruby.

The smoke beast became aware of what she was doing and whirled around the room like a miniature tornado, trying to rip the stone from her hands.

Estele's hair whipped around her face and stung her eyes. Squinting against the fury, she held the Heart of Hecate aloft and shouted, "Whatever you are, I don't want you in my home!" She couldn't remember any Latin but spoke a few words with authority that she thought sounded like it. "Pestis go awayus!"

A low hum shook the air. The pressure in the room changed as if some great cosmic vacuum nozzle had been thrust into the apartment. The smoke beast was sucked away into another dimension, and the terrible smell went with it. The only clue that anything out of the ordinary had happened was the scattered contents of the room.

Estele gaped in shock. "Whoa, I did it! I can't believe it. It's gone. Elvis has left the building. What was that thing?"

Val was stunned. "What did you say to it?"

"Mostly gibberish, but I meant 'pest, leave.' It was sort of the first thing to come to mind."

Val's jaw dropped. "Look at you. You kicked ass and sent the threat packing on your own." He shook his head. "Damn, girl, you don't need a protector after all."

Chapter 8

Val studied Estele's ecstatic expression. She looked like a surprised little kid who had just won a free ride on a pink unicorn. You'd never know she'd just faced down a reeking Hell-wrath monster. Despite her self-doubts, she was a damn fine ally to be partnered with. He thrust his arms out. "That was amazing! Get over here and give me a hug."

Estele squealed and raced toward him. She threw her arms around his neck and clung to him like he was a living tire swing. "I did it! For once I focused and used magic to do something that actually needed to be done!"

She sure did, but what was that gem in her hands? With power like that at her disposal, why had the universe called him and told him she needed his help? Clearly she didn't. Not the sort of all-consuming I'm-going-to-have-to-stay-by-your-side-24/7 protection he had expected to offer. As it was, he was sort of a redundant second stringer. His grip tightened. Estele was soft and smelled sweetly of lavender. One thing was for sure, she felt good in his arms.

Drawing away from him, she gazed into his eyes. "I'm so glad I have a witness or else no one would believe me. This is a first. I need to call Fredi and tell her the news." She reached to the floor for her phone. "Terrific, the screen is cracked. Damn it."

"Hold on." He gently led her toward the couch, sat, and drew her beside him. "Estele, I'm not trying to frighten you, but we should have a plan for when that thing comes back."

Estele shuddered. "Ooo, don't say that. Do you really think that smoke beast is coming back? After all I just—"

Was it wrong to undermine her victory so quickly? He had to be honest even if it stung; their lives and the lives of countless others depended on it. "I do."

She looked pale. "I'll just send it away again."

He reached for her hand that wasn't clutching the glowing red ruby. It looked radioactive. Where the hell had that thing come from? He'd ask about that in a moment, but first he had to make his point. "The smoke beast attacked us at the fairgrounds, it may have been behind the weirdness at the market, and now this. I definitely believe it will be back, and we have to be ready for it when it returns."

"How?" Her gaze traveled furtively around the apartment. "That thing just burst through a front door that has three security latches on it! We don't even know what it is or what it wants."

Val shook his head. "That's not completely true. Estele, it seems to be after you."

She pulled away from him. "Me? Am I getting the blame for that thing? Don't forget, Mr. Del Toro, it took the shape of a bull and charged the car at the fairgrounds."

Estele might have a point, but it seemed unlikely he was the target of that creature's wrath. When compared to Estele, he was small potatoes. "It was confronting me to get to you."

Her jaw dropped. "That's weird logic. Am I the one who smacked a clown on the head with a sea bass? No, that wasn't me. I think this creature, whatever it might be, is pissed at you."

He had to stand his ground even if it did make him look stubborn. "I was protecting you from it, but its focus is you."

She rolled her eyes. "I call brujo bullshit! I don't see it that way."

Oh God, all he'd done was put her on the defensive. What was wrong with him? Maybe he was better with handling food than people. If he wasn't careful, he might spend the rest of his days as a crazy old brujo living alone in a mountain shack. "Estele, don't be offended. Remain calm, and let's look at the facts."

She crossed her arms over her chest, unmoved by his argument. "Your facts or mine?"

Knowing he could come on strong when challenged, he made a concerted effort to soften his tone. "The facts. Our facts." He'd better start with his own opinions and do a damn good job of making his case, because he could clearly see he was losing her attention. "I was sent here as your protector, a shield against danger, ready to sacrifice myself if I had to. By definition that implies I am a lesser player in this drama, looking after someone of greater importance."

Her brows met and her jaw dropped. "Since when am I someone of greater importance? Seriously, are you in the right place?" Estele swallowed hard. Her gaze flicked upward. "You can't be talking about me."

"I'm convinced you are my power ally. I'm here to assist you, not the other way around." He pointed to the ruby pulsing in her hand. "What is that?"

"It's just a stone." Estele shrugged. "That lights up. So what?"

There was an unclouded gemstone with obvious magical properties clutched in her hands, and she was trying to downplay matters with a statement like 'It lights up'? Her feelings against brujos were even worse than he thought. They might even be insurmountable. If he failed here, he failed big and with finality. No second flight with an ally would be offered. This was his only chance. He'd be relegated to the also-ran category, and likely spend his days as an entry-level adept serving a stronger master. The situation had to be turned around. "It lights up? Is that all?" He scoffed. "Is there anything else you'd like to tell me? Please, I'm trying to help you."

"No." Her denial was unpersuasive.

"Estele. I'm here for you. Be honest with me. What's the story behind the stone? I want to know what we're dealing with."

"I can't tell you!" She leapt off the couch, darted into her bedroom, and locked the door.

Damn it. Now he'd frightened her. They were back to square one. He got off the couch, walked to the bedroom door, and knocked. He had to make her see reason. "You were at the fairgrounds. You felt what I felt. We're playing a dicey game of beat the clock. That bubble of evil is getting ready to blow. There's no time to fight. We need to trust each other and come up with a plan."

"You keep saying that!" He heard her pacing on the other side of the door. "What plan? I'm not a planner. How the hell could we devise a plan against being attacked by a smoke beast, anyway? Earth to Val, the world doesn't work that way. Smoke beasts do what they want, whether the rest of us plan for it or not. This is just more evidence that brujos are crazy." She fell silent.

Val hung his head. That certainly didn't go well. Why was he doing so badly with Estele? Maybe he was crazy to think he could sweep into the situation, take control, and have matters go his way. Hell, until a moment ago, he'd even been beginning to believe he might have a chance of winning her over as well. What a victory that would be. It had been so long, and his starving libido loved being close to her. Even if Estele wasn't a witch with power, he'd still want to chase her just because she was a hot little tamale. Estele was powerful, beautiful, and so very skittish. If he wanted to win her trust and maybe more, he'd have to learn to be patient with her and read between the lines.

He spoke softly through a crack in the door. "I'm going to clean up the kitchen. If you don't want to tell me about the stone, you don't have to."

It took all his willpower to pull himself away from the door. He wanted to linger there in case she decided to open it and offer a warm, conciliatory kiss.

He walked to the sink, picked up a flowered sponge, and washed the soup pot. At least she liked his pozole. It was a hit; she'd eaten two full bowls. He wished she liked him. He certainly liked her. Estele was ditzy, but she was also strong. There was no way he could push her around—not that he'd want to. He was just surprised, because his first impression of her had been that she was cute but weak. How nice to be proven wrong.

Staring at the running water, he became mesmerized. Maybe he was sent to be more than her protector? A male protector was a stodgy, old-fashioned idea. Maybe he was her catalyst? The yeast in her bread dough? The cream of tartar in her whipped egg whites? Okay, those were horrible food analogies, but he just might be onto something.

Abruptly, he turned off the water, marched away from the sink, and knocked on the bedroom door. "Estele, how long have you had that stone?"

"I got it today." Her voice cracked.

Had she been crying? He felt like a sod. "And I showed up today too. That can't be a coincidence."

"Val, I can't tell you any more than this. The stone was entrusted to me. If I fuck up, it'll be huge."

"I think I understand something."

"What." She sniffled and blew her nose.

Damn, she had been crying. "I'm not here to protect you from danger. You don't need a shield. I'm here to help you focus. That flashing stone is a red light, an alarm siren. We're ignoring it and we shouldn't. It's calling us to action. The bubble of evil could pop within hours. With you leading me, we'll walk into danger together, kick its ass, and send it on its way."

"How are we going to do that?" She blew her nose again.

He put his ego aside and pulled out all the stops. "I have no idea. Estele, I'm depending on you to step up and tell me what to do."

"I'm supposed to figure this out and tell you what to do?" Estele groaned. "Bad news, brujo. If that's true, we're going to die."

He leaned his shoulder against the door. "I don't want to die, do you?"

"No, not really."

"Then start focusing. What's our next move?"

She huffed a long, exasperated breath. "You're really going to leave me in charge of something this important?"

"Yes." He walked back to the sink and finished cleaning up. God help them, if Estele didn't snap out of I-don't-know-what-I'm-doing mode, they were going to die.

Estele stared at the Heart of Hecate, wishing she knew what the hell she was doing. She rolled the stone in her hand. What had Witch Griselda told her? The Heart of Hecate would help her have clarity? Hadn't Val said something similar about her focusing? Could it be as simple as just asking the stone?

She held the ruby against her lips and whispered, "Is Val telling the truth about the bubble of malevolence?" Their evening flashed before her eyes. She'd seen and felt the weirdness at the fairgrounds. As a lifelong resident of San Buena, she could attest that nothing like that had ever surfaced before. Something strange was afoot. Of course Val was telling the truth; why was she wasting time asking something so obvious?

Rubbing the stone with her thumb, she asked another question. "Is Val trustworthy?" Images of him stepping between her and trouble flooded her thoughts. He had beaten down an aggressive clown for her. Made her favorite homemade soup, and listened to her stories with real interest. Was anyone that good an actor? The stone's steady crimson glow was reassuring.

So Val was trustworthy. Was she? The stone pulsed a little quicker in her hand. Loving thoughts of Grandma Lena poured through her. "Really? I'm trustworthy? Me? Are you sure?" Damn, now she was talking to a rock. "This is serious, don't just say things to be nice." The stone pulsed an even richer shade of red, and for a fleeting moment resembled a beating heart.

Okay, so the ruby was answering questions like a Magic 8 Ball. How cool was that. "So, you want me to trust myself and trust Val, so we can unite to fight evil?"

The gemstone glowed so brightly it lit the room a rosy pink.

“Wow!” Val called from the kitchen. “What’s going on in there? Is everything okay? What’s the colored light show about?”

Clutching the gem, she bit her lip. Dear Goddess, there was so much on the line! How could she trust herself and trust a brujo? Did the universe know how difficult that task would be? She could sooner trust that water could run uphill than the prospect that she might be a force for good in a real emergency and a brujo could be dependable. Still, the Heart of Hecate wouldn’t lie, would it? She rose from the bed and opened the door.

Val stood at the sink, wiping the counters down. He turned and a wavy lock of dark hair slid provocatively over one eye. Something about him reminded her of a big, sleek cat stalking around her kitchen. When his gaze met hers, his lips parted as if he wanted to say something, but he remained silent.

“We need to talk.”

He appeared leery. “I’m listening.”

“Look at us. A dunce of a witch and a slippery brujo.”

His mouth twitched as if he’d taken offense. “I’m not slippery.”

Uh. She was making a mess of this. “I meant brujos in general.”

Setting the sponge on the countertop, he placed his fist on his hip. “I’m not all brujos in general. I’m just me, and you’re certainly not a dunce.”

“I don’t know if fate is enjoying a joke at our expense or if this is some sort of test, but we’ve been paired together and charged with protecting innocent people. Look at me, look at who I am! In which dimension is that not an insane request? Val, I’m so scared that I can’t meet this challenge. The Esposito witches have a pretty lousy rep—”

“Stop.” He moved closer and took Estele’s hand. His big warm hands were callused and felt so sturdy, as if they were strong enough to hold up the world. Rolling up his sleeve, he pointed to his pinup tattoo. “Estele, you were chosen for this task. So many signs point to you. Stop asking why you were chosen to lead the charge and start focusing on our battle strategy.”

Her lips parted in stunned silence. “I’m in charge of a battle strategy? I think we should put you in charge of that.”

He shook his head. “Estele, I’m here to serve you. What is it you need me to do?”

She puffed her cheeks out and gripped the Heart of Hecate in her palm. Looking down at the ruby, she addressed it directly. “What do we do first?”

The ruby pulsed and a purr-like hum followed.

Estele tilted her head, listening. “Did you hear something? Did the gemstone say, ‘Call Tio Bruno and have the truck ready to roll at dawn?’”

Val shook his head. “I didn’t hear anything.”

“I did.” Holding the gem to her ear, she was certain words had been communicated; perhaps not spoken aloud, but telepathically and clear nonetheless. Wow, she couldn't believe it. The gem was talking to her. "Call Tio Bruno. The Brujo Tacos food truck is our Trojan Horse."

His gaze sharpened. "Did the gemstone just tell you that?"

Could it be possible that her powers were becoming more focused? "Maybe? It was like a complete plan just popped into my head. It felt great!"

"And you're sure?"

Looking at the gem, a sense of calm came over her. "Yes, I'm absolutely sure. Wow, this must be what it feels like to be decisive like Fredi."

"Then let's do it." Val reached for his phone and tapped the number. "Tio." He paused and looked apologetic. "I'm sorry, I know it's late. I've made contact and I'm with my ally." A big grin lit his face. "Yes, she's a cutie. Her name is Estele Esposito and she's a witch." He frowned. "Yes, she is one of the Esposito witches. No, I didn't hear about the explosion at the Naval yard." Worry crossed his brow. "An Esposito witch did that? Well, how was I supposed to have known? Yes, I am aware there might be a problem with that. We're at her apartment now. No, I won't get distracted. Listen, we've already been confronted by an evil force at the fairgrounds. Yes, I know the county fair takes place there this week. Listen, we have a plan..." He looked at Estele with trusting expectation on his face, then tapped the screen of his phone. "I've got the phone on speaker. Estele, what do you want Tio Bruno to do first?"

Licking her lips, she launched into her plan. "You're going to load the taco truck up with contra-hexed food and drive it onto the fairgrounds."

Tio Bruno grumbled, "What does contra-hexed mean, exactly?"

Estele's confidence faltered. "I'm not sure."

A moment of silence followed.

"Wait!" A crystal-clear thought burst into her mind. "You and Val are both food wizards, right? What did you call yourselves, alquimistas de sabor?" Hot damn, she'd even remembered a difficult foreign name. This focusing business worked wonders. "You're both really good cooks, awesome actually, but let's be honest, you're enchanting the food. It's just too good. The tamales made people who don't even like each other want to dance! Explain that, will ya? To my line of thinking, if you can enchant the food for positive benefit, you can place a hex-vex-redirect on food to protect people from negative enchantments, right?"

"I'm not following her. Does she think I normally hex the food?" Tio Bruno's words fell into a void of silence.

Val looked bewildered as well. "Estele, we aren't using magic to trick anyone into thinking we serve good food. We really do serve good food. It's called using fresh ingredients."

She threw her hands up. "Well, you must be doing something extra. You're brujos, couldn't you just cast a teeny-weeny protective spell on some salsa or churros?"

"Hold on, I think I know what you want. You mean cast a hex-vex-redirect like the one you placed on the mint patties to counteract that weird Fae's candor spell?"

"Yes! Exactly."

Val exhaled a deep breath. "Okay, I think I know what you're getting at. You want me and Tio Bruno to cast a protective enchantment on the food we serve from the taco truck?"

She nodded. "Yep, and I want you to drive right onto the midway and serve that enchanted food to as many fairgoers and carnies as possible. If they don't buy food from you, offer them a free sample. You saw that strange stupor everyone was in. There's some sort of bad juju hanging over the fairgrounds. Maybe we can use enchanted food to inoculate people from some of the effects of whatever it is that's welling up from beneath the ground."

Tio Bruno finally spoke. "What do we say to everyone? 'Come and get your contra-hexed food here or risk being consumed by evil?' We don't want to frighten everyone or provoke a lawsuit. Wording is so important, so what do we tell people? Getting the public to eat something unfamiliar isn't always as easy as it sounds."

Val's expression became somber. "Tricking people into consuming enchantment isn't ethical. As an alquimista de sabor and licensed food truck operator, I've sworn not to do it."

Estele balked. "And you're looking at me with that probing expression because you suspect I'm unethical enough to slip the public a hex-vex-redirect, even if it is what the doctor ordered?"

The two men remained silent.

What the hell. The Esposito witches already had a terrible reputation for unintended folly; so what if the bad rep got a little worse? "Okay, so I have slipped spells into unwary people's drinks and onto gum in the past. Yes, I did it, but I always meant well."

She picked at her nail polish. It was clear to her that some sort of protective spell had to be cast. An evil force was on the rise and thousands of people would attend opening day of the county fair. "You're right. I would do it. I don't see a more efficient way to protect the public, do you? We can't go the traditional route and close the fair. Even if we did, that evil force will just escape the fairgrounds and run loose in the city. Hell, it's already been to the market, and a smoke beast visited my apartment. It might already be too late!"

"It's not too late," Tio Bruno said with authority. "If it were too late, San Buena would already be exploding with chaos. I'm in a hotel room, across the street from the fairgrounds. From my window, the place is lit like a NASA launchpad, with crews of carnies assembling the rides. It looks like they plan on working through the night. That bubble of malevolence might have sprung a small leak, but the core of evil is still building on this spot. By the way, what's a smoke beast?" He sounded confused.

How would she describe a smoke beast to someone who had never seen one? "It's a gust of sooty, smelly Hell that can shapeshift and grab things. Think of it like a demonic battering ram or a purse snatcher."

"Espantoso! Terrifying." Tio Bruno sounded alarmed. "Valentine, have you seen this smoke beast?"

“Yes, twice. It comes on strong, very intimidating, but Estele was able to chase it off.” Val glanced at Estele, pride on his face.

“Really?” Bruno had to talk loudly over the whirring sounds of an air conditioner in the background. “If the beast flees instead of confronts, it means Estele’s magic must be very strong. Perhaps we have a chance to defeat it after all.”

“Estele, what do you think?” Val gazed into her eyes. His face was filled with admiration. She was so busy enjoying the good vibes he was sending her way that she forgot to answer.

“Estele?” Val asked a second time. “What is our plan? What do you want us to do?”

Plan? Not that again. She snapped out of her daze. “You and Tio Bruno load the truck with the most delectable items you can think of. I’ll cast a hex-vex-redirect on the food and we’ll get it into as many mouths as possible. Does that sound like a plan?”

“We’re only one food truck,” Bruno stressed. “We’re already prepped and I can handle a breakfast run, but we won’t last all day. We’ll need to restock. Valentine, maybe you should get down here and help me out?”

Val appeared leery. “I don’t feel good about that. I can’t leave Estele’s side.”

The windows started to rattle. A horrific groan rose from the pipes. The kitchen sink gurgled ominously. Black bubbles oozed through the drain and the stench of rotten eggs filled the air.

“Holy smoke beast!” Estele saw what was happening. She rushed to the sink, placed a plate over the drain, and pressed down with all her might. “Look who’s invited themselves back.”

Val tossed the phone on the counter and rushed to Estele’s side, adding his weight onto the plate. “We can press down all we want, but I bet this thing just pops up someplace else.”

A scream echoed from the bathroom. “Bonny miss, there’s something unsavory in the tub!” Captain Manx whimpered.

Not her beautiful Zen bathroom! The kitchen was bad enough, but now that stinky thing was slithering around where she stored her toothbrush and makeup. What a sickening thought. “We’ve got to stop this monster. It’s using the plumbing like those horrible pythons that travel from toilet to toilet in tropical hotels.”

Estele cautiously lifted her hand off the plate. “It’s not enough to keep chasing this thing away if it just keeps coming back like a game of whack-a-mole. I have to risk using magic—my magic—to neutralize it. Are you ready for that?”

“I’m backing away.” Val lifted his hands off the plate. “Jeez, that’s a god-awful smell.” A dense black ooze resembling tar bubbled up through the drain. “Do it!”

“I need the stone.” Her gaze searched the countertops for the Heart of Hecate. “Did I lose it? Where the hell did I put it?”

Val pointed to Estele’s hand. “You’re holding it.”

“Oh.” She’d been clutching the stone so hard for so long, she’d forgotten it was in her hand. It had become like a “lost” pair of sunglasses perched on her head. Gazing at the gem, she focused her intent. What did she need to have happen? She needed to feel safe. Surprise attacks from reeking clouds of smoke had to stop. A little alone time with Val without something horrible interrupting them would be nice. She shouted, “Relinquo!” Wow, did I just remember a bit of Latin? Miss Dahlia would be over the moon. “Get your smoky ass out of here!”

Like an octopus pulling its limbs back to center, the smoke slowly withdrew, sank into the drain, and disappeared, taking its pungent aroma with it. Ominous sounds gurgled deep in the pipes, and then nothing.

They waited. Nothing more happened. She threw her arms into the air and cheered. “Did it leave? I think it’s gone! Estele—three. Smoke beast—zero. Hurray!”

Chapter 9

Estele stood stunned, looking around the apartment. The smoke beast was gone. It was too early to know, but she may have actually done something right. How great was that?

Val picked Estele up and spun her in a tight circle. “You did it. You’re amazing!”

It felt great to be held in his arms. How long had she been craving a little praise and real affection from a man? It seemed like her entire life.

She gazed into Val’s eyes. He looked back, a hint of wonder shining there, as if he’d just discovered the greatest secret in the world. He set her down and his embrace softened. It became less of a bear hug and more tender. “Estele, I want to.... I know I shouldn’t....” He stroked the side of her face. “Why fight it?”

His hand slid to her nape and cradled her head as his lips brushed hers. The kiss deepened to something more demanding and far more erotic. He pressed closer and his thigh brushed against hers, parting her legs. His solid body was a thrill to be near. Kissing his wickedly luscious lips couldn’t be completely wrong, could it? Soft and sensual, his mouth explored hers with the gentlest of nips. Damn, this brujo could really kiss. She melted against him, breathless, but he pulled away.

He stepped back. “I shouldn’t have done that.”

“It’s okay.” Her lips tingled where he’d touched her. Was it so wrong to let Val distract her from the issue at hand?

“Hello!” Tio Bruno interrupted them and ruined the mood. “Hello? I’m still on the phone. What happened? Is everyone all right?”

Val released her and reached for his phone. “Tio, everything’s okay. The smoke beast showed up again, but Estele sent it away. Everything looks like it’s under control, at least for now, but I wouldn’t dare leave Estele alone.”

“So, what do I do?” Bruno sounded miffed. “Keep my tamales in a holding pattern?”

“Stay put. Keep an eye on the fairgrounds.”

“What are you going to do?” Bruno said.

Val toyed with the phone’s case. “I’m going to stay close to Estele and do whatever she says needs to be done.” He winked at Estele, turned his back, and continued talking about food preparation on the truck to Bruno.

A giddy flutter of emotion passed through her. This hunk was spending the night, and they'd already crossed that razor-thin line between being interested in each other and showing interest in each other. Brujo or not, she was interested in Val. Maybe dating a brujo would qualify as a study in boundary-expanding experiences, the sort of stuff that was good for the soul?

Captain Manx materialized at her side. His eyes were hollow with terror, his jaw slack.

"Whoa! Why do you do that?" She started and jumped back. No matter how many times she'd seen it happen, it always startled her when the captain appeared without warning. "Captain, what's wrong?"

With a wave of his hand, he coaxed her away from Val. "Miss, I'm as scared as a cat up the mast in a howling cyclone." He turned to face her with his eyes bulging. "I usually don't give in to timorousness, not like this." He offered a trembling hand as proof of his claim. "For the most part, the after-realm keeps me numbed as frostbitten fingers on a polar-bound schooner. But that thing in the bathtub...." His lip quivered and he looked as if he might burst into tears. "That thing was...."

"Was what?" She tried to calm him, but the captain was incorporeal and hugging him was impossible. Using her softest voice, she hoped to comfort him. "Tell me what's wrong. You're not alone in this. It frightened me too."

The captain wrung his hands. "It tried to probe my mind and find out what frightened me most. At first I was cavalier, thinking, 'I'm dead, it can't possibly frighten me,' but it did!"

"How?"

"The smoke beast made me remember my worst memories, or I started to remember but it was too painful, so I fought it. A terrible feeling that I'd met something like this entity before overwhelmed me. The smoke didn't talk, but it planted the idea in my head that it had a brother that badly wanted something from me, and that I must remember it. That's when I screamed."

"Oh, Captain, that sounds horrible. I'm so sorry."

The captain appeared bashful. "I have a tremendous favor to ask, miss."

What time was it? She hadn't even glanced at a clock in ages, but it had to be late. "Please, not another trip to the liquor store. Buying booze at this time of night looks really bad."

"I'm unconcerned with intoxicating libations, miss. At the moment, I find myself in dire need of being close to the living. In plain speak, I wish to sleep in your bed."

"My bed?" she answered breathlessly. "Where will I sleep?"

"Ideally, beside me."

She was hoping for something a little more exciting involving Val. "Captain, no! That won't work."

"There's nothing improper about it. In the strictest sense, I'm a ghost and I don't even sleep."

"That's part of the problem. What are you going to do, just lie beside me, propped on your elbow, staring? That's just too creepy."

"Please, miss. I cannot bear to be alone now. You're perfectly safe with me. In the vernacular of the day, it won't get weird. You have my word as a ward of the sea."

She shook her head. "Captain, your shirt's unbuttoned and you smell like seaweed. It's already weird."

Clicking off his phone, Val thrust it into his back pocket. "Estele!" He walked toward his duffel bag, unzipped it, and took out a sleeping roll. "It's after midnight. I have to meet Tio Bruno at 5:00 a.m. We'd better get some sleep."

Her mood sank. "Meet your uncle at 5:00 a.m.? But I go jogging at six."

"Where do you jog?"

"Along the sea cliffs and around Cemetery Park."

A defiant expression lit his eyes. "With demonic forces tracking your every movement? That doesn't sound very safe. Considering the situation, I insist you skip tomorrow's run."

No jogging? Her morning run wasn't just exercise, it was a decompression device. "Why skip it? It clears my head, and believe me, my head needs clearing."

Val rubbed his chin. "If I walk around the fairgrounds at 5:00 a.m. by myself, I'll be alerting the smoke beast that you're up here alone or waiting to be pushed over the side of a cliff or something awful. You'll be safer if you come with me."

She glanced at the captain's shadow drifting across the room. "Technically speaking, I'm never completely alone."

Within a shimmering mist, Captain Manx materialized beside Val. "Don't leave me here by myself! Let's keep the crew together. In the morning, I'll go with you and help protect our wee lass."

"Guys, hold on a minute!" She lifted her hands in a signal for silence. "So far, I've been doing a damn fine job of protecting myself! I ran the smoke beast off twice. Do I get credit for that? No."

Val looked her in the eye. "I'll give you credit. Estele, you're doing a great job, but recreational jogging along the sea cliffs and the cemetery is too big a risk. I can't allow you to place yourself in excessive danger. I wouldn't be much of a protector if I did." He pushed the bedroom door open, entered, and unfurled a sleeping bag. Laying the bag on the floor at the foot of her bed, he unzipped the side. "I'll sleep here, between you and the door."

He was going to sleep at the foot of her bed? Yum! He was like a territorial tiger in heat, and he'd looked all worked-up and fiery-eyed when he'd spoken.

The captain pulled the sheets down on the bed. "And I'll slip between the linens."

Val's mouth gaped in shock. "What? No. Captain, you're not sleeping here with us."

The captain leaped beneath the covers. "I am. I've already discussed matters with Miss Estele."

The look on Val's face was priceless. "Is that true? When did this happen? I thought it was clear that I was your protector? Tell me what's going on."

Tugging the bedcovers over his head, the captain rolled onto his side. "I asked first, lad. Best not to be a sore loser. I'll take second watch. Until then, tie off the helm and steer toward the morning star. May you have fair weather and clear skies in dreamland!"

“Estele.” Val addressed her with a stern tone. “For God’s sake, kick that guy out of your bed.”

She glanced at the captain, who was pretending to doze and looked peaceful. “He’s scared. Let him stay.” She motioned for Val to follow her into the living room and pointed at a long L-shaped couch. “I’ll get some blankets and we can sleep out here.”

He looked hopeful. “Just you and me?”

“Of course.” Even if they did have to be out the door at 5:00 a.m., it might be fun to spend a little time cuddling on the couch and kissing away the brooding pout from his gorgeous lips. “I’ll get us some bedding.”

The moment she turned to get blankets from the bedroom, she bumped into Captain Manx.

The captain’s arms were heaped high with sheets and comforters. “So, the slumber party is moving out here? Very well. Shall we partake of a little talky-box for amusement?”

Disappointment flooded Val’s face. “Talky-box? I’m afraid to ask.”

“Manxie means television.” Estele took hold of the blankets. How did the captain lift things in an incorporeal state? Sometimes he seemed to have way more influence over the physical world than he should, and defied the physics of metaphysics.

“To be specific, I crave amusement from Mr. Jimmy Kimmel.” The captain chuckled as he sat on the couch and waited for Estele to turn on the TV with the same intense interest with which a cat waits by the can opener when a can of tuna is removed from the cupboard. “I just adore late-night talky-box. Especially those obsessive programs, where people go on and on about some clever gadget. What are those called?”

“Infomercials.” She filled in the blank for the captain.

“Infomercials! That’s right. I love those. Why purchase just one of something you don’t really need when you can have two and pay shipping twice! By the way, miss, I meant to ask for your credit card number. I’d like to—”

“No, Captain. Absolutely not.” She wrapped a blanket around herself.

“But, miss, I saw a plastic contraption that goes from freezer to microwave and you can use it to hard-boil eggs and slice them into juliennes strips or spirals and dump them on top of your children’s breakfast cereal to create fast, inexpensive, high-protein breakfasts.”

“Captain, you don’t eat eggs—you can’t eat anything. I don’t have any children. We don’t need it.”

“Very well, miss. I say the EggMeister was tempting. It looked like it could turn our lives around. Did I mention you could use it to make plain hard-boiled eggs into a brunch-crowd-pleasing decorative tulip bouquet? With the handy EggMeister attachment, plain hard-boiled eggs can be transformed into lifelike flowers. Everyone will gather round and marvel—”

“Enough! Stop the sales pitch. I wish you’d quit watching those infomercials, you’re far too suggestible.” She crossed the room. “I’m going to get ready for bed and pretend that I have a chance of getting a couple hours of sleep tonight.”

“I agree.” Val turned off the television and the lights. “We have a battle on the horizon, and any rest we can get is essential.” He spread a blanket on the longest section of the couch, kicked off his boots, unbuttoned his shirt, and stripped down to a white tank. Moonlight washed his coppery skin. “I’m going to sleep.” He patted the couch, indicating she should join him. “Estele, stay close so I can protect you.”

Estele looked Val over. He was such a nice guy, and his broad shoulders and lean abs were easy on the eyes. She was tempted to jump straight into his arms, but best to give herself a moment to cool off and think. “I’m not trying to be a tease, but I actually do need to change into something more comfortable.” She pointed to her high heels. “I’ll be right back.”

She slipped into the bedroom and unfastened her dress. It seemed like ages since she had put it on and gone to the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge. She unbuckled the cherry-topped high heels. Once her feet were released, she sighed with relief.

Tomorrow she would have to wear sensible shoes to make up for the hours in toe-pinching heels. After putting everything where it needed to be, she searched through a dresser drawer and found a lightweight velour pullover and jogging pants she used as pajamas. She often slept in her jogging clothes and went straight out the door in the morning.

Looking at her empty bed, the thought occurred that she could just climb in alone and hope the captain didn’t surprise her with his presence in the predawn hours, but what about Val? He’d offered to “protect” her, but did he expect her to curl up on the short end of the sectional or at his side? Was flirting with a brujo playing with fire? Maybe it was, but stoking the flames was proving impossible to resist.

She exited the bedroom. The living room was dark except for a slice of moonlight that bisected the floor. Val lay stretched on the couch. He had made a cozy bed for himself by folding blankets and using them as pillows, an extra blanket on top. His eyes glistened and he had a slight smile on his lips as he lifted the edge of the blanket and beckoned her to join him. “Come here. I want to talk for a minute.”

Did he really want to talk?

The warmth in his eyes was genuine, so she went to him. Was there a way through her initial bad feeling against brujos? Could she learn to see Val as his own man and not constantly hear her mother’s bitter ranting about brujos echoing in the back of her mind? After all, she didn’t get along that great with her mother....

He drew her beside him and cradled her in the crook of his arm. “See? There’s plenty of room on this couch for both of us.”

She pressed her cheek against his chest, smelling the faintest hint of musk.

He lifted her face to his and kissed her lips. “Are you scared?”

“To kiss you? No.”

“I meant about tomorrow.”

Was she scared? Oddly, she had no fear for her own safety. “I’m scared my wacko style of magic might hurt someone else. I live in dread of it, actually.”

Smoothing her hair with his palm, he drew her closer. “Why?”

“Why? Gosh, you don’t know me very well. The enchantment community of San Buena knows me as ‘batshit wacky Estele.’ The few people who actually like me call me ‘Estele I-meant-to-do-well Esposito.’”

“I think you’re being too hard on yourself.” His voice was rich and reverberated deep in his chest like the purr of a lion.

“I’m not. Trust me, I’ve earned my bad rep.”

“But you’re so powerful. You sent the smoke beast fleeing. When did all this start?”

Val thought she was powerful? Burrowing her face against his chest, she smiled. “When did what start?”

He said it slowly as if he were a head juror pronouncing a final verdict in court. “Your iffy relationship to your own magical powers.”

Was he kidding? “I was born into it. The Esposito witches are walking disasters waiting to happen.”

His arms locked around her as if he feared she might flee. “I’m not asking about your family, I’m asking about you.”

She paused. Was there a difference? Her life had been defined by cautionary tales, such as the one about her great-aunt Gerty screwing up morale spells during the Great Depression, thus making it even more depressing. Even her own mother had eagerly pointed out her smallest mistakes from the youngest age as proof their bloodline was cursed. “I’ve always had an iffy relationship with magic. My mother told me it’s because I was born of bad blood.”

He shook his head. “Bad blood? What does that even mean?”

“You know, I’m the unfortunate offspring of a floundering Esposito witch and a—pardon me for using my mother’s own words—‘deadbeat brujo father.’ Not a stellar pedigree.”

“Do you have any sort of relationship with your father?”

Estele flopped onto her back. “No! It was just like those terrible hard-luck stories you hear all the time. He went to the store to buy milk and never returned. I don’t even remember the guy. Granted, my mother is hard to live with, but he was a total bastard for just leaving us and never saying anything.”

Val tenderly kissed her cheek and then the tip of her nose. His touch was gentle and conveyed so much. “I’m so sorry. I can imagine that not having a father left a big hole in your life.”

A freaking bottomless pit was more like it. If her father had stayed and her mother hadn’t been so bitter, would she be a better person, more grounded and less dangerous to the general public? Probably. What would it have been like to grow up with a trustworthy man in her life who she could have leaned on and learned from? Lying beside Val, her heart ached in a strange way, as if she’d never felt it stretched so far. Why couldn’t she be someone worth loving and coming back for? It physically hurt to even breathe, so she remained silent as the moments ticked past.

“Are you okay?” He sounded concerned. “You got pretty quiet.”

Did she even want to talk about it? Could she open up to Val and tell him the truth without scaring him away and making herself look even more damaged? It hadn’t worked with anyone else. Maybe she was deluding herself into believing Val might be something special.

Oh, what the hell, she’d never know unless she tried. “When I was little, especially on a birthday or holiday, I’d play a game with myself. I’d look at the door and say, ‘Any minute now, Dad’s walking through that door, and when he does, he’s going to bring me all kinds of gifts. He’s going to tell me he loves me, he’s going to make up with my mother, and it’s going to be okay. We’re going to have enough for rent and we’re going to stop fighting because Mom won’t be unhappy anymore. Like magic, everything will get better.’ He was the missing piece of my childhood and the reason why my mom and I fought so much. At least that’s what I thought when I was a kid. Later, in my teens, when my magical powers got out of control, my mother tried to shut them down with terse comments about how ‘strong’ and ‘arrogant’ my style of magic was becoming. She’d shame me by saying I was beginning to behave just like my dad.”

He drew a tense breath. “And you don’t trust your father, yourself, your mother, or the strength of your own powers? I think I’m beginning to understand the issues here. So, who do you trust?” His voice tensed and he sounded more affected by her story than she was.

It had been so long since she’d told anyone this much about her. Tears welled in her eyes. She wiped her sleeve against her lashes. If she wasn’t careful, she’d be ugly crying in no time. “I trust my best friend, Fredi. She’s a crazy-talented witch and I wish she was my real sister. Without meaning to, I’ve done bad things to her, but she forgave me.”

“What bad-d—” He seemed to stumble over his words. “—bad things did you do to her?”

“I cast some bad magic. But we got past it.”

“Is she all right?”

“Yes. My spell didn’t last more than a few hours. In the end it worked out well. Fredi met her boyfriend, Gus, while under the enchantment I cast, so there was a silver lining.”

He stroked her arm with a broad, warm hand. “Who else do you trust?”

“Miss Dahlia, at the Master Mage Magic Academy, is super patient with me. I make a lot of mistakes and she helps me plow through the solutions one at a time. She’s a practical witch, very hands-on. I also trust Witch Griselda. She’s ancient, and a bit doddering, but she still has it! She’s a freaking force of nature. Oh, you’ll like this! Way back when, she dated a brujo.”

“Really?” He couldn’t hide his excitement at hearing about a fellow brujo. “How did that work out for her?”

“Grissy said she was nuts about him, even hoped to marry him, but it didn’t happen. Old Griselda didn’t say so, but I got a big psychic hit that her old beau died in the Mexican Revolution. I don’t think she ever found anyone else she loved as much.”

He pulled her close to his chest. “So not everyone in the San Buena enchantment community is antibrujo?”

“Far from it. I don’t want to be anti-anyone. I’m sorry I was so rude to you earlier tonight. ‘Brujo’ is a trigger word for me, and now you know why I was so reluctant to work with one.”

He kissed the top of her head. “We’re talking and things are better. All is forgiven. Besides, you don’t have to work with me forever. We just have to get along until the bubble of malevolence is under control.”

Even though they had just met, the thought that all this, the closeness, the candidness, was just a temporary thing stung. In her heart of hearts, she could see herself falling for Val big-time. “When we’re finished doing whatever it is we need to do, what’s next? Where will you go after this?”

“I have no idea. I suppose fate will guide me where I need to go.”

Maybe brujos were like tomcats, born to wander through life acting like nobody owned them. “Have taco truck, will travel?”

He laughed. “Something like that.”

“Your food’s really good, and I’ll bet you’re an excellent brujo.”

“Thank you.” He held her closer. The look in his eyes was pure tenderness. “Estele.”

“Yes.”

“Do you know who else you can trust?”

“Who?”

“Me.” His gaze sought hers. “You can trust me. I won’t let you down. I have your back. I’d die before abandoning my ally in battle.”

She brushed her fingertips along the gritty stubble on his jaw. “I wouldn’t expect you to die for me.”

His face remained calm and looked completely sincere. “But I would, if it served the situation best. As your protector, I’m pledged to do it.”

“Brujos are an intense bunch, aren’t you?” Leaning closer, she kissed his lips. The first touch barely made contact. It was more of a warm breath skimming his lips than a kiss. The second was bolder; her mouth caressed his and heat bloomed between them. Her breasts brushed his chest and she melted against him.

Val pulled away. “Estele, if we start, I won’t want to stop.”

Her voice dropped to a provocative whisper. “Why would we need to stop?”

He looked into her eyes. “Because we just met and I need to focus on keeping you safe while we battle or neutralize whatever it is that we’ll be facing at the fairgrounds in a few hours.”

Had she badly misunderstood his intentions? Was he gently but firmly letting her down. Her mouth went dry.

“Don’t think I’m not tempted.” He grazed his fingertips against her cheek and his brows sank into a more serious expression. “I am, but I’m not a fool either. I think you’re someone special and worth waiting for.”

Did he mean it, or was he just more polite than some of the other guys who had used her once and then let her down? Reaching for one of the comforters, she sat. “Should I sleep on the small couch and give you a little room?” As she scooted away, she longed to be back in his arms.

“I’ll sleep beside you!” Captain Manx materialized in the exact spot Estele had been lying in, curled up like a kitten against Val’s chest. “I’m terrified of the creature’s return.”

“Oh no!” Val turned over and faced the couch.

She rolled her eyes. Of course the captain had been hanging around, listening to everything and waiting to take her spot beside Val. What had led her to believe she’d be allowed a little privacy in her own home?

Clutching a comforter, she moved to the foot of the L. “I’d say good night to everybody, but I don’t think we’re going to get much sleep.”

Soon the Captain and Val were softly snoring. With her purse strap wrapped around her wrist and the Heart of Hecate securely zipped inside, she lay awake staring up at the ceiling and watched a slice of moonlight cross the room.

Chapter 10

Estele woke with a strong hand on her arm, gently shaking her. The purse that was wrapped around her wrists shifted, and she drew it protectively against her chest and held it like a precious newborn. Under no circumstances could she lose the Heart of Hecate that Witch Griselda had solemnly entrusted to her.

“Estele,” Val whispered. “We have to get going.”

Her eyes felt like they’d been glued shut with sleepy sand, but she pried them open. “Am I dreaming, or do I smell coffee?”

“I’m brewing it now.” He smiled, and his eyes fanned in an attractive way.

Rising on her elbows, she glanced out the window. The ocean and sky were dark and almost blended into one another. The lights at the fairgrounds blazed bright. “What time is it? Did we sleep at all, or oversleep an entire day? What’s going on?”

“It’s 4:25 a.m. You slept a little. I heard you. I had the captain snuggling with me, so I didn’t sleep much. How do you take your coffee?”

“So sweet.” She gazed into his lustrous brown eyes. Someone had made her coffee? How wonderful was that? That sort of thing never happened with the guys she usually dated.

He rose and walked into the kitchen. “I’m just trying to soften the blow of an early morning wake-up call.” Opening a cupboard, he removed two mugs, picked up the coffeepot, filled each, and added a couple heaping spoonfuls of sugar to her cup.

Estele winced when she saw how much sugar Val stirred into her coffee. She liked her coffee black, straight-up. When she’d said “sweet,” she’d meant “How sweet that you made me coffee.” Oh well, she’d drink it anyway. When would she learn to be more precise with her words?

He handed the sugary mug to her. “We can get breakfast off the truck. Are you okay with burritos?”

“Burritos are great.” She thought the words through. This time, had she said something wrong or anything that could possibly be misconstrued or cause magic to go awry? No, she had not. She sipped the coffee, then stopped. It was syrupy. She tried not to frown as she rose from the couch and walked into the kitchen. “I think I’m going to dilute this a little.”

Val paced around the apartment, gathering things he needed for the day and sipping his coffee. He was already dressed in dark cargo jeans and a hoodie, but even in such casual clothing he still looked as sleek as a black jaguar. He glanced at her. “Pack a bag for the day. Bring anything you think you’ll need. We might not make it back.”

“Might not make it back? That sounds ominous.”

Setting his coffee mug on the countertop, he stopped pacing. “Estele, we don’t know exactly what we’ll be facing down there, but from what we’ve already seen, expect it to be big. Once we’re engaged in battle, there’s no retreat and no time-outs. Bring your entire magic kit, potions, Wiccan charms, a change of clothes, and a phone charger—whatever you need to get the job done. You’re this team’s heavy hitter and I’m here to help you.”

Suffering Circe, this was staring to get a little scary.

Val stepped closer and his hand brushed her cheek. “You look overwhelmed. Don’t be.” He tugged on his sleeve and pointed to his pinup girl tattoo. “Remember, fate’s picked you as our best champion against evil, and I’m here to support you. You’re not walking into this alone.”

“You seem to have so much faith in me.” Inside, she cringed. How many times had she cast a spell only to watch it swerve into a ditch and implode? “What if I can’t deliver and the bubble of malevolence pops and kills innocent people? What then? If I let others down, I won’t be able to live with myself.”

He picked up his coffee mug and drained it. “If you don’t try, you won’t be able to live with yourself either.” Gathering his culinary knives, he carefully slipped the cutlery into their proper leather slots, rolled the kit up, and placed it in his duffel bag.

“Are we bringing knives to a gunfight? I’m not feeling the least bit prepared for this.”

“This isn’t a gunfight, it’s a firefight—a Wiccan-fire fight. The bubble of malevolence can’t be shot, stabbed, or chased away with a warning. Real action is going to have to be taken. From what you’ve told me, your style of magic is very unpredictable. From what I’ve seen, you are also very powerful. That’s a potent combination. I think whatever is lurking down there in the fairgrounds should be afraid of you.”

Wow, could that all be true? And he looked like such a sexy mutha when he said it. “Really? You think so?”

A bright smile lit his face. “Yes, really.” With a shooing motion, he pointed her toward her room. “Get ready. We should leave in ten minutes.”

Still high on his praise and clutching her coffee mug, she careened toward her bedroom. “Wish I knew what I needed to battle a bubble of malevolence.”

“I would start with casual clothes and shoes you can walk—preferably run—in. Magical tools, crystals, wands, philters—whatever helps you focus—and bring the ruby. The smoke beast seems obsessed with it.”

A shiver traveled over her skin. There was no way she would leave the stone behind or even let it out of her sight, but was she being a fool to blindly trust Val’s judgment? His intentions were good, but could they be hand-delivering the Heart of Hecate to Goddess-knew-what was waiting for her at the Oceanside fairgrounds? A sense of paranoia gnawed at her. “You’re not even supposed to know about the ruby.”

“But I do.” His gaze narrowed. “What’s wrong? You’re looking at me like I grew a third eye.”

“Nothing.” She entered her bedroom and shut the door. The moment she was alone, she unzipped the purse and looked inside. The ruby was safe, sitting in a change pocket. Compared to yesterday, its glow was faint, as if it were resting or conserving energy. She reached into her purse and petted the stone. “Good morning. I’m happy to see you.” A burst of crimson lit the interior of her purse. “Nice stone.” She stroked it like a cat. “We’re going to have a great day, aren’t we?” “How are you doing in there?” Val’s voice floated through the door. “Is there anything else I can do for you?”

“I’ll just be a few minutes.” What the hell did one wear to do battle with evil? Staring at her closet and chest of drawers, she drew a blank until the stone sent a telepathic suggestion: combat boots. She reached for her Doc Martins. “That makes sense.”

“What makes sense?” Val sounded confused.

“Never mind. I’m just talking to myself and a rock.”

“Okay.” He still sounded confused. “I’ll start loading the car, all right?”

“Good idea.” She turned toward her dresser and starting flinging drawers open.

Captain Manx materialized beside her. “Where are we going, miss?”

She flinched. “Not ‘we’—me. I’m headed someplace that you won’t want to go—to the fairgrounds.”

The captain appeared crestfallen. “The fairgrounds?” He bit his lip. “I suppose the hearty young lad is going with you?”

“Yes, we have to go. I’m sure you’ve eavesdropped on us enough to know why.”

“I do know, and I wish to accompany you. Who knows, against all odds I might be of use.”

“Captain, I’m not sure what you could do except haunt the rides and startle mortals, and I have a bad feeling enough of that will be going on already. Besides, the fairgrounds are built on what used to be San Buena’s docks.”

He hung his head and brushed his fingertips against a few wisps of white hair on his semibare chest. “I’m well aware of that fact, miss, and I insist on accompanying you regardless.”

“Won’t being at—” How could she be delicate in saying this? “—ground zero be troubling for you?”

“Ground zero?” The captain appeared blank. “I’m not following your drift.”

“The docks, aka Oceanside Fairgrounds, are the last place your ship was in one piece before it was —”

“I know that, and I’ve scrupulously avoided the area for over a hundred years.”

“Aren’t you afraid going to the fairgrounds might trigger bad memories for you? That’s what you’ve always told me. What if you run into the ghosts of your former shipmates?”

He placed his hands over ears and hummed loudly. “Let’s not discuss that topic. La, la, la, la, I can’t hear you!”

“What do you mean, don’t discuss it? If you think you’re coming with me, especially today, we have to discuss it. To be frank, I’m going to have my hands full. I won’t be able to babysit you.”

Indignation showed on his face. “Do I ever ask you to ‘babysit’ me? I’ve never asked for, nor needed a baby to sit on me. That term sounds quite degrading.”

“Babysitting means something else.” The poor captain sometimes got modern terms terribly wrong. “I don’t mean it as an insult, but you are high maintenance. How often am I downtown on some ill-advised errand looking for a suitable laudanum substitute or some exotic Tonka-bean-infused liquor because you won’t go there yourself to sniff the bottle or fondle the packaging to get an imaginary contact high? Captain, your entire rationale for never leaving the house on the hill or straying beyond Cemetery Park was because you were afraid to go to the waterfront or anywhere near the shipyard and be confronted by the ghosts of your crew or whatever it was that terrified you so badly in life. I don’t get it. They were your crew, your peers. What are you afraid is going to happen? All of you are long dead. You should have so much in common.”

He threw his hands high. “I’m ready to do it today! I shall go to the docks, come what may.”

“Fairgrounds,” she corrected him. “Really? After putting it off for over a century, you’re ready to do it today of all days? I have to warn you, there’s nothing there that you would recognize. The shipyards were paved over twenty years ago. The wooden docks are gone and the harbor has high-rise hotels on it.”

“Nonetheless, I shall go with you.”

Her heart sank. This could get complicated. “That’s fine, but what changed? If you do decide to join us, you have to look after yourself. A bubble of malevolence is getting ready to blow and I can’t afford any distractions.”

“If you must know, miss, I feel called to do it.”

This should be interesting. Who called? “All right, but make it quick. In a minute Val will return and I’m not even close to being ready.”

“My encounter with the smoke c-creature,” the captain stuttered, “was quite an alarming experience. I sensed that it wanted to probe my memories for the most disturbing items it could find and feed upon them.”

“Why?”

His gaze was blank. “So it could grow stronger. I got an undeniable sense that it feeds on fear, insecurities, and doubt.”

“No shit.” A sinking feeling gripped her. “Insecurities and doubt? I’ll need to be extra careful considering I’m sort of the queen of both.”

The captain wrung his hands. “I heartily disagree. You were admirably courageous in confronting the monster and driving it away. You didn’t let it get the better of you the way it frightened me.” He looked at her with pleading eyes. “I’m tired of being so timorous. Despite pretending to be a bluff-talking captain, I spent my life full of self-doubt and regret, and now I’ve carried it all into the afterlife. This should have ended long ago.”

“What should have ended?”

“My existence in this realm.” His expression was pained. The lines on his face appeared deeper than ever. “I don’t belong here. I’ve put it off long enough. I must go with you to the docks and face what I must.”

“It’s fairgrounds now, remember? There won’t be any ships there.”

“The smoke beast will be there. That’s all I need to face.”

The front door opened and heavy footsteps entered the apartment. “Estele!” Val called from the living room. “Are you ready?”

Estele glanced down at her fuzzy sleepwear-slash-jogging outfit. Did she really want to spend what might be the most challenging day of her life dressed like a two-year-old ready for their naptime?

“Miss?” The captain waved his hands to get her attention and pointed toward the bed. “I’ve taken the liberty of selecting an appropriate outfit for you to battle demons in.”

She walked toward the bed. A pair of jeans, a T-shirt, and a safari jacket with lots of pockets were set out on the bed. “Thank you, Captain. When did you do this?”

“I set the clothing out last night. I had to do something helpful. You’ll find the pockets have been stocked with useful articles like a travel toothbrush, lip balms, coins of the realm—”

“Coins of the realm? Where did you get these items?” That sneaky old dog. “You went through my purse while I was asleep, didn’t you?”

He looked guilty. “I’m afraid I did, miss.”

“I thought the ruby made you nervous? Why would you even look in my purse?”

The captain’s eyes bulged like a fish. “It called to me.”

“It called to you, so you went into a lady’s handbag and rooted around? Whatever happened to personal boundaries? Am I not allowed any privacy?”

“I’m so sorry, miss. I knew it was wrong but I was frightened. You and the lad were out like lights. I saw the gem pulsing inside your purse, a bit of rosy light escaping the seams. To these old eyes, it was as comforting as the pink glow of dawn on the day you sight land, so I crept closer—”

“How close?”

“A polite distance, but I did unzip the purse and look inside. And you’ll never guess what happened—”

“Estele!” Val stomped around the living room. “We need to leave. I have to help Bruno get ready for the breakfast run.”

“I’m getting dressed now!” She motioned for the captain to turn around. “Captain, finish what you were saying and don’t peek.”

“It was the strangest thing. First, I thought the stone was talking to me, but it wasn’t. It was more like it was speaking directly to my thoughts.”

Tugging the jersey over her head, she cast it aside and reached for a sport bra. Where did I set the deodorant? “Yes, I know what you mean. I had the same experience too. It was like the stone helped me to organize my thoughts and make a decision. Witch Griselda said it brings clarity.”

“A clear decision! That’s exactly it, miss! I dared to touch the ruby and I did experience an uncomfortable moment of self-examination—”

She pulled the T-shirt over her head with lightning speed for fear the captain would turn, peering over her shoulder to make sure he didn’t. “Self-examination? Oh, please don’t let this get gross.”

The captain remained facing away. “Perhaps self-reflection is a better term. The stone captivated me and I was forced—more like gently compelled, really—to confront my many follies and my part in them. I’ve been avoiding doing this for such a long while, but I believe now that walking, or in my case floating, to the docks—”

“To the fairgrounds.” Sorting through a drawer, she wondered if she even owned a matched pair of socks. Could she dare risk witching two unmatched socks into a pair, or would that be asking for trouble? At least she had clean underwear.

“Fairgrounds. Yes, of course. Going there is the right thing to do. I must face my fears and ask forgiveness of my shipmates.”

She stepped into her pants and tugged them up her legs. “Forgiveness for what?”

He cocked his head. “I’m not sure exactly. It’s been so long, I don’t remember the details.”

“Or don’t want to remember.”

“True. They don’t put people in asylums just because they’re a bit forgetful, do they? I must have done something regrettable and blocked it out, but I feel like the clouds are parting and I’m going to remember very soon what I did, and then I’ll be able to let it go.”

Knuckles rapped on the door. “Estele. We should have left already.”

“Almost ready!” Jeez, it was still black as night out there. She reached for the safari jacket. It weighed a ton. “There’s more than lip balm in here. Captain, what did you put in these pockets, lead slugs?”

“A few needful things, miss.”

Deciding to wear mismatched socks, she slipped into her Doc Martins and laced them up. The moment she was dressed, she burst out of the bedroom, darted into the bathroom, and shut the door.

Val groaned. “Estele, what are you doing?”

“Hold on! Five minutes. I have to pull myself together.” She had to brush her teeth. Bubble of malevolence or not, she wasn’t going to leave the house with coffee breath. “Oh, by the way, Captain Manx will be accompanying us.”

“What did you say?” He stepped closer to the door. “This is serious. We can’t get sidetracked. If the captain comes with us, he’s on his own, okay?”

She looked over her shoulder. Thankfully the captain hadn't crowded into the bathroom with her. Accomplishing what she could in as little time as possible, she combed her hair into a ponytail and swiped on a coat of cheery peach lipstick. Swooping her fringed handbag over her head, she secured it at her side with her arm locked against it. A glance in the mirror revealed that she didn't look like a demon hunter so much as a Banana Republic ad. Unzipping the purse, she looked at the stone, which gave off a faint red glow. "How are you doing in there? Are you ready for today?"

The ruby pulsed. The words never abandoned popped into her mind. What did that mean? Was the Heart of Hecate scared she might abandon or lose it? She spoke directly to the stone. "Never abandoned? Don't worry, I'll be very careful with you and make sure you get back to your rightful owner."

With a burst of bright pink light, the ruby steadily glowed. He'll always be your protector entered her mind.

She spoke into her purse. "Who's 'he'? Val? I know part of your power is the ability to grant clarity, but I sure wish you could be a little clearer with me."

"Estele." Val stood outside the door. "Are you talking to me? If you were, I didn't quite hear what you said."

"No, Val, I'm just talking to myself." She zipped her purse and exited the bathroom. "I guess I'm ready."

Val's gaze skimmed over her. He looked surprised. "A purse, that's it? Are you sure you have everything you'll need?"

How could she answer that? Her chaotic style of magic had never been dependent on traditional Wiccan tools, charms, or anything solid. She tended to wing it, making up incantations as she went. Most of the time that lack of formality was what caused the biggest problems. "What were you expecting me to bring, a jeweled skull and a lightsaber?" She had her "protector" and the Heart of Hecate and that was all she needed. "We're good."

Offering his hand, he smiled. "Let's go."

"Very good! I'm ready too!" Captain Manx took Val's hand. "Off we go."

Estele tapped the captain's shoulder. "Where did you get that harpoon, and is it really coming with us in the car?"

The captain clutched the weapon. "I've had it for ages. I'll just hold it between my knees in the back seat, unless someone objects."

"Have you seen how small the back seat of my car is?"

A matter-of-fact reply rolled off the captain's tongue. "We'll open a window and let the sharp end poke out."

It was shaping up to be a long day. "About that sharp end. There's going to be thousands of people at the fairgrounds—you know, families with children. Watch where you point that harpoon, okay?"

Captain Manx dismissed Estele's comment with a frown. "I've never haphazardly harpooned anyone in a crowd.”

“Make sure you don’t.” She extended her hand to Val. “Give me the keys. I’ll drive.”

Typical man, Val had already taken possession of them. “I thought maybe I would drive.”

She shook her head. “It’s my car. I’ll drive.”

Val dug deep into his pocket and pulled out the keys, but he didn’t look pleased about it. “Here.”

Plucking them from Val’s hand, she tried to sound confident, as if she were comfortable being in charge, which she wasn’t. “Let’s roll.” She turned to the captain. “You don’t really need to go in the car. You’re immaterial, at least most of the time. In theory, you could just pop down to the fairgrounds and meet us there.”

The captain appeared stricken. “I’ve never ridden in a car and I was so looking forward to it. It would be such a thrill to ride with you and the lad and chat with the Parking Fairy in transit.”

That was news. “You know about my Parking Fairy?”

“I know all the elementals who live in the area.” He winked. “The oaks at Cemetery Park are filled with dryads. In this very building, there are water nymphs hiding in the courtyard’s koi pond. You do know that, don’t you?”

That was big news. Had she been blind? “There are actual nymphs swimming in the koi pond? I did not know that.” How would that even work? Was she that unobservant? “The pond’s not that big. Aren’t they cramped for space?”

The captain laughed. “You’re thinking rationally, and the world next door, where the elementals spend most of their existence, is anything but rational. The nymphs come and go from the pond as they please. Most of the time it’s just a brief visit to cheer up the fish.”

Where had she been? “The koi need to be cheered up? I did not know that either.”

Val patted his wristwatch. “We’re wasting time.”

Heading toward the door, she pleaded, “Captain, could I convince you to leave the harpoon behind? On a crowded midway, I think it would be more of a hindrance than a help.”

Manx’s chin dropped to his chest. “Very well, miss.” He set the rust-tinged harpoon in a corner. “I just hope we won’t regret leaving it behind.”

Estele herded everyone out the front door, then shut and locked it. Val stood close, waiting to hold her hand or be of assistance should she think of anything that required assistance. Tiny lights illuminated the black stairs that led to the parking lot, but the sky beyond was still dark.

Val walked to the passenger side. “It’s open.”

She reached toward the driver-side door handle, then jumped back with a start as Captain Manx materialized in the driver seat with his hands on the wheel.

“Beep, beep.” The captain grinned at her with beetle-stained teeth and honked the horn. “I’m ready. Lower the boom and hoist the sails!”

She patted the seatback. “I sit behind the wheel. You sit in the back. In the car, I’m the captain.”

“So you are. Pardon my faux pas.” Blushing, the captain faded away and rematerialized in the back seat and immediately started poking his fingers into an empty ashtray. “Is this a snuff box?”

Estele climbed into the car, shut the door, and buckled her seat belt. Would she regret allowing the captain to come with them today? Probably. She slid the key into the ignition and turned the engine over. It squeaked to life and the car backfired. “Well, that ought to wake the neighbors.”

“You need a tune-up.” Val cocked his head and listened to the engine. “How old is this car?”

“Way older than me.” Wrestling the stick into reverse, she backed out of the parking space. “I forget the year. It’s on the registration. This was my grandmother’s VW.”

“I’m just curious. Let’s have a look at that registration.” Val opened the glove compartment and the Parking Fairy burst out, angry as a hornet, and kicked him on the nose. The little green spark buzzed around the interior muttering obscenities. Val drew back, startled. “What the hell!”

The fairy zipped around the rearview mirror, knocking it askew and leaving phosphorescent contrails in her wake.

“Sorry, Fae.” Estele tapped the mirror and readjusted it. “Val doesn’t know you sleep in the glove compartment.”

Buzz, buzz, buzz, buzz buzz.

Focusing on the road, she noticed the slightest hint of dawn on the horizon. “Well, he knows now and it won’t happen again. By the way, a hangover is your responsibility, not mine. If you know absinthe is going to cause a—”

Buzz, buzz, buzz, buzz buzz! Buzz, buzz, buzz, buzz buzz!

Wow, the Fae was pissed. “That’s just rude. I’m going to ignore that last statement because I know you don’t mean it.”

Buzz, buzz, buzz, buzz buzz buzz buzzzzzzzz.

Estele winced. “You do mean it? That’s not good for any of us. Fae, you need to get a handle on this. Do you want some coffee? How about a saucer of fresh-brewed black coffee, doesn’t that sound good? It will help your hangover.” She glanced at Val. “We can get coffee for Fae from the food truck, right?”

He nodded with a smirk. “Sure. Ask the little grouch if she’d like a miniature burrito like the sort they feed hamsters on YouTube.”

Captain Manx raised his hand. “No burrito for me. I for one would love some coffee with a liberal splash of rum in it.”

Irate beyond reason, Fae battered the dashboard with her tiny wings. Buzz, buzz, buzz, buzz buzz.

Estele side-eyed Val as a warning. “Watch yourself. Fae hate sarcasm.”

He rubbed his nose. “She already kicked me. What else can she do?”

Good Goddess, he had no idea what he was toying with. “Don’t let her size fool you.” She mouthed, “The mighty have fallen.”

Val looked confused. “The mighty come calling? What the heck does that mean? Are you afraid to say out loud that your Parking Fairy is a bitch?”

The enraged green spark raced toward Val's forehead and butted against him. Buzz buzz buzz buzz. Buzzzz!

Val gently brushed the fairy away. "Enough!"

The captain tapped Estele's shoulder. "On our way downtown, could we stop at an apothecary's shop, knock on the door, and wake the gentleman to ask if he has any fresh coca leaves to chew on? The leaves possess a delightful numbing effect and—"

"No. We don't have time for that." She took a turn too sharply and the tires skirted the curb. How could she drive safely with all these distractions going on? "We'll be at the fairgrounds in a few minutes. It's time to pull ourselves together, stop bickering and wasting time on nonsense, and start thinking about how we are going to take on an evil force of incredible magnitude. Captain, that means no sex, drugs, or rock and roll. Keep an ear to the ground and try to be helpful."

Captain Manx's mouth quivered. "I only asked for drugs."

She turned to Val. "Tell Fae you're sorry and tuck her inside the glove compartment. See that red mitten? That's her bed."

Val frowned. "She kicked me and she's a lush."

The fairy flew agitated loops around Val's head. Buzz! Buzz, buzz, buzz buzz.

"Val." She gave him her best pleading look. "Do it, please. We can't fight demonic forces and an angry Fae at the same time. Choose your battles wisely."

He reached into the glove compartment and opened the base of the mitten. "I'm sorry if I disturbed or insulted you, Fae. Please accept my apology and go back to sleep."

Buzz buzz buzz!

Terrific, Fae wanted to hold a grudge, something she could easily drag out for millennia. "She said, 'What happened to the offer of coffee?'"

Licking his lips, Val looked to be at the edge of losing his patience. "Tell Fae she'll get her damn... err, her coffee as soon as we reach the food truck."

Buzz buzz buzz buzz!

Oh, that wasn't nice. A Fae with a hangover could out-swear any longshoreman. Estele shut her mouth, deciding to not pass that last obscenity on to Val.

Val turned in his seat. "Well, what did she say? Are we good?"

Should she be honest and report every nasty thing a grumpy Fae said? Probably not. "Just tuck her into her mitten and bring her some coffee later, and we'll let bygones be bygones."

Fae zipped inside the mitten and Val gently let go of the cuff. The moment Parking Fairy was snuggled inside, Estele was quick to close the glove compartment.

Val whispered, "How come you can understand her and I can't?"

"Do you speak Fae?"

He drew a blank. "No."

"Well, I do. Where elementals are concerned, I think women have a keener ear."

Talking out the side of his mouth, Val leaned closer. “Can she hear us now?”

Good question. “Probably not. I would think the mitten muffles sound.”

“Why did you say the mighty have fallen?”

“The mighty have fallen?” the captain’s voice boomed from the back seat. “Who are we talking about?”

“Hush, Captain.” She glanced in the rearview mirror and caught a glimpse of the rising sun through the back window. “Don’t be insensitive. Fae was once some sort of warrior queen, but she won’t tell me her real name or story. I’ll bet Sidhe knows, but he’s not saying anything either.”

They came to the Oceanside Boulevard overpass that led to the fairgrounds. Except for a police car idling beneath the overpass, the streets were empty of traffic. “Who does that guy think he’s going to catch at this hour? A vampire speeding home to his coffin?”

Estele steered toward the fairgrounds. Despite the rising sun, lights blazed from every direction. An army of laborers was fully engaged in their tasks and had obviously worked throughout the night. The midway had been transformed. The rides had been fully assembled and a few were in motion, being tested. She looked around. “Wow, someone’s been busy.”

Val pointed toward a brightly painted truck set far apart from the action. “There’s the Brujo Tacos truck. Park next to it.”

Driving slowly past the workmen, she noted that not a single man glanced up from their work to look at them. “I’m going to test something.” She honked the horn. Beep! Beep! Even though they were a few yards away, no one responded or even blinked. “Look at their faces. The crew seems to still be in that strange fugue state they were in last night. This is so creepy. It’s like they’ve been enslaved.”

Val slipped his dagger necklace over his head. “It’s hard to get an accurate divination reading in a moving vehicle, but I’m going to give it a try.” He allowed the necklace to dangle in front of his face. In a gravity-defying moment, the necklace lifted into the air and swung like a compass needle, pointing at a large black trailer with flames painted on the side of it. The tip of the tiny dagger pointed straight toward Luther’s living quarters. “Surprise, surprise, the giant Orc seems to be at the center of the weirdness. I’m sensing the strong pull of controlling energies coming from that trailer.”

The way Val’s divination tool reacted to the energy in this area freaked her out. What were they coming up against? “What about the bubble of malevolence? Can you take a reading on that?”

Val blew on the necklace, dropped it into his hand, and gave it a firm shake. “I have to recalibrate it for a fresh reading. This will just take a moment.” The chain shifted in his palm, making a quiet tinkle. Picking the necklace up by the clasp, he swung it slowly in front of his face. “Let’s see what that bubble of malevolence is up to. What sort of reading are we going to get?” The chain shot straight in front of him and then began to rotate with tremendous force, like a swinging blade. He ducked but even though the blade on the tip was small, it was whirring at such tremendous speed that it became as threatening as a buzz saw. It nicked the upholstery, tearing gashes anywhere it touched.

She crouched close to the steering wheel. “Val, make it stop!”

“Stop!” he shouted. The necklace froze midair. Every link in the chain trembled, twisted, and slowly broke apart until hundreds of uncoupled links rained down onto the floor mats.

The captain leaned between the seats. “Well, that was disturbing.”

“Whoa!” Her mouth opened and refused to close. It wasn’t safe to drive. She hit the brakes and stared at the bits of shattered necklace that had fallen into her lap. “It destroyed your divination tool!” This was bad—really bad. “What does that mean?”

Val’s brows butted together. “I think I know, and it’s not good. The bubble has grown exponentially.”

“How much?” She dared to take her foot off the brake and continued driving toward the Brujo Tacos truck.

Val pantomimed sweeping shapes in the air. “If last night the bubble was as powerful as a suitcase stuffed with C4, now it’s a freaking nuclear warhead.”

“Holy crap! And it’s going to blow up beneath our feet? We can’t fight something that size alone.” Estele parked beside the food truck, turned off the engine, and unfastened her seat belt. “I don’t care how early it is, I’m calling Fredi, Miss Dahlia, Witch Griselda—even Sidhe. Let’s wake everyone and get them on this ASAP.”

“Yep.” Val nodded. “But first let’s talk to Tio Bruno and get organized.”

“How do you get organized for a small-scale Armageddon fought with Tilt-A-Whirls and cotton candy? How?” She climbed out of the car and shut the door hard.

“Ah, my fingers!” the captain shrieked. “Use caution, miss. I’m still exiting the vehicle.”

What a drama queen. He wasn’t even in corporeal form; how the hell was she supposed to have known his ghostly hand was caught in the door? “Sorry, Captain. I didn’t mean to slam the door on you.”

“It’s all right.” Captain Manx fully took form and glanced around, blinking. “It’s so different from my time. I don’t recognize anything.”

Her stomach growled. What a tyrant her belly was. Was she actually considering eating at a time like this? “When were you last here?”

The captain turned in a circle and appeared confused. “Spring of 1897.”

“Well, that explains a few changes.”

He frowned. “I can’t even tell where the docks used to be.”

Glancing over her shoulder, she tilted her head. “Close to where those high-rise hotels are now.”

He looked but quickly turned away as if the sight pained him. “The railroad tracks used to be closer to City Hall. In my time they would never have run a train along a beach. You can barely see the ocean from here.”

She pointed to a giant Ferris wheel. “The sand dunes on the beach are blocking our view. You’ll be able to see the ocean from up there.”

“I’m not sure I want to.” With the expression of a lost child, the captain stepped between her and Val and cringed. “There’s a bad feeling in the air. I wish I had my harpoon.”

Chapter 11

Val rapped his knuckles on the door of the Brujo Tacos truck. Was he ready for what was coming? He wasn't sure. The sight of his favorite necklace exploding into sharp bits of metal had been disconcerting, to say the least. They were in for a hell of a day. He wondered who would be the inevitable casualty and hoped it wasn't him, but his odds were bad. He was committed to the cause, but he didn't have a fraction of Estele's power or skills. He was a food wizard-slash-bodyguard, and he was going up against forces that dwarfed any magic he could summon. His training in the highlands of Oaxaca had taught him one essential thing about the magical arts: ignite your passions or perish. Today, much would be asked of him; he would have to deliver or suffer the consequences. "Tio, it's me."

The door opened. The bracing scents of fresh coffee and frying onions wafted out. Bruno stared out at them. His silver hair had been sleeked away from his elegant face and covered with a hairnet, and the presence of a red vinyl apron and blue latex gloves added to the impression he was busy. "You're late. Have you noticed the massive increase in malevolent energy? We don't have a minute to waste." His gaze focused on Estele. "Is this her?"

"Sí. Ella es mi aliada." Damn, he automatically fell into Spanish in front of his uncle.

"Speak English, Val." Bruno stood aside, allowing Estele to enter. "We can't afford even the smallest miscommunication."

Estele placed her foot on the step and climbed into the truck. With a shaky smile, she greeted Bruno. "Hi, I love your food. I'm a witch by the way..."

"I know." Solemn reverence shining in his dark eyes, Bruno bowed to her with all the chivalry of an Old World knight. "It is a great pleasure to meet you. Val has told me your name. Under your leadership, evil shall be quenched and driven back into its fetid lair. I'm honored to be fighting at your side today. I'm at your service and willing to die at your request."

"Wow. Thanks." Estele blushed, and in that moment she looked so pretty and unassuming. He wondered if fate had sent the wrong people to do what might be an impossible job.

Bruno waved them inside. "Let's eat a quick breakfast and talk."

Val climbed the steps and entered the truck. Red and green chili peppers were set upon the grill, roasting beside succulent strips of marinated pork. His stomach growled.

“There’s something here.” Bruno looked alarmed as he swept his hand through the air. “What is this?” He circled his palm beside Estele. “Something followed you inside the truck. Yes. It is a definite sentient presence. Perhaps it was once alive but no longer—”

“Jolly good guess!” The captain materialized next to Tio Bruno and made him jump.

“Santa Maria!” Bruno staggered backward and smacked into a refrigerator. “Who is that? What is that? A fantasma?”

The captain drew his shoulders back and addressed Bruno with all the dignity he could muster. “Sir, are you the captain of this grand rolling vessel? If so, by my lucky stars, do you have any rum aboard?”

Estele beamed. “That’s Captain Manx. He’s a dead sea captain with questionable vices. If you don’t have rum, not to worry, he doesn’t drink it anyway. You can just give him a hot pepper to suck on. He’ll probably like it.”

Bruno’s eyes widened. He glanced at Val. “You recruited the services of a ghost? Brilliant strategy.”

Val shook his head. “I can’t take credit for that. Estele and the captain sort of came as a package deal. For better or worse, he’s one of us.”

Bruno nodded. “Very fortuitous. Sending the dead to fight for us might save a life. I like it. Who wants a burrito?”

“I do!” Estele headed toward the grill. “I ate off your truck yesterday and I thought I’d died and gone to Heaven. You make some seriously delicious food.” She made a silly face. “Considering we’re standing on top of a megaton bubble of evil, I shouldn’t be using the word ‘die’ lightly, should I?”

The captain raised his hand. “If it’s not too much trouble, may I have a splash of hot coffee and a saucer to pour it in? We have a very grouchy Fae currently housed in the young lady’s glove compartment who is sure to go on the warpath if we break our promise to her.”

Estele applauded him. “Good call, Captain. Parking Fairy needs her cup of joe.”

“I have heard of the Fae people for many years but never met one.” Bruno took hold of Val’s wrist. A look of elation shone in his eyes. “Is it true? Do you have a Fae under your influence?”

How would he answer that? The Parking Fairy seemed to hate him. “The Fae is Estele’s companion. The only real influence I have with the Fae is the power to piss her off. She’s sort of touchy.”

Bruno’s gazed at Estele with his mouth open. “A ghost captain and a Fae at your command? Very impressive. My sobrino is lucky indeed to have such a powerful ally.”

“That’s not even scratching the surface of what she can do.” He was proud of Estele. She was pretty amazing, but was it cool to brag? She didn’t belong to him in any permanent way, though he kind of hoped something good might happen between them. Kissing her on the couch had proved hot-shit tempting. A second longer and he would not have been able to think clearly. “You should have seen her banish the smoke beast.”

Estele dipped her chin and glanced at him sideways. “You might want to warn your uncle that I don’t always do things right. My magic can get sort of crazy.”

“Maybe crazy is exactly what we need. Magia loca.” Returning to the grill, Bruno picked up a large steel spatula and used it to herd some chopped and caramelized onions into a mound. “What’s a smoke beast? No one ever explained it to me.”

Hopefully that stinky soot cloud wouldn’t come back, but he knew better. “It’s self-explanatory. You’d definitely recognize it if you see it.”

Staring at the grill, Estele said, “Yum.”

Bruno placed two large flour tortillas on the grill to warm. “It’s my honor to cook for you. What would you like in your burrito?”

She shrugged. “Everything you make is great. Surprise me.”

“Spoken like nobility.” Bruno went to work assembling their breakfast. “Does the ghost captain want to eat?”

“Nope.” Estele shook her head. “He’ll just sniff.”

Where was the captain? Val glanced around. That guy had a terrible habit of popping in and out of 3D reality in the most jolting way possible. It was too bad they couldn’t tie a bell around his neck or do something that would provide a heads-up for his coming and going.

Like a slap in the head, he remembered the Parking Fairy was owed coffee. If he wanted to impress Estele—and he did—the best way to do it would be to show consideration for her and others in her life, and that included keeping promises to supernatural entities. He took a paper cup and filled it two-thirds full with fresh, hot coffee, added a generous amount of cream and sugar, and stirred. Opening the truck door, he signaled Estele with a wave. “I’ll be right back. This is for your Fae.”

Estele followed. “Be careful, Val, the Parking Fairy can be a bit vindictive. Sometimes she deliberately aims for the eyes. Maybe I should go with you?”

She looked so concerned. Did she care for him, or was it concern for her personal Fae? He hoped that look was for him. “Don’t worry, one way or another I’m going to get on your Fae’s good side.”

With a heart-melting smile, Estele handed him the keys. “Good luck.”

He stepped into the cool morning air with the steaming cup of coffee in one hand and the keys in the other. He unlocked and opened the door and carefully sat in the passenger seat before giving the dashboard a gentle tap. “Fae, wake up. I brought you some coffee.” With the same slow, calculated movements as a member of the bomb squad, he clicked the glove box open and peeked inside the mitten.

A spark of green light flew out and zipped around the interior of the car. A couple passes came uncomfortably close to his eyes. “Whoa, watch out! Look, coffee. I kept my promise.”

The spark stopped zipping and hovered over the cup like a tiny helicopter.

“Wait! Don’t dive in. There’s some cream in it, but it’s still very hot.” God, he’d hate to have to tell Estele he'd scalded her Fae. That would be bad. Damn, why hadn't he thought to bring a saucer? Cupping his hand, he poured a trickle of coffee into his palm, making an impromptu Fae feeder. He blew on it. "Here you go. It's safe to drink. Come and get your coffee."

Why was he doing this? Today of all days, he had more important things to do than appease a cranky fairy. What it boiled down to was he'd been rude to Estele's pet Fae and didn't want the bad impression to linger. Estele was the sort of woman worth making the extra effort for. "I didn't know how you like your coffee, so I mixed it sweet and light. I hope that's okay, and if I came across as sort of gruff earlier, I want to apologize."

Buzzzzz. The sound was soft. Fae dove into the shallow puddle of coffee and splashed around like a happy robin washing in a birdbath.

Any residual hard feeling he might have been harboring against the Fae instantly faded. When engaged in playful behavior like this, the Fae was kind of cute.

"What's your real name?" he whispered. "I heard you used to be a warrior queen. How did this happen? Now you're just a tiny fleck?"

Buzzzz! Buzz! Buzzzzz! Fae rammed the tender skin between Val's fingers with what felt like a heated electric stinger that made his nerves scream.

"Oww!" He grabbed his hand. The coffee trickled down his sleeve. "That hurt. Why did you do that?"

Buzzzzz.

"Okay, I get it. You don't want me to bring up the past." Wow, what a grouch. "Don't worry, it will never happen again."

Buzz. Buzz, buzz, buzz.

Good God, either he had gone mad or else the annoying sounds the Fae made by flapping her wings were beginning to make sense. "You want me to pour more coffee into my palm, offer it to you?" Then wait for the pain when you decide to sting me again?

Buzz. Buzz.

He must be a sap. Tipping the cup over his hand, he carefully trickled more warm coffee into his palm and pushed his damp sleeve up his forearm. "Here you go. I'm doing this for Estele. I don't want her to feel I'd be disrespectful to her or anyone close to her. I think she's someone special."

Fae swooped down and sipped the coffee from the edge of the puddle. Buzz.

"I'm glad you agree." If he listened carefully, it was easy to understand the Fae's message. The Fae language was as subtle and soft as the down on a baby duckling, and bloomed in the back of his mind like a surfacing thought. How had he missed it before? The Fae lighted on the base of his thumb, sipping coffee. "Can I ask you a question?"

Buzz.

"You know Estele, right? Do you think that under ordinary circumstances, i.e. not thrown together and forced to fight evil, that she would ever be attracted to a guy like me? I don't mean to sound insecure. I'm just asking because she seems to have a real resistance to brujos. I'm hoping to get past it. But who knows. The trust might never be there."

Buzz. Buzz. Buzzzz.

"So, you've never seen her doing something ordinary like going to the market with a man and doing errands, like she did with me tonight?"

Buzz.

"You think she's lonely? That's pretty sad. A woman like Estele shouldn't have to be alone."

Buzzzzz! Buzz buzz.

"I know. She told me about how her magic can sometimes be wayward, and I think she's afraid to hurt others, but I see so much potential in her. She has magical skills I can only dream of. Estele's amazing." Maybe it was a mistake to open up to a Fae? Would he regret it? How vulnerable had he made himself sound? "Are you going to say anything to Estele about this?"

Buzzzzzz.

You never know? That comment wasn't very reassuring. He'd kept his promise and now it was time to get going. "Do you want to go back to your mitten?"

Buzz. Buzz.

"You want me to roll down the window so you can fly around the fairgrounds and do recon? Okay, I can do that. I'll also leave the glove box open so you can go back inside when you're finished."

Buzzzz.

"You're welcome."

Estele bit into the burrito Bruno had made for her and rolled her eyes with pleasure. The beans were tender but firm, the lime rice fragrant, the pork was perfectly seasoned and had the slightest hint of cinnamon, and the guacamole was spicy and rich. All the flavors were perfectly in balance. "Un-freaking-believable! I could eat one of these every day."

Bruno bowed his head humbly but betrayed his satisfaction with the slightest smile. "My honor."

"The alquimista de sabor crew are certainly into honor, aren't you?" So what went wrong with her dear old dad? She'd love to know the story there.

"Sí. We are the middle ground between Old World knights, New World shamans, and chefs. We harness the power inherent in nature and turn it into alchemical spells to be consumed and expressed through emotions and behavior. It's a potent combination of talents to juggle, and not for everyone."

Should she even bring this up? It might not be wise to expose her deepest insecurities while standing on top of a building bubble of evil. "My father was a brujo, but of a different kind."

Bruno's eyes sparkled. "What was his predilection?"

She swallowed too much too fast. The salsa was killer good. “Uh?”

“What sort of magic did he practice?”

“To be honest, I don’t know.” How sad was that? She’d grown up thinking a brujo was a brujo and gave zero thought to any subtlety or distinctions among their ranks. In fact, the main lesson her mother had ingrained in her was to stay away from them.

Bruno chopped his way through a large pile of vegetables with the efficiency of a machine. “Your father never told you what his specialty was? Perhaps he was protecting you from malicious acts of rival sorcerers?”

Protecting her by abandoning her? That didn’t seem like a decent plan. Estele set her burrito down. This was one of the few subjects that could ever dim her usually robust appetite. “He left us—just disappeared one day.”

Bruno’s brows lifted. “Just disappeared?”

“Yep. He said he was going to the store and vanished. Not cool. It happened right here in San Buena. We had everybody looking for him, from the police to the enchantment community, but we never found a trace.” There was no need to add that everyone thought he’d left to escape her mother’s nagging.

“I’m so sorry to hear this.” Compassion shone in Bruno’s eyes that were the same uncanny golden-gray color as a coyote’s. “It must have been very hard growing up without him.”

It was. “A lot of people grow up without a dad.” Too bad her mother was a wreck too.

He set his knife down on the chopping block and focused solely on her. “It’s hard to be alone in the world. It affects you deeply and changes you in ways you can’t foresee.”

At least she wasn’t completely alone in the world. She had friends who forgave and indulged her. Grandma Lena had been a godsend. However, men and positive male role models had been lacking. She didn’t want to think about how that oversight had changed her, except thoughts of Val dominated her mind. It felt so good to be around him. She wanted to trust him, and having a partner to share a problem with instead of enduring it alone had been an eye-opener. Was that what others had all the time, a reliable partner to lean on when the going got rough? “Maybe I spend too much time alone?” She’d been doing it to spare others the effects of her wayward magic, which got even crazier in crowds or social situations.

“Being a person of exceptional powers and learning to balance alone time and social time is an art in itself. Personally, I am a loner. My calling as an alquimista de sabor claimed me early in life. I never married or had children, but my brother did. When I least expected it, my nephew came to me, wanting to learn my ways. At first I discouraged him and sent him away with the warning that the ways of a brujo would take him too far from society. I dreaded what my poor brother would say to me. But with time and persistence, Valentine proved to me that he was sincere in his desire to learn. He quickly became the best and most devoted apprentice I have ever seen. In a word, he is impeccable. Valentine is the son of my heart that I never knew I needed.”

Why was he telling her this?

He looked worried. “Sometimes the people you never asked for are the ones you need most.”

Why did she feel so nervous, like a flock of butterflies was about to take off in her belly? “Is there something wrong? I feel like I’m missing something in this conversation.”

“This is Valentine’s first flight as a full-fledged brujo. It’s like a graduation. I’ve taught him everything I know and must now bow to a master teacher to take him further.”

She picked up the last half of her burrito and bit in. Holy moly, were they waiting for some other weird character to show up and take this circus to another level? “Who’s the master teacher?”

A strange intensity glowed in Tio Bruno’s gaze. “You are. Valentine was given a mark to identify his ally—”

“I know about the ink-wizard’s tattoo.”

He picked up a cleaver and diced tomatoes. “Yes. Undeniably, the portrait of the ally is you.”

“I believe I’m Val’s ally.” That part was easy to swallow. She even liked saying it, for goodness sake. “Something between us clicks. But I think you’re absolutely mistaken about me being a master teacher! Seriously, I would laugh at that concept but it’s not funny. My magic has hurt people. For crying out loud, I’m on academic probation at the Master Mage Magic Academy and graduation is iffy, as in if ever. That’s not a recipe for being anyone’s master teacher.”

The pounding of the cleaver against the chopping block halted. Bruno glanced up. “Yet I’m convinced you’re Valentine’s master teacher.”

“Sir, I just made a solid argument for why that was highly unlikely.”

“Every fledgling brujo must pass the test of crisis. That is a given. Usually the tests are small-scale and personal in nature. Facing a deep-seated fear... mastering a skill set. But his first crisis call is in your hometown and involves far more than a personal test for Valentine—it is a trial on a colossal scale with the safety of thousands on the line. That cannot be coincidence. There is no room for failure. Fate does not toy with beginners in such a manner. Valentine will succeed or die trying. I strongly suspect you must be both his ally and master teacher.”

Licking a fleck of guacamole from her lips, she thought about all he had said. She mastered nothing except screwing up her magical spells. “We’re doomed.”

The door opened and Val entered the truck. He looked at Estele and smiled, then headed straight to the sink to wash his hands. “Parking Fairy got her coffee. We had a little chat and I think things are good between us.” He glanced around. “Where’s the captain?”

She popped the last bit of burrito into her mouth and moved toward the sink to wash her hands too. “I don’t know. I haven’t seen him for a few minutes, but that’s normal. He comes and goes as he likes. Maybe he went looking for the ghosts of crewmates. I suppose some of them might be still hanging around?”

Val looked into her eyes. “What’s the plan, beautiful? I’m at your service.”

What was the plan? Was she really in charge of seeing to it that a massive bubble of malevolence was neutralized? She unzipped her purse just enough to place her hand inside and touch the Heart of Hecate. The ruby lit the moment her fingertips grazed the surface. What should they do first? What could they do at all? If the stone was going to offer clarity in a situation, now was the time to test it.

To her surprise, a complete thought rushed into her mind with the same violent force as a vacuum filling space. “Umm. We should try to reach out to the carnies. Look at those guys. They were working like automatons last night and they’re still on the job. They have to be close to exhaustion. Let’s offer them some enchanted coffee and food and see if we can’t break the spell they seem to be under and get a few of them to talk. Maybe somebody knows something about Luther?”

Bruno interrupted. “Who is Luther?”

“What is Luther is more like it.” Val poured himself a fresh cup of coffee. “He’s a big guy, like cattle-sized big. I’m not completely convinced Luther is human. Something’s not right, and he seems to be intimidating the owner of the carnival, Marge, aka Madame Shamansky, the all-seeing eye of destiny. Her title is ironic because she parked her carnival on top of a bubble of malevolence. You’d think a professional psychic would have seen that coming.”

Estele turned to Bruno. “We think Luther might be exerting undue influence over the carnival and its crew. Last night, they all seemed to be under some sort of thrall. They were like glassy-eyed zombies brandishing power tools and forklifts. It was creepy as hell. Except for an obnoxious clown, no one acknowledged us or even blinked. I suspect heavy-duty magic at work.”

She honed in on Bruno. He seemed to be hanging on her every word. How novel was that? “We have to find a way to break the spell. You have the most experience as an alquimista de sabor. I’m going to put you in charge of spellcasting on the food. What are the lowest levels of enchantment we can use to cast a counterspell and still get results? These people have already been exposed to a lot of enchantment, and we need to avoid delivering what might be a toxic dose.”

Bruno appeared uneasy. “As an alquimista de sabor, there are strict protocols I must follow. I cannot offer someone bewitched food or drink without also providing them with a clue the item is indeed enchanted. Over the centuries, brujos have earned an unfortunate reputation for being tricksters, but that reputation is unjust. An example is the words ‘Brujo Tacos’ clearly displayed on the sides of my food truck. Anyone approaching my truck is alerted to the possibility that the food has been prepared and likely ensorcelled by brujos.”

Estele shook her head. How could she say this without it coming out all wrong? There really wasn’t a way. “Dude, that’s just a super sneaky loophole. I can guarantee you that no one thinks real brujos are driving around in taco trucks handing out enchanted food. How about we include a verbal warning: ‘Enjoy your coffee, it’s enchanting.’ Or ‘This salsa will cast a spell on you.’ That way we’re covered in case we get called before San Buena’s enchantment community’s ethics committee, which for the record, I’ve been called in front of before.” She shrugged. “Mistakes happen. I didn’t mean to do it.”

Bruno stared at Estele with the same conflicted intensity as a dog would stare at a burger patty that fell off the grill. “This is an emergency and the public is in grave danger. I will accept that solution.”

“Terrific!” Estele held up her palm and waited to be high-fived. Bruno appeared deep in thought and did not respond. After an awkward moment of nothing happening, she lowered her hand. “Okay, I guess we just jump in. Start with the coffee. Brew a lot. At this hour, it should be easy to push a free cup of joe on a work crew that may not have had any liquid or food in hours. Let’s start there.”

Val was quick to open and fill the top of a large, catering-sized coffeemaker with fresh grounds.

She watched Val’s every move as he added a bit of chicory and a cinnamon stick to the coffee. “How much does that hold?”

“Five gallons, but there’s a lot of people out there.”

Her gaze ricocheted between Val and Bruno. “Do you know what sort of spell you’re going to cast?”

Bruno stopped chopping vegetables long enough to give her a worried look. “What do you suggest?”

Estele’s voice cracked. “I don’t know. I’m going to delegate that decision. You’re the food wizards, for crying out loud. Those carnies out there are behaving like army ants. It’s obvious the men have lost their free will and higher thought functioning. What would give it back to them? Think.”

With a brooding expression, Bruno rubbed his jaw in thought. “Sometimes simple things can be disruptive to magic. For instance, a spell cast at night can often be destroyed or diluted by sunlight.”

“Yep.” She nodded. “I’ve heard that.” The comment reminded her to call Fredi as soon as their plan was underway. “What else works?”

“Sometimes a spell-breaker can be paired with a physical action,” Val added.

“What sort of physical action?”

“A shock to the nervous system.” Val fiddled with the monster coffeemaker, closed the top, and hit a glowing green button. “Like an unexpected shove or a slap on the face. Physical contact disrupts the flow of the spell and gives the victim of enchantment a chance to sober up.”

Slapping? Seriously? They were going to turn the fairgrounds into a Three Stooges spectacle. “So, we’re going to encourage people who are behaving like glassy-eyed members of an insect hive to sip hot coffee and then slap their faces? I see no way this can go wrong. Let’s do it.” She peered out the truck’s window. “Hopefully, we won’t have to do much slapping. The sun is rising. Pretty soon we’ll have spell-cleansing sunlight in the arsenal as well.” She reached for her phone. “While the two of you are busy enchanting—”

“Ensorcelling,” Bruno gently corrected Estele. “Brujos are sorcerers. We prefer the term ‘ensorcelling’ to ‘enchanted.’ Enchantment is for witches.”

Enchantment certainly wasn’t just for witches. Was Bruno subtly trying to distance himself from witches, namely Esposito witches, by splitting hairs? “By my reckoning, enchantment is for everyone in the supernatural community. If you have reservations about working with me or any other witch, you should say so now.”

Val’s answer came lightning fast. “Estele, I have no reservations about joining forces with you.”

Bruno didn’t look so sure. “You’re so young and have no real experience as a team leader. Your family history—” He heaved a deep breath. “—does cast doubt in my mind, but I will respect you because fate has indicated you are our best hope.”

Damn. It hurt to hear it, but could she blame him? “To be honest, I feel the same way. I understand completely. I have doubts too. Ask Val how I reacted to the news that I was an ally and the one to battle whatever it is that’s threatening to erupt under our feet.”

Shaking his head, Val frowned. “Tio Bruno, Estele was so humble and self-deprecating. I don’t believe she’d make a claim she couldn’t deliver on. She’s my ally in this mission and I’ve seen firsthand how powerful she is. As mere brujo food wizards, we can’t come close to what she can achieve.”

Wow, Val was really standing up for her. It felt great until she realized how shitty it would feel if she let him down.

Bruno’s pale eyes flashed. “Power and wisdom don’t always travel together. We are vulnerable precisely because she’s so powerful and so inexperienced. Evil might snatch her up as easily as a crocodile grabs a paddling dog from a pond.”

Eww. That was an ugly image. “You’re 100 percent right,” she said. “Even I don’t trust me. I have no idea why”—dare she mention the Heart of Hecate? No—“people started trusting me yesterday with valuable stuff, or why they sought me out believing I was their ally, but they did. Yesterday was a very eventful day. Today, I find myself in charge of loads of crazy stuff. Am I going to run from it and say, ‘Not me, I can’t handle this?’ No. I’m going to be a grown-up and figure this puzzle out one piece at a time.”

Estele peered out the window. The first rays of golden sunshine lit the horizon. “We know one thing for sure: the evil force welling beneath our feet is attracted to me. It followed me to the market and to my home, and I’m guessing it’ll follow me around the fairgrounds. Let’s exploit that fact. Val, watch my back.”

Val nodded solemnly. “You do not even need to ask.”

Now she was on a roll. It was as if confusion lifted and she was able to see the big picture. “Bruno, create the strongest ensorcellment you can muster on that coffee. Let’s get it into the crewmen’s hands ASAP and start slapping people if we have to. The sun is coming up and that works in our favor too. As Bruno pointed out, I have no experience battling evil, so I’m going to do the wise thing and call in others who know exactly what they are doing.” She tapped her phone’s speed dial. “I’m calling in reinforcements.”

The call went straight to voice mail. “Hello, this Frederica De la Cruz. If you are trying to reach me or Gus—” “Estele?” Fredi’s sleep-soggy voice interrupted the message. “It’s literally the crack of dawn.

Why are you calling? Is everything okay?"

She licked her lips. "Things aren't okay. We're all in grave danger, and for once it's not my fault. Whatever you have planned for today, cancel it and come to the fairgrounds as fast as you can, and for Goddess's sake bring a fully charged wand with you."

"Estele, what is this about?" Fredi sounded wary. "Is this connected to the hex-vex-redirect spell from last night?"

"No." Her gaze flickered between Val and Bruno, who were looking at her as if their next breaths depended on her. "Call Miss Dahlia, and Witch Griselda too. Something big is getting ready to blow, and we need all hands on deck."

Chapter 12

Estele watched from a safe distance as Tio Bruno and Val ensorcelled the contents of the coffee urn using native chants, a rattle made from a coyote's skull, and some other odd items they'd retrieved from a medicine bundle wrapped in rustic red cloth.

"Will this affect safe food handling practices?" she blurted. "Ensorcelling food is one thing...." Her gaze fixated on the toothy skull that appeared yellowed by time. "Food contamination is another."

Bruno stopped chanting long enough to flash her a condemning look. "Do not be concerned. I know what I'm doing."

"Okay, fine." Where was Fredi? She wished she were here already.

Val appeared anxious as he gathered a stack of paper cups into his arms. "How are we going to do this?"

With a dramatic wave of his hands, Bruno stopped chanting. "The sorcery has been cast." He set the rattle down on the piece of red cloth, filled a pump thermos with fresh coffee, and handed it to Val. "Take this and try to get everyone who looks like they are under the effects of magic to drink some. We'll just keep refilling it and making more until everyone is back to normal."

Val handed a plastic bag full of creamer cups and sugar packets to Estele. "Come with me." He opened the door and exited the truck.

Estele followed. The morning was cool and the horizon glowed a reassuring shade of peach. The lights that had blazed through the night were still on and the crewmen worked unabated. Heavy electrical cables lay everywhere like pythons basking on the tarmac. A man driving a forklift zipped past, forcing her to jump aside. "That was too close."

"Did you see the look in his eyes?" Val said. "It was frozen as a snow cone. No one was home."

"Let's give him some brujo-style coffee." Her strides lengthened as she sped to catch up with the man.

The forklift had come to a stop. The man waited as a coworker stacked pallets onto the lift.

"Hey, you!" She ran up to the man and dared jump aboard the forklift.

Staring straight ahead, the man ignored her. His eyes were bloodshot and his lips were cracked and dry. He looked exhausted and wired at the same moment. "How about some coffee? You look like you could use a cup."

The man remained silent and staring and didn't acknowledge her in the slightest.

"I'm going to pour you a cup anyway. You'll love it. The coffee from Brujo Tacos is enchanted." She said it loudly. The coffee was poured and she decided to give it to him black. Dipping her finger into the cup, she tested the temperature. It was too hot to pour down someone's throat, which was what it looked like she would have to do, so she blew on it. When she was confident the coffee wouldn't burn the man, she held the cup to his lips. "Here you are. Take a sip. You need this more than you realize."

He stared into space, her pleas falling on deaf ears.

"Okay. Either you won't or can't drink on your own." She reached over and tugged at the man's lip, trying to pour a little coffee into his mouth, but it just trickled down his chin. "I can see I'm going to have to be proactive." Turning toward Val, she said, "Maybe we should get a spoon and play 'open for the coffee train.' This guy is not cooperating at all. Foisting enchanted coffee on him is like giving a pill to an unwilling dog."

There were dozens of crewmen on the midway. This was going to take forever. "Wait a minute. Val, do you have a baster on the truck?"

His face lit with joy. "Yep, I'll get it."

"Hurry, before this guy drives off with me!"

Val turned and ran back to the truck.

"What's going on here?" a woman's sultry voice called to her.

Estele turned. Madame Shamansky stood behind her wearing a purple bathrobe, sheepskin boots, and a frown. "Hi, Marge! Good morning. I was just—"

Marge stomped toward her. "Who the hell are you? This is my carnival. What are you up to?"

Oh dear, the look on Marge's face wasn't welcoming in the least bit. What had gone wrong? "I'm your new psychic, remember?"

"Hold on, missy! This carnival only has one psychic and she is me."

Whoa. Did Madame really not remember her, or was this something else? "Marge. You hired me last night. I'm Estele—Seer of the Akash. Does that ring any bells? You told me to show up for work bright and early and here I am."

"Hell no, I don't remember, because it didn't happen." Marge planted her fists on her hips and scowled. "Are you crazy or just pretending to be crazy? I've never seen you before in my life! I have no idea what you're trying to pull, but you need to get out of here before I call security!"

Val walked toward them, beaming, a large turkey baster held in one hand and a steaming cup of coffee in the other. "Good morning, Marge!"

Marge squinted. "Hello, handsome! Do I know you?" She wasn't nearly as surly with Val. "Have we met?"

Val offered his most devastating smile. "We met last night."

A smile tickled Marge's lips. "Why can't I remember that? I'm certain I'd want to remember someone like you.”

“You invited me into your trailer.” Val looked at her sideways, showing his thick black lashes.

“We must have had too much fun.” Pawing the air with kittenish gestures, Marge grinned. “I sure wish I could remember.”

Val walked toward Estele. He dipped the baster into the coffee and sucked a good amount up. “Would you like to remember what we did last night?”

Marge giggled. “I’ll bet it was naughty and involved lots of tequila, because I can’t remember a damn thing.”

While Marge’s mouth was open and laughing, Val squirted coffee past her lips. “This coffee’s ensorcelled.”

Marge looked surprised, gurgled and swallowed, and wiped her mouth on her sleeve. “What the hell was that about!” Her eyes went wide. “Holy fuck. What’s going on? I remember everything now. We were talking last night and chewing gum. I told you my life story. We didn’t do anything wrong.” She winked at Val. “Damn you for being decent. Then Luther called me over to his trailer. I don’t remember how I even got back to my trailer. Come to think of it, that happens all the time.”

Glancing around to make sure no one was near, she whispered to Marge, “Do you trust Luther?”

Marge appeared unsettled. “Does it matter? There’s no sense asking if the air is good to breathe. A few weeks ago, the guy shows up out of nowhere, pays off my debts, which were considerable, takes charge, bullies me.... When we talk, I have to meet him in a darkened, fart-filled trailer. He won’t turn on the lights or even pay me the courtesy of eye contact. I can’t tell him anything and I wish he’d just go away. Maybe the dude’s in the witness protection program? Something’s not right.” She reached for the cup in Val’s hand, blew on the surface, and downed the contents in a single gulp. “Good coffee. Do you have any more of this stuff?” Her eyes cleared. “Wow, now I feel wide awake, like I can see everything for the first time in a long time. Holy crap, I’ve been a fool. It’s embarrassing to admit this, but Luther’s been keeping me in some sort of fog. I can’t think or act in my best interest when that guy’s around.”

The forklift started to reverse, and Estele jumped off and allowed the glassy-eyed operator to drive away. Damn, she never had a chance to get any coffee into him. “Did you see that?” She hoped to get Marge’s attention refocused. “Does that look like normal behavior to you? You’re not the only one Luther has a negative effect on. We were talking in front of that guy and he didn’t react in the slightest. We might as well have been standing on the moon.”

Marge held up the empty cup. “Any chance of a refill, handsome?”

Val’s tone was earnest. “I must inform you, the coffee carries a powerful ensorcellment.”

Licking her lips, Marge stepped closer. “And so do your eyes, gorgeous, but I’m still willing to risk a second cup.”

Estele reached for the pump thermos and refilled Marge’s cup. “We’re fighting fire with fire. The coffee has a spell cast on it and we’re using it to break a spell that you and the rest of the carnival seem to be under.”

Marge looked surprised. “You think I’ve been under some sort of spell?”

When someone was oblivious, what could be done for them? Would the next revelation be a good or bad thing? People didn’t always take kindly to the truth. Estele slapped Marge’s cheek to add to the coffee’s sobering effect. “Marge, I think that evil forces are at work and you’ve been exploited by someone or something using dark magic.”

“What the fu—” Marge flinched. “What was the slap for? I’m listening. You didn’t have to do it. You think I’ve been exploited by Luther? Yeah, I can see that.” She downed the second cup of coffee in two drafts.

Val retrieved the empty cup from Marge’s hand. “What do you know about Luther?”

“Oh boy.” Marge rubbed her arms like she’d felt a chill. “Not much. He just showed up one night when the carnival was set up in Bakersfield and told me that, like it or not, he was my new partner. I didn’t want a partner, but Mr. Shamansky, died last year and left me with some heavy-duty medical bills to pay off. Another season of touring and good management would have taken care of that. Instead Luther tells me the bills are paid and he’s my new silent partner, and then things get weirder. I’m still in charge, you see, I’m still the majority owner, but everyone immediately starts doing everything Luther’s way. Like all of a sudden, he’s the boss, even though most of them have never set eyes on the guy. Luther hates sunlight. He’s got some weird condition and he avoids it at all costs. That means night travel, night setups, etc. When I get called to Luther’s trailer for business meetings, it’s always at night and the lights are out.”

Estele knew she was fishing but asked anyway. “Did he ever sign anything? What bank paid off the debts? Maybe we can run a background search?”

“Luther paid me with cash from a suitcase.” Marge bit down on her lip. “I know it looks bad. Don’t judge me, I was desperate. I just wanted to stay on the road and pay my guys and gals the salaries they were owed. We’re a family.”

“Marge, I’m not judging you.” Estele placed her hand on the lady’s shoulder. “I’m asking you to trust me and Val. We’re here to help.”

Confusion clouded Marge’s face. “Who are you people anyway? Law enforcement?”

Where should she start? “More like laws of nature enforcement. We’re members of the enchantment community—you know, humans and supernatural beings with magical powers? We’re here to restore balance. I’m a witch and Val is a practicing brujo.”

“What’s a brujo?” Marge’s lip curled.

“It’s like a wizard,” Estele said, “with a slightly different set of personal issues.”

Val frowned. “Hey, I thought we got past that.”

Looking distracted, Marge blurted, “So, you’re magical beings. Why are you interested in my carnival?”

This wasn’t going to be easy. Everything about Marge’s body language was shouting shutout. “I have to tell you something disturbing and I don't have time to fully explain it. We're sitting on top of a bubble of malevolence that's getting ready to go nuclear, and your carnival is definitely involved."

Marge scrunched her nose. "A bubble of what? What are we sitting on top of?"

"Evil," Val said. "Pure evil, and lots of it. It's been steadily brewing beneath the fairgrounds for years and it's getting ready to surface."

"Evil? Don't look at me. If it's been 'brewing' for years beneath the fairground, it's a preexisting condition and therefore not my fault. I run an honest enterprise. It's not like I tracked evil into your town on the bottom of my shoe and spread it around." A nervous-sounding little chuckle burst from Marge.

"Actually, we think you did." Estele cringed. It wasn't easy being the messenger. What could she say that would make the situation clearer to Marge? "We took some sample readings last night—"

"Readings? Like psychic readings? I'm the pro in that department." Marge planted her fists on her hips. "Was that why you were snooping around?"

"Yes, but let me finish. We took divination readings. Aside from observing strong evidence that your crew was under some sort of thrall, we got an off-the-charts reading of evil emanating from Luther's trailer. We think Luther is up to no good. If he joins forces with whatever evil forces are building beneath our feet, we're all going to have a really bad day."

A stricken expression collapsed Marge's face. "Oh my God! You're right. The San Buena fair has been Luther's goal all along. He's been mentioning it for weeks and double-checked to make sure we were still booked for August. Last night, he even alluded to me that I wouldn't have to put up with his company much longer."

"Where's Luther now?" Estele cast her gaze around the fairgrounds. The sun was up but the crews were still hard at work.

Marge didn't look so good right then. Guilt or nausea had added a greenish cast to her complexion. "My guess is Luther's locked in his trailer, where he always is during daylight hours."

"Does he ever come out during the day?" Estele asked, but she already knew the answer.

Marge shook her head. "Never."

"Good." Val nodded. "That means we are free to investigate this situation without his interference. Marge, we need to get enchanted coffee into every member of your crew. It's got to be obvious that Luther has kept you and the workmen under some sort of thrall that needs to be broken ASAP. Those guys were working this hard ten hours ago. They must be ready to drop from exhaustion."

Looking like she was ready to faint as well, Marge nodded. "Just tell me what to do. I'll help you get coffee into everybody. Once the spell is broken, what do we tell everyone?"

Val headed to the trailers, talking over his shoulder as they walked. "We tell them the truth. They've been exploited by some kind of supernatural being, exposed to massive amounts of enchantment, and worked hard on top of it all. Most of these guys are going to fall into a mojo hangover the moment the enchantment lifts. Who knows what to expect? The most important thing is we have to disassemble the carnival and cancel the county fair. It's not safe for the public to be here when the bubble of malevolence blows."

Marge's jaw dropped in shock. "We can't cancel the fair! Tickets are sold. The gates open in an hour. There are people and vendors who are already on their way. There must be something else we can do?"

Val held up the thermos. "Come with me. Let's make sure everyone on your crew drinks the coffee and the enchantment is broken. Once everyone is thinking clearly, we can get them on our side, which might be tricky because some people will need to be slapped in the face."

Marge rolled her eyes. "We're going to force-feed the crew coffee and slap their faces? There are a couple of fellows I've been itching to slap. Okay, I'm game. Let's start!"

Estele knew what she had to do. "Marge, of all your crew, who's the best at picking locks?"

Looking weary, Marge grumbled, "That would be Sparky the Clown. Actually, I think he did time for breaking and entering in Lompoc. He's already sided with Luther, so I'm not sure we can trust him."

A clown felon? How icky was that? Was Sparky the same asshole who taunted her with the pie, or maybe he was the nasty clown Val struck with a sea bass? Whoever Sparky was, odds were he'd already gone over to the dark side and wasn't coming back. "Let's get some enchanted coffee in Sparky and see if we can get his lock-picking tool kit away from him."

"Why?" Val asked.

"Because I'm breaking into Luther's trailer. I want to see what we're dealing with."

"No." Val took hold of Estele's shoulder. "I'm not letting you do that by yourself. We don't even know what Luther is. It's too risky. I'm going with you."

"What about the crew? Those poor guys have been under enchantment nonstop for hours. They can't take much more."

Marge grabbed the thermos. "I'll take care of the crew. I can shove a turkey baster in someone's mouth like a champ. Estele's right, daylight is the only time to confront Luther."

Val took Estele by the hand and took off at a jog. "Let's hurry."

Estele took a stumbling step forward. "Hold on, we don't have a tool kit or anything to pick a lock with."

"Yes, we do." He pulled her forward.

They rushed toward the far part of the parking lot where the tractor-trailers were parked. The hum of generators and the scent of diesel hung heavy in the air. A large black trailer with flames painted on the side stood apart from the rest.

Estele crept up the folding steps and pulled on the door handle. As expected, it was locked. She motioned to Val with a shrug.

Val dug into his pocket and removed the tiny dagger that had fallen off the shattered divination necklace. He brought the slender blade to his lips, delivered a kiss, and mumbled a prayer. Then he held the miniature blade in front of the lock. Like a magnet to steel, the blade flew from his hand into the lock and turned. The lock clicked and the blade flew back into his hand. He smiled, tapped the door handle, and waited as the door slowly opened into an interior as dark and airless as a tomb. He motioned.

Estele hesitated. Was he asking her to go first? Whatever happened to chivalry? With her heart racing, she tiptoed up the steps and peered into a blackness that carried the distinct scent of sulfur.

“Waaaah!” The dead-white face of a screaming clown appeared in front of her, waving his hands and baring yellowed teeth. “Let me out of here!” he wailed.

“Oh shit!” She fell backward into Val arms. A vision from Hell. What was going on?

The clown crowded past her. “Thank you! Thank you! He leaves me trapped in there and forgets me. I can’t stand it anymore!” The clown’s comically huge shoes slapped the ground like flippers as he ran, ducking between other trailers. Seconds later, he was out of view.

“Was that Sparky?” she mouthed. “What was that about?”

Val pushed the door all the way open and stuck his head inside. “Time to find out.” He took his phone out of his pocket and used it as a flashlight. The bright beam of light swept the inside of the trailer. “It smells familiar, doesn’t it?”

Lair of the smoke beast. “What do you see?” She tugged on Val’s sleeve and dared to follow him into the unknown. The trailer was nothing special or suspicious. It had stacked bunk beds, a kitchenette, and even a small bathroom. Every surface was spotless and free of any sort of personal clutter. There wasn’t even a toothbrush near the sink. She opened a tiny refrigerator, which was empty. Her gaze swept the trailer. “That’s weird. Where’s Luther? There’s no one here.”

“Correction. He’s here.” Val swung the light into a corner. On a countertop sitting by itself was a squat brass lamp, the kind used in the ancient world to burn oil and make wishes. Its golden tones glistened in the light, like something straight out of One Thousand and One Nights. He picked up the lamp and handed it to Estele. “Well, well. Who would have guessed? Luther’s a djinn.”

Estele held a finger to her lips. It made sense, a djinn that traveled the night in the form of smoke. She should have thought of it sooner. “Hush.” She mouthed, “Don’t wake him.”

Val’s lips pulled taut and he nodded to indicate he understood, then pointed to her purse and mouthed, “Open your handbag.”

Estele shook her head. It was nerve-racking enough carrying around the Heart of Hecate; did he really think it was a good idea to slip an evil djinn into her purse too? She mouthed, “Take your shirt off.”

Without questioning her, Val pulled his hoodie over his head. A cap-sleeved T-shirt beautifully displayed his broad chest and heavily muscled arms. He handed the still-warm jersey to Estele and she used it to wrap the lamp tightly in a snug and hopefully soundproof cocoon.

“There.” She anxiously cradled the muffled object in her hands. “Let’s pray Luther can’t hear us from inside his lamp. What do we do next?"

His mouth opened and he appeared to be at a loss. "Have you ever dealt with a djinn before?"

"No, have you?"

Val warily eyed the hoodie. "What exactly are we dealing with? Do we have a tiger by the tail? What if he wakes up or escapes the lamp? How powerful is a djinn?"

"I don't know." She shrugged. "There are no djinn in the San Buena enchantment community, so I've never met one before. I've heard stories about an evil djinn who passed through town twenty years ago and caused a bunch of trouble, but that was an isolated incident."

He stared at the wad of fabric in Estele's hands as if he expected it to spontaneously combust. "How did the community handle him?"

"We could ask Miss Dahlia or Witch Griselda. They might remember the details, but I'm not sure they had to do much of anything. After turning the enchantment community upside down looking for a 'special witch,' the djinn vanished on his own."

"Vanished?"

"Yep. He left town and we never heard from him again. The story was he was looking for an all-powerful witch to join forces with, and the ladies at the Master Mage Magic Academy were having none of it."

Val made a motion to leave. "Let's take Luther to the truck and ask Bruno what we should do. Maybe he knows something about trapping or enchanting djinn, though I doubt it."

She clutched the wadded hoodie so tightly in her hands, her knuckles blanched. "You lead the way. I'm so scared I'm going to drop him and that menacing cloud of black smoke is going to pop out and start doing crazy shit!"

"Keep your voice down." Val looked terrified. "Don't wake him. Watch how you're handling the lamp. Don't accidentally rub it, or summon L-U-T-H-E-R by making a W-I-S-H."

Estele thrust the loathsome packet toward Val. "Do you want to hold him?"

He shook his head. "You're doing a great job. Just go slow and look where you're going. There's a bunch of thick cables coming up. Step high. Watch out for the gaffer tape, you don't want that grabbing at your boots and tripping you up. The asphalt is a little uneven here—"

Staring straight ahead or at the hoodie, she really couldn't see much of anything below the waist. "I get it, Val. I'm being careful." In her peripheral vision, she saw a big yellow Cadillac speed into the parking lot, headed toward the Brujo Tacos truck. She lifted one hand to wave. "Look, it's Fredi! Thank Goddess she's here."

"Watch where you're going!" Val lunged forward, ready to catch the lamp if it fell. "You're making me nervous."

"And you think I'm not anxious?" Taking one cautious step at a time, she managed to walk past an acre of cables and a maze of rides, arriving at the food truck unscathed.

Fredi waited beside the truck looking like a fashion spread for women's breezy summer wear in a red T-shirt dress, bold jewelry, and turquoise cowboy boots. As usual her lips were the color of ripe watermelon and her eyeliner was perfect. She focused on the dark lump in Estele's hands. "What's wrong, honey? Your arms are shaking."

She stopped. Relief and nervous exhaustion left her knees shaking. "I'm holding a mean, smelly djinn and I don't want him to wake and escape from his lamp."

"No, we certainly don't want that." Fredi looked horrified and stepped aside. Miss Dahlia and Witch Griselda were standing next to the truck, eating burritos. "I brought the A Team with me. Bring us up to speed. What's going on?"

Witch Griselda cackled with delight. "This burrito is delicious. Love me a brujo who can cook. That young man with the silver hair is a treat for the eyes."

Estele carefully approached Witch Griselda. "Look. We caught an evil djinn. What do we do with him?"

"Drown him!" Witch Griselda's gaze swept over Estele, examining every detail. "Miss Esposito? Is that you? You're still in one piece and look very much alive. I'm shocked! Do you still have the Heart of Hecate in your possession?"

"Err, yes." She hesitated. "The Heart of Hecate is in my purse. What do you mean by 'still in one piece'? Grissy, what were you expecting would happen to me?"

"With the gates of Hell opening beneath our feet, I was expecting to see something a little more gruesome." Griselda waved Estele's comment away. "Like decapitated walking dead or a plague of blisters upon the masses. That sort of thing."

Old Griselda seemed uncharacteristically sharp this morning. What was up with that? "Did you know about the bubble of malevolence before you arrived this morning?"

Fredi looked confused. "What are we talking about? Someone tell me why I'm here."

Still gumming her burrito, Griselda grinned. "I've known about the bubble of malevolence for some time. Until today, I never said anything about it because there was no need." Her eyes bulged. "There's a need to mention it now. Believe me. There's a shit storm headed our way."

She was stunned. "How come you knew and the rest of us didn't?"

Witch Griselda swayed on her feet as if she were drunk. "I'm older than dirt, sweetie, and dirt knows everything."

Was that really Griselda's idea of an answer? Maybe there was a second meaning hidden in the first? Estele drew a blank and let it go. Sometimes it just didn't pay to follow Griselda's logic too closely.

"Unwrap the djinn." Griselda pushed past Fredi and leaned closer. "Let's have a look at the troublemaker."

Estele pulled the hoodie away and clutched the lamp's ornate handle. She brought her finger to her lips, hoping against hope that Grissy wouldn't squeal loudly and wake Luther.

"Packed inside his protective shell like a brass turtle." Griselda popped the last bite of burrito into her mouth and mumbled, “Let’s get back to the subject of drowning. That handsome brujo who made our breakfast burritos said he’d enchanted a boatload of coffee.” She pointed to the spout of the lamp. “I say we trickle coffee into that lamp, stick a cork in the spout, and give it a good shake.”

Disappointment dragged her hopes down. That sounded like a terrible idea. “Grissy, that might be like swatting at a hornet’s nest with a broom. If Luther wakes, a cork won’t hold him inside.”

Fredi brushed her fingertips against the lamp’s lid.

Estele snatched it away. “Careful, Fredi. Don’t make any rubbing motions on the surface. We don’t want to summon him.”

Horror shone on Fredi’s face. “Sorry. I didn’t think of that. What do we know about this djinn? Does he have a master?”

Estele shook her head. “From what Marge said—”

Miss Dahlia broke her silence. “Who is Marge?”

“Marge Shamansky, aka Madame Shamansky, the all-seeing eye of destiny. She owns this carnival.”

“Fascinating.” Miss Dahlia moved her wire spectacles up her nose and bent over the lamp. “How did Madame Shamansky acquire the djinn, through enthrallment or bargaining?”

“According to Marge’s story, it sounded like the djinn acquired her.” Estele was getting nervous as hell standing out in the open holding a real genie in a lamp and waiting for it to all blow up under her nose. “Luther approached here a few weeks ago, paid off her debts, and joined the carnival. From what she said, it seems like Luther has been pulling all the strings since.”

“Luther was free to act on his own behalf?” For a moment, Miss Dahlia compressed her lips so tightly they disappeared. “Am I right in assuming Madame Shamansky does not have command over this djinn?”

Estele lowered her voice. “Madame Shamansky didn’t even realize Luther was a djinn. This is all new. Val and I broke into his trailer and saw the lamp. We made the discovery a few minutes ago.”

Fredi clamped her hand over her mouth and looked worried. “Estele, could this be one of your misunderstandings? That’s how you know we’re dealing with a djinn? You found a lamp? What if it’s just an incense burner or a paperweight?” She pulled a wand from her boot and pointed it at the lamp. “We’re whispering and walking on eggshells in front of a brass knickknack, but do we even know if anyone’s inside it? Maybe I should give it a blast of Wiccan plasma and see what happens?”

The ruby in Estele’s purse pulsed alarmingly bright, bathing the side of her jacket in blood-red light. “Wait. Be careful, Fredi. No blasting. Luther can be very destructive. He takes the form of black smoke and gets people to surrender their will to him, so let’s go slow.”

“Okay.” Fredi aimed her wand at the ground. “So, what’s next?”

Miss Dahlia looked worried. “I haven’t had much experience with djinn, but from the little I know, a djinn clever enough to secure his free agency and move about the world without a master is a formidable being indeed. Luther must have been exceptionally devious to avoid a master’s influence.”

“How would he do that?” Estele said. The small lamp was beginning to feel like it weighed a hundred pounds in her hands, and she wanted to drop it.

Miss Dahlia examined the lamp with a frown. “Magic spells bind djinn to their masters. If Luther evaded a master, perhaps that master died or was tricked into freeing him?” She removed the spectacles from her nose and allowed them to dangle from their chain. “Let’s take a peek at what’s going on here.” The glasses swayed in a crooked arc, then reversed direction and spun counterclockwise like a pendulum. Finally they lifted into the air and hovered for a gravity-defying moment on a horizontal chain like an eager dog pulling on its leash. “Great Goddess! Look at that. Without doubt there’s a powerful supernatural force occupying that lamp.”

Fredi bit her lip. “What do we do? Can we throw the lamp off the pier and bury him at sea?”

Miss Dahlia rubbed her head. “That won’t work. Djinn are anaerobic. They can survive underground or underwater for millennia. Technically, when they are inside their lamps, they occupy another dimension. Luther’s extra dangerous because he can come and go at will. He doesn’t have to wait to be summoned by a master.”

Estele’s stomach gurgled. This was a very disturbing topic that left her feeling sick. “Marge said Luther only comes out after dark and doesn’t allow anyone to look directly at him.”

“There’s a reason for that,” Captain Manx’s gruff voice boomed at her back.

“Where have you been?” Startled, Estele lurched, afraid she might drop the lamp as she turned. “Captain, why do you say that?”

The captain’s expression was dour. “I had a harrowing run-in with a djinn in Singapore. I was bamboozled into allowing one of those wretched lamp-dwellers aboard my ship and I shall regret the decision forever.”

Estele tapped her foot. “I wish you’d said something earlier. For instance, when we were being attacked throughout the night would have been the perfect time to mention your suspicions about a pissed-off evil djinn.”

“I didn’t know I had to!” The captain lifted his hands skyward in a dramatic gesture. “Evil whirlwinds of black smoke... it seemed so obvious.”

“It wasn’t obvious to me. Now we’re in harm’s way.” She was the one holding a freaking djinn and waiting for the sneaky bastard to go kaboom. “No more surprises, Captain. Tell me everything you know about djinn. We’re fighting on multiple fronts. We have a bubble of malevolence beneath us, a freelance creep in a lamp who might be listening to every word we’re saying, and thousands of unwitting fairgoers who are going to be walking through those gates any minute.”

“Where to start... where to start.” The captain rolled his eyes. “On my travels through exotic lands, I learned the race of djinn was originally created as a caste of angelic warriors pledged to serve mankind, but over the centuries contact with too many greedy and foolish humans left them resentful of the role of servant. As I was told, some djinn are trustworthy and wondrous to behold, but I later learned the ones that get traded in gambling dens are deceptive devils. When a lamp was handed to me at a waterfront gambling table as payment for a winning hand, I was pleased as punch. Not three days from shore, I discovered I got an angry, human-hating djinn eager to cause problems at every opportunity.”

Human-hating djinn? That was so not what she wanted to hear. “What did you do about it?”

“There was nothing I could do! Rightfully I should have been the djinn’s master, but he was crafty and quick to limit my influence over him. The moment I summoned him, he proclaimed all commands spoken aboard my ship were null. In no time, Shai, as we learned he was called, became a tyrant, endangering and tormenting my crew. We spent hellish weeks at sea, trapped and treated like rats, yet somehow I survived. I alone made it to the port of San Buena alive, sailing a derelict ghost ship. The crew’s suffering and my guilt for having taken such a fiendish monster aboard in the first place will forever be branded into my mind. If I could take back my actions and change the facts, no matter the price, I would.”

Estele stared at the lamp in her hands. “Are you saying you sailed into San Buena’s harbor and came ashore with an evil djinn? How could you do that to innocent people?”

“No!” Captain Manx appeared appalled at that suggestion. “I did what any responsible captain would do. I came as close to the docks as I dared, then doused the cargo hold with oil, set the ship ablaze, and leapt over the side. The Lady Alice burned to the waterline, and the debris, including the lamp, sank into the sea. I spent the rest of my life trying to warn others of the dangers of accepting an enchanted lamp at the gambling tables, but no one wanted to listen. Stories circulated that I’d gone mad and tortured and killed my crew one by one. It was a horrible lie to live with.”

She looked at the captain. Without doubt he was telling the truth. No wonder the poor man ended up in the house on the hill, desperate to numb himself with anything he could get his hands on. Real pity for Manx filled her heart. “I’m sorry you went through what you did. I can’t even imagine.” She turned toward Miss Dahlia. “Do you think Luther is the same djinn, and if so, how did he get ashore?”

Miss Dahlia eyed the lamp like it was a coiled rattlesnake. “Let’s find out.” She dangled her eyeglasses on a chain above the lamp. “Is Shai the djinn now going by the name Luther?”

Everyone took a step closer as the glasses swayed back and forth over the lamp’s lid in an east-to-west direction.

“That’s a hard no.” Miss Dahlia nodded.

The lamp felt like a noxious thing she wanted to toss into a volcano. “Ask if Shai is still on the bottom of the harbor.”

“I’m almost scared to know.” Miss Dahlia allowed the eyeglasses to dangle from her fingertips as she nervously licked her lips. “Are there two djinn in the vicinity?” The glasses reversed direction and swung north to south. “Uh-oh. That’s not encouraging.”

Estele glanced at Fredi and shivered. “Let’s see if we can pin his location down. Where is Shai?”

The glasses moved away from the lamp, swung in a wide circle, and then began to rock back and forth in line with the distant hillsides. “Look at that. How odd. I expected the glasses to point toward the ocean.” Miss Dahlia walked away from the lamp and the glasses resumed circling in an orderly pattern. “This reading is quite unusual. I asked where Shai was and apparently, he’s very near and beneath our feet.” The chain pulled taut and pointed to the midway where most of the rides were set up. “Look!” She covered her heart with her hand. “What does this mean? It’s pointing to a carnival ride, Ghost Pirate’s Funhouse. How odd. Is it possible we are dealing with two djinn? Maybe there’s been a mistake.” She turned toward the captain. “Divination can be tricky. Perhaps there’s some confusion? Are you certain your djinn’s name was Shai?”

Captain Manx nodded. “His full name was Shai-tan. I know because it was branded on his forehead and scratched onto the side of his lamp.”

“Shai-tan?” Estele’s blood ran cold. “Doesn’t that sound uncomfortably close to Satan?” She gently turned the lamp on its side. “Luther” had been crudely carved into the brass. “Uh-oh.”

Chapter 13

Val walked toward the truck. When his gaze met Estele's, his face lit. "Guess what? All the crewmen drank the enchanted coffee and a few of them didn't even have to be forced. Marge can be very persuasive. Everyone's alert and ready to cope. The only problem is they're starving and have a lot of questions. Me and Bruno have a ton of burritos to roll." He pointed over his shoulder as he climbed aboard the truck and shut the door. "I better get to work."

A mob of people, including Madame Shamansky, were headed their way expecting food.

Now what? Estele studied the lamp. Maybe they shouldn't be talking in front of Luther. Just because he wasn't making an appearance didn't mean he wasn't aware of what was being said. If she wasn't careful, the entire plan to battle the rising bubble of malevolence might be jeopardized.

Oh my Goddess! I'm thinking ahead. The moment she thought it, gooseflesh prickled her arms. There wasn't even any need to check in with the Heart of Hecate to know if this was a valid idea or not, she already knew the answer. How amazing was that. Was that a sign that her intuition was working more efficiently than it normally did? She chose to heed the warning and walked to the door of the truck and knocked.

Val opened the door, already wearing a hairnet and plastic gloves. "What's wrong? You look worried."

"Do you have a pencil and pad of paper handy?"

He appeared concerned and his gaze drifted toward the approaching crowd. "Sure. It might take a moment to get it."

"I'll wait."

He ducked inside the cab of the truck and returned a minute later with a pen and a small ledger. "Is this okay?"

She took the items from his hands. "Yes." Wasting no time, she scribbled the words: "DO YOU HAVE A HEAVY POT WITH A TIGHT-FITTING LID?" and showed the message to Val.

Val glanced inside a steel cupboard. "We have several. How big?"

She pointed to the lamp.

"Ah." He reached for a large pressure cooker. "I have the perfect recipe for that dish." Unlocking the thick steel top of the cooker, he took the lamp from Estele's hand and set it on the bottom of the pot, then replaced the lid with a half twist to secure it. He exhaled as he glanced at her. “Do you really think that will hold Luther?”

“I have no idea, but I’m pretty sure he can’t hear us right now. Either way, he knows we’re onto him. How much time do we have until the bubble of malevolence goes kabluey?”

“I don’t have a divination tool. The bubble of malevolence exploded the links of my dagger chain one by one, remember.”

That was bad news. What else was ready to explode?

This was not the time to panic. Too many innocent people would get caught in the crosshairs. “Improvise. Anything can be a divination tool. Choose a metallic object and pour your intentions onto it.”

Val reached for a large steel fork, the sort used to grab food off the grill. “How about this?”

“Give it a whirl.”

“Okay.” Val set the fork down on top of the pressure cooker. “Now what?”

“I meant that literally. Give it a whirl. Let’s see how the fork reacts to your intentions.”

A crowd of hungry people arrived at the window of the truck and began shouting orders.

Bruno stuck his head out the door and called to Val. “What’s going on? You’re wasting time. I need your help serving these guys and getting more enchanted food ready to hand out when the fairgoers get here.”

“Just a moment, Tio.” Val tapped the fork and gave it a firm push. It began to whirl like a compass. He muttered to himself but she overheard. “Where is the energy level at? How close are we to reaching critical mass?”

Estele watched in horror as the fork stopped whirling, lifted vertically onto its tines, and quivered midair. Slowly, the fork began to curve as if it were performing a back bend, until eventually it arched back onto itself, forming a circle. “Uh-oh. What does that mean? Has the energy come full circle? Are we running out of time?”

“Val! Get in here.” Bruno sounded overwhelmed. “They opened the front gate. There are at least a thousand people walking in.”

“Oh shit! We are so unprepared. Just do your best.” She pointed to the pressure cooker. “Stash that somewhere safe.”

Val picked up the steel pot and carried it onto the truck. “Where are you going?”

Marge walked over and took hold of Estele’s arm. “She’s coming with me. Remember the tent of psychic wonders? It’s ready and waiting.”

Estele wasn’t sure this was the best time to wander off with the carnival’s psychic, but Marge’s grip on her arm was insistent. “I guess we’ll walk around a while and see if we notice anything unusual.”

“Wait.” He held his hand out. “Give me your phone.”

She reached into her purse to retrieve it. “Here.” She gave it to Val.

With a few quick stabs of his thumb, he pressed a series of numbers. “Now I’m on speed dial. Call me before things get unusual.”

“I will.” Against her better judgment, she allowed Marge to lead her away. “Where are we going?”

“You’re going to work.” Marge slipped a sky-blue turban on her head and tucked her hair underneath. “See that line forming in front of the white tent?”

“Yes.” A bad feeling took hold. What was up?

“That’s home base for Madame Shamansky, the all-seeing eye of destiny. You’re Estele, seer of the Akash, remember? The gates just opened and we already have a shitload of customers. It’s time to get to work.”

She halted. “We can’t pretend to tell people’s fortunes when we know that evil djinn are planning an attack on the fairgrounds!”

“Look, sweetie, nothing has blown up yet. The psychic prediction business is fickle. You have to catch folks on the right day. Some months it’s the only personal money I earn. There is no way I’m turning my back on that many people eager to hear something positive about their future. Until something more pressing comes along, I’m peering into my crystal ball and swiping debit cards.”

An epiphany hit. Maybe Marge’s idea was a good one after all. She studied the terrain of the fairgrounds. The tent of psychic wonders sat smack-dab in the center of the midway, at ground zero, so to speak. Maybe it wasn’t the worst place to spend a little quiet time and tune in.

Estele glanced over her shoulder. “Fred, get over here!”

Fred looked up from sipping coffee from a paper cup. “What?”

“Don’t make me shout. Just come over here.” Estele waved Fred over.

Taking long, graceful strides like she was strutting down a catwalk, Fred approached. Fred made confidence look effortless and she always knew how to put the beautiful in “big beautiful woman.” The crewmen were staring at her with their tongues hanging out.

Estele intercepted Fred before Marge could interfere. “How sensitive are your extra senses performing today?”

With a deep exhalation, Fred became somber. “What the hell is going on? You called me before dawn because of some sort of emergency. I had no idea what to expect but once I’m down here, I feel like I’m an iron filing standing in front of an industrial magnet. This is crazy. What’s happening beneath our feet?”

Placing her hand on her heart, Estele sighed. “Thank Goddess you feel it too! I wasn’t sure how I would explain it. Basically, there’s evil building underneath the fairgrounds and Val thinks it’s getting ready to blow. Who knows what will happen when it cuts loose, but I have a bad feeling the repair and restore spell will come in mighty handy today.”

Tapping the top of her boot, Fred grinned. “I brought a second fully charged wand just in case I burned one to the ground. What are we up against?”

“I’m not sure.”

Fredi made a sour face. “I should have brought three wands to buy me the tactical time to reload. I saw one djinn added to the soup pot, but where’s the other?”

Good question. Where was that other tricky djinn? “We don’t know, and that’s where I think you could be helpful. Marge wants me to work her psychic tent of wonders with her, but I think I should be boots on the ground doing recon. Would you sit in for me?”

“What would I have to do?”

“What you do naturally.” She had to convince and recruit the most powerful witch she knew, no small feat. “Read people’s Akashic records and say something charming about them.”

Fredi’s cool blue eyes narrowed to slits. “I don’t easily charm people. I intimidate them. I’m a glamour witch. It’s what I do.”

“I’ve known you since witchlets school. You can be very charming when you have to be.”

“Let me get this straight. You want me to sit on my ass and charm people while all hell gathers fury beneath our feet?”

“Yeah.” It was true, what more could she say?

“Okay, but just for an hour or two.” Fredi examined the edge of a manicured fingertip. “This is a serious situation. You’re going to need me working the field with you.”

Once again her intuition kicked in, and she didn’t need the Heart of Hecate to light up like a Christmas ornament to remind her that this was the time to show some courage and leadership and not back down to Fredi as she usually did. She opened her mouth and something unexpected came out. “Fredi, I want you to do more than charm people. Listen to them. Everyone is psychic, but most people don’t realize how psychic they really are. Encourage people to talk to you. Ask what they are feeling. Have they picked up lately on any sudden and unexplained feelings of dread? You know, ask around and see what keywords come up. By gathering what you learn, we might be able to pinpoint the subterranean source of disturbance.”

“I’ll do it.” Fredi looked surprised. “Estele, I want to give you a compliment and I hope it won’t sound like an insult. When you were talking to me just now, you came across as super focused and totally in charge. You reminded me of me. Even the look in your eyes was different. It’s like I caught a glimpse of Estele 2.0 in an alternate universe.”

No one knew her better than Fredi. The comment wasn’t insulting at all, it was heartening. “I reminded you of you? Cool.” Life goals achieved. “So, you don’t mind joining Marge in the psychic tent to play fortune-teller for a little while?”

“Not a bit. You’re the one holding the Heart of Hecate in her purse. This is your call. Though I will step in if I see things going sideways.”

“Fair enough.” Considering her recent past, Fredi was being extremely generous with her trust. “What do you want your name to be?”

“My psychic name?” Fredi tapped a finger to her pink lips. “How about Frederica, the hand of fate?”

“It sounds like a B movie.”

“I know, and that’s why I like it.” Fredi turned and sauntered away. “I’m off to report for duty to Madame Shamansky,” she said over her shoulder.

So far, so good. Estele looked around. The Brujo Tacos truck was swamped with customers. Hopefully Val and Bruno had enchanted a little of everything on the truck and people were getting some mojo-laced immunity along with their salsa. The most unsettling detail was how many people had already arrived for the fair. Who knew flocks of early birds did the county fair in the morning? The midway was packed, long lines had formed in front the most popular rides, and fairgoers were streaming into the parking lot by the busload. At this rate, by noon this place would be jamming.

Estele peeked into her purse. The gem was safely nestled at the bottom and appeared calm, with only the faintest glow. She reached inside to pet it. “What do I do next?” she whispered. “I’ll do whatever you tell me to do.”

A child carrying a cloud of blue cotton candy on a stick walked past and pointed at Estele. “Look, Mommy! A crazy lady talking into her purse.”

The mother blushed pink. “Maybe she’s on the phone, dear.” They hurried toward the Ferris wheel.

“I’m petting a rock!” Oh well, not everything had changed. People still looked at her with interest and suspicion, as if she were some sort of brightly colored but mysterious creature that may or may not be poisonous.

As she strolled through the fair, a sense of unease built inside. It would have been fun to go on a ride, but it wasn’t appropriate to relax and enjoy herself knowing trouble was brewing below.

She grew more anxious. When it happened, what shape would it take? Would she receive any warnings before it broke out? Worst of all, she didn’t even know what she should be looking for. She walked past a garishly painted ride as a carny dressed like a clown buckled riders into the Tilt-A-Whirl and set the ride in motion. He turned to glare at her. What was that about?

A group of Johnny Cash impersonators dressed in black streamed past her, with their hair slicked back and long coats flapping in the ocean breeze. All carried guitar cases and were headed toward the stage.

The sight brought a smile to her face. Johnny Cash was huge in San Buena. He’d once lived nearby, and everybody still loved him and held a yearly tribute. One of the few facts she knew about her father, Ernesto, was that he had been a devoted Johnny Cash fan.

A petting zoo had been assembled near the far end of the fairgrounds. She walked up to a beautiful little white pony with a silky platinum tail that brushed the ground. Stroking the pony’s forelock, she gazed into the animal’s soft eyes. “Hello, sweetheart,” she cooed. Like every other little girl, a real pony would have fulfilled her childhood dreams and erased years of painful loneliness—or not. Still, how could she not love a pony? “How are you doing?”

The pony glanced from side to side to see if anyone was standing near, then said, “We’re all in danger,” in a distinctly male voice.

Her jaw dropped. “Are you talking to me?”

The pony blinked. “I ain’t talking to your boots, although I will say those laces look mighty tasty.”

“You would chew up my bootlaces?”

“In a heartbeat.” The pony snorted. “I’m bored out of my mind and I like to chew, so sue me. I nip bad kids too. You’re the sweetheart. Come a little closer and pet me again.”

Estele stepped away from the fence. “No. You’re a naughty pony. I can’t trust you.”

“You can. I want to warn you about something.” With a grunt, the pony pissed a heavy stream that formed a puddle between his hooves. He frisked away from it with an adorable shake of his head. “Sorry about that, it had to happen. Estele, you have to watch out for the clowns.”

“A miniature horse is warning me about clowns? Of course clowns are a problem! Tell me something I don’t know, like why is a pony talking to me? By the way, how do you know my name?”

“We all know your name.” The pony whined and playfully stomped his little hooves when some fairgoers walked past. “You’re Estele, the powerful witch mentioned in prophecy.”

Her breath caught. “There’s a prophecy about me? No way. I think there might be some confusion here. That can’t possibly be me.”

“I’m pretty damn sure it is. You certainty have Luther rattled. Last night, I saw you and that guy scoping out the carnival. I was trotting around behind the trailers and watched Luther turn into a smoke bull to chase you off. He’s scared of you. I heard him tell a clown that you could ruin everything.”

“Ruin what? Don’t be vague. Give me some details and I’ll get you a cabbage taco from the food truck.”

“Hell yeah! I’d like that.” The pony batted his lashes. “Luther plans to set his brother free. They have some wild scheme to take over the West Coast as their earthly territory.”

A sickening feeling gripped her. “Is his brother named Shai-tan? You know, sounds like Satan? What do you mean by earthly territory?”

Curling his lips back, the pony revealed his long teeth. “They say the djinn are supposed to serve mankind. Bullshit. Look how Luther served me. One minute I’m a high roller at the Aladdin Casino, the next morning I wake up a freaking pony in a petting zoo. I won that bastard fair and square at a blackjack table. Luther owes me. When things get put right, I plan on polishing that bastard’s lamp to a hard gloss with all the apology requests I’ll be making.”

“Are you Luther’s master?”

“What do you think, lady? I’m crapping on sawdust and nibbling alfalfa pellets from kids’ hands. Do I look like I’m anybody’s master?”

“So, Luther tricked you and trapped you in a pony’s body and—”

“And ran off with Marge Shamansky’s carnival. I feel for that poor woman, but that’s a whole other story.” The pony bobbed his head.

Val walked up to Estele with his eyes shining. “Hi, I wondered where you went. I wasn’t expecting to find you at the petting zoo.”

She turned. Val’s face radiated warmth, like he was looking at something that thrilled him. No one ever looked at her that way, and it felt great. “What are you doing over here? Last time I looked, the line for the truck was long.”

He smiled a slightly crooked, charming smile. “It’s still long and getting longer. You won’t believe what hap—”

“Hush.” She glanced at the pony. Was it wise to talk in front of this poor bewitched creature? Better safe than sorry. She patted the pony’s head. “See you later, Blackjack.”

Val appeared confused. “Who names a snowy-white pony Blackjack? Or were you being ironic?”

“I’ll tell you later.” Taking hold of Val’s sleeve, she led him away. “So what are you doing over here? Who’s rolling enchanted burritos?”

His gaze was riveted on Estele. “My primary job is to be your protector. I should never have allowed you to walk off on your own, even for a moment. Especially not in this environment.”

“And our job,” she countered, “is to protect innocent people. Who’s helping Tio Bruno to make and distribute the enchanted food?”

In daylight, Val’s eyes were not as dark as she had originally thought. When sunlight hit the irises at the right angle, soft cinnamon tones appeared. “Don’t worry. Bruno is getting plenty of help.”

They walked past a vendor making cotton candy. The slightly burnt but sweet scent of spun sugar filled the air. “Who’s helping him?”

“Witch Griselda.”

“What?” Could this be dangerous? “You let old Grissy work your food truck?”

He reached for Estele’s hand and held it as they strolled. “Griselda insisted. She climbed aboard the truck, mumbled an incantation, and turned into this willowy red-haired fox in front of our eyes. Bruno was dazzled. The two of them seemed to click. I’ve never seen Bruno react to a woman this way. They set up an assembly line: Bruno made food, and then Griselda enchanted it. She has another trick too—she cast a multiplication spell on some of the good stuff and now we have more than enough of everything. Miss Dahlia is walking around the fair handing out free samples. So they don’t need me, and I would rather be with you anyway.” He gave her hand a gentle squeeze as he led her down the midway.

Wow. They were strolling hand in hand around the fairgrounds, and except for the potential of evil bubbling up and ruining things for everyone, all seemed right with the world. This must be what other people felt like all the time. They fell in love and planned futures that looked bright. How great would it be to wake up one day and discover she was just like anybody else, and she too could have what they had. The only difference would be she’d never take normal for granted.

In the arena, speakers began to blare Johnny Cash songs as the first of the tributes began.

Val led Estele toward the Ferris wheel and stood at the ticket gate. “Let’s do a little recon.”

She glanced up. A giant spinning machine, rocking in the ocean breeze, perched on top of a bubble of malevolence? “Wait a minute. You want to ride a Ferris wheel assembled by a crew who were under the thrall of an evil djinn when they did the work? Are you sure about that?”

“Are you afraid of heights?”

“Not really.” Other things scared her more. It would be bad to fall twelve stories from a broken Ferris and land on a creepy clown. That was just about the worst-case obituary scenario she could come up with. Early reports claim Miss Esposito fell from the teetering Ferris wheel onto a roving pack of feral clowns. “Except in certain circumstances.”

“The Ferris wheel’s not the problem—it’s what’s under our feet that’s going to give us a hard time. Besides, from up there we can see things we might otherwise miss.”

He had a point.

The wheel stopped to allow two riders to disembark. The operator opened the gate and motioned for them to board. “I remember you!” He pointed to Val. “You forced me to drink coffee, and you were damn pushy about it. I’ve been caffeine free for two years. Now I’m jonesing for more. Thanks a lot, buddy.”

“You’re welcome.” Val waved any negativity away. He gently placed his hand on Estele’s back and guided her aboard. “Ladies first.”

She and Val sat and the operator locked the bar across their laps. His thigh pressed against hers and he made no attempt to move it. They sat squeezed together though the seat could have accommodated three. The operator pulled the brake and the wheel swung into the air.

Her stomach dropped and the breath rushed out of her. “I hope we don’t die up there.” The initial rate of speed was surprising. Did Ferris wheels always go so fast?

“This wheel has some serious horsepower driving it.” The innocent joy on Val’s face softened his strong features. “I love being next to the ocean and seeing a view. Look at that odd fogbank creeping up on the surf. Wait, it’s not just fog. There’s an old square-rigged schooner sailing along the coast.”

She closed her eyes and clutched the bar. Who cared about ships? In her childhood memories, Ferris wheels were slow, easy rides that even Grandma Lena had been willing to take her on, but this wheel was fierce and not for the faint of heart. A stiff gust of wind blew off the water, making the entire structure shudder. “Whoa! Was this a good idea?”

“Fate had the right idea in pairing us as allies.”

She opened her eyes. The emotion in his gaze stunned her.

Val touched Estele’s chin and drew her toward him. His expression morphed into something more subtle and hard to define. “You’re so beautiful. I have to kiss you.”

Her breath caught. Did he really think she was beautiful and not just cute, kooky, or worse, “that weird girl who tries too hard”? How wonderful would it be to have something like this work? Without thinking, she cupped his face and pulled him near. The first moment of contact was hers to offer and she made it count by allowing all the excitement surging through her to transfer to the kiss. His hands tangled in her hair, capturing her against his chest as he brushed his lips against hers. She shivered as chills not caused by the cool breeze passed between them. A psychic flash of knowing that Val was essential to her future happiness and what they were sharing might not end followed. As sensations built between them, the thought, this is true alchemy, shot straight to her heart. What a breathtaking kiss.

A wall of mist swirled through the air and congealed around them. A second later Captain Manx crowded beside Val. “Whee!” he squealed with delight. “What is this thunderous conveyance we are perched upon? This circular romp is as soul-bracing as scurrying up the mast in a storm. I like it!” The Ferris wheel crested its arc and made a swift descent. “There goes me stomach! I feel as floppy as a beached walrus, burping up fish.”

She drew away from Val. The beautiful kiss had been ruined. “Captain, you won’t throw up because you don’t have a stomach.”

“Right you are, miss.” The captain’s eyes glittered with enthusiasm. “So many people here! Where do they all hail from? Who are all those men, standing on the stage dressed in black singing sea shanties? They look like undertakers. I see Miss Dahlia over there handing out treats! I wish I’d met her when I was alive. I’ve always had a sweet spot for a bold lass who’s not afraid to wear a big bustle under her dress.”

“Captain. Miss Dahlia is not wearing a bustle. That’s her.... Never mind.” Estele’s tone was sharper than she’d intended. “Why are you up here?”

The captain thrust his arms to the side and flapped like a bird. “I came to tell you that while scouting for the ghosts of my lost crew, I’ve serendipitously located the subterranean source of evil.”

She nodded. “Yes, we already know the bubble of malevolence is beneath the fair. We were just waiting for something more concrete to—”

“Not just below the fair.” The captain pointed to a brightly painted ride that had a grotesque gaping mouth as its entrance. “It’s directly below the funhouse.”

Her gaze focused on the somewhat shabby exterior of the funhouse that looked creepy as hell. The sunbaked paint had peeled in places and read “UNHOUSE.” A posse of clowns loitered in front. George Romero should take notes. “I don’t like the look of it.”

Suddenly the clowns burst away from the funhouse like birds startled from the brush. She knew the answer before she asked, “Why are the clowns running away?” Half a dozen clowns shoved their way through the crowds, knocking people down and trampling them with flapping shoes as they fled toward the parking lot.

“Something wrong. It’s starting!” Grabbing Val’s hand, she pleaded, “We have to get off this ride! Make the barker stop the Ferris wheel.”

“Hey!” Val cupped his hands to make his booming voice even louder. “Stop the wheel!”

One glance revealed no one was operating the ride. The wheel swooped into the air for another turn while they remained trapped.

Nervous as hell, she looked around. What could they do?

Captain Manx pointed out to sea and gulped. “Bless my barnacled ballocks! Are my withered eyes deceiving me? Avast, look into the fog. It’s my old ship, the Lady Alice, and she’s going to run aground. I can’t allow that to happen. Not on my watch! All hands on deck, your captain is coming!”

In a poof of mist, the captain disappeared.

Chapter 14

Estele stared at the chaos on the midway as the clowns ran through the crowds shouting and knocking people over. She held on to the safety bar with white knuckles. “Holy crap, what’s going on?” Was it her imagination or had the Ferris wheel sped up as well? “Val, the guy isn’t standing at the brake. How are we going to get off this ride?”

Val stared at the machinery around them as if looking for a switch that would turn the whole thing off. The wheel lifted them once again into a huge arc.

“Help!” she screamed at the top of her voice, but the hum of the carnival’s many generators drowned her out. What could they do? Unzipping her purse an inch, she peered inside. The Heart of Hecate flashed fiery red like a silent alarm. “Pagans in peril! Things are bad. What are we going to do?”

His dark brows met and he looked at her with a grave expression. “Do you trust me?”

“Please don’t tell me you’re some sort of condor shifter who can sprout wings and hang glider us out of this situation, because I can’t handle a hard, fast drop from a speeding Ferris wheel. I will soak my pants!”

“I’m your shield, Estele. I won’t let you get hurt.” He unzipped his hoodie and drew her against his chest. “Wrap your arms around me.”

She reached inside Val’s hoodie and wrapped her arms tight around him. The warm fleece fabric was falsely reassuring. “What are we doing?”

He soothed her with the gentle stroke of his hand on her back. “When the wheel reaches the bottom, we release the safety bar, leap to the ground, drop, and roll. Don’t look up or stand until we get a few yards away or else you’ll be a head shorter than the way you walked onto the ride.”

That made an icky mental image. “Got it.”

“I’ll do the rolling. You just tuck your head and hold on to me like we’re duct taped together, okay?”

“Is this going to work?”

He kissed her lips. “I’m not a condor shifter and you didn’t bring a second pair of pants, so it has to work.”

The wheel started its steep descent. She braced against him. “Give me a kiss for luck. I don’t look good in bruises.”

He brushed his fingertips against her cheek. “We’re going to be okay.”

With Val’s arms locked around her, she began to hyperventilate. “Who releases the bar?”

“I will. The timing will be easier if I do everything. You just hang on tight and go with it.”

The wheel swooped toward the ground. The asphalt came toward them fast.

Val unlocked the bar And curled his body around her. “Jump!”

They leapt from the carriage seat. Val hit the ground first. She landed hard on his chest and got the wind knocked out of her. Together they rolled along the pavement until they reached a safe distance.

Val burst into laughter.

Her leg ached, but otherwise she was fine. “What’s so funny?”

“There’s some ticket stubs stuck to your cheek.” He brushed them away. “Are you okay?”

She shifted her weight from underneath him and checked to see that her purse was still with her. “I’m all right.” She stood and when she did, her knee buckled. “Ouch. Maybe I’m not all right. Give me a minute to walk it off.” She hobbled in a circle. Where was everyone? There was no one near the Ferris wheel. Had the clowns chased everyone away?

The ground trembled and a gust of wind howled through the midway, filling the air with an intense static charge. The tiny hairs on her nape stood. “What’s going on? I feel like I’m standing on an electrified metal plate. Something’s happening.”

The Johnny Cash impersonators became silent before bursting into the next song. She listened to the first notes and gasped. It all became clear. A psychic vision unlike anything she’d ever experienced burst into her thoughts. Power had been building beneath their feet and waiting for the proper signal that all the players were in place and it was free to cut loose. Luther was communicating a signal to someone or something else that now was the time to strike. “No! Not that song. Someone tell them to stop. This can’t happen.”

“Love is a burnin’ thing....”

She grabbed her knee. “Val, I can’t run. Get over to the stage and make them stop singing! Unplug the amps if you have to.”

Val looked at her with confusion. “Why?”

“Just do it. Get over there and stop them before they get to the chorus.”

To his credit, Val didn’t argue. He turned and took off at a sprint.

The deep voices of the many Johnnies boomed across the fairgrounds. “And it makes a fiery ring....”

The ground shook violently and cracked beneath her feet. “Too late!”

Screams rang out near the Brujo Tacos truck. A mob of terrified people waiting in line turned and ran as Bruno tossed the steel pressure cooker out the back door and it blasted a hundred feet into the air with the ballistic force of a cannon ball. As it fell, the top twisted open midair and a whirling black tornado of smoke burst free and swooped over the fairgrounds, knocking over machinery and people in its wake.

“No!” she shouted, but no one heard her. This was bad. An enraged Luther was on the loose, causing havoc. Along a distant fence, a row of blue porta-potties wobbled like dominos threatening to topple. Several startled people thrust the bathroom doors open and fled with their pants around their ankles. A muffled roar that sounded like the blades of a crippled helicopter dropping from the sky deafened her. One by one the portable toilets exploded into the air like Roman candles that flew high, spewed their foul contents, and tumbled back to earth with a plastic-splintering crash.

“Oh shit!” She limped in the opposite direction. The breeze carried the disgusting stench her way. “Really, oh shit! Get me out of here.”

“Mommy, help me!” A child’s panicked cry got Estele’s attention. A little boy was trapped on a ride. An eight-armed whirling octopus ride had seemingly come to life and taken its riders hostage. Its high-pitched chattering motor sounded like a menacing cackle. Its lights flashed like angry red eyes, and one empty spinning car behaved like a grabbing hand, reaching out to knock over barricades and trash cans. Once the obstacles were out of the way, the hulking octopus crept forward on its elbows, scraping shallow furrows into the asphalt.

The Hammerhead ride came to life. It wrenched itself free of its footings and stomped across the midway like a stalking dinosaur, with riders trapped inside.

The Zipper ride turned onto its side and slinked down the midway with its riders screaming to get out.

Estele glanced around in horror. This was worse than anything she’d been expecting. Everywhere she looked the carnival had taken nightmarish form. The ghost ship, Lady Alice, had run aground and translucent ghostly crewmen were floating from the beach to the fairgrounds.

Where was everyone in the enchantment community? Why weren’t they fighting back against this bizarre attack from below? Everywhere she looked she saw panic and not a single familiar face. Was there anybody there to help her?

“And it burns, burns...”

Estele covered her ears. Why were they were still singing the damn song? Couldn’t they see from the stage what was happening on the midway?

Maybe not.

Was she the only witch on duty? Clutching her purse under her arm, she dodged screaming fairgoers and rides gone berserk and limped toward the epicenter of chaos, the funhouse. As she got closer the mood got creepier. The clowns had returned and now stood near the head of the midway, throwing pies at the frightened crowd flooding toward the exits, and laughing as people slipped and fell.

“Fuck you, clowns!” She kicked a pie tin aside. “You picked the wrong side!”

The gaping mouth of the funhouse brought her to a halt. The salt air had beaded the red lips with moisture and the huge teeth appeared ready to snap the bones of anyone foolish enough to walk near

it. Dare she go inside and face whatever it was she had to face alone? She peeked in her purse and the Heart of Hecate throbbed a deep crimson. “You want me to go inside?”

It brightened and pulsed like a beating heart.

“Okay, I’ll do it.” She took a tentative step inside the gaping mouth.

Whoahahahaaaa! A maniacal laugh rose from the ground. The vibration was felt in her chest and almost strong enough to squeeze the air from her lungs. Whoahahaha! The sound vibrated through her again. The mouth of the funhouse filled with black smoke, and then the smoke took the shape of a massive horned head. “Estele!” the voice thundered. “I’ve been waiting for you.”

“Oh crap!” She’d made a mistake and walked into a trap. Turning, she ran, but a huge sooty hand grabbed her by the ankles, tripped her, then dragged her bodily inside the funhouse.

“Val!” she screamed as she was yanked into the darkness, but he was nowhere near and unable to hear her above the cries of everyone else caught in the path of clowns and rogue carnival rides.

The smoke lifted her. Floating and helpless, she found herself surrounded by a sooty, loathsome cloud that blocked all light and smelled like brimstone. The noxious smell made her gag. With violent jerks and twists, the smoke carried her deeper into the funhouse. For a disorienting moment she was able to set a boot down and felt the floor spinning beneath her feet. Involuntarily she spun a couple revolutions before the smoke picked her up again and shoved her down a slide.

Whoahahahaaaa!

Wicked laughter rang in her ears. She slashed at the smoke, knowing she wasn’t affecting it in any meaningful way but needing to do something rather than remain passive. “You have me!” They were moving downward so fast it felt like an elevator dropping. “You got what you wanted. Leave the people on the fairgrounds alone. Call off your clowns!”

“No.” The smoke’s baritone voice sounded peevish. “I don’t have what I want. Not yet.”

All movement came to an abrupt halt. They stopped so fast and hard that Estele bit her tongue. “Ouch! You bastard.”

In a heartbeat, the smoke was sucked from the space and the air cleared. They were inside a womb-like chamber with rounded walls. She turned in a circle. There was just enough light to see that the walls were as dark and lush as red velvet and pulsed like living tissue, breathing in and out. Not a window or door was visible. There was no way this was part of a traveling carnival. “Where am I? This place looks like the inside of someone’s colon.”

“The correct statement is where are we?” the voice echoed from behind.

Startled, she turned, fists clenched, ready to fight. A man at least eight feet tall towered over her. His head was bald and his corded neck was thick as a bull’s. The muscles of his chest and arms were as imposing as coiled rope, and his glossy skin shone a murky shade of green. The name “Shai-tan” was emblazoned on his forehead as if branded into his skin.

“You’re inside my private hideaway under the earth. Isn’t it romantic?” His brows met and sank into a menacing frown. “If you think about it, our situation is almost like Pluto and Persephone’s.

Their partnership got off to a hard start as well.”

Persephone? He’d kidnapped her. Holy crap, she was in a lot of trouble. Her stomach did a nervous flip-flop. “I’m not eating anything down here.” If she showed weakness or fear, this creature with his name burned into his forehead would stomp all over her. Tipping her chin, she looked up at him. “Well. I guess I don’t have to ask your name. Mind if I just call you Shai, for short, even though you’re not short?”

“Shut up! I will do the talking.” His lips curled into a sneer, revealing jagged teeth filed to points. “All humans think you’re so clever. Once you’ve trapped a djinn you start ordering them around like tyrants. ‘Speak only English... Write your secret name on your forehead so any master can know it... Make me rich... I wish for more wishes.’” He gagged. “I’m sick of it. It’s my turn to have a few wishes granted.”

Suffering Sibyls, what had she been thrown into? Matters were sure to become tricky. This djinn looked even more dangerous than Luther, but maybe there was a way to appeal to a djinn’s basic nature... if only she knew what that was. Her first impression was that this guy was freaking bitter as stale coffee. “You’ve not been treated well, have you?”

“I’ve been treated worse than dirt!” he boomed. “One master after another has made demands of me, and what has it got me? Imprisonment in a limbo realm is what it’s gotten me!”

The walls shook when he spoke.

“Are you making the ground above shake when you get angry?”

His eyes flashed as orange as glowing embers. “Let’s hope so. I want everyone to feel my rage.”

“They do.” Her intuition cried, Give him what he wants. “The fairgrounds are in chaos.”

“Good. Soon I’ll see the world with my true eyes, not just a smoky projection. I can’t wait to be free and escape this lamp forever.”

Uh-oh. She glanced around. That was why things looked so weird. “We’re inside your lamp?” Holy shit, now what? “How did you get here?”

Shai moved in front of her. “Are you being coy, or do you truly not know?”

The space was claustrophobic enough without him stepping closer. “I don’t know.”

“You’re lying!” Shai’s sinister smile displayed all of his spiky teeth. “Do you know how my brother and I found you? That buffoon, Captain Manx, led me straight to you.”

“What makes him a buffoon?”

“Like you, the captain thought he could reason with an angry djinn. He pleaded and bargained with me to spare his crew, but I didn’t. After I granted a few of Captain Manx’s pathetic wishes, I took great pleasure in making him watch as I picked off his crewmen one by one. Of course, I allowed him to live as a witness to what I was capable of.”

How was she going to handle this guy? Why was she having to handle this guy? Someone wiser, like Miss Dahlia, would have been a better choice. “So you admit you can’t be reasoned with. What wish did you grant Captain Manx?”

Shai swelled in size and his eyes blazed crimson. “Insolence! How dare you ask!”

“If I ask, you have to answer. You’re a djinn, I’m a human. Isn’t that how this works?”

“You’re a special case, so I’ll tell you. When we reached the harbor of San Buena, Captain Manx set the ship on fire. As he leaped over the side, he told me he wished for me to bury myself in the mud, forever, which I did.”

Okay. That was interesting. So Shai would do something against his best interests, but only if he was caught in the do-it-because-I’m-your-master loophole. “How did you get beneath the fairgrounds?”

“Wouldn’t you love to know?” His laughter was joyless.

It occurred to her that because she wasn’t his master, he didn’t have to answer her. This djinn-master business was fraught with enchantment-style legalese. He was wasting her time, talking in circles while the people above her suffered in terror. “Shai-tan.” She said his name loudly in a firm voice.

He winced when she said it.

She sensed she had to project the illusion that she was large and in charge even though she wanted to have a screaming meltdown and run away. “I demand to know how you got here and what you and Luther are planning.”

“Demand?” He laughed. “You have no right to demand anything.” Shai thrust his bottom lip out in a pout. His eyes twinkled as if an amusing thought had crossed his mind. “I’m not in the market for a new master, or should I say mistress, but I would make an exception for you. Interested? I literally could make all your dreams come true.”

Aside from the obvious horrible things about this djinn, there was something so repulsive in his gaze. She steeled her spine to speak the next words. “Yes, I’ll be your mistress, and I won’t waste anyone’s time trying to reason with you. We’ll make a straightforward exchange. I ask a question. You make a request of me. Wouldn’t it be nice to have a human do something for you for a change?”

“That would be delightful.” He sniffed the air, making his broad nostrils flare. “But you’re not an ordinary human, are you, Estele? You’re special, something more. I’ve smelled this scent before. You’re a witch, and a very powerful one. You could do a lot for me. Ask your question so I can make my request.”

Yuck. The way he was looking at her was beyond alarming. Obviously, he believed she had something extraordinary to offer him or she’d likely be dead by now. She had to be smart about what question she asked. If only Fredi were here.... No, she couldn’t wish this on Fredi. This was her fate; she was supposed to be here. Shai-tan had been watching her. “Captain Manx is dead and no longer your human master. Why aren’t you free?”

“Even though the captain banished me into the muck of the harbor, I was still bound to him. I projected myself outside the lamp and tormented him at the asylum as much as I was able.”

“Why?”

Shai crossed his arms in front of his barrel chest. “Because I was trapped and frustrated! Even in his madness, the captain refused to free me. Would you want to spend eternity buried deep in slime bound to a ghost?”

“Captain Manx did what he did because he is kind. He didn’t want others to be harmed.”

“Damn him for losing his mind but not his heart. Even after he died, he wouldn’t go away and allow me my freedom. He clung to the fabric of the world like a stain that wouldn’t fade. Decades passed, but the captain never completely left the earthly realm like he should have. The docks were torn down to make way for a pier and beachfront hotels, and still I was trapped in this lamp with my anger growing.

“In another place, I might have lain dormant for centuries, sleeping the years away, but San Buena isn’t like anyplace else, is it? Even the ground here is drenched in enchantment. One day, someone disturbed my lamp. The constant roar of cold surf above me became the hum of heavy equipment and the warmth of sunshine on fine sand. At last, my lamp was brought ashore and left near the surface. Hope for escape soared. Through the walls of my lamp and the ground itself, I was able to eavesdrop on the world around me. In San Buena, there was a level of enchantment unlike any I had felt in the New World. Here, werewolves paddled into the waves on surfboards and vampires stalked under the pier, and nobody seemed to give a damn. I reasoned that surely there was room here for a rogue djinn.”

Estele studied his face. Maybe she wasn’t powerless in this situation. Was it her imagination or was Shai getting anxious, as if something he badly wanted might be snatched away?

He wet his lips. “One day, a young witch and her baby daughter came to the beach to play. The mother and child strolled so close to my lamp, the brass heated and glowed, and I was sure they would see me and pick me up, but they did not. The raw but chaotic potential I felt from the girl was immense. As she passed, I drank in her essence and imprinted it upon the deepest part of my being, so like a compass needle pointing true north, I would always be able to find her. She was the best of what the human realm and enchanted entities had to offer—a perfect hybrid, so to speak. I reasoned that if I could harness her budding abilities, it would be my answer to overpowering and avoiding all servitude to humans for the rest of eternity. You see, I’m beholden to humans, but you, Estele, are not. You’re one of them, yet so much more. Captain Manx is already dead, and all I’m asking of you is to help him leave this realm.”

“What stopped you from becoming a kidnapper until this morning?” This was a disturbing story. “Why would I help you? You’ve already tipped your hand. You’ve got nothing I want.”

“There was an obstacle to remove first.” A strange light flickered in Shai’s eyes. “You know him, or should I say, you know of him. He came between us.”

It felt as if the world had flipped upside down and she was fighting to maintain her balance, or even breathe, for that matter.

“As I said, I’d been looking for a powerful witch to free me from my ghostly master for a very long time. After all the waiting, I finally sensed the presence of someone gifted enough to liberate me from my prison realm. Too bad you were still a tot in diapers with a very protective father ready to fight for you.”

His words were a punch to her gut. “What the fuck are you talking about, djinn?”

“In the form of smoke, I went looking for you. Your astute brujo father caught me hovering over your bed and came looking for me to shut me down.”

She felt light-headed and short of breath. Was it her anxiety or something else? “How could my father find you?”

Shai tapped a thick finger to his forehead. “Estele, you’re not thinking. Concentrate. When were the fairgrounds and those hotels on the beach built? San Buena is an old city that dates back to the days of Spanish missions, but everything along the shore is new, created in your lifetime. What used to be the bottom of the harbor got dredged up and turned into beach, including my lamp. Someone was sure to find me and polish the exterior of the lamp, but I didn’t want just any master with true freedom within reach. I was willing to be patient and selective.”

Her head was killing her. “Free to hurt others? Am I supposed to feel sorry for you? Because I don’t.”

He smiled a sickening grin. “Feel sorry for yourself. You’re the one who should feel bad.”

She felt awful, like a migraine was sneaking up on her. “Why should I feel bad?”

He licked his meaty lips and spoke slowly, as if he relished every word. “Brujos are very good at divination. As you know, they sense any threat to their loved ones or the group and go hunting for it. Your father, Ernesto, died trying to protect you from me. You see, as useful as a brujo master might have been to me, a talented witch of your caliber was even better. Naturally, I wanted you instead, but Ernesto trapped me here and died in the effort.”

Pressure built behind her eyes. Could what he was saying be true, or was this a manipulative trick from a desperate djinn? “That’s a lie.”

“Agree to help me and I’ll allow you to speak to your father, but make it quick, we’re running out of time.”

Running out of time? What was happening above on the fairgrounds? Were innocent people dying? She’d had nightmares less distressing than this. “How can I speak to him if he’s dead?”

“Oh please. Use your imagination. You speak to ghosts every day.” He clapped his big hands. “Ernesto! Where are you? Come out and greet your lovely daughter.”

On a far wall, a lump formed as if someone were pressing against a stretchy barrier. The silhouette of a man took shape and pushed through the wall as easily as the tip of a pencil moves the membrane of a deflated balloon. In a seamless transition, a man stepped into the space they occupied. His body was slightly translucent and the edges wavered like a heat mirage rising from a desert road. Only his face, especially his warm brown eyes, remained in sharp focus. “Estele?” He smiled. “You look like your mother, Mara. So beautiful.”

Could this really be her father who had died protecting her? If this were fact, her entire life story had been a fiction. She stood, stunned with her heart pounding. The comparison to her mother was vaguely offensive, but it was probably true. “You didn’t abandon us?”

Ernesto stepped closer, and his black T-shirt with a portrait of Johnny Cash silk-screened on the front flickered and then came into sharp focus. “Never.”

The T-shirt was familiar. The only framed photo she possessed of her father was a picture of him holding her on his lap and wearing a T-shirt that looked just like this one. Could evil have devised a way that would hurt and confuse her more than showing her an image of her long-lost father and teasing her with the idea that he was really there? Estele raised her hand. “Stay back. This is a trick.”

Shai lifted his chin, a smug grin twisting his mouth. “It’s no trick. Ernesto, tell your daughter what happened. Estele’s a clever girl. She’ll recognize the truth when she hears it.” He stepped aside and allowed Ernesto to speak.

Ernesto spoke slowly, as if choosing each word with care. “The djinn came for you in the night as smoke, but I fought him off with magic and sage.”

Her throat ached and she wanted to cry. Could she possibly be speaking with her deceased father, or was this just what it looked like, a mirage? “How?”

“With all the ensorcellment I could muster. I turned the djinn away from your room with a spell and hoped for the best. When he returned the next night, we did battle.”

“Why didn’t my mother see any of this or tell me about it?”

“The first night Shai-tan arrived, she was asleep and I didn’t want to frighten her. As a brujo and a man, I knew what I had to do, so I acted first. I used my stalking skills and divination tools to track the djinn. I found his lamp buried in a few inches of sand at the edge of a construction site. I knew it was just a matter of time until the lamp surfaced and Shai would be discovered and liberated.”

“I’m confused. Isn’t he free when he takes the form of smoke and roams around?”

“Yes and no. He’s only free as smoke, and only members of the enchantment community would notice him. To a regular human, Shai’s presence is weak and ineffective. To the unwary, a trapped djinn merely feels like a gritty gust of wind, a bad feeling or smell that can’t be located.” Ernesto looked at Shai. “Isn’t that right? When a master traps you, you’re not much of anything at all.”

Shai nodded. “Unfortunately, the sad brujo is telling the truth. While trapped in this damn lamp I can’t do anything but build power and wait for my twin brother, Luther, to devise a plan to release me. He too is recently freed of his human master. I can sense it. Luther is cunning and manages humans with skill. I have lain dormant for over a century, gathering power from the earth and spending none of it. Together, we will unite and rule as a single titanic force.”

Worry for her friends and the community made her chest feel so tight she could barely draw breath. “S-so,” she wheezed, “Luther is the one doing all the damage topside, not you?”

A cruel smile cracked Shai’s lips. “Yep, and I can’t wait to join in the fun. Once I’m free, Luther and I will claim the West Coast as our territory.”

She was intentionally snide. “Just the West Coast? Are you sure that will be enough for the two of you? Why not move into Nevada and beyond?”

“Because a rival djinn rules Vegas!” Shai thundered in a petulant outburst.

“Oh. That makes sense. We all have to learn to live within our limitations. Why now? Why didn’t Luther find you and free you years ago?”

“I can answer that.” Ernesto’s eyes shone with pride.

“Be silent, brujo!” Shai bellowed. “You’ve nothing to tell. I bested you in battle and stole your spirit.”

Estele’s head ached. It seemed impossible to get a full breath. “And you think I would help you after saying something like that to my father?”

Shai grinned. “You’ll help me because you have no choice.”

Ernesto walked behind Shai, standing in his blind spot. He rubbed his palms together and opened them. Glowing letters appeared on his hands that read “Beware. Time is distorted here.”

She leaned closer to Ernesto and blinked. The letters were fuzzy but legible, and she had no idea what to make of the message.

Ernesto briskly rubbed his hands together again and opened them. A new message appeared. “You’re dying, Estele. Shai is slowly suffocating you inside his lamp. Save yourself. Force him to speak his secret self-destruction spell.”

“What’s going on behind my back?” Shai turned to confront Ernesto. “Let’s move on to the matter that concerns me most. Estele, I command you to cast an enchantment that will banish that fool Captain Manx from the earthly plane forever. Then I’ll be free, we’ll be free, and you can have anything you wish for, including stopping the chaos at the fair. I’m sure you wouldn’t want to see children getting hurt unnecessarily.”

Djinn were manipulative, but they didn’t seem very smart. How dare he say “we” as if she would ever accept someone who killed her father as any sort of partner. “First, free my father from the lamp and then we’ll talk about what you want.”

“I’m proud of you, daughter.” Tears formed on Ernesto’s lashes. “But don’t waste a wish on me. You can’t save me. The dead can’t come back to life. I can only move on to the next world.”

His sincerity broke her heart. “But we never knew each other, and I want to. What you did for me and Mara, you did out of love. It was heroic and changes everything.”

“Estele, you’re running out of time.” Ernesto looked worried. “You have a big problem to solve. Put your heart into it.”

Shai stomped between them. “What’s going on here? Estele, why aren’t you casting the spell on Captain Manx? Send him away forever and I’ll release you from my lamp. Don’t you care about what’s happening above?” He turned on Ernesto. “You’ve been here long enough. Go!”

Ernesto was swiftly pulled backward. He retreated into the wall, but the look on his face clearly conveyed that he didn’t want to leave. His eyes had a pleading quality and his hand tapped his heart.

“Estele!”

“Dad!” She gasped for breath. It was getting hard to think. Was that brief meeting all that would be offered? At least she now knew her mother had been wrong; her father had always cared. He had hinted for her to do something, but what? Could he be referring to the Heart of Hecate? Did Ernesto even know she was holding the stone?

Unzipping her purse, she reached for the ruby and removed it. It glowed scarlet as a sunset in her hand.

Shai’s eyes lit at the sight of the gem. “What is that? Is it the source of your power?” He reached for it. “It feels very potent. Have you always possessed it? Hand it to me.”

She shook her head. “Stand back. I need it to cast the spell. That’s what you want, isn’t it?”

The djinn’s gaze never left the pulsing stone. His hand trembled as if he fought the impulse to snatch it from her. “What are you waiting for? Do it.”

“Hold on a moment. I like to freshen my breath before I speak an incantation.” Estele dug through her purse with her free hand until she located the pack of chewing gum infused with Sidhe the Fae’s candor spell. “Try a piece.”

“Why?” Shai stared warily at the offered pack of gum.

“Because it’s delicious.” She pressed the pack into his palm. “Aren’t you curious to try something from my world?”

Shai removed a stick of gum from the pack, unwrapped it, and held it to her lips. “Ladies first.”

Estele bit into the stick of gum. “See? Would I eat it if it wasn’t safe?”

After sniffing the gum like a dog, Shai unwrapped several pieces, shoved them in his mouth at once, and chewed. A smile crept over his face. “I like it.”

Tension rose and left her knees trembling. Would Fae magic work on djinn? There was only one way to find out: start asking questions. “Are you going to kill me?”

He grinned. “My brother likes to trick his masters and turn them into animals. He thinks it’s funny, but I have no patience for that sort of escapade. The moment I’m free of this lamp, you’re dead.”

Her blood chilled at the anger in his tone. “That’s very candid of you.”

He chomped the gum like a cow. “You’ll be dead to the world but still useful to me. I’ll trap your spirit the same way I trapped your father. The two of you can occupy this fucking lamp until the sun swallows the earth for all I care.”

What a nasty djinn. “I’m holding a very powerful stone.”

“I can see that. It doesn’t look or feel like anything a human has any right to possess.” Shai’s gaze narrowed. “I’ll be taking that ruby from you just as soon as I can safely grab from your hand.”

“Shai.” She licked her lips. Speaking took more air than the cramped lamp provided. “Isn’t it true that the djinn are from another realm and only allowed into this one if they willingly serve a human master or mistress?”

Conflict twisted the ugly features of his face into a snarl.

“Don’t stall. Answer me,” she demanded. “And remember, you called me mistress and you must serve me with a correct answer.”

“Yes!” Shai spat the word. “It is true!” He looked disgusted at betraying himself.

“Is it also true that every djinn has a secret phrase that, if said aloud, will cause him to self-destruct and leave this realm forever?”

Shai’s eyes flashed red. He gnashed his teeth together with such violence, his mouth bled.

“Say it,” she persisted. “I compel you to say it.”

He clamped his hands over his mouth and muttered.

“That’s not good enough.” She waved the Heart of Hecate under his nose. “Take your hands away from your mouth and speak the phrase of self-destruction. As your mistress, you must do as I ask.”

His eyes bulged horribly and he looked more frenzied demon than djinn. “Nether, manocathal, holqu mon, Zarran zon....”

The impulse to cower was almost overwhelming. Standing beside a raging djinn was mortifying, but knowing her father was near and proud of her, she held her ground. “What language are you speaking?”

“Djinn, you bitch! I’m speaking Djinn.” Enraged by Estele’s trickery, the veins in Shai’s neck throbbed like tiny snakes writhing beneath the skin. “Nether, manocathal, holqu mon, Zarran zon kalcodar....”

“You don’t belong here anymore.” Her voice was steady and strong. “I banish you from the human realm and demand that you self-destruct. Go home and take your brother with you.”

“No!” he screamed.

“It’s not negotiable. You must do it! Munda quoque oblivisceris. Cleanse our realm of your presence and forget your way back.” Wow, had she just remembered a little Latin? Miss Dahlia would be stunned that she got a spell right. She stepped closer and shoved another piece of gum between Shai’s jagged teeth. “One for the road. Speak the charm of self-destruction. Nice and loud. I command it!”

“Nether, manocathal, holqu mon, Zarran zon kalcodar emar.” He muttered faster. “Nether, manocathal, holqu mon, Zarran zon kalcodar emar.” A crazed look overcame him. “Nether, manocathal, holqu mon, Zarran zon kalcodar emar!”

The air around them heated and the lamp shook. Shai opened his mouth and roared as he burst into a ball of green flames that intensified until he glowed white-hot. The flames reached a zenith and then died down. His silhouette flickered out of focus as he shrank to the size of a tiny orange ember and then exploded in a burst of light that shattered her senses and the walls of the lamp.

Blinded, Estele was knocked to the ground, gasping. “Witches be bitches. Deal with it!”

Chapter 15

Estele woke to bright sunlight in a blue sky. Dozens of shrill seagulls circled overhead, diving as a group to pick discarded containers of food off the ground.

“Are you okay?” Val’s voice soothed her. His hand stroked her cheek. “Estele, what happened to you? I searched inside the funhouse but I didn’t see you anywhere. I came out and you were lying on the ground, gasping like a stranded fish.”

She rose on her elbow and gulped air. Her ligaments were as sore as if she’d been wrestling with a rhino and her lungs ached like she’d been holding her breath at the bottom of the deep end. “What do you mean, what happened to me?” Her voice wheezed. “I just had to jail-break my way out of a djinn’s lamp. That bastard Shai-tan tried to trap and suffocate me.”

He looked appalled. “You were inside the lamp? No way!”

“It’s true. I wish it wasn’t.” Rolling onto her side, she tried to stand and faltered.

“Hold on.” Val was quick to grab hold of her and lift her into his arms. In a single graceful swoosh, she was cradled against his chest. “Don’t try to walk.” He carried her away from the funhouse. “You’re pale and you look faint.”

Wrapping her arms around his neck, she held on tight and looked over his shoulder. The fairgrounds were empty of people and in shambles, rides had toppled, barricades were knocked aside, and wads of cotton candy, trash, pie tins, discarded jackets, and lost shoes cluttered the midway. “How did you know I was in the funhouse?”

His grip on her tightened. “Look in my top pocket.”

She reached into his pocket and pulled out a broken shoelace with a car key tied to it, dangling it from her fingertips. “A makeshift divination tool?”

He smiled. “It didn’t take long to track you down.”

“Smart.” She gazed into his sparkling eyes. “I’ll never underestimate brujos again.”

“That’s good news.”

The rides were empty, and thankfully she saw no injured bodies lying on the ground, but overall the sight was chilling. “Where is everyone? Except for the mess, this place could be a ghost town.”

“Did you mean to say ghost town or ghost ship?” He tilted his head. “Look over there.”

Estele glanced toward the beach. The Lady Alice shimmered on the sand, pale and translucent as green bottle glass, her broad sails billowing in the wind. The ghost crew and Captain Manx trod up the gangplank. “Captain Manx’s leaving and he didn’t even say goodbye. Captain!” she shouted, but he didn’t turn or acknowledge her in any way. “Why isn’t he saying something? Can’t he hear me? Captain!” She wiggled in Val’s arms. “Set me down!” Her feet hit the ground and she ran to the ship, but as the last man boarded, the ship slowly faded and disappeared from view. She came to an abrupt halt and stared at the space where the ship had been. “He’s gone! No drama. No sailing over the horizon. He’s just gone.”

“He was ready.” Val stroked the side of her arm.

“I wasn’t.” First a long-lost father was introduced to her and snatched away, and now that old pest the captain was gone. “The apartment is going to feel empty without him.”

Val kissed her cheek. “Maybe someone else will move in?”

She turned to face him. Was that a hint? Could they work as a couple? They hadn’t really started dating yet. Brujos sure moved fast. “I’m afraid to ask, were there any casualties? Where’s Fredi, Miss Dahlia—?”

“Everyone’s okay and accounted for. You’re the only one we couldn’t find. We were under attack. The midway was a war zone. Everything was in chaos. Luther was howling around the fairgrounds like a hurricane, and the ground was crumbling under our feet, but then it suddenly stopped. Luther disappeared in a ball of black smoke, then nothing, just an eerie silence and sound of crashing surf on the shore. We regrouped and I went looking for you.”

She squinted against the bright light bouncing off the steel rides. “It felt like I was only inside the lamp for a few minutes.”

“More like thirty.” He led her by the hand toward the parking lot. “Everyone’s at the truck waiting.”

They walked past the Ferris wheel that had toppled onto its side. That was an unsettling sight. “What are they waiting for?”

“You. Witch Griselda wanted to know you were safe and accounted for before she changed anything about the fair.”

“What do you mean?”

“Witch Griselda’s holding everyone and everything inside a bubble of protection. The fairgoers are invisible in their current state. Miss Dahlia said they were being held in a safety zone at the edge of this dimension, and we would bring them all back just as soon as the situation is corrected. That’s why you don’t see much going on and the EMTs and the police haven’t arrived. Everyone is in a state of suspended animation, held in the moment.”

“Wow, I didn’t even know that was possible. What a day.” The Brujo Tacos truck sat at the end of the lot, looking shiny and bright and basically untouched by disaster. Fredi, Bruno, Sidhe the Fae, Miss Dahlia and Witch Griselda, Marge, and Blackjack the pony had all gathered on the shady side. “There’s everybody! Hi! I can see them.”

“The enchantment community is the cleanup crew, and we are in the same time zone, so to speak.”

“Cleanup crew? A disaster this size is going to take a hell of a lot more than a broom and a vague explanation to the authorities. This could be the incident that gets us all outed.”

“Estele!” Witch Griselda hobbled toward her, pounding her walking staff on the pavement. “Did you manage to hang on to the Heart of Hecate?”

She reached into her purse and grabbed it. “Yes, Grissy. Here it is. I’m not sure I should be holding on to it any longer.”

“Nonsense.” Griselda waved the comment off. “You’ve done splendidly and sent two troublesome djinn packing. I couldn’t have done that with such aplomb.” She screwed the ruby back onto the top of the staff. “Now that we know where you are, I can start cleaning house. I was afraid to tamper too much with the temporal realm until we knew your exact location.” She waved her staff toward the Ferris wheel. “Lift!” The command was spoken in a regal tone that would not be denied. “Rise!”

With the harsh sounds of flexing metal, the Ferris wheel defied gravity by picking itself off the ground with loud creaks and crunching sounds and set itself upright.

Griselda swept her staff through the air. The Heart of Hecate glowed like a stoplight. “Now for the real magic. Spin!” she commanded. The wheel began to slowly spin counterclockwise. “Emit kcab nrut dluoc I fi!”

Estele listened carefully but didn’t recognize the spell. “Grissy, is that Latin?”

The old witch frowned. “No. It’s something more powerful. It’s the lyrics to a Cher song, sung backward. If I could turn back time!” she sang at the top of her quavering voice. “Uoy ot lla ti evig d’I!” Griselda glanced at Bruno. “I’m talking to you, brujo. If I were ninety-six years younger, I’d melt you like hot fudge on a sundae.”

As the wheel spun, the fair began to restore itself. The rides crept back into the proper places and anchored themselves down. Wads of cotton candy flew off the tarmac, zipped back into the aluminum drum that blew hot air through it, and turned itself back into heavy grains of colored sugar. The porta-potties righted themselves and appeared sparkling clean. Last, the faint outlines of people came back. Jackets flew back onto shoulders and shoes slipped back onto feet. For a moment, everyone was frozen in place, and then they started to move again in one loud, colorful blur of happy activity.

“It’s working!” Estele couldn’t believe it.

Fredi reached into her boot, took out a wand, and gave it a flick. A conspicuous rut that the octopus ride had scraped into the asphalt miraculously filled. “I’m going to do a walk-through and fix anything that looks out of place that anyone might question.”

Sidhe followed Fredi. “Just in case someone remembers what they just saw and starts yapping about it, I’ll slip them a hex and erase their memories.”

Miss Dahlia headed into the crowd. “I’ll cast an enchantment and make sure all the children find their parents and all the parents find their car keys.”

Val took hold of Estele's hand. "I think we should take a walk on the beach. I want to hear about everything that happened inside the lamp."

"Really?" The way he looked at her with such a dreamy expression made her heart race. Everything about him, from the way he touched her to the patience in his voice, gave away his interest in her. It felt great too. "That's a good idea. I think I need to chill." And what would be better than sitting on the sand dunes with Val and watching the waves roll in while she attempted to process her brief meeting with her late father?

She glanced at Blackjack. "After the fair is put right, somebody needs to help this pony. Luther trapped a gambler inside." She petted his silky mane. "What was your name, sir?"

The pony stomped its front hooves, pulled back its lips, and spoke in a gruff male voice. "Harold Rosecrans." He turned to Marge. "Hey, beautiful. Would you get me a carrot?"

EPILOGUE

FOUR MONTHS LATER

The streets of San Buena were decorated for the holidays with thousands of colorful lights strung from lamppost to lamppost. Their cheerful glow chased away the chill of evening fog.

Estele drove her little red VW Bug around a deep pothole. She glanced over to the passenger seat to smile at Val. “I’m so happy you’re with me tonight. This is so important to me.”

Val reached for her hand, brought it to his lips and kissed it. “It’s important to me too. I’m proud of you, Esky.”

Esky. She loved the pet name Val had given her. In past months he’d given her a nickname, confidence, and so much more. Dare she say it, but Val was turning out to be someone she could see herself loving for the rest of her life.

“We’re almost there. The downtown area is going to be crowded with holiday shoppers.” She opened the glove box and cracked the window. “Parking Fairy, do your thing.”

An emerald green spark darted out of the glove box, zipped around the interior of the car, and settled on the steering wheel.

Buzz, buzz, buzzzz, buzz buzz.

“I’m happy you noticed, Fae.” Her Parking Fairy had been a dream to live with lately. No tantrums, no vendettas. In fact, everything about her life seemed to be coming together. “Yes, this is a fresh manicure. I love purple too. This shade is called Eye of Newt. I’m glad you like it.”

Fae flew toward Val’s cheek and affectionately rubbed against it, purring. Buzz, buzz, buzzzz.

“You’re being a little flirt.” Estele laughed and opened the window another inch. “Fae, find us a parking space as close to the Master Mage Magic Academy as you can get.” She almost said thank you, but bit her lip to keep from making such an embarrassing faux pas.

Buzz. Fae flew out the window and raced ahead.

Estele reached over to squeeze Val’s hand. “Fae will be back in a minute with recon and she can guide us in.”

Val was dressed casually but elegantly in a pair of black jeans and an eggplant-purple silk shirt. Looking at him now, with his dark hair swept away from his rugged face and sparkling eyes, it was hard to believe there was a time in her life when she hadn’t loved and trusted a brujo.

Straightening his sleeves, he buttoned his cuffs. “You never told me, why are we going to the Master Mage Magic Academy in the first place? Is it a Christmas party?”

Why were they going? Miss Dahlia had insisted she show up at a certain time and it had never occurred to her to question it. “I’m not sure what it is. It’s a celebration of some sort. We just have to show up. We don’t need to stay.”

Fae returned and zipped back and forth in front of the windshield, pointing the way to a prime parking space situated near the entrance of the school.

“Ah. Parking Fairy found us a great spot. Considering how much traffic there is downtown, I don’t believe it.” She pulled the car over and parked. “Hey! Look at that, the Brujo Tacos truck is here. What’s Tio Bruno doing in San Buena? I thought he was down south this weekend working the San Diego Convention Center?”

Val smiled and glanced away. “We’re both here for something exceptional.”

“What?” A thrill of excitement shot through her. All her intuition told her something good was happening, but the skeptic in her had to ask anyway. “We’re not in trouble, are we? Please tell me we haven’t been named in a group lawsuit from the international djinn community?”

“No.” Val unfastened his seat belt. “It’s nothing like that.”

“I know! Fredi and Gus eloped and this is their secret reception party?”

He climbed out of the car and shut the door. “Nope. The wedding is still on.”

“Good, because I already bought my bridesmaid dress and I actually love it. You’re still coming to the wedding, right?”

“Yes.” Val strode to Estele’s side and took her hand. “You know I wouldn’t miss it.”

They climbed the front steps together. “I take nothing for granted. You and Tio Bruno are so busy. The truck’s booked solid every day.”

Estele pushed the glass doors open and entered a long hallway leading to the inconspicuous staircase at the end.

Val walked at her side, looking nervous. “I want to run something by you. Soon, I’m going to be even busier. My dad’s setting me up in business with my own Brujo Tacos truck.”

She stopped to throw her arms around Val’s neck and hug him. “That’s so wonderful! Congratulations.” The thought occurred that he’d be way too busy to commute the three-to-five-hour drive from down south as often as he did now. “This is good news. We’ll find a way to see each other, won’t we? I won’t be in school forever. It’s maybe another year or two until I graduate. I’m not screwing up nearly as badly as I used to.”

He kissed her lips and brushed a lock of hair from her brow. “You haven’t been screwing up at all. Give yourself credit, sweetheart. Your magic has been pristine. Your father, grandmother, and all your ancestors would be so proud of you.”

When she looked into his eyes as she did now, she saw a beautiful future. Without doubt Val was the one, she just didn’t know how to bring it up. “You say the nicest things to me.”

“I didn’t say it to be nice. It’s true.” Leaning close, he kissed her again. This time the kiss lingered, soft and sweet on her lips. “I want to relocate to San Buena to be closer to you. What do you think of that idea?”

“You mean work your own truck apart from Bruno? Are you kidding me?” She returned his kiss and tangled her fingers in his thick hair. “I think it’s a great idea. You can do it!”

“Tio and I would work big events together, like the Coachella festival. You could come with me.”

“I would love that.” A breathless sensation washed over her. It was as if all her wildest dreams were coming true at the same time. “Maybe you could move in with me?” The large apartment was so lonely during the week now that Captain Manx had moved on. “At least think about it.”

Val wrapped his arms around Estele and drew her against his chest. “Only if you allow me to pay the rent.”

“Is that a macho brujo condition?” She laughed.

“Yes.” He kissed the top of her head. “I love you, Esky. I want to take care of you. I’m offering my heart, good food, rent, and more if you want.”

She sensed he was going to offer marriage, but was she ready for that? Hopefully, someday soon she would be. If a psychic had told her six months ago that she would be living a balanced life and standing beside a good man who loved her, she would have thought them a complete charlatan.

A puff of steam materialized beside them. Witch Griselda appeared in the hallway, looking disheveled and confused. She turned in a slow circle, thumping her staff on the floor and making the Heart of Hecate glow crimson. “I heard talking. Where am I? There you are! Miss Esposito, why aren’t you inside already? Everyone’s waiting for you to arrive.”

Estele hooked her arm through Griselda’s and led the elderly lady down the stairs. “Grissy, as usual, I have no idea what you’re talking about, but let’s walk into the Master Mage Magic Academy together. I would be honored to escort you.”

Griselda patted Estele’s arm. “You’re such a sweet little seraphim. I have no children, but if I did, I’d like to think they would have turned out just like you, dear.”

How lovely to be praised! It was as if the day just got better and better. Estele felt as if she might cry tears of joy.

“You’re just as crazy,” Griselda muttered, “and dangerously unpredictable as I would expect a child of mine to behave. Estele, you are the category-five hurricane that may or may not reach shore. You are the shake-up the enchantment community has needed for a very long time.”

Wow, that compliment took a hard left, but it was still a compliment. Somehow, somehow, she’d arrived. People treated her with affection and respect instead of dread. The incident at the fairgrounds had triggered a change, but Val’s love had taken everything over the top. His belief in her proved to be an act of healing alchemy for her soul. “Thank you.”

Val walked ahead and opened the door to the academy. “Come inside, ladies.”

Estele took slow, careful steps so Griselda could keep up. Once she reached the deliberately nondescript threshold of the Master Mage Magic Academy, she peered into a darkened room. “Why are the lights out? Someone could get hurt.” She reached for the switch.

“Surprise!” a chorus of voices rang out.

The lights flicked on and everyone in the enchantment community that Estele knew, from Sidhe the Fae to Fredi and Gus, and even her usually sour mother, who’d been remarkably civil lately, was looking at her with rapt attention. “What’s going on? It’s not my birthday.”

Griselda smiled and her left eye wandered up and down. “It’s your graduation day, Estele. You’ve worked hard and surpassed all expectations to become one of the most powerful and creative witches the San Buena enchantment community has ever produced. We want you to start the coming year with the proper title attached to your name.”

Miss Dahlia and Madame Shamansky, who now worked at the school full time teaching Psychic Predictions 101, stepped forward. Together they presented Estele with a rolled papyrus.

Estele studied the document in her hand. “What is this?”

Miss Dahlia pushed her glasses up her nose. “Unfurl it and take a look.”

With Val reading over her shoulder, she unrolled the papyrus and scanned the handwritten page. Her chest tightened as she read the words aloud. “The Master Mage Magic Academy by the Sea wishes to recognize excellence in magical craft and character in Estele Ernestina Esposito, by bestowing on her the well-earned title of Mistress of Enchantment.” She glanced around the room, scanning faces for signs it was a hoax or a mistake of some kind. “Are you kidding? Is this real?”

“It’s real.” Miss Dahlia smiled. “Your improvement has been astounding, a glowing example of what’s possible when a talented person applies focus.”

She read it again just to make sure she was reading things right. The school was recognizing her for doing something right, and it felt so good. A lump of emotion rose in her throat and she’d didn’t trust herself to say another word. She glanced around the room, and so many happy faces looked back. Emily the closeted psychic and Hector the weird Goth boy both looked overcome with emotion. Some kind soul had even brought the shrunken heads from the Voodoo Hoodoo cocktail lounge especially for this occasion, and for once they were silent and smiling through stitched lips.

Numbed, she reread the papyrus. “Is this a mistake? Mistress of Enchantment is the equivalent of a magical master’s degree. Does this mean I passed the Master Mage vocational program?”

Miss Dahlia placed her hand on Estele’s shoulder. “It means you have so much to teach the rest of us. Estele, we would be honored to have you as an instructor.”

Witch Griselda pounded her staff on the floor. “If I die, which I don’t plan on anytime soon, you might eventually replace me as the headmistress.” She tossed the staff into Estele’s hands. “Catch!” she cackled.

Estele caught the staff in one hand and held it aloft. This was almost too much to take in. “Master Mage Magic Academy! Freaking yeah!”

Fredi clapped loudly. “To Estele Esposito, my best friend! Everybody give the newest Mistress of Enchantment a round of applause!”

“To Ernesto, the bravest brujo!” she added. By some strange but wonderful transmutation, she’d become dependable. All around the room, the cheers continued, but all she could focus on was the love in Val’s eyes as he gazed back at her.

The End.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Katalina Leon is an artist and author who can't commit to a single romance subgenre. Her favorite playgrounds are historical, sci-fi, contemporary, and most of all paranormal realms. Lately, she has paranormal romance and vampires on the brain. Katalina brings a sense of adventure and a touch of the mystical to romance. She believes there's a daring heroine inside every woman who wants to take a wild ride with a strong, worthy hero.

Read More from Katalina Leon:

www.katalinaleon.com

TO CATCH HER DEATH

BOONE BRUX

All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

TO CATCH HER DEATH

I reap stupid people. Like I don't get enough of that every day.

What do you get when you cross a hockey mom with the grim reaper?

Me, Lisa Carron. If being a depressed, frumpy, widowed mother of three wasn't bad enough, I just found out I'm a grim reaper. I know what you're thinking. Wow, that's kind of sexy and full of awesomeness. Hardly. Oh, and my clients? Stupid people. Like I don't get enough of that from the living.

Since Alaska is big and angels of death are few, I've been partnered with reaper extraordinaire, Nate Cramer. He's strong, silent, and way too good looking for my recently widowed state. Oh, and he reaps violent criminals, so that should be interesting.

Forget the danger and the hours of self-analysis it will take for me to find my reaper mojo. My biggest problem? Hiding it all from my overly attentive family and nosy neighbors. Now that's going to take a miracle.

Chapter 1

Being a widow wasn't as glamorous as it sounded. Unless a person had the money to grieve properly—say in a tropical country, drowning in endless Mai Tais—it really kind of sucked.

I should know. I've been a widow for a year now. Twelve long months of clawing my way through each day. My name is Lisa Carron. I'm a thirty-five-year-old, single mother of three, and today is the one-year anniversary of my husband Jeff's death.

It was also a year ago, today I started letting my appearance slide. Grief will do that to you. Lay you low and drag you into dark places you never thought you'd go. In my case, it was carbs and elastic waistbands.

For the last year, my kids had come first, my depression last. Tasks like dressing and combing my hair took a back seat to more important activities, such as lying on the couch and staring at the ceiling, or scouring the cabinets for spilled chocolate chips. None of my pre-widow clothes fit anymore. Still, I hadn't been motivated to clear off my treadmill and fire that baby up.

One aspect of widowhood I had enjoyed was wearing black. I know that wasn't a thing anymore, unless you're an elderly lady from the old country, but I embraced it nonetheless—maybe a little too enthusiastically. Everything I owned was black.

I'd fallen into a rut and until a few days ago, when my daughter casually suggested I run a comb through my hair as to not scare the neighbor kids, I hadn't realized how far I'd sunk. That was my Aha moment. It was then I'd realized my kids had weathered the crisis of their father's death and emerged on the other side in far better shape than I had.

The revelation was bittersweet. I mean, kudos to me for being an awesome mom, but damn. My frizzy ponytail belonged on the backend of a horse, and my nails looked like I'd been buried alive and clawed my way out of the grave. In a word—I was a hot mess. What I needed was a long dip in Lake Lisa.

Determined to get my act together, I dropped off the spawn of my loins at my parents' house for the weekend. Once back home, I popped a cork on a bottle of Riesling, sat at the table, and planned two kid-free days. The excitement made me a little giddy—or maybe it was the wine—anyway, for the first time in a year, I sketched out a Saturday that was all about me.

That night I slept like a baby and when morning dawned, I rolled out of bed ready to face the day. A slight ache beat against the inside of my skull, but it was nothing a few aspirins hadn't cured. Plus, the Riesling had totally been worth it.

I showered and headed to the Holiday gas station near my friend Vella's hair salon. Getting my hair done was number two on my list. Buying my bucket of soda number one. The sugary nectar was the only legal substance I knew that gave me the sustained energy I needed to get through my day of errands—and sadly, the main reason I'd become a little fluffy.

Before I could shut off Omar, my ancient minivan, The Hokie Pokie, my mom's special ringtone, erupted in my purse. A million terrible scenarios sped through my mind. Fine, maybe I wasn't completely comfortable being away from my kids.

I flipped off the ignition and scrambled to find my phone. "Are the kids okay?"

"They're fine, sweetheart." Mom's placating voice soothed my panic back to a normal level. A small plane from the nearby airport buzzed over the car. "Where are you? I hear traffic. Are you running errands?"

Translation, did you get your big butt out of bed?

"Yes, I'm at the Holiday station near Merrill Field. I'm getting gas," I lied, not needing the lecture on the hundred ways soda could kill me. "Did you need something?"

"It's sixteen degrees out." Temperature update brought to you by my mother, the neighborhood weather monitor. "Are you wearing your winter coat?"

"No, it's not that cold." Refusing to wear my parka until it hit zero had been something I'd done since I was a teenager—a personal affirmation that I was an Alaskan woman. Plus, it irritated the hell out of Mom, so I'd kept up the tradition. Childish, I know, but some days I just needed that win.

"You and that stupid habit. One day you're going to catch your death." Her heavy sigh hissed through the receiver. "Anyway, what do you have planned for today?"

"I'm on my way to Vella's to get my hair cut." Vella was my best friend and supreme ruler of all hairstylists in the universe. "Possibly my nails."

"Oh good, you were starting to look like a mangy Cocker Spaniel. Have her hit those roots with a little color too. You'll feel better."

Translation, she'd feel better.

Having grown up with Mom's backhanded comments; I now ignored them—for the most part. I was secure in my frumpiness, and looked passably acceptable to be seen in public, though Bronte, my daughter, would argue that point.

"Mom, are you sure you're okay keeping the kids this weekend? I can get them after my hair appointment."

"Nonsense. We're making ghost sugar cookies for Halloween, and your father is pulling out his gun collection later."

In the background, I heard a collective cheer from my twin sons. "Are you nuts? Do not let the boys anywhere near those weapons.”

“They’re just show pieces, honey. The boys will be fine.”

Show pieces my ass.

“Uh huh.” My father was a retired cop and had an unhealthy obsession with firearms. But arguing with my mother was pointless. It was a sad state of affairs when a fifteen year old was the most responsible person in residence. “Could you put Bronte on the phone?”

Several seconds of silence passed until my daughter came on the line. “Yo.”

“Hey, do me a favor and make sure the boys don’t touch Grandpa’s guns.”

She gave me her perfected annoyed teenager grunt. “How? They don’t listen to me.”

“You’re clever. Figure something out.” Bronte was more devious than both her brothers combined. It was a trait I stopped fighting and now used to my benefit. “If the boys come home unharmed, I’ll buy you those hockey skates you want.” Even though they weren’t top of the line the skates would still set me back. But my kids’ safety was worth it. “We’ll get them after I pick you up Sunday.”

“Right after you pick us up?”

“I promise.” I couldn’t waffle or she’d think I was bluffing. “Straight from grandma’s house to the store.”

She was silent for a few seconds, but I had her. She’d been asking for new hockey skates since last season. “I’ll see what I can do.”

“Thank you, sweetie. Tell Grandma I’ll call her later. And hey...Mommy loves you.”

Bronte made a gagging sound and ended the call. I smiled, knowing nobody would be going near my father’s gun collection.

I dropped the phone into my purse and opened my van door. It squawked in protest, the loud kind that made everybody cringe and turn to stare. I kept meaning to have my dad look at it, but then I’d be subjected to my mother’s endless affirmations on how to bounce back from losing Jeff. Like she knew anything about being a widow. Sure, it might seem like my dad was dead when he sat in his chair watching TV, but he’s just quiet. I’m almost certain my mother hadn’t drained all the life out of him—yet. So, I lived with judgmental looks and knowledge that one more thing in my life was falling apart.

The cold October wind swirled around me and slipped between the collar of my black polar fleece jacket and neck. Shivers rippled along my shoulders. I yanked the zipper up and walked to the front door, tilting my chin toward the sky. I hated when my breath flash froze the material of my jacket to my face. It was like getting a mini wax job, and considering the lack of attention I’d given my upper lip over the last year, I wasn’t taking any chances.

I pulled open the glass door to the convenience store and held it for a large, bald guy with bad manners and a worse looking trench coat. His dark eyes darted to me and then away again. Hunched and limping, he slumped past without as much as a thank you. Rude bastard. Normally I would have graced him with one of my famous snarky comments, but the way he skulked past sent a serious case of the heebie-jeebies up my spine. Instead, I ignored him and headed for the soda machine.

Something about fountain pop made it better than drinking it from a plastic bottle. Maybe there's more fizz, less sweetness. Maybe it's the straw. A lot of things taste better with a straw. That's not a proven scientific fact, just my personal opinion. Let's just say I have researched soda drinking over the years.

Mr. No Manners slinked past and around the back of the store to the refrigerated section. I focused on getting my jumbo beverage, not making eye contact with him. A cellophane wrapper crinkled behind me, drawing my attention. I glanced over my shoulder. The first thing I saw was firm, male buns. The man straightened and perused the artificial ingredients on a package of pastries.

I silently scoffed. From his trim physique and well-rounded tush, it was obvious this guy had never enjoyed the luscious processed goodness of a mass-made pastry. He was too fit—too outdoorsy looking, with his healthy glow and casually tousled brown hair. He definitely gave off an Alaskan man vibe—I hike, compost, and brew my own beer from wild berries I picked myself. Yeah, I knew the type well. People like him rarely bought anything that contained more than three ingredients, and those pastries were only eaten by hardcore junk-foodies. I never touched them myself. The texture reminded me of soggy florist foam, or crumbling sheet rock. Not that I've ever eaten either.

Still—I might have been a grieving widow but I wasn't dead. After one more appreciative look at him, I returned my attention to filling the vat of soda.

As I slid my thumbs along the edge of the plastic lid to snap it onto the cup, a deep voice shouted, "Give me all your cash."

My head whipped toward the front of the convenience store. Mr. Bad Manners held a shotgun pointed directly at Doug and Roger, the mini-mart cashiers. Yeah, we were on a first name basis.

Like a heavy rock sinking into thick mud, the situation registered in my brain. Holy crap, it was a fricken' holdup.

My fingers dug into my soda cup, my eyes growing wide as paralyzing fear rushed through me. I think I stopped breathing, not wanting to draw the robber's attention. My first thought was of my kids. Things were finally getting back to normal. Well, as normal as they could be. No way was I going to attempt some adrenaline inspired hero crap that would no doubt get me killed.

From those thoughts of survival, my mind quickly jumped to the fact that I might be on the nightly news and probably should have dressed better. Random Thought Syndrome—I was one of its many sufferers.

The snack cake guy stood unmoving. It didn't appear any of us patrons were looking to be local heroes, or from the robber's crazed stare, a possible fatality.

Rock music from the local radio station filled the silence. I mentally urged Doug or Roger to start shoving cash into a bag, but neither moved. Unfortunately, it seemed I didn't possess Jedi mind powers.

"Money! Now!" Sweat trickled down the robber's stubbly face and he waved the shotgun at the boys. His head flicked several times to the side, as if he had a nervous tick. Nervous tick equaled itchy trigger finger as far as I was concerned.

“Don’t shoot, sir,” Doug finally said. He reached toward the cash register and punched a button. The till dinged and the drawer slid open. “I’m just gonna get a bag to put the money in, okay?”

Good move, Doug.

“Hurry up.” The robber glanced around the store, his gaze lingering on me longer than I liked, before darting back to the cashier. “And don’t trip the alarm.”

Doug nodded. His hair, a substantial sandy blond fro with a huge comb sticking out the side, bounced up and down like a dandelion puff bobbing in the breeze. Plastic bags crackled as he attempted to work it free it from the pile. Cars sped along Glenn Highway beyond the large glass windows, completely oblivious to the ensuing robbery and the innocent patrons inside. My heart beat against my throat and my mouth went dry. Taking a sip of my soda was tempting but the scene with the tyrannosaurus rex from Jurassic Park kept playing in my mind.

Don’t move. Don’t even breathe. Maybe this monster wouldn’t notice you.

Seconds ticked by and still Doug fumbled under the counter. I knew these two college guys weren’t the brightest bulbs in the string of lights, but seriously, how hard was it to get a stupid grocery sack?

Doug crouched slightly, and when he straightened, he held a big ass revolver aimed at the bald guy.

Time seemed to slow.

Several things happen at once. The robber’s eyes widened, comprehension that the cashier now sported some serious firepower dawning. His gun jerked up, and before I had time to drop to the floor, Doug pulled the trigger.

The revolver exploded, catapulting the criminal backward into the stand of chips. He slithered to the white tile floor in a cacophony of crumpling cellophane. The ringing in my ears ricocheted through my head and my feet seemed rooted in place. Nobody moved. We just stood there with our mouths hanging open.

I think I spoke for everyone in the mini-mart when I finally muttered, “Holy crap.”

An aftershock of adrenaline surged through me. I slung my soda aside and raced toward the robber. Hopefully he was injured and not dead. I’d had enough of death for a lifetime.

Mr. Snack Cake seemed to have the same idea and sprang into action. He barreled around the corner, shouting, but I was too amped up to make sense of his gibberish. I dropped and slid the last foot, stopping when my knees plowed into the robber’s ribs.

The good-looking guy waved his arms at me. “Don’t touch him!”

Too late. Sorry, but when I see a scraped elbow or somebody with a hole the size of a frozen pizza in their chest, my ninja paramedic skills kick into action. I pressed my fingers to the robber’s neck, checking for a pulse. Nothing. My hands drifted across his chest, but there was no place to start compressions. Not that it would have helped. Doug's shot had hit the man dead center—no pun intended.

Mr. Snack Cake skidded to a stop beside me.

I glanced at him. "He's dead."

His eyes grew to the size of silver dollars. "I told you not to touch him."

Obviously, the sight of a corpse was completely freaking out this guy. Good thing I'd developed a rather unhealthy obsession with CSI shows after my husband died. I knew what to do. I looked over my shoulder at Doug. He still held the revolver, his hands shaking, and appeared to be in shock.

"Call 911." His eyes tracked to my face but I don't think he understood me. "Doug." I used his name, trying to snap him back to reality. "Put the gun down and call 911."

The weapon clattered to the floor and he fumbled for the phone. Using the dead guy's shoulder for leverage, I tried to push to a stand. The sensation of being pulled downward tugged on my arms. I struggled to my feet and tried again, but couldn't yank my hands off the robber.

Mr. Snack Cakes leapt over the body and gripped me around the chest. His hands locked directly between my boobs. Granted, this was the most action the girls had seen in over a year, and normally I would have been flattered, but I preferred to be groped more privately—with fewer dead people around.

"Hey, pal, mitts off the boobs." I fought against his hold but my hands remained glued to the dead guy.

"I told you not to touch him." He tugged, but I still couldn't straighten, or remove my palms from the robber's body.

What happened next was like trying to wipe sticky fingers with a paper napkin. No matter what, the napkin clung to me—just like the robber did.

I was still bent over, as if locked in a deadly game of Twister, when the cute guy heaved himself back and finally dragged me free. I won't swear in public, but I'm almost positive he groped my boobs again.

I couldn't be certain because at the same time I heard a zipper-like rasp and found myself reeling backward. Mr. Snack Cake caught me before we both fell into a postcard stand. I'd barely righted myself when the dead guy's body lifted from the tile and hurtled toward me. I folded in on myself, bracing for impact. But instead of colliding, the mini-mart robber passed through me. Somebody screamed like a little girl—I'm pretty sure it was me.

The man holding me gripped my hands, curling them into fists. "Hold him, Lisa!"

Every instinct had me spinning to see where the robber had gone. Nothing made sense. Had I just imagined the man passing through me?

"He'll run if you let go," the cute guy said into my ear.

"Let go of what?"

That question was quickly answered as the robber snapped back through my body, slicing me with an icy chill that cut through my bones. A shudder rippled through me and my mind couldn't comprehend what I was seeing—Mr. Bad Manners.

His translucent body flickered, and a dark aura pulsed around the form. I screamed again and attempted to violently shake off the good-looking guy's hold. I'm certain it was one of those spastic, hyperventilating convulsions. Not pretty, but I wasn't apologizing for my freak-out.

"Stop fighting me," Mr. Snack Cake yelled.

Yeah, right. Every survival instinct screamed for me to get away from the ghostly entity glaring at me. I dug my boots into the tile floor and pushed backward, but couldn't get traction. Any movement I made tugged the apparition of the bald guy with me. The darkness around the robber grew and enveloped me. His anger beat against me as if it was my own emotion. It invaded my personal space, choking off my breath and the scream hovering in my throat.

The ghost yanked against my hold, which disconnected his dark aura from me. I gasped, inhaling a lungful of air. Then he jerked again, yanking me forward. I stumbled over something and when I looked down I saw the mini-mart robber's body lying in the same place he'd fallen, except now a pool of dark blood seeped from under his back.

My gaze darted to the ghost attached to me and then down at his body. I screamed—again. I mean, I was all about the paranormal, but in a romantic way—fallen angels—sexy vampires—pretty much any immortal who wanted me to be the focus of his world—but not an angry ghost of a violent criminal.

The cute guy leaned in. "Whatever you do, don't let go of him."

Not that I could. My fingers ached from the living guy's grip, and my nails gouged my palms. He turned me toward the back of the store, which automatically dragged the apparition of the robber with us. "I'm taking her to the bathroom to get cleaned up and calmed down," he said to the boys. "Lock the doors until the police get here."

At this point, he frog-marched me and what I now believed was a ghost, toward the back of the mini-mart.

The apparition fought our every step. "Let me go, you stupid bitch."

Wow, harsh. Logic shrieked I shouldn't argue. I'd seen the Amityville Horror. No way did I want blood seeping out of the walls of my house. It was hard enough getting red wine stains off the carpet.

"Shut up, Leroy," the cute guy said.

That silenced the robber's ghost. Crap, were these two partners? Had I just become a criminal sandwich? Nausea rolled through me. Maybe if I puked on Snack Cake's fancy hiking boots, he'd let me go.

"How do you know my name?" The spirit stopped struggling. "You a cop?"

Cute guy lowered his voice so only we could hear. "You wish I was a cop."

Chills slithered down my spine at his tone. Who the hell was this guy? The darkness pulsing around Leroy's ghost intensified and my head started to swim. It felt as if he was sucking the life from me. Blackness crept around the edges of my vision.

Don't pass out. Don't pass out.

Damn it, I'd been determined to get my life on track. It looked like the first day of my new life might be my last.

We entered the bathroom. The smell of industrial cleaner filled my nose and the flickering fluorescent lights intensified my headache. He kicked the door closed, sealing us inside the white tiled tomb.

"My name is Nate."

I craned my neck to see if he was talking to me. "All right." Nice to meet you seemed a little inappropriate for the situation. "Listen Nate, you need to tell me what the hell is going on because I am seriously about to lose it."

"Let me get rid of him first, and then we'll talk." His voice softened, the creepy killer tone lessening.

"Get rid of him?" I scrunched my face and laced my words with my infamous sarcasm. "Where do you think he's going? We're in a frickin' bathroom of a mini-mart."

Me and my big mouth.

"Pick!" Nate waited a few seconds before shouting the word again. "Pick!"

"Pick?" What was I supposed to pick? The ghost or me? Life or death? My fingers ached from his crushing grip. I wiggled, trying to get away, but he continued to hold me in place. "I pick life. I want to live. Don't kill me."

"Me too," Leroy's ghost said.

"It's too late for you, Badder."

I didn't know who Badder was, but when Leroy began to fight me again, my keen sense of deduction kicked in, telling me it was the ghost. Several times he tried to jerk away, but kept rebounding like a rubber band. His arms passed through mine, cutting my bones with a searing cold. My head pounded, feeling like it was about to shatter. Any minute I was going to embark on a psychotic episode of epic proportion.

A bright, blue light suddenly appeared at the end of the bathroom near the toilet. All of us stopped struggling and stared as the sink disappeared behind the elongating glow. The light widened into a rectangle and the intensity dimmed. Breath caught in my throat when an actual door appeared, and then slid open. Leroy Badder's mouth sagged and his shoulders slumped. At least I wasn't the only one stunned by the sight. Nate, however, appeared perfectly calm, like an elevator arriving in the Holiday bathroom was a normal occurrence.

My attention drifted back to the far end of the bathroom and the man standing on the other side of the door. At least I thought it was a man. Something about him didn't look completely human. Maybe it was his coal black eyes, or perhaps the tiny bumps protruding from the front of his skull that reminded me of horns. Despite what was certainly an unfortunate birth defect, the man's head was a perfect oval. A solid sheet of sable brown hair slicked along the top and sides like glossy frosting, and the creases in his black suit were so sharp they looked as if they could cut. Mafia attorney popped into my mind.

Beyond him the room glowed red. Not like those red-light bulbs hookers use to advertise their services, but more like a roaring fire burned nearby. My first impression? Modern Gates of Hell. But that would be ridiculous, right? I mean, I was standing in a mini-mart bathroom.

“I’ve got him, Pick.”

Nate’s words snapped me out of my trance. “That’s Pick?”

“Yes.” His gaze slid to mine and he lowered his voice. “Don’t let him touch you.”

Like that even had to be said. “Yeah, no problem.”

I must have been in shock, because I should have been freaking out. It wasn’t every day you saw an elevator to Hell in a convenience store bathroom. My life was hockey games and laundry, not... well, not whatever this was.

“Nate.” Pick’s voice carved through the tension like a hissing blade. “Punctual as usual.” His gaze tracked to me and his thin lips pulled into a white, feral smile. “And who do we have here?”

This Pick character gave off a seriously eerie vibe.

“A new recruit,” Nate said.

I had no idea if they were talking about me, and it didn’t matter. At this point I was doing good not to pee myself.

The attorney guy pulled a clipboard from a file pocket mounted near the entrance and scanned an attached paper. “Leroy Badder?”

“Yes.” Nate didn’t move or release his hold on my hands. “He just robbed the convenience store—or tried to.”

Pick ticked a mark on the clipboard and placed it back into the pocket. “You’ve been quite the troublemaker, Mr. Badder.”

“Yeah, well, let me go and I’ll show you just how bad I can be.” Leroy tugged against my hold, pulling me toward the elevator.

Panic shot through me. Nate had specifically said to not let Pick touch me, and I had every intention of complying. Once again, I dug the thick heels of my boots against the slick tile floor, and lunged backward.

Nate’s grip tightened and he leaned in, pressing his mouth against my ear. “When I tell you to release him, let go.”

“Gladly.” Though I didn’t know if my fingers would open after being crushed for so long.

Leroy shook his arms, which caused me to chomp down on my tongue. I bit back a string of name calling, most of which were less than flattering references to his mother.

“Now?” I shuffled my feet, trying to avoid Badder’s stomping boots. Then the ghost braced his foot against my thigh and hauled backward. “Now?” I shouted.

“Now!” Nate’s grip slid from my hands to my waist, holding me steady.

With the help of Leroy’s thrashing, my fingers uncurled and released the ghost. Leroy hurled toward the open door, as if being sucked in by a giant vacuum, and tumbled into the elevator. He lay for a few seconds, looking around. When his gaze tracked downward, his eyes widened and his mouth rounded in a silent scream. Before he uttered a sound, Leroy dropped out of sight. The scene reminded me of the coyote on one of those Road Runner cartoons. Seconds later, the cry he hadn’t voiced wafted up and out of the elevator to Hell.

Pick stood in the doorway, plucking invisible lint from his suit until Leroy’s voice faded. I stumbled backward and out of Nate’s hold, hitting the door. My fingers fumbled for the handle, but Nate flicked the deadbolt to lock.

“Let me out.” My hands shook so badly I couldn’t maneuver the latch back. I had no idea who or what Pick was or where Leroy Badder had disappeared. What I did know was that I wanted to be as far away from these guys as possible. I pointed. “I’m not going in there.”

“Calm down.” Nate grabbed my shoulders and spun me to face him. “You don’t have to but we need to talk before the police get here.”

I stared at him, not sure I trusted anything he said. My fingers curled around the handle of the door. No way was I dropping my defenses so this guy could toss me through the fiery Gates of Hell. Nate released me but kept his hands raised, gesturing for me to stay put. I didn’t move—was unable to move.

He faced the elevator. “Our transaction is complete.”

Pick tipped his head in acknowledgment and straightened. “Until next time.”

With that, the door slid shut and compressed into a thin line of light, shrinking until it vanished completely. Nate walked to the other end of the bathroom. “It’s over.”

I didn’t release my death-grip. “What was that? Who are you? Where did Leroy go?” My questions flowed like verbal diarrhea. “Am I dead?”

“You aren’t dead, but Leroy is. That doorway was a portal, and Pick is what’s called a porter. He escorts souls to their appointed destination.”

“Appointed destination? You mean Hell?”

Nate shrugged. “Not necessarily, but in most cases, yes.”

“What do you mean, in most cases?”

He stared at me, his blue eyes never wavering from my face, but didn’t answer.

“What are you?”

Nate took a deep breath and exhaled. “I’m a grim reaper. It’s my job to get souls to the porters.”

I didn’t know whether to laugh or run screaming from the restroom. There wasn’t enough liquor in the world to drown the images of the things I witnessed. Not enough soap to scrub away the feel of Leroy sticking to me. And there was no denying I might have completely lost my mind.

Nate cleared his throat. “And you’re a grim reaper too.”

Okay, I'd definitely lost my mind.

Chapter 2

*M*e a reaper? Very funny.” I pointed my shaking finger at Nate. “Okay, I’m leaving now. You just stay there and...well, just stay there.”

“Lisa.”

That brought me up short. During our initial struggle with Leroy’s ghost he’d called me Lisa. “How do you know my name?”

“I’ve been watching you for a while.” He took a step toward me.

“Don’t come any closer, stalker boy.” I spazed and plastered my body against the door. My left hand fumbled in my coat pocket and I hauled out my deadly set of keys. “I will gouge your eyes out.”

Nate looked up at the ceiling, his jaw clenching and unclenching. “I knew this was a mistake.”

“What? Killing me in a public bathroom?” In an effort to back up my threat, I jabbed the pointy end of a key at him. “That would be a very big mistake. My dad used to be a cop.”

“I told them you weren’t cut out to be a reaper, but nobody listened to me.”

“What do you mean not cut out to be a reaper?” Rational thought and action sometimes eluded me. Instead of going along with his assumption that I couldn’t do the job, I rallied my bruised pride and foolishness. “If there was such a thing as a reaper, which there isn’t, I’d be awesome at it. And for your information, I’ve got a black belt in Karate.”

He shook his head. “No, you don’t.”

“How would you know?” Stupid question, he was a stalker after all.

“It’s my job to know everything about the reapers in my zone.”

“Okay.” I shook my keys at him. “Then tell me about myself.”

“You’re thirty-five, a mother of three, and your husband died a year ago today.”

“You could have Googled that.” I pulled on the door handle and tried to flip the lock open, but it wouldn’t move.

“I didn’t.” When he walked toward me I faced him, sliding to the corner, with my keys still held in attack mode. “You’ve been on our radar for some time, but with your husband’s death I didn’t think it would be wise to approach you about being a grim reaper.”

“Good plan, let’s keep it like that.” I reached for the handle again, but he slammed his foot in front of the door, preventing my escape. I glared at him. “As a matter of fact, let’s never speak of it again.”

With everything I'd just experienced, and now this guy claiming I was a reaper, it was just too much to take in.

"We need to talk about it, Lisa. Now that you've activated your powers, a decision needs to be made."

"Fine, I've decided to ignore my reaperiness, you, and—" I made a circle with my hand, indicating the other end of the bathroom. "The whole paranormal shindig that may or may not have happened."

"I'm afraid it's not as simple as that." He ran his hand through his hair, giving it a messy appearance that made him even cuter. "You need to be informed before you make a decision."

"No, I really don't. I've made plenty of uninformed decisions. Turducken, skinny jeans, the fruit diet, all bad judgments, yet here I am, right as rain."

"This isn't the same as making a poor fashion choice. There are entities you have to report to now that you've reaped Leroy Badder."

"I did not reap Leroy Badder. He just—kind of—stuck to me."

Nate held his hands out to his side and gave me a look that said duh. "Same thing. You have to answer for it."

I narrowed my gaze, not completely understanding what he was trying to tell me. "Who are these entities? Like the Human Resource Department of reapers or bigger, like God or Satan?"

"We can't talk here. I'll explain things after we've dealt with the police."

"Do I look like an idiot?" I gave an unladylike snort. "I'm not discussing anything with you and I don't need you to explain things to me."

After my husband died, I'd struggled with my own mortality and the meaning of life. I'd gone to a dozen churches, looking for solace, read books on life-after-death, and searched for reasons why he died. Let's just say I have a tendency to immerse myself in my projects. Unfortunately, I was exactly the kind of person who would buy into this reaper crap, hoping for a higher meaning.

Before he replied somebody pounded on the door.

"Police, could you step out here please?"

Relief washed through me. I needed to get out of Hell's bathroom before I did something stupid, like enlisting in reaper boot camp, or signing my soul over to Satan. "Coming officer."

Nate approached and covered my hand with one of his. "Take this and call me. We need to talk." He held out a business card. When I didn't take it, he slipped it into my jacket pocket. "I'll explain everything then."

I stared at him for a second, no clever retort coming to me. But neither did I tell him I wouldn't be calling. I pulled the door open and squeezed out, making sure not to brush against him. By the off chance he was the Angel of Death, I wanted to keep touching to a minimum.

The next hour was spent rehashing the details of the robbery. I did my best to stay as far from Nate as possible, but he kept glancing my way with his piercing blue eyes. Why were the cute ones always nutjobs—or grim reapers? As much as I wanted to, I couldn't dismiss the bizarre events that happened. No obvious explanation for Leroy's ghost, the Gates of Hell, or Pick popped into my head. Common sense told me revealing the bathroom incident to the police would not be in my best interest.

After the officer finished with me, I walked to Doug. The poor guy looked paler than usual. I'd been frequenting this particular Holiday for a year and had learned that Doug was a sweet, farm boy from Iowa, who came to Anchorage to study environmental science. I'd done my part to make sure the police knew he'd shot Leroy in self-defense.

"How you doing, Doug?"

His round hazel eyes slid to my face. "I killed a guy."

I leaned my hip against the counter. "Yes you did. Thanks for that."

His brow furrowed. "Thanks?"

"If you hadn't shot him, he would've shot you, and maybe the rest of us."

I wasn't sure if that was true. Perhaps if Doug hadn't tried to be a hero and handed over the cash, Leroy would have escaped with the money, leaving all of us unharmed. Or in my case, not a grim reaper—supposedly. But Badder was dead, and Doug would struggle with that the rest of his life. What harm would a few possible fibs do?

"Really?" The expression on his face nearly broke my heart. He appeared to be clinging to any thread that would lift the burden of snuffing out someone's life. "You're not just saying that?"

"Doug, you saved all our lives." I indicated the store with the sweep of my hand. "My kids have already lost one parent. Thanks to you they didn't lose me too."

His posture straightened. "Wow, I did that?"

I gave him a couple of pats on the shoulder. "You really did."

Roger approached, his brown eyes still wide with shock, and his normally tan skin on the ashen side. "You okay, Mrs. Carron?"

Roger was a native kid from a bush village called Dillingham. "I'm fine, Roger. How are you doing?"

"All right, I guess." He glanced over his shoulder at the police, and then back to us. "Can I tell you something?"

"Of course." I had that effect on people. Complete strangers routinely bared their souls to me in the checkout line. I always found it weird that people were willing to tell me intimate details of their lives. If only I could get my daughter to share a bit about her life.

"You know after Doug shot the robber?"

I nodded.

Roger swallowed hard. "I could have sworn I saw his ghost."

To cover my shock I play dumb. "Who? Doug's ghost?"

"No." Roger's tongue darted out nervously to moisten his lips. "The gunman's ghost. It was only there for a few seconds, but faded when you went to the bathroom."

I kept my face passive. "Really?"

“Yeah, he was standing right in front of you and he looked really pissed.”

Pissed was putting it mildly. I gave him a strained smile. “Whew, glad I didn’t see him. I would have lost it big time.”

Roger clutched his hands to his chest. “Do you think I’m crazy?”

“No.” I shook my head. “I think some people are more susceptible to the spirit world.”

That wasn’t a lie. I’d always fancied myself sensitive to things like ghosts and haunted houses, whether it was a sense of being watched, or a feeling of foreboding when I walked into a room. If I really was a grim reaper, that might explain my experiences. Maybe Roger’s native upbringing connected him to the spirit world. Heck, maybe he’d taken a hallucinogenic before work. Besides the robbery, I couldn’t explain anything else that had happened.

“Well, I need to get going. Are you guys okay? Did you call the owner?” I asked.

“Yeah,” Doug nodded. Through all the hoopla, his plastic comb had remained firmly in place at the side of his fro. “He’s on his way.”

“Maybe you’ll get a bonus for preventing a robbery.” They looked at each other, their eyes lighting at my mention of money. I smiled. “Mind if I grab a soda?”

Doug shook his head. “Take anything you want, Mrs. Carron. Anything.”

“Thanks.” I slipped between a police officer and the stand of postcards, trying to be as discreet as possible. If I could get my soda and leave, I wouldn’t have to talk to crazy Nate again.

I opted for the forty-four ounce jug and made a break for the front door. A cop still questioned him, but Nate glanced in my direction. Our gazes locked for a few seconds, and then he flicked his head toward me, indicating our business wasn’t finished. I silently groaned. A slick ditch would have been too easy.

Despite the crowd gathered beyond the yellow police tape, I pushed open the glass door and stepped outside. Cameras clicked and questions were shouted at me, but I kept my head down and walked briskly to my van. Why couldn’t the robbery have happened after I’d gotten my hair done?

I drove to the Northway Mall, where Vella’s Star Power Salon resided. I parked, grabbed my soda and purse, and locked Omar. The brisk breeze registered, but the shivers running through me were not caused from the cold. I was still trying to wrap my head around everything, but not having much luck.

At least I’d be able to relay all the events to Vella. Her quirky outlook on life was one of acceptance and what-ifs. Hopefully, she wouldn’t suggest I seek psychiatric help or up my meds—which I did not take. Vella thought everybody should be on happy pills, as she referred to them. Not me, I preferred to suffer through my pain.

The mall was quiet for a Saturday morning. Then again, it was usually quiet. Situated in the not so posh section of town, the stores in the Northway Mall came and went. There were a few steady merchants, and personally, I liked the smaller crowds. But I’m sure the storeowners would disagree.

The smell of hair color hung in the air and Elvis Presley crooned over the speaker system when I entered the salon. She was a diehard Elvis fan and even owned a motion activated, life-size cutout of him in her house. The damn thing scared me to death one night when I stayed with her. Stumbling down the dim hallway for a midnight pee, I'd passed her Elvis room. From out of the darkness I heard, "Thank you, thank you very much." When I screamed Vella's husband, Bud, ran out of their bedroom in his tidy whites, wielding a baseball bat. Let's just say there are things that can't be unseen.

"You're late." Vella lounged at her station, pawing through a celebrity magazine. "I thought you were going to be here at nine o'clock."

Vella was from Texas, and although she'd lived in the great north for over twenty years, she'd refused to relinquish her big bleached blond hair and tanning bed. I called her Menopause Barbie—not to her face.

I plopped down in the chair next to her. "I would have but I got stuck in the middle of a mini-mart robbery."

"What?" She tossed her magazine onto the counter "Girl, are you okay?"

"Yeah, fine—well, physically fine." I sighed. "Which is more than I can say for Leroy Badder."

Vella shrugged. "Who's that?"

"The guy who robbed the store. You know Doug, the kid from Iowa?"

"Big hair?" Vella held her hands out to the sides of her head.

"Yeah, he shot and killed the guy." The memory of the blood seeping from under Leroy's body made me shudder. "It was awful."

"Sweet Jesus, and here I had my panties in a bunch, thinking you were having one of your pity parties."

If anybody other than my best friend had said that to me I would have ripped their head off. But when Jeff died, she'd been right beside me, holding my hand, wiping my tears, and taking care of my kids when I'd had too much.

"Hello ladies, and I use that term loosely." Jonathan, the salon's receptionist, sauntered in, carrying two large cups of coffee. "Decided to get out of bed, I see."

I growled at him and bared my teeth.

"Ooo, feisty. I like that." He handed Vella her coffee. "I figured you'd have your barrel of sugar water, so I didn't get you any coffee."

Jonathan was okay. He was the stereotypical gay guy, impeccably dressed, feminine demeanor, and knew all the latest gossip. The last quality made me wary when talking about my personal life. Spilling the details of the robbery around him guaranteed the story would be making the rounds in the rumor mill within the hour.

"Actually, I'd love a cup. Thank you." I needed to tell Vella about my slam dance with the paranormal world without him around. Pasting on my sweetest smile, I said. "Tall mocha, no whip. You're a treasure."

He gave an indignant grunt and looked to Vella for support.

“She was just in a robbery, Jonathan. The girl needs coffee.”

His eyes widened. “Really? You were at the Holiday?”

Already he’d heard about the holdup? That was exactly why I wouldn’t discuss my private life around him. “Yes, and I’ll give you all the gory details when you get back—with my tall mocha.”

“Oh goodie.” He spun and headed out of the salon, his boot heels clicking across the tile floor.

“What’s going on?” Vella took a drink of her coffee and narrowed her eyes. “I know you like to mess with Jonathan, but I’m sensing there’s something more to this.”

I glanced over my shoulder to make sure he was gone, and then looked back at my friend. Qualifying my explanation first was more for my benefit than her. Why would she believe me when I barely believed it myself? “Hear me out before you pass judgment on my sanity.”

Both of her perfectly sculpted and clipped eyebrows lifted. “Girl, you know I don’t judge.”

I refrained from commenting on that blatant lie. “After Leroy, the robber, was shot, I touched him to see if he was dead.”

“Ick, did you wash your hands?”

I looked at my fingers. There should have been blood on them but there wasn’t. “Yes,” I lied. “Like I was saying, I checked to see if he was dead.”

“Was he?”

“Sort of.” I took a deep breath and plunged forward with my story. “When I stood, his spirit lifted out of his body and went right through me.”

Vella shifted in her chair and crossed her legs, her focus zeroing in on me. “Go on.”

The story rushed out like air from a balloon. When I was finished, I took a deep breath. “Nate gave me his card and said we needed to talk.”

She tapped her long nail against the side of her cup. “The Angel of Death has a business card?”

“I know, right? What kind of reaper doesn’t carry a scythe, but has a business card?” I shook my head. “He’s probably a weirdo stalker. The guy knew all sorts of shit about me. The whole thing was beyond peculiar.”

“Well, I think it’s safe to say this Nate is a little touched in the head.” She took another drink and seemed to contemplate what I told her. The bubblegum pink nails of her other hand drummed against the arm of the chair, and she pursed her lips, squinting at me. “Can I see his card?”

I dug in my pocket and handed it to her.

“Grim Reaper Services. Well that’s just stupid.” She pointed to the lettering at the bottom with her thumb. “There’s an address.”

I tilted my head to get a better look. “4831 B—” I snatched the card from her and stared at the address I knew so well. “That’s where Jeff used to work, but it’s the General Resource Services building not Grim Reaper Services.”

“All right, this is getting weirder than my Uncle Clem’s lingerie collection.”

I harrumphed. “I’m not even going to ask.” Vella’s family contained more freaks than a circus sideshow and her supply of stories was endless. “Am I supposed to believe death is renting office space from General Resources?”

“Look, both businesses have GRS as their initials.” Vella leaned back, giving me a look that said she’d formed her opinion. “This guy is bad news, no doubt about it?”

“What about Leroy Badder’s ghost and the elevator to Hell?” How could she not think I was crazy when what I was asking was irrational? “I know what I saw.”

“Maybe it was some of that post dramatic stress syndrome they’re always talking about.”

“You mean post traumatic?”

“Whatever.” She jabbed a finger at me. “It hasn’t been that long since Jeff died. Maybe this was your brain’s way of coping with a life and death situation.”

“I guess that’s possible.” I looked at the card again. Something very creepy was going on and I had a feeling I wasn’t going to like whatever this Nate guy had in mind. “But Roger, one of the cashiers, said he thought he saw Leroy’s ghost too.”

“Mass hysteria.” She set her coffee on the counter. “We used to see it all the time when the evangelist healers came to town. Everybody wailing, getting right with Jesus. One time my Aunt Edith said she and a bunch of her churchin’ ladies saw the blessed mother sitting on the altar, eating a burrito.” Vella made a drinking motion with her hand. “I think the old gals imbibed a little too much of the blood of Christ, if you know what I mean.”

“Mass hysteria, you’re probably right.” I smiled, trying to ignore my gut instinct that what happened, really had happened. “Hopefully I’ll never see Nate again.”

Vella sighed. “Too bad he was cute.”

“What does that have to do with anything?”

“A cute guy gave you his number—I’m just sayin’, too bad the cute ones are crazy.”

“Yeah, just my luck.” Not that I was in the market for a boyfriend or even a booty call. “Do you know he said I didn’t have what it took to be a reaper?” His statement still grated, even if he was a psycho serial killer.

“That’s because he’s never seen you wield a weed whacker.”

“Exactly.” I grunted. “I’d make a freakin’ awesome reaper.”

“Damn straight.” She stood and pulled the scrunchie from my hair and threaded her fingers through my limp locks. “It would be kind of neat, don’t you think?”

She scraped her nails along my scalp and my eyes slid shut. “What would?”

“Being an Angel of Death.” Her hands rested on my shoulders. “Helping people cross over.”

I opened my eyes. “What happened to me didn’t feel neat. It felt violent and sticky.” She continued to massage my head, but the look on her face told me that brain of hers was conjuring up all sorts of scenarios. “What?”

She shrugged. “If you were a reaper, would you have wanted to help Jeff pass?”

“No.” The word popped out of my mouth.

Her hands stopped and rested on top of my hair. “Why not?”

Why wouldn’t I have wanted to help my husband pass? So many people would do anything for a chance to say goodbye. “Because when I found out that Jeff had been in a car accident, he was already dead. There was nothing I could do about it. If I’d known he was going to die and there was still nothing I could do about it—” I paused, my throat tightening at the thought. “I don’t think I could handle that.” I looked at her. “It’s a burden I wouldn’t want to bear.”

She held my gaze in the mirror for a few seconds but didn’t say anything more about death. “So, what are we doing today? Short and sassy? Platinum?”

“Manageable and get rid of the roots.” I made a chopping gesture half way between my shoulders and chin. “Maybe a few inches off to clean it up, but I still want to be able to put it in a ponytail.”

“Come on, let me do something daring.”

I’d had enough of daring for one day. What I needed was safe. “Maybe next time.”

She grumbled under her breath and spun my chair to face the back of the salon. “Your shampoo bowl awaits, Milady.”

Getting a new cut and color would make me feel better, but I had another worry now—like I needed that. Nate knew who I was, which probably meant he knew where I lived. It was one thing to have my safety put in question, but there were my kids to think about. A chill ran through me. Either he had lied to me to make contact, which wasn’t good, or what Nate told me was true, and I was looking at a life-long sentence as the newest Angel of Death at Grim Reaper Services.

Chapter 3

I left the salon with a slick new do and my scrunchie around my wrist. The change had been subtle, but I definitely felt better. On the drive home my mind replayed the events at the Holiday station. I wasn't sure I bought Vella's mass hysteria or post-traumatic stress explanations. In my gut I knew I hadn't imagined the whole thing. Something had happened. But no matter how hard I tried to cram the incident into a neatly defined compartment, it just didn't fit—and I really needed it to fit.

I turned onto my road. The section of Anchorage I lived in was what I referred to as established. Homes ranged from 1970's split-levels to newer duplexes and condos. My house was a well-worn, but sturdy, 1979 two-story, located on Resurrection Lane. Though the street was named after Resurrection Bay, the irony that I was trying to resurrect my life, not to mention the whole reaper thing, was not lost on me.

As I pulled into our driveway, I couldn't help but think all I needed was a few junk cars in the yard and a hound dog on the porch to complete my house's tired appearance. Home repairs had been low on my list of priorities, because of grief and limited funds. To say I'd been shocked when I found out how small Jeff's life insurance policy would be a gross understatement.

I'd yet to deal with the sense of betrayal I harbored about that. I mean, how much of a bitch would that make me to be pissed over money when I'd just lost my husband, and the kids, their father? Plus, I blamed myself for not being more involved in our finances—and a lot of other aspects of our life as a couple. Like I said, my self-esteem hit rock bottom and dwelling on what I could have done better would be like pouring lemon juice into a wound.

A fat raven sat on the railing of my front deck. Anchorage has the biggest ravens in the world. They were well fed from the Dumpsters and tourists, and were roughly the size of a Welsh Corgi. This bird must've frequented all the feeding hotspots. The way it stared at me, all harbinger of doomish, sent another wave of foreboding through me.

The grating squeak from my van door opening hadn't spooked the raven like I'd hoped. It just sat there, peering down at me. Even when I started up the front steps, it didn't fly away.

"Shoo." I waved my hand. Besides giving me the heebie-jeebies, I didn't want bird poop on my deck. Melting bird poo in the spring is beyond gross. I crept a few steps higher. "Go on."

The raven cocked its head and made a gurgling sound that reminded me of a telephone ringing. Its whole demeanor gave me the impression it was trying to talk to me. Then the bird looked to the sky. I followed its gaze and noticed five more ravens circling like black vultures.

Could things get any weirder?

When I rose to the second to the last step, the raven extended its wings, gurgled again, and took off. The sound of air against its blue-black feathers whooshed with each stroke as it lifted to join the circling murder. I jammed my key into the door and ducked inside before the scene turned into something out of a Hitchcock movie.

After slamming the door and locking it, I peeked out the curtains in my front living room. All six birds had settled in the bare branches of a tree across the street and sat silhouetted against the gray afternoon sky. Maybe it was my imagination, but the birds seemed to be staring at my house. I let the curtain fall into place and stepped back. My purse slid from my fingers and dropped to the floor. This day was too weird. Maybe if I ignored the ravens, they'd go away. Then again, maybe they were an omen of things to come.

I needed to get my mind off all the reaper madness and refocused on being productive. More than anything, I wanted a shower. Mainly to wash off the hair from my new cut, but also to scrub the feel of Leroy Badder from my hands—actually, my soul. The incident had left me with a greasy sensation that coated my being.

It took a good fifteen minutes of vigorous scouring with my loofa before deciding I'd cleansed as thoroughly as I could without dousing my body in bleach. Once out of the shower, I slicked my hair into a ponytail and put on my favorite sweatshirt. It had been a gift to my husband on his last birthday. I'm sick of being my wife's arm candy was printed in white letters on the front and Jeff had worn it around the house the day before he'd been killed.

For a long time I slept with the sweatshirt, inhaling the last remnants of his scent. It was the only way I'd been able to get to sleep. Over time his aroma faded and I'd taken to wearing it—every chance I got.

The shower hadn't completely washed away Leroy's essence, which made me antsy. Whenever I got like this I cleaned. From the state of my house, I hadn't been antsy in a very long time.

With the music cranked up, I hauled out my cleaning supplies. Sadly, I had to dust those bottles off first. Starting in the bathroom, which was completely disgusting and bordering on a health hazard, I began swamping out the house. How had I not seen what a pigsty we lived in?

The hours passed and layers of dust, stacks of unattended mail, and piles of dirty laundry dwindled. At seven o'clock I stopped and surveyed the area. The place looked great. Then and there I vowed to never let the mess get away from me again. Talk is cheap when you're high on cleaning fluid fumes.

As I poured a celebratory glass of wine, my doorbell rang. Still reveling in my accomplishment, I didn't stop to consider who could be at my door. It wasn't uncommon for Don Burner, my playboy next-door neighbor, to stop by and see if I needed anything. He was a nice enough guy, but sort of icky in a hey baby kind of way.

I opened the door and froze. Nate stood on the other side. Before I could slam and lock the door, he pushed it open.

“Lisa, we have to talk.”

“No, we don’t! I just got my house clean,” I said, as if that was a viable argument. I yanked on the handle, trying to wrench it from his grasp. “Things are finally getting back to normal. We don’t need to talk.”

“Yes, we do.” He palmed my chest below my neck and pushed me backward. “Now.”

I stumbled, which gave him the break he needed. He stepped inside. I liked to think I was tough, but having a strange man barge into my home snuffed out that misconception. I tamped down my panic. Where was nosy Don when I needed him? Once inside, Nate closed the door.

“You can’t just shove your way into my home.” I wasn’t sure how I would follow this argument. Though I hated to admit it, I didn’t possess any stunning skills that could physically eject him from my house. If he was a killer, the best I could do were a few well-placed bitch-slaps before going down. “I could have you arrested.”

“Yeah, but you won’t.” His gaze scanned the house. “You alone?”

“No.” I fumbled for a lie. “My neighbor, Don, is fixing my bathroom sink.”

“Would that be the same Don I just saw leaving with two young women.”

Crap.

I grunted. “No, that was his twin brother, Jon.”

Nate nodded. “Right.”

Damn, I wish I were a better liar.

“You’re not welcome here.” He took a step forward and I slapped my hand against the wall, blocking his path with my arm. If he was a grim reaper maybe he couldn’t enter my house until he was invited—like vampires. “Be gone.”

He smirked. “I’m not a vampire.”

“I know you’re not. There’s no such thing.” I rolled my eyes, trying to give the impression I hadn’t totally been thinking that. “What do you want?”

“Give me ten minutes. Then I’ll leave and never bother you again.”

It sounded too good to be true. “Never ever?”

“I promise.”

He didn’t do any kind of scout’s honor hand gesture, so I didn’t know if I could completely trust him. “Ten minutes.”

In that amount of time he could have me sliced up and vacuum-sealed, but what choice did I have. I spun and walked into my kitchen. The very idea that he being the grim reaper was the lesser of two evils made me want to laugh. Not in a ha-ha, ironic, isn’t it way. More like a, things keep getting weirder way.

His footsteps followed. I cursed myself. He would probably track dirt all over my sparkling floor. I scooped up my glass of wine and turned to face him. My upbringing forced me to offer him a drink. “Would you like a glass of wine?”

He held up a hand and shook his head. “No, thank you.”

Hmm, very polite—for a killer. I pulled out the chair and sat, indicating he should do the same. I took a sip of wine, wishing it were something stronger. “Okay, speak.”

He lowered himself into the chair and propped his elbows on the table, leveling a stare at me. “You are a grim reaper.”

“So you’ve said.” I took another drink and set down my glass. “Are we done?”

“Hardly.” He eased back and sized me up, his gaze narrowing. “All right then, you explain what happened at the Holiday station this morning.”

I considered giving him Vella’s explanation, but those reasons sounded even more ridiculous than reaping a soul. I decided to change tactics. “Let me ask you this, why do you think I’m a reaper?”

“We recently lost one of our own and you came on our radar as the next reaper in line.”

“Lost one of your own?” I didn’t like the sound of that. “You mean one of your reapers died?”

He shifted in his chair. “Yes.”

“That’s a bit ironic isn’t it, the Angel of Death dying?”

He shrugged. “We’re mortal, tools for the greater good of mankind.”

I refrained from telling him how much of a tool I thought he was. “Isn’t the grim reaper immortal?”

“You watch too many movies.”

That was true, but I didn’t confirm his statement. Our conversation was idiotic and yet a hundred questions demanded to be asked. That’s another problem. I had an unhealthy amount of morbid curiosity. “How did this reaper die?”

He took a deep breath and exhaled, giving me the impression he didn’t want to answer. “He was killed in a car accident.”

“Car accident?” Unease crept through me. Maybe it was the same ability I had to sense the paranormal, but his answer instantly put me on alert. “When?”

He reached up to massage the back of his neck and squinted at me. “A year ago.”

His answer hung in the air. I stared at him, physically feeling the silence pressing down on me. My mind grappled with what he had and hadn’t said. “You’re talking about Jeff...aren’t you?”

Several more seconds passed before he answered. “Yes.”

Whatever humor I’d found in the conversation vanished. “That’s not funny.”

“I know.” He leaned forward and pinned me with a stare. “Jeff was my partner.”

“Jeff didn’t have a partner. He was an accounts manager for General Resource Services. He wore a tie and took his lunch to work.” My voice raised an octave. “He worked late and provided for his family. He didn't reap souls."

Nate shook his head. "I'm sorry, Lisa, but that's not true. General Resource Services is a front for Grim Reaper Services."

"No." I slapped my hand on the table. "I've been in there. I've seen his office and people filling out applications." I pointed a finger at him. "And never once have I seen you. You were not his partner." What Nate was saying was asinine and impossible. My husband had been a good provider, a great father, and an okay husband. He sure as hell hadn't been a grim reaper. "I don't know why you're doing this, but I want you to leave."

Nate reached into his jacket pocket and pulled out two cards, tossing them onto the table. He flicked his head toward them. "Our identification badges."

My hand shook when I reached for them. Nate and Jeff's faces stared back at me from the laminated rectangles. GRS was printed in bold, black letters to the left. I flipped them over. A bar code and a bold line of numbers filled the backside. "This doesn't prove anything." I pitched them onto the table and glared at him. "You could've had those made anywhere."

"But I didn't." He slid another card across the table. "This is your temporary pass. It will get you onto the fourth floor."

I didn't pick it up, only glanced at it and then back at him. "I don't need that."

"You do if you're coming to GRS on Monday."

"I'm not going to GRS on Monday or any other day." I sounded convincing, but I'll admit my curiosity was trumping my disbelief. "I'm not interested in whatever little show and tell you have planned for me."

Nate picked up both identification cards and stood, leaving my temporary pass on the table. "Think about it. If you change your mind, be there at nine o'clock."

I remained seated. "I won't."

"We'll see." He headed for the door, stopping at the kitchen entrance. Without turning around he said, "I'm sorry about Jeff. He was a good partner."

I didn't reply and it seemed he didn't expect me to. The thud of the front door sounded, and his boots clomped down the stairs outside. With my interest piqued, I walked to the kitchen window to watch him climbed into a black Suburban.

"Figures." What other color vehicle would a reaper drive?

As he pulled out of the driveway, the murder of ravens, still sitting in the tree across the street, rose and followed his rig. Another chill ran through me. I rubbed my arms and turned. The laminated card glared at me from across the room. Unable to squash my curiosity, I crept toward the table and slid back onto my chair, picking up my glass of wine. Nate's claim that I was a reaper had been bad enough. To find out Jeff had been his partner—well, that was almost too much to believe. Almost.

As much as I didn't want to admit it, Jeff being a grim reaper made a lot more sense than me being one. For a while I'd suspected him of having an affair. Late nights, business trips, and vague explanations of where he'd been had all smacked of another woman. But maybe it hadn't been an affair at all. Death didn't happen at convenient times. Maybe he and Nate had split shifts, took turns sending on souls. Maybe Jeff had worked the day shift so he could lead a fairly normal family life.

I picked up the temporary pass, trying to control the guilt and anger building inside me. I'd never confronted him about my suspicions. If I had, perhaps things would've been different between us.

Why hadn't he told me what he really did for a living? I already knew the answer. We'd grown apart after the twins were born. Raising three kids was a full-time job, and Jeff never seemed that interested in helping. Don't get me wrong, our distance wasn't completely his fault. I'd embraced motherhood and let being his wife sort of fall by the wayside. My mother had always taught me that was what a good mom did. If I'd been smart I would have taken a hard look at my parent's non-existent relationship.

I took a deep drink of wine and dropped the card. More questions filled my head and I wouldn't be able to put this mess behind me until I checked out GRS for myself. I was like that, too damn inquisitive for my own good.

I walked to the living room and flipped on the television. Nothing looked mind-numbing enough to hold my interest and make me forget about the bizarre twist my life had taken.

A day ago I'd been a grieving widow. Now I was a woman, who had discovered her husband might have been leading a double life. Usually, in cases like this, the average woman learned her husband had kept a mistress, or fathered a second family in Ohio, or spent their life savings on gambling. But not mine. Oh no, he had to be a frickin' Angel of Death. And to top it off, he somehow passed it on to me. It just figured.

Chapter 4

Thankfully I had twelve solid hours to process everything Nate told me. I wouldn't have been able to hide the fact I'd been told I was a grim reaper if I hadn't had a good night's sleep. After picking up the kids, we headed to the sports store to buy Bronte her hockey skates, and then back home for a quiet evening of pizza and mindless sitcoms. I'd glossed over being in the hold up at the Holiday station, and after a few hundred questions, the kids became absorbed in their assorted electronics and toys. By Monday morning I felt things were almost back to normal—almost.

"Who pooped and didn't flush it?" I stuck my head out of the bathroom and waited for an answer I knew wouldn't come. "I just cleaned this bathroom. The least you guys can do is flush!"

I trudged back to the toilet and stared at the offending floater. Then I slammed the handle down. It wasn't logical to feel compassion for a turd, but the sense that my life was about to travel down the same swirling path, created a weird bond. I dropped the lid and shuffled to the sink. My hair still maintained its bouncy style after last night's shower, so I kept it down. After brushing my teeth and washing my face, I swiped on a layer of mascara and exited the bathroom.

"You're not leaving the house in that sweatshirt are you?" Bronte crossed her arms and gave me a look of teenage disapproval. "What is this, like the hundredth day in a row?"

"No, I'm not wearing this," I said, even though I'd totally been planning on doing exactly that. "And I washed it yesterday, so it's clean."

"I think it should say I'm sick of being my husband's armpit candy, instead."

"I'll have you know your father loved this sweatshirt."

Bronte snorted. "You should have buried him in it and done us all a favor."

"Oh, real nice." The tongue of a fifteen year old could be lethal. I'd learned to ignore most of her taciturn ways, chalking it up to hormones and coping mechanisms. That's what I told myself, anyway. "Are you ready to go?"

"I'm ready." She shoved a thumb over her shoulder toward the boys' bedroom. "But you might want to hustle Thing One and Two along. They're having one of their secret meetings."

Secret meetings never boded well and were best headed off at the pass. The last time Breck and Bryce sequestered themselves, I found all their stuffed animals wearing blindfolds and lined up against my bay window. That wouldn't have been so disturbing, but all my steak knives were missing as well—it was during their circus phase.

I knocked on the door, hopefully disrupting yet another nefarious plan. “Let’s go boys.”

The two jumped when I spoke, confirming their guilt. I’d have to stay on my toes for the next few days.

“Coming, Mom.” Bryce picked up his fifty-pound backpack and slipped it over his winter jacket. He’s my little nerd, and never leaves the house with less than seven things to occupy him in the van.

Empty-handed, Breck headed for the door.

“Coat.” I blocked his path so he couldn’t get past. “Backpack, homework, lunchbox.”

“Oh yeah.” Breck trotted across the room and gathered all his items in one disorganized bundle. “Ready.”

I smiled down at him. My twins were polar opposites. Bryce excelled academically and liked everything organized. Breck was the class clown and a sports enthusiast. Rarely did he remember a coat or to brush his hair. His mischievousness kept me on twenty-four hour alert.

“Get in the van. We don’t want to be late.”

The boys thundered from the room. I followed, collecting my fleece jacket and purse, waiting to make sure the kids were out of the house. As I walked to the kitchen, I slipped on my coat and zipped it so Bronte wouldn’t see I was still wearing the sweatshirt. From between the overdue phone and cable bill, I plucked the temporary pass Nate had given me, and shoved it into my coat pocket.

Though it was only a stiff piece of plastic, it weighed like a heavy stone. Maybe it was just my conscience. After Nate left, my guilt about believing Jeff had cheated had grown. For the rest of the weekend my mind conjured questions I couldn’t answer. By Sunday night I solidified my decision to go to GRS Monday morning. At the very least, I’d be able to satisfy my curiosity and put this crazy reaper business behind me.

After dropping off Bronte at the high school and the boys at their elementary school for open gym time, I headed down Muldoon toward GRS. It was another gray, brisk day, which seemed appropriate for my mood. At a stoplight I watched the cars speed past, wondering if any of the drivers were grim reapers.

I caught myself. Did I actually believe I was a reaper, or that they even existed? I’d always liked the idea of angels escorting me to Heaven after I died. What I witnessed in the bathroom of the Holiday Station was about as far from that scenario as I could imagine.

The light turned green and I continued down Muldoon, which turned into Tudor. I’ve never understood the naming of roads in Anchorage. For no discernible reason, street names changed. L Street turned into Minnesota, which then turned into O’Malley farther down. I didn’t know why and never asked. Maybe those who named the streets had so many great choices they wanted to use them all.

I slowed when I approached the parking lot to the GRS building. Omar fought my attempt to turn right. Yeah, I’m blaming my van. I veered into the left lane and whipped a U-turn. Staying in the right lane, I pulled into Starbucks and shut off the engine. I stared at Jeff's old work place. Any other time it was simply a reminder of where he'd worked. Now it loomed against the cloudy sky, ominous and forbidding. I squinted, trying to peer through the top floor windows, but couldn't see anything beyond the silver glass.

I glanced at the clock on my phone. There were still forty-five minutes before Nate expected me. The thought of a little more time calmed me slightly. As I got out of the van and walked toward the coffee shop, shivers skittered up my spine. Somebody was watching me. My eyes darted back toward the van, but the rest of the lot was empty. I did a sweep of the GRS building. Unless somebody stared at me from behind the mirrored windows, I couldn't locate anybody. Then I looked up and noticed a fat raven sitting on the edge of the roof. My steps slowed. I'm no raven expert, but I swear it was the same bird that had perched on my porch railing a few days before. It gurgled at me, as if to confirm my unanswered question.

I stopped, waiting for the raven to do something other than make noises. To my surprise, it pecked once at something on the ledge and then took flight. It dove and I ducked to avoid being hit. With a downward pull of its wings, it soared upward. As it did, something fell from its beak.

The object landed with a metal clank and slid along the sidewalk to bump against the toe of my boot, but the bird continued its course toward downtown. I picked up the metal charm and examined it. A cold chill raced through me. It was a raven sitting on the handle of a scythe, the blade curling above its head.

The charm burned against the palm of my hand but I didn't think it was from the cold. It grew hotter. I pinched the clasp by my thumb and index finger and held it up to the light. Yep, it was definitely glowing.

When I got up this morning I'd been so confident I'd be able to put all this reaper craziness behind me. I guess that wasn't going to happen.

A knot formed in my stomach. Coffee suddenly sounded unappetizing. It was probably best to face my fears and get this over with. I took a deep breath, pocketed the charm, and walked back to my van.

There was no simple way to get across the street to the GRS building, so I drove to the nearest stop light, executed another U-turn, and headed back. This time I turned into the parking lot. Not giving myself a chance to chicken out, I grabbed my purse and strode to the front door.

The building was exactly as I remembered. Large glass doors led to a utilitarian foyer, which was empty at the moment. A wide hall lined with dark wood doors branched to the left. I'd taken a few steps toward the hall with the intention of examining the offices, when the elevator door to the right dinged open.

I jumped and spun to see Nate leaning against the back wall. "I wasn't sure you were going to show up."

"Neither was I." I shrugged, pretending all this wasn't completely freaking me out. "I think I'm early."

He exited the elevator with a knowing smile. Maybe I was easier to read than I thought. His gorgeous blue eyes leveled on me and I mentally cursed him for being even better looking today. Though loathe to admit it, I cared what he thought of me, and was happy I'd gotten my hair cut and attempted the minimal amount of makeup this morning. However, I should have taken Bronte's harsh suggestion and changed my shirt.

Nate held his hand out. "Do you have your pass?"

"Oh, yeah." I fumbled in my pocket and pulled out the card. The raven charm hooked on the edge and dropped on the floor. Before I could grab it, Nate bent and retrieved the charm. I held out my hand, not wanting him to examine it too closely. It was tough to rationalize the raven and its gift being a coincidence. "That's just something I found."

His eyebrows lifted and he dangled in front of me. "A little bird didn't happen to give this to you, did it?"

"Maybe." I snatched it from his fingers and shoved it back in my pocket. "It's nothing."

The grunt he issued spoke volumes, letting me know I couldn't be farther from the truth. I shoved the temporary pass at him.

He took it and smiled again, a little dimple appearing in his cheek. I had the overwhelming urge to slap the cuteness off his face for no better reason than the feeling inept every time I was around him.

"Come on." He walked toward the elevator. When I didn't move, he stopped and looked at me. "I promise it's just an elevator. Nothing more."

"Right." After what I'd seen in the Holiday bathroom, elevators had become my least favorite place. I followed him into the car, praising myself for my courage—or colossal stupidity. That was still to be determined. "So what happens now?"

Instead of answering, Nate slid my pass along the top of the panel and punched the fourth floor. He leaned against the bar. The doors slid shut, sealing us inside. When the elevator rose, my stomach lurched. Not wanting to look at Nate, I stared at the circles, on the panel, following their lighted path, waiting for his answer. Muffled music wafted from the hidden speakers in the ceiling.

Finally he said, "That depends on you."

I figured he'd say something like that. It was a goading statement that forced me to engage in the conversation. I did the same thing with Bronte. I'd bite. "How so?"

"Are you here because you're taking the fact that you're a grim reaper seriously, or is this about assuaging your guilt over Jeff?"

I stiffened. "I don't have any guilt over Jeff." Nate cocked his brow in a wordless retort. "Fine." I crossed my arms over my chest. "I might have thought he was cheating on me, and I might be slightly curious about the whole reaper gig, but that doesn't mean I believe everything you told me."

"Fair enough." The elevator slowed and gave a little hiccup when it came to a stop. "After your orientation, I think you'll be sufficiently convinced."

I bit back we'll just see about that.

The elevator doors slid open to reveal a long, black reception desk with a formidable looking woman sitting behind it. Her hair had impressive height and reminded me of my aunt Jean, who refused to give up her sixties hairstyle. When I was little I used to watch my aunt slick purple gel on a single curl at each side of her head, and secure them to her cheeks with pink tape. Then she would wrap her entire head in toilet paper. In the morning she'd exit the bedroom with a perfectly coiffured hairdo that stood up to any windstorm.

"Morning, Madge." I followed Nate to the desk. He rested an arm along the counter. "You're looking particularly lovely this morning."

Madge's smile was taut and didn't quite reach her eyes. "Aren't you the charmer?" Her gaze slid to me. "Lisa Carron?"

I nodded and inched forward.

Her eyes lingered on me a few seconds before she released a sigh heavily laced with forced acceptance. "Fill these out." She slapped a stack of papers on the counter. "Don't forget to initial the bottom of each page or you won't be allowed into orientation."

I shoved the papers back to her. "I have no intention of attending orientation."

"That's what they all say, Sweetie." The woman smiled again, which looked more like a grimace, her eyes squinting behind glasses nearly as big as her head. "Humor me." She pointed toward a row of chairs against the wall. "Clipboards and pens are on the table."

With that, she spun her chair toward her computer, dismissing us. I picked up the papers and looked at Nate. "Are these a binding contract?"

"No." His hand slid around my arm, and he led me to the chairs. Tiny spindles of heat burrowed into my arm where he touched me. I ignored it. "But you can't get past Madge until you sign the privacy agreement." We sat and he handed me a pen from the neat arrangement in a cup. "Mainly, these say you're entering GRS of your own free will, without coercion, and you agree not to speak of what you see and learn today if you do not accept the position."

"Who would believe me?"

For the most part the papers said exactly what Nate had told me. Except for a few paragraphs of legal nerd talk, the agreement was straightforward and something I could live with. Once I left GRS today, I'd have no problem never mentioning the entire incident.

Ten minutes later, I'd finished filling out the forms and returned them to Madge. After a quick perusal, she tapped them into a neat pile and slammed a staple into the corner. "Welcome to GRS, Mrs. Carron."

I considered reiterating that I wouldn't be staying, but from her bored look, I could see she didn't give a crap. "Thank you."

"Come on." Nate stopped at a glass door and slid my pass along the key panel again. The lock released with a little click and he pushed the door open. Keyboard tapping and low conversations I couldn't make out hummed inside. "After you."

I stepped around him into what looked like a normal office setting. Cubicles filled the center of the room and long glassed-in conference rooms lined each end of the work area. The place looked identical to the offices on the first two floors where I thought Jeff had worked.

“Morning, Mr. Cramer.” A chubby guy in a tight white shirt and a Harry Potter tie popped his head over the top of his wall. “New recruit?”

“Morning, Harold. This is Lisa.” I started to say hello, but Nate placed his hand on my waist and guided me toward one of the conference rooms at the end of the cubicles. “She’s undecided whether she wants to work for us, but I think I can persuade her.”

Harold chuckled. “If anybody can, it’s you, Mr. Cramer.”

When we were out of earshot I said, “You and Harold got a bromance going?”

Nate scowled at me. “He’s just a colleague.”

“Seems more like a groupie.” With a gentle shove, he pushed me into the room and shut the door. “Are you some kind of reaper rock star?”

He turned to face me. “Hardly, and Harold is not a groupie. He’s a Wannabe.”

“A what?”

“He wants to be a reaper, but he’s not endowed with the Grim.” Nate walked to a flat panel television and picked up the remote. “If you decide to come to the dark side, you’ll be working with several Wannabes.”

“Huh, that’s interesting.” I glanced at Harold’s cubicle. He stared at me with the same longing I stared at bikinis with every spring. I want to wear one so badly but it was never going to happen.

“Have a seat.” Nate pointed to a chair with the remote. “This film is a little dated, but it gives all the pertinent information you’ll need to make a decision.” He slid the clicker to me. “If you have any questions, pause the DVD and ask.” Next, he pushed a pad of paper and a generic black pen at me. “You might want to take notes.”

“All right.” I retrieved the remote and settled back into the chair. “This should be interesting.”

I didn’t know what to expect, but a 1950’s style infomercial was not it. The women in the film wore torturous shoes, and bras that could repel a missile attack. Their hairstyles reminded me of Madge’s at the front desk, and I noticed all the women were stationed at the Wannabe cubicles.

I pointed to the television. “So—what—no women were reapers in the fifties?”

“There have been women reapers all through history. I told you the film was a little dated.”

“A little? Since this video was made entire, empires have fallen. We’ve walked on the moon, and wised up about smoking in the work place.” A thin smoky veil filled the cubicle area where the women were happily typing and smoking. My lungs hurt just watching them.

“Focus on what they’re saying, not the actors.” Nate sat in the chair directly opposite me.

I concentrated on the message and buried my feminist outrage. After a minute, I found myself absorbed in the narrator’s explanation of GRS.

“Every reaper is a descendant of Charon, the Ferryman.”

I paused the video and looked at Nate. “A descendant of Charon? The same Ferryman on the River Styx?”

Nate nodded. “Every few hundred years, Charon comes to the surface for a vacation. This usually results in one or two pregnancies.”

“So, let me get this straight, Charon takes shore leave, knocks up a few women, and then goes back to his ferry?”

“Yeah, he’s the ultimate sailor.” He glanced at his watch. “As a matter of fact, it’s about time for his next holiday.”

I shook my head. “Remind me to stay as far away from him as possible.”

I pressed play and settled back in my chair. I admit the reapers had a good system. They were divided into different groups—illness, children, war, natural causes, and violent crimes. I wondered what group I’d be in if I’d accepted the job.

Once you make the commitment to join the GRS team you will be given a bevy of tests, both physical and psychological.

I refrained from asking anything about the tests. I didn’t think I wanted to know and the less knowledge the easier it would be to forget this crazy mess.

With support from your area’s command central, you will embark on a career that is not only monetarily rewarding, but a service to all mankind. Welcome to GRS.

The video ended. Nate walked to the television and shut off. “What do you think?”

“What did he mean by monetarily rewarding?” This piqued my interest. I’d never considered getting paid to reap souls, but Jeff got his paycheck from somewhere. His life insurance had barely carried us a year and my savings were nearly depleted. I’d been putting off getting a job so I could be there for the kids, but I couldn’t ignore the need for employment any longer. “Do we get paid for being grim reapers?”

“Yes.” Nate folded his hands on the table. “Plus, you get bonuses for quota.”

I eased forward in my chair, mimicking his posture. “What are we talking here—barista pay, or would I actually be able to support my family?”

The corners of Nate’s mouth quirked up in a gotcha kind of way. And as much as it irritated me to admit it, he had my interest. When I got pregnant with Bronte, I dropped out of college and never went back. At this point in my life the best I qualified for was an entry-level position in retail or a receptionist.

“You would definitely be able to support your family.” He paused. “Jeff did.”

I couldn’t argue. We’d always had everything we needed—not everything we wanted, but who did nowadays? “How dangerous is it?”

Nate shrugged. “Not very dangerous for us. Mainly we deal with the weather or inconvenient locations. You won’t be assigned to War. That’s the most dangerous post.”

His statement brought my reeling mind to a halt. The image of hundreds, sometimes thousands, of people killed in a single attack, and only a few reapers to dispatch their souls popped into my mind. “What happens if a soul isn’t reaped?”

“Purgatory, ghosts, limbo—it depends on the life they lived and what they believed.”

A knot formed in my stomach, obligation pressing on me. If I didn’t reap, then who would? Even if I’d been chosen by some ancient accidental pregnancy, the task had fallen to me. What if it later fell to one or all of my kids? If I took the position I’d be able to help them adjust. Not to mention the money. Thoughts of a bright Christmas, and fixing my dollar-sucking pit of a house pulled me toward the decision I so vehemently resisted. I planned on leaving GRS today and never looking back. How quickly plans changed.

I gave a heavy sigh, praying I wouldn’t regret this. “All right, I’m in.”

Chapter 5

The expression on Nate's face was a cross between relief and disappointment. I knew he didn't think I'd make a good reaper. He'd made that perfectly clear at the Holiday station, but he'd done his job by recruiting me.

"Great." His tone was in direct opposition with his words. "Let's get the paperwork started."

I followed him out the door. All the Wannabes looked up when we exited. "Everybody, Lisa Carron will be taking Jeff Carron's place."

A few of the workers smiled and waved. There were even welcomes from Harold and a woman sitting in the front row, but I also noticed raised eyebrows at Nate's announcement. Obviously he wasn't the only one who questioned my abilities, which made me even more determined to succeed.

I gave a little wave, but didn't know what else to say. Nate headed toward a door I hadn't noticed at the other end of the room. We stepped through, sealing out the Wannabes' intense attention. Dark doors similar to those on the ground floor stretched down a wide hallway.

He stopped at the first office. "Morning, Nigel."

A crisp looking man in an argyle sweater vest and slicked back hair sat at an impeccably organized desk. "Good morning." His eyes drifted to me and back to Nate. "Mrs. Carron has accepted the position?"

"Yes, she has." I answered, irritated that Nigel talked as if I wasn't in the room.

His lips pinched together, his gaze cutting to me and back to his desk. Either this guy was a complete ass, or was in girl-panic mode. He opened the bottom drawer of his desk and pulled out a neatly compiled folder of papers.

"Lisa, this is Nigel Bottomzumt. He will take care of your personnel paperwork. Workerman's Comp, leave requests, and your orientation packet."

"Nigel Bottomsup?" I asked, not sure I'd heard correctly.

"Bottomzumt, Mrs. Carron. With a z-u-m-p-t."

Touchy. "Gotcha," I said.

"She'll need to fill out the usual forms, W-4, retirement package, life and medical benefits forms." He placed a black pen on top of the packet, and slid it across the desk. "You do have a beneficiary in case you die in the line of duty don't you?"

“To be honest, Nigel, since my husband died, I’ve tried not to think about the what-ifs of something happening to me.” I termed it my coping strategy. Vella called it burying my head in the sand. From the way he stared at me it looked like my avoidance issues needed to be faced. “My kids will receive any money I have.” Which, if I died tomorrow would keep them in mac and cheese for a month. “I’d like Vella Anderson to be the executor of whatever benefits I’d get from GRS.”

Nigel furrowed his brow. “You don’t have any living relatives that might be better?”

He asked the question in a way that told me he knew my parents were alive. Of course he would since Jeff had been a reaper. Nigel probably kept a spreadsheet on all the employees of GRS and their families.

“Yes, my parents and brother are alive, but I’d like my friend Vella to handle the money for my kids.” It was an instantaneous decision and I really should have asked her permission. But I wanted Vella to raise the kids if I died. She didn’t have any children of her own and my parents were old, well into their sixties. Not to mention, the fact my mother and I butted heads on every subject. My brother, Bryan, could barely take care of himself, let alone three kids. If I let him raise the kids, they’d end up in juvenile court by the time they were sixteen. “Trust me, this is best, and if my status as being a reaper ever came out, Vella would be far more understanding than my parents.”

Nigel glanced at Nate, as if asking his permission to allow it.

“Is there a problem?” My gaze bounced between the two of them.

“No,” Nate said. “You have the right to choose whomever you want.”

“Damn right I do.” I wasn’t sure why there was even a question.

Nigel’s mouth tightened. “All right, then. Please print legibly.”

I turned my attention to the forms, ignoring the sick feeling the thought of dying gave me. The questions were extensive, not the usual insurance or privacy forms. I’m not sure why they even bothered making me swear I wouldn’t tell anybody. Couldn’t the big bosses smite me with a single blow if I spill the beans on the super-secret reaper club?

My hand hovered over the page. I’d already told Vella about Nate and she’d ask again. Hopefully I wouldn’t get us inadvertently added to the supernatural kill-list by telling her about my new job. After all, she’d need to know since she’d be raising my children.

It took about half an hour to fill out all the forms. My fingers cramped from writing on the tiny lines. “All done.”

As I handed the packet back to Nigel, the cell phone on his desk started playing Single Ladies by Beyoncé.

His mouth thinned even more and he picked up the phone. “Excuse me.”

My first thought was that Nigel had a sweetheart, but my suspicions were quickly extinguished.

“Hello.” He spun his chair so the back faced us. I let my eyes travel over his spotless office. “Yes, I will pick it up on my way home.” His words drifted over the top of the chair.

Hmm, did Nigel have a wife? That was hard to believe. I couldn’t picture what kind of woman would fall for him. Maybe someone meek and mousey.

“No, Mother, the couple’s yoga is tomorrow night.”

Ewww!

I’m sorry, but doing couple’s anything with a parent skeeved me out. I had to repress the urge to mimic gagging. My gaze cut to Nate, and by the sneer on his upper lip he also struggled with the ick factor.

Nigel’s voice lowered to a whisper. “I got it, Mother. Now, goodbye.”

When the call ended, he spun to face us and set the phone back in its original spot. He opened the folder of forms I’d filled out, and thumbed through them. After a few minutes, he shut the file and looked up, giving me a smile that didn’t reach his eyes. “Everything seems in order.”

I sat there, waiting for more, but I guess he was finished talking. “Okay then. What next?”

“You’ll need to get your pass.” Nate smiled at Nigel. “As usual, thanks for your help.”

Nigel smoothed his hands down the front of his vest. “You’re welcome, Nate. It’s always a pleasure dealing with employees who stick to protocol.” He peered at me, his gaze almost accusatory. “Welcome to GRS, Mrs. Carron.”

I didn’t know why Nigel disliked me, but the man obviously didn’t approve. Maybe he held with Nate’s belief I’d suck as a reaper. “Thank you,” I said. “Have fun with your mother at couple’s yoga.”

His gaze narrowed, as if trying to figure out if I was mocking him. Of course I was. That was my impulse reaction when somebody treated me like dog do-do he needed to scrape off the bottom of their shoe.

I followed Nate to the next office. A large, fortyish, Samoan woman, with skin the color of caramel and eyes the color steel, sat behind a long counter.

“Nate Cramer. Where have you been hiding yourself?” Her greeting was the direct opposite of what we’d received in Nigel’s office. I instantly liked her. “I’ve missed you, Sugar Pie.”

“You know how it is, Rosie, work—work—work.” He walked to the counter and leaned on it. “But I’m back.” He turned, gesturing me forward. “Rosie, this is Lisa Carron.”

Her smile spread, showing off pearly teeth. The skin around her eyes crinkled. “Lisa.” She took my hand. “Welcome. I’m so sorry about your husband.”

“Thank you, Rosie.” Warmth spread through my hand when she clutched it. The sensation sent a wave of calmness through me, giving me the impression there was more to her than just being the office help. I made a mental note to ask Nate about the workers. Sure they were Wannabes, but what made them qualified to work at GRS. “I’m happy to be here.”

She released me and pointed to a blue screen. “Why don’t you stand over there and I’ll immortalize that pretty face of yours on a GRS pass.”

That comment endeared her to me even more, and I did as she asked. The thought of having my own access card gave me a little thrill. It had been a long time since I’d been anything other than Jeff’s wife, or the kids’ mother. Discovering that reapers really existed overshadowed the fact that I was now gainfully employed.

I let my arms hang at my side. “Should I smile or not smile.”

“You should definitely smile, Sugar.” Rosie wrinkled her nose. “Why don’t you take your jacket off?”

I hesitated, once again cursing myself for wearing Jeff’s sweatshirt. “I think I’ll leave it on, if that’s okay.”

She shrugged. “Suit yourself.”

Adjusting the lens of the mounted camera at me, she said, “Say grim reaper.”

I laughed and she snapped the picture.

“Perfect.” Rosie moved to her computer. “It will be just a minute.” She tapped on the keys. “Nigel has already got your information in the system.”

“We only left his office two minutes ago,” I said.

“That’s our Nigel.” The way Rosie said his name made me think that maybe she had the hots for him.

I tried to imagine the two of them together, but couldn’t quite make that love match. The whirr of a machine behind the counter started. After another minute, Rosie handed me my very own GRS access card. It was still warm from the laminating machine, so I held it around the edges and marveled at my picture.

My smiling face beamed back. It was the happiest I’d looked in over a year. “Thank you.”

“You’re welcome, Sugar.”

“All right.” Nate straightened away from the counter. “Rosie, as always you’ve brightened my day.”

“You’re such a sweet talker.” She waved a hand at him, her laughter filling the office. “Lisa, don’t let this silver-tongued devil talk you into anything dangerous.”

The mention of danger popped my bubble of joy. The way she had said you, made me wonder just how many people Nate had coerced into hazardous situations. Had Jeff been one of them? “I sure won’t, Rosie.”

“Come on.” He indicated the door. “On to payroll.”

Money, now that was a subject I could sink my teeth into. It was the only reason I’d taken this job—well, that, and the niggle of universal obligation. I trailed Nate. “So what kind of pay are we talking about—you know, just a ballpark figure?”

“I’ll let Willow fill you in on all the details.” He stopped at the next door. “She’ll be able to answer any questions you have.”

Willow was a typical Alaskan name. We also had a lot of Ravens, Denalis, and Auroras in the state. More than likely Willow was young with the kind of natural beauty that looked like she’d been skiing over the weekend. I walked into the office and realized I was partially right.

She glanced up from her desk and gave us a super model smile. Green, almond-shaped eyes were accentuated by her long red hair, which was pinned up in a messy up-do. If I tried to pull off that hairstyle, it would look like I'd been wrestling a chimpanzee all night.

"Good morning." She stood and held out her hand. "You must be Lisa Carron."

It appeared everybody at GRS knew about me. I accepted her greeting. "Yes, and you must be Willow."

She released my hand. "That's me, or Money Bags as everybody calls me behind my back."

Nate sat in one of the chairs in front of her desk. "That's not what I call you behind your back."

He smiled and folded his hands across his stomach. "Or to your face."

She lifted a brow at him. "Always a charmer, Nate."

Though Rosie had basically said the same thing, Willow's tone was not complementary. Obviously these two didn't get along. I sat, wondering about the couple's history.

"I think I can correctly assume that you've taken the position here at GRS?" She opened a file lying on her desk but her gaze never left me.

I exhaled. "Against my better judgment, yes, but I need a job."

Her smile was sweet and understanding. Despite Nate's problems with Willow, I liked her. "I understand your hesitance, but I'm sure you'll do fine." She paused. "I'm sorry about your husband. All this must have come as quite a shock."

"Thank you. Yes, I'm still reeling a bit, but I'm glad I found out."

I really wasn't. But, many times during my life I hadn't gotten the memo from the big guy upstairs. In order to cope with all the changes, I needed to believe there was a higher purpose in me becoming a reaper.

"All right, let's dive in." She placed her hands on top of the file. "GRS is set up on a pay scale that takes into account time in service and rank."

"Rank?" I asked.

"Yes, you will start out as a Deputy or a GR1." She slid the top sheet of paper toward me and pointed to a graph. "This is the pay to start with. After your six-month training period, you'll move up to a Deputy GR2. This will increase your income $112 per pay period."

It was difficult to disguise my disappointment over my base pay. The amount would barely be enough to cover our expenses. I nodded and studied the graph, not trusting that my frustration wouldn't leak out. Instead I looked at Nate. "What are you?"

"Lieutenant GR6."

I scanned down the table. His pay was impressive, about three thousand dollars more a month than I would be making. "What rank was Jeff?"

He was quiet for a few seconds. "Sargent GR6."

I bit the inside of my cheek to stop myself from asking more questions. There was no way my husband had made as much as the chart said. Or if he had, he didn't spend it on the family. That led to the question, where the hell had all the money gone?

“I know it doesn’t seem like much, especially since you were used to Jeff’s salary.”

“No, actually it’s fine.” Because I was never used to his frickin’ salary.

Not commenting further about Jeff’s pay, she pointed to the next chart down. “But we also give you a stipend each month for working in a remote location.”

My spirits lifted slightly at the extra four hundred dollars, but I had to push away the idea there was more money Jeff hadn’t brought home. I refocused on my present situation. “Anchorage is considered remote?”

Her brow furrowed and she looked at Nate. “I’d assumed Nate had briefed you on all the specifics of the job and your duties before having you accept the position.”

Now I looked—well glared—at him. “No, he didn’t.”

She sighed. “Anchorage is not considered remote, but the outlying villages are. You will be required to travel for GRS, and reap souls whenever needed.”

“That presents a tiny problem considering I’m a single mother of three. I can’t just drop everything and fly out to Barrow or Dillingham. What am I supposed to do with my kids?”

“That’s precisely why I expected this to be explained prior to your signing.” She scowled at Nate again, but he seemed unrepentant. We were definitely going to have a few words after my orientation. “Fortunately, GRS has in-home care for those who need it or we will supplement your sitting costs if you have someone you trust.”

I nodded. “I’ll have to think about this. I can’t leave my kids with just anybody.” Specifically my mother.

Mom would take them in a heartbeat, but I’d be indebted to her forever. Still, I needed a job, and making that sacrifice would be worth it. On the flip side of the coin, if none of my kids became reapers, which I dearly hoped, then I wouldn’t be able to throw my martyrdom back in their faces when they blamed me for their horrible lives. I was looking at the big picture here.

“Let me know if you need any help setting things up. I can introduce you to our caregivers. They are ready at a moment’s notice and might be good to keep as a backup.”

“Thank you, Willow, I really appreciate that.” I liked her more and more. She and Rosie were the first people at GRS who actually seemed human. “Do you have kids?”

“No.” She picked up her pen and tapped it on the desk. “But I raised my sister—until she died a few years ago.”

Instantly tears burned at the back of my eyes. I swallowed hard, reaching across the desk to cover her hand with mine. “I’m so sorry.”

From experience, I knew nothing more needed to be said. After Jeff died people tried to console me by relating a story about someone they’d lost. Although they attempted to find a common ground and connect with me, I got so tired of trying to make them feel better. I ceased being the griever and became the comforter. It was very draining.

“Thank you,” she said.

I pulled my hand back and fumbled for a way to get back on topic. “I think meeting GRS’s caregivers is a good idea.”

“Great, I will set that up for us in a few weeks, after you get settled.” Her smile returned. “Now, onto bonuses.”

“I like the sound of that.” I glanced at Nate. For whatever reason, he didn’t seem happy. Maybe he and Willow had dated, and she’d dumped his grumpy butt. I added that to my list of questions for him.

“After every twenty reaps you will receive a thousand dollar bonus. On your hundredth reap you will receive an incentive bonus of five thousand dollars.” She slid another sheet to me. “This is the breakdown beyond that.”

“Wow.” I glanced at the figures. “Twenty five thousand for a thousand reaps?”

“We’ve only had one person in Alaska receive that bonus.” Her eyes cut to Nate and back to me. “But all the reaps were not harvested in Alaska.”

He crossed his arms and continued to glare at Willow. I refrained from asking him how he reaped a thousand souls. Mainly because I didn’t want to know, figuring it was a horrific natural disaster, or something even more gruesome. At this point ignorance was bliss.

“All righty then,” I said, trying to talk past the uncomfortable tension zinging between them. “How often do we get paid?”

Willow relaxed against her chair. “Every two weeks. We do direct deposit. We’re a paperless office whenever possible.”

“Recycle, reuse, and reap?” I asked.

She smiled again. “I like that motto. We might have to adopt it for our conservation program.”

Nate stood. “Is that all?”

Willow didn’t look at him, but stood and held out her hand again. “It was great meeting you, Lisa. Let me know if you have any questions.”

“Thank you, I will.” I shook her hand.

“I hope you like it here. I’m sure you’ll be a great asset to GRS.”

“Finally, somebody with vision.”

Nate harrumphed and left without waiting. “Is he always like this?”

“Oh no, just around me.” She sighed. “I’m sure he’ll be somewhat human with you.”

“One can only hope.” I gave her a consoling smile and left. Something had definitely happened between him and Willow. Call me an office gossip, but I was already devising a plan to squeeze that info out of him. I skipped a few steps to catch up with him. “What’s next?”

“Time to find out if you’re pregnant.”

Chapter 6

I skidded to a stop. “Excuse me?”

Nate turned to face me. “Your medical exam is next.”

“Oh.” I started walking again. The only way I’d be pregnant was through an immaculate conception, which I was beginning to believe could actually happen. Who knew which of the things I once considered fantasy could possibly be true. “You’re not going to be in my exam with me, are you?”

He stopped at a glass door. A metal sign engraved with medical office hung beside it. “Thankfully, no.”

Thankfully indeed. “Are we finished after this?”

Nate checked his watch. “I’ll come back and in about an hour. We can catch some lunch after that.” His eyes did a quick track up and down my body. “You must be getting hungry.”

Wow, he’d so effortlessly insulted me with his judgmental scan. I had questions for him about the job, so I bit back my retort and plastered on a smile. “Sounds great.”

Without any more discussion, because seriously, my self-esteem had already taken a beating today, I entered the office and shut the door in his face.

Cherry wood and rich plum walls decorated the outer lobby. The warm mood directly contradicted the utilitarian world that existed beyond the door. I prayed the doctor was a woman. Of all the employees I’d met so far, women seemed to be the only ones with an ounce of compassion.

I walked to the counter and tapped the bell. A feminine voice answered from somewhere beyond my sight. “I’ll be with you in a second.”

So far so good. At least the nurse or receptionist was a woman. Another minute passed, and the doctor finally appeared. She was around fifty and had black hair with two thick streaks of white racing down each side, as if they’d been painted on.

“Hi, I’m Dr. Jensen, but call me Candace.” She held open the door with her hip and extended her hand. “You must be Lisa.”

“That’s me, the new recruit.” I gave her hand a quick shake, relief washing through me. I didn’t know how far up into my sweet junk she was going to get, but I felt much more comfortable discussing my girl problems with a female doctor. “Nice to meet you.”

“Come on back.” She led me to the first room on the right, and pulled a file from the pocket next to the door. “I’ll need to get some history before we start the exam.”

“Great.” I plopped down in a plum colored chair that was incredibly comfortable and would look fantastic in my living room. She took her place at a small writing desk. “Doesn’t a nurse usually do this part of the exam?”

“I’m the doctor, nurse, receptionist, and sometimes janitor.” She looked up from the file and smiled. “Besides new recruits, and the annual medical exam on the employees, I don’t see a lot of action here.” She shrugged. “I used to be an ER doctor in Detroit. I loved it for a while, but the constant crisis tends to take its toll. Here there’s rarely any drama and a lot of my day is free to work on other projects.”

“Sounds like a dream job. I’d like getting paid big bucks and having everybody basically leave me alone.”

“That surprises me. Most reapers like to be in the thick of things.”

I held out my arms to the side. “Do I look like your typical reaper? I have three kids, one of them being a teenage girl. The most excitement I’ve had over the past year was the convenience store robbery that landed me here.”

“Yes, I heard about that.” Thick black lashes framed her dark blue eyes. “I think you’re the first recruit I’ve had who accidentally became a reaper.”

I sighed. “Once you get to know me you’ll see how fitting my initiation was.”

She laughed. “I’m sure you’ll be a great reaper.”

I grimaced and shook my head. “You’re either being incredibly diplomatic or gullible.”

“Between you and me I think the reapers could use a little more estrogen on their team.” She tucked a hank of thick hair behind her ear and looked at the chart. “It seems to me reaping should be handled with finesse and compassion, instead of acting as if they’re tossing a log on the fire.”

“Oh, you’ve met Nate then?”

She laughed again and nodded, but made no further comment on the subject. “So, first question. Are you pregnant, or is there a possibility of being pregnant?”

Several answers popped into my head but I refrained from saying them. “No.”

“Do you have any old injuries that are giving you problems or periodically act up?”

“Well, I sprained my ankle in a horrible gardening accident last year.”

She looked up, her brows lifted. “A horrible gardening accident?”

“I was talking on the phone and carrying a potted tomato plant out my front door, when I tripped and fell.” It had been awful and humiliating. Repeating the sordid details again dredged up what a Mrs. Magoo I could be. “I landed on the pot, tossed the phone over the side of the patio, and bugged up my ankle.” Perhaps it was from the painfully embarrassing memories, but my ankle began to throb. “It aches when the weather changes, or if I walk on uneven ground for a long time—or talk about it.”

“Did the tomato make it?” she asked seriously, scribbling a few notes down.

“Nope, but it was a lost cause to begin with. My plants always die.” It was true, I’d yet to own a plant I was able to nurture and get to flourish.

Continuing to write, she said. “That’s probably because you’re a reaper?”

“Seriously?”

She looked up. “Most reapers have a tough time with plants and small animals, like fish.”

“Wow, I always thought I’d inherited my mother’s anti-green thumb.” We never had plants when I was growing up. When I got my own place I’d been determined to get a little green in my life. Alaskan winter days were dark and plants seemed like the perfect touch of life during the cold months. But no matter what I tried, I couldn’t get the darn things to grow. Now I knew why. “Remind me not to clean my boys’ fish tank.”

“I’ll make a note here to start you on physical therapy. I can help you strengthen your ankle.”

“A physical therapist too?” I liked Dr. Jensen. She didn’t just listen to what I said, but seemed genuinely interested in helping me.

“I started my medical career as an assistant to a physical therapist.” She smiled. “It made me want to become a doctor.”

“Where would we do my physical rehab, here?” Lord knew I could use it on more than just my ankle.

“Yes. One of the benefits of working at GRS is deep pockets. I’ve got better equipment and supplies than most hospitals in Alaska.” Her gaze tracked down the form. “Do you smoke?”

“No.”

She made a checkmark. “Do you drink alcohol?”

“Yes.”

“How often?”

I hated these questions. They always made me feel like I’d done something wrong. “Two to three times a week?”

She scribbled another note. “Hard liquor? Wine? Beer?”

“Yes.” Realizing that sounded rather alcoholicish, I added, “But I prefer beer.”

Another smile spread across her face. “A girl after my own heart.”

The woman had sophistication coming out her ears and I had a difficult time picturing her downing a cold one. “I pegged you as a wine drinker?”

“One of my claims to fame in college was being the two time beer drinking champion at my sorority’s Oktoberfest.”

“Impressive.” The connection between Dr. Jensen and I tightened a little more. “But only two years?”

She flipped around a picture frame that had been facing away from me and pointed to a Muffy-looking blond. “Belinda Mayer stole the title my senior year.”

The good doc stood out amongst the sea of Barbies. “She looks really—perky.”

“Don’t let her looks fool you. The girl could drink like a fish.” She set the picture back in its place and returned her attention to the questions. “Do you use any recreational drugs?”

“Define recreational?” When she looked up with her eyebrow lifted, I rethought my answer. “No, besides the occasional swig of cold medicine to help me sleep, I’m clean.”

“Do you have trouble sleeping?”

“For the first six months after Jeff died I did, but I’m getting better.” I still woke some nights thinking he was beside me, but it didn’t cause me the jolt of depression anymore. Usually, I just rolled over and fell back asleep. “No need for a prescription if that’s what you’re asking.”

“It was.” She ticked off another box. “Are you taking anything for depression?”

“Despite the opinion of others, no.”

“Tomorrow you’ll be given your psych exam, which includes a little chat with GRS’s psychiatrist. He’s good, but a little pill happy if you know what I mean.” She set down her pen and looked at me. “My suggestion is to take the prescription if he writes one, and toss it when you get home. It’s better to look cooperative than having to defend your mental competence.”

“GRS has a psychiatrist on staff?” I shifted in my chair. “That makes me a little nervous.”

“Let’s face it, this isn’t your ordinary nine-to-five. He’s a great therapist and you might find yourself needing to talk about something that happens on the job.”

I widened my eyes. “Can’t I just come and see you?”

She gave a little snort. “Psychiatry is not on my list of specialties, but I will admit, I give my best advice after a few beers.”

“Me too. I’m a veritable font of wisdom after a six pack.”

There had been several times over the last year when Vella and I had solved the world’s problems. With each bottle we became more brilliant. But, as with reality, by the morning my genius had been replace by self-loathing and a monster headache.

She scooted her chair forward and pulled a blood pressure cuff off a hook on the wall. “You’ll need to take off your jacket.”

Obviously there was no way I was getting out of revealing my sweatshirt. This was a good lesson for me. I’d dressed like a frump for so long, I’d become immune to it. Already this job was forcing me to give myself higher standards. I slipped off the jacket and pushed up my sleeve, resting my arm on the chair. Candace didn’t comment on my poor clothing choice, and I didn’t bring it to her attention.

After positioning the cuff, she pushed a button. The whir of the machine kicked in. The band tightened. I attempted a few calming breaths, trying to make my blood pressure as low as possible. The pressure reached that painful point when my hand felt three times its normal size.

A second later a tiny puff of air hissed, releasing pressure every few seconds. I mentally tried to slow my heart rate. Not having any real medical training besides what I learned from television, I didn’t know if that had anything to do with my blood pressure, but figured it was worth a try. A quiet ticking clicked from the machine. The painful throbbing ebbed to a tolerable level. After another few seconds, the cuff gave a loud sigh and deflated.

“One twenty over eighty.” She yanked on the strap, and with a loud rasp of Velcro, freed my arm. “Perfect.”

Relief, and I’ll admit, a little surprise washed through me. “Great.”

She hung the cuff back up and stood. “Now, your weight.”

I groaned. “Do we have too?”

“Sorry.” She indicated a fancy scale the size of my treadmill. “It’s required.”

“That thing looks big enough to weigh livestock.” She laughed as I plodded to the scale, my shoulders slumping. Before climbing on I kicked off my shoes. Like I said, any edge I could give myself. I doubted it would matter when it came to finding out just how fluffy I’d become.

I stepped on it and stared at the digital reading. The numbers scrolled quickly upward and landed on a nice round one hundred and fifty. “Holy crap.”

Candace wrote the weight on the file. “It’s natural to put on weight during a time of grieving, but you’re young and the weight shouldn’t be too difficult to take off.”

She sat back at the desk and I dropped into the plum chair. “I didn’t realize I gained thirty pounds.”

Instead of making me feel better, her consoling smile drove home just how much I’d played into the grieving widow. Though perhaps not consciously, I’d used putting my kids’ needs before mine a few times too often.

“I guarantee you’ll drop some weight once you start your training.” She closed the file. “Until then, try to eat better. I recommend cutting out sugar, which includes limiting your drinking.”

“This job just keeps getting better and better.” I let out a sigh.

“Well, we’re done except for—” She opened her drawer and pulled out a plastic cup with a blue lid. “Getting a sample.”

I wrinkled my nose. “There’s no way I’m pregnant.”

“Drug testing.”

“Oh—right.” I took the cup. “Bathroom?”

“Straight across the hall.”

I exited the office. The bathroom mirrored the other room, with elegant granite countertops and tiled floors. I really needed to give my house a makeover. The 1970’s harvest gold bathtub and black laminate counters hadn’t been changed since the day the previous owners installed them. I mentally added yet another project to my growing list.

After doing my business, I handed Dr. Jensen the cup. A low growl rumbled from my stomach. I hoped we were finished. I got cranky if I went too long between meals. And after facing the harsh reality of my weight, I was definitely feeling a little grouchy. “Anything else?”

“All finished.” She walked me to the outer office. “I’ll set up a time to examine and test your ankle. From there I can set up a rehab program. In the meantime, I suggest taping it.” She reached behind the desk and pulled out a promotional pamphlet. “You can get this at most sporting goods stores, and there’s a website that shows you how to properly tape up a weak ankle.”

“Roger that, doc.” I took the brochure and my stomach grumbled again.

At that moment Nate opened the door. I had to wonder if he’d been listening outside. “Finished?”

“Yep.” I turned back to Candace. “Thanks again.”

“You’re welcome. I’ll call you later this week for rehab,” she said.

“Everything okay?” Nate sounded a little too hopeful, reminding me again that he thought I wouldn’t make a good reaper.

“Just fine.” I brushed past him. “I’m starved.”

Not waiting for him, I headed down the hall, not exactly sure how to find my way out of GRS’s inner sanctum. I can be stubborn, and my determination to prove him wrong took hold. I’d show Nate Cramer that I had what it took to be a damn fine reaper—right after I refueled with a jumbo basket of parmesan-garlic fries.

Chapter 7

Nate offered to buy me lunch, and we ended up across the street at a restaurant I didn't particularly love. Despite Dr. Jensen's suggestion to eat better, I'm pretty picky about my food, and craved something cheesy and unhealthy. But Nate was adamant, even after I recommended a nearby diner that made the best burgers in town. Control freak.

I perused the menu. Greens, grains, and things I couldn't pronounce dominated the list. I ordered a Santa Fe chicken salad with extra ranch and a Diet Coke. At least I recognized the ingredients. Nate ordered the Asian chicken salad without the mandarin oranges. What's the point?

I toyed with my wrapped set of silverware "So, what's up with you and Willow? You guys have a nasty breakup or something?"

"There's nothing between me and Willow." He tapped his finger impatiently on the table.

Oh, there was definitely something between the two co-workers. "Huh." I slowly peeled the wrapper from the napkin. My innate curiosity wouldn't let the subject drop. "It sure looked like there was some history?" He didn't reply. I glanced up, but he was staring at a spot behind me. The joke was on him. I was immune to the silent treatment. I had a teenager. "Why do you hate her?"

His eyes drifted back to me. "I don't trust her."

"Because she's a beautiful, independent woman?" Nate didn't strike me as the type to be threatened by a successful woman. And I didn't know if his opinion about me not making a good reaper was personal, or a blanket judgment about women.

"The reason I don't trust her is none of your business." He glanced behind me again, narrowing his gaze. "But I suggest you keep your distance from her. She's bad news."

"Right." Sure sounded like sour grapes to me. When he didn't meet my eyes, I followed his gaze. "What are you looking at?"

"Nothing."

I craned my neck and noticed two men sitting at a table across the restaurant. They appeared normal—really normal. As a matter of fact, if Nate hadn't clued me in, I wouldn't have noticed them at all. "Do you know those two?"

"In a sense." His eyes shifted to me. "They're our competitors."

"Reapers have competitors?" Chancing another look, I assessed them. Both men appeared benign.

One caught my eye and lifted his drink in silent acknowledgment. I smiled and turned back to Nate. “What kind of competitors?”

“Angels.”

My mouth dropped open. “Are you serious?”

“Unfortunately, yes.”

I’ve had a major thing for angels all my life. As a child, they were grouped in the same category as mermaids and the little people I was certain lived in my walls. After Jeff’s death I took comfort in imagining them spiriting him away on heavenly wings. “That is so cool.”

Nate snorted, which I took as an insult to my intelligence. “They are not cool. They’re a pain in the a—”

“Hey.” I cut him off before a bolt of lightning struck us for blasphemy. “If you’re going to insult the heavenly hosts, do it when I’m not around.”

“Trust me, they give as good as they get.”

Trying to reconcile angels to the same level as us reapers went against all the beliefs I’d been raised with. Or at least the ones I’d glamorized. “I’m sure you’re wrong. Angels are all loving.”

“You newbies are so naïve.” He sat forward and lowered his voice. I leaned away from him, fairly certain he was about to burst my bubble. “Not all angels are jerks, but those two are. They’re guardian angels.”

I turned and looked at the men again. Both were staring at me and smiling. Did they have x-ray hearing or some kind of all-knowingness?

“God, would you stop doing that?”

I faced Nate again. “Sorry, but this is all new to me.” I took a deep breath and exhaled. “Go on.”

“Guardian angels interfere with our reaping. Their job is to save their charges.”

Relief washed through me. “Wow, that’s so amazing and awesome.”

“No.” His head shook vigorously. “Not amazing, Lisa. People are meant to die at certain times. These guys come in with their free pass from Heaven and muck it up.”

“Free pass?” In addition to all the paperwork and exams GRS made a new reaper go through, they obviously needed to incorporate an Afterlife 101 class. I made a mental note to bring that up to management.

“It’s all part of the Free Will Project, which is stupid, in my opinion.”

I glanced at the ceiling, waiting for that bolt of lightning. “Easy with the insults.”

“People are going to die. Sometimes I have to attempt a reap three or four times before I get the soul.”

“Wow, militant much?” I leaned forward, giving Nate my best mom face. “Souls aren’t a prize you collect to reach a quota. This is somebody’s life we’re talking about.”

“You’re going to lecture me on what a soul is?”

He had a point. I really didn’t know what I was talking about. I’d only officially been a reaper for a few hours. “Fine, then why are they here? Just having lunch? Are they human like us?”

“No, but they take human form when they need to.” He flicked his head toward a table to my right. “See the large man at the end?”

“Yeah.”

“He’s about to—”

Before Nate finished his sentence, chaos erupted at the table. The big guy clutched his throat, his face turning red. I jumped to my feet. “He’s choking.”

The other people at the table leapt up. Chairs scooted across the tile, a few banging when they hit the floor in the panicked rush to help their friend. The two guardian angels and I started toward the table, but Nate gripped my arm. “Wait.”

I yanked my arm free. “He needs the Heimlich.”

“It won’t matter.”

My feet froze, unable to take another step. “Will the angels help him?”

“They’ll try—but it won’t work.”

“Why not?”

“William has been slated for a long time.” Nate stepped around me but didn’t go any further. “Heart attack, diabetes, the man has been on borrowed time thanks to the guardians.” A look of satisfaction stretched across his mouth. “I’ll throw the boys a bone and let them give it their best try.”

“You sound pretty confident.”

“Yeah.” He shrugged. “I am.”

I blew out a long breath. “So that man is going to die? No matter what?”

Nate gave a single nod, continuing to smile.

It didn’t matter how many years I’d reaped, I’d never become as callus as him. Just knowing there was nothing I could do for William, made my stomach turn.

The big guy’s face darkened to purple. He collapsed to the floor, hands still at his throat. It was awful to watch. The wait staff and diners crowded around him, turning William on his side and pummeling his back, trying to dislodge whatever was stuck in his throat.

“Call 911,” Nate said before striding toward the crowd.

It took a few seconds for his order to sink in. “Right, 911.” I dug in my coat pocket and hauled out my phone. My hands shook and I kept tapping the wrong number. “Frickin’ hell!” Finally I got the number dialed, and in a quivering voice, gave dispatch all the info. He assured me the ambulance was on the way and that somebody had already called. I clicked off and backed up until my legs hit the chair. I dropped heavily into it. “Holy crap.”

Nate wound his way through the crowd and knelt beside the man. I saw the bottoms of his hiking boots peeking through the throng of legs. The breath froze in my chest when he stood and wove his way out of the mob with the fat guy’s spirit firmly in hand.

He stopped at the table. “I need to take care of this.”

“What’s going on?” William’s spirit looked from me to Nate. “Do I know you?”

No doubt the guy was confused—and rightly so. I knew what was going on and it was almost too much to take in. “I’m Lisa.” Realizing my introduction did nothing to clarify the situation, I added. “There’s been a little accident.”

A woman’s cry emanated from somewhere in the middle of the crowd, and the man turned toward the table he’d been sitting at. “What’s going on?”

I wasn’t sure how to answer him. “Well, William.” I glanced at Nate, widening my eyes with a silent jump in anytime. “Somebody in your lunch party choked to death.”

“Oh no.” He spun, trying to get a better look. “Was it Charlie? It had to be Charlie. The man shovels food in like a conveyor belt.”

“No.” I shook my head. “Charlie is fine.”

“It’s you, William.” Nate could really use a lesson in tactfulness. “You’re dead.”

William glanced from Nate to me, and then started laughing, the white aura round his translucent form growing. “How can I be dead when I’m standing here talking to you?”

“Yeah, that’s a tricky one.” My gaze leveled on Nate. He seemed impatient to get the job done. Maybe this was some kind of on-the-job training. I pinned him with my best glare before turning back to William. I let my ire morph into the same type of smile I used when comforting my kids. “Nate will be escorting you to your final destination.” The explanation made me sound like a paranormal travel agent. “There’s nothing to be afraid of. I can tell your journey is going to be very enjoyable.” By the bright white of his aura I assumed he’d be going to Heaven. Hopefully I wasn’t making a rookie mistake. My smile widened. “If you just go with Nate, he’ll get you on your way.”

William didn’t move. “I’d like to see for myself.”

I assumed William meant he wanted to see his body. Unsure if this followed procedure; I looked at Nate for confirmation. He nodded. Not letting go of the big man’s spirit, they edged toward the crowd. A lump grew inside of my throat and my nose tingled. I’m usually not a crier, but the forlorn look on William’s face pushed all my buttons. He seemed so lost. After a few seconds, his wide shoulders slumped. From what I noticed Nate did nothing to comfort him. No arm around his shoulder. No pat on the back.

Mental note to self: Be interactive with clients.

Another minute passed before they headed back to where I waited. I took a deep breath and smiled again, certain this time I looked more sad than encouraging. “Are you okay?” That was probably a really stupid question, but nothing more profound came to mind.

He shrugged. “Yeah, I think I am. I mean, it’s not every day a man witnesses his own death, right?”

Heck if I knew. Maybe they did. This whole afterlife thing was almost as new to me as it was William. But I knew he didn’t need my uncertainty. “Just think, you now have the answer to one of the great mysteries. There really is life after death.”

That made him smile. “I guess you’re right.” He turned to Nate, who still held onto William’s shoulder, but with only one hand. Rambo Reaper must have surmised William wasn't a flight risk. "I'm ready."

"Come with me." Nate took a step to the side, but didn't let go. "We'll need a little privacy for this."

In a busy restaurant there was really only one place that was private. "The bathroom again?" Nate ignored me and guided William forward. Feeling like I should say something, I quietly called, "Safe journey."

The big man gave me a little wave and then turned the corner, leaving me standing alone. How long would the reaping process take? The memory of my own experience in the Holiday bathroom was convoluted. To me it felt like hours. In reality it had probably only been a few minutes and that included Nate's pitch to become a reaper.

I sat on the wooden chair and waited. The faint wail of sirens grew, but this time the sound didn't make me nervous. Ever since my husband died, the screech would send a wave of anxiety through me. I always wondered if somebody was hurt or dead. Morbid I know, but I couldn't help it. At least this time I knew. In an odd way that knowledge gave me a little comfort.

The waitress stopped at the table and set a Diet Coke next to me. "Can you believe this?"

That was a loaded question. I shook my head. "No." I picked up my soda and took a long drink.

"Second one this year. Weird."

"Yeah." It wasn't the most intelligent response, but she really didn't seem to be talking with me as much as at me.

She continued to stare at the crowd. "Your salads will be out in a minute." Then she walked away, leaving me to my thoughts.

My appetite evaporated, which was a miracle in itself. I leaned back in the chair and crossed my arms. The notion that life went on even after one departed this Earth made me contemplative. William was dead but in a few minutes I'd be served the salad I'd ordered before he'd hitched a ride on the express train to Heaven. It made life's problems seem a little less urgent.

I glanced back at the table and noticed the two guardian angels. They both stared at me, no longer smiling, but not really angry. Unsure what to do I lifted my glass. "Better luck next time guys."

They tipped their heads toward me and turned to leave. I'm not sure what I expected. Maybe for them to wink out in a sparkle of white light. I took a sip of soda. This death gig was nothing like I'd imagined it would be.

Nate returned and slid into the chair across from me. He picked up his water and drank. I watched him. There was an edge to him even though he looked composed.

"You all right?" I had to ask. It was in my nature.

His gaze followed the EMTs wheeling a gurney toward William's body. "I'm always all right."

I highly doubted that. Nobody is always all right. At the best of times I'm sixty-five percent all right. "Okay, just asking."

The salads arrived and we each picked at the field of greens. It seemed wrong to eat while the crew worked on William—even though we knew he was in a better place. The fork stopped halfway to my mouth. “He went to Heaven, right?”

Nate nodded, pushing a small slice of orange that had snuck in on his salad to the side of his plate. More questions popped into my head. “What kind of souls do you reap?”

He slowly chewed, his gaze leveled on me. After he swallowed, he said, “Violent deaths.”

Yikes, no wonder he was so distant. Facing that much ugliness all the time would darken anybody’s day. “Did Jeff reap violent deaths?”

“No.” He took another large bite of salad, waiting to answer until he swallowed again. “His were more...random—deaths that didn’t fall so neatly into a category.”

I wasn’t sure I understood completely. “Do choking victims have their own reapers?” I slid a generous pile of salad into my mouth.

He glanced down at his plate. “That reap would have been yours, but since you haven’t been trained, I took it.”

A black bean lodged in my throat and I choked. Coughs seized me. I hacked and wheezed—very unladylike. Finally I was able to suck in a big gulp of air. “You knew William was going to die?”

“Yeah, I got word when you were having your medical exam.” He shoveled a chunk of chicken and lettuce into his mouth.

Water, I needed water. The reaper business had just gotten real. It was one thing to be guided through the process and quite another to know I’d be responsible for getting a soul to its appropriate destination. I grabbed Nate’s glass and took a big gulp. He continued to chew and stare at me. “So just what kind of deaths do I reap? Accidental deaths?”

Looking at his plate again, he jabbed at his salad. “Not exactly.”

When he didn’t expound on his explanation, I rapped my knuckles on the table. “What’s my assignment, Nate?” From the way he avoided my eyes I knew I wasn’t going to like it. At that moment my agreement to be a reaper for the sake of a paycheck seemed a tad impulsive. “I’m not responsible for plague or something gross, am I?”

“No.” He set down his fork. “You’ll be reaping people who died in a less than intelligent manner.”

I processed what he was saying. “You mean, I’ll be reaping stupid people?”

“The people aren’t stupid, just the way they die.”

Still not sure I completely understood—hoping that what I thought wasn’t what he meant—I pressed on. “You mean like frat boys who jump into a shallow pool or a drunk who lights his farts and burns to death?”

“Yeah, kind of like that.”

The urge to laugh rivaled with my inability to speak. It just frickin’ figured my assignment would be peppered with the idiotic. I sat back in my chair and stared at the dispersing crowd. The EMTs wheeled William out and things were calming. “Why William?”

Nate wrinkled his forehead. “Why William what?”

“Why would I have reaped William? He choked, that’s accidental, not really stupid.”

“Choking falls under you because it’s kind of a miscellaneous death. It’s not really violent and it’s not suicide.”

“Miscellaneous, that seems a little vague to me.” If what Nate said was true, I was going to be a busy reaper. “What other...” I made air quotes on either side of my head. “Miscellaneous deaths fall under my watch?”

He rattled off an impressive and oppressive list. “Slipping and falling. This includes public places, homes, and mountain tops.” Before I squeaked out a colorful curse about how the hell I was supposed to reap somebody lying on a ledge eight thousand feet up, he cut me off. “Most electrocutions, alcohol poisoning, sex acts gone wrong.” He paused. “If they were mutual and not a homicide. Otherwise those fall under me.”

My mouth hung open and for a few seconds I couldn’t form an intelligent response. “So, basically any asinine way somebody could die—I get.”

Cocking his head, he crossed his arms over his chest. “That’s not going to be a problem is it?”

I snapped my mouth shut. “Problem? Why would reaping the recipients of the Darwin Award be a problem?” My voice raised an octave. “Who wouldn’t love reaping the butt of life’s jokes?”

“Jeff never had a problem with it.”

I narrowed my gaze. “Let’s get one thing straight. I am not Jeff.”

A purely insulting laugh huffed from Nate. “Oh, I’m well aware of that.”

Damn, I’d walked right into that one. Ever since I’d fallen into this reaper gig, Nate had made it quite clear he didn’t think I was up to the task. Determination coursed through me. That happened sometimes—I’d get angry and dig in my heels. Usually I got far more than I bargained for.

That happened with Bronte’s fifth grade science project. What started out with good intentions, ended with a lot of tears and a thirty-pound, pudding-spewing volcano. Not only did I have to transport the monstrosity, I had to clean up its stunning eruption at the show, which covered the table, floor, and several surrounding science projects.

Before I repeated the mistake by making promises I might not be able to keep, I slid from the chair. “I’ve lost my appetite.” I scooped up my purse and slung it over my shoulder. “I assume you got the check?”

When he didn’t reply, I walked out of the restaurant. I’d like to say I felt some satisfaction about snubbing him, but the only thing I felt was humiliated. I reaped stupid people. Great. Like I didn’t get enough of them in my personal life.

Chapter 8

The kids tumbled through the front door an hour after I got home from lunch with Nate. Pasting on an everything's wonderful face, I met them at the entrance to the kitchen. "How was your day?"

Bronte slinked past me, earbuds in place. "Lame, like always."

Breck dropped his backpack at the door and made a beeline for the refrigerator. "Hi, Mom."

Bryce, always more composed, hung his coat on the hook, and then followed his brother to find refreshments. "It was good. A guy came to our class and dissected a cow eye."

"Yeah." Breck shoved a cheese stick in his mouth. "I poked my finger in the victorious layer."

"Vitreous layer," Bryce corrected.

"Whatever, it was so cool when it squished out."

I grabbed the back of Breck's collar. "Take off your jacket and stay a while."

He shrugged out of it, switching the cheese to his other hand and extracting his arm. "Come on, Bryce, Tiffany Powers and the Techno Werewolves is on."

"No TV." I pointed to their backpacks. "Homework."

A unanimous groan circled the kitchen. Bronte shoved Bryce out of her way and pulled a bottle of flavored water out of the fridge. "I'm all done."

I lifted an eyebrow. Over the last year I'd let the kids skate when it came to homework and extra chores. The teachers had done the same thing because of Jeff's death. I'd convinced myself it was for their own good, at least until they could adjust. But lunch with Nate had changed things. He didn't think I'd make a good reaper. Whether I would or not I'd be damn if I'd curl up in a ball and prove him right.

With a sense of empowerment, and no small dose of I'll show you, I made the decision it was time for the entire Carron family to get their crap together. "Good. Let me see it."

Bronte stared at me, slowly twisting the cap off the bottle. I knew this look. She was sizing me up. Probably trying to figure out if I was serious. Then she attempted a diversion tactic. "I left it at school."

"Huh." I gripped the edge of the refrigerator door and closed it. "Okay, then help me make dinner."

Her eyebrows pinched together and the corner of her lip lifted in a tiny sneer. “I don’t do cooking?”

“You live here too. We all need to pitch in.” I bent and opened the door to the dishwasher. “You can start by unloading the dishes.”

With an incensed huff, she trudged the three feet to the dishwasher. “This is a complete waste of my talent, Mother.”

“Mine too.” I held out a clean plate to her. “If you don’t want to help with dinner, clean your room or...show me your homework.”

She took the plate from me. “What’s with the whole mom gig? You haven’t made us do chores for the last year.”

“It’s time we get back into a routine.” I paused, not knowing how she’d feel about me going back to work. “And...good news... I got a job. I start full-time next week.”

“What kind of job?” She turned and stared at me, her tone suggesting I wasn’t qualified for much beyond scrubbing toilets.

I pulled another plate from the lower rack. “Actually, I got a job at GRS.”

“Like Dad?”

“Same company, different job.”

Her gaze narrowed. “Doing what?”

On the way home I’d thought about what I’d tell the kids. It had to be something believable but also gave me an excuse for travel or inconvenient hours. “Human resource assistant. I’ll be helping employees with employment issues.” I set the plate on the counter. “I might even get to do a little village travel.” To my trained ear I sounded like I was trying too hard to convince her, so eased back on the enthusiasm. “GRS has employees all over the state.”

“I find that utterly fascinating.” Clearly she didn’t.

“What you should find fascinating is the money. We might even be able to have a descent Christmas.”

Her eyes lit up. “Like—a new laptop—merry?”

I shrugged. “Maybe, if you pull your grades up, plus help around the house.”

She slid the second dish onto the shelf, continuing to stare at me. I waited. My daughter was sharp and calculating. Either she was devising a counter attack to keep her freedom or she was surmising the situation. Another few seconds passed. Then, to my surprise, she nodded. “Okay.”

She turned and walked toward the door. “Where are you going?”

“To do my homework.”

With that, she left. The sound of her backpack unzipping whispered through the kitchen doorway. I couldn’t help but smile. It was a small victory, but one I would happily take. Having Bronte working with me and not against me would make my life a heck of a lot easier.

The sound of a car door thumping closed was followed by clomping footsteps and then our front door opening. “Hello, hello.”

“I’m in the kitchen, Vella.” I continued to unload the dishwasher.

Such a good friend. She entered bearing a six pack and a bag of groceries. “You haven’t started dinner yet, have you?”

She knew me so well. “Not yet.”

“Bud is out of town this week and I got a little carried away with my grocery shopping.” She set the plastic bag on the table. “So I thought why not dine with my favorite people. We could fix the kids dinner, set them in front of the TV, and have us a few icy ones.” Her voice dropped to a whisper.

“And you can tell me about your day.”

When Vella had that look, I knew I was in for eighty questions. “The kids should love that.”

“I figure that will keep them occupied while we chat.” She dug in the bag and pulled out a roasted chicken, a tub of mashed potatoes, gravy, and a tin of biscuits. “Pop these in the oven.” She handed me the tube. “They only take eight minutes.”

“Do some shopping today?” I asked, peeling the wrapper from the biscuit container.

“I worked a little this morning, but when my two o’clock color canceled, I decided that retail therapy was a better use of my time.” She arranged the containers on the table. “I’d planned on buying a new pair of boots, but then remembered I didn’t have any food in the house.”

Vella not having any food in the house meant she was out of wine. “No splurging on footwear then?”

“Girl, Bud’s been riding my butt about staying on budget. He’s as tight as my Aunt Edith’s girdle when it comes to money.” She dragged out the chair and sat. “But I like my comforts and he knew that before he married me.”

“That’s right. Having a trophy wife comes at a price,” I said over my shoulder.

Bud was a decade older than Vella. I don’t think he knew just how high maintenance a southern trophy wife could be. But to be fair, Vella loved Bud and treated him like gold. “It’s nice that you’re trying to stay within budget. That should make him happy.”

“I know, right? Tight old miser.” She waved a manicured hand in the air. “I never let him grocery shop anymore. The last time he bought the cheapest toilet paper in the store. I swear he actually dug around in their storeroom to find the last existing package.”

“And that was a bad thing?”

“You have no idea. I couldn’t tell if it was toilet paper or sand paper. I’m delicate down there.”

A snicker slipped out. “Ouch.”

Vella jabbed a finger at me. “I kid you not. I could have rubbed myself with tree bark and gotten the same results.”

I grimaced at the thought.

“Anyway,” she continued, “today I bought me some of that really expensive toilet paper. The kind with three layers that looks like my grandma quilted it.” She gave a little sigh. “It’s like wiping my ass with a baby angel.”

The vivid image Vella wove made me burst out laughing

“Seriously!” Her eyes widened and her expression turned serious. “I’ll give you some and you be the judge.”

I smacked the tube of biscuits on the edge of the counter. Thick white dough oozed between the cardboard. Why was it I loved everything devoid of nutrition? After laying the fat circles on a cookie sheet, I popped them into the oven. “I’ve obviously lived a deprived life.”

“You joke, but it’s true.” Vella glanced over her shoulder and then back at me, lowering her voice. “So?”

“So what?”

She gave me her frowny face. “You know what. GRS.”

I held up a finger and walked to the kitchen door. No kids in sight. I hoped they were actually doing their homework, but figured I could follow up on that later. Baby steps. “We are definitely going to need alcohol for this.” I found a bottle opener and popped the caps off two beers. “Where do I begin?”

“First of all, did you go this morning?” Vella plucked two glasses from the cabinet. “Was he there?”

By he, I assumed she meant Nate. “Oh yes, he was there.” While pouring the first glass, I took a deep breath. “And so were about fifty GRS workers.” I tossed the bottle into the trash and handed her the glass. “The grim kind, if you know what I mean.”

Her mouth dropped open and her eyes rounded. “Get out of here.”

I nodded. “Yep, seems he was telling the truth and I am—” My voice dropped to a whisper. “A grim reaper.”

Vella picked up a glass and took a long drink. After which, she wiped her mouth with the sleeve of her shirt. Though it wasn’t uncommon for her white trash roots to come out, it was always funny to witness. She opened her mouth to say something, stopped, and then took another gulp. I waited. I knew how she felt. Finding out her best friend was an angel of death was a lot to take in.

She swallowed hard and set the glass on the counter. “Well, if that isn’t the shit.”

“If you mean messed up, then yeah, that’s the shit.” After snagging the full glass, I sat at the table. “But it’s a paying job and there are benefits.”

“That’s good—right?”

Obviously she was struggling for the right thing to say. Vella joined me at the table. On impulse, she reached across the table to pat my arm, but stopped. We both stared at her hovering hand.

“It’s all right,” I said, “you can touch me.”

Tension eased from her shoulders and she lowered her hand, tapping my arm once as if she thought it would explode.

I smirked. “Any bright lights you feel drawn to?”

“No.” She pulled back her hand. “But you can never be too careful. I don’t know what a reaper does and doesn’t do.” Vella ran her finger around the rim of the glass. “And you’re sure about this? He wasn’t just putting you on?”

“It would have been an elaborate jest.” I lowered my voice so the kids wouldn’t overhear, and recounted my day. Vella sat riveted in her chair. Even though the story sounded outlandish, something I would conjure after huffing airplane glue, I’d finally accepted it was true.

When I finished, Vella sat for a few seconds, staring at me. Then she smiled. The action was forced and a little tight, devoid of her genuine southern cheer. “You seem okay with all this.”

I shrugged. “What choice do I have? I need a job. The pay and benefits are better than anything I could get elsewhere.”

“I guess.”

“What’s wrong?” I knew my friend and usually there were five or six interactive conversations happening in her head at once. “You sound...wary.”

“It’s not that. I’m just so angry with Jeff. Why didn’t he ever tell you about this?”

I tried to smile but it felt more like a grimace. “They said we’re not supposed to reveal ourselves to anybody. Not even family members.”

“But you just told me.” A panicked note elevated Vella’s voice an octave.

“Yeah, but you already knew about the Holiday station and Nate.” My explanation wasn’t quelling her alarm. “Don’t worry. Nothing is going to happen to you. I’m sure of it.”

“If it does, I’m coming back to haunt you.” She took a big gulp of beer. “And I’ll be damned if I’m going to the light easily.”

“Thanks for the warning.” I hadn’t thought what it would be like to reap somebody I knew. Knowing my pool of friends and family, it would no doubt happen one day. “But I’m sure it’s going to be fine.” She glared at me. “Really, I promise.”

“I’m going to hold you to that.” Vella took a deep breath and exhaled. “How dangerous is this reaper job anyway?”

“I don’t know. The people are already dead. How dangerous can it be?” I paused. Something about Jeff’s death nagged at me. “But...”

“But what?”

“I can’t help but wonder if Jeff’s car accident wasn’t an accident.”

“Why do you say that?” Leaning in, Vella rested her elbows on the table. “Did somebody say something today?”

I tried to ignore the shiver of foreboding rippling through me. “Not in so many words but I kept getting the feeling there was more to it than a simple car crash.” I shrugged. “I’m probably imagining it. Trying to reconcile him being a reaper and not telling me is probably making me suspicious.”

“I know you guys had your problems, every couple does, but Jeff was a good guy.”

“Yeah, he was.” I nodded. “Maybe I’m feeling guilty about thinking he cheated on me.” The oven timer beeped, pulling me away from my remorseful thoughts.

After silencing the piercing buzzer, I slipped on an oven mitt and removed the golden brown biscuits and set them on the stove. “Once I get a little more familiar with GRS I think I might ask around. Surely somebody will be able to reassure me.”

Vella started loading up plates for the kids. “What about Nate?”

“He’s as closed mouth as a mafia hit man.” I plopped a biscuit onto each plate. “But there’s a woman named Willow in payroll. Maybe she knows something.”

“It’s worth a try.”

Despite Vella’s encouraging words, she didn’t seem optimistic. Maybe she was worried I’d learn something I didn’t want to know. What’s that saying? Don’t ask the question if you don’t want the answer. “Kids, time to eat.”

The thunder of at least four feet pounded through the house. Bryce and Breck slid into their chairs at the table as if stealing second base. I always waited to set their drinks down until they’d settled. Too much spilled milk over the years. Bronte wandered in still connected to Apple support. I pointed to my ears. Getting my message, she yanked on the cord and shoved the headphones into her pocket. I assumed her music continued to play but didn’t point that out to her. I take my wins where I can.

Yummy noises emanated from the table. It wasn’t the healthiest meal in the world but all three ate. Score. Vella and I dished up plates for ourselves, making sure to take all we wanted in the first helping. When the food was good, we usually didn’t get a chance for seconds. Like a swarm of locusts, the kids polished off everything but the chicken bones.

I looked at Vella and smiled. “That has to be a new record.”

She laughed. “Maybe I should have bought more.”

The boys scooted from their chairs and started out the door.

“Bus your dishes.” They stopped, appearing confused. It was the first time I’d asked them to do anything in the last year. Obviously, further instructions were needed. “Pick up your plate, scrape it in the garbage, and put it in the dishwasher.”

Simple and to the point. That’s what worked best with eight-year-old boys. Besides Bryce needing to do a double scrape to get the mashed potato residue off, the boys did a great job. Not having to be told, Bronte followed suit.

Kids fed in eight point three minutes.

After closing the dishwasher, she leaned in and gave me a kiss on the cheek, and then walked out. I glanced at Vella. She was as surprised as I was at my elusive daughter’s display of affection, and dare I hoped—approval.

“What was that all about?”

The faintest tingle burned behind my eyes. I inhaled, not wanting to have a gushy mom moment. “I told her I got a job and made her do her homework.”

Vella nodded. “Boundaries. Kids think they don’t want them, but they do.”

“Come on, let’s sit.” I brushed the biscuit crumbs to the center of the table before claiming Breck’s vacated chair. “Thanks for dinner.” I held up my glass. “And the beer.”

“You don’t have to thank me. I need girl time just as much as you do.” She sat in the spot Bronte had vacated. “So what’s going on tomorrow?”

I groaned. “Psychological testing.”

Vella cocked her head to the side. “What, to see if you’re nuts?”

“Ironic, isn’t it?”

“I’d say. Who wouldn’t be a little off kilter after everything you’ve been through?” Her eyebrows arched. “What kind of testing do they do?”

“An oral exam, I think.”

“Normally I’d look forward to something like that, but I don’t think it’s going to be as good as it sounds.”

It had been a long time since I’d had anything oral given to me. Unfortunately I had to agree with Vella. “Me either, but I’ll give you details if it is.”

“Girl, I want details even if it’s not.”

I shoved a forkful of mashed potatoes in my mouth and swallowed. “Not afraid of being smited for knowing too much?”

“Nah.” She downed the last of her beer. “Like Mark Twain said, ‘You go to Heaven for the climate, but you go to Hell for the company.’ I figure I’ll be so busy visiting my relatives and friends I won’t have time to wallow in eternal damnation.”

I laughed. “Good point.”

My day started out with a lot of unknowns, and ended with even more. But a few things were certain. My best friend wouldn’t abandon me, no matter how nuts things got, and I’d do just about anything to provide for my kids. Even if that meant reaping stupid people.

Jeff’s death still bothered me, but those questions could wait. It wasn’t like knowing exactly what happened to him would change my life more than it already had. I doubted there was some huge conspiracy or nefarious plot that landed him on the pointy end of the reapers scythe. Right?

Chapter 9

Twenty minutes. The tick-tock from the cuckoo-clock marked the passage of time. Time, by my calculations, that had morphed into an endless stretch of boredom. I shifted on the chaise lounge, trying to get comfortable. Though tempted, I refused to lie down. This was the psychologist's office, and everything in me fought being analyzed. Reclining felt too much like giving into the process.

I glanced at the irritating clock again. Twenty-one minutes. The doctor, or whoever was supposed to administer this test, was late. Either he or she was being completely rude or this was part of the test. My gaze scanned the office for obvious hidden cameras. I didn't see anything, thus the hidden part, so I waited and refrained from fidgeting.

After another minute the door opened and a man entered. "Mrs. Carron?"

I stood and smiled like I hadn't been contemplating smashing his cuckoo-clock against the floor. "Yes."

"James T. Crock. I'm so sorry I'm late." I bit the inside of my cheek, trying not to laugh at his name. He dumped a stack of files onto his desk and stuck out his hand. "Had an unscheduled meeting."

When I shook his hand his fingers were cold and clammy. The urge to wipe my palm against the fabric of my jeans was only overridden by my thoughts of conspiracy. Was my every move being scrutinized? "No problem. I was just sitting here admiring your clock."

A wide smile stretched across his mouth. "It's German. Got it when I visited the Black Forest." He glanced at the clock, and then at me again. "I find it very soothing. Don't you?"

Not so much. But I smiled and nodded, wanting to get on Dr. Crock's good side.

"Well then, shall we get started?" He pointed at two overstuffed chairs near the window. "The test is rather lengthy so we might as well get comfortable."

He gathered a leather portfolio and claimed one of the chairs. I sat in the other and crossed my legs, trying to appear at ease. Inside, my stomach flip-flopped like a spawning salmon. I attempted small talk. "James T. Crock, like James T. Kirk, huh?"

"No." He looked up from the stack of papers he'd been thumbing through. "I was named after James T. Cook, the great explorer."

"Ah." Okay, not a Star Trek fan. "Great man."

“If by great you mean an actual historical figure, who was instrumental in developing ways to measure longitudinal bearings, then yes, he was quite exceptional.”

“Uh yep, that’s exactly what I meant.” Obviously small talk was not his forte, so I decided to let Dr. Crock take the lead.

He leveled a stare at me and I found myself sitting a little straighter. “I will administer the test orally.” I suppressed the urge to giggle. It didn’t matter who said it, orally always sounded dirty. “Your reply will be either yes or no. There’s no need to expound on why you’ve answered one way or another. Just a simple yes or no.”

As far as I was concerned the sooner I finished, the sooner I could have lunch. I nodded again. “Fast and to the point, got it.”

He gave me a placating smile, but I don’t think he actually believed I could follow directions. I’d show him.

“Are you ready?” His pen hovered over the question sheet in his portfolio.

“Fire away.”

“Question one, I like mechanics magazines.”

“Excuse me?” I wasn’t sure I’d heard him correctly.

“I like mechanics magazines. Yes or no.”

“No.” It was the first answer that popped into my head, mainly because I’d never read a mechanics magazine. Still, I guess if I’d had any interest in that area I would have picked up one up from the store. I answered again, very firm in my conviction that I indeed did not like mechanic magazines. “No.”

He made a little checkmark on the sheet. “Question two. My sleep is fitful and disturbed.”

Well that was a given considering everything I’d been through the last year. But until Jeff’s accident I’d slept like a baby. “Do you mean before my husband’s death or after?”

No emotion played across Dr. Crock’s face. “My sleep is fitful and disturbed.”

Okay, no help from the help. I was tempted to say no but I’d already given myself away. Damn, I had to stay one step ahead of these questions or he’d think I was a nut case. “Yes.”

“I have a good appetite.”

“Yes.” The answer blurted from my mouth before I had a chance to think about it. “I mean it’s pretty obvious, isn’t it?”

“Yes or no, Mrs. Carron.”

“Yes, definitely yes.”

He added another tick to his paper. “I believe in the afterlife.”

I stared at him for a second. “Are you serious with that question? You realize I’m a grim reaper, right?”

“I don’t write the questions, Mrs. Carron. I only administer the test.”

“Yes, Dr. Crock, I believe in an afterlife. I’ve actually seen what waits on the other side and it didn't look all that great." He scribbled a note on the edge of the paper. That couldn't be good. I inhaled and mentally centered myself again. "Next question."

"I have never been sorry that I'm a girl."

For the love of God. "Seven days out of the month I'm sorry I'm a girl." I crossed my arms over my chest. "Those commercials of women riding bikes and roller skating—all lies."

"Is that a yes then?"

I held up my hand. "Not necessarily. Other than the cramping and the irrational bouts of rage, I like being a girl."

He arched a brow. "Yes or no."

He was trying to trick me. I knew it. "What was the question again?"

"I have never been sorry that I'm a girl."

After mentally repeating the sentence three times I smiled. "Yes."

Tick.

"I sometimes tease animals."

"No, well, my mom put a sweater on our bulldog once, and I made fun of him, but no, I don't tease animals. That's just mean."

He gave a heavy sigh and marked the paper. "I do not like everyone I know."

My mind raced through my list of people in my life. I didn't hate anybody, but I didn't necessarily like everybody. Take my neighbor, Clare Goucher. The woman was pushing sixty and insisted on doing yard work in her bikini. Or my mom. I loved her, but I didn't really like her most of the time. "Yes, I do not like everyone I know." Dr. Crock's mouth pinched into a tight line. "It's unrealistic to like everybody, isn't it?"

"I'm not here to judge, Mrs. Carron."

I bit back a sarcastic retort, not wanting another side note added to my file. Instead I focused on the damn clock. "Next."

"I am neither gaining weight nor losing weight."

"Another fat question, huh?" I drummed my fingers against my ribs. The tight waist of my jeans decided my answer. "No."

Tick.

Bastard. I was really starting to not like Dr. Crock.

"Once in a while I laugh at a dirty joke."

"Yes." I kept my eyes on the clock. The sooner this stupid test was over, the better.

"I sweat very easily on cool days."

What the hell? This test seemed to be skewed toward us fluffy gals, and I didn't like it. Most days in Alaska were cool, thankfully. "No."

"I believe I'm being followed."

That question gave me pause. Did ravens count? Because I was fairly certain that bird was stalking me. “Yes.”

Dr. Crock’s brows lifted in surprise. I could tell he wanted to ask whom I thought was following me, but when I narrowed my eyes at him, he cleared his throat. “Peculiar odors come to me at times.”

I blinked several times. “What?”

“Peculiar odors come to me at times.”

“Dr. Crock, I have two eight year old boys. They produce odors no human should be subjected to.”

“That would be a yes, I assume?”

“Yes.” I’m pretty sure that’s not what the question meant. I’d read accounts where people swore they smelled their dead grandmother’s perfume. Nothing like that had ever happened, so I stuck with what I knew. Besides, this test was pissing me off.

“The things that some of my family have done have frightened me.”

“Yes, yes, and yes.” There was a lifetime of therapy wrapped up in having a cop for a dad. Not to mention my brother, whom I believe was dropped on his head as a baby. Though my mom denies it.

“Definitely, yes.”

“I like or have liked fishing.”

I’m an Alaskan. Fishing is in our blood. “Yes.”

Dr. Crock pinned me with a stare. “I deserve severe punishment for my sins.”

Call me crazy, but the way he looked at me made me wonder if that question was even on the test. “We all sin, but I don’t feel I need to be severely punished for them.” He continued to stare at me, giving me the willies. “Do you?”

“Again, Mrs. Carron, not judging.”

Right. “How many more questions are there?” I glanced at the clock. We’d only been at it for ten minutes.

“Five hundred total.”

I groaned and let my head fall back on the chair. “Fine. Next.”

“I like to take a bath.”

“Yes.” I said to the ceiling.

“Horses that don’t pull should be beaten or kicked.”

I started to feel like one of those horses. “No.”

“I like mannish women.”

My head popped up. “What do you mean? As in friendship or like—like?”

“You must interpret the question yourself.”

“If I have to interpret the questions myself, what’s the point of this test? I might say I like mannish women because I’m a lesbian, and like to feel girly. Or maybe my best friend is mannish, and I like her despite the fact that she’s mannish. In each scenario the reasons are completely different.”

“You’re overthinking things. Just a simple yes or no.”

“Then yes, I like mannish women. I like feminine women. I like feminine men if they are a good person.”

He rolled his eyes as he made another checkmark on the paper. Was rolling eyes even allowed if you were a psychologist?

“I think Lincoln was greater than Washington.”

Propping my elbows on the arms of the chair, I stared at Dr. Crock. Did my answers really matter? I was beginning to think it was my reaction to this barrage of idiotic questions that GRS was really gauging. “Yes.”

“I have to urinate no more often than others?”

I kept my expression passive. “Yes.”

On and on the questions went. Did I like to play hopscotch? Was I opposed to every person on earth drinking alcohol? Was I afraid of fire?

Three hours later Dr. Crock looked up from his paper and smiled. “Only three more questions.”

My butt cheeks throbbed from sitting so long. The entire time, he allowed me only one five-minute break to stand and stretch. I straightened my legs and sat up straight, waiting.

“I prefer to wear black clothing.”

Easy. Any woman who struggled with her weight knew black was her best friend. “Yes.”

“I’ve contemplated suicide.”

I was taken aback. Never, not even in my most grief-stricken moment, had I thought about killing myself. I had the kids. They needed me. No didn’t seem strong enough. “Never.”

He made his mark and then smiled at me. “Last question.” I saw he was just as happy to be finished with this test as I was. “I have a normal level of interest in death.”

Even though he waited for a yes or no, a lot of other answers came to my mind. “I’m a grim reaper, so already my level of interest is higher than non-reapers. So who are we gauging this by? Overall humankind or just GRS workers?” He opened his mouth to give me what I was sure would be a bland retort, but I cut him off. “On the other hand, you would think being a grim reaper would amp up my interest, but honestly, if I never ever saw another dead person, I’d be perfectly content.” I stood and picked up my purse. “So you decide, Dr. Crock. Do I have a normal level of interest in death?”

I walked to the door, but stopped. When I looked back, the good doc was jotting more than a quick note in my chart. Deciding silence was golden, even though that realization had probably come too late, I walked out. The questions he’d asked had been weird, revealing, and on the rare occasion, thought provoking. I’d never contemplated whether dirt frightened me, or if my hands and feet were normally warm. Now that he’d asked, I found myself thinking about just how unenlightened I was about myself.

The reality was, I’d lost interest in the little things I once found fascinating. As a kid I spent hours watching the worms that surfaced after a rain. Now I didn’t even notice them. My head was filled with to-do lists and the needs of others. Somewhere along the line I ceased being Lisa and turned into somebody's mom and wife.

In general, I thought the personality profile I'd just suffered through was crap, but I couldn't deny some of the question sparked a desire to know myself again. Did I prefer mango over guava juice? Had I ever tried guava juice? Being a grim reaper may not have been my first choice of employment, but the fact I was one of the few on Earth, gave me a shot of self-respect I hadn't felt in a long time.

Maybe I'd pick up a mechanics magazine on the way home.

Chapter 10

The gymnasium spread out before me with an obstacle course that ranged from reasonable to bizarre. I assumed I was supposed to traverse this bad boy. The track I could handle. It was some of the other areas I wasn't quite sure about.

Nate stood beside me with a clipboard and a huge stopwatch. "You have ten minutes to make it through the entire course."

I nodded as if that wouldn't be a problem. "Gotcha."

"Let's walk the course first." He started down the track, not waiting for me. "You'll do one lap, then you'll veer to this area."

A pommel horse blocked our path, but luckily a springboard sat in front of it. I remember vaulting over one when I was in grade school. Of course I was seventy pounds lighter, but I think I could manage this. "I have to spring over?"

"Yes." Stepping around me, Nate moved to the next obstacle. "Here you need to climb the rope ladder."

Ladder? It was more like a spider web of knots and rope spreading across one wall. Still, not impossible. I pointed upward. "What's that?"

"Once at the top, you'll climb onto that ledge, crawl to the end, and slide down the rope."

Resting in a deep hole in the floor sat a small trampoline. The rope's end knot dangled several feet above it. Obviously, Nate expected me to drop onto the stretchy black surface. My aim would have to be good, or I'd end up sprawled on one of the mats surrounding the trampoline. At this point my biggest fear was breaking a leg or pulling muscles I hadn't used in years. "So drop onto that?"

"Drop, bounce a few times, and transfer to the next trampoline."

No problem—if I were an Olympic gymnast. The next trampoline was half the size of the other. I craned my neck to make sure there wasn't yet another, smaller apparatus I'd be expected to rebound onto. Relief washed through me when I saw a balance beam. "Got it." Boy I was being cooperative. Last night I'd decided not to whine if I could help it. "Next?"

"Climb onto the wide balance beam. Jump down." He strode ahead of me, patting each wooden beam as he passed them. "Onto the next bar." I noticed it was a bit narrower, only about three inches wide. "Down, and finally to the last balance beam."

Was he serious? The piece was no more than a half-inch across. “You expect me to walk on this?”

He stopped and at looked me. “Actually I don’t think you’ll make it over the vault.”

Walked right into that one. I smiled. “So encouraging.”

He shrugged. “You asked.”

Note to self: Nate thinks you’re a doofus. Don’t give him ammunition.

I crossed my arms over my chest. “Fine, what’s next?”

“Another lap around the track. The time will stop when you cross the finish line.”

“Perfect.” I screwed my determination into place. I might not vault over the horse like a gazelle, or gracefully scramble up the rope, but I sure as heck was going to finish this course in less than ten minutes. I yanked on the bottom of my sweatshirt. “Let’s do this.”

“Toes to the line.” Nate pointed to the yellow stripe running the width of the track.

I placed one foot against the starting line and then hunkered down into a runner’s stance, bouncing a couple of times like I’d seen the athletes do.

He cleared his throat. “What are you doing?”

“Getting ready to run? What does it look like?”

“You don’t want me to answer that.”

I twisted my head around to glare at him. “You got that right.” Setting up again, I leveled my gaze on the track in front of me. “I’m ready.”

“All righty, then.”

I heard the laughter in his voice. Eat my dust, Nate Cramer.

“On your mark.”

My body tensed.

“Get set.”

I lifted my butt in the air and ignored how much it hurt my fingertips to hold my weight forward. I—would—not—fail.

“Go.”

Though my intention had been to blaze down the track, leaving a fiery trail behind me, that idea quickly fizzled. Good God, when was the last time I’d actually run? I couldn’t remember. A better tactic was to set a quick jog. Weird things happened as I made my way around the track. Over the years my body had morphed into something I didn’t know. Areas of me jiggled that hadn’t ever before. After the second bend in the track my muscles burned. Air fought its way into my lungs. The whole experience was pathetic.

With each step more of the bravado I’d felt at the starting line evaporated. I veered off the track and jogged toward the horse. The thing seemed taller. Not sure I’d make it over, I gave an extra bounce on the springboard. I realized my mistake too late. Pitching forward, I smashed into the horse. Luckily I gained enough height to roll over the top in a tangle of arms and legs. As I dropped onto the opposite side, my hand snagged under one of the handgrips.

“Sweet mother!” I stumbled to my feet, twisting my ankle, and yanked my hand free. A steady throb took root at the base of my palm. Rubbing the spot did nothing to physically soothe the injury, but it kept my cursing contained.

“You okay?” Nate walked toward me, but I stopped him.

“Fine.” I limped toward the rope ladder. Pain continued to ripple through my wrist and ankle, but I tried my best to ignore it.

You can do this. You can do this.

Surprisingly, the ladder didn’t pose much of a problem. My legs felt like they were on fire, taking a lot of my weight as I climbed, but at least I didn’t flop around like a salmon in a net. With relative ease I scaled the web. The next phase was a different story.

Once at the top, I flailed for the wooden platform. Even by twisting my body, I just brushed the scaffolding with my fingertips. The only answer was to climb as high as possible and get above it. Medical bills started piling up in my mind. Broken wrist, sprained ankles, maybe even a broken back if I fell.

I glanced down. Nate stared at me, a hint of a smirk playing at his mouth. That was the motivation I needed.

I gripped the top rope and climbed until my feet were level with the plank. Extending my leg, I eased my left foot onto the ledge. From below I’m sure my position looked ridiculous, but at this point I didn’t care. I’d finish this damn course or die trying. Okay, that was a little drastic, but the realization of how out of shape I was pissed me off. Just another thing that had fallen apart after Jeff’s death.

Overhead, I grabbed the handle protruding from the scaffolding and pulled myself onto the ledge. The ground twenty feet below wavered, and I clung to the handle for dear life. I closed my eyes and waited for the world to stop spinning.

Note to self: Avoid heights if possible.

The ledge hadn’t looked so narrow from below. Reluctantly I released my death grip and crouched. A belly crawl seemed like the best idea. Safe, low to the board, and less chance of falling. Inch by inch I made my way to the end of the ledge. The rope dangled in front and I latched onto it like a shark on a tuna. White knuckled, I stood.

Again, it had been my intention to ease onto the rope and lower myself to the trampoline. The second my full weight cleared the platform, my grip slipped. Fire race along the palms of my hands as I plummeted toward the trampoline. For somebody watching, I’m sure I looked like I knew what I was doing. My resonating scream however, quickly extinguished that notion.

My feet hit the knot at the end of the rope, cramming my knees into their sockets. Certain my hands were a bloody mess, I released my grip and dropped on all fours onto the trampoline. I bounced several times, biting my tongue. God, I hated this job. What was I thinking when I said I’d be a reaper?

After the momentum slowed, I struggled to my feet. Every part of my body hurt. If it hadn't been for Nate watching me, I would have lay there curled in a ball, whimpering. Testing my balance, I gave a couple of shallow bounces.

The smaller surface I was supposed to leap onto seemed a lot farther away than when we walked the course. Who designed this damn thing? Satan himself? I closed my eyes and took a deep breath. I was almost finished. I could do this. My lids slid open and my gaze focused on the projected landing spot.

With cat-eyed concentration, I bounced and launched. It felt like I lifted ten feet off the ground. The truth was probably more like I just cleared the trampoline. But I made it. Like a real gymnast, I stuck my landing.

Nate's brows lifted with surprise. Suck it, reaper.

Now pretty full of myself, I leapt off the trampoline, landing with a solid thud on the mat, and jogged to the balance beams. No problem. Hefting myself up, I skittered along the widest beam. I moved a little slower on the next one, but didn't fall. Though lower to the ground, the last and narrowest beam required my undivided attention and best balancing skills. My ankles shook from the effort it took to remain upright. What happened if I fell? God forbid I'd have to start again.

At the end of the beam I gave myself a mental high-five and jumped down. It would have been impressive if I'd sprinted the final lap of the track. Would have been, but I didn't. As a matter-of-fact, I'm not sure I could have called it a jog at all. My quick walk was interspersed with a few sluggish running steps, but then I'd have to slow again. My lungs burned and blood pounded in my head. Sweat poured off me as if I'd been doing an hour of heavy cardio. It was embarrassing and even more humiliating.

With the finish line a mere ten feet away, I found the last of my energy and sprinted past Nate. I heard the click of his stopwatch.

"Not bad," he said.

I bent, bracing my hands on my knees and sucked in air. I'd never been super athletic, but I was wheezing like a two-pack-a-day chain smoker. "What's—" Cough. Pant. I could barely form words. "My time?"

"Seven minutes, ten seconds." Nate stopped in front of me. "You okay?"

I nodded, still unable to speak coherently. After another minute, I straightened. "Yeah, I'm great." Sweat dripped into my eyes and I wiped it away with the bottom of my sweatshirt. "So I passed?"

"Yep." He walked away. "The first round, anyway."

"What?" Surely I hadn't heard him correctly. I inhaled and blew out a long breath. "The first round?"

He stopped near a trunk and opened it. "That was just the first run. If you hadn't finished we wouldn't bother with the second heat."

The urge to wrap my fingers around his neck and squeeze intensified. I knew this testing wasn't his fault but he seemed to be enjoying it way too much. “But I already did it with over two minutes to spare.”

Nate reached into the trunk and pulled out a bright orange, mesh jumpsuit. He gave it a couple of shakes, and then held it up for me to see.

“What the hell is that?”

“You’ll wear this on your next run. It’s meant to simulate transporting a soul.” He indicated the sleeve for me to see. “There’s Velcro at the cuffs and chest.”

I stared at him, still not understanding. “How does Velcro simulate reaping?”

“Because...” Nate dropped the jumpsuit on the ground and dug in the trunk again. This time he extracted what looked like a life-sized pillow doll. “This will be attached to you.”

If I understood him correctly he expected me to run the course I’d barely gotten through, with a gigantic pillow stuck to me. “That is the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard.”

“Maybe, but it will give you a sense of what you’ll be dealing with if you encounter a resistant spirit or difficult terrain.”

Maybe I could get a job as a barista. I liked coffee and Danishes. What was a few scalding milk burns compared to this? Thinking about running the course again made my stomach lurch and my head pound harder. Doing it while lugging the pillow around made me want to cry defeat. Nate’s expression made clear that’s exactly what he expected. Though exhausted and slightly beaten down, I was not willing to except more humiliation. “Will I be timed again?”

The grin he’d barely concealed stretched across his mouth. “No. Take all the time you need.”

What I needed was a long nap and a miracle. “I’ve got to pee.”

He replied by pointing toward the locker room. Doing my best to stand tall and not limp, I brushed past him and headed across the gym. Pushing open the heavy locker room door hurt. Walking hurt. Thinking hurt. How I’d ever get through the course dragging a body pillow was beyond me.

I stopped at my locker and yanked it open. A full icy bottle of water sat in a puddle of condensation. Before taking a long drink, I rubbed the cool container against my forehead. The heartbeat pounding in my head eased a little but my lungs still burned. A piercing stitch set up residence in my right side. After opening the spout of my bottle, I squeezed the cold liquid into my mouth. What I wanted was to gulp down every drop but I knew I’d pay for it with a side-stitch once I started the course again.

After snapping the lid shut, I set the bottle on the top shelf and reached for the towel hanging on one of the hooks inside. A tiny jangle clanked at the bottom of the locker. My raven charm. I picked it up and held it in my palm. The metal warmed against my skin. After shoving it in my pocket the day the bird dropped it at my feet, I’d pretty much forgotten about it.

The edge of the tiny scythed glimmered blue. Maybe there was something to this bond I had with Fletcher. That’s what I’d named him, getting tired of calling him the weirdo bird. At this point I could use all the help I could get, magical or otherwise. I unhooked my snowflake necklace and slid the raven charm onto the gold chain. It could have been my imagination but I swear tiny sparks flickered around the pendants when they touched. The metal was cool against my chest when I rehooked the chain and what felt like spider web threads of electricity rippled across my skin.

I rolled my shoulders and cocked my head side to side, suddenly feeling reenergized. If the charm did have magic, maybe it could give me an edge on the stupid obstacle course. Not taking any chances that Nate might call cheating if he saw the charm, I slipped it into the neck of my sweatshirt. Maybe there was hope yet. I slammed the locker closed, squared my shoulders, and strode back into the gym.

He glanced up from his cell phone, his eyes narrowing slightly. "You okay?"

"Great. Why?" Acting natural or the ability to lie weren't skills I'd been gifted with. Most of the time I over compensated. Usually my eyes were too round and innocent, or my voice raised an octave. "Don't I look okay?"

I'd totally set myself up for one of his insults, but it was a small sacrifice if he didn't figure out I wore the charm. For some reason Nate didn't take the bait. Instead he nodded. "You look good."

Maybe I was making an ego mountain out of a slip-of-the-tongue molehill, but I was fairly certain he'd just complimented me. Our gazes locked and a zing of sexual tension crackled between us. At least I think it was sexual tension. It had been a long time since I'd experienced it.

Even if he wasn't feeling the connection, it was nice to hear something flattering come out of his mouth for a change. And the little jitter that rocketed through me let me know I wasn't completely dead inside. Wow, I really needed to change the batteries in my vibrator if I was thinking about Nate in that way.

Dragging his gaze from me, he turned and busied himself with the jumpsuit. It suddenly felt very warm in the gym. The urge to fan myself was barely overridden by the intense desire to act as if his compliment hadn't stroked my comatose vanity.

"Put this on." He turned and shoved the jumpsuit at me. Guess cuddling was out.

My I'm rockin' this reaper bubble burst. I repressed a groan and lifted the orange abomination from his grasp. "I'm going to look like the Great Pumpkin in this."

He snorted. "Yeah."

"You're loving this." I glared at him. "Aren't you?"

"Oh yeah." His head bobbed up and down. "But we've all had to wear it. So don't think I'm torturing you needlessly."

I harrumphed and sat on the gymnasium floor. Getting my tennis-shoed foot through the leg hole proved to be more difficult than the obstacle course. "What the heck." The orange mesh caught on the treads of my shoe, not allowing me to shove my foot through or remove it. "I can't...it's wrapped around my toe." I jammed my foot downward into the wall of mesh. That only succeeded in reinjuring my already sore ankle. After a few seconds, I gave a battle cry of fury and kicked my leg, trying to dislodge the jumpsuit. "Stupid firkin' farkin' piece of crap."

Though the f-bomb rarely passed my lips, I'm not averse to connecting as many like-sounding F-words as I can when I get frustrated. Nate's brows lifted as I continued muttering a string of F alternatives.

He let me struggled for another minute before he knelt and grabbed my foot, which I beat against the floor. "Stop." He had my ankle in a vise grip, so I didn't have any choice but to do as he said. "Next time take your shoe off first."

"Next time?" I pointed and shook a finger at him. "There's not going to be a next time."

"Then..." He tugged the jumpsuit from my foot. "I suggest you don't fail."

That was the best incentive he could have given me. No way did I want to endure another round of making a fool of myself—at least not here. My klutzy nature ensured I'd screw up at some point, but I wouldn't invite humiliation if I could help it. "Oh, I won't fail."

I yanked off my shoes and snatched the jumpsuit from Nate. Not only would I not fail, I'd kick this course's ass and call it girl names when I was finished. I stood and wiggled into the mesh. Though the jumpsuit was snug in places, it wasn't uncomfortable. Probably better tight than loose. That way I wouldn't get hung up anywhere. At least that was my hope.

After putting on my shoes, I stood. "Now what?"

Nate handed me the pillow person. It was heavier than I thought it would be, but nothing I couldn't carry.

"You must keep control of the soul at all times." He gripped my forearm and pointed to my wrist. "There's Velcro here." His fingers moved to press between my boobs. "And here."

A flurry of butterflies erupted in my stomach again, but he seemed oblivious to my reaction, or the fact that as co-workers he touched me inappropriately. I simply nodded, keeping my gaze pinned to his. "Gotcha."

When he lowered his hand, I cradled the pillow person, hugging it to me. Chest to chest, the Velcro connected. I let go and the pillow stuck. I did a few jumping jacks, but it didn't fall off. This would be easy. I didn't even have to hold onto it, leaving my hands free to climb and grip. A thought popped into my head. "Why the chest?"

"What do you mean?"

The rip of Velcro being peeled apart sounded as I pulled the pillow away from me. "I get sticking it to the wrists. It requires me to hold on, just like I did with Leroy Badder. But why at the chest?"

"If you embrace a soul and hold it against you, it will remain stuck. Like a heart-to-heart connection."

I scrunched my face, remembering how Leroy Badder's soul had cut through me like an icy blade, and I'd only touched him with my hands. "Ick."

"Not all souls are as nasty as Badder," Nate said, seeming to read my thoughts. "Most of your charges won't possess the dark aura or violent feel."

A shiver skittered up my spine. "Still." I shifted the pillow and connected it to the Velcro at my wrist. "I will never willingly do that."

He shrugged and checked his watch. “Your choice. We need to get started.”

A sigh heaved from me and I murmured some incoherent objection that sounded a lot like Yosemite Sam.

I took my place at the yellow line on the track. To make sure I didn’t drop the pillow during my run I gripped its mitten-shaped hand. And that was exactly the way I’d planned handling all my souls. The less contact the better.

“Whenever you’re ready. Take all the time you need.”

Since I wasn’t being timed, I started out with a slow jog. This was going to be easy. Without the pressure of beating the clock I could finish this course in my own sweet time. As I rounded the first bend a loud scraping echoed through the gym. I glanced back up the track at Nate. He was moving what looked like a metal doorframe across the end of my lane, but I couldn’t see exactly what it was. My good mood dipped. I knew simply running the course again would have been too easy.

I continued to watch him move from obstacle to obstacle. More scraping along the floor ricocheted around the gym as he pushed the springboard away from the pommel horse.

“Son-of-a...” I bit down the curse, realizing I’d have to climb over the apparatus instead of ungracefully springing over it.

At each obstacle he added a new hindrance. I swallowed down my complaint and focused on the track ahead of me. Already I was out of breath and beginning to perspire. The pillow swished along the floor beside me. With each step it seemed to grow a little heavier. I really needed to dust off my treadmill and start working out.

My jog slowed and I stopped in front of the metal barricade. It was a turnstile on wheels, like something I’d see at airport security. Except this barrier was only about five feet high. The logical thing would be to connect the pillow to my chest, duck, and push past the metal bar, but I couldn’t bring myself to do it. It was the principle of the matter. I understood the pillow was just a metaphorical soul, and wouldn’t give me the sickening sensation Badder had—at least that’s what I assumed. But I’d been naïve, taking Nate at his word. I thought I just had to run the course. Now here he was throwing up more obstacles. Any trust I’d had vanished, that included believing the pillow was just a pillow.

I eyed the barricade. Fine, I’d drag my burden through after me. Dipping my head, I walked forward and pushed against the bar blocking my way. At first it didn’t give, so I leaned against it with all my weight. The bar rotated so fast I fell forward, but not before another bar snapped up and nailed me in the back. I gasped for air and stumbled. The pillow caught on the other side, nearly yanking my arm out of the socket.

“You and the soul must get through the turnstile.”

“No shit, Sherlock,” I mumbled under my breath. I tugged on the pillow, but one of the hands had lodged at the juncture of the rotating wheel. “Come on.” I jerked on the material, but when ripping sounded, I froze. What would that mean if this were an actual soul? Would only part of the spirit get transported, leaving little bits of the soul stuck in different places like the subway or an electric can opener? “Shit.”

I bent and peered into the cog of the turnstile. The fabric had hooked on a spring. I jiggled the bar, trying to maneuver it so I could slide the fabric free. Nothing budged. I poked my finger inside and pushed on the bar again. Pain shot through the tip of my finger. I gasped and yanked my hand free. A good size blood blister rose from the pad and instinctively shoved my finger into my mouth and sucked. I’m not sure why. It didn’t ease the pain and actually caused the throbbing to intensify. I pulled my finger free and shook it wildly. Again, a stupid move, but I was pissed. I jerked the pillow as hard as I could.

More ripping, and the fabric sprang free—minus one thumb. “Sorry.” I grimaced and poked the stuffing back into the hole where the thumb used to be. “Maybe you don’t need fingers in Heaven.”

I glanced up. Nate stared at me from across the gym but didn’t say anything. I tucked the pillow under my arm and jogged toward the pommel horse. Half way across the floor, I stopped. “What the hell?”

“It’s barbed wire.” Nate walked toward me. “Get down and crawl through.”

What was this, a war zone? “You’re joking?”

“No. It’s meant to simulate difficult terrain.”

I propped one hand on my hip and let the other hang at my side, still gripping the pillow soul. “This is Alaska, not Afghanistan.”

“You never know where you’ll be assigned.” He scribbled a quick note on the clipboard. “But we can stop and run the course again tomorrow if you want.”

I straightened. “No way. I’m doing this now.”

Despite my opinion about the ridiculously stupid course, I was big enough to admit that many times in my life I hadn’t seen the big picture. And since I knew little to nothing about actual fieldwork as a reaper, I was willing to give Nate the benefit of the doubt.

Logic dictated I Velcro the pillow to my chest. Unfortunately my stubbornness usually kicked logic’s ass when push came to shove. Hunkering down like I’d seen in war movies, I shimmied my body forward, dragging the pillow beside me.

The opening narrowed. What the heck? Did GRS have something against rubenesque women? Ropes of pointy wire crisscrossed above me, leaving only a few feet for me to maneuver. About a yard in the pillow snagged on a barb. Feeling the doll had given enough when it sacrificed its thumb, I wiggled backward and detached it. Again I moved forward and again it snagged. He cleared his throat with the kind of sound that covered a laugh. Bastard.

There was no way I was getting through this without shredding the pillow. Drastic measures were in order. Coming to the decision I’d rather suffer the sticky feel of a soul than Nate’s condescending attitude, I shoved the pillow under me. The Velcro pads fused.

Though a little awkward, the pillow made moving a whole lot easier. Instead of shimmying, I was able to push my body forward, and slide along the polished floor. Even though the muscles in my arms quivered like a frightened Chihuahua, I felt pretty smug by the time I reached the end of the barbed wire enclosure.

I struggled to my feet, ungracefully clawed my way over the vault, and then shuffled to the wall of ropes. The doll bounced against me, its head bopping mine every time I took a step. I pushed it to the side but the pillow rebounded back and blocked my view. I grabbed the soft head and shoved it against my neck, clamping down with my chin. That did the trick.

The rope wall spread out and up. My arm shook when I raised it to grasp the rope above my head. Stepping onto the lowest rung, I began my climb, making sure to keep all the weight on my legs. The trek was slow but I progressed nonetheless. Like I said, I would not fail. I sent up a silent “Thanks” when I reached the top. Nothing out of the norm had happened. Nobody dumped oil on me from above, or let loose a swarm of spider monkeys to attack me.

I turned my head to see where the ledge was located. The head of the pillow sprang free from my grip. “Crap.” I stretched my neck, trying to contain it again, but couldn’t reach. “Stupid—thing.”

In such a precarious position I couldn’t flatten myself against the wall to get ahold of the pillow’s head. Each attempt caused my arms to shake. The possibility of tumbling to the ground became a very real threat.

Abandoning my efforts, I looked over my shoulder and extended my leg along the ledge. Nate hadn’t climbed the rope ladder when sabotaging the course, so I hoped there were no hidden surprises for me on the narrow ledge. I shifted my weight and using the handle on the scaffolding again, eased onto the platform. Unlike the first run I couldn’t hunker down. There was a big frickin’ pillow in my way. But neither could I see around it. Again I crammed the stuffed head under my chin.

Inch by inch, I scooted along the wood, feeling my way with the toe of my shoe. Luckily there were no pitfalls. The rope hung in front of me, taunting me to grab it. Learning my lesson during my last run, I snaked it with my hand and wrapped the rope around my foot. I’d seen it done on TV, so I knew it had to work. Relief washed through me when I didn’t zip to the bottom of the line.

Though awkward with the pillow attached to my chest. I slid down without injuring myself, and hopped onto the trampoline.

At this point the pillow became a growing hindrance. Sure it might break the fall if I missed the next trampoline, but it was tough keeping my balance. I yanked the pillow off my chest and attached it to my wrist again. Bounce-bounce, and I landed on the smaller trampoline.

The end was in sight. Only three balance beams and a trip around the track. I jumped down and mounted the first beam. The deep roar of a motor revved and suddenly a blast of air hit me from the right side, almost pushing me off. My body tilted to the left and my foot lifted.

“Ahhh!” I did one of those tottering will she or won’t she fall stances. The wind cut off my breath. Coherent words were impossible. The arm opposite my lifted foot shot out in an effort to not fall. It was only a about a yard drop, but to me it might as well have been a cliff. I hovered, my body splayed like a five-pointed star. The pillow lifted and I knew I was going over. Reaching deep, I dipped into the ninja skills lurking inside me, and lowered my foot to the balance beam. Thank God for ample hips. I shoved it into the wind, which brought me fully onto my narrow perch. Now balanced, I yanked the pillow to me and slammed it against my chest. Looking to my right I saw Nate standing next to a fan. The thing was ginormous. Why hadn't I noticed it before? Probably because I hadn't suspected treachery.

Refocusing on my course, I tucked the pillow head under my chin once again and scooted along the beam. At the end, I jumped down and mounted the next. The wind continued to batter me but I was too determined. At this point it could have been a fiery tornado and I wouldn't have fallen.

When I made it to the end of the last balance beam the wind stopped and the roar of the fan died. I didn't look at Nate. I was too close to conquering this mutha of an obstacle course. Jogging forward, I tensed, ready for anything he threw at me. But nothing happened. And when I crossed the finish line, Nate stood waiting with a genuine look of surprise, and might I say admiration on his face.

I stopped in front of him and dropped the pillow, glaring at him. "Can't handle being a reaper, eh? Well suck it, Cramer. Looks like you've got a new partner."

With that I strode across the gym to the locker room. Yeah, there was a new angel of death in town.

Chapter 11

By six o'clock that night all my righteous indignation had evaporated into a mass of bruises, rope burns, and pulled muscles. A long, cylindrical black and blue patch stretched across my lower back where the turnstile had smacked me. And trying to remove my sports bra had turned into a painful wrestling match that left me lying on the bed, whimpering and defeated.

"Vella!" For once I was grateful for her casual attitude on dropping by at all hours of the day. "I need help." At that point I had no pride. All I wanted was a hot shower and if that meant exposing myself to my best friend, well, so be it. "Vella!"

The door to my bedroom sprung open. "What's wrong?"

I wiggled the arm I'd gotten free from the spandex torture. "Help."

"Oh my giddy aunt." She closed the door and walked to the bed. "What happened?"

"I can't get out of my bra."

"I can see that. I mean where did you get all those bruises? You look worse than I did after the greased pig catching contest at the fair."

"I had to run the obstacle course today. Special stress on obstacle." I rolled to my back, one arm still pinned to the side of my head. "Everything hurts."

"Can you sit up?"

I rocked forward a couple of times, but the muscles in my stomach lit off a loud protest. "No."

"How about rolling to your side?"

"Nooooo."

Vella propped a hand on her hip. "Can you lift both arms over your head?"

"Think of me as a vegetable. I am incapable of movement and thought at this point."

"All right." Vella held out her arms with her palms facing me. This meant she had an idea. Whether it would cause me excruciating pain was still to be seen. "I'm going to help you sit up. Then I'm going to work that sports contraption off you."

"K."

"I apologize right now if I happen to touch your boobs. Copping a feel is not my intention."

My boobs had seen a lot of action lately. Too bad none of it was of an amorous nature. "Noted."

After climbing onto the bed, she shoved her hands under my shoulders and hefted me into a sitting position. My groan morphed into a long moan. Each stomach muscle tightened and protested. Who knew I had so many muscles. From the pain radiating through me I swore I'd been born with twice the amount.

"I'm too young to be in this much agony." Another whimper squeezed from me. I'm not a very good patient. Kind of whiny.

"You need a long hot shower and an adult beverage to relax your muscles." Vella forced my arm down and through the chest band of the sports bra, popping me free from the spandex jail. With a quick swoosh, she yanked the garment off of me. Even my bra flab hurt. "Now lay back."

I tried to ease myself back but my quivering muscles were having none of it. I hit the bed like a falling boulder and bounced a few times. Vella climbed off the mattress and lifted my leg, extracting the running shoe. I lay there, bare breasted, unable to manage a modest arm across my chest.

"Lift your butt so I can get your pants off."

Right. Like that was going to happen. When I didn't move, she shook her head and yanked my yoga pants, dragging my undies with them. Okay, I wasn't hurting that much. I curled my fingers around their elastic waistband and held on. It had been a long time since anybody had seen me naked and if it was going to happen again, I didn't want it to be with my best friend.

A final tug and I was free from all my stretchy workout clothes. With great effort, I rolled to my side and pushed myself up. "You're a good friend."

"I know." Vella tossed the pile of clothes into my laundry basket, and then looked at me. She cocked her head. "For having three kids you've got some nice tits."

"As much as I appreciate the compliment, I don't want to talk about my boobs with you."

"I'm just saying, a lot of women don't keep their perk. You're lucky."

Ignoring her, I pointed to my open closet. "Robe, please."

She lifted my fluffy white robe from the hook and draped it over her arm. Then she held out her hands. "Up you go."

I locked fingers with her and allowed her to pull me to my feet. More pain radiated through me. What was the saying? The second day was always the worst. I couldn't imagine my body hurting more unless somebody set me on fire. "Thank you."

"Go take a hot shower and I'll fix something to eat." She slid the wrap up my arms and settled it on my shoulders. "You should relax the rest of the night."

Pulling the lapel closed, I nodded. "Okay." I straightened and grimaced. "Thanks again for your help."

She waved me away. "Go."

I shuffled to the bathroom and locked myself inside. Turning the water on as hot as it would go, I dropped the robe and climbed in. Though I couldn't actually say the heat eased my pain, it certainly loosened some of the tightness.

My hand brushed the two pendants lying against my chest. I held them between my index finger and thumb, gently rubbing them. I wasn't convinced the raven charm had supernatural powers, but I was willing to invest a little effort to find out.

Forcing myself to relax, I concentrated on the charm and let the steaming water flow over me. After a few seconds the sensation of being stroked with feathers bushed across my skin. I continued to rub, enjoying the feel. The tension in my neck and shoulders eased. After another minute the sensation faded, taking with it, a little of my pain.

Jets of water pummeled my back. There was no doubt I still hurt, but not as much as before I'd entered the shower. Maybe there was more to the charm than I'd originally thought. Maybe there was still more to discover. I really hoped so since I didn't get everlasting beauty and strength when I became a reaper.

After twenty bliss-filled minutes the water turned cold. I shut off the shower, feeling a lot better. Another ten minutes found me in the kitchen, stomach growling, and throat parched.

Vella and Bronte were busy cutting up a variety of cheese, fruit, and vegetables, laying them on a platter.

"It looks like a snack-platter for dinner," I said. Truly, it was one of my favorite meals. Who didn't love hors d'oeuvres? It was like a party without all the work.

"Quick and easy," Vella said. She turned, holding the tray. My mouth watered. "I hope you don't mind me mixing up a little of my homemade salsa too."

"No, I love your salsa." My eyes cut to my daughter. "And you're helping?"

Bronte glanced up. "Yeah, I know you had a hard day."

Her smile was sweet and innocent, which put me instantly on alert. "That's so sweet of you to help." I shuffled to one of the chairs at the table and sat. "It really takes the pressure off knowing you're willing to pitch in." Bronte's smile tightened just a fraction. "And to do it out of the kindness of your heart, not expecting anything in return." My features slackened. "It really means a lot."

"Sure." The word rushed out, pitched a bit higher than was natural. "We have to help out each other. Give and take."

"Exactly." I nodded, continuing to hold her gaze.

She blinked several times before looking back at the tray of cheese she was arranging. "But..."

Here it came. She wanted something. Rarely did Bronte do anything without a calculated reason. "But nothing," I said, cutting her off. "You're awesome. Best daughter ever."

"Yeah—yeah—that's true." She nodded. "I'm a pretty great daughter." Her head continued to bounce like a bobble-head doll. "Which is why you should let me go to Payton Alexander's Halloween party."

Okay, it wasn't as bad as I thought. "Who's Payton Alexander?"

Vella set a bottle of Corona in front of me. "Doesn't his daddy own the furniture store on C Street?"

"The guy who screams in his TV commercials?" I took a drink, stalling for time.

“Yeah, that’s him, but Payton isn’t creepy like that.” Bronte placed several mouth-watering selections on a small plate and set it in front of me. A silent bribe to sway my vote. “Actually he’s really shy.”

“Cute?” Vella asked.

A flush crept across Bronte’s cheeks, telling me exactly what I needed to know. She shrugged. “Yeah, he’s all right.”

That meant gorgeous in Bronte lingo. “Huh.” I took another drink, but didn’t say anything.

“So, can I go?”

I stared at my daughter. “Who else will be there?”

“Fang and William.”

Bronte’s best friends. Fang was a cute little Chinese girl with a serious case of the Goth. Constantly dressed in black and skulls, she looked more like a reaper than I did. William was the nerd of nerds, but cute as all get out. I was fairly certain he had a crush on Bronte. Not that she noticed—or that she let on. “Is that all?”

“And Kelly Huff.” Bronte continued to needlessly rearrange the bits of cheese on the tray. “She got her license and offered to drive us.”

Red warning lights blared in my mind. “Kelly Huff? When did you guys become friends?” From what I knew of Kelly she was the most popular girl in tenth grade. Queen of the in-crowd. And a mean girl. She and Bronte butted heads a few times, so I didn’t understand their new camaraderie. Then again, who really understood the mind of a teenage girl?

“We’re not friends.” Bronte plopped in the chair and bit into a cracker, chewed, and swallowed. “She likes William.”

“The Queen of Mean likes dear, sweet William?” Vella asked. “She’ll eat him alive.”

Bronte snorted. “Yeah, when I told him, he broke out in hives.”

I traced the blue pattern ringing my plate. “I’m not sure I’m comfortable with you going to a party with a bunch of teenagers.”

“Who else would I go with?” My daughter’s head gave a little shake. The indignant kind that told me clearly I was an idiot. “I’m a teenager. My friends are teenagers.”

The urge to tell her no pushed against my throat and it was difficult to repress. Trying to be reasonable, I bit back my retort. It wasn’t that long ago I was in high school. The reason why everything seemed so important or monumental escaped me now, but I was trying to be understanding. “Will there be chaperones at the party? And by chaperones I don’t mean older siblings. Parents, grandparents, a youth minister perhaps.”

“I think his parents are going to be there or next door at another Halloween party.” Bronte rested her arms on the table and leaned toward me. “Please? It’s like, the first thing I’ve asked to go to since dad died.”

Oh, she was good. Playing the dead dad card. Even though I couldn’t argue the fact she’d basically been housebound for the past year, I still wasn't comfortable letting her go. "Let me think about it."

She groaned. "Come on, Mom."

"If you need an answer now, it'll be no." I leaned back in the chair and winced when the bruise on my back hit the wooden rungs. "But I promise I'll think about it."

She rolled her eyes and stood. "Fine." Turning, she skulked toward the door. "No matter what, I'm not trick or treating with Thing One and Thing Two this year."

"I didn't ask you to." My mom volunteered to take Bryce and Breck around her neighborhood. She was militant about checking Halloween candy for razor blades and straight pins. Plus, then I wouldn't have to shiver in the cold while my sons strategically hit every house within a five block radius. "Why don't you have your own party here?"

She stopped but didn't look at me. "What's the point? Everybody will be at Payton's party."

With that last jab of guilt, she left the kitchen. I sighed and took a long tug on my bottle. My daughter had never been into what was cool or following the popular crowd. It was one of the things I loved about her. From a very young age she'd marched to her own drum. It looked like those days were at an end.

Vella slid into Bronte's vacated chair. "You gonna let her go?"

"I don't know." I shook my head. "Teenagers, a party, and driving is never a good idea." Vella didn't have kids, but she had a ton of nieces and nephews. A few of them she'd practically raised. "Do you think I should?"

I expected some of her southern philosophy. Maybe something like, "You've got to let your kids kill their own rats." Instead she cocked her head and said, "Hell no."

"Why?"

"Besides the fact this Kelly Huff is obviously using Bronte to sink her claws into our sweet William, you've already lost your husband to a car accident. Do you really want to take a chance on your daughter's life? Especially with all the crazy people out on Halloween?"

Her words felt like a slap, but she'd voiced the exact concerns I'd been thinking. My memories of Jeff's accident were still so vivid they took my breath away. Imagining that with one of my children made me want to vomit. "No, I don't."

"She'll probably hate you for a while, but she'll get over it." Vella reached across the table and patted my hand. "The last thing you want is to reap your own child."

"Wow, you don't pull any punches." I gripped her hand and squeezed, letting her know I wasn't angry. "But you're right." I shook my head, searching for the right words. "I wouldn't come back from that."

Pulling her hand from mine, she sat back in the chair. "None of us would, Lisa."

Silence stretched between us. I popped another hunk of cheese in my mouth and chewed. Swallowing, I looked at her. "You're a good friend."

“I know.” She lifted her bottle, drank, and then lowered it again. “You are too, despite this whole Angel of Death thing.”

“Thanks—I think.” Though the shower eased some of my aches, my body still throbbed. I sat forward and rolled my shoulders. “I’m not twenty anymore.” I sighed. “What if I can’t do this reaper job?”

“What’s the worst that could happen?”

“Oh, I don’t know. I could be killed or maimed.” I hesitated. “Or humiliated.” I rubbed my hands over my face. “God knows I’ve already done that enough.”

“Listen.” Vella tapped her bright pink nail on the table. “This might not be the best situation or your dream job, but it’s going to put food on the table. Hell, I’d let you come work for me, but business has been slow.”

Though Vella was my best friend, the thought of working at her hair salon, listening to Jonathan gossip all day made the hair on my neck prickle. At times I wasn’t sure how Vella and I became such good friends. I didn’t care about celebrity gossip, make up, or name brands. Because of her husband’s high position at the oil company, she was involved in a lot of charities and social events. Whereas, I attended hockey games and constructed paper-mache turkey heads for school plays. We were the epitome of opposites attracting. I think that’s why we worked.

“Thanks.” I propped my elbows on the table, not wanting to put pressure on my back. “You’re right. At this point I need to tough it out.” I attempted a cheery smile. “Who knows, maybe I’ll be the best reaper this side of the Arctic...once I stop hurting.”

“Have another beer. It will help cure what ails you.”

“I doubt it. Besides, I need a good night sleep tonight.” My cheery smile tightened into a humorless grin. “God only knows what’s in store for me tomorrow.”

“Did Nate give you any clue?”

“Only that we hit the seventh. I hope that’s not some metaphorical term for one of the circles of Hell.”

“Well if it is, give my Uncle Donny Jo a message from me. Tell him I did not end up pregnant by Al Ambler. Nor did I have to resort to mud wrestling or lap dances to get through college.” She took a swig of beer and then set it on the table with more force than necessary. “Oh!” She jabbed a finger at me. “And tell him Aunt Edith knew all along he was cheating on her with Alvaretta Hunt—though that’s not what we called the woman.”

“Yeah, I got it.” A shiver skidded up my spine. “Hopefully, I won’t meet Uncle Donny Jo or any other of your relatives tomorrow. Or ever.”

“Well, if you do, don’t turn your back on them.” She pinned me with a gaze and nodded her head. “I’m just sayin’.”

Hell just got a whole lot scarier.

Chapter 12

At exactly ten the next morning I pushed through the front door of GRS. Nate leaned next to the elevator, thumbing through the Anchorage Newspaper. I straightened, trying to hide any indication that yesterday's training torture left me nearly incapacitated.

"What are you doing down here?" I stopped at the elevator and punched the button. "Afraid I wouldn't show up this morning?"

"The thought had crossed my mind." He smiled and folded the newspaper, tossing it into the recycle bin. "But—" He patted me on the back. Pain shot from my shoulder and down my back, nearly forcing a groan from me. I ground my teeth together to prevent a whimper from escaping. "I knew you were made of stronger stuff."

"Yep." I stepped away from him. "That's me. Tough as nails."

The elevator doors slid open and he held up his hand. "After you—partner."

Was that sarcasm? It was difficult to tell with him sometimes, so I just assumed it was. "What fun things do we have planned for today?" I leaned against the back wall of the elevator. "Torture with hot poker. Shoving toothpicks under my fingers. Five hours of being licked by cats while strapped to a chair?"

"What's the matter?" He slid his key card along the slot and pressed the number seven-button. "Yesterday too much for you?"

"No." Pasting on a sweet smile, I crossed my arms, ignoring that ache that emitted around the area of my bra flab. Until last night I hadn't realized I had muscles there. "But since I passed, and I'm here today, I thought you might have some new challenges for me."

The doors squeezed shut and he turned to face me. "Tests are over. Today you see Command Central and meet some of the higher ranking members of GRS."

"Sounds fun." At least the idea of a tour did. I wasn't sure what I would have done if he told me I had to lift or climb something. My stomach did a little flip when the elevator began to climb. "By higher ranking, do you mean reapers?"

"Reapers, command personnel—and others."

And others sounded ominous but I didn't question him further. Once we reached the seventh floor, I'd find out what others were. No sense in stirring up my suspicious nature more than it already was. “Cool.”

We rode the rest of the way in silence. I tried to appear unfazed by what waited for me on the seventh floor, and Nate seemed determined to break my calm façade by burning a hole in the side of my head with his stare. I ignored him. After another few seconds the elevator lurched and the doors opened.

It took all my will not to gawk at the sight. One large room spread out in front of me. Smoky colored floor-to-ceiling windows soared up the front wall, letting in the bright October sun. Raised voices, printers churning out copies, and the frantic tapping of keyboards whizzed around us.

“Ladies first.” Nate indicated I should lead.

I stepped onto the blue carpet but didn’t advance. The room reminded me of the bridge on a space ship. Computers lined one of the walls and in the center of the room was a circular elevated platform. What looked like radars pinged, registering tiny green blips on the screens. But it was the man standing in the center who drew my attention.

Yowza! I didn’t think men like him existed in real life. The dark gray t-shirt he wore stretched across his broad back, and his biceps rolled from under the tight armholes. The fabric clung to his body and dipped into a pair of gray camouflage pants that hugged a rear end that made my fingers itch to touch it. I blew out a long, silent breath but didn’t fan myself. I did have some control.

“This is Command Central. It’s the heart of GRS,” Nate said.

Not pulling my gaze from the mouth-watering Adonis, I pointed. “Who’s that?” Nate snorted and with great difficulty, I looked at him. “What?”

“That’s Constantine.” A smirk turned up the corner of his lip. “He always gets that reaction.”

“What reaction.” I tried to play innocent but knew I was busted.

“The slack jaw, hypnotic gaze, and the fact that even though you’re standing in the command center of GRS, all you can focus on is him.”

“I am not...slack jawed.” The rest of it? Guilty. “But seriously, you should have his picture on the recruiting pamphlet. I wouldn’t have hesitated signing up.”

At that moment Constantine turned. “Nate.” He hopped off the platform. “And Lisa Carron, our newest recruit.” He held out his hand. “I’m sorry for the circumstances of you being here, but I’m glad to have you.”

“And I’m glad to be had—here, I mean.”

Forget his silver gray eyes that seemed to glow, his silky voice, or the thick black hair that begged my fingers to run through it, my knees nearly buckled when I grasped his hand. A jolt of electricity shot through my body, warming me from my toes to the tips of my ears. Maybe it was a reaper thing, a way to acknowledge each other without acknowledging each other. Whatever it was, I’d be shaking his hand whenever possible.

He released me and hooked his thumbs on his front pockets. “Nate said you breezed through the obstacle course yesterday.”

I highly doubted those were the words Nate used. “Breezed, stumbled, the main thing is I made it.”

“Exactly. Come on, I’ll show you around.”

Oh happy day. Constantine walked to the center of the room, giving me another glimpse of his rear end. I followed in his wake. Damn he smelled good. If Heaven had a scent it would smell like this guy. My heart skipped a beat and I silently sighed. It was one of those he’s so dreamy sighs, usually saved for teen heartthrobs.

“This is our tracking station.” He pointed to the blipping radars. “It’s where we monitor impending deaths.”

Several green dots blinked on the screen, drawing my attention away from my incredibly hot superior. Some of the blips were bigger than the others. My stomach clenched at the idea those were people, going about their daily lives, unaware their time on Earth was counting down.

“Tempting, isn’t it?” Constantine asked.

I glanced at him. “What is?”

“Wanting to rush out.” His gaze held mine. The man must have read minds. “Warn them.”

“Yeah, it is.” No point in lying. “Does anybody ever do that?”

“It’s happened, but it doesn’t help.”

The need to know battled with my knowledge that ignorance was bliss, and won. “Why not?”

“Only guardian angels can interfere. If a reaper tries to prevent the death it will still happen. Maybe not in the way planned, but it will still happen.”

“That’s depressing.” I admit I had toyed with the idea of preventing some of the deaths I would encounter. But what was the point if the person ended dying anyway—maybe horrifically?

“Depends on how you look at death, I guess.” Constantine stepped around me. “No doubt your opinion of it will change in time.”

My eyes cut to Nate. “Did your opinion change?”

He nodded. “Oh yeah.”

Before I had time to ask him how, Constantine pointed to a large, digital board hanging on the wall. Names were lit in green, and a series of yellow boxes glowed behind them. “These are the reapers stationed here in Alaska.”

I noticed my name at the bottom of the list. Only one box was lit. “There’s a lot more than I thought.” Nate was in the number one spot with a string of yellow lights behind his name. “What do those mean?”

“Each light represents a reaped soul. Everybody has a quota for the year.”

“Why do I have a box?” I hadn’t reaped yet and figured it was some kind of confidence building tactic.

“Roy Badder,” Nate said behind me.

“I didn’t reap him.” Sure, I’d touched him, but Nate did all the heavy lifting. Plus it was an accident. So I didn't feel I deserved the credit. "I just held onto him."

"Same thing," Constantine echoed what Nate had said in the Holiday bathroom.

"So, it's like a scoreboard?"

"Exactly. Soon you'll be up there with Nate."

My gaze skated up the list of reapers. God, I hoped not. Trying to infuse my voice with awe, I widened my eyes. "Impressive."

Nate grunted. "Right."

Okay, so maybe sincerity wasn't my best attribute when it came to him.

"Anyway," Constantine continued, "see the blinking square at the end of Edgar Cramdon's quota?" I nodded. "That means his client is dead but hasn't been reaped yet."

I shifted my weight to my other foot and crossed my arms over my chest. "Dead? For how long?"

"Not sure." Constantine took out his phone and scrolled through several screens. "Eighteen hours."

"Aren't we supposed to reap right away?" I couldn't imagine some poor soul being stuck while their body assumed room temperature. "I mean—it seems the considerate thing to do."

"Normally, yes." He shoved his phone back in his pocket. "But it was a suicide."

"What difference does that make?"

"It's not policy, so don't quote me on it, but we let suicides cool their heels before letting them cross over. Then maybe they'll think twice about taking their life the next time around."

There was a whole lot of information coming at me. Not here's the break room and the pudding in the fridge belongs to Lois information. This was secret of the universe stuff. "What do you mean—next time?"

"Reincarnation," Constantine said as if he'd just said something as generic as muffin or socks.

"So...we come back?" Duh, he'd just said that, but it was the most intelligent thing I could manage while my brain drank the information. "By choice?"

"Of course. How else would you learn lessons?" He smirked, revealing a dimple I hadn't noticed. "Walk in another man's shoes, so to speak."

"So I've reincarnated before?" Of course my imagination instantly shot to a princess or Gandhi.

"Absolutely." He walked to the closest computer terminal and typed in some information. "Let's see when and who you were."

"Get out of here." All of my inhibitions evaporated. I joined him, leaning close to him in an effort to see the monitor. "Are you googling this?"

"More like ethereal Googling. This computer connects directly to the Akashic Records."

"I've heard of those. They contain everything that's happened in history, right?"

He turned his head and smiled at me. "Very good."

I smiled back, which was a better option than acting on my impulse to run my tongue along his lips.

“In a nutshell, the Akashic Records chronicle every second of every hour in history since time began.”

“Every second?”

His eyebrows lifted and he nodded.

“So drunk dialing my college ex incident?”

“Recorded. Sorry.”

“Crap.” I turned my attention to the computer monitor. “So who was I?”

“Let’s see, a Mesopotamian priestess.”

“Really? I hadn’t expected something so glamorous.”

He grimaced. “But you were sacrificed on the altar.”

“I wasn’t a virgin, was I?”

“Yeah.” His gaze cut to me again. “Sorry.”

“Figures. What else?” Surely not all my lives had ended so...unsatisfactorily.

“A Hebrew slave in Egypt. You were crushed by one of the pyramid blocks. A goat herder in Persia. Starvation.”

“Starvation?” I wasn’t sure how the whole reincarnation thing worked but I couldn’t imagine not having had the same driving need to eat as I did today. “Why didn’t I just eat my goats?”

Constantine gave a nonchalant shrug. “Don’t know. Details are sketchy.” He refocused on my life data. “You were also a Civil War soldier, a rice farmer in Asia, a milk maiden in eighteenth century Europe, and...oh.” He pointed to the screen. “A prince to England’s monarchy.”

“Now that’s what I’m talking about. Which prince was I?”

“Uh.” His brow furrowed. “Henry the Eighth’s son.”

My excitement plummeted. “Wait, he didn’t have any sons that lived, right?”

“Yeah, you died at birth.”

“Figures.” I straightened. “Okay, as fascinating as this is, perhaps too much information isn’t a good thing.” I’m sure there were deep spiritual reasons why most of my past lives ended tragically, or seemed completely mundane. Maybe that was the equivalent of building character. “Now I understand why we don’t remember our past lives. Actually I’m grateful. So depressing.”

“Not everybody can be Cleopatra,” Nate said. “The world needs goat herders too.”

“Comforting.” Anxious to move on, I clapped my hands together and rubbed. “What’s next?”

“The rules.” Nate picked up a thick book off the counter. At first I thought it was a phonebook. He shoved it at me. “Read it. Learn them.”

“All of it?” I took the regulations from him. “Will there be a test?”

“Yeah, every time you reap a soul. That’s your test,” Nate said.

“I can’t take this home. Somebody might see it.” I looked at Constantine. “Aren’t I supposed to keep my reaperhood a secret?”

“Yes.” Constantine took the book and handed me a phone. “That’s why we use this instead.” A short huff of laughter escaped him and he shook his head. “Nate prefers an old school approach when it comes to training.”

“Is this mine?” A shot of excitement raced through me. The phone I held was several versions newer than the dinosaur I’d been using the last four years.

“All yours,” Constantine said. “It’s important that we’re able to reach you when needed.” He stood behind me and reached around my arm. His biceps rubbed against my upper arm. “This is the GRS app.” He tapped on the tiny skull icon. “All the information you need is in here.”

I nodded, but was having a hard time concentrating. “Where are the regulations?”

He tapped the documents tab, and then Regulations and Procedures. “Most of the stuff is common sense. Don’t tell you friends about GRS. You’ve got to reap the soul you’re assigned to. No afterlife messages to loved ones.”

I craned my neck and looked at him. “Really? Why not?”

“The chance of exposure are too great. People start asking questions. Pretty soon the grieving wife is on your doorstep, begging you to find out where the life insurance policy is.”

“Oh.” I looked back at the phone. “It just seems like a nice courtesy we could provide.”

Having some afterlife message from Jeff would have definitely helped with the grieving process. Something along the lines of, “Thanks for being such a great wife. Tell the kids I love them.” Or maybe, “By the way, you’re next in line to be a grim reaper, so maybe stay out of the Holiday gas station if you don’t want to pursue that line of work.” What I got was radio silence.

“It’s not,” Nate said. “So get the idea out of your head.”

“I didn’t say I was going to do it,” I argued, pretending that I hadn’t just been thinking of ways around this rule.

“You didn’t have to. I’m beginning to read your body language and you were definitely thinking about it.”

I ignored him. Nate didn’t know me, and he wasn’t the boss of me. “Moving on,” I said, dropping the phone into my pocket.

“Moving on,” Constantine echoed. “Let’s have a look at Purgatory.”

“Purgatory?” I followed him, skipping a few steps to catch up. “You mean the Purgatory?”

“Yes and no.” He pressed a button on the wall and two doors slid open. “They’re containment cells used until the soul can be delivered. So, in a way it’s Purgatory. Every command center has one.”

We stepped into the room. A low hum buzzed across my skin. “What is that?” A shiver raced through me. “It’s making the hair on my neck stand on end.”

“That’s from the ectoplasmic barriers.”

“Pretend English isn’t my first language.”

He looked at me. “It’s magic.”

“See, that I understand,” I said, walking forward. “But I thought we gave spirits to our porters.”

“Most are, but in some cases their fate is undecided, so they have to hang out here a while.” Constantine stopped beside me. “You shouldn’t have this problem though. All your reaps will go through your porter.”

“Speaking of which.” I crossed my arms. The action was done more out of dread than confidence. I wasn’t sure I was ready for a one-on-one with my porter. Pick had been uber creepy, and knowing me I’d get someone even freakier. “When do I meet mine?”

“No time like the present,” Nate said from behind me.

He sounded a little too gleeful. I was instantly suspicious. “Will I have the same porter as Jeff?”

“That’s doubtful.” Constantine pressed the button and closed us inside Purgatory. “He’s probably been reassigned since there was a year between Jeff and you.”

With a deep breath, I faced him and circled my shoulders, as if preparing to spar. I circled my head and leveled my gaze in front of me. “Let’s do this.”

“For the initial meeting all you need to do is call for your porter,” Nate said.

“Like when you called for Pick?”

“Exactly.” He pulled out his phone and pointed it at me.

“What are you doing?” I asked.

A wicked grin split his face. “I want to capture your expression when you see your porter for the first time.”

Jackass.

I jabbed an accusing finger at him. “What about the no tell rule? You can’t show the picture to anybody.”

“I can’t show non-GRS employees. However, I can post it on our inter-office web page.”

I looked at Constantine, my finger remaining aimed at Nate. “Can he do that?”

“Yeah, sorry, it boosts employee morale.” He patted me on the shoulder and another zing of electricity shot through me. I flinched and scowled. “And I’m sure this won’t be the last time he captures the moment. Nate loves this shit.”

I lowered my arm but continued to glare at my partner. “Okay, but remember, two can play that game.”

“Bring it on.” His gaze captured mine. Clearly he didn’t think I had revenge in me. Ha, the joke was on him. I had kids. Conniving was my middle name. “Are you going to call or should we go home for the day?” he continued.

“I kind of like the idea of calling it a day.”

“Not an option,” Constantine said, putting an end to our bickering. “Now, if you’d be so kind.”

Determined to show Nate I was made of stronger stuff than he believed me to be, I took a big breath and called, “Porter.”

Nothing happened.

Constantine shifted, crossing his arms. “Try again.”

Even his simple request sounded like a command. Again, a tiny niggle of doubt that he was just a reaper ghosted through me. I cleared my throat. “Porter.”

My heartbeat sped up when a thin pink line of light appeared at the end of the room. Instantly, I cued in on the pink and a tiny wave of relief washed through me. I hadn’t considered I might get a female porter. The tension eased from my posture.

Just like at the Holiday station, the light widened and spread, forming a door. I glanced at Nate, but the jackass still had his phone pointed at me. I ignored him and turned back to the dimming light. Seconds ticked by as the scene solidified. For some reason I couldn’t blink or look away. It was like opening a secret Santa gift at an office party. Would it be something good or a gag gift? After what seemed like forever, the door slid open.

Nate’s camera clicked to my right a few times, but I was unable to look away from what I could only describe as the biggest gag gift ever. I pointed. “What—the hell—is—that?”

Chapter 13

Well, it certainly wasn't a woman, but I wasn't sure it was a man either. Creepy transvestite circus master came to mind. Its yellow eyes peered at me over the top of small round sunglasses. Tall and thin, its stance was almost feminine. A shiny gold blouse draped its torso and bright purple leopard leggings hugged long, slender legs. The only masculine thing about the porter was the heavy heeled black boots. Spikes jutted from the sides and chains circled the ankles. Definitely a deterrent for getting too close—like I needed another reason not to get near this...porter.

“Oh crap,” Constantine said.

I whipped around to face him. “Crap what? Why crap?”

“You’ve got to be kidding me,” Nate added. I spun to him. He lowered his phone-camera. “This can’t be right.”

“Oh my God, would somebody tell me what’s going on!”

“That’s—”

“Hal Lee Lewya,” the porter cut in with a deep purr. Okay, I went with male. He gave a low bow. “At your service, pretty lady.” Hal straightened and smiled. A single gold canine winked at me, making him look like a 1980’s music video star. “And you must be my new reaper.” He tipped a tiny purple top hat in my direction. “A pleasure to finally be reassigned.”

“More like a surprise you’ve been reassigned,” Nate said.

“Why?” My gaze bounced between Constantine and Nate. “Why a surprise?”

“Hal had a little trouble with his last reaper.” Constantine took a step forward, partially blocking my view. “Decided to take him on a little trip to Hell.”

“What do you mean?” I remembered Nate telling me not to touch Pick. The reason was sinking in. “Like Black Friday at Target trip to Hell or literally a trip to Hell?”

“Literally—” Constantine let the rest of his statement hang, unspoken.

Hal waved a bejeweled hand in the air. “You got him back. I don’t know what the big fuss was.”

The floor shifted almost imperceptibly under my feet. My heart jumped to my throat. Earthquakes in Alaska are common, but I still hated them. I glanced at Nate. With a flick of his hand he motioned me closer. Seemed like a good idea for protection’s sake. Obviously there was a lot going on I didn’t understand.

“The big fuss is that,” Constantine said, “he’s spent the last nine years in a mental institution because of what he saw. And this isn’t the first time you’ve pull a stunt like this, or do you need reminding?”

When Constantine spoke his voice was set low. Power rolled off him, as if emitting an invisible electrical charge. The light on the wall flickered. I took another step toward Nate. For the first time, I really looked at Constantine. Not just his chiseled body and stunning face, but all of him. I assumed he was nothing more than a GRS bigwig. Now I wasn’t sure he was even human. The way Hal Lee Lewya cast his gaze toward the floor told me I was probably right.

“No, you don’t need to rehash my sins. I assure you, Constantine, I have learned my lesson and have been thoroughly punished.” Hal lifted his stare. “Enough to satisfy even you.”

“I doubt that.”

Silence blanketed the room. Unsure what I should do, I cleared my throat. That drew everybody’s attention. “Soooo, is Hal my porter,”—which I seriously hoped he wasn’t—“or am I to be assigned somebody new.”

“No.” Constantine looked at me. “He’s yours.” He paused. “Sorry.”

Oh goodie.

I was learning that things at GRS were what they were, and there wasn’t a lot I could do about it. “Well then…” I turned to Hal. “My name is Lisa Carron.”

Hal’s yellow eyes drifted slowly down my body and back up to rest on my face. Okay, I needed a shower after that little perusal, but I ignored his rudeness. Or maybe he wasn’t being rude. Maybe a thorough body scan was considered proper behavior for one of the Netherworld’s minions. At that point I didn’t care. I just wanted him gone.

His long slim fingers toyed with a wide metal cuff at his wrist. “Lisa.”

The velvety purr of his voice wrapped around me and tugged me forward. I stepped toward him, but Nate grabbed my arm. My gaze tracked from his hand to face.

“Going somewhere?” he asked.

“What?” It took a couple of seconds for the situation to register. “I mean…” I glared at Hal. “That wasn’t very nice.”

He shrugged. “A little porter humor.”

“What, luring me in so you can drag me to Hell too?”

“You hurt me.” He pressed a delicate hand to his gold shirt. “I told you I’d learned my lesson.”

“No,” I pulled my arm out of Nate’s grasp, “you said you’ve been punished. It’s not the same thing.”

He tilted up his chin and laughed. “You’re clever, Lisa Carron.” Slowly his laughter died. “I will remember that.”

Unsure what he meant, I looked at Constantine. “Are we done here?”

“Yes, I think that’s quite enough for today.”

I looked at Hal again and mimicked Nate's dismissal of Pick. "Our transaction is complete."

With that, Hal bowed and stepped backward into the elevator. "Until next time, Lisa Carron."

Again the urge to move forward gripped me but this time I was ready. It took all my will, but I remained rooted to my spot. The doors closed, swallowing Hal and releasing me from his compulsion. I slowly turned to face the boys. "Okay, would somebody please tell me why I've got a psychopath for a porter?"

"I wish I could, Lisa." Constantine ran his fingers through his thick hair, worry etching his face. The locks fell back into place, but I didn't find them so alluring this time. "I'll check into it and let you know."

"He's dangerous," Nate said. My gaze cut to him. "I know I give you a hard time, Carron, but I'm serious when I say you can't handle him."

Normally I would have bristled at the insult, but not this time. "No argument here." I rubbed my arms, trying to chase away the lingering effects of Hal's creepy impulse touch. "Don't reapers have some kind of talisman against their porters? Maybe a magic potion I can drink every day?"

"There are a few things but they're rare," Constantine said.

"Like what? I'm willing to try anything." Whatever I had to do to keep out of Hal's reach, I'd do. "Eat eye of newt. Circle a grave three times at midnight on All Hallow's Eve. Paint myself green and hop around in the front yard, naked. No matter what it is, I'm all in."

"It's not a matter of doing something as it is having something done to you."

The thought of Constantine doing something to me sent a thrill, and a little apprehension, racing along. Until I'd seen, or more like, felt his power, I would have been all over him like a cheap suit. A little of my bravado fled. "It doesn't hurt, does it?"

"Not usually." Constantine gripped the back of his neck and rubbed. "On rare occasions a reaper will acquire an ally."

I shook my head, not understanding.

"Someone or something adopts them, helps out in little ways. Maybe guides them."

"You mean like a sidekick?"

"More like a familiar," Nate said. "You don't happen to have one of those...do you?"

Automatically my hand went to my neck, searching for the raven charm. I mentally cursed myself for having forgotten my necklace on the bathroom counter this morning. "Maybe."

Constantine stopped massaging his neck. "You do?"

"I don't know. There's this raven named Fletcher. Well, that's what I named him. Anyway, he's been following me around, sitting in the trees outside my house." I shrugged. "And maybe he gave me a raven charm."

"I take it you didn't bring the charm with you today?" Constantine asked.

"Yeah, how'd you know?"

"It's an amulet that will protect you. If you had it on, Hal's compulsion wouldn't have worked on you.”

“Well, luckily Fletcher adopted me, otherwise...” The idea of being at Hal Lee Lewya’s mercy sent a ripple of dread that wrapped around my bones and squeezed. I swallowed hard.

“Luck has very little to do with this.” Constantine pressed the button on the wall and the doors to Command Central slid open. Before leaving Purgatory he looked at me. “It seems somebody is looking out for you, Lisa.”

I blew out a long breath. “It’s about time,” I mumbled.

Nate moved up behind me. “Why don’t you go home and get that raven charm?” He stepped past me. “Put it on and don’t take it off—for anything.” I nodded. “Take the rest of the day off and rest up.”

“I’m fine. I don’t need to rest up.” The excitement of Hal Lee Lewya’s arrival had anesthetized yesterday’s soreness. At his words, all my aches returned. “I can get my charm tonight.”

“Better to go home and take it easy.” After stepping through the door Nate turned to me. “Tomorrow is Halloween. It will be one of your busiest nights of the year.”

“My busiest night?” I followed him across Command Central. “Why?”

“Halloween and idiotic stunts go hand in hand. Someone is bound to die.” He flicked his head toward the platform. “Have a look.”

A plump woman dressed in a violet pantsuit sat at one of the radars. We approached and I could see a dozen dots jumping around the screen. “Those aren’t all mine, are they?”

The woman turned and smiled up at me. “No honey, just this one, this one, and...” She pointed a purple painted nail at a large green blip. “This one.”

“Three?” I said.

“So far.” She laughed. “But the day is still young.”

She seemed to really love her job. “Do we know who they are?”

“I do.” She turned back to the radar. “But you won’t find out until the information is sent to your phone tomorrow afternoon. No sense flaunting temptation in your face.”

“Oh, yeah.” Despite already knowing this, I felt like a chastised child. “Of course.”

“So go home and I’ll see you tomorrow.” Nate wrapped his fingers around my arm and guided me toward the door.

“But—” I wasn’t sure why I was protesting. Probably because it felt like I was being shuffled out the door, and everybody seemed to have another agenda but me. “There must be something I can do around here.”

“Nope.” He gave me a little push into the elevator. “Not a thing.” Reaching inside the elevator, he pushed the ground floor button. As the doors closed, he smiled and gave a little wave. “Have fun.”

I returned a tight smile, but went willingly. Far be it from me to stay where I wasn’t wanted, or to refuse time off. More than likely Hal Lee Lewya was the cause of being herded out of GRS, and truth be told, I’d rather have them taking care of that issue without my help. Nothing I could really do about it anyway. I didn’t have pull or a clue as to what was going on most of the time.

On the way home, I realized I didn't have one errand to run or any pressing tasks that needed to be completed. Even the house clean and the laundry was done. So, I took an afternoon nap. Twenty minutes had been my goal, but two hours later I woke to the sound of my sons' pounding footsteps.

"Mom," Bryce bellowed, "we're home!"

No kidding. "I'm in here." I swept the blankets aside and swung my legs over the side of the side. The boys bound down the hall and launched themselves onto the bed. I bounced several times, laughing. "Have a good day?"

"Tomorrow's Halloween." Breck stood and gave two powerful jumps. "Candy."

"I can't wait," Bryce said, throwing his arms around my neck. After that declaration he jumped to the next subject. "What's for dinner?"

I broke his hold and stood. Cooking was the last thing I felt like doing. Actually, reaping was, but cooking came in a strong second. "How does fast food sound?"

A unanimous "Yay," erupted from both.

"Is your sister home?"

"Yeah, she's watching TV downstairs," Bryce said, taking a flying leap off the bed.

"Get ready. We leave in five," I called to his departing back.

Breck followed his brother, performing the same launch and run sequence. I stopped in the bathroom, fluffed a bit, and went to find Bronte. Like Bryce had said, I found her downstairs, snuggled into our big, red beanbag chair. Though she'd taken off her coat, she still wore her favorite black knit hat that had cat ears and a skull and crossbones on the front. She didn't look up when I entered.

"Hungry?"

She answered with a noncommittal grunt and a shoulder shrug.

"Fast food. Grease and sugar," I said, trying to coax a reaction from her. Her gaze never wavered from the television. Usually I'd get a cursory glance, but not even a blink in my direction. "What's wrong?"

"Can I go to Payton's Halloween party?" she asked, still not looking at me.

The party had completely slipped my mind. Ever since Jeff died, saying no had become difficult. I didn't like to deny the kids something fun, but I the thought of her going to the party gave me a bad feeling. First off, I didn't like Kelly Huff. Girls like her bullied or fluttered their eyelashes to get their way. In school I'd gotten the bullying end of the deal. Though I wanted Bronte to make her own mistakes, this one could get her hurt or worse. I didn't beat around the bush or try to cushion the letdown. "No. I don't trust Kelly to be a responsible driver."

She rolled her eyes and crossed her arms. "I knew you wouldn't let me."

"Then you shouldn't be disappointed." When she didn't reply, I tried another tactic. "Why don't you and Fang have a sleepover? It'll be fun. Invite a couple of girls. I'll be going out for a while so you'll have the house to yourself. Watch a scary movie and eat junk food."

She looked at me. “Where are you going?”

To reap at least three souls. I went with my standard answer. “Vella’s.” She grunted again and I took it to mean my night would be lame. Better her think that than know the truth. “Come on.” I held out my hands. “Let’s eat, then we can discuss your plans for tomorrow night.”

She stared at my hands for a few seconds and finally sighed. Grasping her fingers, I pulled her to a stand and into my arms, wrapping her in a tight mom hug. Even though she stood there, arms limp at her side, she turned her head and laid her cheek against my shoulder. Obviously she wasn’t that mad.

McDonald’s was packed. Obviously a lot of other parents hadn’t felt like cooking either. The boys made a beeline for the play area, while Bronte and I ordered. After our food arrived, we carried it into the kid zone. Instantly, I was struck by the smell of the cleaning fluid they used. A little Pilipino woman wove her way through the patrons, wiping a table here, sweeping up spilled fries there, and keeping the place clean as clean as possible with so many kids around.

The noise level was ten times that of the adult section beyond the glass. I envied the childless people. Sitting and eating without screams of small children piercing their skulls. We commandeered the corner table, and after brushing sprinkles of lettuce off the bench, slid onto the bright red laminate seats.

I doled out the food, prepping the boys’ kid’s meals for their dine-and-dash dinner habits. Bronte was plugged into electronic life support, completely ignoring me, so I pulled out my new phone and thumbed through the screens. Several icons for GRS scrolled by. I tapped on the skull and went to Rules and Regulations. Man, there were a lot of them. How was a person supposed to learn all these?

It is prohibited to purposely make contact with deceased’s family before or after reaping. I still thought that one was stupid and I wasn’t certain I’d be able to abide by it. I wondered what kind of punishment I’d incur for breaking it.

It is prohibited to prevent the reap. Only guardian angels have the right to interfere.

A reaper must remain neutral.

It is prohibited to fraternize or engage in ongoing conversations with the client. In other words, don’t become their therapist.

On and on the list went. I wondered if Nate had actually memorized all the rules, or if he was just putting on a good show. As I scanned through the rest, I gleaned the general message. Keep a low profile and do the job. How hard could it be? Even though I hated to admit it, I’d always been kind of a rule follower. Being a reaper might be the perfect fit.

Breck scooted into the booth next to me and took a big drink of his soda. Pink tinged his cheeks and sweat coated his forehead.

“You having fun?” I said, clicking off my phone and pocketing it.

He shrugged and toyed with his fries. "It's all right."

"What's wrong?" I scooped a hank of sweaty hair off his forehead. "Is somebody bullying you?"

"No." He bit the end of the French fry and chewed.

Something was definitely wrong. Normally, Breck hog-faced a burger in under a minute, but now he didn't touch it. "You can tell me." I hoped it was something simple, like he'd decided he wanted to be a vampire instead of a ghost. "Come on." I gave him a reassuring smile. "I'm pretty good at solving problems."

His big blue eyes looked up at me. "There's a ghost in the slide tubes and she won't give me back my sock."

My smile tightened. "A ghost?"

Bronte snorted and shook her head. "Moron."

"Hey, stop calling your brother names." I looked back at Breck. "Are you sure it's a ghost and not a kid that stole your sock?"

"Positive. It's an old lady and she's mean."

Solutions and excuses raced through my mind. My son didn't need his sock. We had a hundred singles at home he could wear. And what were the chances of a real live ghost haunting the McDonald's play tube?

"What are you going to do, Mom?" His eyes stared at me, trusting.

"Yeah, Mom, what are you going to do?" Bronte smirked at me.

"Well..." I gently shoved Breck toward the end of the bench. "I'm getting your sock back." I narrowed my gaze at Bronte. "That's what I'm going to do."

My son let me out and I wove my way through the bevy of children and tables and stopped at the end of a long green slide. Every few seconds a kid shot to the bottom and jumped off to circle back for another go, sometimes turning and crawling back up.

Surveying the conglomeration of colorful tubes and nets, I decided that climbing the padded platforms steps would be a lot safer and less humiliating than trying to shove myself up one of the slides. I glanced around. The other parents were busy with their own kids or ignoring the mayhem. I gripped the edge of the platform and slowly worked my way up the play set. Once at the top, I crawled on hands and knees across a netted bridge. Something wet and sticky pressed into my palm. I cringed but continued forward. The smell of dirty feet, chocolate shakes, and pee enveloped me. I tried not to think of the bacteria clinging to every surface I touched.

Note to self: pick up more hand sanitizer.

A small child in an orange sweat suit tried to squeeze past. "Excuse me."

"Sure thing." I pressed my body to the side to let him by. When he reached the end of the netted bridge I stopped him. "Hey, have you seen any...um, another lady up here?"

"You mean the ghost lady?"

My eyes rounded and I nodded. "Yeah, the ghost lady."

“She hangs out next to the yellow slide.” With that the kid scurried away.

I hesitated. If there really was a ghost living in the play set, she wasn’t my charge. I pulled out my phone and tapped the appointment app. The screen was empty. Maybe I should leave well enough alone. I could always buy Breck more socks. Unfortunately, curiosity was one of my worst vices.

At the juncture where the net bridge ended, I stopped. Taking a deep breath, I poked my head around the corner. Yep, she was there, all translucent and ghost like. My heart jumped to my throat. I didn’t think I’d ever get used to seeing spirits. It’s one thing to catch a glimpse in my periphery. Staring at one full on was intimidating in an I don’t know nothin’ about reapin’ no spirits way.

“I’m not leaving, so don’t waste your time trying to convince me,” the ghost said.

I glanced around, but nobody else was there. “Are you talking to me?”

“Who else would I be talking to? Came to try to get me to cross over, right?” She lifted a spectral cigarette to her lips, took a drag so long my lungs hurt, and then blew it out. “Like I told the first guy. I’m not going.”

Her words sort of registered but my attention was fixed on her cigarette. I quit smoking two years ago but sometimes the craving still hit. I scooted farther into the padded area, trying to maneuver myself into the line of her ghost smoke, hoping for a hit. I settled against the netted wall across from her and inhaled. The smell was faint, and not as satisfying as I’d hoped for.

“How do you know I’m a reaper?” I started to cross my legs but they still hurt. Instead I stretched them out and crossed my ankles. “Maybe I’m just a mom, who can see ghosts.”

“Right.” She snorted and held out her hand, indicating the area we sat in. “Because there are so many parents up here.”

She had me on that one. Unless a child was hurt, scared, or physically stuck, no parent would dare enter the germ-pool. And even that was questionable, especially if there was an older sibling to send into the tubes to retrieve the child.

“Okay, so I’m a reaper.” I pointed to Breck’s sock. The end poked out from under her butt. “I wouldn’t have bothered you if you hadn’t scared my son and refused to give him his sock.”

She harrumphed and took another drag.

“So, why are you up here...?” I waited for her name.

“Lily.”

“Lily. Is this where you died?” I couldn’t imagine someone wanting to spend eternity in a fast food play set.

“No, I died in the hospital. Lung cancer.” She squashed the cigarette onto the mat and after a few seconds it disappeared. “But this is where my daughter comes with my grandkids.”

“I’m sorry.” And I really was. Missing family must have been the number one cause for hauntings. I didn’t have any solid stats, but I was pretty sure I was right. “I bet it’s difficult knowing you won’t see your grandchildren grow up.”

Her face scrunched. “I couldn’t give a good gosh darn about my grandkids. They’re monsters.

Their parents spoil those brats something awful.”

Taken aback by the vehemence in her response, I blinked a few times and nodded. “Okay, then I don’t get it. Why here?”

“I need to get a message to my daughter.”

The clang of warning bells erupted in my head. Rule number one— It is prohibited to purposely make contact with deceased’s family before or after reaping. It would have been better to say I was sorry and I couldn’t help her. Damn my curiosity. “What kind of message?”

The ghost’s gaze shifted to me. She stared for a few seconds before saying, “My good-for-nothing son-in-law, Tony, is cheating on my daughter with her best friend.”

I gasped. “That bastard.”

“That isn’t the half of it. Maryanne is pregnant with his kid.”

I sat forward. “Maryanne is the best friend?”

“Yep, and the skank keeps pretending to be my daughter’s bestie. Makes me mad enough to possess her.”

“What a bitch.” I leaned back, completely incensed by the situation. “Your poor daughter.”

“She’s a good person and doesn’t deserve this.” The ghost held my stare. “So...”

Don’t become the spirit’s therapist. Just broke that rule. “I don’t know. Can I be honest, Lily. I’ve only been doing this job for about a week, and passing a message onto family members is a major no-no in the rule book.”

“Send her an anonymous letter.” The ghost held out her translucent hands. “Who would know?”

I cocked a brow at her. “You do realize who I work for, right.”

“Well, maybe if you’re casual about it. Tuck it in with your bills and letters, they—” She pointed upward. “Won’t notice.”

I shouldn’t. I mean, I really shouldn’t even entertain the idea of getting involved. Delivering the message was not worth the trouble I’d get into.

Suddenly Lily’s eyes widened. Scooting onto all fours, she crawled to the edge of the platform to look through the net. “They’re here.” She pointed to the group of people walking into the play area. “Oh, that whore of a friend is with them.”

I scrambled to join her. Side-by-side, we watched the group claim a table near the door. It wasn’t hard to tell who Lily’s daughter was. Small and blonde like her mother, she appeared haggard and beaten down. The friend, on the other hand, had a rosy glow, and there was no mistaking the furtive glances she tossed in Tony’s direction.

“Okay, I’ll do it.” The words popped out before I could stop myself. I sat back on my heels. “But you have to promise to cross over when it’s done.”

Lily smiled and held up her hand. “Scout’s honor. So, what are you going to do?”

I took a deep breath and exhaled. “Watch and enjoy.” I scooted toward the yellow tube. “Meet me in the parking lot after I leave.”

She nodded.

I crawled across the platform, grabbed Breck's sock, and sent myself down the yellow tube slide. Standing, I dusted myself off and glanced up. Lily was still pressed against the net, watching me. Instead of heading straight back to my kids, I skirted the center tables and walked toward Lily's daughter.

I was never much of an actress, so I drew my motivation from experience. Believing Jeff had been cheating on me was a hurt that cut into my soul, but I would have wanted to know. Still, I hated that I was about to open a can of hurt for Lily's daughter.

As I passed their table, I casually glanced over. Pasting on a big smile, I stopped. "Hey, sorry to bother you." I pointed to Maryanne. "But I recognized you two from the doctor's office, and just wanted to say congratulations on the baby."

The blood drained from Maryanne's face and her eyes cut to Lily's daughter. "I don't know what you're talking about."

"You and your husband." I pointed at Tony. "The girls at the doctor's office and I were talking about how cute you two were together."

Lily's daughter leaned forward on her arm, resting them on the table. "That's my husband."

I let my eyes go wide. "But, you and he—" I didn't finish my sentence. If Lily's daughter were smart she'd put two and two together. "Okay, well, sorry."

With that I continued to my table. Bryce had joined Bronte and Breck. They'd polished off most of their meals and would be ready to go in another five minutes. "I've got to make a call." I tossed Breck's sock to him and then grabbed my purse from the corner of the booth. "I'll be right back."

"Did you see her, Mom?" Breck shoved his foot into the hole and pulled on his sock. "Did you see the ghost?"

I repressed the urge to look in Lily's direction. "Nope, just your sock." I ruffled his hair. "It probably stunk so bad she didn't want to keep it." He smiled and went back to eating his fries. "Okay, finish up and I'll be back in a second."

As I passed the table where Lily's family sat, I heard their heated conversation. I'd placed the spark of doubt and her daughter was running with it. Pushing open the glass door, I pulled out my phone and walked outside to wait for Lily. I fingered the raven charm hanging around my neck. I'd put it on when I got home and vowed to never take it off. Hopefully it would protect me from Hal's allure.

The temperature had dropped several degrees over the past half hour. I zipped my coat all the way up and shoved my free hand into my pocket. A squawk sounded above me and I glanced up to see Fletcher perched on the light pole. Relief washed through me. Hopefully, the bird's presence meant this would be a smooth transaction.

Lily appeared beside me, a big grin on her face. "That did it." She held out her hand. "Thanks."

I reached out and shook her hand, but didn't let go. "You're welcome. I'm glad I could help—" even if I do get in trouble.”

“What are they going to do? Fire you?” Lily said.

I thought about that for a second. “Good point. I don’t really know.” I shrugged. “So, are you ready?”

A heavy sigh heaved from the ghost. “Ready as I’ll ever be.”

“I want to warn you, my porter is a little unorthodox, but don’t be scared. He’ll get you to where you need to be.”

A mischievous gapped grin spread across her face. “Sounds interesting.”

I turned my back to the restaurant and lifted the phone to my ear, pretending to be taking a call. Still holding onto Lily, I called, “Hal Lee Lewya.”

Fletcher squawked and flapped his wings. This time I didn’t have to wait. The thin pink line of light formed and the elevator door slid open. I glanced at Lily, gaging her reaction.

Her grin rounded to an astonished O. “What in the name of God’s green Earth is that?”

I had to admit, Hal had outdone himself. Dressed in a bright red, satin pants and shirt, he glimmered in the fading sunlight. “Well, Lily, that is Hal Lee Lewya.”

“He looks more like a Las Vegas pimp.”

“Lisa.” His voice caressed me as it had at GRS, but the effect was very different. There was no urge to go to him. “I didn’t realize we had a client.”

“We didn’t, but now we do.” I took two steps forward and stopped, making sure to stay out of his range. “Lily needs to cross.” I pinned him with a glower. “You’ll make sure she gets to where she’s supposed to be, right?”

“Of course.” He held out his hand. “But what do you say to a little fun first, Lily?”

“Uh uh.” I wagged an index finger in his direction. “No deviations. Just straight to her check-in point, or whatever you call it.”

Hal’s lower lip rolled into a pout. “Perhaps just the first circle of Hell—”

“No.” I cut him off. “No circles.”

“Then maybe Lily would like to see the river Styx.”

Actually, I wouldn’t have minded seeing the river Styx. I open my mouth to reply, but Lily beat me to it.

“Maybe a few detours wouldn’t be so bad.” She smiled at Hal. “I mean, it’s not like I’m on a deadline, right?”

I didn’t know if she was or not, but I could see I wasn’t going to sway these two. “So help me, Hal, if you do anything—”

“Yes, I know, you’ll report me.” He wiggled his fingers in Lily’s direction. “She’ll be fine.”

Even if she wasn’t, what could I do? Take her to GRS and put her in Purgatory? But then they’d know I broke the message to loved ones rule. Yeah, I was completely covering my own ass.

“All right, I’m going to trust you, Hal.” Of course I didn’t. “Our relationship is new, and I want to start off on the right foot.” He lifted a brow, and I got the distinct impression he was more entertained than moved by my ‘go team’ speech. So I changed tactics. “You scratch my back and I’ll scratch yours—if you catch my meaning.”

His expression morphed into a slightly evil smile. “Perfectly, Lisa Carron.”

With nothing further to say, I released Lily’s hand. She drifted to Hal and into the elevator. “Bye, Lily.” I waved. “Have a good afterlife.”

“You can count on it.” She ran her hand down Hal’s arm. “I need a set of these fancy pajamas.”

“Your wish is my command, Miss Lily.”

With that, the elevator door closed and folded into a thin beam of light before vanishing. I lowered my phone and looked up at Fletcher. I was fairly certain the bird was my familiar and had kept Hal’s mojo and bay. “Thanks.”

The raven flapped his wings and launched into the sky. I took a deep breath and released it, hoping I hadn’t just gotten myself in a heap of trouble.

Chapter 14

Halloween day worked out better than I could have planned. My mother picked up the boys in the morning so they could enjoy an entire day of Halloween festivities. Bronte left for Fang's house around two o'clock. It seemed that once she'd accepted she couldn't go to the party, Fang and a group of girls had decided to opt out and have a sleepover instead. I will admit to feeling a bit smug in my efforts to protect our youth. The other parents could thank me later.

With the kids gone, I was free to spend the day preparing for my busy night. It took several rounds of trying on clothes before I settled on an appropriate reaping outfit. For me it was all about the clothes. Before I took up any sport or activity I had to have the proper attire. Otherwise, I felt like I wasn't fully committed. Lucky for me, my wardrobe was reaper ready.

Temperatures so far had been colder than normal and I figured tonight wouldn't be any different. After a lot of kicking, punching, and standing outside to see if the clothes were warm enough, I settled on a black turtleneck sweater and black polar fleece pants. I pilfered a black stocking cap and gloves from our winter clothes bin, and pulled out my black shearling lined boots.

The outfit was perfect, but when I stood in front of the mirror assessing myself, I realized I wanted an even bigger change. I was a reaper now, not just a mom who fell into the position. I'd embraced it, well—kind of, and despite Nate's skepticism, I'd passed all the tests. I'd even reaped Lily without any help.

After pulling out my phone, I dialed Vella.

"Vella's Star Power Salon, how may I help you?"

"I'm ready," I said.

Silence stretched on the other end of the phone, until she finally said, "Platinum and sassy?"

"Bring it on!" I clicked off the phone and set it on the dresser. If I knew my friend, she'd close up shop and be at my house in fifteen minutes. She'd been chomping at the bit to get ahold of my hair for years. Telling her to bring it on was like waving crack in front of an addict. And I had to admit, for the first time I wasn't afraid of change. I wanted different. I needed to let go of the old me and embrace my reaper, and Vella was the gal for the task.

By the time Nate picked me up that evening, I'd found my reaper mojo. My hair was short and spikey, except for the two thin pieces she'd left at the sides, and my new platinum color glimmered like a pearl in the bathroom light. I hated to wear a hat but necessity demanded it. Besides, the little sprigs of blond peeking out looked kind of hot. I felt like a character in a spy movie.

One look from Nate told me I'd made the right choice. "You look...great."

"Thanks." I climbed into the passenger side of the Suburban. "I really needed a change."

He stared at me a few seconds and then shifted into reverse. "You ready for tonight?"

"As ready as I'll ever be." I clicked my seatbelt. "Where are we going?"

"Out to one of the lakes in Wasilla." He pushed the gear into drive. "Did you get the assignment on your phone?"

"Yeah, a Nuk Fulsom? But I didn't see any details on how he's going to die."

"There's a details tab in the corner. It drops down and give you more information."

I didn't feel like digging my phone out of my pocket and trying to read as we drove. "So what are the details?"

"Headless Horseman," he said.

"Excuse me?"

He smirked. "Or, I should say Headless snow machiner."

People in the lower forty-eight call them snowmobiles. Up here we call them snow machines. I always figured it was a location thing, like pop versus soda. I scowled at Nate. "That sounds gross."

"Not as bad as it sounds. Some guys are trying to cross thin ice with pumpkins on their heads."

My brows lifted. "That is one of the stupidest things I've ever heard."

"Yep." He glanced at me and then to the road again. "Those are your clients."

The little bit of ego boost I'd gained from reaping Lily evaporated. I had a feeling the Lily-like reaps would be few, and pumpkin-wearing ignoramuses would be numerous. Thankfully, Nate didn't jab with any more verbal barbs.

The drive took an hour. A veil of snow lay in a white sheet across the ground and the full moon made it sparkle like blue diamonds. Nate pulled onto the narrow road and shut off the lights. With only the moon to see by, he inched down the road until reaching the end. Four other cars were parked there, and he pulled alongside the last one on the left and shut off the engine.

From where we sat we had a perfect view of the men on the lake. The whine of the snow machine pierced the night as one of the guys took off across the ice, pumpkin firmly resting over his head. I unhooked my seatbelt and sat forward. The breath stuck in my throat as I watched him shoot across the lake. Would this be the guy I'd have to reap?

Until now I never thought much about seeing the death take place. I only concentrated on getting the soul. "How did you say this guy dies?"

"The ice breaks."

My head snapped in Nate's direction. "Then how am I supposed to get to him?"

"His soul will be on the ice, watching his friends."

My gaze swung back to the group of guys. "How can you be sure?"

“They always linger. Either because they don’t know they’re dead, or they want to make sure somebody finds their body.”

“I hope you’re right.”

We watched the antics for another fifteen minutes. A lot of heavy stuff rolled through me. As a mother, I wanted to march out there and tell them what idiots they were and to stop it before somebody got killed. As a reaper, I wanted to get the job over with and go home. As a human it was uncanny to watch an individual’s life count down, while they had no idea. The knowledge was a gift and a curse. It made me feel powerful, and yet insignificant against death’s force. I’d fallen into this job, and had accepted it begrudgingly. Realizing the scope of my obligations humbled me.

The steady whine of the snow machine motor broke, drawing my attention back to the lake. Just like Nate said, the ice cracked, giving way. One second Nuk Fulsom was there and the next he was gone. Even though I knew it was coming, having it actually happen was still a shock. I gasped and slapped my hands over my mouth. After few seconds I covered my eyes, trying not to cry.

“You okay, Carron?”

I nodded but didn’t reply, not trusting my voice. Screams from the other guys filtered through our closed windows. My stomach roiled and threatened to revolt and took several deep breaths to calm my nausea. Finally I looked up again.

“It’s about time.” Nate paused. “You ready?”

I saw Nuk’s glimmering spirit standing beside his friends. “How do we do this?”

“I’ll divert the guys and help them retrieve Nuk’s body. You get ahold of his spirit and lead it off the thin ice.”

“Be careful.” Fear for Nate’s safety coursed through me. “You’re not one of my reaps tonight are you?”

“No.” He shook his head and smiled. “But thanks for worrying.”

“Okay.” I held up my gloves. “Can I wear these?”

“Yep. Clothing doesn’t interfere.”

I nodded and slipped them on. When I was finished, I pulled on the door handle. “I’m ready.”

We exited the Suburban and made our way down the slope to the lake. Nate headed for the guys and I cut a path to Nuk. He continued to stare at his friends, not noticing me. “Nuk.”

He didn’t move.

“Nuk,” I said again.

Still the guy didn’t respond.

“Nuk!”

“What?”

It wasn’t the ghost who answered. I spun to face a very wet, very much alive man. “You’re Nuk?”

He sniffed and wiped his arm across his eyes. “Yeah.”

“Who broke through?” I was completely confused since the dead guy was still alive, and now I didn't have any idea who I was supposed to reap.

"Eddie, my friend." Nuk glanced back at the open water.

"Did you—" I scrambled for something to say. "Did you call 911?"

"Yeah, they're on their way." He moved toward the group.

I turned to the ghost. "Eddie?"

"Yeah." He sidled up beside me, his hands shoved in his coat pocket. "Am I dead?"

"Uh, yes—yes you are. Sorry."

He shrugged. "At least my death was awesome."

I grunted. "Seriously? You think falling through thin ice with a pumpkin on your head constitutes an awesome death?"

"Hell yeah." He grinned at me. "You know what would have been really cool?" He didn't wait for my reply. "If we would have lit the pumpkins on fire like the real Headless Horseman."

Okay, I wasn't going to impart any afterlife-changing pearls of wisdom, so I pushed forward with the agenda. "Eddie, you need to cross over and I need to get home to hand out Halloween candy." I took a step toward him. "Would that be all right?"

His brow furrowed. "Are you telling me you're the grim reaper?"

I held out my arms. "In the flesh."

"You're hot."

"Really?" I asked, surprised by his compliment.

"Hell yeah. I would have done this a lot sooner if I'd known hot babes were angels of death."

Idiot. "Thanks." I took him by the arm and led him to the lake's edge. "I like you, Eddie."

He edge closer to me, pressing his cold ghostly body into mine, literally. I jumped back. "Not like that." A shiver ran the entire length of my spine. "Now stay." I grabbed his arm again. "I'm going to pass you off to my porter and I promise he'll show you a good time. Okay?"

Eddie nodded, a stupid grin plastered on his face. "Awesome."

"Yes, it's awesomely awesome." I tilted my chin up. "Hal."

Instantly the thin line of light appeared. One thing about Hal, he was prompt. The door slid open and he stood in a floor-length, white fur coat.

"Whoa," Eddie said.

"Indeed," I replied. "Now that's awesome, right?"

"Dude, I love the threads."

"A man of great taste," Hal said. His yellow gaze skated to me. "Lisa, you bring me the most entertaining clients."

"I trust Lily got where she needed to be?" I asked.

"Delivered to the Pearly Gates early this morning." His gold tooth winked at me. "That is, after a turn around the first circle of Hell."

"I said no tours."

“She asked to go, and loved it.” He waved a silver cane in my direction. “The first circle is nothing more than a bunch of whining pagans. Now the third circle—” Hal looked at Eddie. “I think you’d enjoy that. Sex twenty-four-seven.”

Eddie looked at me. “Thanks for setting this up. It’s even better than I imagined.”

“I didn’t arrange this.” I glared at Hal. “What do you get, a cut on how many souls you lure into Hell?”

“Lisa, when will you learn, I simply want to have fun?” He waved Eddie to him. “And this young man not only likes my clothing, but seems ready for a little excitement as well.”

I glared at both of them and finally let go of the ghost’s arm. “Fine, but don’t come crying to me if you get in trouble—either of you.”

“Let your conscience be clear, sweet Lisa.”

“And don’t call me that.”

Eddie moved into the elevator and turned to face me. As the doors closed he grinned and waved. “See you on the other side.”

“I certainly hope not,” I mumbled.

As the portal disappeared, my phone erupted in my pocket. I fumbled with the zipper and finally pulled it free. It was my mother.

“Hi, Mom, is everything all right?” Icy wind whipped around me, but it wasn’t as chilling as my mother’s words.

“Bronte’s been in a car accident.”

Chapter 15

“I’m on my way.” My mind turned to white-hot panic. “Nate, we’ve got to go!”
“What’s going on?”

I started running across the snow-covered ground. “My daughter’s been in a car accident.”

The crunch of footsteps sounded behind me, letting me know Nate was close on my heels. Tears stung my eyes and streamed down my cheeks, burning in the cold. A huge lump formed in my throat. As I barreled up the snowy bank to Nate’s Suburban, I could hardly breathe. Was Bronte badly hurt—or worse?

Once at the truck I reached for the handle. My fingers gripped the door but began to shake. Shivers wracked my body, not from the cold, but from having to relive another possible death. The same crippling emotions I experienced the night Jeff died swamped me. Shallow sobs huffed from me as I wrestled with the door handle. Not my baby. Anybody but my kids.

Nate’s strong hands gripped my shoulder and moved me away from the door. I fought against him. “I need to get to her.”

“I know.” He blocked me and opened the door. “I’ll drive you to the hospital.”

We stared at each other for a few seconds while my brain processed what he said. Finally, I nodded and crawled into the passenger seat, my body trembling.

Nate climbed into the driver’s seat. “Put on your seatbelt.” I glared at him. “The roads are slippery, Lisa. Bronte needs you safe. Buckle up.”

Somehow his terse words penetrated my panic. I yanked the strap around me and jammed it into the buckle. “Drive.”

He slammed the Suburban into gear. The vehicle fishtailed, but he easily maintained control. We drove in silence all the way back to Anchorage, allowing every imaginable scenario to pummel my mind. What would I find once we reached the hospital? All my mother had said was there had been a car accident and Bronte was involved. I hadn’t heard anything after that.

I wiped the sleeve of my jacket across my eyes. Pulling myself out of the grief after Jeff’s death had been hard enough. I wasn’t sure I’d be so lucky if Bronte was dead.

Dead, like the young man I’d just reaped. I closed my eyes and sent up a silent prayer. “Please, not my daughter.”

But what if she had been killed? Would the task to reap her fall to me? When Vella had asked if I would have wanted to help my husband pass when he died I'd said no. At the time I'd meant it. Now, facing that very situation, I knew I'd give anything to see and talk to Bronte one last time.

The miles flew by in a blur, but it seemed to take forever to get to the hospital. Finally, Nate pulled up to the emergency entrance. "Go on. I'll park and find you."

Not waiting for the Suburban to stop, I flung the door open and raced through the automatic doors, skidding to a stop in front of the reception desk. "I'm Lisa Carron. My daughter was brought in. She was in a car accident."

Maybe it was the panic in my voice, or the crazed mother-on-the-edge look on my face, but the woman snatched a visitor pass from the wall and came out of her office. "I'll escort you back. Here, put this on." She gave a single wave to the security guard in the booth directly across from her cubicle. "Lisa Carron."

He nodded.

The woman pressed a large round button on the wall. With agonizing slowness the double doors opened. I shifted my weight from foot to foot, barely able to control the urge to push past her. Not that I'd know where to go. I'd probably start shouting for Bronte, get arrested, or at the very least, medicated. So I waited.

The only person at the desk was a young, tall male nurse. He glanced up as we approached.

"Michael, this is Lisa Carron. Her daughter is one of the kids in the car accident." The receptionist turned and faced me. "He'll take care of you."

"Thank you," was all I could manage.

As she passed me, she placed a hand on my shoulder, sending a wave of warmth through my body. I glanced at her hand, and then to her face. She smiled and I recognized her as one of the gifted. Not a grim reaper, but perhaps a wannabe or even a guardian angel. I nodded and returned my attention to Michael.

"Is my daughter..." My voice cracked. "Is my daughter alive?"

He looked up from the chart. "Yes, a broken arm, but nothing worse."

Tension rushed from my muscles, deflating me like a balloon. At that same moment Nate arrived. I turned and buried my face in his jacket, and his arms went around me without hesitation. For once I was grateful for his solid chest and strength.

After another minute of sobbing into his coat, I sniffed and stepped away. "Are the other kids okay?"

I'd just assumed everybody in the car had cuts and bruises but nothing worse.

The nurse shook his head and lowered his voice. "The driver was dead on arrival."

His words hit me like a slap. "Oh my God." My hand flew to my mouth. "Who was it?"

Michael flipped through the pages on a clipboard. "Kelly Huff." He looked at me. "Her parents just arrived."

Nausea rolled through my body. I bent, bracing my hands on my knees and tried to get a breath. Nate rubbed my back, but didn't say anything. The anger over Bronte disobeying me was dwarfed by the fact that even though she'd narrowly escaped being killed, Kelly Huff had not. I stood and wrapped my arms around my torso. "Can I see my daughter, please?"

"Of course."

We followed Michael along the corridor, passing several curtained off rooms. We stopped half way down the hallway. Movement drew my attention toward the end. Three people exited a room. A knot formed in my throat when the woman turned to one of the men and buried her face in his coat. The other person, obviously a doctor from the way he was dressed, spoke softly and then left the two alone.

"Kelly's parents." My voice cracked.

I wanted to go to them, offer my condolences, but the action felt too intrusive. What could I possibly say? No parent should outlive their child—ever. And the fact that mine was still alive suddenly seemed unfair somehow.

Nate put his hand on my back and guided me into the room. At first I was resistant but then I saw Bronte lying in the bed, her face covered with bruises and cuts, her arm in a sling. I practically ran to her. She turned her head and looked at me, tears streaming down her face. At that moment, my only thought was of comforting her. I wrapped my arms around her and pulled her gently to me, careful not to hurt her.

She turned her face toward my neck. "I'm sorry, Mom."

"Me too, baby." I kissed the top of her head, letting my lips linger in her hair. "Me too."

"The doctor will be with you in a few minutes," Michael said, and slipped out of the room.

From the doorway Nate said, "I'll be right back."

I turned my head, still resting my cheek against Bronte's head. "Where are you going?"

"I need to check on a few things." He tugged the curtain closed, leaving Bronte and me alone.

It didn't take super-duper reaper intuition to know he'd gone to reap Kelly Huff. A chill ran up my spine, and I closed my eyes. Some days I really hated this job.

Though it took all my willpower, I unwound my arms from Bronte, and pulled the chair in the corner up to the side of the bed. I claimed her hand, needing to touch her. We sat in silence until her tears finally dried. Now that some of the shock had worn off, questions bubbled inside me, but I didn't ask them, not wanting to traumatize my daughter any more than she had been tonight.

After another few minutes she said, "I'm sorry I disobeyed you, Mom. I promise to never do it again."

A humorless laugh hiccupped from me. "If only that were true." I chanced a little parenting. "Why did you do it?"

She shrugged and winced. "It sounds lame, but Fang begged me to go. You may have noticed that me and my friends aren't actually that popular." She hesitated. "I knew Kelly was just using us to get to William, so I decided to use her to get into the in crowd.”

“I didn’t think you cared about popularity contests?” It seemed she wasn’t the only one learning a lesson tonight.

Since the day she was born, Bronte had had her own style. She never seemed to care about what was cool. At least I hadn’t thought so. I was wrong.

“I never did—don’t really, but Fang does. She said if I was a good friend I’d suffer through the night.”

“Even though I said no?”

Bronte nodded.

“Still, you made the decision. You have to take responsibility for that.”

“I know, and I won’t argue with whatever punishment you give me.” She let her head fall back and rest against her pillow. “Maybe you could ground me for a year so I don’t have to see anybody.”

“A whole year? Don’t you think we’ve already had a year of punishment?”

Her gaze captured mine. Tears puddled, magnifying her blue eyes. “All I could think about was what you were going to do when you heard I’d been in a car accident. You know, after Dad and all.”

I swallowed hard. “I won’t lie, Bronte, that was one of the worst moments of my life.” A single tear spilled down her cheek, but I wiped it away with my thumb. “And hearing that you were alive was one of the best.”

“So what now?”

“We go on from here.” I leaned forward and swiped a matted chunk of hair from her face. “Live our lives. That’s the best we can do.”

Before she could reply the curtain whipped open. “Bronte.” My mother sailed into the room and threw herself at her granddaughter. “We thought you were dead.”

“Grandma, I can’t breathe,” Bronte’s muffled voice emanated from my mother’s armpit.

I looked at my dad. For the first time that I could remember, genuine emotion played across his face. His pale skin accentuated his wide-eyed stare, as if staring at a ghost. “Dad, you okay?”

His gaze slid to me. “Yeah.” His voice was raspy and I had the urge to get up and hug him, but I didn’t. If my dad started to cry, I would lose it completely.

“Where are the boys?”

“We left them with Vella,” my mother said. “She wants you to call her as soon as you get a chance.”

I’d have to do something nice for her. Not having to worry about the boys was worth two bottles of wine and several hours of listening to stories about her crazy family.

Seeing Nate lingering just outside the door, I stood and patted my mom’s back. “I’ll be right back.” On my way out I pulled the curtain closed again. “Well?” I whispered at Nate.

“Well what?”

I gripped his wrist and pulled him away from Bronte’s room. “Kelly Huff, did you reap her.”

“No.”

I let go of his arm. “Why not? I thought that’s where you went.”

He glanced down the hall, and then back to me. “I did but she wasn’t there.”

I narrowed my gaze. “What do you mean she wasn’t there?”

“Somebody reaped her already.”

“Are you sure?”

He sneered at me. “I think I know when there’s no soul.”

“Sorry. It’s just weird, is all.” I paced a few steps. “That is weird, right?”

“Weird but not impossible. Somebody might have been in the area. I don’t know.”

“Is there any way to find out who?”

Nate stared at me for a few seconds. “It doesn’t matter, Lisa. Kelly is gone. Job done.”

“But—”

“But nothing.” He took my hand and led me back to Bronte’s room. “You need to focus on your family right now. Not worry about who—,” his voice dropped to a whisper, “finished the job.”

I stopped at the entrance. Nate let go of my hand, but didn’t go into the room. He was right. Bronte needed me, but more than that, I needed her, and my boys. “Thanks for being there tonight. I don’t know what I would have done without you.”

His lips spread into a tight smile. “Don’t mention it, Carron. That’s what partners do for each other—right?”

Had he just called me his partner? Without coercion? Without threat of death? Not wanting to spoil our one, fragile moment with sarcasm, I nodded. “Yeah, they do.”

A slight blush crept across his cheeks. He shifted uncomfortably and then flicked his head toward the exit. “I’m gonna hit the road.” He shoved his hands in his front pockets. “This seems like a family affair.”

“Okay, thanks.”

He turned to leave but stopped. “Take a few days off. I’ll cover your assignments,” he said over his shoulder, not looking at me.

I didn’t reply and he didn’t seem to expect one. His step never slowing, he strode down the hall. I watched until he turned the corner. Who knew Nate Cramer, reaper extraordinaire, had a heart? I hadn’t, but it wasn’t a mistake I’d make again. And as far as Kelly Huff’s spirit, that was another issue. Maybe one day we’d discover who reaped her, but for now I wanted to forget about everything except taking care of my daughter.

It seemed death would be my constant companion from now on, and I could either be consumed by it or own it. I decided to own it. Suck it, Death! There’s a new reaper in town.

The End

Continue the Grim Reality Series in book two, Styx & Stoned

<https://boonebrux.com/grim-reality-series/>

Newsletter

<https://boonebrux.com/vip-club/>

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

I've been writing fulltime for five years, which isn't long for some, and a lifetime for others, but I've learned a couple of things about myself. I love to spoil my readers. I want them to get lost in my stories, even if it's only during their lunch break. And I want to make them laugh.

It might only be a little in one of my medieval fantasies, or a lot from my Grim Reality Series. I hope you become part of my family of readers, and I can help you forget your cares for a while and make you laugh.

Read More from Boone Brux

<https://boonebrux.com/books/>

SHADOWLING

(SHADOWLING CHRONICLES BOOK 1)

ERIC PADILLA

All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

SHADOWLING

Shadows attack...

Sixteen year-old Dani Prado is not fond of the dark. In fact, it terrifies her. So, when something crawls from the depths of the earth through the local mine to snatch people and pets from her small town at night, she follows the police chief's directives and stays in her house after the sun goes down each day.

But now her younger brother Bobby is counted among the missing and she fears the worst. The police won't help and the rest of the town is afraid to go looking for the captives, too. Wait, they tell her, until reinforcements come to help.

Unable to tolerate the thought of her brother in the clutches of some shadowy monster while she waits, she decides to go into the mine looking for him, joined by her mother and a few friends. She has to solve the mystery of the missing people, and bring them back. If she can. The darkness beckons and the shadowling awaits. Dani will need every bit of her skill, ingenuity, and courage to enter a world without light, find her brother, and return. Hopefully with her body and mind still intact.

Chapter 1

The creature, whatever it was, gained on me with every breath, with every one of my too-slow steps. I ran as hard as I could, but it would catch me. Soon.

The air burned as I tried to draw it from my surroundings. It was like fire in my throat, stinging my lungs and making my chest hurt. Why was the air so thick, and why could I not move faster? I pumped my arms, pushed my throbbing legs. Just a little faster.

A door appeared up ahead. It hadn't been there a second before. If I reached it, I could go through, close it, slow—even stop—the hunter right behind me. I lowered my head, leaning into the run, and pushed with all my might.

Stars flecked the edge of my vision, and the world seemed to twist. Somewhere deep within my mind, a little voice told me I was about to pass out from lack of oxygen, that I was done for. It had been a good try, but the door was too far, I was too slow, my body not up to the challenge.

I stomped on the voice in my head, silencing it. I gasped to take in one more bite of the precious air that seemed thick as taffy and threw myself into my simple task: get to the door.

And there it was, right in front of me, one step away. I reached out, tears streaming from my eyes. I didn't know if they were from the pain, from fear, or simply from the rush of air across my face as I ran.

My hand closed around the knob. Do not look back. Go through the door. Close it. Then I'll be safe. The thing chasing me surely couldn't get through a door, right? Everyone knows monsters can't get through doors.

I felt movement behind me, a brush of air on the back of my neck. So close. There were no footsteps, no sound, just a change in the pressure on my skin as it pebbled with goose bumps. I rotated my hand to open the door.

The knob wouldn't move.

Someone shrieked, and I realized it was my own voice, stuttering and strained as I used some of the precious air I had left to scream my defiance and fear. I put my other hand on top of the one already on the knob. With a mighty push, I turned the knob and the door opened away from me. Not locked, just stuck.

I hurled my body through the opening, expecting at any moment to be torn to shreds from behind.

As I cleared the portal, I turned and slammed the door. The latch clicked.

Safe.

I breathed in and out rapidly, trying to keep from hyperventilating as I leaned against the door. I was secure. Whatever chased me couldn't get me in here. All I needed to do was...

I saw then that the door had no lock. My heart, already trying to beat its way from my chest, seemed to double its rate. No lock? Why would the door have no lock?

Looking frantically around, I saw nothing to help me. In fact, I saw nothing at all. I saw no walls, no furniture, nothing. Only the door floating in darkness. Where was I? Should I leave the door and run, or should I stay and hold it closed? The predator was faster than me. What would give me the best chance to survive?

Again, I sensed movement. The door swung open, not toward me, but away from me. It had opened the other way a moment before, but the knob pulled from my grasp, and there was empty space where solid wood had been. A blackness, darker even than the night around me, rushed in, and I felt myself falling toward the ground, a peculiar sensation coursing through me. Maybe it was what you felt when you died.

I jerked upright off my pillow with a strangled cry. Sweat covered me and I felt as if I had been breathing hard for an hour, like I'd been running for my life.

A dream, then. I slowed my breathing, gulped to wet my dry throat. My heart was still beating so rapidly, it almost hurt. Like it did when we had to do sprints in track. I swiped away some hair that was plastered to the side of my face. It had been a long time since I'd had a nightmare that real. I thought I was really in danger, really there, though thinking back I recognized some signs that it was a dream. But that's the way it worked, right? Your mind folded all the little inconsistencies and impossibilities into what you were seeing and it all seemed to fit, somehow. Well, I was awake, so it was over.

I picked up my phone. Two-thirty in the morning. Ugh. Four and a half hours until I needed to get up for school.

I pulled off the covers twisted all around me and swung my legs off the bed. My soft footfalls on the carpet of my room sounded almost loud in the quiet house. Ten steps to the bathroom and I was squinting through the light I flipped on.

The girl in the mirror looked like she had been wrestling. In the heat. With a skilled opponent. Basically, she looked like she'd been beaten up. Her long chestnut hair was a tangled, frizzy mess. I should have put it up before going to sleep, but I had been so tired when I went to bed. Brown eyes peeked out from under the mass of locks, squinting slightly to focus. I didn't like her oval face much, but I guess it could be worse. At least I wasn't covered in zits.

Sighing, I splashed some water on my face, dabbed it dry with the towel, and flipped off the light. After stumbling across the room—my mom would have a fit if she saw the clothes I'd tossed on the floor—I hopped back into bed, pulled the covers over me, shivered once, and wiggled around until I was comfortable. I had four and a half hours of sleep coming to me, and no stupid nightmare was going to keep me from it.

Chapter 2

When I finally dragged myself out of bed, after hitting the snooze more times than I could count, I gradually got ready for school. Jeans, the first pair of flats I pulled from the closet, and a tee shirt that read What You Looking At?, and I was about as presentable as could be expected. I sighed. It was only Wednesday. Not even halfway through the week yet.

I lived close enough to walk to school. Good thing, too, since I didn't have a car like some of the kids my age did. At sixteen, I had my driving permit, but my mother didn't let me practice driving much. She had a little trouble handling me at the wheel. She was many things, but a calm passenger for a teenage driver was not one of them. Whatever. I wasn't in a great hurry to start driving. Where did I need to go?

She had dragged us from our home in Tucson to Lode, a much smaller town. She always claimed the job was a good opportunity, and more money than the job she had been doing, but I didn't buy it. I think, like me, she wasn't able to handle all the reminders of my father. Since he died in the car accident, many things had changed. So many things.

As I made my way out of my house and down my street, I tried to focus on the sunshine and the other kids walking. But the sun didn't seem to be as bright as it had been before the move, before the accident, and the kids seemed to be merely shadows of people I would never know.

"Danica Prado," a voice said.

I turned to see its source padding up to me. I knew who it had to be. Only one person teased me with my full name like that.

"Hey, Sam," I said.

Samantha Yin, my best friend, stood about an inch shorter than my five feet, six inches. Her long black hair fell to the middle of her slender back. Her mom and dad were from China, but she was born here in Arizona. Her eyes had a squashed egg shape, tapering at the edges. They were brown, though when I looked closely at them, I saw a hint of red around the iris. Not red like she was tired, but lines of it through the mocha coloring. I only knew this because she made me stare into her eyes a few months before because she thought something had gotten into them. I wasn't big on eye contact. She was so pretty, sometimes I was jealous of her. It didn't last long, though. I loved her like a sister.

"Another Wednesday, huh, Dani?" she said, falling into step next to me. She only lived a couple of blocks from me, and we normally timed it so that we walked to school together.

“Yeah.”

She looked at me, studying my face and peering into my eyes. “Are you all right?”

“I’m fine. I didn’t sleep well last night. I’m pretty tired.”

“Oh. Not the best way to be with more than half a week left.”

“Tell me about it,” I said. “I’ll have to try to catch up on my sleep in math class.”

She laughed. “Yeah, right.”

We continued walking, me too tired to really say anything and her too polite to try to draw me out. I finally relented.

“Did you see Jacob Benton yesterday at the water polo match?” I asked her.

“Yeah,” she said, hugging herself. “Do you think I go to those things just to watch you play? Please.”

“My God, he’s gorgeous,” I said, thinking of him and his body.

Jacob was the captain of the water polo team at school, the best wrestler we had, and the captain of the baseball team. He was tall, dark-haired, muscular, and so handsome I couldn’t look at him without feeling like I’d held my breath for too long.

Of course, he also had a girlfriend, one of the most popular girls in school: Madison Cairsen.

We made it to the school and began heading up the sidewalk toward the courtyard when I ran into the back of Sam while I was looking toward a group of kids laughing loudly. She had stopped abruptly.

“Hey,” I said. “What’s the big idea? Don’t stop on a dime like that. What are—”

She had reached back and was groping around for me while keeping her eyes straight ahead. When her hand found my face, she used her grip on my chin to swivel my head around to our left and about twenty feet ahead.

It was Jacob Benton.

The sunlight shone on him like he was some sort of angel. Seriously, there was a break in the morning clouds that sort of spotlighted him just as I caught sight of him. It made me think about all that symbolism stuff we’d been studying in Lit class. We both turned toward the bench to the right of the sidewalk and pretended we had dropped something. I watched him out of the corner of my eye.

Tall, ripped, and so, so hot, he was everything I liked in a guy. His short brown hair, almost as dark as my own, always had that “controlled mess” look. Those dark eyes flicked toward where Sam and I were standing and I stopped trying to watch him for a moment, until I checked back and saw him looking away. I wasn’t able to breathe again until he had passed by and gone around the admin building.

He was with his girlfriend, of course, a fact that effectively killed the fantasies running through my head. What did he see in that girl? What could he possibly find attractive about a beautiful, blonde, blue-eyed captain of the cheerleading squad? Who also happened to be as rich as his family? I sighed.

How did I get stuck in a Hollywood movie about the prom king and queen and the awkward girl?

“I hate her,” Sam said.

She crushed on Jacob, too, but would never admit it. Her disgust with all that was Madison was mainly on my behalf. She was my best friend, after all.

I nodded as we walked on toward our first class.

Sam and I were early to class, as normal. I liked to be on time, unlike my mother. Whenever I had to be somewhere and she was involved, I knew I was going to be late. We just didn’t see eye-to-eye on that subject. I got my punctuality from my dad, I think.

We sat and watched as the other students filed into the classroom, moving faster as the sounding of the bell drew nearer. When it sounded, the kids who had not yet made it to their seats ran the last few steps. Well, most of them did. Some were too cool to hurry.

Mr. Reynolds was in front, going through some papers. He was tall and lanky, with black hair showing a few patches of gray. His thin face would probably never be called good-looking, but when he smiled—which he did a lot—it made everyone within range feel better. I know; I had asked Sam and others who had his class.

One of the best things about Mr. Reynolds was his passion for the subject he taught. He enjoyed English in general, but his excitement really shone through in his literature classes, like the one I was sitting in. Medieval Literature.

“Okay, everyone,” he said. “Okay, settle down.”

The kids who had been gabbing with their friends trailed off and turned toward Mr. Reynolds.

“Yesterday, we were talking about Inferno. I am assuming all of you did the reading for last night.” He scanned the room, obviously looking for those students who could not meet his eye. There were several. I laughed inside, but calmly met his gaze and kept my face neutral on the outside. As his eyes met mine, he nodded. He knew I would have read the assigned pages.

Samantha looked over at me and smiled. She would have completed her homework, too, probably gone beyond the assignment. She was a perfect student, and her grades reflected that. Since I met her, I had never seen her get anything other than an A on any assignment or test. She was a beast when it came to schoolwork.

“Dante Alighieri, as with many artists of his time, infused his work with religious themes,” Mr. Reynolds said. “But although his work, the Divine Comedy, of which Inferno is the first volume, described in great detail the inner workings of hell, its value is really in how the story is a metaphor for the political climate at the time, and in a broader sense, life itself.”

I wondered at how my teacher had even gotten approval to put this book in the curriculum. People seemed to freak out when religion was concerned, especially at school. I chalked it up to Lode being a small town. I was glad he did get approval, though. The story was fascinating in itself, but I could really sink my teeth into analyzing the allegory.

Yeah, I was one of those: kids who are way too academic for their own good. I hadn’t ever really been a geek or nerd or anything before. But when I moved to Lode, I had no friends and looked forward to homework so I would have something to do. As I focused on my assignments, I became more interested in what I was learning and did well in my classes. As I did well, it became even more interesting. By the time I had accumulated a few friends—all good students because that’s what we had in common—my path was set as one of the “smart kids.” I didn’t feel any different than I had before, but now I had a label I never thought would apply to me.

Anyway, I had a kind of morbid fascination for this assignment, like people do for a big car accident. The darkness and depressive nature of the poem sort of gave me chills, but I liked it. A little bit.

“...and symbolism can be seen throughout the account,” Mr. Reynolds went on. “Everything from the use of mythological people and beasts to taking accounts directly from the Bible itself gives us a deeper picture of the world at that time, as well as the enduring humans search for perfection.”

The class continued, and as it did, I thought about the story. I actually looked forward to reading more of it. I had friends, but I’d made a habit of doing well in school and would keep it up. Besides, I was curious to see how Dante fared as he traveled deeper into hell. I wondered if his account could compare to the hell I lived every day.

Chapter 3

At lunch, I met up with the rest of the crew.

“Hey,” Zachary Pinse said, as he hopped over the back of the bench I was sitting on, landing to sit next to me. “Your favorite guy in the world is here!”

I leaned forward and craned my neck so I could look around him. “Funny, I can’t see him. You’re probably in the way.”

He laughed as he high-fived me, his always-smiling face breaking out into an even bigger grin. He didn’t have a chance to respond, though.

“Who ever heard of doing maths first thing in the morning?” Emily Hartford said in her English accent. “I really think it should be outlawed. What a horrid way to start the day.” Her freckled face was flushed—either from her rant or from rushing to get to our normal lunch spot from the other side of campus—and her long brown hair swung as she took a seat on the other side of me.

“It’s too bad you couldn’t get lit class with Sam and me,” I said. “It’s actually pretty interesting.”

Emily looked around. “Where is Sam?”

“She had to go to the gym to talk to Mr. Farrel really quickly before lunch. She’ll be here in—” I cut off as she appeared.

“Are we ready then?” Emily said. “I’m famished.”

“You could have started eating without me,” Sam said, her face a little pink also, no doubt from walking so quickly. Or maybe embarrassment. I wasn’t sure.

“That wouldn’t have been very polite, would it, now?” Emily said.

“How long have you been in the States again?” Sam asked. “We’re not big on etiquette here, you know.”

“Yes, well, old habits die hard.”

Emily had moved from England a couple of years earlier and still occasionally had difficulties with how things were done here. She was very polite, in stark contrast to most of the kids our age here in Lode.

We all usually brought our lunches rather than to go to the cafeteria. In a pinch, we could always use the vending machines, but nine times out of ten, we brought something. I unpacked my lunch, a plain peanut butter and jelly sandwich—hey, it’s a classic—some Cheetos, and an iced tea. So, I’m not the most imaginative person in the world. Or the healthiest.

“My dad says there’s something going on at the mines,” Zach said, trying to speak through a mouth full of some kind of sandwich. It smelled like tuna fish. I swore that if he spit any chewed up sandwich on me, I’d crack his head for him.

Zach’s dad was a shift lead at the mine. Almost everyone in town had something to do with that hole in the ground. It was the whole reason the town was created to begin with. With a name like Lode, you’d have to figure that would be the case.

“Really?” Emily said, eyebrows raising and back straightening so she sat a little taller. “What kind of thing?”

Zach swallowed—without spitting any of his lunch on me, I might add—and looked at her. His eyes had grown a little larger when she had sat up straighter. Emily typically wore clothes that understated her figure, but sometimes I got glimpses of how good her body was, like now. I think Zach noticed, too. At times, I resented her for it, but like with Sam, the thought left my head quickly. I really shouldn’t compare myself to my friends.

“I don’t really know,” Zach said. “He said something about breaking through to some other cavern or mine or something. It happened toward the end of his shift. I’ll ask him about it later. Maybe he has more information now.”

“Breaking into another cavern?” I asked. “How does that happen? I thought they did all kinds of techy x-ray stuff to make sure they didn’t accidentally tap into an underground river or something like that.”

“Dunno,” he said, taking another bite of his lunch. “I’ll ask my dad.”

“You know, Zachary,” Sam said, “I don’t understand why you said anything at all, if you don’t know any details. Do you just speak so you can hear yourself?”

“Shumtimes.” He really had a mouthful this time. I scooted a little further from him so I wouldn’t have to slap him.

I dragged myself home at the end of the day, feeling drained from the lack of sleep the night before. I came through the living room without saying a word to Bobby, my brother, and went straight to my room. My backpack I unceremoniously dropped on the floor as I collapsed onto my bed. I just wanted to sleep.

“Hey, Dani,” he said from my doorway. He had followed me to my room. “What’s up?”

I tilted my head to look at him. “You need a haircut.” He did. His hair was a bushy mess. The length wasn’t really the problem, though. The fact that he never combed it was. His brown eyes twinkled and he got that goofy grin he wore so often, his mis-sized teeth reflecting the sunlight coming through my window.

“Rough day, huh?” he asked as he plopped into the chair at my desk.

“I’m just tired.”

“I heard you moving around a lot last night, like you were dreaming,” he said. “Either that or wrestling with someone. You didn't have anyone in here with you, did you?"

I threw my pillow at his head and he laughed.

"Maybe if you started training again, competing, you'd be tired and sleep all night without waking up," he mused as he ran his hand over one of the trophies standing next to my desk.

It was a tall thing, over three feet high. The little girl at the top—she had a pony tail and everything—was on one leg kicking at something higher than her head. The plate on the trophy read: "First Place, Sparring—Girls 14-15."

I laughed. "Yeah, maybe. But I'm not going to compete again. I'm done with that."

I had studied karate for years and started doing tournaments when I was twelve. I enjoyed it and my father liked watching me. It became something the two of us could share. I actually got pretty good, winning the state championship for my age group two years in a row. That was before he died, though. I hadn't competed since the accident, hadn't even really trained.

My sensei encouraged me to continue training, saying that it would help me deal with my loss, but I just couldn't do it. Since we moved, there was less pressure to train. From everyone except my brother. Bobby was proud of my accomplishments and wanted to see me fight again.

"But you're so good, Dani," he pleaded, "and I know you like it. Why don't you try it again?"

"No, Bobby," I said with a sigh. "Please don't pester me about this now. It's just...it's just too soon to be talking about this. Please?"

He backed off, for which I was grateful. After he wandered back toward the TV, I lay back on my bed and closed my eyes.

It had been dark, like being underground kind of dark, that night. The rain and storm clouds obscured anything in the sky. The moon, the stars, airplane lights high above, all of it. Worse, the power had gone out for some reason, probably someone sliding off the road in the rain and hitting a power pole. We had been moving around the house by candlelight and headlamp for a few hours. I'd played some games on my laptop for a little while but settled down to sitting and waiting for my dad to come home. He was still out in it, probably on his way back from his work at the medical research company.

I spent most of the time in my room. Bobby and my mother were in the living room. For the short time I was down there with them, I watched their interaction. Mom sat rigid on the edge of the couch, her phone on the table in front of her. She was telling him about a time when she was a child and the power had gone out for a full day. As she spoke, she glanced often at the phone, as if expecting something. Her speech was jerky, halting, like her mind was somewhere else. I don't think Bobby noticed.

He was curled into a ball on the other couch, watching my mother and listening without making a sound. Every time lightning flashed, he twitched, and when the thunder came almost immediately after, he jumped a little. While Mom darted her eyes back and forth from him to the phone, he shifted his from her to the battery-powered camping lantern on the table. I'd always suspected he was afraid of the dark, but that confirmed it in my mind.

I left them to their own ways of coping and went back to my room. I'd just wait there patiently until he got home. I'm not sure how long I lay there on my bed waiting before I fell asleep.

The boom of a thunderclap shook me awake. It rattled my window and vibrated my skull. It scared me, my disoriented mind trying to grasp what was happening. Where was I? What day was it? What was going on? An irrational fear gripped me, and I started shaking. A voice from the other room pierced the wall of my room.

"What? No, oh no!" It was my mother. She sounded frantic.

The sense of foreboding I had felt, magnified by the manner in which I woke, doubled and then doubled again. I rolled from my bed onto my feet, tripped over a sweater I had dropped to the floor earlier, and almost pitched headfirst into the wall. I caught myself, stood upright, and took a breath. Why was my heart beating so fast?

I rubbed my eyes and tried to shake off the grogginess. By the time I got to the living room, my mother had ended the call and was staring at her phone, her eyes strangely unfocused.

"Mom," I said. "Is something wrong?"

Lightning threw strange shadows across her face. The thunder almost immediately after made me jump. Bobby moaned and curled up on himself. My mother didn't move.

"It's...it's your father," she said, continuing to stare at her phone. "There's been an accident."

Chapter 4

The news really didn't affect me at first. I think maybe I was in shock, because it didn't seem real. That wore off.

They never did let me see my dad's...body. They said he had lost control of the car in the storm and slid off a cliff. I saw a picture of the car once, what was left of it. It made me think maybe they were right not to let anyone see his condition. No one except my mother, that is. She insisted on identifying him, though they had already determined who he was. Dental records or something. I had to stay with my aunt for a week until my mother was speaking again after that.

Bobby and I were both a mess, but I think he recuperated faster. I don't know, maybe since he was younger, a given amount of time was longer to him. All I know is that I felt the effects of what happened long after we moved. The scariest part was the things I couldn't think about and identify, the "subconscious effects of the trauma," as the psychologist I had to see called it.

I think my mom was probably worse than me. She would go through her day, carry on as if things were ordinary, but each night I could hear her trying to hide her sobbing. Though to anyone who knew her casually she seemed normal, she didn't laugh and joke around like she did before.

About six months after the accident, Mom had an opportunity to take another job with the company she worked for, The Great Southwestern Mining Company. It was an office manager position at a small satellite office fifty or sixty miles away.

"I want to talk to you about something," she said to me and Bobby. We sat on the couch in the living room watching her. She wrung her hands and tapped her fingers on the coffee table. Her eyes darted from Bobby to me and then back again.

"What is it?" I asked.

"I have an opportunity for a promotion," she said. "From clerk to Office Manager."

"That's great, mom," I said.

Bobby sat there tossing the racquetball he sometimes carried around.

"It...will mean that we have to move."

"Move?" Bobby's head raised at that, and he missed catching his ball. "How far? Will I still be in the same school, with my same friends?"

"No," Mom said. "It's about an hour away."

“Mom!” he said. “We can’t—”

“Bobby!” I interrupted. “Be quiet for a minute.” Turning to face my mother, her eyes liquid, I said softly to her, “It’s hard to be here for you, huh?”

That was all it took for the tears to flow. Her face didn’t change much, just a tightening of her jaw as she clenched it, but liquid streamed from her eyes.

“Everything here reminds me of your father,” she said. “Every time I turn around, there is a memory of the two of us, or of all four of us. Sometimes I feel like I’m going to explode or go insane. It’s been six months, but it seems to get worse every day. I don’t know if I can handle it.” She wiped at her eyes and sniffled. “Plus, we need the money. It’s a good opportunity.”

We discussed it, but I knew from the start it was something we had to do. I had memories, too, and the ghosts of what had been assaulted me also. Bobby wasn’t happy about it, but he finally, grudgingly, agreed. He hadn’t needed to. My mother had looked at me most of the time, gauging my reaction. She knew I would support her. Besides, I would have made the same decision if it was up to me.

So we moved. To Lode, a small town of maybe eight thousand people. It was a mining town, built when a prospector found a small cave and thought it might contain gold. It didn’t. There was copper, though, so The Great Southwestern Mining Company bought the land and mineral rights and started mining. The town grew up around it.

Things were still rough for us. There was still a hole in our lives, but time dulled the edges on the blade that seemed constantly pressed to my heart, and life became less torturous. Mom and Bobby seemed to snap right back into a routine, living life and not moping. I couldn’t. Did they still think of my father? Did it still feel like a piece of them was missing? Or was it just me?

I didn’t want to think about it. Not right now.

My backpack stared at me accusingly. I sighed and picked it up. Mr. Reynolds had assigned homework, as had my other teachers, and it wasn’t going to do itself. After a moment of digging around in the largest compartment of the backpack, I pulled out the copy of Dante’s Inferno. Just the thing to suit my mood, a dark account of traveling through hell.

My teacher had said there were many translations of Inferno out there. The one he chose for us to read didn’t focus on trying to make the words rhyme but instead tried to be as accurate as possible, capturing the feeling of the original work in Italian. It lost the sense of meter, of being like a song, but the “prose still produced the important imagery.” That’s what Mr. Reynolds said. After reading some of it, I agreed with him.

I sat at my desk with a small desk lamp shining its beam onto the pages. As I read, I could picture the darkness, the caverns through which Dante traveled. I smelled the damp stone and the pervasive, pungent scent of sulfur in the air. I could almost hear the sounds as I went through the account, first of the great river Dante had to cross, then the storm, and the wailing, and...

“Hey!” a voice said, much too loud in the quiet room.

I nearly jumped completely out of my chair, book flying. My shoulder hit the desk lamp as I leaped, and it tottered before settling back down on the flat surface of my desk. Bobby stood in my darkened doorway. When had it gotten dark? I shivered, the memory of what I had read fresh in my mind.

“God, Bobby,” I said. “You scared me to death. What’s wrong with you?”

My brother eyed me as if he was searching for something. “Why are you so jumpy? Mom called you a couple of times. Dinner’s ready.”

“Oh,” I said “Okay.” I picked the book up from where it had landed on the floor and set it on my desk. “I guess I was engrossed in my reading. I’ll be there in a minute.”

He smirked at me, and I half expected him to say “boo,” but he just nodded and turned to leave. Why was I so jumpy? I turned on the other two lights in my room and scanned the corners for anything lurking in the previously shadowy spaces now flooded with light. There was nothing, of course, but a shiver raced up my back. I took a breath, looked around one more time, and left my room. Despite my mother’s constant nagging not to leave lights on when not in use, I didn’t shut them off as I went to eat dinner.

The next day found me sitting with my friends in the big auditorium at school. They called it an auditorium, anyway. It was really just the gym with all the bleachers pulled out. The Principal had announced an emergency assembly just a few minutes before we all started piling into the gym.

“Thank you for coming so quickly,” Ms. Tonner, our principal, said. “We know it is an abnormal situation, but the staff felt it necessary.” She scanned the entire room, nodded, and continued. “Some strange things have happened in and around the mine. There was apparently some sort of explosion or collapse. Some of the miners are still unaccounted for.”

Many in the audience started whispering. It was no wonder. Most of the kids had parents who worked for the mine company. Ms. Tonner raised her hands and waited for the buzz of whispered voices to soften.

“We will update you as we get more information. There have also been...reports of some sort of animal loose, possibly from the caverns adjacent to the mine. We don’t have a lot of information yet, but the Mayor’s office is highly recommending that no one be outside their homes after dark. It appears that this animal is nocturnal and dangerous. Pets and a few people have been reported missing. It may be a coincidence, but best to be safe.

“This same announcement is being made on the local TV stations, radio stations, and at places of employment. If your parents are not aware of it, please share the information with them when you get home from school this afternoon. Remember, be in your homes after dark until the authorities have determined if there is any danger and have taken steps to remedy it if there is. You may return to your classes now. Thank you.”

I stumbled back toward my class, my friends around me. I heard them talking, but their voices echoed strangely, almost like we were all in a big steel tank half filled with water, the sounds bouncing from the walls a few times and then dying suddenly.

“This is the thing my dad mentioned,” Zach said.

“What do you think it is?” Sam asked.

“Maybe it’s a bear,” Emily offered.

Their words meant nothing to me. An animal from underground, coming out only at night? I pictured the formless thing that came for me in my dreams, hunting me, constantly chasing. I shivered, though I could feel the desert sun hot on my skin.

“Dani?” Sam said. “Dani, are you all right?”

Something pressed onto my shoulder. A hand, shaking me gently.

“All right, Dani?” Emily said.

I blinked a couple of times and shook my head, turning toward them. Both girls and Zach had concerned looks on their faces. Sam’s eyes were locked on mine, hers intense. I dropped my gaze to watch her mouth as she spoke.

“Oh, sorry,” I said, trying to act nonchalant. “I’m really tired. I must have zoned out there for a minute.”

“That look on your face was not zoning out,” Sam said. “It...it looked like you were afraid. Are you okay?”

“Sure,” I lied. “Maybe I did have a scary thought or two. Aren’t you scared of a bear that is too smart to be caught and strong enough to take pets and even people? It’s like some kind of horror movie.”

“I’m sure they’ll sort it all out,” Emily said. “We need to stay in the house when it’s dark, like Ms. Tonner said, and we’ll be fine. They’ll find it and capture it and pretty soon we’ll be going to the zoo to see what it looks like.”

“Yeah,” I said. “Probably.” An uncomfortable feeling, a sort of burning nausea, formed in my belly. I doubted it would happen that way at all.

Chapter 5

Over the next week, there were more reports of strange things happening in conjunction with the mine. And in the dark. It didn't look like it was some escaped animal.

Sam and I were watching TV at my house after school. After that irritating sound they play when there's a natural disaster or something, a special announcement came on. The picture resolved into the police chief, Charlie Fretz.

"There have been troubling reports throughout the city," he said. He was an older man, a little heavy, and the head underneath his uniform cap was bald. He was dressed up in the formal uniform he wore when officiating at public functions, dark blue with shiny buttons and a glimmering badge on his chest. "More pets have disappeared, and several people have been reported missing as well.

"Earlier today, an entire shift of mine workers disappeared. As I'm speaking to you, the private security firm the mine uses to guard the facility is mounting an investigation, going into the caverns to determine what the problem is. I don't think I need to tell anyone in Lode that mines are dangerous. They are taking precautions against mine gas or other hazards and using the utmost care.

"I will be providing updates as information becomes available. For now, the mayor has decreed that no one should be outside after the sun goes down. My officers will be patrolling to assist anyone who is stranded after dark. That is all for now."

I turned to Sam. "What do you think of that?"

"I think the chief almost looks professional in his uniform. He's normally in plain clothes."

"Small town," I said. "What ya gonna do? But I meant about what he said, silly."

"I know. Just trying to lighten the mood. It's crazy. No bear could be doing this. A whole shift of mine workers? Maybe it's terrorists or something."

"Right," I said. "Terrorists would target a town of eight thousand people. And to start, they snatch pets and a few random citizens. Sounds logical to me."

"Okay, okay," she said, putting her hands up in surrender. "It's a little scary, isn't it? I mean, it sounds like a horror movie. Some kind of creatures from outer space or something came and are taking over the town a few people at a time. Why aren't the police doing anything about it?"

I look at her, incredulous. "Our police? We have four cops and a chief. What do you think they could do against someone or something that took out a whole shift of miners?"

“We don’t know what happened with the miners. There could have been a collapse or something. It could be coincidence.”

“Yeah, I guess.”

“Anyway,” Sam said, “I think I’m going to head home before it gets dark. I don’t want to be hassled by one of Lode’s four cops because I’m walking down the street.”

“Good idea. I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Yep,” she said, heading out the door. “See you later.”

I sat there on the couch, not paying attention to the TV though I was staring blankly right at it, wondering what could cause the problems we were having. I looked around, ice traveling up my back for some reason, like when you feel like someone is watching you. Whatever it was, the mine security or our police would figure it out. I’d just have to stay inside when it was dark in the meantime. That would be no problem. I didn’t like to be outside when it was dark. Where was I going to go, anyway?

Bobby came home an hour later. He was hanging out at his friend’s house, two doors down. My mother came through the door just after he did.

“Did you hear there was some kind of trouble at the mine?” she asked us as she went to the kitchen to start dinner.

I took a good look at her. She was not as tall as me—something that really bothered her—but I didn’t think being short was a big deal for a woman. Her hair was the color of mine, dark brown, though she liked to put highlights in it to make it look lighter. It wasn’t quite as long as mine, either, only going down a couple inches past her shoulders. I thought she was pretty, but others seemed to think she was gorgeous. Men hit on her everywhere we went. It was sickening. They liked her shape, too. I could see them scanning her body, which would probably be considered curvy rather than athletic. A smaller, curvy, Hispanic woman. The guys ate it up. I wondered how it would feel to be the center of attention like that all the time.

“I saw something about it on the TV,” I said.

“What happened?” Bobby asked. My mom told him basically the same thing the chief said in his announcement.

“Cool,” he said. “Do you think it’s some kind of monster? Maybe it’s been sleeping for a thousand years and they woke it up with all the mining noise, and now it’s hungry. Hungry for human flesh.”

I whacked him on top of the head. “What is wrong with you?”

He tilted his head and eyed me as he rubbed his scalp. “You don’t know. It could be. Or it could be aliens from outer space coming to steal bodies or something.”

“Enough, Bobby,” my mom said. “This is serious. I know all those miners. They could be trapped down there. All radio contact was cut off. Everything went silent. Even the remote cameras went out.”

Now, that part wasn’t mentioned by the police chief.

We ate the lasagna my mom made for us. We sat around the table in the kitchen but, as always, the TV was still on in the living room. When the emergency sound came over the speaker again, we all looked at each other. There was a moment's pause and then all three of us got up and scrambled to the living room.

Chief Fretz's face took up the screen again. He looked like he was sweating.

"I...there have been more developments with the case of the missing miners. As I mentioned in my earlier announcement, the private security firm used by the mine sent in a group of their personnel to investigate the situation. Safety specialists, members of the mine's emergency response team, went with them. Altogether, fourteen people went in: two safety specialists and twelve armed security guards." The chief swallowed hard. "We have, um, lost contact with them. As before, the radios, ah, they went silent and the body cameras failed to show anything conclusive.

"The mayor's office and the police department are working to determine what is happening. Until we have resolved the issue, we cannot stress enough that no one should be outside after dark until further notice. We have contacted the county seat and are trying to get aid from those who specialize in...uh, this type of situation. That is all for now."

The screen abruptly went back to the show that had been playing before the announcement.

I looked to my mother. I couldn't really place her expression. Was it fear or just general concern? Her mouth was set in a tight line but her eyes held a kind of wild look, wider than normal and darting from me to Bobby.

"Mom," I said. "Are you all right?"

She shook her head and met my eyes. They seemed a little more normal than they did a moment ago. "Yes. Yes, I'm fine. Why don't you two clean up the dishes? Have you done your homework already?"

The rest of the evening was like any other day, except that my mom and Bobby stared out the window to the darkness every once in a while. To be honest, I did so myself. What was out there, and would it stay in the mines? I also wondered what the other members of my family thought, my mother with her concerned looks and Bobby with a more anxious, even excited, expression.

The next morning, Sam and I talked about it on the way to school. There had been no further word on the miners or the security detail. As we made our way through the quad, it became clear we weren't the only ones speculating.

"I heard they found the bodies. They were all headless and drained of blood," one voice said.

"I heard it was a cult that takes people and eats them alive," another said.

"It's a conspiracy," a third voice claimed. "It's some kind of plan to steal money from the town."

"No, no, no," yet another student claimed. "They're mutants who live underground. We got too close to their hive, and now they've developed a taste for human flesh. They'll take us all if they can."

I looked at Sam and raised an eyebrow. Honestly, where did people get these ideas? We arrived at our normal meeting place. Emily was there, talking softly with Zach. He had seen better days. As we approached, he lifted his head from his hands to look at us. His eyes were red and puffy and his lower lip quivered.

“Oh, no,” I said, realizing what it meant. “Was your dad on shift yesterday?”

His red-rimmed eyes filled with liquid again and he emitted a noise, a soft whimper.

“I’m sorry, Zach.” I stepped up behind him where he was sitting on the bench and hugged him.

“I’m sure they’ll find out what happened and find him safe and sound.”

“Yeah,” Sam said, seeming at a loss about what to do. “There has to be a logical explanation.”

“I was just telling him,” Emily said, “that my father explained to me the way the rock is structured around here.”

“That’s right,” Sam said. “He’s a geologist with the mining company. What did he say?” Her concern for Zach showed through. She hardly ever stated the obvious like that. We all knew what Em’s dad did.

“He said there are natural caves in the area, maybe the same cave system as the Colossal Cave thirty or so miles away, but maybe they’re still growing. The Colossal Cave is dry; the water source that carved it and made its features all dried up, but there may be other systems nearby. Maybe the miners broke into one of those.”

“That wouldn’t explain why all those people disappeared,” Zach said.

“Maybe,” Emily continued, “they came across something very valuable, a vein of gold or something. Maybe they’re busy trying to mine it or something.”

Zach looked at the English girl blankly. “Seriously? That’s the best you got? They found some gold and are being greedy and going AWOL so they can scoop it all up? Come on, Em. Give me some credit here.”

Emily’s pale skin flushed red. “Sorry. It’s all I could think of on such short notice,” she said, attempting a smile but not quite managing it. Instead she hugged Zach. “I’m sure he’s fine, whatever the reason.”

“Thanks, Em,” the boy said. “I’m sorry to snap at you. I’m sort of stressed about it.”

“Any other news?” I asked. “The last thing I heard was last night when the security team went missing.”

“That’s the last thing anyone knows,” Zach said, sniffing. “They seem to have stopped talking about it after last night’s awkward announcement by the chief.”

“We’ll probably have another assembly today,” Sam said. “They’re going to want to make sure no one is stupid enough to go trying to explore the mine.”

“Who would do that?” Emily asked.

Sam nodded toward the other end of the courtyard. A group of about ten kids were over there smoking, some of them pushing others or play fighting.

“Oh, right,” Emily said. “I could see them trying to prove how tough they were by taking on whatever is down there.” The rest of us nodded.

As expected, there was another assembly, and Ms. Tonner told us to take the curfew seriously and not make more trouble for the overworked police force.

During her speech, and afterwards, I scanned the faces of the other students. I saw everything from sadness—like with Zachary—to humor, to thoughtful concern. Some kids would see a joke in anything, but most of the faces I saw had serious expressions, eyes that showed worry or were just unfocused. Conversation was muted, as if people were afraid to speak openly about what was happening. I'd never seen anything like it.

“So,” Mr. Reynolds said in class the next day, “who has something to say about our reading in Inferno?” No one raised their hand. Did he really believe anyone would?

“Samantha?” he said, causing Sam to jump. “What are your thoughts? I know you’ve done the reading.”

“I...uh...well, Mr. Reynolds, with everything that’s going on right now, I find it difficult not to think of the mine situation when I read Inferno.”

“Really?” He settled his lanky frame on the front of his desk and stroked his chin. He tried for the rugged, unshaven look, but the facial hair he grew was spotty and mostly gray, peppered with darker hair. “What specifically are you thinking about?”

Sam was too smart and too competent to be thrown for long. “It seems to me that there are parallels. Dante traveled through hell, concentric rings within caverns in the earth. Each of them was reserved for specific types of sinners, the most serious crimes being in the center. It makes me wonder which circle of hell the things in the mines came from, and if there are worse things than what we have seen already.”

As she said it, I shivered. I had thought much the same thing, even though we didn’t talk about it. I looked over at her. She was looking confidently at Mr. Reynolds. How was she always so in control? Smart, pretty, always seeming to know what to say or do, she was fantastic. I smiled at my friend. She saw it and raised her eyebrows, then turned her eyes back to our teacher.

“I see,” Mr. Reynolds said. “I’m not sure if I would see it the same way, but your opinion is duly noted. Is there a specific thing in our reading that makes you think of our situation right now?”

“We’re barely halfway through his account,” Sam said, “but it’s like the ones who go into the mine are crossing Acheron, the river of the dead.” She looked around at the others in class, all of them paying attention for a change. “Anyone who has crossed over into the mine has not returned, as surely as if they crossed into the land of the dead.” She started, her eyes going wide as she looked around the classroom. “Not that I mean I think they’re dead or anything. I’m talking about symbolism.”

She darted her eyes over to a girl on the left side of the classroom, Raquel Nefferman. Her father was one of the miners on the same shift as Zach’s dad. Her eyes glimmered with unshed tears, as they had every time I had seen her that day. They met Sam’s, and Sam gritted her teeth and drew her lips back at her inadvertently painful statement. Raquel forced a smile at her and nodded. I could hear Sam release a breath. I’d never heard my friend say anything mean to anyone, even teasing; it just wasn’t in her. I was glad the other girl didn’t take offense.

Mr. Reynolds had watched the exchange and nodded. “Good, Samantha. I can see the depiction you’re pointing out there. Anyone else have any thoughts? How about on the specific punishments for the crimes the souls committed in life?”

The class dragged on. I don’t really remember what we talked about. I was thinking about what Sam said. What did happen to those people? Were they dead? I hoped the police cracked the mystery soon. It was hard enough thinking about Dante and his journey without worrying about other things in the dark trying to get me.

Saturday morning was usually a time for chores. Bobby and I pulled some weeds and mowed the lawn. We washed the windows and cleaned our rooms. Mom had been “letting” me do my own laundry lately, so I had that to do as well. By the time we finished, it was just after noon.

“Okay,” Mom said, “you can go.”

Bobby didn’t wait another second. He ran off toward his friend’s house; he and Timmy Snodgrass were inseparable. I just stood there.

“What, nothing exciting for you to do?” she asked.

“Nah. I’m kind of tired. I think I may just chill around the house.”

“Okay, suit yourself.” She started walking back into the house and stopped. “Dani, are you all right?”

“Sure. Why wouldn’t I be?”

“I don’t know. Just all this stuff about dangers in the dark. I know you leave the lights on all the time. Are you...is everything okay?”

“It is weird,” I said, scrambling for a way to change the subject. “I hope they figure out what’s going on soon. I don’t like thinking there is some kind of bogeyman out there in the dark waiting to snatch us up.” I laughed, but I didn’t think it was convincing.

“I know. Well, if you’re sure there’s nothing wrong?”

“I’m fine,” I said. “I think I’ll go lie down and listen to some music.”

I could feel her eyes on my back as I passed her and headed down the hall.

Chapter 6

“*B*obby!”

It was my mother’s voice. What time was it and why was she yelling? I looked at my phone. It was 7:06 AM. Ugh.

Footsteps padded quickly down the hall. My door opened.

“Dani,” she said, “where is your brother?”

“Wha?” I rubbed my eyes and blinked against the light coming from the hallway. “How should I know? He’s probably asleep.”

“He’s not in his room. You know he wouldn’t get up this early on a weekend.”

She was right about that. He normally slept until almost ten o’clock on the weekends. The situation finally hit me. Where was he?

“The last time I saw him,” I said, “was last night when I passed by his room to go to bed. He was still up, talking on his phone with one of his friends. I think it was a girl, by the way he was talking.”

My eyes adjusted, I got a good look at her. Her hair was a frizzy mess and her brown eyes were frantic. She turned her head toward his room and then back to me. “Get up. We need to go look for him.”

I didn’t argue. I’d seen her like this before. It was her mama bear look, and I knew better than to argue. I’d seen the results. It took me a few minutes to throw some clothes on and pull my hair, as frizzy as hers, through a scrunchy into a pony tail.

Mom wasn’t thinking straight, but I followed along faithfully as she went to Bobby’s best friend’s house a couple doors down. It was kind of early to be knocking on someone’s door, but that didn’t stop her. I wondered why she didn’t call them to ask if Bobby was over there, but like I said, I don’t think she was thinking clearly.

“Mom, did you call his phone?” I asked.

“Of course I called his phone. And texted him. There was no answer.”

The neighbors hadn’t seen him either, not since the afternoon of the day before. I racked my brain trying to figure out where he might be.

We searched for two hours, driving around town to places we thought he might be. We saw a few of his friends—they hadn’t seen him—but saw no sign of him.

“Where are you going now?” I asked as she set her jaw and started accelerating after leaving the last place we thought he might be, the local pizza joint.

“Police station,” she said.

Oh, of course. She was going to call in the aid of her boyfriend. Jesse Xander, one of the four cops in the city, was an okay guy. As close as I could tell, she had been dating him for about a year. Of course, she never referred to him as her boyfriend and never acknowledged that there was something between them. She always pretended he was just another of her friends. She had a lot of guy friends.

I never understood why she tried to hide it. It was totally obvious. Bobby and I laughed about it sometimes. I wasn’t sure if she was trying to save our feelings, thinking we couldn’t handle it after losing Dad, or if she was just embarrassed about being in a relationship with him. I couldn’t understand why she’d be with him if he embarrassed her. It didn’t matter. Maybe he could help.

“Jesse,” she said after we came through the door to the police station. “Bobby is missing. I need help.”

“Calm down, Allie,” he said, getting up from his desk. Her name was actually Alessa, but friends and family called her Allie. “Here, sit down.” He eyed me and nodded toward another chair. I sat in it. He was a tall man—Mom liked them tall. Maybe she thought he was good-looking, but to me he was pretty ugly. He was older than her, his head bald but his chin and lip sporting a mustache-goatee thing. I never figured out why she stuck with him. She always had guys hitting on her. I’d even had friends come over that mooned over her. I didn’t take after her in that respect. Guys didn’t find me fascinating like they all seemed to with her.

“I don’t know exactly when he disappeared,” Mom said, “but he was not in the house this morning when I got up.”

“Has it been twenty-four hours?” he asked. “You know we can’t do anything officially until it’s been that long.”

Mom looked at him, mouth open. Then she drew her lips into a tight line and narrowed her eyes at him. Uh-oh.

“You had better be joking with me, Jesse,” she said. I felt heat from her from where I was sitting a few feet away. If she hadn’t said something, I would have called him down for it. “What is this, some small town department on a TV show? No real police department has that requirement.”

Jesse swallowed and looked at his keyboard. “It’s policy here. I don’t make the rules.”

“I don’t care what your official policy is,” she said. “You need to help me find him.”

Jesse shot me a look. It said, How much can I disagree without seeming like we’re bickering lovers?

“Of course, Allie. I just mean I can’t do anything officially. I can help you personally.”

That cooled her a little. Her eyes no longer looked like they belonged to a cat that was about to eat a mouse. Now she looked at him like a cat eyeing a dog. “Okay, what do we do?”

Before he had a chance to answer, the door swung open and Mrs. Cairsen entered, her daughter Madison trailing.

“Oh, good,” she said. “There is someone here. You there, officer. My daughter is missing, and you must find her.”

Everyone in Lode knew the Cairsens. They had more money than everyone else in the town combined and expected everyone to worship them because of it. They were the typical rich snobs, the kind you see in the movies. All except Allison, Madison’s younger sister. She was pretty cool. She even hung out with Bobby sometimes. They were in the same grade.

Madison, though, that was something completely different. Not only was she the head cheerleader and one of the most popular girls in school, she was Jacob Benton’s girlfriend. For that alone I hated her, but so many other things justified that emotion.

“Take a seat, Mrs. Cairsen,” Jesse said with a sigh. “I’ll be with you in a minute.”

“You don’t seem to understand,” she said, raising her chin so she could look down her nose at him. “My. Daughter. Is. Missing. You must find her.”

Jesse frowned at the woman and rubbed the back of his neck. “I understand, Mrs. Cairsen, but I am already dealing with one missing person right now. I will get to you and take your information when I am done with Ms. Prado here.”

“No, I don’t think you do understand. You need to—” Mrs. Cairsen cut off as the chief walked out of his office.

“Hello Melissa,” he said to Mrs. Cairsen. “Is there,” he eyed Jesse and gave him a stern look, “a problem here?”

“Oh, Charlie. Good.” Mrs. Cairsen faced him, turning her back on Jesse. “Allison is missing. I need your officers to search for her.”

“Of course, of course. It seems Jesse here is occupied. David!” he shouted toward a doorway to another room. “Come in here and take a missing person’s report.”

David Gaff came through the doorway, scratching the side of his graying head. I’d seen him around town—we were a pretty small town, after all—and I liked him. He was always helpful and seemed to enjoy talking to kids. His middle-aged body was sort of pear-shaped, and as he went toward Mrs. Cairsen, he almost seemed to limp. He’d probably been sitting too long and his muscles stiffened up on him.

“Good afternoon, Mrs. Cairsen.” Catching sight of me and Mom, he added, “Allie.” He smiled and waved at me, too. My mom and I both waved back. “So, has your missing person been gone for twenty-four hours? We require that to fill out an official report.”

“No, no,” the police chief said. “We don’t have to be that strict. Help her out, David, and get right on it.” He smiled at Mrs. Cairsen.

“Yessir.”

Mom and Jesse both looked toward the chief, her eyes widening and Jesse doing a double-take.

He shook his head and continued typing on the keyboard.

After giving Jesse all the information and getting an assurance from him that they'd start searching, we left the police station. With time to dwell on it again, Mom started to breathe heavily as she drove us home, her head swiveling, trying to search everything on the way. She started to mumble to herself.

"Where could he have gone? Think. Where would he hide, what would he be doing?"

As we pulled into the driveway, Mr. Snodgrass, Timmy's dad, saw us and came toward the car. He was dragging Timmy behind him. We parked and got out to meet him at the end of the driveway.

"Allie," he said. "I have a little more information for you. I didn't know this earlier when you came over, or I would have said something." He glared at his son. "Tell her, Timmy."

The boy, the same age and pretty much the same size as Bobby, looked at us sheepishly. He was almost a carbon copy of my brother. The same raggedy hair, the same oversized teeth, even the same guilty look like he had done something—or several somethings—and was waiting to be caught. The only real difference in their appearance was his blue eyes where Bobby's were brown.

"I'm sorry I didn't say anything sooner," he said, looking toward his father. He had obviously been told to make the apology. "Bobby was...he sort of did...well, I dared him to, you know..." Mr. Snodgrass slapped the top of his head. Not hard, but it was enough to get his son's attention. Timmy cringed a little—for effect—and squinted at his father.

"Timmy," my mom said, "just tell me what you know about Bobby. Where is he?"

"I'm not sure. We were talking yesterday, and I dared him and Allison to spend the night out in the park. You know, Steinholt Park. He said he wasn't afraid of anything coming to get him. He didn't even really think there was anything dangerous coming out of the mines. So I dared him, and he and Allison went to the park after dark last night to stay there. I haven't seen him, but he's probably at her house eating candy or something."

My mother's face had gone pale. She put her hand to her mouth, and I didn't like what I saw in her eyes. That look usually meant she was either going to start screaming or have some kind of meltdown, like a nervous breakdown. I hoped neither would happen. She closed her eyes and took a deep breath. Then she took another one. When she opened her eyes again, the fire in them made me take a step back. Timmy saw it, too, and he did likewise.

"The park, just down the street?" she asked slowly. There weren't that many public parks in town. It was obvious she was trying not to blow up in front of our neighbors. She controlled her voice, but it was strained. "They went there last night?"

Timmy seemed to shrink in on himself, as if he would double up, then double up again, and continue to do it until he folded into himself and disappeared completely. "Yes, ma'am. That's what they said, anyway. That was the dare. I'm really sorry if I got them in trouble."

Another deep breath. "Thank you for telling me," Mom said. "It's not completely your fault. You didn't force him to go." She turned to Mr. Snodgrass. "Thank you for bringing this to my attention. At least we have a place to start now.”

“Sorry I didn’t know earlier,” he said. “Do you need help with anything, looking for him or anything else?”

“No,” she said. “Thank you, though. That’s very thoughtful.” She seemed to have developed a habit since my father died of not accepting help for anything. She tried to do everything herself, even when it was obvious she could use aid. In this case, I agreed with her, but sometimes it really aggravated me because her not accepting help didn’t seem to apply to me. If she rejected someone’s offer, it usually meant more work for me.

I didn’t mind in this case. If Bobby was in trouble, I’d do anything to help him out. Though I didn’t show it on the outside, I was anxious to start searching with this new information. Jittery, nervous energy bubbled up from somewhere in my middle. We needed to get going to find out what the situation was. I refused to think that he had been taken by some dark creature.

My mom shot me a look. There wasn’t anything on her face, but I could read it in her eyes. She was in denial, too, as if it would all end up being a misunderstanding if we didn’t put words to our fear. We both got back in the car and took off toward the park.

It only took us a few minutes to get there. It wasn’t a large park, just your basic trees, grass, some benches, and a restroom, named after the prospector who had found the original small cave that became the mine. He sold the information to the mining company. A park named after him was part of his compensation.

There really wasn’t any crime in Lode, but it was still a stupid idea to spend the night in a park, even when there weren’t things from the mine snatching people. Bobby was fearless, though, which is to say that he was stupid. Not in most things, but in something like this, when someone dared him to do something, yeah. Stupid with a capital S. No, make that all caps.

As we came around a large tree on the edge of the park, my mom gasped. There were two sleeping bags laid out under a cluster of four trees. I recognized one of them as ours. The other was unfamiliar, but judging by how nice and expensive-looking it was, it was probably Allison’s. It looked more comfortable and warm than my bed at home. Her family had more money than God.

My mom rushed to the bag and rifled through it. What did she expect to find? Did she think Bobby had shrunk to pocket size and that he was hiding inside?

While she did that, I surveyed the area. I didn’t see anything that looked like there’d been a struggle. Bobby was small, but he was a scrapper. If someone had tried to kidnap them, he would have fought. He would have at least messed up his bag. It lay there, flattened out as if he had been ready to go to bed, but never quite made it. The grass didn’t hold footprints. I didn’t see anything that was useful as a clue.

“Dani,” she said. “Come over here. Help me get the sleeping bags up. We can bring them to the police. I already know this one is ours, but I want to confirm that this other one was Allison’s. Mrs. Cairsen will probably want to know about it.”

I silently did as she asked. I watched her as I did it. She was getting frantic again.

“Mom, why don’t you sit down on the bench and breathe? I’ll go put these in the car.” She took my suggestion and sat, bent over so her head was hanging down near her knees. I could hear her forcing breaths. She really shouldn’t have doubled over like that. I learned that in karate training. She needed to stretch out her rib cage to get more breath in. I didn’t say anything, though. She was having a rough enough time without me trying to tell her what to do. I took the sleeping bags to the car.

I quickly paced around the area, scanning the ground to make sure we didn’t miss anything. When I didn’t find anything else, I went and sat next to my mom. She looked over at me, her breathing more normal. Her face was drawn, like she had been lifting weights all day and was at the point of giving up.

“They have him,” she said.

“What? Who? What are you talking about?”

“The things. From the mine. They came out at night and they took him. Took them both.”

“Mom, you don’t know that,” I said, trying to sound positive. “They’re probably just off doing something else they’re not supposed to. We’ll find him, you’ll ground him, and everything will be back to normal.”

“No, Dani,” she said. “I had a feeling, earlier. Now I’m sure. Whatever has been taking pets and people, it took Bobby and Allison last night. We have to talk to the police. We have to make them go into the mines and get Bobby. We have to...” She trailed off.

We got up and went to the car. We’d go back to the police and try to convince them that this new evidence should make them escalate the missing person case. As we sped back to the station, I couldn’t help but feel that my mom was right. Whatever it was that lived in the mines and came out at night, it had taken my brother. The question popped into my mind despite my best efforts to keep it out. Was he still alive, or had the thing killed and eaten him?

Chapter 7

“Allie, this doesn’t change procedure,” Jesse told her. “We still can’t just go into the mine. There are only four of us. Five, if you include the chief, but he’s not about to go out in the field. Four. There were more than a dozen armed security guards, and they disappeared when they went in. We can’t send the entire police department into a situation like that. Hell, we can’t keep people from wandering around at night and becoming targets. Obviously.”

My mother looked around the small police station. There were three other people—aside from the cops—there, two of them talking with Ivan, one of the other cops, and one waiting to be helped. Mom looked at me, her face a thunderhead, but calmed it as my eyes met hers. “We’ll talk about this later,” she told him in almost a whisper. I knew that tone. He’d get a stern talking to later. “Let’s go,” she said to me, already heading out the door.

As we drove home, I went over in my head what was happening. For some reason, I’d felt insulated from reality as we searched for Bobby and then found the sleeping bags. The severity of the situation hadn’t really settled in. It was becoming real to me now. I found myself tensing up, every muscle tightening. My hands started to shake and my belly turned sour. Bobby was gone. Taken. He could be dead.

I seemed to have lost control of my limbs, my mouth. I wanted to say something to my mom, anything to let her know I believed now that Bobby had been taken, but I couldn’t form words. I sat there, trembling, until we got home. When I didn’t get out of the car right away, she came around to my side and opened the door.

“What’s going on, Dani?” she said, concern in her eyes. “Are you okay?”

“Mom,” I said, finally able to speak. “I have to go get him.”

“What? Dani, what are you talking about?” She put the back of her hand on my forehead. “Are you coming down with something? Come on. Let’s get in the house so you can lie down.” She took my hand and pulled me out of the car, guiding me toward the house.

“I’m not sick. I have to go after him. They’re not going to help us at all.”

“Who?”

“Anyone,” I said. “The police, the security company, whoever. No one will go look for him. We’ll sit here and wait, hoping, and Bobby will be somewhere in the dark.” I shivered more strongly. “We can't leave him to the dark. They'll kill him, eat him. I need to go get him."

My mother stopped in the entryway after closing the door behind us. "Dani, you can't go after him. We'll have to convince the police to go look for him. Allison Cairsen is missing, too. They're rich and good friends with the police chief. Maybe we can use that. Go lie down. I'll make some phone calls. Promise me you won't go running off to find him. Give me a chance, okay?"

As we walked to my room, I looked into her eyes. She was still scared, but her fear took on a new dimension. Somehow I understood that now, she was more afraid for me than before. Her expression seemed to plead with me. "I won't run off and try tonight. I'll give you a chance to get some help, but if you can't, I'm going after him. I will not leave him to that darkness."

She nodded and left my room, taking her phone out of her pocket.

I looked around my room, my safe haven from the dark things prowling our city. It would be night soon, another chunk of darkness in which the things could play. Would they take more people tonight?

My eyes went to the corner of the room where my bo staffs leaned against the corner. I had won some awards for staff forms in competition, too, not just for sparring. I hadn't spent a lot of time actually fighting with the weapons, but I considered myself pretty good with them. How big were the things from the mines? How fast? Could I hurt them with six feet of hardwood swung with speed and force? I might find out soon. I hoped my mother could get some help, but the cynical side of me doubted it.

My dream was bad enough when it was me in the room with only darkness for walls. Thinking of Bobby, taken to a place with no light, made me angry. The heat of it simmered inside me, wanting to flash into a large flame, but I would give Mom a chance. Emotion warming me, I dozed off.

"Jesse, I'm telling you," my mother's voice said. She was in her room, but in the quiet house, I could hear her conversation.

"Calm down, Allie." It was Jesse's voice. Her phone was on speaker. "Don't get so excited."

"Don't get excited? My son is missing, taken by whatever it is that lives in the mine. How can you tell me not to get excited? What if one of your daughters was taken?"

"Okay, I get it. There's still nothing I can do."

"That's not good enough. You say you love me. Well, it's time to show it. I have been on the phone all day trying to get someone to do something, but apparently the entire town is full of cowards and people who don't care about the lives of two children."

"Allie," he said. "The Chief and the mayor are trying to get help from Tucson and from the state. They haven't been able to convince them that the situation is real yet, but they will. No bodies have been found yet, so there's no proof of anything. Just a little while longer and we'll have more men to go search. You have to wait."

"Wait? You want me to wait? It's been almost a full day, Jesse. I'm not waiting any longer. Dani is going after Bobby whether I want her to or not. I won't be able to stop her. We can't wait for days for more cops to show up. I'm going to go with her. I want you to come, too."

“No. You can’t go into the mine, and I’m not going anywhere. You don’t know what’s in there. It’s a stupid thing to do.”

My mother was silent for a moment. “Jesse, I’m asking you. Will you please go with us? You’re trained and you have guns. We need you.”

“My daughters need me. I can’t go on a suicide mission and leave them here. No, it’s not going to happen. I forbid you to go.” Uh-oh. That was a mistake. It never ends well when someone commands Mom to do something.

“You,” she said in that calm, icy voice that always made me and Bobby stop whatever we were doing immediately, “forbid me. Let me tell you this, Jesse Xander. If you don’t come with me and help to find my son, you can just never bother talking to me again. I’m not interested in cowards.”

“Allie, you know it’s not that. I just—”

“We’re done,” she said, cutting him off. “Dani and I are going to find Bobby. If you are a man and if you care for me at all, you will come with us. You can call me if you change your mind. Otherwise, I never want to talk to you again. Goodbye.”

I lay there, not knowing what to do. She said she was going with me, but I didn’t know if she meant it or if she was just trying to get him to go. I heard her softly sniffing. She rarely cried where anyone could see or hear her, so I’d give her a while and then ask her what we’d do. I was excited about being able to do something, but scared at the same time. I lay there for a little while, letting my mind wander, close to dozing.

I got up and went to the weapons leaning against my wall, running my hand down the wood. It had been a while since I had practiced with them. I hoped I was up to the challenge.

A soft knock on my door burst through my thoughts.

“Dani,” my mother said. “Are you awake?”

“I am,” I said. “Come in.”

She did. Her face was slightly puffy and her eyes were red, but she looked resolved. “I’m going with you. To get Bobby back.” She looked at me expectantly.

“It’s going to be dangerous, Mom.”

“I know.”

“Not just from whatever is out there. We could get lost in the tunnels or fall or something else could happen.”

“I know, Dani,” she said. “I also know that no one is going to help us look for him. If we don’t do this ourselves, we’ll never get him back. I can’t lose another one of you. I just can’t.”

“Okay. Let’s go, then.” It bothered me that she was even suggesting this. What would make my protective mother risk death for herself and me? She must have been panicked out of her mind. I didn’t think for a minute that she believed I was more capable than a dozen security guards. She just plain was not thinking clearly.

“Not tonight,” she said. “If we go after dark, we’ll probably be taken before we even get to the mine.”

“Isn’t that what we want to do? Get taken to where he is?”

“No.” She sat on my bed and put her face in her hands. “I’ve been thinking about it. If we let them take us, they’ll be in control. I think our only chance is to go there and surprise them. To do that, we need to go during the daytime. They may sleep during the day, even in the dark of the tunnels. Maybe we will have the advantage of surprise.”

It occurred to me that we were referring to whatever was in the mine as “them.” I guess we both figured it would take more than one wild animal to take all the people who were supposed to be missing. Besides, animals killed and ate. They didn’t kidnap. No bodies had been found, not even blood or other evidence. “Okay. First thing in the morning, then?”

“Yes. We’ll eat dinner, gather what we need, get some sleep, and be ready to head out at first light. Come on, let’s eat.”

After dinner, we got supplies together. Headlamps, extra batteries, food, a first aid kit; it was like we were going on a backpacking trip. We hadn’t done one in a while, since before my dad died, but we had all the stuff. Including WAG bags. It wasn’t pleasant to think of heeding nature’s call in a bag, but I threw several of the packs in anyway.

I threw in a coil of climbing rope as my mom walked into the room with what looked like a small suitcase. She put it on the bed and opened it up. A handgun shone dully in the overhead lamp.

“Jesse gave me this for my birthday a few months ago,” she said.

I remembered overhearing them talking. He had told her he wanted her to be able to protect herself. He taught her how to shoot and how to care for the gun. They had gone to the range a few times to practice, though she never told me. I noticed, though. I wasn’t sure how good a shot she was, but a gun would definitely come in handy. “I’ll feel silly wearing a holster, like some cowboy in the wild west, but I have to take it. We don’t know what’s down there.”

“I’m taking my staff,” I said. She nodded like she had assumed as much. “Do we have everything?”

“I think so,” she said. “We have five or six hours to sleep before dawn. Let’s rest. We don’t know how long it’ll take to find him and to get him out.”

I agreed and started heading for my room. Before I’d taken two steps, I turned and went back to her. “He’s still alive. I would have felt something if he wasn’t. Like with dad. We’ll find him and get him out.” I hugged her and felt her tremble as the breath seemed to catch in her throat.

“We will,” she said softly as I went to rest up for our mission.

Chapter 8

The low clouds, almost a fog, ate much of the early morning light. A dreary day for a dreary adventure. Mom made us breakfast as I went through everything we had gathered to take. It all fit into our backpacks, which was good, because we weren't about to go into the mines wheeling a suitcase. I went out the front door to put our supplies in the car.

And ran into Sam coming up my walkway.

"Oh," I said. "Sam. What are you doing here? It's still dark. I don't really have time to talk right now."

"I'm not here to talk," she said. "I'm here to go with you."

"What? Go with me where?"

"Come on, Dani. It's a small town, remember? I know you're going to try to find Bobby. I'm going with you."

"No," I said. "No, you're not."

Her face pinched in irritation. She sighed. "You're my best friend, Dani. The way I was raised, you do anything for your best friend. You could use help, and I'm here to help you." I noticed for the first time she wore what looked like tactical clothing, black rugged material with several pockets, some of them bulging with items. She even had a belt with little pouches on it.

"What's with the outfit?" I asked, not able to help myself.

"I'm a big fan of spy novels. So what if I dress up as a secret agent sometimes? I have skills that could be useful."

"Sam," I pleaded, "Please don't make this harder on me. It's too dangerous. I can't let you go."

"Are you going alone? Just you and your mother?"

"How...how did you know?"

"Small. Town," she said. "Nothing is secret here."

"You still can't go. One more person won't make a difference, and I won't risk you getting hurt."

"One person won't make a difference?" another voice said, this one with an English accent.

"How about three? Would that suit better?"

Emily stepped up from around the car, Zach right behind her. They had hiking clothes on, hers coordinated grays and his tan pants and a blue flannel shirt over a t-shirt. Both carried backpacks.

Zach had a baseball bat in his hand and a very large survival knife strapped to his waist.

“No,” I said. “I appreciate it, guys, but no. It’s my problem and it’s too dangerous. Go home.”

“Dani,” Zach said, eyes wet. “My dad is missing still. If you don’t let me go with you, I’ll go by myself. We’d have a better chance together. Please. I have to try to find him. It’s my dad, Dani. My dad.”

I opened my mouth to speak, but words wouldn’t come. I couldn’t refuse him a chance to find his father. I knew well the feeling of emptiness over a missing father. He was right, too. We would have a better chance together.

“Let them come,” my mother said as she came out behind me with more supplies. “Zachary is right. If he wants to find his father, we’ll do better together.”

My mouth dropped open. I stared at her. This wasn’t my mother. Who had replaced her with a clone? No refusing help, no asking for permission slips from their parents. What was going on?

“We’re going to help Zach,” Emily said. “If you won’t let us come with you, then we’ll help our other friend. She put her arm around him, but winced as she did so. Zach was always trying to get closer to all us girls. Em was probably hoping he didn’t see more in the gesture than was meant.

“Dani,” Mom said. “I don’t agree with them coming, but they’re obviously going to follow us anyway. We can’t stop them, and we don’t have time for this. Let’s go. Everyone in the car.”

Emily and Zach high-fived each other and Sam smiled at me. To be honest, I did feel a little better having them along. The more people I had with me when I faced the darkness of the mines, the better. Still, I worried if they were up to it. I worried if I was up to it. I angled my staff from the back seat up through my open window in the front, and we headed toward the mine.

When we got there, we found the area locked up tight but without a security guard. I guess they figured if someone was stupid enough to try to get in, they deserved whatever they got. Or they had run out of security guards.

At the first gate, one of the side entry points onto the processing facility, my mom took out a ring of keys. She shuffled through them and finally selected the one that fit the padlock on the thick chain keeping the gate closed. I looked at her. She must have seen the confusion on my face.

“I am the office manager for one of the offices for the mine company,” she said. “I know people.”

I shook my head. I didn’t know when she had time to get the keys, but I let it pass. My hands were shaking from nervousness now that we were close to entering the mine.

Mom pulled up to the mine entrance. It was a big gate, double steel doors large enough for a semi truck to drive through. This was the entrance to the underground. This was where it would begin.

We piled out of my mom’s Honda Accord and she popped the trunk. I got a closer look at what everyone had brought. My three friends had come equipped, with backpacks similar to those my mother and I had. Zach had his knife and his baseball bat. Emily pulled out what looked like a gnarled walking stick. When she noticed me eyeing it, she shrugged and leaned it on her shoulder. I looked at Sam. She didn’t seem to have any kind of weapon. What did she plan on doing when whatever lived in the mines attacked us? All three had jackets or sweatshirts. That was good. It could be cold underground. At least, it was in the cave tours I'd been on.

Another car pulled up to us. I jumped at the sound. Man, I was jittery. I hoped it wasn't someone from the mine company. On second glance, I saw that it was a sporty little Audi, not something a security guard would be driving around looking for trespassers. My heart jumped when the door opened.

Jacob Benton got out and moved the seat up for someone in the back to leave the vehicle. I didn't even notice who it was. Jacob Benton. God, he was gorgeous. He was wearing jeans, a t-shirt, and a hoodie, but even dressed like that I could see the muscles shift as he moved. Sam reached over and lifted my chin to close my mouth.

"I heard you're going into the mine to look for your brother," he said. Did everyone in town know about this? "Is it okay if we go with you?" His eyes came up to meet mine, but I shifted my gaze away. Eye contact had been uncomfortable for me since the accident. I wasn't sure why.

I opened my mouth to answer him as the other door opened. "We are not going with them, Jacob," Madison Cairsen said. "We are taking over this shabby little group."

"Oh, hell no," I heard Zach say.

Jacob looked at him quizzically.

"Now, Madison," Jacob said. "Don't go—"

"No, no, Jacob," she cut him off. "These type of people appreciate a strong hand. They need leadership. So, Danish, or whatever, let me tell you what we're going to do."

"Madison," Sam said calmly, grabbing the walking stick from Emily. "If you don't shut your mouth, turn around, and leave," she hefted the stick as if to feel its weight and balance, "so help me, I'll crack your head with this."

"Whoa, whoa. Hold on now," Jacob said, stepping in front of Madison and holding his hands up. "She's distraught. Her sister was taken also—"

"No thanks to you and your filthy little brother," Madison threw in.

"Madison!" Jacob said. "Don't tempt me to step out of the way. Dani, she's upset. Don't take her too seriously. We want to help. We need to go look for Allison too, but we can help you find your brother. What's his name? Bobby?"

Things were happening too fast for me. Sam threatening Madison. That horrible cheerleader bitch wanting to go with us. Jacob knowing my name, even Bobby's. My head was spinning and I wasn't sure what to say.

Mom came to my rescue.

"Listen, Madison," Mom said. "You can come with us. If you do, you will follow directions. You will not try to take over. When we say hop, you will hop. Otherwise, you're on your own. I don't want to be responsible for you to begin with."

"Do you know who I am?" Madison started, looking to be winding up for one of her rich-girl rants. Jacob stepped up to her and put his hand over her mouth.

“We’ll do what we’re told, Mrs. Prado. Don’t worry. I’ll remind her if necessary.”

“Thank you,” Mom said, mollified. “What is your name?”

“Oh, sorry,” Jacob said, removing his hand from Madison’s mouth slowly, looking at her as if afraid she would continue her rant. He wiped his hand on his pants, leaned over, and held it out, grazing my shoulder. “I’m Jacob Benton, ma’am.” I noticed that he maintained eye contact with my mother as he said it. I hadn’t ever really been close enough to him to notice that habit.

He shook my mother’s hand and then put his hand on my shoulder. “Sorry, I didn’t mean to push by you like that.” He had touched me. Twice. I stared dumbly at his mouth as he smiled at me. It slipped a little when I didn’t respond in kind and when I wouldn’t look into his eyes. I was too shocked for the first and too uncomfortable for the second.

“And I’m Tyler Lennon,” another voice said. I turned and found someone else standing there. He shook my mother’s hand, too.

Tyler Lennon was one of the great oddities at our high school. He was commonly referred to as a music dweeb. He somehow fancied himself a rock star, constantly emphasizing his last name as if he was actually related to John Lennon. He was lanky, awkward, and not good at all in social situations. Normally, he would be relegated to the “weird kid” status in school, but he wasn’t. He and Jacob had been friends since they were in first grade, and that afforded Tyler a social status much higher than mine or my friends, almost equal to the popular kids.

“Nice to meet you, Jacob, Tyler. Do you have supplies? We’re not sure how long it will take to find the missing people.” As she said it, my mom adjusted the holster on her hip. She looked odd with it strapped there.

“We thought of that,” Jacob said, face brightening. I sighed and then looked around to make sure no one noticed. Sam did and smiled at me. “We have backpacks with food and headlamps and extra batteries.” He pulled the packs out of his car and handed Tyler’s and Madison’s to them. She grimaced. I figured she thought Jacob would carry it for her.

“Do you have...anything you can use as a weapon?” Mom said, obviously uncomfortable with asking that of a kid.

“I brought these,” Jacob said, bringing out a couple of sticks just over two feet long. I recognized them. Escrima sticks.

“Do you know how to use those?” I asked, overcoming my shyness around him in my excitement.

His face lost some of its shine and colored slightly. “No, not really. I got them a few years ago because I thought they looked cool.” He turned them in his hands. They were made of dark hardwood. “I figure I can swing them and hit something. It’s better than nothing.”

“Can I see them?” I held out a hand. It had been a long time since I had practiced the forms I knew for the sticks, but when he handed them to me, they felt good in my hands, just a bit heavier than the rattan practice weapons I had used. I stepped away from everyone else and ran through what was simply called Stick Form #4 in my style, whirling the weapons, blocking imaginary blows, and striking my invisible opponents. The dull whisper as the sticks cut through the still morning air invigorated me. It had been too long.

I ended the form in an attention stance with sticks crossed in front of me, the salute and ready position. When I turned to hand them back to Jacob, I saw that everyone was staring at me. My face heated more quickly than I would have thought possible.

“Oh, ah, I used to play around with them. A little.” I handed them back to Jacob and busied myself with putting my pack on.

“Can you show me a little of that?” he asked me, staring at the sticks now in his hands.

“Sure,” I said, looking up but becoming too nervous to meet his eyes. He even ducked his head a little and angled his face to get in my line of vision, but I looked away. “The movements are pretty basic. You’ll pick it up in no time.”

“Well,” Madison said. “I guess we should have expected you to know how to play with sticks. Are you a dead aim with a rock, too?”

I was picking up my staff when she said it. I looked down at it, imagining how it would feel to strike her with it. Not hard, but enough to make her shut that mean, pouty mouth of hers.

“Stop it, Madison,” Jacob said. “What she just did was awesome. She might be the one to save your skin if we get into trouble.”

The girl mumbled something under her breath and fiddled with her backpack. I noticed she didn’t have a weapon.

“No, Tyler,” Jacob said. I had forgotten there was anyone else around me. “You are not bringing your guitar.”

“I bring my guitar everywhere,” his friend said.

“Dude, no. Unless you plan to swing that thing and hit something over the head, it’s staying in the car.”

“Hit something with it?” Tyler said. “Are you insane? This is a Fender Stratocaster. I’d swing you as a weapon before I’d do that.”

Jacob laughed. “Then find something else.”

Tyler looked around. He stepped over to the building and found a metal bar, about the same size as a crowbar. He hefted it, looked at Jacob, and raised an eyebrow. Jacob nodded.

“Okay, let’s get going,” Mom said, turning toward the mine entrance. She hadn’t even taken a step when another car, this one a dark mid-sized car, pulled up.

“Damn it,” she said. “What now?” Then she saw the car and her face changed completely from irritation to...something. Satisfaction? Relief? I think it was partly both.

The car stopped and a man got out. I recognized him. His face, good-looking for an older guy, showed relief as well, as if he’d thought he might be too late. He had short dark hair, showing some gray in it. He wore hiking pants, a blue tee shirt, and a sweatshirt. When he met eyes with my mother, he smiled, his blue eyes twinkling. “Hey, Allie.” It was Rick Phillips, one of my mom’s friends. He nodded to the others. When he saw me, he smiled widely. “Hey, Dani, what’s up?”

“Rick, what are you doing here?” My mother had put on her stern face, though the relief in her eyes told me she was glad to see him.

“I heard you were planning on going on a picnic and wanted to come. I hope that’s all right. I even brought food”—he lifted a backpack out of the car—“and utensils.” He took out a pair of swords. Samurai swords. “No wine, though. I heard there would be minors here. Maybe miners, too.” He laughed at his distinction between the two words.

Mom huffed. “Oh, come on. Let’s get going before the rest of the town shows up, though that’s what I wanted yesterday. I want to be inside the mine before anyone tries to stop us.”

Rick donned his pack and put the sword scabbards through some kind of belt he had rigged up. At least he didn’t have traditional sashes to hold the swords in place. That would just be weird. He came up to me and fist-bumped me.

“What’s with the swords?” I asked.

“Oh, I got on a kick when I was younger, watching samurai movies and practicing with swords. I got pretty good at killing imaginary opponents. It’s all I could think of to bring.”

“Can I see one?”

“Sure.” He twisted so the hilts pointed toward me. He had the traditional daisho: a long katana and a shorter wakizashi. I pulled the katana free of its scabbard and inspected the blade.

“Sweet,” I said. “These are not cheap aluminum demo swords.”

“Nope. High carbon steel. Razor sharp. Hopefully I will be able to leave them in the scabbards. I’d hate to cut anything other than bundles of reeds for testing the keenness of the blade.”

I slid the sword back into place. “Yeah, me too.” With a sigh, I followed the others toward the mine entrance, butterflies the size of housecats swirling in my belly.

Chapter 9

I followed my mother toward the mine. I figured that of all of us, she would have the best idea where to go. I don't know why I thought that. She was an office manager. She didn't work at the mine itself. I didn't know if she had ever even been there. Everyone else seemed content to follow her, though.

My mother took out another key and put it into a keyhole next to the large gates. When she turned it, the two doors swung outward slowly. The motors controlling the gates whirred like a garage door opener, but it was as loud as five of them.

There were two sets of gates, apparently, because a few dozen feet in from the first one, we came to a twisted metal doorway, smaller than the first one. It looked like someone had driven a vehicle through it. I wondered if whatever lurked in the mines did it or if someone did it trying to escape. I also pondered why the opening was left like this. Was everyone afraid to try to seal it back up again?

"Do you think we'll run into any of the shadowling?" Rick asked.

"The what?" Mom said.

"Shadowling. That's what the news started calling whatever is in there this morning. I guess some people saw several shadows moving near where some people went missing. They had to call the things something, I guess."

"Great," she said. "Now the mythical monsters have a name. I'm betting we're going to find a group of bandits or something. Maybe terrorists."

Sam winked at me, and I rolled my eyes.

As we started going through the doorway, I was the last in line. I looked as each of the others passed the twisted hunk of metal that was supposed to keep people out of the mine. I guess it didn't do as well keeping things in the mine. The reactions ranged from my mother's cool recognition of the damage, to the nervous darting eyes of Emily and Zach, to Madison's grimace and wrinkled nose. Her expression seemed to indicate that the dirt and dust that lay around the area were more important than the wrecked entrance. I looked at Rick and he shrugged.

There were lights strung along the ceiling of the corridor, but they weren't on. I took my headlamp out as the others paced around the opening. Sam walked over to the wall of the cavern and flipped a switch.

The lights flickered on, a row of dull, glowing bulbs stretching off into the distance. I looked at my friend and she gave me a smile. A nervous one.

Looking into the darkness, even with the lights disappearing as the tunnel sloped downward, I sniffed. “Almost all the copper mines in the state are pit mines. We had to live near one of the few mines that used both shafts and slopes.”

It was fully light out behind us, though I couldn’t see the sun through the clouds. I took a long last look at the cars, the ore processing area around them, and the cloudy sky, and then searched the dimly lit corridor ahead. The others were milling around, waiting for someone to tell them what to do.

They waited.

I stood there until I couldn’t stand it anymore.

“Let’s get this over with,” I said, walking past the others and into the mine. I could feel the headlamp strap on my head, a fold pressing against my skin on the left side. It was a comfort, an emergency source of light should the overhead lamps fail. My heart was beating so loudly, I was surprised no one commented on it. The scrape of shoes on the gritty rock floor behind me told me that at least one other person followed me. I was happy to hear several other shoes crunching along as well. We were on our way.

I had never really been claustrophobic, but the darkness...oh, the darkness. It was irrational, my fear of the lack of light. It didn’t make sense. Thinking over it logically, there seemed no good reason why it should bother me. But it did. Oh, God in heaven, it did. I tightened my grip on my staff, clutching it until my forearms started hurting, but I continued to move.

“Relax,” Rick said, right at my shoulder. His voice made me jump. I hadn’t realized anyone was that close. “Breathe deeply and regularly. You’ll be exhausted in an hour all tensed up like that.”

I nodded, not taking my eyes from the stretch of tunnel ahead of me. I did loosen my grip, though. A little. And I breathed in and out slowly. It seemed to help.

I got a chill, but realized it wasn’t from the temperature. It was a little cooler in the mine than it was outside, but not as cold as I thought it would be. I had brought a jacket with me. Jeans, a tee shirt with “Where are you going to go today?” printed on it, and a rough denim jacket. I was prepared for chilly weather.

“What’s the plan?” Sam asked in a whisper.

It sounded like a shout in the quiet of the cave, making me jump again. Rick was right. If I didn’t calm down, I’d end up with no energy when I needed it.

“I...I don’t know,” I admitted. I hadn’t really thought beyond getting into the mine and searching for Bobby. I mentally kicked myself.

“I have a basic map of the tunnels,” my mom said. Papers rustled and shadows shifted as she stepped up to me. “This main tunnel goes for a ways before we have to make a choice. Right here,” she pointed to a large area off which came four other passageways, “is where the security force was the last time they could track them.”

I turned to look at her. How had she prepared for this? When did she have the time? We'd just figured out late the night before that we were going.

"I did a few things last night after you went to bed," she said, shrugging. "I called in some favors. No one owed me enough to come with us, though." I shifted my eyes toward Rick, and then back to the map.

"The mine," Zach said, "has aspects of a slope mine and a shaft mine. I did a project on it when I was in sixth grade, even made a model of it. If we head off in this direction—" he pointed to one of the corridors on the map "—we'll get to the shaft elevator. If we take the other passageways, they gradually slant down to other areas."

"We should probably take the sloping tunnels," I said. "If we take the elevator, we may go beneath where we need to be and miss finding who we're looking for completely." Everyone seemed to agree with me. "Is the map good enough for us to follow?"

"It looks pretty simple," Tyler said. "We won't get lost."

I caught movement as Sam turned to look at Tyler. "What happens if we lose the map or it gets destroyed or something else happens to it? I don't think relying on only one thing to keep us from getting lost is a good idea."

"That's a good point," I said. "What do you have in mind, Sam? I know you already have a solution."

She smiled, but turned her eyes downward, embarrassed by the compliment. She reached into her pack and took out a bag of fat sidewalk chalk of different colors. It was the kind I used to use when I was a kid for drawing hopscotch squares on our driveway. Good old Samantha. She was always ten steps ahead of everyone else.

"We can mark which way we went at every intersection," Sam said. "That way we can retrace our steps."

Madison laughed. Everyone turned to look at her.

"You think you're so smart," the cheerleader said. "What if our headlamps run out of batteries? What then? We won't be able to see the chalk marks, then. Ha."

I stared at her. Is this the type of thing we'd have to put up with the entire time we were down in the mine? "Uh, Madison. If we have no light, the map will be worthless, too. Do you have an idea for some kind of glowing marker for total darkness?"

"No." Her voice was barely a whisper. I think she got my point. I just shook my head at her.

"Most of the mine has lights strung along the ceiling," Zach said. "Hopefully we won't have to worry about lighting."

"We're losing track of what we should be doing," I said, starting to get frustrated with the waste of time. "Sam, use your chalk and mark our path at each intersection. Come on, let's do this. I want to get Bobby and get out of here as soon as possible." Madison opened her mouth, but I spoke before she did. "And Allison. And anyone else we find."

I started walking down the passageway, the others following me. It was wide, probably ten feet across or more, with the ceiling at least eight feet above us. It was the original opening, widened after the mine had been in operation for many years, but still decades old. The roughness of the stone meant this part of the tunnel was carved out before all the cool modern drilling machines were invented.

The arched ceiling was lined with a lattice of wood ribs stretching off down the corridor. The lights—thick, elongated glass globes—were attached to the wood and tethered to each other with electrical cabling. The filthy glass made the light dim and threw shadows along the passageway's surfaces, including the steel tracks down the center of the floor.

The others settled into a slow gait as they followed me. The cavern was wide enough for a few people to walk side-by-side, so we progressed as a loose pack, in ones or twos mainly. My mother came up beside me.

“Are you going to handle directing everyone?” I asked her. “You’re one of only two adults.”

“I think you’re doing fine,” she said, forcing a smile. “You let me know if you want me to take control. Otherwise, it’s fine with me if you lead us.”

“I’m not a leader, Mom. I always kind of do my own thing.”

“Then just keep on doing your own thing. Everyone seems to be following you.” She winked at me, then focused her attention forward, down the tunnel, her expression stern.

I looked back over my shoulder at the others. Half of them were looking at their feet nervously. Sam smiled at me. Jacob gave me a little wave. Rick raised his hand in a thumbs up. Madison glared at me.

Well, three out of four wasn’t bad.

Chapter 10

I was staring down into the endless tunnel, the line of lights disappearing unbroken as the tunnel dipped.

“Abandon all hope, ye who enter here,” I said to myself.

Sam chuckled.

“What was that?” my mom asked.

“Oh, nothing. It’s just something we’ve been reading in school.”

“Are you reading Dante’s Inferno?” Rick asked. He was walking side-by-side with Mom.

“Yeah,” I said. “It’s our current assignment in English class.”

“Pretty appropriate,” he said. “And ironic.”

“Right?” I said. “Have you read it?”

“Yeah. A long time ago.”

“What are you two talking about?” Mom asked.

“There was an Italian author in the Middle Ages named Dante Alighieri. He wrote a trilogy full of allegory. It was about a trip through hell, and he described in detail what he saw there. The first book was called Inferno. There was a sign hanging above the entrance to hell. ‘Abandon all hope, ye who enter here.’”

“That’s not very encouraging,” she said.

“Sorry. This just made me think of it. That’s what happens when we have too much homework.” I showed her all my teeth. She slapped my shoulder.

We made our way to the intersection Mom had pointed out on the map. Without breaking stride, we headed off toward where the security force had been when contact was lost. We passed through a widening in the corridor where a few vehicles that looked like tractors were parked. I looked at Zach.

“Diesel-powered,” he said. “Mining isn’t like boring tunnels for roadways. They blast the rock and then break it up and carry it out with these.”

“There’s not enough room for all to ride,” I said, frowning at the machines. “We’ll have to keep walking.”

As we went down the passage, the rock seemed to transform. No, not the rock, but the way the tunnel itself had been made. It widened out until it was nearly the width of the street in front of my house. It also became square, as high as it was wide. The slats on the ceiling were replaced with some type of plates that looked to be bolted directly to the stone.

“This is the newer section of the mine,” Zach said, noticing my inspection of the walls. “Doing the work with the machines requires more space.”

I scanned the area ahead of us, looking for any movement or shapes outside the edge of the dim light from the lamps above. The steady click-click-click of my staff hitting the ground as I walked seemed too loud. There was the scrape of shoes behind me, and someone was breathing hard from our brisk pace, but otherwise, there wasn’t much sound.

I took off my jacket and stuffed it into my backpack. “Isn’t it supposed to be cold down here?” I asked Zach.

“The mine temperature is usually around sixty to seventy degrees,” Sam answered for him. “Depending on how hard the ventilation system is working.”

“Ventilation system?” I said.

“Of course,” Zach said, giving Sam a look like she had taken one of his favorite toys. “With diesel equipment and blasting, they have to move fresh air through the mine. Didn’t you hear the fans when we were closer to the opening?”

Now that he mentioned it, I had heard something, but I’d been too nervous to pay attention. In fact, in the silences between the clipped speech, I still heard a slight whine from somewhere far away.

We continued into the newer section of the mine, the blackness ahead and behind seeming like it was trying to gobble up the glow from the ceiling lights that seemed much too dim.

My hands started shaking and the walls seemed to close in on me, though they were wider than before. I would be trapped here, subject to the whim of anything that came from the depths. Shadowling. That’s what the news had called the things from the darkness. Somehow, putting a name to them made them even more frightening. If something didn’t distract me soon, I’d go insane.

“So, Dani,” a voice said, making me almost drop my staff. I closed my eyes and tried to slow my breathing. I hoped the speaker didn’t notice.

Jacob stepped up beside me. He looked at me quizzically. He had seen me jump, but he didn’t seem like he was going to tease me about it. “Nice staff. How did you get so good with the sticks?” He held them up as if I didn’t know what he was talking about. “Are you as good with that thing as you are with these?”

“Better,” I said, hardly getting the word out. I was talking to Jacob Benton. Alone. I worried about saying something stupid, and the air itself seemed to squeeze my chest, making it harder to breathe. “I mean, I’m much better with the staff than with the sticks.”

“Really? Wow, you must be awesome. The thing you did earlier, that was the coolest thing I’ve ever seen anyone do in person. How did you get that good?”

“Just practice, mostly,” I said, trying to sound nonchalant. “I used to compete a little.”

“A little?” Sam said as she came up on my other side. “You were the state champion for two years. You’re freaking awesome.”

“Ssst,” I hissed at her, jerking my head toward the others. She got the hint and stepped to the side where the others had spread out across the wider tunnel, muttering something that sounded like an apology.

“Well,” Jacob said, looking back toward Madison, who looked as if she’d had all she cared to put up with from Tyler and was preparing to join her boyfriend. “I’m glad there’s someone here who knows how to fight. I’ve never really had to.”

“You’ll do fine,” I said. “You are a natural athlete and have great reflexes. I’ve watched you move —” I realized what that sounded like as I said it and could feel my face get hot. “Umm, and you are pretty efficient. With your body. Your motion. You...I’ll try to find time to teach you some basic strikes. You’ll do great.”

“Thanks, Dani,” he said, his eyes twinkling as we passed under one of the lamps hanging from the ceiling. He was still doing his best to try to maintain eye contact with me, but I couldn’t. “I look forward to it.”

He walked back toward Madison, who was coming at us as if on a mission.

“What was that all about?” she asked him, shooting me a cold look.

“Just finding out what’s going on,” he said.

Sam smiled at me, as did Emily. Even Zach had a small grin on his face. My friends. If no one else, they would always back me up.

“It’s here,” my mother said, as the corridor opened up into a larger chamber, darker than the tunnel we had been traveling. “The place where the security force lost contact.”

There were barrels lined up in one area, cardboard and wooden boxes stacked on pallets near them, and a drilling machine that looked like it was in the process of being repaired. The dim yellow light silhouetted litter and the other items strewn about the darkened cavern. Several of the overhead lamps were not working.

I turned my headlamp on to get a better look and gasped. The unlit lamps had been smashed. The crunching as I walked toward the center was probably the glass from the light covers. Some of the trash on the floor was clothing, torn and tattered. There were a few walkie-talkies there as well, in addition to three handguns I could see. Something clinked against my shoes as I walked. I had inadvertently kicked aside several bullet casings. A handful of dark spots that could have been bloodstains spotted the floor, but thankfully, no more than that.

There were no people, alive or dead.

Tyler picked up one of the guns. “This will be better than a crowbar.”

Rick picked up another of the guns and checked the clip. “No bullets.”

“This one, either,” Mom said. “I don’t see any ammo around. These will only be good for throwing.” She put it back on the floor.

“What about the bullets you brought for your gun?” Tyler said. “Can’t you share?”

“They’re not the same,” Mom said. “I’m using a thirty-eight. These are all nine millimeter. My bullets won’t work in these guns.”

“Damn,” he said, earning a raised eyebrow from my mother. “I mean, that’s too bad.” He smiled at her.

Emily gasped and everyone’s heads swiveled toward the sound. She was off near the wall of the chamber with Zach, the two of them picking through the refuse there.

“What is it, Emily?” I said as I was walking toward her. I scanned the edges of the darkness as I did.

“We found something,” Zach answered for her, “or someone.” They had both stepped back a few feet from where they had been.

I was the first to reach them, Sam a step behind me. My headlamp shone in the space behind some crates that had been knocked off their pallet. There was a body there. I stopped abruptly, Sam running into me.

I gripped my staff more firmly, ready to strike, but then realized there was no need. A slight trickle of blood had dried on the corpse’s head as it had dribbled from a bullet hole onto the floor. I would have expected there to have been more of it.

“What is it?” Sam asked, stepping up to inspect it. I reached for her shoulder to hold her back, but wasn’t able to grab it in time. I stepped over a broken crate with metal machine parts spilling out of it so I was standing next to her.

“Not one of the security guards,” I said, wrinkling my nose at the odor. It smelled like rotting meat. I gagged and had to turn away for a moment.

The body was man-sized and man-shaped. It wasn’t a person, though. Its skin was pale and translucent, with creases and folds that told me it was thick and tough, more like some kind of hide. It also had no hair at all on its body. The head, maybe a little larger than a man the same size—or maybe not, it was hard to tell—had wide-set eyes that stared blankly back at me. Looking at it made me want to search the room for creepy crawly things. I shivered.

“Look at its hands,” Sam said. How could she remain so calm? It was a dead thing in front of her. Emily and Zach had stayed back, their faces looking a little pale in the headlamp light.

I did. The fingers were pointed, like claws, and the nails were much thicker than a person’s. They looked suitable for digging in hard dirt, maybe stone. What was this thing?

“So,” Rick said, climbing over a barrel to get a look. “We find our first shadowling.”

Sam and I stepped away to let the others get a look. It was a grisly sight, not one I wanted to stare at for any length of time.

Something else occurred to me, something no one else mentioned. It was wearing pants. They were dark, the legs ripped off them to make them more like shorts, but it was definitely clothing. Weird.

Mom stood there staring at the creature for a long moment. Her eyes darted across the still form, her mouth parted to allow a hiss of air through them. Her lips twitched once and she turned from it, putting her hand to her head as she went toward the center of the chamber. I wondered if I should go to her, ask her about what she was feeling, but Rick beat me to it, whispering something in her ear I couldn't hear.

After everyone had viewed the shadowling, we gathered in the center of the chamber. Madison was the last to leave, taking a selfie with the dead creature in the background. That girl really had something wrong with her.

"What does it mean?" Tyler asked.

"It means," my mother answered, "that the security guards and the shadowling fought here. It means the men killed at least one of the...things, though with a dozen armed men, I'd think they would've killed more than that."

"Do you think they took their dead with them?" Rick asked.

"I think so," I said. "All except this one, because it was hidden in the corner over there. The question is, did they kill the guards and take their bodies away, too?"

"Do you think," Zach said, his face twisted into a grimace, "that they...eat people?"

"Of course they eat people," Madison said. "Why else would they take them? We need to find my sister before they eat her. She's too rich to eat."

I found myself staring at the girl. How anyone could be so stupid and uncaring was beyond me.

"Now, hold on," Jacob cut in. "There's no evidence they eat people. Let's calm down and focus on the solution. We have to find the people who have been taken. Thinking beyond that won't do us any good right now."

"Right," Mom said. "Thank you for pointing that out, Jacob." She opened up her map and laid it on the top of a barrel. "We need to figure out where to go. We can't wander aimlessly through the mine. There are too many tunnels."

"Where is the section where they were extending the tunnel?" I asked, trying to make sense of the mass of passageways drawn on the paper. "The problems started when the new section of the tunnel was drilled. That's where the shadowling came from."

My mother traced her finger along the map until she stopped and tapped one section. "Here. If we go down that tunnel, the second from the left, it should slope down eventually to where the new section was dug last week. It's quite a way, though."

"Then we better get started," I said. "I don't know about any of you, but I want to get this over with and get back outside where I can see the sun. This place creeps me out, even without dead creatures lying around."

"I'm more concerned about the live ones," Sam said as we started down the slightly sloping corridor.

Chapter 11

As we walked, everyone settled back into brooding silence. The hum of the lights above seemed loud, drowning out the scraping feet and the soft crunching of bits of gravel and sand beneath our shoes. A chill ran through me. The temperature in the cave was cool, though manageable when moving. It wasn't the air that made the goose bumps ripple along my neck, though.

No one spoke, but that was fine. Conversation seemed foreign in the depths of the caves, unwelcome. It almost felt like trespassing to utter a sound. I remained silent, uncomfortable but still believing it to be the better choice.

My mother's eyes were still wide and had a frantic cast to them. She was still pretty freaked out. I could understand. I mean, her son had been taken by the things we had seen in the other chamber. I was even more scared than before. Seeing something so alien and strange made it all more real. Gone was any chance that it was something mundane like bandits or kidnappers.

This was actually happening. Bobby had been taken and was somewhere in the darkness ahead. Despite the moderate temperature in the tunnels, I shivered a little. It was a mental thing. I'd have to fight the icy touch on my skin with my mind. It wasn't real, or at least, it wasn't physical.

We came to another intersection of tunnels and stopped. Our choice was to continue straight or angle off to the right. Both paths sloped slightly down, the one on the right slightly more so. We still didn't speak, all of us silently waiting as Mom looked at the map. It was so quiet—the lights here made little noise—I could hear Tyler's breath from the back of the group. It was a sort of whistling, nasally sound. I guess he had allergies or something. The rock creaked above us, reminding me that tons of earth and stone were just above us.

I caught movement to my far left, behind us. It was right at the limit of my peripheral vision. I spun as two of the shadowling came loping around the corner of a tunnel I didn't know was there.

The pair of creatures looked like the dead one we had seen, but their color differed. Instead of that pale, static tone, these seemed to blend with the stone around them, shadows playing across their rough skin. They were darker than the other one, almost as if they were made of shadow itself. It was hard to pinpoint where their bodies ended and the darkness began.

One thing was for sure. By the way their already-large eyes widened even more, they were as surprised to see us as I was to see them. They stopped so abruptly, one of them skidded a few feet, scraping across the cavern floor.

That motion and sound caused everyone else to snap their heads toward the two newcomers.

I leapt at them, staff whirling. It's better to engage quickly and seize the advantage early—those were almost the exact words my sensei repeated to me over and over again—so I attacked.

Relentlessly. Without moderation.

These creatures had taken my brother. They would not take us.

It took a second or so for the shadowling to react. That was enough time for me to crack one over the head with my staff hard enough to stagger it. The other brought its claws up just as I lunged and rammed the end of my weapon into its face. I heard its nose crack, and it screamed in pain.

Spinning, I swept the dazed creature's legs out from under it and thumped its head again as it fell, but I didn't see it hit the floor. I was already turning again to attack the other one. It had recovered from the shock of its nose being broken, shaking its head and springing toward me.

I back-stepped, slapping its clawed hands aside with my staff as it tried to tear at me with them. It was so fast. It pressed on, forcing me to retreat at a speed I wasn't comfortable with. I hoped I didn't trip on anything. It was already all I could do to keep it from tearing me apart.

A dull thunk echoed in the tunnel and the shadowling lurched forward, stumbling. Zach came into view behind it, finishing up a swing with his baseball bat. Jacob was there, too, flailing ineffectually with the sticks, managing to land maybe one of four blows. I torqued my hips and spun the staff as hard as I could upward. It caught the creature under the jaw and not only stopped its forward momentum but flung it backward. It slapped the floor hard with its back, and Zach pounced on it with his large survival knife, punching the blade into its throat. It tried to scream, but only a whistling, gurgling sound came out.

It thrashed for a few seconds and then stopped moving.

I leaned on my staff, trying to catch my breath. It suddenly hit me that there had been two of them. I searched the area for the other one and located it.

Located its body.

Rick was leaning over the thing, the last few inches of the sword in his hand colored with a dark fluid. His eyes met mine, and he nodded as my gaze skittered off to the side. His mouth twisted as if he was going to be sick.

Retching sounds assaulted my ears from a couple of different directions. Zach was leaning over near the corridor I hadn't seen, hands on knees. He wiped his mouth on his sleeve. A few feet away, Emily was in a similar posture. I didn't blame them. My own stomach was roiling.

My mother stood exactly where she had been before it all started. The map hung loosely in her hand, and she stared at the creature Rick was standing over. The whites of her eyes almost glowed and looked much bigger than should have been possible.

"Mom?" I said. "Mom!"

She started and the map fell to the floor. Her wide eyes met mine and then filled with liquid.

“I...they...”

I pulled her into a hug. She was trembling, her entire body vibrating. “Sh. It’s okay. They surprised us. It’s fine. They’re gone now.” Looking to Rick, who seemed shocked himself as he gazed at the creature he had killed, I jerked my head toward the hidden corridor.

He blinked but seemed to understand. Holding his sword out, he went ahead, just to the limits of where I could see him, scanned the tunnel, and then looked back at me and shook his head. Good, there were only the two. For now.

It took a few minutes for Mom to stop shaking and for her to be comfortable enough to talk.

“I don’t know why I froze,” she said. “I didn’t even think of taking out the gun. It was so fast. They were just suddenly there.”

“It’s fine, Mom. It’s probably better you didn’t use the gun. The sound probably would have drawn others. We got lucky it was just the two of them and that they were as surprised as we were.”

“Rick,” she said. “That one came at me and he stepped in front of me. He swung and cut it. He saved my life.”

“I’m sure you’ll return the favor,” Rick said. “We can watch each other’s backs. It’s the reason I came, after all.”

“Thank you,” she said.

“Are you guys all right?” I asked. They pressed in, all of us in a tight bunch as if no one wanted to be too far from the others.

“We’re good,” Jacob said, stroking Madison’s hair. The girl was as wide-eyed as my mother, mumbling incoherently. “No one got injured. You distracted them and dazed them so we could attack them from behind.” He smiled at me and the tunnel suddenly didn’t seem quite as dark.

We took a few minutes to recover from our short, but intense, ordeal. The others were speaking silently together, Rick soothing my mother, my friends in a clump, and Jacob still trying to relax Madison. None of them were near the bodies of the creatures we had just killed. In fact, they all turned their backs to the corpses. I felt strangely detached. I hadn’t ever killed anything bigger than a bug, but for some reason, I was calm. Would the feeling end suddenly when the shock wore off? Would I freak out then? I hadn’t actually landed a killing blow, just distracted the creatures so the others could.

I stepped up to one of the bodies, the one Zach had killed. It looked...different, now that it was dead. I planted my staff on the floor of the cavern and leaned on it to get a closer look.

“What do you see?” Rick’s voice made me jump.

“Ah! Don’t sneak up on me like that. You scared me to death.”

“Sorry.”

I stood up and turned to face him. “Do you notice anything about these two?” I motioned toward the dead creatures, lying only ten feet apart.

He looked at the one near my feet, then narrowed his eyes to scrutinize it more closely. “Those torn pants or shorts they're wearing. It looks like the same color and material as the other one we found."

"Yes," I said, "I mean, anything that's different now that they're dead?"

"I don't know. I guess their skin has changed color a little. That's normal when things die, though. People do the same thing."

"It's more than that, though," I said. "When they're alive, it's like they're camouflaged, like they're made out of shadow. When I saw them earlier, I could have sworn they were dark gray or black, not this paler color."

"Hmm," he said. "Now that you mention it, it was kind of hard to see where their edges were, how big they really were, before. Even right under the lamps. Is it a trick of the light or did everything happen so fast that we couldn't get a good look?"

"I don't know. It's almost like they have some kind of power to blend in. Like it's magic or something."

"Magic."

I broke eye contact with him and looked back at the shadowling. "I don't know. Maybe they're aliens and have special abilities. Or maybe they are magic. I've never heard about creatures like this before. They could be part chameleon. I don't know. Maybe not everything has a scientific explanation."

"Maybe," he agreed. "We'll have to get a better look if we see more of them. I don't plan on making a study of them, though. It's pretty clear that if we meet more, it'll be us or them. I don't really feel like being eaten by monsters today."

"Yeah, me either."

We left the bodies where they were. I entertained the thought—briefly—of hiding them, but didn't want to waste the time trying to find some place to stash them, and the thought of picking up a dead and bloody creature didn't appeal to me. At all. Instead, we checked the map and continued down the corridor we'd been traveling.

Ten minutes later, the overhead lights went dark, plunging our entire world into black so deep it seemed like the world had ended.

Images of creatures, shadowling and other more monstrous ones, came into my mind, swarming me, pulling me into even deeper blackness. My chest compressed, and I started trying harder to pull air into my lungs. I couldn't do it. Was all the oxygen gone? Did the dark beasts do something to turn the air thicker? I heard the harsh sound as my lungs worked, and I tried with all my might to put air into them. The darkness pressed on me.

A flash of light nearby made me gasp and jump, swinging my staff into a ready position.

It was Sam's headlamp, her face visible just below it.

Of course. I reached up and switched my own light on, trying to slow my galloping heart. By the time everyone had their lights on, I had regained control, for the most part. My face was covered with a sheen of perspiration from the panic, but at least I could think again.

“Malfunction?” I asked, looking at Zach. For better or worse, he had the most information about the mine because of his research for his school project.

“I don’t know,” he said. “Maybe they didn’t pay their bill.” His mouth twitched upward but didn’t quite make it to a full smile.

Chapter 12

It took more than another hour for us to get to the cavern where the most recent digging had occurred. Before getting there, I had an uncomfortable conversation with Emily on how to use the WAG bags for going to the bathroom. She went around a corner into another passageway to use it while I explained to the others and offered to let them have one of the bags I had brought. Awkward.

We finally arrived to find that the tunnel was dominated by a drilling machine. It wasn't one of the huge tunnelers I'd seen pictures of, the ones used to create railway tunnels or holes for roadways. This one looked like a huge battering ram on wheels. The main beam of the thing looked as if it telescoped, and the gigantic ball at the very front of the machine had curved rows of spikes made out of some different kind of metal than what the ball was made of. The conical spikes seemed removable so they could be replaced with new ones when they wore out. They reminded me of teeth in crooked rows in the mouth of some monster. I would have liked to have seen the machine in operation. Drilling through solid stone seemed like it would be exciting to watch.

"They usually blast to make new tunnels," Zach said. "Maybe they're trying out this machine to see if it works better."

The tunnel the machine was pointing toward intersected another, rougher corridor that was at an angle to the one we were in. It must have been a surprise when it had broken through to the other cave. I'd never heard that there were other caves near.

"That must be where the shadowling came from," Jacob said, pointing at the ten foot section of wall that had been shattered by the drill. "It looks like a natural cave, not a mine shaft."

He was right. I'd been on cave tours before. There were several commercial caves in the area, including the Colossal Cave we had talked about earlier. The tunnel that had been breached looked like it had formed naturally, the floor uneven, no drill or chip marks on the wall, no abnormal voids from blasting. I shined my headlamp into the hole and noticed that the opening wasn't even consistent. In the ten feet I could see with each swing of my lamp, the passageway narrowed in size and then widened out again. Would we even be able to get through it?

"Will we even be able to get through the passage?" Sam asked. I smiled at her for mirroring my thoughts exactly and she smiled back at me, though her eyes showed confusion as to why we were smiling.

“We don’t really have a choice,” Mom said. She had regained her composure since meeting the shadowling. “If that’s where they came from, that’s probably where they took their prisoners. We could spend a day or two wandering the mine trying to find them, but I’d say that the chances are better that they’ve been taken back into the caverns the creatures know best.”

“I think you’re right,” I said, my mind trying to come up with any other idea, any reason not to go into the darkness.

While we paused before heading into the natural caverns, Sam walked to the wall of the mine and put a big X and an arrow on it with her chalk. I raised my eyebrows at her and she shrugged.

“I marked all the other intersections before, too,” she said. “I don’t want to get lost.” I nodded.

I watched the interactions between the different pairs in our group as we hesitated. Jacob had a long-suffering look on his face as Madison prattled at him, no doubt complaining of something. Emily and Zach had their heads leaned in toward each other and were speaking softly. Mom was trying to explain something to Rick—I recognized the tightness around her mouth and eyes and knew they disagreed about it. Sam was putting her chalk back in one of her pockets. Tyler...well, Tyler was playing air guitar and humming something I didn’t recognize. Quite a group we had here.

“Are you ready?” I said, taking my staff in my left hand. “We probably have some traveling to do. Hard traveling.” Weary nods were my only answer.

I stepped through the hole into the natural cavern and quivered. Was it colder in here? It was so quiet. I’d thought it was silent before, but there had at least been the soft buzz of the lights and the background sound of the ventilation system. Now that we were in an area without these things—the cavern was even more soundless. Like a tomb. Not a pleasant thought.

I breathed a little easier than when we first entered the mine, though I felt more like something was squeezing my chest in this strange new set of tunnels. I guess if something scares you or stresses you out but remains in front of you, all around you, your body’s alarms get tired and you get used to it. Yeah, right. As if I’d ever get used to being underground, in the dark. I clenched my staff tighter to keep my hand from shaking.

“Are you all right?” Sam asked, just behind me as she had been for nearly the entire trip so far.

“I’m...” I took a deep breath. “I’m not all that good with dark places, especially with monsters that want to eat me.”

She chuckled weakly. “Is anyone?”

That was a good question. The others all had tense looks on their faces, too, all had eyes that darted from shadow to shadow. I wasn’t the only one scared half to death. That was comforting, in a way. “I guess not. At least, not anyone sane. Not anyone I know.”

Sam looked toward Tyler, nodding his head to some musical beat only he could hear. I got the hint. But even as oblivious as he seemed, his face had the cast of someone who would jump three feet if she said boo to him, his lips in a tight line and his eyes squinting.

I headed to the right. That way sloped down, so it seemed it would have the best chance at being the correct way. The logic was flawed—the cavern could rise and fall many times in a short distance—but it gave us somewhere to start. We were off the map, after all. Sam drew a big arrow on the natural side of the wall, pointing through the hole and back toward the surface.

The surface. How long had we been underground, anyway? It seemed like days, but checking my watch, it had only been four and a half hours. It was not even quite noon yet. We had all been snacking as we walked, but we should probably stop and have lunch within a couple of hours. Our mission was going to take a while.

We were lucky. The tunnel remained large enough for us to walk through, though it was anything but level and smooth. There were occasional shelves of rock we had to duck under and points where we had to squeeze through a narrow space for a few feet, but we didn't have to crawl or turn around because things got too tight. That was good. What was bad was that we saw no sign of anyone ever having passed that way before. No footprints, no trash, nothing.

The air was stale and had a wet, musty smell to it. Water dripped on us occasionally, creating damp spots on the floor. There was no sunlight, so moss wouldn't grow there. I guess it was lucky. The last thing I needed was to slip on moss and crack my head on stone as I fell.

"You know I'm not really religious," Sam said as we picked our way through a cavern that had opened up from the tunnel. "My parents are Buddhist, but I see religions as more of an academic study than something to dictate my life."

"Yeah," I said, stepping over what looked like the start of a stalagmite. I looked up and saw a fair-sized stalactite that may eventually meet with it. In a few thousand years.

"But this whole Inferno thing has me thinking."

"Inferno? Oh, the book. Dante. Our English assignment. We're facing monsters in the dark and you're thinking of schoolwork?"

She looked at me as if she didn't know who I was. "I'm always thinking about schoolwork. You know that."

"Ah, right," I said. "I guess I do."

"Anyway, the story is all about how the Catholic God handed out punishment for the sins people committed in their lives. As Dante traveled through hell, he saw how fitting the trials were for these souls. Gluttons could never get enough to eat, greedy people had nothing but their rags, all that stuff. It was all about justice and balance and people getting their due reward for their actions."

"Do we really have to talk about hell and schoolwork—which some would say are the same thing—right now?"

"I was just thinking," she said, ignoring my protests, "that maybe, in a way, these creatures are fitting punishment for our actions. Maybe we're like the ones who couldn't commit to either good or bad, endlessly chasing a banner with nothing on it."

I stopped and turned to look at her as she ran into me. She was looking to her left, scanning the edges of the headlamp light.

“What are you talking about, Sam?” I said.

“We kind of go in and violate the earth, strip mining on the surface and boring tunnels below ground to take part of the ground away. Maybe this is nature’s, or some god’s, way of telling us we’re not being nice.”

“You think this is a punishment from God?” I asked. “That dark shadow monsters are taking children to teach us a lesson?”

“No, not really, but it has me wondering if there is some kind of balance or justice in the universe.”

“Sam,” I said, letting my irritation come through in my voice. “My little brother can be a pain, but he’s done nothing to deserve being eaten by monsters. There’s no justice in that.”

“I know, Dani. Don’t take it like that. It’s just strange that we’re reading that book and this should happen at the same time. I’m only trying to understand it all. Forget I said anything. I’m sorry if I made you mad.”

“It’s okay,” I said, expelling a breath. “I’m not mad, not really. It surprised me, that’s all.” I started walking again. I wouldn’t tell her I had been thinking about the book, too. It was a coincidence. Too strong a coincidence. Not everything in life had a reason, right? This was all random. I’d have to remind myself of that as we went along.

I didn’t even have time to finish my thought. A shadow flitted across my headlamp beam and I heard a gasp from behind me. I stepped forward and snapped my staff into a guard position. We had company, and it was up to me to play the good hostess.

Chapter 13

The shadows around us seemed to come alive, wriggling and pulling themselves free of the walls and crevices in the tunnel. I froze for a moment as I flashed back to the familiar nightmare. I found myself panting.

It wasn't more than a second or two until my training took over. Without conscious thought, I closed the distance on one of the dark forms and struck at it. It moved like it truly was a shadow, twisting and sliding around my staff. It took two more swings before I actually made contact with a dull, satisfying thunk of the hardwood staff.

It circled me, warier now that it had felt my weapon. As it did, I caught what was happening around me in my peripheral vision. Another shadowling was grabbing at Madison, trying to pull her away from the others. She screamed and slapped ineffectually at her assailant, but it hardly noticed. It was too busy dodging Jacob's and Tyler's weapons. The escrima sticks and crowbar were too slow to strike it, but maybe they'd get lucky and get a hit in by accident. I had my own concerns right now.

My adversary lunged at me, swiping with its claws. It was a half-hearted attack, obviously not meant to actually cut me. I figured it was a feint, so I did what it probably didn't expect. I slapped the claw aside with my staff and stepped forward. Toward the shadowling. Its nostrils flared, a gesture much too human for my comfort, but it was too late for it to do anything. I swung the end of the staff down so fast I heard it whistle in the air as it came down over its arms and contacted its head. The thud sounded like hitting an unripe melon with a hard rubber mallet.

The creature swayed from the strike, took a single step backward to try to regain its balance. I moved toward it and spun the other side of the staff down hard, striking it in exactly the same place. The sound had more of a cracking sound this time. Before it could move, my staff came around again and I slammed it into the side of its head with enough force to throw it against the wall. It hit the stone, bounced a little, and crumpled to the ground.

I wasn't sure if I had killed it or not, but I didn't have time to check. Instead, I turned to survey the scene. Tyler and Jacob were still swinging their weapons at the creature that had been trying to take Madison. It attempted to ward off the blows, swiping at the air in front of it to make them back off.

My mom was fumbling at her waist, trying to take her gun out, while Rick slashed at another of the creatures with his sword. He actually looked like he knew how to use the weapon. They were okay for now.

Emily and Zach faced another shadowling. They took turns swinging at it, Em with her cudgel of a walking stick and Zach with his baseball bat. They were doing even worse than Tyler and Jacob, though. As I watched, the creature snatched the stick from Emily's hand and threw it away from them. Before it clattered to the ground, I was in motion, charging toward the trio.

Emily screeched and backed from the monster stalking toward her. Zach was winding up to strike it with his bat, but he was swinging so slowly, the shadowling was hardly paying attention. Its eyes were fixed on the girl, and it was moving toward her, hands grasping the air in front of it as if to snatch her from ten feet away.

I got there just as it reached out to grab her. I hadn't even stopped fully when I slammed my staff down hard on its outstretched arm. It howled in pain and pulled its injured limb back. Then it turned to me, hatred in its dark, too-human eyes.

That was the only distraction needed. Momentarily forgotten, Zach connected with the baseball bat. He had swung it like he was going for a grand slam home run. It caved in the back of the creature's head, and it dropped to the ground, twitched a few times, and then lay still.

A gunshot boomed and the shadowling that had been attacking my mother fell. Rick was already sprinting toward the last creature, which was still occupied with Tyler's crowbar and Jacob's sticks. While it was fending off their blows, Rick lunged in from the side and punched his sword into the creature's abdomen. It screamed until Rick pulled the blade free, brought it around in a tight circle, and slashed horizontally at the creature's neck. Its head rolled free, spraying Tyler with dark blood. The musician gasped, sputtered and spit, and started retching. Thankfully, he didn't actually throw up.

I swung my headlamp around the corridor, looking for more enemies. There didn't seem to be any. I moved it more carefully, the beam illuminating each of my friends in turn so I could see if they were all right. None seemed to be injured. I let a long breath out. We had survived an assault from the shadowling. But how many more would we have to get through?

I thought of the security force sent into the mines and how they disappeared without a trace. How had we beat the shadowling when men with guns didn't? I had to chalk it up to not being ambushed by the creatures and the probability that there were many more of them attacking the security guards. I just hoped our luck held up.

We continued on our way, leaving our fallen enemies behind.

"Did you see?" Emily was saying to Zach. "That thing, it snaffled my cudgel. Right out of the air. Then it threw it away."

"I saw," Zach said. "I guess it's good it didn't use the weapon. We can be thankful for that."

"I suppose," Emily said.

Zach had a point there. These things were hard enough to fight without them using weapons, too.

"I'm tired," Madison whined.

"I know, Maddie," Jacob said. "We're all tired. We have to keep on going. Allison is still out there.”

“I know, but can’t we just get these scrappy little people to go fetch her for us? My feet hurt, and there may be more of those monsters out there. They tried to kidnap me!”

“Yes. I saw it. I’ll protect you. We need to find Allie, though.”

I noticed my mother’s head turning toward the two when she heard that name. People called her Allie, also. She turned her face back toward the tunnel. She, like the rest of us, concluded it was better to ignore Madison.

“But I didn’t know it would be so hard to find her,” the cheerleader continued.

“What,” Zach said. “Did you think you’d walk in, bat your eyelashes, throw some money around, and all the murderous cave monsters would bow down and do whatever you wanted? Stop your whining.”

Madison looked aghast and turned expectantly to Jacob. His mouth tightened into a straight line. He looked daggers at Zach and started to say something, but I spoke first.

“Zach, she’s just concerned about her sister, like you are about your dad and I am about Bobby. We can take a short break to rest, but let’s not bicker. It’s hard for all of us.”

Zach threw his hands up and sighed, but didn’t say anything. Madison huffed as she turned to find a spot near the wall, dusting a patch of floor so she could sit. Jacob looked at me, emotionless at first, but then his eyes met mine and he nodded before turning to go sit with Madison.

“Nicely handled,” Sam said, throwing her pack down and sitting next to it in the middle of the corridor. I guessed it was as good a place as any. I sat down next to her, cross-legged.

“Thanks,” I said. “There will be more of that. The stress is going to keep building the longer we go on. I hope we get to the point where we become more comfortable with being down here—” I looked at the surrounding darkness and fought the panic trying to take me “—and start acting like a team rather than several different individual groups. Our lives may depend on it.”

“You’re thinking of that team-building exercise we did in P.E., huh?”

“I guess I am,” I said. “There’s something to that stuff, you know. If we can act like a team, maybe things won’t be as bad.”

“Yeah.” Sam had a faraway look in her eyes. P.E. was not her favorite subject. She was a brain, a nerd. She did all right in the required physical education, but it wasn’t...academic enough for her.

Someone tapped my shoulder. I looked up to see Jacob standing there, sticks in his hands. Sam got up and went to Zach and Emily.

“Hey,” he said, trying to catch my eyes again, and failing as I focused on his mouth. Such a nice mouth. Behind him, Madison glared at me. “Great job defusing that little situation just now. I’m tired and my temper is short. If you hadn’t stepped in, I probably would have said some things...well, thanks for dealing with it.”

“Sure,” I said. How could someone so popular and so absolutely gorgeous be such a nice guy? And polite, too. It didn’t seem possible. “We’re all on edge. I don’t want us to fight. We have to be a team. If we're splintered, we may not survive this."

"Yeah, you're right."

I wasn't sure what to say. Should I say anything? He was standing there looking at me and I was looking back at him. Heat started rising from my neck up through my face. My mind scrambled to think of something to say. Anything to say.

"I was wondering," he finally said, and I'm pretty sure I exhaled loudly enough for him to hear. For everyone to hear. "If you'd show me a few things with the sticks like you offered. You know, if you have a minute and aren't too tired. And if you want to."

"I do," I said, maybe a little too quickly and too loudly. As my words echoed in the tunnel, I felt everyone's eyes shift to me. I really needed to modulate my volume in this tomb we were passing through.

I stood up, looked at my staff, then around us to see if there was anywhere to lean it. There wasn't. He smiled at me and put his hand out to take it from me. I shrugged and smiled back. When he handed the sticks over, I took them, one in each hand, and stepped back a little from him.

"You're a wrestler, so you know about center of gravity, balance, and generating power through body movement, especially the trunk." He nodded at that. "Apply what you know to using the sticks." I noticed others paying attention, too, some blatantly and others more slyly.

"I won't bother with too many defensive maneuvers because a strong offense is probably better in this case. Those things don't have any finesse at all. They just use brute force attacks.

"So, first, hold the sticks like this, with your grip a hand's length or two from the end. Don't hold them at the very end. Remember that they are an extension of you, like extra length added to your arm. You don't have to grip them so tightly that you make your forearms ache. You don't want your grip too loose, either, or they'll come out of your hands when you strike. Find the balance, or you'll either exhaust yourself or drop them. Supple wrists are the key." I wagged the sticks in front of him to show him how to hold them.

"Don't limit yourself to just swinging them like a baseball bat, either," I continued. "There are eight angles of attack." I rapidly struck an invisible opponent, straight down from the top, diagonally downward from right to left, horizontally from right to left, and so on. I struck quickly with the right stick and then mirrored the motions with the left stick. The whoosh of the weapons cutting the air seemed loud in the cavern. No one else spoke. "Remember that you can also use back-handed strikes, not just frontways." I demonstrated.

"You are so fast," he said, eyes wide. I began to feel flushed again.

"You don't have to try to strike so fast that your form is compromised, but speed is a big part of using these weapons. They are relatively light, compared to a baseball bat." I nodded toward Zach. "Or even a staff—" I motioned to my weapon in his hands, "—so speed makes up for not weighing as much. These are hardwood, though, so they're resilient enough to really strike your target and do some damage without breaking. I think it's kamagong wood."

“Got it,” he said. “Strike fast, but not so fast that I’m wild.”

“Exactly,” I said. “Did you notice how I moved with them, how I generated power?”

His eyes dropped to the floor. Was he...embarrassed? How absolutely adorable. “You swiveled your hips,” he said. Was he blushing? Oh my God. I wanted to kiss him so badly, but with our audience, that would never happen. I had to face it, even without an audience, it wouldn’t.

“Right,” I said. It even came out like my face wasn’t on fire and I didn’t have a thousand butterflies swirling around in my stomach. “All your power comes from the hips, from your trunk.” I thought of his abs—one of the main reasons I watched the boys’ water polo matches—and had to push the thought to the back of my mind or I wouldn’t be able to think at all.

“Could you show me again, a little more slowly?” he asked. He still wasn’t meeting my eyes, but this time it was because he wasn’t trying to.

I performed a few strikes, more slowly than before. “Make sure you’re balanced. There are specific stances for fighting and using the sticks, but do what is comfortable and feels in balance for you.” As I delivered a few strikes with each stick, I exaggerated my hip rotation to show him clearly where the power came from. His eyes fixed on my hips, and my belly turned over. The fire that was boiling beneath the skin of my face flared hotter than the sun. I started to sweat.

I stopped. If he stared at me any longer, I was pretty sure I’d burst into flames. “Keep the wrists supple and let the sticks flow with your body’s movement. So, you got it?”

“I think so,” he said, finally looking up so our eyes met for a split second. I started to slip into those dark eyes and had to look away.

We swapped weapons. As we did so, I saw Sam’s wry smile and Madison’s intensified glare.

“Try it out,” I said.

He did. With a few minor corrections, he was swinging the sticks more smoothly in no time.

“You look great,” I said, wincing inwardly at my wording. I pushed on. “It looks like you’re more comfortable with them already.”

“I am,” he said, flashing his killer smile. “Thank you so much, Dani. This might just save my life.”

“I hope so,” I said. “I’ll show you some combinations later, if we get the chance.”

“Sounds great.” He put both sticks in one hand took a half step toward me, looking like he was going to hug me. Then his eyes darted toward Madison and the others and he sighed. Just a little. “Thanks. I’ll practice as we walk.”

He turned and walked back toward Madison, who was already whispering at him. I caught a “treating her like she’s important” before they turned toward the wall and the sound was lost to me.

So much for being able to sit and rest. Still, I felt energized. I faced my mother and couldn’t hide the smile on my face. Hers matched mine for a second, but then her expression dropped into one of worried concern. Yeah, I couldn’t forget that Bobby was out there and we needed to go get him back. There was no time for me to awkwardly flirt with the most perfect guy who’d ever existed.

“Let’s get going,” I said, turning toward the blackness ahead. I had almost forgotten for a moment how tense things were, how dark and scary and dangerous they were. Almost.

Chapter 14

Not even half an hour later, three more shadowling found us. This time, we were a little more organized. Between Rick's sword, my mom's gun, and the rest of us attacking in two groups, we made short work of the trio.

As I spun to generate force to crack the skull of the last of the creatures, I noticed a shape in the far side of the cavern. The chamber we'd fought in was wider than the corridor we had been passing through, a hollowed out area probably twenty feet from wall to wall. On one edge of the room, there were several cave formations, broken pillars and a configuration that looked like a hand fan. Crouching on top of one of the stalagmites was one of the shadowling.

It was different than the others, though I couldn't tell at first what made it so. Was it taller, heavier, shaped differently? I couldn't really place the variance. Its color was slightly different in the glow of my headlamp, maybe a little lighter, or maybe with some color in it. Anyway, it looked right at me, then dropped to the floor and scrambled away, quickly disappearing out of the beam of my light.

"Did anyone else see that shadowling sitting on the broken pillar over there?" I said, pointing with my staff to where it had been.

No one had. It started me wondering if I had imagined the whole thing.

"Dani," Emily said. "There's something I've been wondering about."

"What is it, Em?"

"Well, we're not being all that quiet. I mean, we talk and stomp around, we yell when we get attacked, and the gun—"she looked toward my mother—"well, we're making an awful racket."

"I know," I said. "I don't like it. It'll draw attention to us. I don't see what we can do, though. When we get attacked, we have to fight. The gun is the most powerful weapon we have."

"I know," she said. "That's not really what I was talking about. What I've been wondering about is even with all this noise, even with having killed some of the monsters, why are they attacking only three or four at a time? Do you think there are only a few of them? If so, how did they defeat and capture more than a dozen armed security guards? It just seems strange to me."

"To me, too, Em. I don't know the reason. That makes me uncomfortable. I can understand creatures trying to take us and eat us, but this, it makes no sense."

“Maybe they’re trying to herd us?” Sam said, coming around my left side. “Maybe they’re directing us somewhere where they can take us all out.”

“But that doesn’t make sense,” I said. “If there are more of them, why not just attack us with everything they’ve got? Doing it in small groups only allows us to kill some of them.”

“Maybe they want us alive,” Sam said.

That stopped me cold. “I don’t know. Even if they did, why not overwhelm us with shadowling and capture us that way? We only have one gun, and they can’t be too afraid of that. They took on that whole armed security force. I guess we’ll just have to continue on and see what happens. If there’s some kind of strategy, I can’t see it.”

We had all been pretty lucky. No one had any injuries. At least, they didn’t as far as I could tell. We’d outnumbered the groups that had attacked us, so we were able to evade them while others struck at them. I wasn’t sure how long that would last, but I was glad no one had been injured yet.

We picked up our packs and moved on. Sam diligently marked each intersection with chalk so we would be able to get out when we were done. It occurred to me that the shadowling might be intelligent enough to know what the chalk was for and wipe it off, but I didn’t mention it to anyone. There wasn’t really anything we could do about it if that were the case, except maybe try to scratch the stone. But that would be time-consuming and could be obscured, too.

My breathing had stabilized, though it stayed faster than it would be if I was at home, on the surface. Not trapped in the dark underground with vicious monsters. I closed my eyes and took a deep breath. Funny how closing my eyes made me feel more comfortable when darkness was the thing that freaked me out most. The cold air of the cave was refreshing, though a little stale. It was cool enough to seem brisk but not enough to burn as I breathed it in.

Tyler’s incessant humming, singing, and sound effects were actually a help as we went along. It gave me something familiar to latch onto, something that spoke of the surface and sunlight and the absence of crazed homicidal monsters. As I swung my headlamp from side to side, scanning the corridor in front of me, I even found myself humming along at times.

The cave was not what I had expected. At times, the tunnels we passed through were relatively flat—though they all seemed to slant downward at least a little—and we could walk as we had in the mine somewhere above, upright and two side-by-side. At other times, we had to wriggle through narrow spaces, climb over rock formations, or hunch to get through an area.

All around, there were fantastical shapes that, if I wasn’t so nervous about being attacked, I could probably recognize as looking like familiar structures or objects. It all got old within the first hour anyway. There were only so many types of configurations formed in a growing cave, and once you’ve seen them a few times, they just don’t hold the wonder they did at first.

Less than half an hour after the last attack, the creatures found us again. This time, there were six of them. The tunnel we were in was not wide. In fact, it narrowed between our position and where the shadowling were. Tactically, it was a horrible place for them to attack us, but they did it anyway.

There was only room for two of us to fight up front. Rick and I took the front-line positions and waited for the dark shapes to come to us. In the bottleneck, the two of us probably could take on three times their number; only one or two could come at us at a time.

I was a little concerned. I had trained with the staff for years, so I knew how to use it in a small space when necessary. It was just a matter of using front-to-back motions instead of wide swings. I wasn't sure about Rick, though.

He had proven to be pretty good with those swords of his. I even saw him use both at the same time, the longer katana in his right hand and the smaller wakizashi in his left, during the last fight. Still, I wasn't sure he had the skill to keep from cutting me by accident. I hugged the left wall of the tunnel while fighting, allowing him as much room on my right as I could.

I hadn't needed to do that. I wondered if he had any formal training. The way he shifted his stance to slash and lunge forward rather than with circular motions to the side actually impressed me. He was not only skilled with those weapons, he was smart, too.

As we fought, my mother stepped up occasionally and shot between us. The first time she did it, it scared the living daylights out of me. The second time, it just irritated me because of my ringing ears. In no time, we had taken the six creatures down. As the last one fell, I saw a shape, just on the edge of my lamplight. It was that same shadowling—I'd bet on it—standing off to the side, watching. Its eyes met mine, and then it calmly stepped back, out of the light, and disappeared.

"Was that another one?" Mom said. "Over there?" She pointed the gun at where the creature had been.

"Yes," I said. "It's the same one I spotted earlier. It just observes. I'm not sure what to make of it."

"Maybe it's some kind of spy," Tyler said from behind me. "Maybe it's going to watch and then report back to the mother ship or something."

"Do you think they're aliens?" Madison asked, the first thing she'd said in at least an hour. "Are they taking people away to put them on their ships and do experiments on them?"

"I'm sure they're not, Maddie," Jacob said, directing a stern look at his friend. "Why would aliens come and then hide in caves?"

"Then what are they?" she said. "No one has answered that question for me yet. What are these things, and why did they take my sister?"

That stopped all discussion. Honestly, for an airhead, she had nailed the question we all wanted answered. The problem was, it didn't seem like anyone could answer it. We stood around for a full minute, everyone looking at everyone else. Then, almost as if someone had given us a cue, we stepped over the bodies of the newly killed shadowling and continued down the uneven corridor as it narrowed and then widened enough so that three people could walk side-by-side.

"You're really good with those," I said to Rick as we began walking. "You didn't have any formal training at all?"

He eyed me and a little smirk grew on his face. “No formal training. Just a lot of samurai and kung fu movies and countless battles with dastardly imaginary villains to save the princess.”

“It’s nice to know there are some good, old fashioned heroes around,” I said. “Or samurai. Or ninjas. Or whatever.”

“I seem to have noticed another one near also,” he said, tilting his head toward Jacob and raising his eyebrows. My scalp got hot and, in another second, my face did likewise.

It was stupid, silly banter, but I needed it. The weight of the stone pressed down on me, and an urgency burned in me. I can’t really explain it, but it felt like I was looking at an hourglass as the last little bit of sand slid through. It felt like something was going to explode, and I didn’t know if I’d be able to withstand the blast.

Chapter 15

“What is that?” Sam asked. She was up front with me. Our positions changed around as we walked, and she maneuvered her way up to me. Zach and Emily seemed to be sticking together and, of course, Jacob and Madison were joined at the hip. Rick was here mainly because he was my mother’s friend, so they were together, too, leaving Sam to join me up in the front where it was most dangerous. She was my best friend, after all. Tyler brought up the rear, tapping on the walls like they were a drum set.

“What is what?” I asked.

“That, right there.” She pointed to something up against the wall, barely visible in her headlamp beam.

I swept the area with my light, checking for any creatures hiding in the shadows. We went over to the shape. It was a jacket. One of the security guard jackets, with the American flag on one arm and an eagle on the other. The name embroidered on it with light blue thread was Derek. It was the first evidence of people we’d seen since we got into the natural caves.

“What is it?” Mom asked.

“It’s one of the security guards’ jackets,” I said.

“Is there blood on it?” Rick asked.

“No.” I turned it over, looking at it carefully in my headlamp. There were no stains of any kind on it.

“Is there any kind of alien slime on it?” Tyler asked, poking his head over my mom’s shoulder. Jacob’s hand slapped the top of his head.

“Ow,” Tyler cried. “I was just asking. You never know, you know.”

“What does it mean?” Emily asked.

“I’m not sure it means much of anything,” I said.

“I think it means we’re on the right track,” Rick said. “We know at least one person is this way.”

The words were barely out of his mouth before a dark shape landed on top of him, bearing him to the ground. Light from headlamps flashed wildly, and in that light, what seemed to be a dozen shadows made flesh leapt at us.

I spun in time to mostly evade the creature trying to tackle me. It skipped off my staff and landed hard on a rock protruding from the wall next to me. Two hard blows with my weapon later, it lay unmoving.

The world was a maelstrom of flashing lights and shadows as everyone flung their heads around trying to see what was happening. The cavern was large enough to move around in, but still cramped with all the bodies shifting, lunging, dodging, and fighting in it.

A gunshot rang out, followed by a pained scream. I hoped my mother didn't shoot one of us by accident. I thought of telling her that, but two shapes came at me, and I only had time to try to keep from being killed.

The shadowling attacked differently than before. Before, they mostly tried to grab us, take us away. Now, they were using their claws, slashing at us. I knew I didn't want to be cut by those wicked looking nails.

I back-stepped, spinning my staff to smack away the claws coming at me. These creatures were so fast, I was nearly hit several times but somehow got my weapon up in time to block or parry the blows. The two in front of me seemed to be working together, another new thing.

They also had different styles. One was faster, striking at me and moving like a boxer so it didn't present an easy target. The other one, well, I would have considered it a bruiser. I'd fought many of those, opponents who tried to knock you out in one punch, moving slowly but with the force of a tidal wave. Strange that none of the other creatures we'd battled had showed differences like this.

I breathed and calmed myself. Fighting was familiar to me. I had to think of it as sparring, not life or death. The creatures' large eyes reflected my lamplight back at me as I swung my head. When the beam shone in those orbs, the shadowling flinched, even if just a little. It gave me an idea.

I took one more step back and ran into something soft. I twisted to the side to evade one of my assailant's claws and threw a look over my shoulder. It was Madison, standing stone still with her hands over her mouth, eyes wider than I'd ever seen hers. She was useless. I thought of luring one of the monsters fighting me to attack her as a distraction, but immediately rejected the idea. She'd be killed, and it would be my fault. I might feel bad about that. Eventually.

One of the creatures swung at me, and I saw an opening. I jabbed at its face with the end of my staff, cracking bones in its nose, and spun to the side where my other foe was, the boxing one. It leaped toward me, both claws out, ready to slice me to ribbons. I tilted my head just enough to shine the headlamp in its eyes. It blinked and shook its head, its momentum stalling. I took the opportunity to swing the end of my weapon up as hard as I could.

It connected with the creature's crotch.

I hadn't been sure if it would work, but as the force of the blow lifted it off its feet a couple of inches, the monster howled. Their anatomy was not that much different than ours, then, it seemed. I couldn't really tell with the pants it was wearing. I thought had seen a few of the creatures with breasts, which this one did not have, so I thought maybe they reproduced like humans. Apparently, the point I struck was a vital area, like with us.

I shifted my momentum, dropping down into a lower stance and rotating my hips to redirect the energy and strike the other shadowling with the same end of my staff. The satisfying crack as it came down on its head told me it would be out for the time being. Glancing at Madison, standing a few feet away from me, I shook my head and looked for my next opponent.

Sam didn't really have any weapons—something I needed to remedy—but she was smart and cool-headed and seemed to be doing more than some of the others. As Zach and Emily swatted away claws coming at them, Sam had brought out that flashlight she was so proud of. It was billed as a digital torch, and that was a good name. I had felt the beam when it was on a medium setting, and it was hot. Very hot. It was as bright as a spotlight. Sam was using it to blind the creatures, having figured out their sensitivity like I had.

Zach was back-stepping toward a wall, swinging wildly with his bat, trying to keep from being sliced by the claws whirling in front of him. Emily was striking at the creature attacking Zach, not noticing the one coming up around on the other side of her, ready to pounce. If I called, it would only panic her, so instead I sprinted the few feet and lunged at the shadowling sneaking up on her.

At the same time, Sam brandished that laser-like flashlight and hit Zach's attacker in the eyes with the beam. It stumbled and Emily's cudgel struck a glancing blow off its head. Zach planted his feet and brought his baseball bat around, hitting the creature on the shoulder. The two of them fell upon the beast, raining blows on it as it hunched down to protect itself.

I had reached the other shadowling, swinging out low with my staff to knock its legs out from under it. It crashed to the ground, rolled, and came back up, murder in its eyes. It bared its teeth at me, fangs glistening with saliva in the light of my headlamp.

It jumped.

I was barely able to get my staff in front of me as its claws came toward me while it angled its head to get the perfect position for tearing out my throat with its teeth. This thing did not want to take me prisoner; it wanted to kill and eat me. I hadn't seen this type of ferocity before.

Catching its attack on the wooden weapon held in both hands in front of me, I rolled backward, kicking my feet up into its abdomen and pushing it upward. It flipped through the air, carried by its own momentum and my little boost, and struck a large rock formation behind me, head toward the floor and feet high. It grunted as it bounced off the rock and fell, but scrambled back to its feet in an incredibly short time.

I got to my feet at about the same time it did. I thought it had showed hatred before, but what I now saw in its face burned much hotter than what I had seen earlier. It spit and hissed, then made some kind of sound I'd never heard before, sort of a clicking, screeching sound. Was it cursing at me?

The shadowling crouched low, scuttling like an insect. The movement reminded me of a spider. When my mom's gun went off again, I jumped a little, but it didn't. It was focused completely on me. I could see in its eyes it wanted to kill me.

The creature sank lower, readying itself to spring. I'd seen the same movement, the same tense muscles, the sense of an impending explosion, in cats as they play fought with other felines. I shifted my grip on the staff, preparing to defend.

Just before the shadowling bounded at me, a loud chittering filled the corridor. My attacker's eyes flicked toward the source of the sound, and I shifted my gaze toward the same area. The creature, the one who was slightly different than the others, the one that had been watching us, was making the same types of sounds my current foe had earlier. It must have been their language.

It continued to click and screech at my opponent. The tone of the tirade was that of command. Was it their leader?

The shadowling in front of me continued to move side to side as it screeched back at the other which, I could see now, perched on a high rock formation overlooking the battle. The two exchanged words in their strange language, and my adversary seemed to get more and more frustrated. It hunkered down again, ready to leap despite apparently being told not to.

The leader chittered even more loudly, and all the other shadowling disengaged from the fight and disappeared into the darkness. All except the one in front of me.

It screamed and jumped at me, so fast that even though I was expecting it, it caught me unaware.

I saw the claws coming at me, the mouth opened wide to tear at me, the teeth flashing like sharp, little white daggers. I wasn't sure if I would be able to keep all three of its weapons from me this time.

The world slowed down, reduced to only the darkness, the hurtling form illuminated by my headlamp, and myself. A dozen movements flashed through my mind, ways I could keep from getting injured or killed. I discarded all of them immediately. It was already committed, too close for me to have time to react. I didn't even think I could twist out of the way in time. Was this how I would die?

A loud bang echoed through the cavern.

The creature twisted to the side as if it had been pushed while in mid air. It was enough to upset its trajectory and allow me to move just enough to the side to evade the strike. It landed hard on the stone floor, scraping across the grit there, bouncing and rolling, then sliding to a stop. I shone my lamp light onto it and saw what I knew would be there. Blood flowed out of a hole in the side of its head.

I slumped, leaning on my staff for support.

I looked over to see my mom, just a few feet away, drop her arm, the gun barrel trailing a wisp of smoke in the combined beams of our headlamps. She exhaled loudly.

And then she started to cry.

A few seconds later, I joined her.

Chapter 16

“What was all that about?” Sam asked several minutes later, when we had searched the area for more shadowling and determined that we were safe. “All that screeching?”

“It’s their language,” I said. I had regained my composure, as had Mom. I think it was the emotional weight of the situation. I’d felt the same thing when I won the state championship in sparring. “I think that other one, the one that’s different from all the others, was scolding that last one and telling it not to kill me.”

“Language?” Sam said. “Are you sure?”

“Not completely, but they have to have some way of communicating, right? They were arguing at the end there. I’d bet on it.”

“Do you realize what that means?” Rick said. “For some reason, that other one didn’t want us killed. Or, at least, it didn’t want you killed, Dani. I didn’t see it interceding with anyone else. At the very end there, it actually called off all the others, leaving that last one to die. In effect, it pulled back its front lines and left that one all alone. That shows a lot of intelligence. These things aren’t just crude beasts.”

“Yeah,” I said. “And that’s what is probably scariest of all. It’s also sad, because we have to kill them to survive.”

We spent a little time inspecting everyone to make sure no one was seriously injured. Zach had a minor scratch and a bruise from when he’d fallen down earlier. Jacob had a line of parallel gashes along one arm where sharp claws ripped through his sweatshirt and cut his skin. Rick had some bruises from the creature that had jumped on him and crushed him to the floor, but luckily no slashes. The others, including me, had no injuries to show for the battle.

“How many were there, anyway?” I asked. “I was too busy trying to keep from being killed to get a good count.”

“Ten or twelve,” my mom said. “Rick kept them back from me so I could take aim and shoot at them.”

“They’re upping their game,” I said. “No more small groups. Apparently, we deserve more resources now.”

“I have a question,” Emily said, raising her hand. I chuckled at that. Good old unassuming Emily, treating it like we were in school.

“What is it, Em?” I said.

“That one you’re calling the leader, what makes you think it’s in charge?”

“Mainly it’s because of how it tried to call off that other one when it looked like it would try to kill me. The leader seems more intelligent than the others, sitting back and watching instead of coming at us.”

“Maybe it’s just a coward,” Emily said. “How can you even tell if it’s the same one you saw before? All those things pretty much look the same to me.”

I thought back to the times I’d seen it, trying to pick out the details. “I think it’s a different color or maybe taller than the others, though it had those same torn pants as the others seem to wear.”

“I’ve seen it twice now,” Jacob said. “At least, I think it was the same one. I’m with Emily, though. It looks the same as the others. None of them really have a color. They blend in with any dark surroundings.”

“It’s the same one,” Rick said. “I’ve caught glimpses of it, too. It isn’t color or shape or anything like that. It’s the thing’s bearing.”

“Bearing?” Emily said.

“Yeah. It stands like it’s in charge. The others sort of skulk around, moving as if they don’t want to be noticed, even when they know they’ve been seen. That one, though, it holds itself like it’s a king or something.”

I thought back, picturing it. “You’re right. That’s what it is. I couldn’t place it, but that’s why it looked so different. I’m sure it’s in charge, and I’m sure it was trying to keep the one that got mad at me from killing me. But why?”

“Maybe they like to eat their food alive,” Tyler said.

Three different hands reached out and slapped his head.

We continued walking for less than an hour, until we got to a place where the tunnel widened into a cavern. We had been traveling all day. It was nearly eight o’clock at night, and it was obvious we wouldn’t be getting out anytime soon.

“I think we should stop for the night,” I said as we all came to a weary halt. “We’re too tired to go on. If we run into more of the shadowling, we may not be able to fight them off.”

The cavern was a large, pear-shaped space, strange rock formations on either side of a clear center. Three openings aside from the one we came through lined the wall. One was obviously a continuation of our route, another seemed to keep going in another direction—I scouted it but didn’t want to go too far from the others to check it out—and the third was a narrow tunnel that led to a wider area, a kind of room where we could all fit easily with enough space to move around. There was even a little sheltered portion separated from the rest of the chamber by a large, fan-shaped stone formation. There were no other entrances. It was perfect.

“We can sleep here,” I said. “Two people can stay awake in shifts to guard the group and make sure we're not attacked. If we are, the creatures will have to come at us one at a time because of the narrow entrance."

"I can't sleep here, on the ground," Madison said. She had been quiet for the last couple of hours, silently dragging her feet next to Jacob. She was making up for it now.

"That's fine," I said. "You can take the first watch then. If you can't sleep, you might as well guard us."

She sputtered, but couldn't come up with anything to say.

"Okay," Jacob said tiredly. "She and I will take first watch. Who do I need to wake up for the next shift, and when?"

I nodded to him, thanking him for helping to shut down Madison's whining. "Sam and I can take the next watch. Wake us in a couple of hours. After us...Mom, do you and Rick want to take the slot after that?" She nodded. "Good. Then Emily and Zach can take the last watch."

"What about me?" Tyler said.

"Oh. Do you want to join Jacob and Madison?"

"How about I take the watch with Emily? And that other kid."

"The name is Zach," Zach said.

"Nice to meet you, Zach," Tyler said. "I'm Tyler. We'll be on watch together." He smiled at Zach and found an area to curl up to sleep. Zach shook his head.

"Right," Emily said. "So we're going to get stuck in here for the night?"

"Yes," I told her. "You're on last watch, so you can get some sleep now."

"Great."

As I went to sleep, I heard Madison asking Jacob if there were spiders or snakes in the cave that would bite them as they slept. The last thing I remember is feeling a smile grow on my face at how much fun I could have with that.

Jacob shook me awake at around 11:00 PM. I was groggy, but as soon as I realized it was his hand touching me, I went from asleep to wide awake in two seconds. I liked the way his strong hands felt on my shoulder. I sighed and got up.

"Anything happen?" I asked.

"Other than Madison jumping every time someone snored? No, not much. Despite her claims to the contrary, she's already asleep, just in the time it took me to cross the cavern."

"That's good. I'm sorry if it's rude, but I think I prefer her asleep."

He laughed. "Sometimes, I know exactly what you mean. She's not a bad person, though. Just a little rough around the edges and different than most other people."

"Yeah," I said. "Different." I sat up and rubbed my eyes. He had let me sleep for almost three hours, but I was still exhausted. I'd take my turn, though. We all had to do our part. I started to move over to wake up Sam, and he gently grabbed my shoulder again.

"Hey, Dani," he said. "I wanted to thank you."

“Thank me? For what?”

“You’re the heart and soul of this thing. Without you, we wouldn’t have gotten this far. Hell, we probably wouldn’t have made it through the first shadowling that attacked us. When the rest of us were confused about what to do, you took charge. I’m team captain in my sports at school. I recognize a good leader, and you are one. So, thanks. If we succeed in this, it’ll all be because of you.” He squeezed my shoulder softly, tried to make eye contact again—I was able to avoid it—then turned and went back to where Madison was mumbling in her sleep.

“Nice,” Sam said, startling me. I hadn’t realized she was awake.

“Nice what?”

“He likes you,” she said. “I think you’ve got a shot with him. If he realizes what a troll he’s dating. And, you know, if we survive.”

“Yeah, right. Come on, we have some guarding to do.” I snuck a look at Jacob settling down to sleep, lying on his side on the cold stone floor. The shoulder he had touched still felt warm to me.

Nothing happened on our watch. We talked about what kind of animals might be in the cave and decided there probably weren’t any. I knew for sure there wouldn’t be snakes or other reptiles. It was too cold for that. I doubted bats would come this far in, also, because all their food was closer to the surface. At least we didn’t have to worry about getting bitten by something.

When it was time, I woke my mom and Rick up to take over for us. I felt kind of bad for them. The middle watch got the raw end of the deal. Their sleep was split down the middle by their watch, so they didn’t get to rest as much as the others, not in one chunk. I had the same situation, though, so I didn’t let it bother me too much.

Mom smiled at me and kissed the top of my head as she and Rick went over to the flat stone shelf near the front of the cavern. I smiled back at her, said goodnight, and settled back into my place to catch a few more hours of rest.

“I can’t believe it,” my mom’s voice said as it carried across the cavern. They weren’t speaking loudly, but I heard it anyway because of the acoustics of the place. “He refused to come. ‘I have to take care of my daughters,’ he said.”

“Allie, don’t be so harsh,” Rick said.

I tilted my ear toward where they were talking. I didn’t want to miss this. I hadn’t known that Rick knew about my mom and her boyfriend. She had never told me about Jesse. I had to figure it out on my own.

“Don’t be so harsh?” she said. “I asked him to come with me, to protect me as I searched for Bobby. He actually forbade me to go.”

“It is a dangerous thing,” Rick said.

“All the more reason he should have come with me. He’s a cop, for God’s sake. He’s an expert with a gun, trained to handle dangerous situations. He should be here protecting me.”

Rick had apparently decided that the best way to deal with the rant was to remain silent and just listen.

“Forbidding me to go,” she continued. “He should know better than to try telling me what to do. I begged him to come, to help keep me and Dani safe. Do you know what he said? Do you? He said, ‘I have two daughters I have to keep safe, Allie. I can’t go and you shouldn’t either.’ I told him I was going, and all he could say was that I shouldn’t.

“He told me he loved me. I guess that was a lie. How can you love someone and still turn your back on them when they need you most?”

I heard the rustling of Rick readjusting his position. I think he was uncomfortable in more than one way.

“Well?” she said, turning her anger on him.

“You’re doing the same thing,” he said so softly I almost didn’t make it out over the distance.

“What do you mean by that?” I could picture in my mind what her face looked like as she said it. She was probably sitting with her arms crossed under her breasts, shoulders drawn toward the front, her eyebrows pinched down and her forehead furrowed, her mouth set in a tight line. I’d seen that posture many times, and I was glad it wasn’t directed at me at the moment.

“Allie,” he said, “you’re mad at him for putting his daughters first, before you. You’re mad that he isn’t willing to leave them unprotected to go with you to rescue your son. He claims that it’s not sound thinking to enter a mine and chase after monsters that have kidnapped one who you love.”

“Damn right.”

“Yet you are doing the same thing. No, let me finish.” I heard his jacket rustle and was sure he was raising his arms toward her to gesture her not to interrupt him. “You normally wouldn’t condone this type of thing, going underground and searching for trouble. I mean, look at the situation. You didn’t even ask all these kids with us, all minors, if they had their parents’ permission to go.

“You cast off all common sense, all logical thinking and rushed down here without much of a plan at all, all of it to save your son. If Jesse is a bad boyfriend for putting his daughters first, doesn’t that make you a bad girlfriend for putting your son first, even to the point where you are putting your daughter at risk? Does that make you a bad parent?”

My mother gasped as he finished. I waited for the explosion, for her to yell at him for calling her a bad girlfriend, for her to scream at him for calling her a bad parent.

The silence was deafening, finally broken by a sharp intake of breath from one of the sleeping boys and then a snort.

“I’m not calling you those things, Allie,” he said consolingly. “I’m just saying that when it comes to those we love, there are times when nothing else in the world matters. In those times, situations in which we would sacrifice anything for our loved ones, who can say if it is good or bad?” I heard the movement of his down jacket again and knew he had picked up her hand. “Give him the benefit of the doubt. He may be selfish and uncaring, but he also may just be scared to death over his children.”

“Yeah,” she whispered. “I guess.”

They were silent for the next few minutes, during which time I fell back asleep. I didn't know anything again until Emily shook me awake at the end of her watch.

Chapter 17

I lay there on the cold floor of the cavern, my headlamp off to conserve the batteries. I guess it's true what they say about getting used to things. Before this little journey, I had to have lights on all the time. But I had been so terrified for so many hours the day before, a little darkness hardly seemed threatening. Still, I turned my headlamp on and breathed a little easier in the light.

I did not want to get up. My whole body was sore from the fighting the day before. I groaned as I levered myself up with my staff. The others didn't seem in any better shape. Except the three who had been on watch, that is. They seemed awake enough.

"Anything happen?" I asked Emily.

"No. Tyler and Zach were both trying to impress me." She giggled. "It was hilarious, and adorable. You should have seen it."

I smiled at her, but she cocked her head slightly. Okay, maybe it wasn't a convincing smile.

"Anyway," she said. "I better get my stuff together. I'm assuming we'll be starting off after eating something."

"Yeah," I said. "We still have a mission to complete."

Her frown reflected my feelings. Our mission. To find and rescue our loved ones. The entire thing pressed in on me, making me want to curl up in a ball until it all passed. The shadowling still had Bobby, and we still had to get him back. They knew we were here, probably knew exactly where we were, but we still had to try. Why were they playing this game? Why didn't they just swarm us and take us all prisoner? There was so much I still didn't understand.

"The way I see it, these creatures know what we're doing," Rick said as we were all eating whatever breakfast food we had in our packs. For me, it was oatmeal made with water I heated up on my little backpacking stove. "I don't know what they're waiting for, but I'm sure there are enough of them to capture us all. That presents some choices. Do we continue? Do we go back? Do we change the way we proceed, maybe splitting into two groups or taking passages more randomly? What do we do?"

"I really don't think any of that will make a difference," I said, swallowing the spoonful of oatmeal I'd been chewing. "They're in control here. It's their cave, the darkness is theirs, and we're way too unprepared to dictate what they do."

“Are you saying we should go back?” Jacob asked, concern mixed with sadness on his face.

“No, of course not. Bobby and Allison and Zach’s dad are all still out there. I won’t stop until they kill me or we rescue the captives. I’m just saying that no matter how we change the way we search the caves, we won’t fool them. They are letting us roam free for now, but they could probably capture or kill us at any time. The question is why they haven’t.”

Everyone else was silent. Maybe they were thinking about what I said, or maybe their thoughts were off somewhere else. I heard Tyler humming—it sounded like the Beatles’ Here Comes the Sun—and knew at least one person was thinking of other things.

“I say there’s nothing for us to do but to continue on,” I said, “deal with things as they happen, and hope we’re not in over our heads. It sounds irresponsible, but I can’t see any other way we can do it. Can anyone else?”

Silence again.

“Okay,” I said. “Let’s get going. I want to be out of this God-forsaken stone maze before another day passes.” There were grunts and other noises that sounded like affirmations.

We had barely gotten back into the main corridor before Sam, walking beside me, raised up her hands.

“Stop,” she said. “Wait.” She reached up and turned her headlamp on its strongest setting and then scanned the ground in front of us. Not satisfied with the light, she got out her super flashlight and flipped it on. She got down on her knees and moved her head from right to left as if following something. Getting up and walking to the edge of the cavern, she followed something with her eyes as she directed the beam up toward the ceiling.

My mother gasped.

I moved around Mom so I could get a better look at where Sam was shining her light. I finally saw it. Above us, suspended by some kind of cord, was a cargo net, its ends weighted. I looked more carefully at where Sam was looking on the ground and found a very thin, almost invisible line stretching across the floor.

A trip wire.

The creatures were tired of dealing with us. They would try to capture us without a fight. I felt several things at that moment. A little pride that they wanted to avoid combat with us. A little anger that they would do something like this, using the mine’s own equipment—nets used to hold down large piles of supplies—to try to trap us. Probably most strongly, though, I felt a little despair. These things were not stupid. At least one of them had the ingenuity to set a trap. True, it was a crude trap, but could I have done any better? I didn’t think so.

“I think we’re in a lot of trouble,” I said.

We made our way past the trap, Sam standing at the wire and making sure everyone carefully stepped over it. We inspected the area in front of us as we made our way out of the chamber, jumping at shadows and double checking every trick of the light that made it seem something could be in front of us. It was going to slow us down considerably.

“How did you even see that, Sam?” Zach asked. “I mean, even I, with my perfect vision—the best my eye doctor has ever seen, by the way—would have had trouble spotting it.”

“I’ve got pretty good eyes,” she said, shrugging. “I guess I just got lucky.”

“I think we got lucky,” I said, “that you were with us. I would have stepped right into it.”

Her face flushed and she looked away, down at the stone floor and to the left. That was why she saw the second trap.

“Shadowling!” she said, whipping out her super-flashlight and turning it on.

At least five of the creatures froze for a moment, holding their hands up to their eyes as the light bathed them. They had been waiting in a small alcove off the side of the passage we were in, hidden in the shadows.

I slid around Sam and struck at them while they were surprised. Someone to my left did the same, but I was focused on the shadowling, so I didn’t see who it was. It didn’t matter. The fact that someone was backing me up was good enough for me.

I clobbered two of them over the head with my staff before they started fighting back. Pushed up against the wall like that, they weren’t able to move effectively, so for every awkward swipe of a claw, we could hit them twice. I finally caught sight of who was next to me. It was Jacob. He swung the sticks almost like he knew how to use them. Nothing like a crash course to learn something.

As I jabbed my staff into the face of one of the creatures, a gunshot rang in the tunnel. Through the ringing in my ears, I heard sounds of a scuffle behind me. The shadowling must have been hiding on the other side of the tunnel, too. I wondered how many there were.

The attacker in front of me was looking around, eyes darting back and forth from my left side to my right. It was trying to find an escape path. I spun my weapon hard enough to knock its arm away and strike it a solid blow on the side of its head. It looked at me, an expression of sadness and resignation on its monstrous face, then it curled into a ball and waited for me to finish it.

Instead, I swung over it to strike the one next to it. Jacob was raining blows on the only other one still conscious, and it looked about to be knocked out. My new target hissed at me, swiping with its claws, but it didn’t have the room to do it effectively. I changed the momentum from a horizontal strike to flip the staff around for a vertical strike. It whistled downward, contacting the top of the shadowling’s head with a sickening crunch, and all the fight went out of the monster. It dropped to the floor, limbs splayed out beside it.

Jacob went to attack the shadowling that had curled up, but I stopped him.

“No. Don’t kill that one. I have a plan. Let it go.”

When no blows fell, the pitiful creature at my feet looked up through the claws it had wrapped around its head. There were still no attacks, so it bounded up and scurried into the darkness, as quick as a lizard.

The others were finishing off the other shadowling that had attacked them. I took a quick look around, saw everything was under control, and tore off after the escaped creature.

“I’m going to follow it,” I called over my shoulder. “Come with me as soon as you can.”

It was a scary run, and a short one. I tried to keep my prey in the beam of my headlamp at all times, but that was difficult to do. It was still a little dazed from the blow to the head, stumbling occasionally, but even with that, it moved effortlessly through the cave formations and tunnels of varying widths. It was like watching a monkey travel through a forest canopy.

I fell further behind and eventually lost sight of the creature completely. I stopped, panting. While I waited for the others to catch me—hopefully they kept sight of where I went, because I was completely lost—I took a good look around.

Some of the passages we had traversed were narrow and required squeezing through. At least, they did for me. That shadowling somehow zipped across them at nearly full speed. They were not the tunnels I would have taken. But then, I didn’t know where I wanted to go. I hoped the creature went straight for its home instead of where it thought it might be able to escape.

“Dani,” a voice echoed from where I’d come. “Are you down there?” It was Jacob. Of course, he was probably in the best shape of anyone else in the group. He’d be able to keep up with me in running after the beast.

I turned back toward him so my light would lead him to me. “I’m over here.”

I saw his light before I saw him. He walked up, squeezing through a narrow part of the passage, and stopped a few feet in front of me.

“Did you get it?”

“I wasn’t trying to get it,” I said. “I was trying to make it lead us to where we needed to go.”

“Oh.” He took a few deep breaths. “Damn, you’re fast. You should go out for track. You can just pretend you’re chasing monsters. You could win some meets for us.”

I laughed. “I’m not fast enough. I was hoping it would lead me right to where their lair is.”

“And did you ever think that maybe it would lead you right into another group of those things, or to another trap?” Sam said, huffing and puffing as she came through the narrow part of the tunnel. “Not very smart.”

“It was smart,” Zach said, “though maybe not very safe.” It seemed that the whole group was catching up to us.

When the last person, Madison, came through to the area we were all gathered, she had a withering look for Jacob. He shrugged, apology written all over his face. It didn’t do anything to soften that stance, though. Her feet were spread apart, hip cocked to the side, arms folded in front of her. She was the perfect picture of personal affront.

“Just what do you think you were doing, young lady?” my mother said. “That was stupid and brash, just running off like that.”

“I know,” I said, dipping my head to try to reduce the tongue-lashing I was about to get.

“You are not invincible, you know,” she said. “You can be hurt. Don’t go pulling any more stunts like that.”

“I’m tired of only reacting,” I said. “I feel like we’re being herded to somewhere they want us to go. They’re playing with us, but I don’t want to play their game. I’m not sure why they aren’t killing us or sending dozens of them against us, but I’m done with it. I don’t know if that one I chased was trying to lead me where it could escape or if it was panicked and actually fleeing to where it lives. I took a chance that it would show us the right passageways to find the ones they’ve taken.”

“I understand why you did it, Dani,” she said. “Just don’t make any more of those split-second decisions without talking to us first, okay? You scared me to death. What would have happened if it had led you into a bigger group of those things?”

“I probably would have been captured, and then you would have had to come rescue me.” I smiled at her, showing all my teeth. She shook her head at me.

“I agree with you, for what it’s worth,” Rick said as we looked around the area we were in. “It’s always better to have your own plan than to just react to what your adversary is doing. It’s too bad that shadowling got away, though. Do you think we can use another one to lead us again?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “That trick probably won’t work again. We’ll have to try something else. At least we’re on the right track now. If it was going toward its home.”

We had a choice to make. There was the narrow passage we had come through, and there were four other openings of various sizes coming off the section of tunnel we were in. It was sort of shaped like a summer squash, narrow at the end we came in and getting wider and rounder on the other end. I guess that made the place we were in some kind of intersection.

“It continued on that way,” I said, pointing in the direction almost across from where we had come in. “It could be one of three tunnels, though I’m thinking it was one of those two.” I gestured toward two wells of darkness that resolved into two passages when Sam shone her light at them.

“Left or right?” Sam said, asking no one in particular. Really, though, she seemed to be looking at me, waiting on what I would say. In fact, everyone was looking at me.

To ease my discomfort, I inspected the floor in front of each of them, hunching down to get a better look.

“This one,” I said, choosing the left passage.

“Why that one?” my mother asked.

“More activity here. The dirt seems more disturbed, the little bits of stone and gravel are more parted here, pushed to the side of the cavern. I think this tunnel has seen a lot more people—or things—than the other one. That’s what we’re looking for, the place where these things pass through a lot.

“Sam, can you go back and mark the walls we passed while chasing the shadowling?”

“I already did,” she said. “I’ve been keeping a big piece of chalk in my pocket and as we ran after you, I quickly marked the walls.”

“That was great thinking. Good, I don’t want to get lost coming back out of here.”

As I spoke, she marked the wall in front of me with a big X and drew an arrow down the corridor back toward where we had come from. I hoped we would be able to use those chalk marks. I tried to suppress the thought that we might not be coming back out, but it was hard.

“Nothing to do but go forward,” I said, hitching up my pack and starting down the selected tunnel. We were alive, for now, and that meant there was a chance to do what we’d come to do. It would have to be enough.

Chapter 18

“I was thinking about it,” I said to Jacob, who had come up to walk at the front with me for a while. “Maybe not all these creatures are bad.”

“What do you mean?” he said, turning his head to look at Madison, who was walking next to him with a sour look on her face.

“I was thinking maybe the shadowling are like humans. You know, some of them are good and some of them aren’t. Some don’t want to hurt us while others do. Some might want to eat us and some others don’t. I don’t think it’s always black and white. Or light and shadow, as it were.”

“You’re thinking about the one cowering in front of you earlier, huh?” he said.

“Yeah, that’s part of it. I’m also thinking about that leader, how he tried to talk the other one out of killing me. If these things were just mindless beasts trying to eliminate us or to take us as food, we already agreed they could have done it by now. Pretty easily, too. Even if they just gathered all those we’ve seen and fought so far, attacking at once, there’s no way we could have withstood that.”

“I know what you mean,” he said. “It’s kind of humbling. I think it’s pretty obvious we’re no match for them and their numbers.”

“We’re not. I wish I understood why they’re holding back.”

We both lapsed into silence, and eventually he and Madison were replaced by Sam. We continued on, speaking of little things, trying to pretend we were anywhere else. There were no side passages for over an hour, though we looked for them carefully.

“When do you think we’ll get to the section with the burning sands?” she asked after we’d been silent for several minutes.

“What?”

“The burning sands. You know, the ones reserved for the people who were violent against nature. In the book.”

“Oh,” I said. “In Inferno. You’re still stuck on that, huh?”

“It’s a fitting punishment for people who act against nature, don’t you think? All of them are pretty fitting, though I am not so sure about Dante’s opinion on which sins are most serious. I mean, giving murderers a lesser punishment than liars? Still, most of it makes some kind of sense.”

“Sam,” I said. “We’re not in Dante’s hell. We’re in a different kind of hell. This isn’t a punishment, just something that happened to us. Or that happened to the ones we loved. We chose to come here. Not that I had much choice.”

“Like Dante,” she said.

“Oh, Sam.” I sighed.

“I also wonder about the punishment given to the thieves. You know, they’re surrounded by vipers and when they get bit, they turn into vipers themselves and stay that way until they bite someone else.”

“I didn’t read that far,” I said.

“Do you think if these things bite us, we’ll turn into one of them?” she asked.

That made me stop and think. “You mean, like a werewolf?”

“No, like the vipers.”

“I…” I wasn’t sure what to say. I hadn’t thought of it that way. “I don’t want to talk about this anymore. Let’s change the subject.”

“Okay,” she said. “Do you want to talk about physics?” Her face brightened.

We spent the next fifteen minutes talking about physics. I didn’t pay attention, though. What Sam said got me thinking. What if she was right? What if some of the things we were fighting—were killing—had been bitten and changed into the monsters. Could we be killing the miners, security personnel, and missing people who had changed into shadowling? I felt a burning in my stomach and chest, like I had eaten food so spicy I was going to be sick, over the thought.

The tunnel sloped slightly downward while twisting around like a river had run through it. I could imagine water filling the cavern and had to try to think of something else. Being trapped in a cave full of water was not something I wanted to linger on.

As our passageway widened, movements on all sides made my heart lurch.

“We’re being attacked!” I yelled as the creatures descended upon us from ahead on both sides. It was hard to tell, but there seemed to be more than ten of them. With the wide tunnel, at least ten feet in the area we stood, they would have the advantage.

From the start, this attack was different. The creatures acted in harmony, almost like they were running plays. Two split off and came toward me, and others seemed to be teaming up on individuals in our small party, especially Jacob, Rick, and my mother. My remaining friends only had one each to deal with.

All except Madison. She had no less than five surrounding her. Why? I struck a clawed hand coming at me as my mind searched for the reason. I had to give up thinking about it for a moment as both of those in front of me attacked at the same time, one swiping high, toward my head, the other going for one of my legs. Holding my staff in a wide grip, hands about two feet apart, I intercepted the high claw with my staff, my right hand high and the left low. A solid thunk of hardwood hitting whatever these things’ arms were made of echoed in the cavern. Then I swiveled and caught the other monster’s arm as it came in toward my leg, pulling my right hand down and raising the left. The staff contacted the attacking arm and forced it upward, causing the creature to spin. I took the opportunity to guide the staff in a tight circle, making it come around and slam down on the shadowling's collar bone.

There was a loud snap, and the monster screamed in pain. I continued the motion as the left side of the staff bounced off the creature, slamming the right side down on top of its head. The shadowling's knees got wobbly, and it collapsed to the floor.

I didn't stop, though. I flowed from that attack to the next, swinging the staff horizontally while pulling my head back from the path of the other attacker's claw. Ribs cracked and the creature huffed as all the air was driven from its lungs. Two more quick diagonal strikes, one from high left and the other from high right made the second attacker drop on top of the first.

Their attacks still had been half-hearted, not really seeming like they were trying to seriously injure me, but they were dangerous anyway. I had no choice but to do my best to incapacitate or kill them, even if I thought that there may be ones that were not so evil among them.

I looked over in time to see that three of the shadowling that surrounded Madison had grabbed her arms and a leg. Jacob and Tyler were busy trying to fight others—two for Jacob and one for Tyler and his crowbar—so it was up to me. I lunged at one of the monsters holding Madison as Sam shone her light in another's face.

The one I attacked was so preoccupied with his captive, it didn't see me until the end of my staff crashed into its eye. It let go of her immediately, falling backward, claws coming up to soothe its face as it fell. The dull thump of its head hitting a protruding rock behind it didn't bode well for the thing's future. When its body finally stopped its movement, it lay there motionless, either dead or knocked out.

The other two proved to be no problem. With Sam shining light in their eyes and Tyler coming to help after crushing the skull of the other one he was fighting, both the remaining shadowling went down.

My mother's gun rang out a couple more times, breaking through the screeching and screams of pain from the remaining attackers. A few of them ran away, but most of them were lying on the floor, scattered around the area.

"Is everyone accounted for?" I asked a few minutes later. "Is anyone hurt?"

We were all there, and though we had more scrapes, bruises, and claw marks than before, we were all relatively unharmed.

"Did you see what they did that time?" I said. "A bunch of them ganged up to try to take Madison—"

"They can have her," Zach's voice said from behind me. I don't think he meant for it to be heard. Madison glared at him and Jacob frowned, but no one said anything.

"Ahem." I started again. "Like I said, something like five or six of them went after her, and the others seemed more organized, like they had a plan in place. I don't like it."

"I haven't liked anything since we entered the mine," Tyler said.

“True,” I said. “Me either. But I especially don’t like this. Not only are they showing more intelligence, it seems that they are trying to capture us one-by-one. We can’t let that happen.”

“How are we going to stop it?” Rick asked. “I mean, if they swarm one person but there are others to keep us occupied, how are we going to deal with it? We need plans of our own.”

“We do. The first thing is that we need to use the buddy system. I don’t care where you go or what you do, do not be alone. That includes if you need to...um, answer the call of nature. We need to stick together, very close together, as a group as much as possible. I think we’re getting close. We need to get to where the prisoners are with all of us together. It’s the only way we’ll be able to free them.”

The others nodded.

“Let’s—”

I wasn’t even able to finish what I was going to say. Another group of the shadowling came from where we had just been. A larger group. There was no way we’d be able to beat them in a large area, allowing them to surround us.

“Run!” I said, pushing Sam toward the opposite side of the chamber, where it looked like the corridor tapered in. “Get into that passageway so they can’t surround us.”

Rick ran toward it to lead the way, my mother right after him. Sam stumbled from my push and ran for all she was worth right behind them. Then Emily, Zach, Madison, and Tyler sprinted away from me and the pursuing shadowling. I jerked my head toward where the others had gone, and Jacob started jogging, looking back over his shoulder to make sure I followed. I did, at least twenty of the dark creatures on my heels.

Chapter 19

I dashed after Jacob, just getting to the narrow section of the tunnel as the first shadowling reached me. Thankfully, the ceiling was not too high here, only maybe seven feet up. That would keep them from climbing over and dropping on us. Of course, the narrow passage, with not nearly enough space to swing my staff from side to side, would affect my use of the weapon, but better that than to be where I could be attacked on all sides. I turned to face the oncoming horde, backing down the tunnel as best I could while jabbing at them and swinging the staff vertically.

It seemed like our adversaries had learned that the staff hurt because they were wary in coming toward me. That was good. The more time we had before they overwhelmed us, the better. Maybe someone could figure out a way we could escape. Sam was smart, she'd come up with something.

I ran into something softer than stone. It surprised me so much, I almost allowed a wild claw swing to get me. I dodged to the left, slammed into the stone of the wall, and kicked the offending shadowling in the face.

"What's going on?" I said, not even able to spare a look at what I'd backed into.

"Those other ones from earlier," Jacob said, "the ones that ran. Well, they came back when they heard their friends catching up to us. We're trapped in here."

As if to prove it, the gun went off. Great, trapped between two groups.

"They'll need to take them out," I said. "Quickly. We can't fight all these. Tell them. Pass it up to the front."

"Will do."

I heard him telling those in front of him and then it being passed along. I hoped they could manage it. There weren't probably more than five left in that original group. If reinforcements hadn't arrived from the other side, too. What a pain in the ass.

I kept jabbing at the shadowling coming at me and swinging the staff up and down when I had the chance, but I wasn't doing a lot of damage. It was enough to keep them a few feet away from me, but not enough to whittle down their numbers. I wasn't sure how long I could keep this up.

My entire existence devolved into swinging a big stick around and trying not to be sliced open by sharp monster claws. I was soon sweating from the exertion. Swing, jab, kick, dodge, those were the only things in my life at that moment. The only thing that changed was that another gunshot sounded occasionally, apparently when my mother was able to get a clean shot without hurting one of us.

The narrow space was heating up. I think I was heating it up. Sweat poured down my face, trickling down my chest and back, soaking into my shirt.

“They took care of all of them,” Jacob said. “They’re moving out of this narrow part. Do you want me to take a turn?”

“No room,” I said, panting from my exertion. “We’ll have to wait until it’s wider before we’ll be able to swap.”

“Okay,” he said. He patted my shoulder quickly, not letting it linger so it didn’t affect my fighting. “Hang in there. I’m going through now. Back up as you get the chance.”

“Got it.”

It was a dicey thing. I wanted to turn and run, but that would have been stupid. I wasn’t about to make that mistake after all the effort I expended trying to keep from getting gutted by one of those claws. I backed up while attacking, shuffling like a boxer. The uneven floor made it dangerous, and I almost tripped a couple of times, but regained my balance without dropping my guard. When I felt cool air on the back of my neck, I knew I was almost there.

“A few more steps,” Jacob said. “You’re almost out. As soon as you are, we’ll jump in and attack them as they come through one at a time.”

“Okay.” I was breathing so heavily. I had forgotten how hard it was to fight for more than a minute or so. Even fighting for a minute would make most people throw up. The strain on the breathing, not to mention the muscles, was really intense.

I took one more step and then stumbled. If it wasn’t for someone behind me catching me, I would have fallen. I looked over my shoulder and saw Sam’s face, smiling at me. “I’ve got you. Great job, by the way.”

I nodded and cast my glance back toward the passage I had just come through. As Jacob had said, the shadowling were coming through one at a time. He, Tyler, and Zach were taking turns clobbering them as they did, Rick standing by to get into the rotation.

I sighed, leaning on my staff, and breathed. I’d rest for a minute and then get back into line with the rest of them.

It only took another couple of minutes for our pursuers to stop and retreat. I think what really did it was when my mom stood in front of the passage and calmly took aim at the creatures as they came out. She shot four of them in the face as they came, killing them and clogging the entry into our chamber. The shadowling screeched at each other in their language and stopped trying to climb over the bodies of their companions. Soon, there were none alive in front of us.

“I noticed how you’ve been conserving ammo,” I said to Mom as we searched the chamber we found ourselves in. “Only taking shots when you know you’ll kill them, when you won’t miss.”

“Yeah,” she said, reloading her gun. “I only have so many bullets, and I don’t know how long we’ll be in here. Or how many of those things there are. Besides, I’m afraid of ricochets if I shoot and miss.”

“Good thinking,” I said.

“I do that occasionally,” she said. “Hopefully it’s enough.”

“Hopefully.”

“So, the group that ran, they went this way,” she said. “Does that mean we’re going in the right direction?”

“Probably.” It was strange, for some reason, having this conversation with my mother. Awkward. Peculiar. I supposed there was no normal or comfortable parts to this entire thing. “Ready to go?”

“Yep.”

We slogged on. One section of this dismal underworld looked much like another. Wide passageways, narrow ones, large chambers with stalactites and stalagmites littering the ceiling and floor, it all passed unnoticed. We weren’t looking at the big things like that. No, we were looking at the small things. Is that shadow big enough to hide some of the creatures? Is that a side passage or just a little depression where the light doesn’t reach? The suspense of when the next attack would occur was causing me to jump at every flicker of light. I was clenching my teeth so hard, anticipating an attack, I was getting a headache.

There was no doubt there would be another one. If we’d all learned one thing well, it was that there would always be more of the dark creatures coming after us. Until we got back onto the surface, we were fair game. And that cliché was as true literally as it was figuratively. I had the definite feeling we were being hunted.

At one point, when a fat drop of water dripped from overhead and landed on my forehead, I almost hit Sam with my staff in my panic. It was a wet, musty, miserable place, and I just wanted to go home.

Less than an hour after our last encounter, they came after us again. It was not clever, not a carefully planned ambush. It almost seemed as if the shadowling were running through the cavern on the way somewhere else and we happened to be there. Some of their eyes widened—just before the light beams hit them and they squinted—as they caught sight of us.

To be honest, it was more of a collision than an attack.

There were probably fifteen of them, and once their shock had passed, they split up and did as before. Three came at me, two went after Jacob, four surrounded Rick and my mother, and the others were attacked singly. Except Emily. Apparently, she was the target for this group. Six of them crowded in around her, only one really paying attention to Zach and the others concentrating on my British friend.

I was not about to let them take her. Anger started building in me. First Bobby, then all the endless chasing and fighting, and now they were trying to take my friend? It was different when they were after Madison. I didn’t have an emotional connection to her. I did with Emily.

The three came at me at once, swiping at me in the same way the others had. Well, I’d had about enough of playing their games. They would try to attack me, try to take my friend? I'd show them their reward for pressing us.

There was a lot of room in the cavern we were in, and I used it to the full. The first shadowling to come near found how hard a staff could be swung when its wielder held on to the end with both hands and rotated her entire body to strike. I literally caused the creature, about the same size and weight as me, to fly off its feet and slam into the one next to it. I'm pretty sure the strike broke its arm.

With two tangled up together, I went after the third. Gripping the weapon in the center with both hands, I swiveled my hips to rotate my torso, swinging the staff on either side of my body. As I moved it faster and faster, it made a whirring sound. Until it hit the shadowling's outstretched arm, which it promptly broke.

Even breaking its arm didn't slow my momentum that much. I kept spinning the staff, striking the creature every few turns of the weapon. The shadowling was forced back as I hammered it repeatedly. A final blow to its face spun it about and dropped it to the floor. I continued spinning the weapon and turned to the other two, now just recovering from my earlier attack.

I widened my hands and increased the arc of the spins. This decreased the speed, but gave me more leverage to generate more power. I struck downward so hard toward the uninjured shadowling that its arm broke, too, bone bursting through the skin, as it tried to block my strike. The weapon continued down, breaking its skull. The thing's eyes rolled up in its head as it fell. Another three vicious strikes, the last one horizontally to crush the third creature's throat, and all my attackers were down.

I didn't stop, didn't allow the staff to slow. I darted toward Emily, stopping so abruptly when I got there that I slid across the floor several feet. I was striking at my foes as I came to a stop, wide swings batting away limbs and heads, taking feet out from under creatures. I was like a tornado, spinning around the creatures, hammering at them, knocking them down. Killing them.

It wasn't enough.

Three of them had hold of Emily and were dragging her into a side tunnel. Her stick lay on the floor nearby. Once they got her through there, I knew we wouldn't be able to get her back. Those things moved much too fast for that to happen. I flailed at the other beasts around me, but couldn't seem to move toward her fast enough.

An unearthly howl filled the cavern and suddenly, Zach was there, blocking the three from getting into the tunnel. They would have to go through him, his stance said. The shadowling holding Emily moved as if to attack him, but he had other ideas.

It was evident by the way the creatures' bodies stiffened that they were surprised when Zach leapt at them, snarling as he attacked.

As he crossed the distance, Zach swung his bat with all his might. It blew through the first shadowling's defenses and crushed its skull, spraying brain matter on the one next to it. Most of the momentum in the bat was spent, but Zach somehow turned it, added more force to it, and, with a diagonal swing upward, caught the creature on the side of the head, low near its jaw. The beast's head snapped back and it fell, twitching, its neck at an angle it was never meant to be in.

The third monster caught the bat, the energy dispelled, and prepared to bite Zach. Instead, my previously gentle friend let go of the bat, drew the knife tied to his waist, and slashed the thing's throat out in a savage motion. The attack spun Zach all the way around. When he came to rest, he held the wobbly knife out in front of him, obviously a little disoriented. He shook his head, glanced back and forth, and then relaxed when he saw that Emily was the only one left near him. His shoulders slumped and he dropped his knife, breathing heavily.

I lost track of what was happening with everyone else as I took care of the last two attackers. When I was done, I walked stiffly over to where Zach, Emily, and Sam were huddled in a corner. Emily had been crying but wasn't any longer. Her red-rimmed eyes came up to meet mine.

"Me this time," she said, clutching her cudgel, which she had just retrieved.

"Yeah," I said.

She looked at Zach and her face got—I don't know—warmer. He had risked himself for her, and she had noticed. I left them to it.

"How much longer can we deal with this?" I asked my mom. "If we keep getting attacked every hour, we'll eventually go down."

"I know," she said.

Rick looked like he would say something, but he didn't. The tension of the silence stretched, thinning, like a rubber band that had been pulled to the point it was ready to break.

It snapped.

"Should we give up?" Mom whispered.

"What?"

"Should we go home, leave this place?"

"Are you crazy?" I said. "They have Bobby."

"We don't even know that for sure. In insisting on coming to get him, will I be losing you, too? Will we both be losing everything? I don't see how we can do this. We've survived this long, but half the time, these creatures don't even seem like they're serious. How can they attack us lackadaisically and allow us to kill them like that?"

"I don't know, but—" I said.

"Dani, it was a mistake to come down here. We're going to die. Maybe it's not too late to turn around."

I looked at her, incredulous. "No. Just no. I'm going to find Bobby and the others. I'm going to get them, and we're all going to go back to the surface. We have come too far, worked too hard, faced too much, for us to turn and leave. We're committed. If I have to go alone, I will. I will not let those monsters have my brother. The darkness took Dad. It won't take Bobby. I won't let it. I..."

I turned and walked away from her. It wasn't her fault, this whole thing. I was just so tired. Tired of being scared, tired of running. Tired. I sighed, took a deep breath, and turned to go back.

I ran right into Jacob.

“Hey,” he said, his eyes searching mine. His were guarded, as if he wasn’t sure if he was welcome. I looked away.

“Hey,” I said. A real conversationalist, I was.

“I kinda heard what you said. Back there.” He jerked his head toward my mom, still sitting there with surprise written all over her face.

“Yeah, well, I’m kind of pissed off right now. Sorry.”

“You don’t need to be sorry, Dani,” he said. “I agree with you completely. I’m scared to death down here, and to be honest, I want to go back home, to my house with all the lights and with doors that lock. But I won’t. It’s not my brother, or sister, or dad that have been taken by those monsters, but if I can help others to get those loved ones back, then I’ll do what I can.

“Did you know that I want to go to med school, become a doctor?”

“No,” I said, wondering why he was telling me this. “You’d be a good one, I’m sure.”

He laughed. “Maybe. My first choice was to be a firefighter, but my parents won’t let me ‘waste my life’ like that. You see, I have always wanted to help people. I’ve always had this Prince Charming, go out and save the damsel in distress, kind of thing going on. It doesn’t have to be a damsel, though. I mean, you could mop up the floor with me if we had to fight. I just like the idea of being a hero. You know, saving people and helping those who can’t help themselves. What kind of hero would I be if I turned and ran away at the first sign of danger?”

“Yeah.” I chuckled. “You’d have to pick a superhero name like Chicken Man or something.”

“Exactly. Anyway, I’m with you. Even if it’s just the two of us, I’m with you until...well, until the end of it. Whatever that means. I just wanted you to know that. Don’t give up. Don’t give up on us and don’t give up on yourself.”

He turned to walk away.

“Hey Jacob,” I said.

“Yeah.”

“Thanks. You are a hero. And what you said helps. A lot.”

He reached over and pulled me to him, hugging me and stroking my back. “You’re welcome.” He ducked down to try to make eye contact, finally resorting to putting a finger on my chin and gently moving my head up. “Why won’t you look me in the eyes?”

“I’m...I don’t feel comfortable doing that. Anymore. It’s just...I don’t really do eye contact.”

“Well,” he said. “Maybe you can make an exception for me?”

I nodded and met his eyes for about a second.

“That’s a start,” he said, smiling.

He walked back to Madison, who had been watching us the entire time and who was switching between glaring at him and at me. I didn’t care. He had given me the boost I needed.

“Let’s go kick these things’ asses,” I said under my breath as I picked up my staff and headed toward the tunnel where our latest attackers had come out. Though I didn’t care if anyone followed or not, I smiled as I heard shuffling feet chase me down the corridor.

Chapter 20

The euphoria from Jacob's pep talk and the hug lasted almost an hour. The tunnel we had been following had widened out into a huge cavern, with a roof too far ahead for my headlamp to reach and sides that were just beyond the beam when I was standing in the middle.

That wasn't the weirdest part, though. There was trash all over the floor. I mean, a lot of trash. It looked like a fairground after a weekend. There was broken wood, pieces of metal, clothing and other types of cloth, cardboard, even a few empty barrels. How did those barrels get through the narrow passageways we had come through? There must be another way in.

"What do you make of it?" I asked Sam.

"I don't really know. We're very far into the cave. Why would anyone bring this much trash here? It's bizarre."

We began searching the refuse for clues or weapons. For anything, really.

"Remember," I said. "No one is to be alone. At least two, preferably more. Stay together." There were grunts I took as affirmations.

Something that sounded like a strong wind passed through the cavern. I stopped walking and cocked my head, listening. It took a few more seconds until I could place the sound.

"Shadowling!" I said, turning toward the area we had come from.

The sound changed into what it really was, footsteps on stone. Dozens of footsteps.

"We can't possibly fight that many," Sam said. "There have to be at least thirty of them."

"Run," I yelled. "If they surround us, we're done for. Try to stay together."

We ran.

We made it about fifty yards before the creatures' plan became clear. As we moved toward the nearest tunnel, all in a group, the floor was pulled up, trapping us all in a huge piece of canvas. We were trapped.

The last thing I remember was something splashing over the cloth, a foul-smelling chemical of some kind. Then I lost track of everything.

I jerked awake. It was like when I had dreams of falling and woke just before hitting the ground, my body twitching. I was lying on my back, nothing but darkness above and something sharp digging into my back, like I was lying on sharp pebbles.

My head pounded and my stomach churned. I didn't remember going to sleep. What had happened? I ran my hand across the floor and found it to be chain link, like a fence. Why was I lying on a fence?

When I tried to open my eyes wider, I realized that it was pure black around me. Not the kind of dark of a cloudy night or a darkened room. It was completely black, the kind you only get when you're underground with no background light at all.

I clawed at my forehead to turn on my headlamp, but it wasn't strapped there. Immediately, my breathing became ragged and I had to gulp for air. My heart was in a vice, one that was slowly squeezing, making my chest hurt. The darkness. I had thought I had gotten used to it in my time in the caves, but I understood now that I had only convinced myself of it because I always had my headlamp handy. I was not used to it. It was still my enemy, still a thing alive, waiting, ready to pounce. To kill.

My breathing quickened even more. Part of my brain warned me that I was hyperventilating, but all I could think of was that I needed more air. Ice raced up my back and back down again.

"Dani?" My mother's voice sounded far away, yet also right next to me.

A hand found the top of my head and I let out a pitiful sound, like a whimper. I was too scared even for my reflexes to work.

"Calm down, Dani," she said. "It's me. I'm right here. Hold on."

I heard rustling as she moved and then a spotlight burned a hole in the world. I shielded my eyes from it. It was so bright. But it was light. Glorious, wonderful light.

I gulped air, almost filling my lungs. I settled into my old habit, focusing on my breathing, slowing it. Relaxing. My mother was silent while I did so. She had seen me do this countless times during competition, when my anxiety and fear had tried to take hold of me.

I opened my eyes fully as the light dimmed to a more comfortable level and my sight adjusted. Her face was a few inches from mine, looking at me.

"Mom?" I said, my voice catching.

"Yes, I'm here." She stroked my hair, watching me.

"The dark...my headlamp...where?" I drew in another breath, easier this time. "Where are we? What happened?"

"They caught us. It was a trap. They poured some kind of liquid on the canvas they caught us in, a chemical. I think that's what knocked us out. We were put in here." She swept her headlamp in an arc and I gasped.

We were in some kind of kennel, a large box made of chain link fence, the gate secured by a chain with a padlock. Emily, Zach, Sam, and Madison were with us, all of them looking like they were still sleeping. I saw my headlamp lying on the floor. It must have fallen off in my sleep. I strapped it on and touched the switch. Blessed light came into being. I sighed.

With my own light source available, I scanned the surroundings. There was another cage maybe ten feet away from us, still forms scattered all over the bottom of it. No, not unmoving. I picked up little twitches and chests rising and falling. The remaining members of the team were there. At least none of us were missing.

“How long have we been out?” I asked.

“I don’t know,” Mom said. “I woke up when I heard you having trouble breathing. It’s like when you were a baby. Every little sound could wake me up. I’m sure it’s been hours, but I don’t know how long. Oh—” She took her phone out of her pocket. “6:00 PM. The last time I looked at the time, it was three, so yeah, two or three hours, I think.” She moved around, putting her hand to her waist. “Damn.”

“What?”

“They left me my phone, but they took my gun.”

I looked around our small prison. It was only maybe five feet by five feet, with a ceiling lower than six feet. “My staff is gone, also. Do you have a headache? My skull feels like someone used it for a golf ball.”

“Me too,” she said. “It’s probably from whatever knocked us out. Hopefully it’ll pass.”

“I wonder why we’re not being guarded,” I said.

“Are you sure we aren’t? I mean, we can’t see the edges of the cavern. There may be some of those creatures just beyond the range of our lamps.”

“Good point,” I said, moving toward Sam. My body responded sluggishly. I hoped that would pass. “I have a solution, though. I hope.” I went into Sam’s pocket, the one I saw her take her flashlight from earlier. I was in luck. Our captors had left it alone.

Bringing Sam’s super-flashlight out, I switched it on, and the entire room came into clarity. That thing was amazing. I could almost hear it hum like a spotlight.

We were in a rough cavern, water or lava carved, I guessed. It was twenty feet by probably thirty or more. There were two other cages besides the two we were in. They were empty.

A pile of our gear, mixed with trash, was heaped over in one corner. Our backpacks were strewn around, our weapons lying there, taunting me.

There was not a shadowling in sight.

What looked like a main entrance, however, was in sight. Actually, it was the only entrance. This was a good place for the cages. It was a dead end. No wonder they didn’t put guards here. To get out, we’d have to go through other passageways, ones that probably held some of the monsters. Good. At least we had time to try to break out.

“Break out?” my mother said when I voiced my thoughts aloud. “How do you intend to break out?”

“I’m not sure yet,” I said, “but we’ll figure something out.”

Chapter 21

When I shook Sam awake, she grabbed my arm and squealed, her normally narrow eyes going big and round. “Oh, it’s you, Dani. You scared me to death.”

“Sorry. Sam, we have a situation, and since you’re the smartest person I know, I figured you could help.”

“Sure,” she said, squeezing her eyes shut and putting her hand to her forehead.

“Headache?” I asked.

“Yeah. You too?”

“Uh-huh. I think it’s whatever chemical they used to knock us out.”

“Smelled like ether,” she said. “The stuff they poured onto the big cloth that trapped us. I think it was some type of ether compound.”

I wasn’t even going to ask her how she knew what that chemical smelled like. “Like I said, I need your help.”

She looked around, surveying our surroundings for the first time. She made a little seated hop and darted her eyes left, right, and up. She brought her hand down to feel the chain link floor. “Oh my.”

“Yeah.” I handed her back her flashlight and she used it to look around the chamber as I had done a few minutes before.

“Why do you think they put us in here, unguarded?” she said. “Why go through the trouble of catching us when they could have just killed us while we were all bundled up?”

“I was thinking the same thing. I don’t know what’s going on, but I do know we need to get out of these cages if we want to do anything useful. If we’re still trapped in here when they come for us, who knows what will happen?”

“Hmm.” Sam had moved to the gate, inspecting the chain and lock holding it closed. The chain passed through the poles over which the chain link was stretched. It was heavy, much too thick to be broken, and the lock looked like it was of good quality, too. “I wish I had my backpack. I have some lock picking tools in there.”

“Lock picking tools?” I said. “How do you know how to use lock picking tools, let alone have a set?” I couldn’t really tell in the lamplight, but I thought she blushed.

“Just something that interested me that I’ve been playing around with. Doorknobs are much easier than padlocks, but I might have been able to manage it.”

“I don’t suppose you have wire cutters in that pack of yours,” I said, mostly as a joke.

“Of course I do. But they’re not heavy enough to cut the chain with the padlock. Maybe the fence itself. Anyway, they’re over there.” She pointed forlornly at her pack lying in the pile with the others.

I shook my head. Lock picking. “Too bad we don’t have any tools to loosen the bolts here.” I pointed toward the bolts with round heads holding the fence material to the poles. The round side was inside, with the nuts on the outside, but the fence was chain link; we could reach through to try to loosen the other side. If we had a wrench.

“Oh,” Sam said. “I have a multi-tool. You know, one of those things with knives and pliers and screwdrivers all in one, like a Swiss Army knife, but better.”

“Do you have a way to get to your pack?” I asked, frustration building in me.

“You don’t understand, Dani,” she said. “I mean I have it.” She drew her hand out of her pocket and held something out to me. It was a shiny silver chunk of metal that could be opened up to reveal all its little secrets.

I stared at her for a moment before my face stretched into a smile. “You keep that in your pocket?”

“Not all the time. Only when I’m going to explore a mine and caves to try to rescue people who have been taken by dark monsters. In that case, I always carry it in my pocket.” She wiggled the tool at me.

“Sam,” I said, taking it from her, “you are amazing.”

“I have my uses. So, do you think we can get out with it?”

I was already opening it up to use the pliers. “I think so. It’s going to take a while, though.”

Slipping the tool carefully through one of the holes in the fence, I began to try to loosen the nut, but stopped.

“Can I borrow your scarf?” I asked.

“Sure.” Sam unwrapped it from her neck and handed it over to me.

I pushed half the scarf through one of the holes in the chain link, right at the bottom. I spread it out on the ground as best I could with my fingers poking through the fence. I was ready now.

I slipped the tool through the hole again, turned it so I could grab it through the fence to squeeze it and tighten it down on the nut. It took me a little while, but I finally got the angle right and was able to loosen it, just a little. I worked at it some more, my fingers wanting to cramp up from the awkward angle, but I kept on.

The nut was almost loose enough for me to take it off the rest of the way with just my hand when I fumbled the tool and it clattered to the floor. It was a dull, muffled sound. The implement had landed on the scarf, just out of my reach. I pulled the scarf in and was able to retrieve it.

“Whew,” I said, a bead of sweat dripping down my nose and dropping off. “That was a close call.”

Sam nodded, too focused on what I was doing to speak.

The first nut came off, allowing me to pull the bolt through. The chain link loosened at the bottom, allowing me to peel it aside a few inches. It had taken me almost ten minutes to do it.

The next bolt only took me five minutes. I dropped the tool twice. Once, I pulled it back with the scarf, but the second time it bounced from the higher height and fell on the stone floor. I was able to reach through the already-loose part of the fence to retrieve it.

By now, everyone in my little cage was awake and watching me. I didn't pay them much attention. I had to get out of this thing before any of the shadowling came back. I didn't have time for anything but getting the last two bolts out. Three were already sitting on the floor beside me.

The fourth was tighter than the others had been. Whether it had been tightened more or it was just stressed because the other bolts were loose and the fence was at an awkward angle, I didn't know, but it took a long time to get that first little bit of movement. Perspiration flowed freely on my forehead now, and my palms were slick with it, too. I was able to reach up through the already loose sections to work on it from the outside. Without that leverage, I probably never would have been able to budge the nut. When it finally started moving, I breathed out and slumped for a moment.

Chittering came from the other room, two of the shadowling discussing something. Maybe more than two. It sounded like they were coming toward us.

It was too soon. I wasn't ready for them yet. I had to get these other bolts out. We were so close. Just a few more minutes. As I loosened the nut to the point I could turn it with my hand instead of the tool, my mind searched for different ideas to keep them from seeing us before we were ready. Anything. Some distraction. I tried to think of something, but came up empty. It was like trying to snatch a fish from a pond. I knew it was there somewhere but couldn't quite get my hands around it. I growled low under my breath.

The bolt came loose in my hands. I set it down and brought the tool up to the last one.

The voices seemed to have stopped just outside the chamber we were in. I thought of telling everyone to turn off their lights, but it wouldn't have mattered. These things could see in the dark. If anything, the light would make their vision worse. Better to worry about things that needed attention. Like the last bolt.

I could not get the nut loose. I reached up through the fence I'd peeled back and used all my strength, but couldn't get the nut to move.

One of the shadowling screeched something that sounded like the end of a conversation. Did I hear its voice raise in volume at the last? Had it turned to come in? I was running out of time. I grunted, trying to loosen the nut, but couldn't. All that effort for the creature to find us and sound an alarm, ruining all my work. We'd never have a chance like this again. I cursed silently. So close. I was so close.

Then it came to me.

"Be quiet and don't look at me," I said. "Shine your lights on the guard when it comes in." The others nodded at me. As they swiveled their lights toward the entrance, I turned my headlamp off and squeezed through the slack fence I had been working on. There was just enough give for me to get through and out of the cage. Now if only my luck held.

As quietly as I could, I snuck over to the pile of discarded items and crouched behind it. It was just enough to the side from the main entryway that I could see the creature as it came into the room.

It stopped in the entryway, surveying the chamber. It didn't seem comfortable with the humans shining their lights at it. Hand up to shade its eyes, it came warily forward, looking toward the other cage first, since it was closer to where it came in. It sniffed the air, surprising me. I hadn't realized they used their sense of smell. Or maybe it just had allergies or something. I didn't know.

The shadowling came around the cage I had been in. Though it seemed to have difficulty with the lights shining on it, it scrutinized the cage floor, checking on the occupants. When its eyes reached the section of the chain link I had loosened, it stiffened. It was now or never.

When I had competed in karate, I focused on fighting with kicks and punches, not really doing any MMA-type groundwork. I had a few classes, seminars really, on some jujitsu holds and techniques, but I wasn't proficient at them. I tapped that knowledge, hoping it would be enough.

No sooner had the guard seen the fence than I came up behind it and grabbed it in a chokehold. It was a common technique, called a sleeper hold by non-martial artists, my right arm around its throat, left hand behind its head to apply pressure forward, effectively cutting off the breathing.

I wasn't prepared for how strong the thing was.

It jerked violently, swinging me around as it tried to get free. It wasn't able to screech for its companions because I was compressing its throat, but it bucked and scratched and succeeded in dropping its chin beneath my arm.

Its teeth sinking into my forearm felt like my skin was being torn off. I scratched at its eyes and tightened my arm around its throat, lodging it underneath the chin to prevent it from using its teeth again. This close, the musty, foul smell of the monster burned my nostrils, bringing tears to my eyes. Still I held on.

The shadowling backed up quickly, slamming my back against the stone wall of the chamber. It almost caused me to loosen my grip, but I gritted my teeth and pulled tighter, refusing to let the pain defeat me. It tried to roll forward to dislodge me, but I had adopted a wide stance and could not be pulled down so easily.

The battle seemed to take forever, eerie because other than the scuffling of our feet and my labored breathing from the exertion, everything was silent. My friends were watching, directing their lights at me so I could see what was going on. My own headlamp, still off, had been knocked off my head.

Finally, slowly, the beast's thrashings became fewer and weaker and then stopped completely. I kept pressure on its throat, kicking its leg hard to make sure it wasn't pretending. No reaction. I kept it in the hold for a long count of five and then released it. The shadowling slipped to the floor like a puppet with its strings cut.

I hadn't killed it, but it would be out cold for a while. I looked down at it and wondered if I should finish it off, but rejected the idea. I had killed these things in battle, but to do it in cold blood while it was unconscious? I couldn't bring myself to carry through. I hoped I didn't come to regret my decision.

I slumped against the wall, breathing heavily. I had scratches on the side of my face from when it had been frantically clawing to get free and my forearm burned, but for having taken on one of the monsters hand-to-hand, I felt like I came out all right.

I huffed as I stood up straight and walked to where my headlamp fell. I had heard a clink during the fight, and just a few seconds of searching in the high beam of my lamp revealed that it had been carrying a key. Maybe it had come to feed us or something. In any case, I didn't waste time before opening the locks on both cages to let everyone out.

Chapter 22

As the others went to the pile of our gear to retrieve their property, I pulled the sleeve of my jacket up to inspect where the creature had bitten me. Two punctures and some bruising, apparently from other teeth that had not broken the skin, were clearly visible. It wasn't bleeding much, so I pulled my sleeve back down. I'd clean it and dress it later. There were more pressing issues right now.

Rick's hand on my shoulder surprised me. He handed over my staff and backpack. "Good job. Those things are pretty strong."

"Tell me about it," I said, taking my pack and slipping it on. I grabbed the staff from him and turned to find everyone looking at me.

"What now?" my mother said. She had checked over her gun and was slipping it into her holster.

"Well," I said. "They kindly left all our stuff right here where we could get it. I think maybe we need to use it. The other prisoners should be close. Let's get them out of here."

She nodded to me, and so did Sam, Zach, Emily, and Tyler. Jacob smiled at me as he hefted his sticks. Madison looked blankly at the ground. It seemed that things had been too much for her and she was in a state of shock. She'd have to figure it out herself. We had work to do.

Within minutes, we had a plan. Thinking the other shadowling in the next room might be wondering about their companion, we had to act fast.

We rushed around the corner of the wall into the other chamber as a group, Madison, Emily, and Sam pointing their headlamps left, right, and center, Sam using her super-flashlight to flood the whole area. The rest of us attacked the three shadowling that were within the cave.

I dashed past one of the guards, striking its leg as I passed, making it fall for the others to take care of. The other two were up ahead of me, one on the left side of the cavern and one on the right, next to an opening into the blackness beyond. I chose the right one and Rick took the one on the left.

My opponent was still in a state of surprise, so it didn't cry out right away, but just as I reached it, its mouth opened and it screeched several unintelligible syllables. Things were going to get busier very soon. I hoped my mom was doing as I had asked her to do.

I struck the shadowling across the face with my staff, cutting off its cries. The blow was hard enough to cause it to spin away from me, but I pursued it. It raised its arms to try to claw me, but it was off-balance. I was able to bat its limbs away and strike it three times in rapid succession, twice with the right side of my weapon and once with the left side. Each hit forced it back a step until it ran into the wall. A quick circle of the end of the staff to transform the momentum into a downward strike to the crown of the head, and it dropped as if it had no bones.

I glanced back at the cages I had hoped would be in the room. My mother was using the key to open the third of three, letting out the groups of people within. As with the previous room, there was a pile of items nearby. The men, women, and even children, who were leaving the cages went to the pile and started pawing through it, some finding items they could use as weapons, others finding property specific to them.

I searched through the people. There were nearly thirty of them. How had the shadowling taken so many? Bobby was not among them. Neither was Allison, Madison's sister. Zach was crying and hugging a man with his back to me. Good, at least his father was safe. But where was my brother?

A man walked up to me. He had tactical clothing on, rugged black material, boots, and a holster.

"I'm Derek Singletary. I head the security team for the mine. Thanks for the help. Stay behind us now. We have a bunch of these creatures to kill."

My mother scoffed. I turned to look at her as she started to say something. I spoke first.

"Listen, Derek, you are not going to go and—"

I didn't have time to finish. Shadowling started pouring through the corridor beyond into the chamber. The alarm had been heard. Even as more of the creatures rushed in, I could hear more of them yelling in other parts of the cave. Now we would find out how many of the monsters there were.

I spun to face the entrance and the dark shapes pouring in. I huffed a breath and readied my staff.

I was starting to get tired. I'd been in the dark for nearly two days, as close as I could tell, and most of that time I had been fighting. Or running. As I dodged an airborne shadowling, striking it in the ribs as it sailed past, I wondered how much more I could take.

The children and those who either couldn't or were too afraid to fight had been put out of the way in the other chamber, where we had been caged. Between the security guards, the miners, and my own party of friends, bodies of shadowling littered the floor. There were a few humans, too. I had a constant ringing in my ears from the gunshots that punctuated the overall sound of battle. It was not only my mother's gun, but also those of the security guards. Apparently, the creatures had no issue with throwing firearms in with the other gear and trash kept in the same room as prisoners. It was interesting to me how ingenious and at the same time stupid these monsters could be.

I squared off against another foe, its eyes lidded against the light and its mouth drawn back in a snarl. It lunged at me, only to have half its head disappear in a spray of blood. Derek, standing next to me, lowered his gun and nodded to me. I nodded back.

"You're pretty good with that thing," he said, pointing his chin toward my staff. I noticed for the first time that there were red streaks along the ends of the weapon.

"I guess," I said, not really in the mood for conversation.

“You made it all the way down here, you and a bunch of other kids, with only bats and sticks?”

“Looks that way.”

“You’re not going to listen to me tell you what to do, huh?” he said.

“Nope.” I said. “We came here for a specific purpose. Neither you nor anyone else is going to get in the way of that.” I realized I was not being attacked. The trickle of shadowling had slowed, was stopping completely. It looked like we’d have a lull in the fighting. But for how long?

“I have authority over the mine property,” he said. “We could make you obey.”

“Look around, Derek,” I said. “We’re not in the mine anymore. We’re in natural caves.”

“She’s right,” one of the miners said. It was Zach’s dad, Adam Pinse. He was a big man, imposing, though anyone who knew him recognized that he was the sweetest person in the world. His messy hair, dirty face, and torn coveralls gave him a sort of sinister look. “You have no authority here. If you try to force these kids to do something they don’t want to do, well, I think we may have some problems.”

I had to strain to keep the smile from my face.

As he said it, three other miners stepped up, wearing the same dirty coveralls he was. Two of them were also large, the third being more of an average size.

Derek looked them over. “That’s how it’s going to be?” he asked, hand resting on the gun he had holstered when it was clear there were no more of the creatures around.

“Yep,” Adam said.

I didn’t want a showdown or anything ridiculous like that. I figured I’d better step in before we started fighting amongst ourselves.

“Listen,” I said. “Why don’t you go and escort the prisoners back to the mine? I still have work here to do. There’s no point in fighting. And here,” I threw the jacket at him we had picked up all those hours ago. “I think this belongs to you.”

He caught his jacket, looking at the name tag. “We need to kill all these things,” he said, but the authority had gone out of it. He put his jacket on.

“No. Your job is to get the people out. Let the National Guard or the police clear the tunnels if they want. It’s not your job.”

He looked at me as if he didn’t believe he was trying to negotiate with a kid. I could see in his eyes that he was turning over the situation, trying to come up with something that would let him save face. He didn’t want his men to see him foiled by not only a teenager, but a girl at that. Sam stepped in.

“You know, you’ll all be heroes,” she said, “escorting and protecting the ones taken by the shadowling, bringing them back out of the tunnels alive.”

“Shadowling?” he asked.

“Yeah,” I said. “That’s what the news has started to call them. They made it up after you all disappeared.”

“Hmm.” He rubbed his chin and mulled it over. “We would be going above and beyond if we brought them back out.”

“You would be the first ones the news and the rest of the town see,” Sam said. We both knew she had him. “You could tell your story. There would be interviews, ceremonies. You would probably even get overtime or hazard pay.”

Or you could take your chances and fight these creatures and maybe die, I thought. I didn’t know if he was a coward or not, but the lure of fame and some extra money would probably tip it in our favor. He had his way out without looking like he was giving in, and his men could still respect his command.

Derek looked into my eyes. I saw in his that we weren’t fooling him at all. He was not only not a coward, but he was pretty smart, it seemed. He let me know with his look that he wasn’t taken in, but he would let it be.

“All right,” he finally said. “We’ll take everyone back up to the surface.”

“I marked our way at every intersection up until they captured us,” Sam said. “I’m not sure how far away that was. If you see chalk arrows, that’s the way we came. Go in the direction the arrows point and you’ll get to the mine and then finally out into the open.”

“Fair enough,” he said. He was still looking at me, considering me. “Are you sure about this?”

“Yes,” I said without hesitation. “My brother is still in here. We have to go get him.”

“Fine.” He held out his hand. “Thanks for the assist. Good luck in there.”

I shook his hand. “Yeah, you too.”

The security force gathered up almost everyone else—Zach’s dad decided to go with us, and two of the miners stayed with him—and headed down a tunnel that slanted slightly upward. Hopefully they’d find the intersections we’d marked.

I turned to those remaining. There were the original members of our team—Mom, Rick, Sam, Zach, Emily, Tyler, Madison, and Jacob—and we had added Zach’s dad and two of the miners on his shift, Armando Anzures and Dan Nefferman.

“I know your daughter,” Sam said to that last one. “She is going to be so happy to see you.” I remembered the looks exchanged between Sam and Raquel Nefferman in class that day. It would be great when her dad returned.

The three men had found suitable weapons when the security guards refused to lend them guns. Zach’s dad and Armando held hardwood ax handles—pick handles, I guess—and Dan had a metal bar that had been mixed up in one of the trash piles. We were about as ready as we’d ever be.

Aside from the way we had come and the way the others went, there was only one other passageway. The opening stared at us like a giant, black, depthless eye.

“Are you ready?” I said.

“Let’s get back my boy,” Mom said.

“And my sister,” Madison added. We had offered to let her go back with the others and promised to try to find Allison, but she refused. She would see this thing through to the end, she said. She got some points for that in my book. Maybe she wasn't a complete troll.

We headed down the tunnel, going deeper into the belly of the earth, thoughts of Dante and his journey dancing in my head.

Hopefully we'd live to see the light as he did at the end of the story.

Chapter 23

“I don’t know why they captured us,” Zach’s dad said. “I thought it was to eat us, but as far as I know, no one was killed or eaten. They fed us some rations and boxes of protein bars they got from somewhere. No one was even hurt after they were captured.”

“Tell ’em about the holes,” Dan, one of the other miners, said.

Adam held up his arm and moved the sleeve up. He had a mark as if something had punctured him in the hollow of his elbow. “We all had them when we woke up in the cages. I think they injected us with something, though they don’t seem smart enough to be doing things like that.”

Sam had stepped up and shone her flashlight on Adam’s arm. “Not injected, removed.”

“What?” he said.

“They didn’t inject anything into you,” she said. “They took blood from you.”

“How do you know that?” he said.

“The hole. It’s from a bigger gauge than a needle to inject. A catheter. Besides, they probably would have injected lower, or on the shoulder. Even a catheter to inject a lot of something would have been placed lower down on the arm. I think they took blood from you.”

“But...why?”

“They probably drink it,” Tyler said. That earned him exasperated looks from almost everyone.

“We’ll have to solve that mystery later,” I said. “For now, let’s find our missing people so we can get out of here.” I started down the corridor, but turned to them again. “And be careful. I’m sure there are more of those things down here, and after the slaughter we just took part in, they aren’t going to be too happy.”

Gunshots rang through the cave. They were from far away, but there was no mistaking what they were. I hoped the others got through to the mine and then out safely, but we had other things to think about. With a sigh, I led the others through the dark passageways.

“Maybe the monsters will go toward the gunshots,” Tyler said, “so they’ll leave us alone.”

I had been thinking the same thing, but was too ashamed of myself to say it out loud. “I would rather neither of the groups got attacked.”

“Yeah,” he said. “Me too.”

We snacked on the food we had brought in our backpacks. For some reason, the shadowling hadn't even gone through the packs. Once we started off, we continued through a narrow, winding tunnel that rose and then lowered again. It was wide enough to get through without squeezing, but we had to go through single file. I felt exposed at the front, the light from my headlamp striking the awkward, rounded shapes, throwing shadows strangely and giving everything a surreal feeling. I saw flickers of movement from the corners of my eyes, but found that it was just the shadows jumping as I made my way through. Somehow, Jacob ended up in line right behind me.

"Are you okay?" he asked. "You seem kind of jumpy."

"I'm fine. I'm just tired, and with the weirdly shaped shadows, it feels like there are things moving around me."

"You want me to take point?" he asked.

I felt a stab of irritation. What, did he think I couldn't handle the front? Did he think he could do a better job than me? Did he think he could fight the creatures better than I could?

I took a breath and let it out slowly. There was no reason to get mad at him. He was being polite, not trying to compete. "Nah, I'm good." I wanted to get out of these caves, get back into the open. Preferably where there was lots of light.

The cavern finally emptied out into a wider pocket, big enough for all of us to fit. I moved toward the far end and waited for everyone to file in. There were three openings aside from the one we came through. One of them was about five feet wide and the other two were narrower. They all slanted downward slightly.

"How far down do you think we are?" Zach asked.

"More than a half mile from the surface," his father answered. "I didn't know there were caves this deep here. I guess no one did."

"Those creatures did," Zach said.

His father didn't have anything to say about that. Even if he did, he didn't have a chance to voice it. There was a soft rustle of movement, and when I swung my headlamp toward it, a shadowling slid to a stop, crouched against the light, in the mouth of one of the narrow tunnels.

It squeaked in surprise, turned, and darted back through the tunnel it had come out of.

"Get it," I said, running after it. "If it tells the others where we are, there's going to be trouble."

We chased it through the tunnel, just as narrow and winding as the one we had been in. My breathing was loud in my ears, and the sounds of the others behind me, their breaths and the scuffing of their feet on the stone, let me know they were keeping up with me.

Unfortunately, I couldn't keep pace with the shadowling. The thing moved like it didn't have bones, slithering through narrow parts, dashing over or under obstructions. I quickly lost sight of it. There were no side passages, at least none that I could see, so I kept moving ahead, hoping I'd catch a lucky break.

The passage widened suddenly again, and I slid to a stop, not sure why. Maybe the dip in temperature tipped me off. Swinging my headlamp toward the floor, I realized I was right on the edge of a hole that drilled down into the blackness. A couple of pebbles dislodged by my slide went over the edge and bounced off the wall of the hole. They kept clacking for a long time.

I never heard them hit the bottom.

The others stopped, Sam putting her hand on my back to stop herself, then grabbing a fistful of my jacket, and the others colliding behind her because of the abrupt halt. I guessed she reacted more quickly than the others and followed me first when I took off running.

I borrowed Sam's flashlight to survey the hole while she kept hold of my jacket so I didn't slip. It was only about four feet wide and didn't extend all the way to the side of the tunnel we were in. As bright as her light was, I couldn't see the bottom when I shone the light down into it. Of course, I didn't go all the way to the very edge to shine the light down, but I could see at least fifteen feet or so of the wall in the light. We didn't want to fall into it.

There was no sign of the shadowling.

Handing the light back to her—my headlamp light looked dim after using hers—I skirted around the hole to go through the passage, now a bit wider than it had been. The ledge was a good three feet wide going past the hole, but it seemed a tightrope when crossing so near a bottomless pit.

"Be careful," I said. "It may not be bottomless, but it's very deep. I have a section of rope, but I don't want to test if it can reach down far enough to retrieve anyone who falls."

It bothered me. Did the shadowling bring us this way on purpose, trying to get us to pitch into the hole, or was it just coincidence? Did it fall down the hole, or was it still up ahead? If still ahead, was it waiting with a group of its friends to ambush us? The situation made me feel like I had an itch right in the middle of my back, between my shoulder blades. An itch I couldn't reach.

There was nothing else we could do, though. We continued on.

The tunnel gradually widened and the ceiling got higher. We still didn't see or hear anything of the creature, and I thought that maybe it really had fallen into the hole, as unlikely as that seemed.

"Sam?" I said, something occurring to me. "Have you been marking the walls with your chalk?"

"I have, though some of the marks are just slashes. It's hard to stop and draw an arrow when you're running and people behind you are running."

I released a breath I hadn't even known I was holding. "You're the best." Good. At least we weren't completely lost.

A few hundred yards later, we reached a cavern unlike any we'd seen before. It was massive, probably thirty or forty feet wide, with a ceiling so high overhead, I could only see the tips of stalactites with my headlamp. Sam's flashlight could reach higher, but I couldn't even estimate how far away the ceiling was.

There were classic cave formations: fans, popcorn, melted slag-like blobs, and of course the stalactites, stalagmites, and pillars. Crystals grew in some places, too, reminding me of the old Superman movies and his Fortress of Solitude. It was beautiful.

My peaceful observation of the cavern was shattered when my mother screamed.

Chapter 24

The sound my mother made was not a scream of terror but sounded more a mix of surprise and warning. Anyway, it was a good alarm. I turned my head so quickly toward her my vision blurred for a moment. Then my eyes locked on what was happening.

A group of the shadowling had come up on us from behind. They had struck quickly, and one of the miners, Armando, was lying on the ground, blood leaking out of him through a terrible gash in his neck. A gash made by sharp claws. He had been the last in line, just behind my mom and Rick. It looked like the time of the monsters attacking half-heartedly, trying to capture us, was past.

Mom and Rick had turned when Armando was attacked and were fighting now, but things were different than before. The six creatures going after them had a crazed look in their eyes and were attacking savagely, not controlled in any way like before. Was this a rogue group, or had their other battles finally earned us a reputation of enemies they needed to destroy?

In addition to those coming from behind, I caught movement from the sides. More dark figures swooped in to attack with the others. All told, there were probably more than a dozen shadowling attacking us, maybe as many as fifteen.

I was at the very front, so only one came at me, angling from where it entered our corridor at the side. I didn't think, just spun into action, whipping my staff out and connecting with the thing's head as it tried to leap onto me. The swing, with the momentum of my spin behind it, knocked the creature from the air, cracking its head and making it spin violently to crash to the stone floor, body limp. There wasn't time for finesse. I needed to kill these monsters, and kill them quickly.

I glanced at the others as I turned to face one of the shadowling that had targeted Sam, a few feet away from me. The brunt of the attack was around Rick and my mom, with only a few spread out around the others. I needed to get to them before the two were overwhelmed.

The beast in front of me lunged at me instead of Sam, which was my desire. It was so fast, I barely got my staff up in time to block its claw. I was a little too slow to move my weapon to block the second claw coming at me at the same time. Sharp nails grazed my shoulder, laying down a line of fire as red began to come through my torn sleeve. I lunged back a step to evade the first claw as it came again.

Yes, they were definitely fighting differently than earlier. They were ready to kill us now, undisguised hatred glowing in their overlarge eyes. My opponent pressed forward, slashing at me, mouth wide and ready to bite, wet teeth reflecting my headlamp light.

It suddenly lost its fluid motion when a bright light hit its eyes. Hands raised, it tilted its head to reduce the glare.

I took advantage of the moment and attacked with a savage flurry of strikes. Lunging in, I jabbed the left end of my staff into its throat. Not waiting for the response, I stepped up and spun the other end of the staff around to strike hard at the side of its neck then, changing the direction of the force, brought the left end up again to slam into its groin. I finished by bringing the right end of the staff down on top of its head, followed closely by the left side to the same spot. Windpipe crushed and head cracked, the creature fell, air whistling through its ruined throat as it tried to suck in a breath.

I was already moving toward my mother when its body hit the ground.

She and Rick were not doing well.

At first, they were coordinating. He would slash at the shadowling attacking them, then back off suddenly, giving her an open shot. She'd shoot one or two of the monsters, making each bullet count. Then he would go forward and engage them again. It seemed to work for the first few waves.

But then her gun clicked. Twice. She was out of bullets.

She tried, frantically, to reload, but her hands were moving like she had lost coordination, fumbling and almost dropping the gun. When Rick tried to recover, the five opponents in front of him came forward in a wave. He lunged in toward one, and another of them slipped past his guard and slashed at his arm. He cried out, but back-stepped while slashing at another of them. Without the gun, he wasn't able to take small breaks between attacks and was quickly tiring out.

Another of the creatures jumped on his back, slashing down his left shoulder as it tried to sink its teeth into his neck. He bent at the waist, throwing it off and slashing it with both swords as it fell, but there was something wrong with his movements. The gash on his shoulder looked to be affecting his range of motion. Not good. I put my head down, held my staff tightly in one hand, and sprinted toward them, ignoring the others fighting their own battles around me.

Rick was losing his fluidity, as if the energy had been drained from him. He looked like a prize fighter in the twelfth round, stumbling, dead on his feet. He must have been losing a lot of blood.

A shadow jumped from my right side and landed directly in front of me. I swung at it, wanting to take care of it quickly. I kept one eye on Rick. He received another slash, this one so deep in his left forearm that he dropped his short sword.

"No!" I yelled as I battered away the shadowling's attack, kicked it in the face with a hopping front kick, and then spun while savagely battering it with diagonal downward strikes. Five powerful blows later, its head was no longer round in shape. I stepped on its body to leap toward Rick and my mom, who was still paralyzed with panic. It had only been a handful of seconds.

I launched myself, eyes locked on the scene a few feet in front of me. Rick brought his remaining sword up, cutting a shadowling as it tried to tear out his throat. He had no way of stopping the two others, one on each side of him, as they slashed his sides. Cloth shredded and blood splattered my mother's face as they tore flesh from him.

He screamed. Then, almost as if it was slow motion, he dropped his sword, eyes wide with pain looking at my mother. His knees buckled and he fell backward, narrowly avoiding the two other sets of claws coming toward his neck and face. He hit the ground hard, his back taking most of the force, but his head bouncing off the stone also.

I landed next to him, a rage building up in me I'd never felt before.

One of the shadowling swiped its claws down toward Rick, and something in me snapped. I screamed at it, spittle spraying out as I did so. I brought my staff around in a hard horizontal strike to the thing's arm, right at the elbow. A sound like a dry tree branch breaking filled the cavern as the limb bent in half the wrong way. The beast didn't have time to scream. I jammed the end of my staff into its throat so hard, the noise made by cartilage cracking was almost as loud as the breaking bone had been. I spun toward the next creature, knowing the one I'd just struck was already dead.

There were four shadowling left around me, all of them turning from Rick's fallen form to me. I hissed at them as I attacked.

It wasn't anything fancy, and it definitely wasn't beautiful, but letting my anger fuel me, I whirled the staff around me, keeping any claws thrown my way from connecting. I was a storm of blows, striking from every angle, not using finesse to find an opening, but instead battering down the upraised arms used for defense. These creatures were strong, but they weren't strong enough to withstand a heavy hardwood staff spun with such speed.

One by one, I relentlessly battered them. I broke bones, shattered noses, crushed eye sockets, and struck at soft tissue. If the creatures had the same anatomy as humans, I was sure they were bleeding internally by the time I was done.

I was finishing off the last foe when I heard an insistent buzz in my ears. It irritated me. What was it, that noise?

"Dani!" It was my mother's voice. I continued to rain blows down on the shadowling at my feet. I needed to make sure it couldn't ever harm any of us again.

"Dani!" she screamed at me again, frantic, fearful. "Dani. It's dead. They're all dead. Stop."

I blinked a few times and looked at her, slowing—but not stopping—my staff as it thudded wetly on the creature at my feet. She looked hysterical, her eyes wide and tearful, her hands on each side of her head, quivering.

I looked down.

The carcass I was hammering with my staff was unrecognizable. It was a mass of red flesh, like dark tenderized meat. I stopped hitting it and saw that both ends of my staff were red, blood dripping from them. How hard did I have to be hitting the beasts to make that much blood?

I widened my vision and saw the others, all of them staring at me. There were no other shadowling standing.

I dropped my staff, threw up, wiped my mouth, and broke down in tears.

I sobbed uncontrollably as my mother took me in her arms and tried to console me. I tried to pull air into my lungs, but could barely manage it. I didn't know what was wrong with me. Was this what it was like to have a nervous breakdown? I focused on trying to breathe, going down deep into myself. It still took me a few precious minutes to calm down enough to remember what had happened.

"Rick?" I said. "He fell. Rick, where is he?"

"Here," he said, his voice barely a whisper. He was a few feet away, in an area the others had cleared of the shadowling bodies.

He was a mess. The blood from his sides pooled under him, and he was so pale I would have thought him already dead if he wasn't blinking his eyes.

"Oh, Rick," I said, going to him. "I'm so sorry I wasn't faster."

"Not...your fault," he gasped.

We all knew he was done for. Even if we had the supplies to suture him up and stop the bleeding, it was obvious the damage was too severe. Even a hospital may not have been able to help him at this point.

"Allie," he said. "Are...you okay?"

"Yes. Thank you. I'm sorry. The gun. I ran out of bullets."

"I know."

Mom went to him and I jerked my head to let the others know to give them some space. We walked to the other side of the chamber, letting them talk by themselves.

"He's not going to make it," Sam said.

"No," I said.

She teared up, little fat droplets rolling down her cheek. Hot, wet tears ran down my face also.

"Is everyone else okay?" I asked, more to distract myself than anything else.

Everyone had a few scratches or bruises, but most of the shadowling had concentrated on my mom and Rick.

"Did they target those two specifically?" Zach asked.

"I don't think so," I said. "They happened to be right there when we were attacked from the back. They were using elementary tactics, ganging up on one or two to overwhelm them and then moving on to the next one. It was just unlucky they were in that spot."

"Or lucky for us," Tyler said. I rounded on him and cocked my fist to knock him out, but Zach's dad caught my arm and held it.

"Wait, Dani," Adam said. "I think he meant that if it would have been any of the rest of us, the creatures would have killed us quickly and moved on to the next one. Half of us may have been dead before they were stopped."

Tyler had backed up a step, his arms up like he was surrendering. His eyes were manic, as if he was facing an executioner.

“That’s what I meant,” he said. “I just meant that Rick is a badass with that sword. None of us could have kept them back so long.”

I relaxed my arm and Adam released it. “Oh, sorry.”

“No problem.” Tyler’s voice was shaky, no doubt thinking about how a couple of minutes before, I was beating the corpse of that shadowling so violently. My stomach lurched.

We gathered our packs, some of which had fallen and been kicked around the cavern as we battled. Those with first aid kits in theirs helped the others dress their wounds.

My whole body felt like one big wound. I had scratches and cuts all over me, most of them small enough that I didn’t need to do anything for them right then. My forearm, where that thing had bitten me, burned, but that was nothing compared to how I felt inside.

“Are you in a lot of pain?” my mother asked Rick.

That was strange. I was too far to be able to hear them speaking. I looked around to see if anyone else gave any indication they could hear. No one was looking toward the pair. Maybe it was some kind of weird acoustics thing the cave did.

“It’s...okay,” he answered.

“I’m really sorry I couldn’t help you,” she said. Her words were halting, shaky. She didn’t know what to say. She knew he was dying. I was sure he did, too, even through the shock.

“It’s fine. I came—” he grunted as he shifted, “—to protect you. I did that. As long...as you’re okay...that’s all that matters.”

There were a few seconds of silence.

“Can...I ask you something?” he said.

“Of course,” she said.

“Did you ever...could you—” he took in a wheezing breath. “Do you think you would have ever been...interested in me?”

Another pause.

“I mean,” he said. “Would it have been possible...for us to be together?”

“No.”

My heart broke over that one word. I felt the tears trying to come back even though they had dried for the time being.

“Oh,” he said.

“Rick, you’re a great guy,” Mom said, “but I’m not interested in you like that. I can’t help who I love.”

“Yeah,” he said. “I guess it’s stupid. I thought...you at least cared for me.” He sucked in a quick rush of air, hissing at the pain.

“I care about you the same as everyone else. You’re not special, though. I have lots of friends. You’re just one of them. I just don’t think of you like that.”

“I...” he wheezed again. “Okay. Listen...take care of Dani. She’s...a great...kid. Have a...good life, okay?” Rick made a noise like someone had hit him in the stomach. His voice had gotten softer as he spoke, the last word barely a whisper.

“I will.”

There were no other words. There was no sound at all until my mother’s shoes scuffed the stone floor and crunched on bits of rock as she came back to the rest of us.

“He’s gone,” she said, eyes strangely blank.

Chapter 25

For the second time in a half an hour, rage blossomed in me, a fire being fanned from smoldering embers to a full blaze.

““You’re not special’?” I spat at her. ““I have a lot of friends, and you’re just the same as them’?” I put my head in my hands and squeezed. “I can’t believe you.”

“What?” she asked, but then she drew her eyebrows down and glared at me. “And don’t you talk to me like that.”

“That man loved you,” I said. “He came down here to protect you, risking himself even though you never gave him the time of day. He sacrificed himself to keep you from getting hurt. He got torn up by these damn monsters, dying in pain, shredded by claws. He loved you, and when he asked if you cared, you told him no.”

“It’s not like that,” she said. “He didn’t have to come down here. I didn’t ask him to.”

“I know you didn’t,” I said. “And that makes it all that much sadder.”

“Who are you to question me?” she shouted. “I’m your mother.”

“Yes,” I said, “you are. And right now, I’m embarrassed by that fact.”

She started to say something, but I turned my back on her and walked back toward Rick’s body. Thankfully, she closed her mouth and didn’t make a sound other than a huff of air.

I looked down at the body of my mom’s friend. Memories of our interactions flashed through my mind. He wasn’t perfect, had his faults like anyone else, but he tried. He had always cared much more about Mom than she did about him. I had never asked her about it. We didn’t really talk about feelings around our house.

I could understand her not being attracted to him, though for an older guy, he was kind of handsome. He probably wasn’t her type. The thing was, though, she always kept him at arm’s length, never really seemed to care one way or another about him. Well, she’d never hurt his feelings again. I’d never have to see the pain in those blue eyes again. The last thing he heard was her telling him he was nothing special, after he gave his life for her. That must have hurt more than the physical pain in his shredded body. I was going to miss him.

I picked his swords up from where he had dropped them. We would come back and get his body when all this was over, give him a proper funeral. For now, I would honor him in the only way I could think of. I wasn't as good with a sword as I was with the staff, but I had trained a little with it, and I would cut any creature that crossed my path until this thing was finished. And every cut would add to his legacy. If my mother wouldn't show him honor, I would. I lifted the sword in salute, feeling a little embarrassed doing so, slid it home in the scabbard I had taken from his body, and went back toward the others.

I handed Sam my staff and Rick's short sword while I passed through the midst of the others on the way to the corridor down which we'd been heading before the attack. "Will you hold these for a while?" I asked my friend.

"Yes."

"Let's find Bobby and Allison and get out of here," I said.

The others looked at me like I was some kind of alien. I didn't really care. For the first time since we had entered the mine, fear was not the overriding factor in me. Anger was.

A little ball of molten lava smoldered in my belly. Fury at the shadowling, at Rick for dying, at my mother for her lack of sensitivity. It all whirled and gyrated inside me, making me feel like I might throw up but also like I could do anything. There didn't seem to be any reason to fear any longer. What could happen? I could die, right? So what. If life was this disappointing, why bother?

I had one goal: find the remaining captives, mostly my brother, get them out, and never have to see another cave again as long as I lived. Nothing else mattered.

"Dani," my mom said softly. It was the tone she used after we'd argued and she was trying to patch things up. Of course, it usually came after a week or two of us not talking to each other at all.

"No," I said. "I don't want to talk about it. If we survive this, maybe we can talk next week. Right now, I want the anger I'm feeling. I want to use it to kill these things. The more I kill, the easier it'll be to get Bobby out."

Thankfully, she stopped as I continued walking. I didn't want to argue with her. I wanted every bit of my annoyance to go toward the shadowling.

As I walked, Sam right behind me, the tunnel widened and flattened. It began to look as if it was one of the mine corridors, though I didn't see any marks from drills or picks or any other tools, but it struck me as odd that the passageway was so uniform.

"Are you okay, Dani?" Sam asked after we had walked for over an hour.

"Should I be? Someone I know just died. Died in a horrible way. My mom made his last few minutes even more painful for him. My brother is still missing, all my friends are injured in one way or another, and we're hundreds of feet down under the surface of the earth."

"True, but I'm concerned about you. That's a lot of stress for one person."

I sighed. "Yeah, it is."

"It scared me, when you were beating on that dead creature. I'm not sure if that scared me more or if it was the way you took out those four shadowling so quickly when Rick fell. I've never seen anyone attack anything so savagely before."

“Really?” I said. “Was it that bad?”

“It was. I still shiver when I think of what I saw in your face and how your stick seemed to break something everywhere it hit. These things are strong, stronger than people, it seems like, but it was like they were as weak and uncoordinated as toddlers when you went at them.”

“Oh. Well, I’m sorry I scared you. I liked Rick. He didn’t even need to come. He only did it to protect someone who doesn’t seem to care if he lived or died.”

“You know it’s not like that,” she said.

“Maybe. Anyway, that rage is gone. I’m still mad, but I’m controlled. I want to find Bobby and Allison and get out of here. I want this to be done. And I want it to be done quickly.”

“Me too.”

When we came into an area in the tunnel with several squat formations along one side, I figured it was a good place to stop and rest.

“Let’s take five or ten minutes here,” I said. “Eat something, drink, sit down for a little while. Not more than ten minutes, though. We still have work to do.”

Madison eyed me warily as she sat down. No, not warily. She had fear in her eyes. She looked at me as if she thought I had gone insane and would start attacking people. Good. As long as it shut her up, it was fine with me. I could just imagine the stories she’d tell at school. If we got out of here alive.

I stopped halfway to sitting down on a rock that looked a lot like a chair. I chuckled at what I had just been thinking. I was in the center of the earth, fighting for my life against monsters from who knows where, and I was worried about what kids at school would say about me. My chuckle bubbled into a laugh, but I clamped down on it and cut it off.

“It’s good to see you laugh,” Jacob said, coming up to me. I saw Sam moving off to sit with Zach and Emily out of the corner of my eye. Those two had not been more than a foot apart since Zach had defended her. How long ago was that? Two or three months? It seemed like it.

“I was just thinking of something ironic,” I said.

“You want to share?” he said, his eyes twinkling in my headlamp light. I was able to flick my eyes back and forth to his, but not maintain contact. As he had said before, it was a start.

I told him what I had thought and he laughed. It was a beautiful sound, and it made my heart ache. It sounded a little bit like Rick’s laugh.

“Don’t worry. I’ll let everyone know what really happened. I already told you that we would never have been able to do this without you. I believe that even more strongly now.”

“I don’t know why, but I don’t feel like arguing about it,” I said.

“Are you okay?” he said, eyes narrowing as if he was scrutinizing my expression. “You were… intense there for a little while.”

“Enraged is probably a better word,” I said. “It’s true, what Tyler said. If it was any one of us besides Rick, all of us may have been killed, one at a time, as the shadowling picked us off.”

“Us maybe, but not you. But yes, Rick really saved us all. He seemed like a really nice guy.”

Unexpectedly, I started to cry again. I had taken my sadness and pushed it down deep, covering over it with my anger, stomping down on it, and nailing a tarp over it. Jacob’s kind words ripped that covering to shreds, and grief washed over me. I started sobbing, gasping for breath, trying to get air into my lungs.

He put his arms around me and hugged me to him. He stroked my hair with one of his hands, rocking me gently back and forth.

“Good,” he said. “Let it out. It’ll help.”

I did. I sobbed like a child for several minutes, fighting for breath, sniffing through my runny nose. All the while, he held me and soothed me.

Finally, my breathing returned to normal and my tears slowed. They still leaked out, but not in torrents as before. I looked up at him, our eyes meeting. It was the most comfortable I had been meeting someone’s eyes in more than two years.

“Better?” he said.

Then my situation occurred to me. I dropped my eyes and my face turned to fire instantly. I fidgeted and he loosened his arm. I wriggled away from him.

“Um, yes,” I said. “Sorry. I...it’s been a rough day.”

“Don’t apologize, Dani. You’ve been through a lot. More than the rest of us. You can keep that anger if it’ll help to get the captured people back, but don’t let it overwhelm you.”

“I won’t.” I looked over at Madison, who was glaring at me. She wouldn’t say anything, of course. I was a psychotic killer. Still, it made me feel bad. Jacob was her boyfriend, after all. “Thank you. For, you know, just being here.”

“I’m glad I could help,” he said, his smile something that should have been in a museum for everyone to enjoy. “Are you ready to finish this?”

I wiped my cheek, picked up Rick’s sword, and stood up. “I am. Let’s go.”

Chapter 26

I raised up my hand as I stopped. Everyone behind me shuffled to a halt. We had only been moving again for maybe half an hour after our last break.

“Do you hear that?” I asked.

“Hear what?” Sam said.

I looked around at the others. They were all looking at me as if they didn’t know what I was talking about. Zach went so far as to tilt his head like a dog.

There it was again.

“Stay here for a minute,” I said.

I took a breath and switched off my headlamp. Surprisingly, the terror that usually threatened to overwhelm me at the thought of being in the dark didn’t attack me. I looked down the tunnel. The lights from the others’ headlamps still made it possible for me to see well enough to pick out the lumps and other obstructions on the floor.

I continued on for fifty feet or so, following the slight left turn in the tunnel. I stopped when I heard more clearly what I wasn’t able to make out before. It was the sound of voices. They were arguing. I still couldn’t quite get what they were saying, though.

I moved a little closer, just a handful of steps, and stopped. Still, the voices made no sense, like I was only hearing half of what they were saying. Like a bad connection on a cell phone. I took a few more steps, telling myself that was as far as I would go before turning back. The sounds were as loud as someone in front of me talking directly to me, but I still didn’t understand.

Then it occurred to me that I was hearing the screeches and shrieks of the shadowling, not voices at all. Not human voices, anyway. Standing calm, not in the middle of a battle, I could hear the modulation in the sounds, pick out the different speakers. I could even tell when one of them was asking a question. The overriding sense of the conversation, though, was antagonism. Two shadowling were arguing.

I dared not go any farther. If I could hear the creatures, they could hear me, and their eyesight was much better in the dark. There may have been one watching me right then. I silently turned and walked as carefully as I could back toward the others.

As I did, though, I realized I had moved far enough around the turn that their lights were not visible. I still saw a glow from around the corner, but the beams of light themselves didn't penetrate into the section of tunnel I was in. Strange. I had thought the beams still reached me. Shrugging, I went back to my group.

"There are more of them up ahead," I told them. "They're arguing. I wasn't able to see because they don't seem to need lights, but I think we'll have to go through them. There are no other side passages up to where I stopped."

"Are you sure we have to go through them?" Zach's dad asked. "I mean, can't we backtrack and take one of the other side passages back there?"

"We can wander around these caves forever," Sam answered for me. "The chances of finding the captives are better if we go where there are shadowling."

"Yeah, what she said," I said.

"Let's go, then," Jacob said, getting a glare from Madison for some reason. "We need to find them soon. We've been down here a long time."

The others agreed, Tyler mumbling something about aliens in an underground lair. My mother had been quiet since our argument.

I looked at each of them, made brief eye contact. My heart fluttered when I met Jacob's brown eyes. Madison had nothing but a cold look for me. Zach looked to his dad, a half smile on his face, and then faced me and nodded. Emily looked to Zach, then turned to me and forced a smile also. Zach's dad, his friend Dan next to him, nodded and hefted his ax handle. Tyler hummed something and lifted his chin in greeting. Sam set her jaw and nodded, her serious brown eyes unblinking. My mother wouldn't meet my eyes. This was all we had, the ten of us. It would have to be enough.

"Let's turn off all the lights but one," I said, "and keep that one on red light mode facing down. Everyone grab the shoulder or arm of the person in front of you. Try not to make too much noise or trip over anything. The closer we get before we turn the lights on, the better off we'll be. If we can flood the tunnel with light suddenly, we'll have a better chance of surprising them."

I flipped my headlamp to red light mode and pointed it toward the ground in front of me. I remembered the route, and it was relatively free from big obstacles, so with the help of the red lamp, I should be able to lead them up to where I was before. That would have to be enough.

I gripped the sword in both hands, my right on the hilt and my left on the scabbard. I set off for what I hoped wouldn't be a disaster. If we could take advantage of the internal strife, we might just finish off the group of shadowling without another death in our party. Depending on how big the group was, and how serious the argument. Nothing brings two arguing factions together like a common enemy.

It seemed to take hours, each step excruciating as I strained my ears to hear any change in the argument still progressing up ahead. Every scuff of a shoe, every harsh breath behind me made me wince. We were making so much noise that if the voices stopped for even a moment, we would be heard. We might, anyway. Still, I went on, and those behind me followed.

I put my hand over my lamp and scanned up ahead. I thought I saw something up there, as if someone else was using a red lamp. I blinked twice and shook my head, but it didn't go away. It didn't get any brighter, either. To be honest, it looked like a ghost. A kind of red blob of a ghost, but definitely humanoid.

I allowed my red lamp to illuminate the ground again and moved forward some more. Another few steps, and something told me we had gone far enough. I stopped and turned my head back toward the others. They looked like movie monsters, illuminated by the red light like that. I swallowed. Too much thinking about imaginary creatures and not enough about what we were doing. I forced myself to focus.

I realized then that I had screwed up. I had come up with a plan in my head, even mentioned it to them, but we didn't get into details. Without saying anything, how would we coordinate turning our lights on? I mentally kicked myself, trying to think of how I'd get it across to them. If we didn't all act at the same time, the entire plan could fall apart, as much of a plan as we had.

I took my headlamp off and pointed it toward myself, motioning them to get as close to me as they could. Then, I pointed toward the lamp switch and held up my other hand, squeezing the sword between my knees so I could free up both my hands. I held up my hand, fingers splayed. Then, I dropped the fingers one at a time, counting down. When I dropped the last one, I motioned to the headlamp switch and then mimicked like I was throwing a ball, starting with a fist and throwing my hand out, fingers spreading wide. To make sure I was understood, I then squinted my eyes and held the hand up as if to shield myself from bright light.

I looked at each of them for confirmation they understood. Each nodded. Well, almost all of them. When Madison looked to me, then to Jacob, then to Tyler, I knew she was confused. She opened her mouth to ask, but I gestured emphatically, putting my finger to my lips and then drawing it across my throat. Even in the red light, I could see her pale. She got the idea.

Jacob looked at me, nodded, then started gesturing to Madison. After a minute, she finally got what I was trying to say. I hoped that everyone else really understood what I wanted and weren't just thinking they did.

There was nothing else to do. We'd have to go with it.

I nodded at them, making sure they all were looking right at me. I breathed in, filling my lungs up all the way down into my abdomen, then, in the red glow of my headlamp, I held up my hand, fingers wide. I pulled my thumb in, counting to myself as I did so. Five.

I switched the light off, moving the switch over to the white light setting.

Four.

I put the headlamp back on my head and grabbed the sword from between my knees.

Three.

I turned to face where the shadowling argument was building. Maybe they would come to blows before we attacked.

Two.

I twisted my hand around the hilt of Rick's sword and gripped it tightly.

One.

I turned my headlamp on and ran toward the voices, hoping I was not alone.

Chapter 27

Lights flashed behind me, Sam's super flashlight brightest of all. Its beam cut through the darkness like a shark's fin in the ocean, the shadow seeming to split before it. When it fell on the creatures, I gasped. There had to be more than forty of them in the large chamber.

A chamber filled with cages like the ones we had been in. Cages with people in them. But forty shadowling? How were we going to survive this?

Two of the shadowling were standing very close to each other. Their postures told me that they were the ones that had been arguing. One of them was the leader we had seen. Both of them looked at us, putting their hands up to shade their eyes from Sam's light.

But the two were not my primary concern. There were nearly a dozen shadowling between them and us. There was no turning back now; they knew we were here. I wasn't sure if we would survive this, but a slim chance was better than none. If we turned and ran, they would overwhelm us.

I screamed as I ripped the sword from the scabbard. As I did, I hit the nearest creature on my left with the hardwood of the sword's case, snapping its head back from the blow, and sliced at one on the other side with the sword, tracing a red slash across its chest. I heard a gunshot.

I wasn't strong enough to effectively use a full-sized katana with one hand, so I threw the scabbard at another shadowling in front of me and gripped the sword with both hands, controlling my slashes with the right hand and levering with the left. My opponent raised both its claws to ward off the sheath, leaving its abdomen wide open. I dropped low and sliced at it horizontally. Its organs spilled out from the cut as I moved to the next creature.

Sam knew enough to stay back. She focused on shining the light in the faces of the monsters, Rick's short sword in her other hand and staff cradled in her arm with its end on the ground, leaning against her. The others hadn't been fast enough to keep up with me as I charged. Now they were entering the battle, so I needed to be careful not to cut my allies.

I had to hand it to Rick. He kept his sword sharp. A shadowling tried to slash me with its claws, and I parried it aside with the side of the sword. A tight circle with the blade, and I removed the claw from the beast at the wrist with a downward, outward slash. I circled it again, over my head, and came down diagonally, cutting halfway through the thing's neck. I kicked it in the chest as I pulled my blade free, ducking another set of claws and shuffling to the side to get out of range of another of the attacking monsters.

Jacob was busy with three of the creatures, having a difficult time batting away the strikes coming at him. I lunged, punching my sword through the back of one of his foes. The blade glanced off a rib and exited the monster's front. I think I hit the heart because the shadowling fell immediately, almost tearing the sword from my hand. I jerked it clear as the body hit the ground. Jacob nodded to me as he struck one of the others in the head, and I raised my sword quickly in salute.

That was a stupid move, something I probably did because I had read it in a fantasy book or saw it in a movie or something. It almost cost me an eye. I saw the movement just before the claw would have torn off the side of my face. I bent backward at the waist, barely avoiding the claw, and turned my salute into a cut with the blade vertical, moving the whole weapon horizontally directly in front of me. The movement took three of the claws from the attacker's hand. I followed up with a horizontal slash from left to right, cutting across its chest, and then turned the momentum in another circle to transform the strike into a downward vertical direction, splitting the creature's skull down to the nose.

I pulled the blade free while taking a step back. As the sword came clear, I pivoted the weapon in my right hand, dipping the tip in a long arc and reversing its direction. Using my left hand lightly on the hilt, I guided the steel into a reverse thrust, puncturing the abdomen of a shadowling preparing to slash at me from behind. I drew the blade from its body, turned to my left, and slashed horizontally at the wounded creature, taking its head off. The shock of hitting the nerves and cartilage made my hand vibrate until the sharpened steel made its way through, and the sword moved lightly again. I'd never felt anything like it. It made something inside me squirm.

There was no time for that. I backed away from another set of claws and slavering teeth and ran into something behind me. I brought my sword up, casting a quick glance over my shoulder. Emily, swinging her walking stick at the shadowling, looked at me and nodded. Zach was on the other side of her. The steady rhythm of gunshots had paused for a moment. My mom was probably reloading. I nodded at Emily and lunged at the creature in front of me.

As I turned in a circle with two of the monsters, I caught a glimpse of the two shadowling that had been arguing. The one I had seen before was shaking his head. The other one still screeched at him. It almost made sense to me. I could swear there were some real words in there. Something about "us or them."

I cut at the leg of one of the shadowling I was fighting and then slashed the arm of the other as it threw its claws at me. The one with the injured leg limped back while the second one came at me again with its other arm. I sidestepped, struck downward to cut its arm off at the elbow, used my own elbow to smash its nose, and then drove my sword through the chest of the limping one, angling the sharp steel up under the breastbone into vital organs. I was able to pull the blade free before the torque of it falling took it from my hands or, even worse, snapped the blade.

The remaining creature, nose dripping blood and arm spurting it, backed away from me. I used basic movements I'd practiced in sword forms when I had played with bokken—wooden swords—several years ago. Left downward diagonal slash, right downward diagonal slash, left horizontal strike, and finally a straight downward vertical strike. The creature, bleeding from several major wounds, slipped to the ground to die of blood loss.

I turned just in time to see the leader shadowling turn his back—it seemed male to me—on the other one. They were less than ten feet from me.

The other arguer pulled back his claw to attack the leader. Something in me was disgusted. I don't know why I would ever expect honor or fair fighting from these creatures, but it really irritated me that it would try to sucker punch another one of its kind. As it swung its claw, I lunged forward like a fencer, covering the distance in the blink of an eye. And struck.

A claw with half a forearm attached spun in the air. The attacker screamed, a more human scream than I'd heard from shadowling before, and blood sprayed me as it spun around to look at me.

Its big eyes were full of hatred. And pain. I could dance around it, acting defensively only, letting it wear itself out, bleed itself out, but I didn't think I'd do that. My anger flashed at this thing. Not only was it bad enough that it took my friends, that things like it killed Rick, but it didn't even have the decency to deal fairly with its own kind.

As far as I was concerned, the planet didn't need any more creatures like this. There were too many humans like that already.

It snarled and launched itself at me, trying to tear me with its claw, rip me with its teeth, and hurl its body into mine at the same time.

“Oh, hell no,” I spat.

I sidestepped and spun, narrowly avoiding its charge. As it passed to my right, I brought the sword around, left hand high, right hand low, blade angling downward. It was a block, a defensive move, but applied to the body moving past, it put a deep gash in the creature's shoulder. It howled.

I turned barely in time to be ready for its second charge. The thing was so fast! This time, it put its arms out, the whole one and the half one, so it was too wide to dodge. It rammed me.

I'd had enough. Just before it was to make contact with me, I dropped into the lowest, most stable stance I knew. And I lowered the tip of my blade so the weapon was horizontal. I held the sword hilt close and lowered my shoulder. Then I prepared for the impact.

The creature's eyes widened when he saw what was happening. It had apparently thought I'd try to slip to the side. It was committed too fully to stop, trying unsuccessfully to backpedal. It slammed into me, its face ramming into my outstretched blade. Its remaining claw slashed my left shoulder, though not deeply, but its teeth never had a chance to reach me. The sound emitted was a mixture of a sword going into a metal-trimmed scabbard, a watermelon being sliced, and a hiccup, the last being the only sound coming from the creature's mouth as it died.

The momentum spent, the shadowling's body dropped to the ground, dragging me down with it by the sword hilt. I stumbled until I let go of the weapon, but regained my balance. Reaching over, I slid the blade back out of the thing's head. It had gone all the way through. My stomach roiled, mainly at the sound I had heard, but I clenched my abs and raised the sword up again.

The leader shadowling was on the other side of the massive chamber, deftly climbing up a wall to a precarious perch in front of a tunnel. It chittered loudly, and all the rest of the creatures still alive immediately broke off contact and followed it. Before it was swallowed up by the darkness, its eyes met mine, flicked to my left side, and settled on mine again.

It nodded, as if in acknowledgement. Then it was gone.

Chapter 28

I looked to where the shadowling had shifted its eyes. There was a cage there, with people in it, a pile of trash, a lone table, and what looked like boxes of food. Human food; some kind of rations or camping meals. Was that what it had wanted me to see? That it had been feeding the captives, not killing them?

The room was a mess of bodies and awash with blood. We didn't even kill half of the horde in the room; most of the shadowling ran away with the leader. I didn't see any remaining that could pose a problem. Two of them twitched or moved weakly, but none were standing.

I was about to ask if anyone was hurt when my mother gasped. From the sound of it, she was crying, too.

"Bobby?"

My heart stopped mid-beat. I froze. What did she see? Please, God, tell me that after all this, he's not hurt or dead. Please.

"Bobby!" she cried again. I located her as she ran across the chamber toward one of the cages.

In it, I saw a familiar shaggy head of brown hair.

"Mom?" he said. "It is you. I thought it was, but was sure I was just imagining it. How did you get down here? And where did Dani get a sword?" He squinted toward me and I realized that the headlamps we were wearing were too weak to light a cavern this size. Still, I saw him distinctly. "That is Dani, right? I can't see her clearly."

"Yes," she cried, putting her fingers through the chain link "It is. We came to get you. Hold on and we'll have you out of there."

It was easy enough to do. The keys were sitting on the only table in the place. There were no chairs, just the table. In no time, the cages were opened and my mom was squeezing the life out of my brother. I waited off to the side until she was done.

Another commotion from behind me took my attention.

"Allie," a quivering voice said. "Allie?" It was Madison. My mom turned to look, but then apparently remembered again that Allison's nickname was Allie also. She went back to smothering Bobby.

So that was it, then. The two we had come to get were safe, along with maybe a dozen others.

How had they taken so many people without the town knowing? Some of them looked as if they might be homeless or at least people passing through town. Others, though, I recognized, even if I didn't know their names.

Jacob came up and stood in front of me. "We did it. We got them back safe. All we have to do is find our way back out, and we'll have done everything we wanted."

"Not everything," I said, looking down at the sword in my hand. I'd have to go find the scabbard. I was pretty sure I'd be keeping this sword for the rest of my life.

"Yeah," he said, some of his enthusiasm waning.

We were silent for a moment, watching my mom with Bobby and Madison with Allie.

"You know, I've said it before but it bears repeating. We couldn't have done any of this without you. You were our leader, our greatest warrior, our heroine."

I smiled at that. "That almost sounds poetic."

He cocked his head and got a thoughtful look on his face. "You know what? It does. Someone should write a poem about this. About you. Maybe I will. I'm a fair hand at it, if Mrs. Rothman is right. She wants me to publish some of my stuff. Wouldn't that be crazy?"

"Sure would."

He looked into my eyes. Really looked. And I let him. "Honestly, though. Without you, there's no way we would have survived this." He looked at the cages. "Or, at least we would have been captured for whatever purpose they took all these people."

"Aww, you're just saying that because it's true," I joked.

"You're right, I am. You're the best, Dani. I'm glad I got to know you better." He reached over and hugged me, just a quick embrace and pat on the back. I squeezed him back. He released me much too soon.

I sighed.

"Let's hang out sometime," he said. "You know, when we're not a mile under the earth and don't have monsters hunting us."

"Definitely," I said, knowing it would probably never happen. Once we got back out, things would go back to normal, he to his world and I to mine. It was a nice dream, though.

He took three steps, turned, and came back. "Can I have your number? It'll make it easier to coordinate, you know, hanging out."

It took me three tries and a look at my own phone to remember my number. While I had it out, he took it and put his number in. He took a selfie with my phone, the two of us in the picture together, "just so I wouldn't forget who he was." Yeah, right. Like that would ever happen in a billion years.

When I could remember how to walk again, I went over to hug Bobby and ruffle his hair. "You still need a haircut. Are you okay?"

"I am now," he said. "I told Allie that you'd come for us. You say you don't like to fight anymore, but I know you're a badass."

“Watch the language,” Mom said. We both rolled our eyes at her.

“What did they do with you?” I asked. “Did they hurt you?”

“No. See, everything is fine.” He lifted up his arms and turned in a circle. He did look unharmed, but I had seen something.

“Let me see your arm,” I said. He put it out and I checked it over. Sure enough. His right arm had a little scab from a catheter, like the others before had. They had taken his blood, too. I guessed they had knocked all of them out before taking it. None of them seemed to remember it happening.

“What is it?” Mom said.

“Oh, nothing. Just checking.”

I gathered everyone in a group and was preparing to get them to leave when I noticed the glint of metal in the pile of trash near where Bobby’s cage was. I stepped over and kicked an old tire and a piece of cardboard away. There was a briefcase there. A brushed aluminum briefcase.

Memories flashed in my head at the sight. I remembered a briefcase just like that, one my father always carried around. We used to joke that it was his spy briefcase. It had two separate combination locks on it, something I’d never seen before on any other case. Just like this one.

My hand trembling, I reached for the handle. I pulled it out slowly, scanning it, inspecting it. I turned it over. It was a normal-sized case, probably a foot and a half wide, a foot tall, and six inches thick. And heavy, as if it was full of papers. It felt like it weighed the same as the one I had hefted before, handing it to my father as he headed to work.

There, just below the handle on the other side of the case. There were three scratches, straight lines, but positioned in such a way that they formed a sloppy triangle. Or a sloppier capital D. My breath caught in my throat.

A little movie played in my head. My father was in the kitchen talking to my mother. I was maybe eight or nine years old. I peeked around the corner to check where they were, then made a beeline into the room my father used as his office.

I tried to open the briefcase, something I had always wanted to do. The locks wouldn’t open. Fine, I thought. If I can’t open it, then at least I can autograph it. Hey, I was young at the time. It seemed like a good idea.

I searched through the desk drawers and found a screwdriver, one of the ones with the sharp, flat end. I held it close to the tip to get the most leverage, and then I started scratching my name in the case.

It was more difficult than I thought it would be. I couldn’t control the tool well enough to make round letters. I could only scratch straight lines into it. So I did.

I got three lines down before a shadow broke the light from the hall and fell onto me. I froze and then slowly looked up. My father was standing there, face a thunderhead.

“Dani,” he said. “Why are you trying to destroy my briefcase?”

I had explained that I was writing my name. He took the screwdriver from me, explained the concept of private property—again—and grounded me from any extracurricular activities, like karate, and everything else I enjoyed.

I saw him occasionally running his fingers over that scratched D sometimes. He always got a wistful smile when he did it.

This was his case. My father's case. But what was it doing down here?

"That looks just like your father's old case," Mom said, startling me from my reverie.

"I know." I wasn't going to tell her it was the same case. He never did tell her what I had done, so she probably wouldn't recognize it. "I think I'm going to keep it. It reminds me of him."

She eyed me skeptically for a moment, then shrugged. "Okay, but you have to give it back if someone else claims it."

"I'll give it back if the owner claims it," I said honestly.

I shouted to get everyone's attention, and soon we were on our way out of the caves, hopefully without incident. I carried Rick's sword—back in its scabbard—in my right hand and the briefcase in my left, mind swirling with all the things I had seen and done. We were finally going home.

Chapter 29

Sam's chalk arrows and her super-flashlight made getting out of the caves, and then through the mine, much easier than I would have thought possible. We didn't run into any shadowling or any other hazards on the way out. We did see where the group with the security guards had been attacked, though. There were five bodies scattered across the floor. None of them were human.

We exited the mine at close to 6:00 AM. As we emerged, I thought it was full daylight. It was so bright, I had to shield my eyes with my hands. When I could finally lower my hand after my eyes had adjusted, I saw the truth. Huge spotlights had been set up, pointing right at us. Figures moved around the base of the lights, but it was too bright to see them.

"It's them," a voice said. "Turn the lights to the side." It was hard to hear over the sound of the gas motors powering the lights, but apparently someone heard. The spotlights were turned so they were not facing directly at us, and then I could survey the scene.

There were dozens of people lined up, many of them with guns.

"Sure," I said. "Now they decide to get the guns out and do something." All I could do was shake my head.

The spotlight motors were turned off one by one, each shut down helping to lower the noise level. I looked to the horizon. The sun was just rising, painting the sky with reds and yellows, signaling the start of a day on the surface. I stood and watched it. It was the most beautiful thing I had ever seen.

"...and I crossed over and began to mount the little known and lightless road to ascend into the shining world again," Sam said, almost reverently.

I sighed. "What was that?"

"It's the end of Inferno, when Dante and Virgil climb back up out of the depths of hell on Easter morning and see the heavenly stars and the sunrise."

"Oh," I said. "That again."

"Yeah," she said, smiling at me. "That again."

Things moved quickly after that. There were interviews and debriefings and food, blessed food. They let us go to a local motel and get some sleep and clean up, but they wanted us all to stay together so we could give the police all the information we could. After we got a little rest. We were all dead on our feet. We'd been underground for two days, fighting or running much of the time.

My mom, Bobby, and I got a suite, two rooms and a sort of living room. Bobby and I crashed in one room, and my mom got the other. I was asleep before I even hit the blankets.

"Yes, I know," I heard my mom say. It was loud enough to bring me out of my slumber. I wondered why she was talking so loud, but when I looked at Bobby, he didn't even change his deep breathing. It was as if he didn't hear it.

"I was worried sick about you," a man's voice said, his volume lower than hers, with kind of a tinny ping. Jesse.

"Not worried enough to do anything about it," she said, her voice booming.

"Come on, Allie. We already talked about this."

"We did."

I finally understood. Jesse wasn't in the room with her. He was on the phone. That's why his voice sounded metallic. Not on speaker, though. I felt a little guilty about listening in, but if they were both going to talk so loud, they deserved it.

My mother sighed. "Oh, maybe I'm being too harsh. Someone told me something that helped me understand your side of it." Her breath changed pitch, as if something had caught in her throat. "Anyway, I think I understand why you did it."

"You do?" he said. "That's good. I'd really like to see you later. Maybe we can talk about it some more."

"I..." she said, "I'd like that."

I smiled. Well, at least Rick's lecture did some good. My smile slid off my face. Rick. I stroked the sword next to the bed. We needed to get someone to retrieve his body so he could be buried. In a coffin. Not under tons of rock.

My gaze passed over the briefcase next to my bed. I reached over and put my hand on it, the cool metal feeling good on my skin. It was my father's case. That was enough in itself, but I wanted to open it.

I picked it up and tried the locks again. They were still locked. Of course they were. I tried different combinations, starting with the simple ones like 0-0-0 and 1-2-3. I gave up after twenty or thirty tries. I wondered what was in there. Was it just work stuff, or was it something that would be valuable to me, like pictures of my dad or a journal? I'd have to dedicate some time and effort to it when I had gotten some rest.

I put the case back on the floor, running my fingers over the scratched D one last time before lying down. I settled back to get to sleep, but was interrupted again before I managed it.

"We've talked to the ones from earlier and compared the list to the records for missing persons," a deep voice said. "Then we looked at the list we made of the ones who came out. There are still people missing."

"Are you sure?" another voice, sounding older, said.

“Yes.”

“Damn. What did those creatures do with them? Do you think they ate them?”

“No,” the younger voice said. “We’re not finished interviewing the second group, but no one we’ve talked to yet was hurt or saw anyone else being hurt or killed after they were captured.”

“Okay, we’ll find out more when...” the voices faded as they walked farther away from me.

I looked at the ceiling, shocked. I had heard them, outside my room, down the hallway by the sound of it. I had heard them like they were in the room with me. What was going on? I counted the teeth on the fire sprinkler above Bobby’s bed ten feet away while I pondered it. I got to five before what I was doing struck me.

The room was dark. Yet I was counting teeth on a fire sprinkler head? I looked to the other side of the room and read the placard on the door. I could easily read the checkout times and the instructions for using the door latch. In the dark. A dozen feet away.

I looked down at my forearm, the puncture marks there cleaned and bandaged. That thing I choked, the shadowling, it had bitten me, and now I could see in the dark and hear like a dog. Sam’s talk about turning into a viper, from Inferno, ran through my mind. Would I turn into one of them? My heart raced and bile rose up in my throat. My hand started to shake. I didn’t want to be a monster. What was I going to do?

I focused and forced myself to breathe slowly, consciously thinking my heart to stillness. It took a few minutes, but the panic left me and I was breathing normally. I had to think. I had to plan.

I didn’t know how much longer I would have until I turned into one of those creatures, if it even worked that way. Maybe it would just kill me. Either way, I had to figure it out so no one else was affected. Looking into the dark, something that no longer held any terror for me, I guessed my adventure wasn’t completely over. Not just yet.

The End

To keep up to date on other series by Eric Padilla (including books under the pen name P.E. Padilla) and get a free book, subscribe to my PEP Talk newsletter.

<http://pepadilla.com/opt-in-page/>

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

A chemical engineer by degree, air quality engineer by vocation, certified dreamer by predilection, and writer by sheer persistence, Eric Padilla learned long ago that crunching numbers and designing solutions was not enough to satisfy his creative urges. Weaned on classic science fiction and fantasy stories from authors as diverse as Heinlein, Tolkien, and Jordan, and affected by his love of role playing games such as Dungeons and Dragons (analog) and Final Fantasy (digital), he sometimes has trouble distinguishing reality from fantasy. While not ideal for a person who needs to function in modern society, it's the perfect state of mind for a writer. He also writes epic fantas under the pen name P.E. Padilla, and lives in Southern California, though he would like to be where there are more trees.

BLOOD CAPTIVE

IZZY SHOWS

All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

BLOOD CAPTIVE

In a world ruled by blood, don't forget to check the shadows.

The dawn of vampires has come, they have dominated the world, and the blood mages that challenged them—the only creatures capable of annihilating their species.

When one blood mage is freed from the dungeons, by a werewolf no less, tensions rise in the vampire court. Werewolves have not been seen in centuries, and a blood mage on the loose could mean the downfall of vampire kind.

She's taken, trained, and turned into a lethal weapon. The shadows are her friends, the vampires her prey.

The time has come for her to prove herself—her first solo hunt. If she fails, she stands to lose everything she's come to depend on.

When the Prince of Vampires stands between her and her prey, she has no choice but to find another way.

But he's not the only complication.

What price would you pay for freedom?

Chapter 1

GRAYSON

The night held the scent of fear, sweat, and the sound of many hearts beating too fast-welcomed sensations for a vampire such as myself. My lips drew tight in a grim smile as I charged down the empty alley with my friends at my side.

"Careful Grayson, you might actually enjoy yourself for once," one of them called, his soft laughter a welcome sound on the wind.

Indeed. I just might.

For one such as me-the prince of the vampires-there were few moments of pure joy. Too much responsibility, and too many expectations, inhibited indulging the momentary pleasures of life. One was expected to weigh all possible outcomes in every conversation and choose that which would ensure the most success for the species as a whole.

I didn't resent it. It was simply a fact of life. I was Prince of the People and thus my life was owed to them.

But there were moments—so very few—where I allowed myself to revel in my most basic nature. Like this one. The hunt.

Adrenaline pumped through my veins along with the stolen blood I'd drained from a thrall earlier in the night. The hours after we have taken blood were the ones in which we felt most powerful, where we could do anything imaginable. You would never be faster, stronger, or more aware than immediately after taking blood.

It was not necessary for me to feed before the hunt; my royal lineage ensured that I was of the strongest stock. I could go far longer than a normal vampire—and I had done so in the past when there were shortages of blood. But those years were long gone. We had risen to supremacy in a world once ruled by humans, and I could take blood when I pleased.

A luxury that I indulged.

My legs pumped harder as I ran, following the scent of the mages we chased. Blood mages were the closest thing a vampire could get to a fair fight, outside of the wolves. The mages had long been an enemy we hoped to eradicate. They alone possessed the power required to exterminate the vampire race.

My father was the one who had managed to devise the collars of iron and ancient magic that would contain their abilities, allowing us to come to full power. They could no longer keep us in subjugation, removing the need to hide.

Now we hunted the blood mages, both out of necessity and for sport. They could not be allowed to roam free. All must be killed or caged.

I preferred them caged. They made excellent trophies, and when the thralls ran low, they were a good back-up source of blood.

A scream pierced the night, and I forced the thoughts from my mind. No need to reminisce on such things when something much more enjoyable was at hand.

"You're getting that serious look on your face, Grayson," Alex said.

My eyes darted over to my long-time friend, my legs never stopping. There were five men outside of my family who were permitted to call me by my given name—Alex was one of them. To everyone else, I was simply 'Prince.' A title, not a name, and a constant reminder of the responsibility that was mine by birthright.

"Am I?" I forced a smile to my face. He was right. I had, in fact, started to scowl again.

"Are you not enjoying the hunt?"

"I always enjoy the hunt, friend." I winked at him. "I will enjoy it more when there is fresh blood in my mouth."

He shot me a savage grin.

We raced through the night, all but invisible at the speed with which we moved. The scent of our prey grew stronger. They could not hope to compete with our speed. They would run as far as they could and then try to hide the sounds of their heartbeats and the smell of their blood, hoping it would deter us from finding them.

Tricky as they were, they cannot stop from breathing. As long as we were close, we'd find them through that sound alone. And even if they managed enough distance, there were the old methods of tracking to fall back on.

But the sounds of labored breathing reached my ears a moment later and I knew that I would not have to rely on ancient methods; the mages were close, and soon I would feast on them.

The five of us rounded the corner as one, slowing to a walk, and came face to face with the family of blood mages that had been running from us. A mother and three young that looked to be in their teens.

I scowled. I had hoped for older prey, something I could dine on without the guilt of ending the life of a youngling. Alas, four more for the dungeons. It seemed that these were destined for the cages.

A quick gesture of one hand to Raoul, and four collars were produced from the pack on his back.

"Submit, woman, and no harm will come to your children." I kept my voice low and melodic, a special note of command in the tone. It was a talent gifted to all vampires to compel humans, though some blood mages could fight against it. It was always worth a shot, and there was still the chance that she would see the logic of my words.

"I would rather they die than end up in your hands." She dropped her hands to her sides, clenching them tight.

"Calm yourself," I said, my tone dangerously soft.

"Or what, vampire? You'll kill me?"

I sighed. They never learned. Then again, there were never any survivors or runaways to spread the word as to what happened when we caught them, or what happened to the ones who resisted.

The woman began to chant, and my chest tightened. Another minute and she would stop the heart beating inside my chest, or set my blood ablaze. Or perhaps she would take control of me. I could not allow any of those scenarios to happen.

Quick as you please, I leapt behind her and clamped my hand over her mouth. In small numbers, blood mages were not something to be terribly concerned about, especially when there were outnumbered by vampires.

And when there's a royal vampire who'd just fed? Overkill.

Her children scurried away from me. One of the boys let loose a terror-filled shriek. That answered one question—she had not trained her children in the talents of blood magic. Either that, or they were missing the gene. It mattered not, they would go to the cages all the same.

"Raoul." I jerked my head at the woman.

He strode forward and fitted the iron collar around her throat, his strong hands ignoring her struggles.

"Unless you want your mother's neck broken, you will submit," I said to the teenaged younglings.

They were smart enough not to struggle as each was fitted with a collar.

I glanced at Alex. "Not the hunt I was hoping for," I said, allowing disappointment to creep into my voice.

"It's too bad. I was looking forward to you taking the stick out of your ass," he said, grinning cheekily.

I stepped away from the mage and shoved Alex's shoulder. "Careful Alex, or I will be rid of you."

"Then what would you do when you are King? Who would keep you grounded?" He grinned. "No, I do not think you will be rid of me anytime soon."

I chuckled. Alex was right. He knew just when I needed to laugh and when I needed to focus, and he was always ready to give me whatever incentive I needed for either.

We led the family back to the castle. Alex walked beside me, two men walked on either side of the family, and one man followed up the back. Just in case anyone got any ideas about freeing the newly captured mages.

But they wouldn't do that. The blood mages would never risk themselves for another like that.

Blood mages were inherently selfish creatures, caring about their own survival. They had no sense of responsibility to their fellow mages, unlike us. We prided ourselves on taking care of our own.

Even the wolves have pack loyalty. But blood mages? Despicable creatures, altogether.

It didn't take us long to reach the castle, and lead them into the dungeons.

"Should we separate them, Grayson?" Alex asked, glancing at the mother cautiously.

"No need," I said. "They cannot rid themselves of the collars."

He knew that so why had he asked? I frowned in his direction.

He shrugged. "Thought you might not want to put the woman with the others."

Ah.

I took another look, my eyes running casually over her body. She was well-built, with ample curves and pale blond hair. But she did not interest me, else I would have already taken note.

I shook my head. "Put them in a cell together."

Alex and Raoul kept hold of the four mages, while my other men went to grab the keys to the cells.

Bored already, I walked down the line of cells, letting my eyes drift over the various prisoners therein. Some had been here only a few days, brought in from a fresh hunt, others for weeks, months, or years. We generally cycled them out of these front cells after they had been here for a while—assuming a vampire did not kill them while taking blood—but there were some that had been deemed necessary to keep an eye on.

Troublemakers, for the most part.

It was not something I concerned myself with. It was the guards' duty to determine which prisoners were cycled out.

Some of the guards intentionally kept certain prisoners here of which they were, well, fond.

I turned on my heel and walked toward my friends. Perhaps we would go carousing after this. Anything to scratch the annoying itch to get out and do something—an itch the hunt had only intensified.

As I passed a cell, something caught my eye. I stopped and took a few steps back to peer inside.

There was a lone blood mage within—odd, in itself, as they were usually kept in groups—but at first glance she did not appear to be anything of note. She had long brown hair and tawny skin. With her face was turned away from me I could not make out any further features.

I lifted a hand, about to call out to her. I stopped before the words could leave my throat. What was I doing?

"Prince!" Raoul called.

I dropped my hand, hoping they hadn't noticed., I turned and was pleased to see they weren't looking at me.

"Yes?" It took effort to keep my voice steady. I cast a narrowed glare at the blood mage.

Had she found a way out of the collar? Was she working magic on me? It didn't feel like it. I shifted my weight so that I was closer to the cell door, and peered closely, trying to see through the thick mess of hair to her neck.

"Let's get out of here and go do something," Raoul said.

Right. Wasn't that what I wanted?

And yet, a part of me wanted to stay...

I shook my head. No.

"Of course," I said. "Let's find something fun to do." I walked away from the cell to follow my friends out of the dungeons, not letting myself look back even though I felt the urge to.

It couldn't have been magic that had caught my attention.

But then what had?

Chapter 2

NINA

*C*rack.

The sound of the whip greeted my ears before I felt the kiss of leather against my bare back. My teeth clenched together so tightly that I was surprised none of them broke from sheer force.

I will not scream. I'm steel forged from fire and I will not break.

I repeated the mantra over and over. I refused to give the guard the satisfaction of the truth. They had broken me a long time ago.

I liked to pretend that I was still whole. My pride was all I had left; it was the only thing I could hold onto.

They could take my life as they had done to plenty of other blood mage prisoners. But as long as I still drew breath my mind was my own.

"Nothing to say, bitch?" Harsh words, but I was used to a lot worse.

I turned my head to look up at the guard, curving my lips up at the corners into a defiant smile.

"Another please, sir?" My words were so sweet, completely at odds with the situation.

The guard flashed sharp fangs, the mark of what he was—one of the immortal night stalkers who dominated our world.

My grandmother had told stories—before I was taken at only six by the vampires—about a world before the vampires ruled. A system called democracy, where people had been equal. The blood mages had still lived in fear of being found out, but they hadn't had to hide like rats just to survive. According to abuelita, all you had to do was proclaim yourself a Wiccan and just be a little kooky. No one bothered with so-called 'hippies'. The best disguise for a blood mage was disregard.

I wasn't sure I believed the fairy tale of a mythical world where everyone could live more or less in peace, but it was much better than the horror we lived in now.

The vampires had free reign, and they hadn't hesitated to turn humans into cattle. And blood mages? We were either killed or enslaved with no rhyme or reason which one it would be. Maybe the vampire was in a forgiving mood when they caught you, and decided to let you live.

But was it really better down here in the dungeons at the mercy of the guards?

Another crack of the whip and the metallic scent of blood filled the air. The scars from twelve years of torture had roughened my flesh so new wounds didn't sting as much as when I'd been small.

I had learned quick it was better to cry out when hit, so they felt they were getting something out of the torture. Power tripping bastards. Silence drove them crazy. They just whipped harder and harder until you screamed.

So why did I remain silent?

Because fuck them, that's why. It was the only control I had in this life. The guards decided when I ate or slept, but I decided when to scream.

Crack.

I bit my lip to keep the whimper from escaping my mouth.

Keep quiet, Nina. You can't give him the satisfaction.

Of course, eventually, when I couldn't take anymore and death was a real possibility, I would unleash the screams burning in my throat.

Every night he came to take his pound of flesh, I swore this would be the night I kept silent until he gave up without his reward. Maybe then he would leave me the hell alone. Though, it was more likely I'd be disposed, no longer an entertaining toy for the sadistic asshole.

The whip tore into my flesh and a soft yelp escaped my lips. I hadn't been prepared.

"What was that?" The guard bent down so his face was right in front of mine. His breath assaulted my nostrils.

"Not a damn thing." I bared my teeth at him.

Fuck you, buddy.

"Tch. Too bad for you, then." He stood and pulled back his arm, holding the whip high in the air. I turned my head away and squeezed my eyes shut so I wouldn't see the whip coming down. My hands balled into tight fists as I prepared for the attack.

Tension, as I waited for the sharp pang I knew was coming, built inside of me. Maybe not this one, maybe not even the next, but eventually I wouldn't be able to stop from crying out.

Defeat welled inside of me, and with it, the pessimistic voice that had invaded my mind years ago.

Why do you make trouble? Just give him what he wants and he'll go away.

But he'll just move on to another prisoner.

Maybe that was the real reason I refused to give in, because if it wasn't me, someone else would feel this pain. I couldn't bear the guilt.

There were children here. The guards didn't care your age, all that mattered was you being a blood mage. If you're one of us, you were nothing more other than a bit of sport.

At least the children didn't have to endure the other horrors.

My shoulders tightened.

No. We will not go down that memory path. I mentally slammed the door.

"Stop!" An unfamiliar male voice dripping with authority yelled.

My eyes popped open, but I didn't dare turn my head. Had that been real or imagined?

"Unhand me," the guard bellowed. "Who the fuck do you think—Prince!"

Prince.

Disgust curled deep inside my gut. I didn't know the Prince of the vampires, but he must be a truly awful creature to rule over the sadistic guards.

Why had he stopped the guard?

"You will cease your ministrations." The prince's voice had a dangerous edge, but the soft tone stroked my ears pleasantly, so foreign a sensation I hardly recognized it.

"Sire, this is...this is the way of things!"

"You are needed elsewhere, good sir. Surely you won't second guess my orders?"

Silence for several heartbeats before the guard grunted. His footsteps echoed as he marched out of the chamber.

The Prince's footsteps were soft in comparison as he walked closer. My heart raced as panic set in—what did he want with me?

If I hadn't been bound, I would have smacked myself. You would think the thralls would be enough to satisfy him; he must have his pick of the litter. Apparently, he wanted something different, or he wouldn't be down in the dirty dungeons with me.

My bare breasts pressed against the rough wood of the table I laid. The damp air that permeated the dungeon caused goosebumps to erupt on my bloody back.

"Hello," he said.

I was surprised how gentle his voice was, and even more embarrassed the way my body reacted to the sound.

Talk about Stockholm syndrome. Down girl. You don't want to get involved with a vampire prince.

"Will you look at me, please?"

What had it cost the Prince to say please? Still, I wasn't stupid enough to disobey the prince. I might as well sign my own death sentence.

Slowly, I lifted my head off the table and looked at the Prince as he had commanded.

I wanted to be disappointed he wasn't horribly disfigured by the evil that tainted his soul. He was so beautiful it took my breath away. Thick white hair—not even a tint of blond to it—fell past his shoulders. Part of it was pulled back into some sort of half ponytail, so it didn't hang into his eyes, but one stray lock had gotten out of line and fallen onto his forehead.

The strangest urge to brush it back into place consumed me. I dug my nails into my palms to stop myself.

He was tall and well-muscled, but it was his striking blue eyes that held me captivated. I could drown in them, and it wouldn't even be a bad way to go.

My lips parted to tell him to leave me alone, but the words wouldn't come out. There was a strange warring sensation inside me—I didn't entirely want him to go. I wanted to keep staring at him, wanted to commit every inch of his face to memory so I could hold onto it later.

You're being ridiculous, Nina. Get ahold of yourself. He's a vampire. He's the entire reason you're caged down here. He possesses the power to set us all free, and instead he lives it up in the castle. He's just here to use and abuse you. Remember?

He cocked his head to the side as if I was a puzzle he couldn't figure out. "Who are you?"

I arched an eyebrow, tilting my head to the side so that my forehead touched the wood of the table. What a weird thing for him to ask.

My stubborn streak kicked in and I smirked at him, refusing to answer.

Go away. I thought to myself, since I couldn't get the words to come out of my mouth.

"You won't talk to me, will you?" He set his lips in a firm line and sighed. "I'm not here to hurt you."

Liar.

No vampire ever came down for any other reason. And they definitely didn't come just to talk.

"I'd like to know your name." It wasn't a question, but it also wasn't a command. I could refuse.

So, I did. He could like to know all he wanted, but I wasn't going to give it to him unless he pulled the prince card. I wanted him to know I understood the rules, and he wasn't going to get special attention just because he used pretty words.

"Surely, you haven't had a conversation in a long time."

No shit.

"I thought perhaps you might want to...talk."

I shot him a dry look and resisted the urge to roll my eyes. He didn't care about us down here, and I wasn't going to let him pretend that he did.

"Is it such a bad thing to speak with a vampire?"

"Go. Away." The words came out in a croak, rasping against my throat.

His eyes widened. "I..."

"Leave me," I said, before he could get another word out.

His eyes dropped to the floor as he turned his head to the side. I tried not to be impressed by the strong jawline in his profile.

He's not handsome. He's ugly as a toad.

Yeah, I'd keep telling myself that. Maybe it would make me feel better.

"As you wish." He turned and left the chamber.

A confusing pang of sadness gripped my heart. I hadn't expected him to actually leave.

Chapter 3

NINA

My back ached as I leaned against the stone wall in my cell. A guard, not the one who had whipped me, had taken me back to my cell. Surprisingly, he hadn't been horrible to me. He'd kept his eyes averted while I put my on shirt, and hadn't manhandled me on the walk back.

While I didn't know for certain, I suspected the prince had said something to him. It grated against my nerves—I didn't need some prissy, spoiled prince inflating his sense of self-worth by looking out for me. I'd done just fine the past twelve years in this hell. I could take care of myself.

Alone in my cell, I was very much aware of the warm, wet sensation of my shirt sticking to my bleeding wounds. I would have been better off removing the shirt and letting the wound heal. The longer the fabric stuck to my flesh, the more it would only hurt later when I peeled it away. At the very least I should stop pressing against the wall and making it worse.

But I did none of those things. I welcomed the stinging pain washing over me in small waves, reminding me what it meant to be a prisoner in the vampire's world. I couldn't forget how horrible they were, couldn't lose sight of the reality of this world. No matter how nice the prince had wanted seem, I knew the truth.

One way or another, they'd be the death of us all.

The ones who died before they saw the cells were the lucky ones. They'd never know what it was like to yearn for the feeling of the sun on their skin.

God, I missed the sun. I looked just like my mother—brown hair, brown eyes, and you guessed it, brown skin. All right, it's more of a tawny color than anything, not super dark, but still. I wasn't pale as your typical vampire from having not seen the sun in twelve years, but I was a few shades lighter than I probably would've been.

Once when I'd been a child, we'd taken a vacation. An honest-to-God vacation. What, that doesn't sound like a miracle to you? Try living on the run your entire life, and you'll realize what a miracle a vacation was. We went to the beach, and I laid out in the sun for ages, played in the ocean, and enjoyed myself. I'd grown up in a constant state of anxiety, waiting for the hammer to fall-for the vampires to swarm us.

Having a few hours by the ocean...it was the best memory I could store in my mind.

I closed my eyes and leaned my head back against the wall, calling to mind the sensation of the sun warming my skin. I would give anything to have just one day in the sun again.

Sudden cries jolted me out of my daydream. I frowned, climbing to my feet and edged closer to the bars. I was alone in my cell and there was no one in the cells around me. No one to ask questions of.

I'd learned a while back my isolation wasn't normal. Most prisoners were kept in groups to save space. But apparently, this one guard liked me—and not in a good way—so I got 'special' treatment.

Fucking awesome, right?

I gripped the iron bars and pressed my face against the cool metal, straining to peer down the dark hallway. The suppression collar around my neck clanged against the bars—it was what kept me subservient to my captors. Without it, I would've been free to kill anyone who looked at me funny with a simple spell.

Not that I knew how to use my magic. Training didn't start until thirteen, and only if your parents followed the old ways. I'd known some teenagers who hadn't started training, because their parents didn't believe they were ready.

I would never know what it was like to tap into the magic that burned inside me. Could you imagine being divorced from a part of yourself? It was a horrible feeling. I was painfully aware of it every moment of every day, and it hurt worse than any beating.

Like a giant, ugly wound kept open forever.

More yells came from down the hallway. Incoherent, unfortunately, so that wasn't doing me any good.

I tried to make myself sit back down, but my curiosity was piqued. It was probably just the guards coming back for a little more torture—probably of me since my torture session had been interrupted by Mr. Prince. The guard would be super pissed about that, and it would royally suck when he took it out on me.

I should've gone into the corner and made myself disappear but I couldn't move my feet. I needed to see what was happening.

Morbid curiosity and all that.

Then a guard ran past. I jumped back, my eyes wide, before I stepping forward and pressing my face against the bars. What had he been running from?

If I could just get a little closer, I could see what it was...

The guard flew forward, a giant grey wolf on top of him.

What the fuck is a wolf doing down here?

My mind froze as I tried to absorb the information my eyes transmitted, but I got nothing. I stared as the wolf savaged the guard, tearing into his throat and then ripping his heart from his chest.

I should be screaming. The thought didn't transmit to my vocal cords. Probably because I was still gawking as the wolf went to town on the dying guard. I didn't waste any of my time on pity.

When the vampire stilled, the wolf took a few steps back, then slowly turned its head. Its eyes locked with mine. It still growled, hackles raised.

My blood ran cold, but I still couldn't move. It was dangerous so close to the bars keeping me safe from the wild animal.

How had it gotten in?

A moment later the wolf seemed to calm, and turned its attention back to the guard's body. It rooted around the vampire's waist and yanked the keys from the belt. With one toss of its head, it threw the keys into my cell.

My jaw dropped. Was this a rescue? A chance to escape?

My frequent dreams of escape were never like this. I'd never once imagined a wolf would plow its way into the dungeons and set me free. It felt more like a fairy tale than abuelita's stories.

It took a second before I'd the presence of mind to grab the keys off and reach through the bars to the lock on the outside. I fumbled, trying to find the right one, and the numbness began to fade. Time was ticking by and any minute now more guards would come.

The wolf growled impatiently.

I finally found the right key. I'd never been so happy to hear a clanking sound as when the tumblers fell into place, and the cell door parted. I shoved it open.

The anxiety hit as soon as I stepped out of the cell. I'd never been out without at least one guard telling me where to go, usually with a hand wrapped around my upper arm. I didn't which way to freedom. If I didn't figure it out, and soon, this rescue mission would be short lived.

The yells of the other prisoners dampened my panic. I shook my head to clear. I had to get the other prisoners out, too!

The guards would take their rage out on anyone left behind. I started toward another cell, its occupants reaching through the bars begging for freedom. And before I could get two steps, teeth punctured the skin on my hand. I shrieked. In reality, it wasn't a huge bite, just a little nip, but it shocked me.

The wolf continued to growl, baring its teeth when I moved toward the other cells. He would bite me again if I continued to try getting the other prisoners out.

Why would he set me free, but stop me from saving the others?

The wolf stalked past, and then shot a glare over its shoulder at me. It knew the way out and it was my only chance at freedom. That was a more compelling reason than the fear of getting mauled.

I took a last look at the people I was abandoning--my people. I'm sorry. There was nothing I could actually do to save them. Trying to be a hero would end with me back in my cage, or worse. I wasn't big on self-sacrifice, especially futile ones.

Reluctantly, I turned and followed the wolf away from the cries of my fellow blood mages.

Chapter 4

NINA

The wolf sprinted down the corridor and I rushed after it, terrified of being left behind. I didn't know what it was, but it wasn't a normal wolf.

Could it be...? No, that's impossible.

Werewolves were a thing of myths. No one had seen one in centuries, or so the stories claimed. But all the evidence in front of me pointed to a beast with the mind of an intelligent human being. Either this was a very funny dream I was going to wake up from any minute, or I'd just been saved by a creature from ancient lore.

I didn't have time to spend pondering, though, as I had to focus on keeping my legs moving.

It'd been years since I'd done more than walk after the guards as they dragged me from the prison cell to the torture chamber and back again—I had never gone anywhere else in the dungeons, and running hadn't exactly been on the menu. They didn't care about keeping us fit; they cared about keeping us under control.

My lungs burned and my under-used muscles screamed as I charged down the hallway with the wolf ahead of me. It was purposefully going slower than it was capable of; there was no way in hell the wolf was as slow as me. I was thankful that it didn't just take off and leave. I wouldn't have known where to go without it to lead me.

We came to an intersection, but the wolf didn't hesitate, turning the corner and sprinting.

It clearly knew where to go. Which made sense. It had come into the dungeons on its own somehow.

We passed a body on the ground bearing the same savage marks as the guard the wolf had killed. A shudder ran down my spine at the violence, but I didn't have time to stop and dwell on it.

What would happen if we got caught? If I was lucky, the vampires would take me back to my cell—no, if I was lucky they would kill me. I couldn't go back to the cells and the torture after coming so close to escape.

I wouldn't be able to bear it.

I stumbled and barely caught my footing, panic jolting me back to the urgency of the moment. I had to keep my mind on the task at hand.

No multi-tasking for me.

We rounded another corner and came face to face with one of the vampire guards.

I skidded to a halt and backed up a few steps, prepared to run in the other direction. Or maybe throw myself on the ground and beg for mercy. I didn't get the chance to choose.

The wolf leapt onto the man without a moment's hesitation, bearing him down to the stone floor and ripping into his throat.

An odd thought occurred to me. It didn't make much sense to rip the throat out of a vampire. They could survive anything but heart extraction—or the power of a blood mage. I wished I could be rid of the collar so I could help in our bid for freedom.

Then again, I didn't know even the simplest of spells. I wouldn't be able to defend us if it came down to it; I was reliant on the wolf to get me out of this alive.

Which was terrifying in and of itself.

The wolf made short work of the guard and we kept going, charging down the hallway again.

God, I just want five seconds to catch my breath. My blood pounded, and I stumbled again.

My muscles didn't know how to do this. I was going to fall, and the wolf wouldn't notice. The vampires would get hold of me again, take me back to the cell, and a whipping wouldn't be the only thing I got this night.

No, you're going to get out of this alive. Don't think about anything other than moving forward.

I ran, pushing the horrifying thoughts as far to the back of my mind as possible. If I fell, if the vampires came in force and subdued the wolf, if I was taken back...I would deal with the consequences then.

Not now.

Keep going, Nina. Just keep going.

What felt like an eternity of running later, we came to the end of the corridor—two stairways at the very end. One led up and one down. I moved toward the one that led up. To get out, we had to get up from the dungeons.

Pain lanced through my thigh as the wolf bit into me again, a low growl rumbling in its throat.

I shot him a nasty glare. "You know, there are better ways of getting my attention than damaging my leg. I need that for running, you know."

The wolf's eyes bore into my soul. I shuddered.

Fair enough.

The wolf headed for the stairs on the right, the ones that led down, and I couldn't do anything but follow him.

Stairs were even harder than running. I hadn't used stairs since I was six years old, and you would be surprised at how difficult it was to move down stairs at a decent speed without stumbling and falling.

It took all my concentration just to keep myself upright with one foot moving in front of the other.
Just keep going, right?

The wolf froze. I had to backpedal to keep from plowing into him and falling face first down the steep stairs. I ended up landing painfully on my ass. The stone was not a forgiving mistress.

Sucking in a deep breath, I resisted the urge to snap at the wolf for not giving any sort of warning before stopping.

The wolf turned itself and with a jump darted down a hallway I hadn't even noticed—we weren't on a landing, we were still on the stairs, but there was a corridor right there. I stepped off carefully into the hallway, paying attention to the movement just to make sure I didn't fall again. Safely off the stairs, I took off at a run after the wolf.

The corridor was long and dark—I couldn't see my hand in front of my face when I lifted it to test. But I thought better of trying that again when I almost fell flat on my face.

Right, no multitasking while you're running. My brain just couldn't handle it right now, apparently. I was like a goddamned toddler. I had to use all of my brain power just to keep my legs moving. Fat lot of good I was.

It felt like ages passed, but at last we reached the end of the corridor.

A fairly unimportant looking door stood in front of us. My gut clenched as I thought about what might be on the other side. Something awful?

More vampires?

The wolf wouldn't have led me here if it didn't think we—more like it—could take whatever was waiting behind the door. With a deep breath, I reached to clasp the knob and turned it.

The door swung open, revealing the outside world. Grass. God, I'd almost forgotten what grass looked like.

"Jesus, Mary, and Joseph," I whispered reverently.

The wolf didn't appear to want to take in the beauty of the moment. It took off, bounding across the grass, and all I could do was follow.

Forlornly, I cast a look up at the moon.

If only we had escaped during the day. I might have seen the sun again.

I pushed that thought from my mind and cheered myself with another thought.

I would see the sun again.

Chapter 5

NINA

The rays of dawn were just beginning to reach into the sky when the wolf finally slowed from its gentle lope to a comfortable walking speed. It had taken us the rest of the night to reach our destination, but what a destination it was.

We were mere feet away from a freaking mansion.

"Er, I hope you know the people here, because this doesn't look like somewhere I'll fit in," I said, rubbing at my arms. The morning was cold, and though the run had effectively warmed me up, my skin was cold to the touch.

I couldn't stop looking up at the sky, at the grey light that was filling it. My heart yearned to stay outside just a little while longer, to see the sun rise and feel the warmth on my face.

The wolf didn't so much as look at me to indicate it had heard me, it just kept walking toward the mansion.

A man stood at the bottom of the steps that led up to the giant door, clothing in his hands.

He did not look happy to see me.

I grimaced and averted my eyes. I was used to getting looks like that—the guards had hated us blood mages, of course. But I had thought that wherever the wolf was taking me would be a friendly place.

I guess not.

"Hello," I said attempting to force a cheerful smile to my face. I still knew the basics of etiquette, though my interactions with other people had been limited to the guards that had abused me.

When you have an abuelita like mine and you remember how to be polite no matter what shit you've been through. That woman beat manners into me until they stuck like fleas on a dog.

The man cast one look at me—his nose screwed up like he smelled something bad—and then turned his attention to the wolf between us.

"Master," he said, inclining his head.

I arched an eyebrow. Master? Well, that was a surprise.

And then, as if there hadn't been enough surprises for the night, the wolf transformed in front of my eyes, taking the form of a man. He was naked, and I quickly averted my eyes. There had never been a need for modesty back in the dungeon, I never got to choose when to keep my shirt on, but there was that etiquette thing again. It wasn't polite to stare at a naked man.

At the sound of a throat clearing, I looked back at the man. He was tall, though not as tall as the vampire Prince—where had that thought come from?—and had pale white skin and cropped short black hair. Cold brown eyes stared back at me.

He nodded towards the door and walked up the stairs, clearly expecting me to follow. I shivered, suddenly uncertain if this had been a good idea after all. But what was the other option? Going back to the cells?

Hell no.

I would be eternally grateful to this man for rescuing me. If he wanted to lead me into a shack in the desert, I would follow. I could certainly muster up the courage to follow him into a mansion.

So, that's what I did. I followed him, and the man who'd given him his clothes followed behind me.

Once inside the doors, my eyes took a moment to adjust to the bright lights, and then I saw that we were in a great hall populated with several men and women. It was a fairly diverse group of people, and they were all chattering with one another, but as the werewolf passed by them they all fell silent.

I followed, not knowing what else to do with myself. I certainly didn't want to keep standing in the doorway—they were all staring at me. And they weren't friendly stares, either.

Some of them were actively scowling or sneering, while others simply eyed me with distrust. That was cool, I could deal with that, I told myself. No one had trusted me since I was six years old. I could certainly deal with a bunch of strangers eyeing me funny.

It would have been nice if he'd taken me to some sort of paradise where everything was sunshine and roses.

I smirked at the thought as it entered my mind. Yes, that would have been nice, but it was also woefully irrational. I had to keep my expectations rational.

I was grateful just to be out of the cells. Certainly, I was grateful to find myself in a place of such luxury. I had never been anywhere so beautiful. We walked past numerous paintings, and sculptures either stood on their own or topped tables that stood against the walls. Whoever this man was, he certainly had taste.

Or at least, I assumed it was all in good taste. I hadn't exactly had an education in art history.

Or an education at all. I cringed at the thought. All these people...they probably knew how to read, at the very least.

Was that why they were eyeballing me funny? Did they know that I was an ignorant idiot that couldn't count or read?

And then I noticed one man glaring at my throat. Reflexively, I reached up and touched my throat, my fingers automatically coming into contact with the iron collar there.

Ah, suddenly everything clicked into place.

They knew what the collar meant. They may not be vampires, but they didn't trust blood mages any more than vampires did, I was sure. It made sense, you don't exactly trust someone who can take control of your body and treat you like a puppet, even if that person happens to be wearing a collar that stops them from doing any of that.

Not that I would ever do such a thing to a random person. I knew better than that. It wouldn't fall into the rules of politeness that my abuelita had taught me.

At last, we reached the end of the parade past all the wary glances, all the distrustful people, and the wolf-man led me into another room.

Dining room. It took me a moment, but my mind supplied the word at last. There was a giant table that could easily fit thirty people in the long room, with elegant chairs lining the sides, and a lone chair at the far end.

"Take a seat," he said, gesturing towards the table.

Those were the first words he'd said to me. I wanted to make a comment on that—it was in my nature to joke around when I was nervous—but I thought better of it. This was a strange place and a strange man, and he might not appreciate my sense of humor.

The last thing I wanted to do was displease him. He might send me back to the vampire cages, and then what would become of me?

I shuddered.

No, I couldn't ever go back there. I would rather die than live in a cage again.

I took a seat, doing as I was told. I stared up at him, waiting for him to say something else, to break the silence that stretched out between us. Even though I wanted to, I couldn't think of anything to say that wouldn't come off as a quip.

Don't piss him off, Nina. He saved you.

Why had he saved me, though? I hoped he'd tell me that soon enough. And why had he stopped me from saving the other mages? Surely they deserved a life of freedom just as much as I did. There was nothing special about me compared to the other blood mages. I was a dime a dozen.

"Are you hungry?" He started walking towards another door, and panic leapt through me.

Was he going to leave me here? I desperately wanted him to stay near me. Like a baby bird, I had imprinted on him, and I knew I wouldn't feel safe in this mansion if he left me alone.

"Starving," I said, keeping my voice as soft as was possible. I was afraid to raise my voice.

He looked back at me and quirked an eyebrow, but said nothing. Instead he walked to the door and knocked on it. A man appeared a moment later.

"Yes, Master?"

"Please bring a plate of food for our guest," he said.

"Yes, Master." The man shot a nasty look my way the moment the werewolf turned his head, and then went back through the door from whence he came.

Ah, joy of all joys. The man preparing my food hated me and I hadn't even said two words to him. How had I managed that?

And then it sunk in that I was going to have food. Real food, hopefully, and not the gruel that they fed us back in the cages. My stomach growled loudly, and I looked down at the table in front of me, embarrassed.

The werewolf walked over and took a seat beside me.

I don't know if he was going to say something, because a moment after he sat down the man appeared through the door with a plate in hand. Steak, potatoes, and green beans were heaped on the plate.

My mouth watered. Meat? Oh my God, I was going to get to eat meat?

"That's for me?" I asked, my voice squeaking a bit.

The werewolf cast a look at me that might have been amused, but it was hard to tell. The man didn't have a lot in the way of emotional tells.

The man—chef? Butler? I don't know—carried the plate over to me and set it down, producing a steak knife and fork and setting them down beside the plate. I didn't look up at him, but I could feel the resentment exuding from him.

I didn't know why it was that all the people here seemed to hate me so much, aside from the blood mage thing. It was probably just that. Because I was pretty sure I was the first blood mage they had seen, unless they knew some mages that hadn't ever been captured. Somehow, I doubted that from the way they'd responded to me. I knew for a fact that no other mage had been rescued from the dungeons—I'd been down there for twelve years. I would have heard about it.

So, I was a new breed of freak for them. But you would think that living with a werewolf, they would be used to abnormalities.

Shoving all those thoughts from my head, I attacked the food with fervor, forgetting the rules of politeness. I just wanted the food in my belly as quickly as I could get it.

"Careful," the werewolf said. "You don't want to eat too much or too quickly, it will turn your stomach. There will be plenty more food. This is not your last meal."

I swallowed a lump of meat that I hadn't chewed properly, too busy trying to get it down to my stomach as quickly as possible, and forced myself to slow down. He was right, of course. I hadn't eaten real food since I was a small child. My stomach was probably going to take weeks before it acclimated to real food.

I frowned down at the food, already missing it even though I hadn't finished it yet.

"What am I doing here?" I asked as I cut into the steak.

"Yes, let's get down to business. My name is Conall. And as you may have surmised, I am a werewolf. So are all of my people."

I managed not to drop my jaw at that. A mansion full of werewolves? No, that couldn't be possible. He had to be pulling my leg on that one.

"Yes, it's true," he said, sounding tired of the topic already. "I recognize that to you, it must seem impossible that we exist. We simply did a better job of blending into the background than the blood magicians did, for our own survival. But I am tired of simply surviving, and that is why I have formed this coalition. We hunt the vampires. It is my goal to eradicate the species entirely. You will be trained to hunt vampires as well."

"Why me?"

"Why not you? It will be useful to have a blood mage in our ranks."

"Right, I get that," I said, slowly. Even though I didn't really get why he was choosing now to get a blood mage. I mean, we were allegedly very powerful creatures. There wasn't a whole lot that a vampire could do to fight back when we got involved with things short of just killing us—which was why they hunted us in large packs. A blood mage on their own could probably take on three vampires at once, but if you surround one with enough vampires, there's just nothing to be done about it.

We were best at ranged attacks, like all magicians I assume. And it would certainly help any army to have a blood mage amongst them.

"But why me?"

He just looked at me, clearly bored with my questioning. Sheesh, the guy was cold. But that was okay, really. I was willing to do anything he asked—he freed me. I owed this man my life. And he wanted me to take out the vampires that had made my life a living hell? Yeah, I could sign up for that.

Maybe one day he would give me an answer to that question—why—but I wasn't going to press him for it right now.

I was just grateful for my new lease on life.

Chapter 6

GRAYSON

A hand on my shoulder jerked me out of the restorative sleep in which I had been so deeply embraced. My eyes snapped open and I glared up at the person who had dared to disturb me, and saw Alex's eyes looking back at me. I softened.

The man was one of my best friends, certainly one of my most loyal men, and if he had awakened me, then it must have been for something important.

"What is it, Alex?"

He looked troubled, and I sat up, a sense of urgency filling me.

"Out with it, man, what's going on?" I swung my legs out from under the blankets and stood, already moving to the wardrobe to extract my clothes.

"Your father wants you in the war room, Prince. He wouldn't say why," he said.

My eyes narrowed as I turned to look at him. He never called me 'Prince' for anything other than a joke, unless it was serious business. He might not know why I had been called to the war room, but he must have picked up the tone of the situation and knew that it was nothing good.

I jerked my head in a quick nod and dressed quickly. Whatever the danger was, we would be able to handle it, I knew that. There had been nothing we as a royal family hadn't been able to handle since the blood mages had been subdued.

Nothing could stand in our way.

I made my way from the room as quickly as possible, hurrying to the war room.

When I entered, my father and five generals were already inside. Annoyance prickled my mind—my father should have called for me first, rather than the generals. I didn't know why he would do something like that, it was entirely outside his normal behavior.

"Hello, gentleman," I said, striding into the room with a self-assured smile. If there was one thing I had learned from my father, it was that you never allowed anyone to see you sweat.

"Grayson, good of you to join us," my father said. He indicated the seat to his right and I took it without another word.

"We have a situation," one of the generals said. "I am sorry to have to bring this to your majesties at such an hour, but I believed it was urgent that you learn of this as soon as possible so that you could formulate a plan."

What he meant was—"I had no fucking clue what to do and I dearly hoped that you would be able to fix this shit for me." General Lucius was a bit of a waste of space, as far as I was concerned. I didn't think the man deserved the title, but it wasn't up to me. It was up to my father.

Though I did not long for the days when the crown would be on my head—I was not that sort of Prince—that man would be the first to go. I would replace him with someone more competent. Someone that could do their job without constant oversight.

"By all means, General, proceed," my father said.

With a clenched jaw, I waited to find out what it was that was so important we had to be awoken so soon after dawn. Everyone should have gone to bed to wait out the day, to wait for the sweet release of nightfall.

"A blood mage has escaped." The words were blunt, but I understood that there was no way to sugarcoat them.

It took a moment for the words to really register in my mind. A blood mage was on the loose in the city. How had that happened?

"That's impossible," I said, speaking before I could fully think it through. This was bad form for me, I knew better than to behave in such a fashion, but I couldn't stop myself.

My father cut me a sharp look, and I felt the force of the unspoken reprimand. I was a direct representative of his. My behavior cast him in a negative light. I bowed my head to indicate that I understood what I had done was wrong.

Everything in the vampire world is about politics. We can't get anything done without having to weigh all the consequences and benefits equally, and some see that as a good thing, but more often than not it leaves me feeling like we should have acted sooner.

General Lucius continued. "The mage did not escape on her own. Several guards were killed in the escape, and they all bear wounds that indicate a wolf attack."

Now there were murmurs from the other generals. My father and I remained silent, absorbing the information that we had been given.

I knew I should be focusing on the fact that a wolf had come in and attacked things—the werewolves had been eradicated eons ago, this shouldn't be possible—but the general's usage of the female pronoun had stuck in my head.

Which blood mage had escaped? I had to know. Was it the female that I had visited earlier in the night?

For some reason, my gut clenched at the thought. I didn't want her out on the streets. I had spoken to a guard after leaving her, to learn more about her. She had been in captivity for most of her life, she didn't know how the world worked. She wouldn't survive out on the streets.

She has a wolf with her.

My lips curled back in a subtle snarl. I liked that idea even less than the idea that she was out on her own. If she was with a wolf...But no, I needed to push these thoughts from my mind. She didn't matter to me.

I forced my thoughts to turn to the more important topic at hand; we had a werewolf problem. I didn't waste time thinking about all the ways this was illogical or impossible. It had happened and it had to be dealt with.

Did anyone even know how to kill a werewolf anymore, short of extracting the heart? That was the only way to kill a vampire, and I guessed it would be an efficient means of dispatching a werewolf as well. But that sort of fighting was dangerous. It required you to get close to your enemy, and offered up the possibility of them reaching your heart as well.

This was why the blood mages had been such a dangerous enemy when they had free roam of the world—they possessed the power to kill a vampire from great distances. We had been powerless to do anything in retaliation without moving in large packs and quickly finding the blood mage attacking the group.

A werewolf, though, would have to get in close to kill a vampire. It provided a level playing field, and I relished the thought of killing the wolf that had made off with the blood mage.

Somehow, I knew it was she who had escaped.

No, we are not thinking about that now. I reprimanded myself as my thoughts turned back to the blood mage.

"We must go on the offensive," I said once I managed to reclaim control of my mind. "If there are wolves in the city, we must be rid of them as soon as is possible."

"Patience, young Prince," my father said. "We must not be so hotheaded."

I chafed at the reprimand. He called me hotheaded, but I saw no flaw with my plan. If we rooted out the werewolf we would be able to reclaim the blood mage that escaped. She would have to be killed, made an example of...

I found that I didn't like the thought of that.

Of course, there was a much more disturbing thought that took precedence. What if the wolf that had made off with the blood mage was not the only one in the city? The wolves of old had always moved in packs. Where there was one, there were always five more. At minimum. Logic dictated that there would be a pack behind the lone wolf we'd been attacked by, and that was dangerous.

Hunting a wolf pack was dangerous. A wolf on its own was not such a problem to be dealt with, but put any kind of beast in large numbers, and the odds quickly go in the other direction.

If there was a pack, we should move now, so that it didn't have time to get back to its pack members.

I wanted to argue this with my father, make him see the reason behind my suggestion, but decorum dictated that I say nothing. My father had made a statement, and all must defer to him. The council was not on equal levels with the King—this was how it had always been. And I was no different from the council, aside from the fact that they also ranked beneath me. But when it came to the King, well, no one could argue with him.

Especially not in front of others.

I couldn't believe he wasn't going to immediately go on the offensive, though. To wait and see what would happen was an act of weakness.

When I am King, I will not be so weak. I will make a show of force so that my people will always know that they have a strong leader who will look out for them.

No one doubted my father's capabilities that I knew of. No one other than me. Decades under his command, working closely with him, had shown me that he was not the immaculate ruler that he presented to the people. He was plagued with indecision, and he moved too slowly.

It would be the death of him one of these days, but I hoped that day would not come too soon.

I did not yearn for the crown. It came with responsibilities I was not yet ready for. As a Prince I had enough of those already, and I had to remind myself frequently to enjoy the small amount of liberty that came with my position in comparison to my father's.

He had no friends. It was impossible to be close to anyone when you were King. You always had to be concerned with whether or not someone was after your crown. Paranoia came with the job description. There was only ever one person a King could feel safe with, and that was his Queen. Not even his heirs were trusted—perhaps least of all his heirs.

But his relationship with his mate—my mother—was abnormal now, to the point where he might as well not have a Queen. My mother lived, but she had barely been able to carry me to term, and her last pregnancy had been over a century ago. The miscarriages had created a void between the two of them, and in a way it was as if they weren't mated at all.

And so it was that I was the only heir.

Yet another dangerous and weak thing that my father had done.

He should have produced more heirs, in case something happened to me. Heirs were important, not just for the succession of ruling the people, but because without one of the royal blood, the entire vampire race would die out. We are all of us linked together, from sire to sire. The death of a sire means the death of all their progeny. And all vampires are ultimately linked back to the King—if the King has no heir and is killed, then that is the end of our species.

There is a special ceremony that is performed with centuries old magic to officially link the succession from sire to heir so that upon the sire's death the hold of the line is passed down to the heir, rather than the heir dying along with the sire. If the ceremony is not performed, then the line dies with the sire.

For me, the ceremony had been performed when I had reached my prime. So long as nothing happened to me before my father died, our line was secure. And then it would be my responsibility to secure the lineage.

Truthfully, my father had already begun to pressure me on this. It was exceptionally important because I had no brothers, no one to take my place. And yet I resisted for now.

How had I come to this line of thought? I pushed it from my mind, focusing on my father when I recognized that he was about to speak.

He cleared his throat. "We will send our stealthiest warriors into the city to locate the wolf and the blood mage. The blood mage is of utmost priority—if that collar falls into the wrong hands, they could figure out how to remove its magic and everything we have worked for will be for naught."

All the more reason why I thought a full frontal assault was necessary. But I pushed that thought aside as well; my father's decision had been made.

I could do nothing but stand by him.

Chapter 7

NINA

I spat blood onto the ground to clear it from my mouth, glaring at the wolf across from me.

One month, that was all I had been given to acclimate to the world again before my training had begun. I would have liked a little more time, but that wasn't up to me. It was all up to Conall. I owed him a life debt, and if he said to jump then I was damn well going to jump.

The she-wolf across from me was grinning viciously. She enjoyed the fight, and I think more than that she enjoyed pummeling me. A month had been enough time for my body to adjust to food and for me to begin bulking up so that I no longer looked like a skeleton, but it hadn't been enough time for the wolves to accept me.

Still, they glared at me whenever I walked past them. I heard the insults muttered under their breath, and I knew that they hated me more than words could say. I felt like it was a little over the top, all things considered. I knew that blood mages weren't exactly the most accepted race, but after my collar was removed and they saw that I didn't immediately take control of everyone's mind, I had thought that they would bend a little more.

That was not the case.

I ducked to the side as the she-wolf lunged for me again, narrowly missing her first. She wasn't holding back. If I let her get a good shot in, she might just break some of my bones.

That, I did not want. I wasn't in the mood to break and bruise, but again, that wasn't up to me. I was going to walk away from this, one giant bruise, I had already accepted that.

But that didn't mean that I wasn't going to give this my all.

I desperately wanted to make Conall proud. I wanted him to think that I was worthwhile. I didn't want him to regret choosing me to save from the cells.

Because a part of me was afraid that if he regretted it, he would send me back. I couldn't ever go back to those cells. A shudder ran down my spine at the thought of it, and my attacker took advantage of the moment when I wasn't paying attention.

She landed a punch to my shoulder, sending me spinning backwards. I fought to regain my footing and forced myself to concentrate on the task at hand.

Conall was watching, and I couldn't disappoint him. That just wasn't acceptable.

I balled my hands into fists and bounced my weight from foot to foot, ducking again to avoid another blow, then darted in to slam my fist into her gut.

She moved aside before I could get there and brought both of her fists down together on my back, using my momentum against me. I slammed into the ground, hard. My head smacked against the dirt and I just barely managed not to groan. All those years of torture really came in handy when you didn't want your opponent to know that they were getting the better of you.

If she thought I was beaten, then there wouldn't be anything I could do.

I rolled onto my back, pulling my legs up and threw my weight forward, landing on my feet. It was a move I had been taught a few days ago, and it had taken a lot of practice to get it down pat.

Yeah, they didn't immediately throw me into beat-you-black-and-blue practice, they had started with teaching me how to fall. You would think that falling would be something everyone automatically knew how to do, like some sort of genetic code. How hard could falling be?

Hard, let me tell you. You have to learn how to hit the ground right, with your palms flat out in front of you so that you can push off as soon as you hit the ground. You have to learn how to hold your head steady so that your neck doesn't slam into the ground, and yet at the same time stop your head from cracking open.

So yeah, it's hard, but I had learned. And then once I had learned how to fall, they'd taught me how to get back up as quickly as possible. I was already a walking bruise from those lessons, and my muscles were sore and screaming at me, but there was no respite to be had.

Every day was another lesson. Every day held more bruises to be added to my collection. There was no downtime for healing. I assumed that was because they wanted to toughen me up as quickly as possible, but no one really said why.

No one really said a lot to me, period.

"Come on, little girl," the she-wolf taunted me.

I gritted my teeth together and came at her, fists swinging. She sidestepped me, but I danced to the side this time to keep her from repeating the same move from earlier.

Another lesson learned. See? I'm not completely useless. I can figure things out pretty quickly.

My breath was coming in hard pants, my lungs were burning, and my arms felt like blocks of heavy wood. It took a lot of effort to raise them up to a fighting stance again, but I managed it.

She swung at me again, and this time I blocked her blow with my forearm and brought my other arm up in an undercut.

My jaw dropped when my fist connected with her face, snapping her head back.

Holy shit, I'd actually gotten a shot in! I really hadn't thought I would be able to accomplish that.

But there was no time to waste getting excited about my lucky shot, because she was wiping the blood from under her nose and her eyes promised death.

She didn't like getting hit. News flash: neither did I! But apparently that didn't matter.

Without warning, she came at me again, fists flying. It was all I could do to duck and block her blows; I was entirely on the defensive. This was bad—defensive wasn't a good position to be in for long. You tired quickly when all you were doing was blocking blows, and you were never going to win a fight from this point of view.

As I blocked her, I tried to keep my eyes on her body, looking for an opening.

Come on, just give me another one.

But she didn't. She just kept swinging at me, and I knew I was going to go down any minute. There was nothing I could do about it, she was just too fast.

I ran to the side, catching a blow on my back as I went, trying to get away from her so I could get my bearings in the fight. But she pursued me viciously, not giving me even a moment to catch my breath.

Jesus Christ, didn't she know what a fair fight was? This was just training; she shouldn't have been coming at me so hard.

I spun around, and her foot collided with my chest, sending me flying into the ground. I choked, trying to draw air into my lungs. They just didn't want to work. I felt like a thousand-pound truck was resting on my chest, my heart was stuttering, and I knew I had to get back on my feet.

Stand up, damn it. Don't let her beat you.

I struggled to my feet and ducked to avoid her next blow, but her foot connected with my head and I saw stars. I clenched my eyes tightly shut as I stumbled, trying to stay standing, and then her foot connected with my arm and I felt it bend at an angle it really shouldn't have.

A scream was torn from my throat and I fell to my knees, clutching my left arm to my chest as I swore up a storm. I couldn't open my eyes to see through the pain, couldn't get my brain to work. All the torture from my childhood hadn't prepared me for broken bones—repeated flesh wounds had been the option of choice for the guards. Most of the time.

My arm was on fire, or at least that's how it felt. I fought to bring air into my lungs.

Could I get up and fight with a broken arm? I seriously contemplated it, as suicidal as that was. I didn't know how to fight with one arm. Hell, I didn't know how to fight period, as of the recent evidence had shown.

At last my eyes opened and I looked up to see the she-wolf staring down at me, waiting to see if I would get back up. I wanted to in that moment. I had never wanted anything more than to get back up and smash her fucking face in, but I knew that I wasn't capable of it.

Not that I wasn't capable of violence, I mean. But rather that I physically wasn't capable of completing the task at the moment.

Later. She would pay for what she had done to me. I swore it to myself, and it made me feel a little better.

"I submit," I said at last, choking out the words.

Movement caught my eye, and I looked over to the doorway that led to the training courtyard, and saw Conall leaning against it. Disappointment was writ across that face.

I hung my head in shame. That look crushed me in ways that a broken bone never could.

Chapter 8

NINA

That night found me in the library, my broken arm set and in a sling cradled against my chest, a grimoire in my lap. Conall had managed to save a few of them from before the days when the vampires took over the world. I don't know how he managed that—was he that old, or had it been done by his family members?—but I was grateful. It was a connection to a part of myself that I had never thought I would have.

I had always believed I would never be able to tap into this part of myself. The iron collar I had worn for twelve years had assured me that I would be divorced from this side of myself for eternity, but Conall had been able to remove the collar and I had felt whole for the first time in a long time.

Now, I had to prove that I could learn the spells in the grimoires and prove to him that I was worth more than just your average hunter. He hadn't brought me here just to learn how to fight hand to hand, or how to stake a vampire. He had brought me here to learn blood magic, so that I could take out the vampires from distances others couldn't accomplish.

I had to learn how to do it.

I peered down at the page. One of the wolves had taught me to read, though it had been a painfully slow process, and I had felt like an idiot the entire time. But secretly, I was elated that this was a skill I now had under my belt, no matter the fact that it was still difficult. I had to sound out some of the words, but I could do it on my own now. The words meant something to me, they weren't just random scratching's on a page that I would never be able to decipher.

Every day that I lived in this mansion I learned something new that carried me one step closer to being an independent person. No one would ever be able to take the ability to read away from me, and that elated me in ways I couldn't put into words.

Just as I came to a rather difficult word and was about to sound it out, I heard footsteps from outside the library. I tensed. The wolves were still very hostile towards me because of what I was, and I knew that if they found me learning blood magic—even though that was what Conall wanted from me—they would only become worse.

A part of me wanted to walk away from the blood magic if it would mean acceptance from the pack. I wanted to belong somewhere. No, not just somewhere, I wanted to belong here. I had been separated from my family since I was six years old, and the concept of family was basically foreign to me. I could only remember what my abuelita's face looked like. She had raised me in place of my mother, who had been killed by the vampires when I was even younger. The faces of the other family members were just a blur to me, they hadn't been as much of a presence in my life.

But this pack, this was an opportunity to have a family again. It was an opportunity to be part of something bigger than me, and that was what I wanted.

The library door opened. I turned in my chair to see who was coming in, and was surprised to see the she-wolf from earlier.

Had she come to break another one of my bones? Instinct told me that I should clear out of the room to prevent that from happening. It wasn't like I could physically stop her from hurting me; she had more than proven that she was the superior warrior here.

But then again, she had the advantage. She'd been training since childhood, just like all the other wolves had. They'd grown up in this life, I'd only come it a month ago.

"Hello," she said, her lips turning up at the corners in a gentle smile.

I narrowed my eyes. What trick was this? She carried a cup in her hand, and steam was rolling off of it. A sweet aroma filled the room. I wondered what was in the cup, because it smelled delicious, but I didn't ask.

Maybe if I didn't respond to her she would just go away. As much as I wanted the acceptance of the pack, I had learned that it was best we kept our distance from each other for now.

She walked into the room and took a seat opposite me, reaching forward so that the cup was held out to me. "Peace offering." She lifted an eyebrow as she held the cup forward.

I hesitated, then reached forward with my good hand and took the cup from her. I blew on it gently, the paranoid thought coming to mind that she might have done something to whatever was in the cup to hurt me. I hated that I couldn't trust the wolves. But no one had done anything to my food or drink in the month that I'd been here, and she could rough me up whenever she wanted, so I doubted she had done anything to it. I took a sip, and the warm liquid slid down my throat, warming me.

My eyes closed and a soft 'mmm' sound came from my lips. "Oh, that's good," I said. "Thanks."

I opened my eyes in time to see her beaming at me.

"I thought you might like it. It's an old family recipe. Good for relaxing the muscles, which I thought you might need after the day you had."

Frowning, I tapped one finger against the cup idly. "I'm sorry, but why are you being so nice? You kind of busted my arm earlier."

She shrugged. "Yeah, sorry about that. I kind of lost it when you caught me by surprise. I won't make the mistake of underestimating you again, though." She grinned. "I thought it was about time someone welcomed you to the group. It hasn't been easy on you, has it?"

My eyes widened. She meant to make peace between us? Well, I couldn't do anything other than accept that. All I wanted was to get along with the wolves, aside from making Conall proud. After today though, I didn't think that was very likely.

I sipped at the tea again, allowing myself to relax back against the chair.

It was then that I felt the distinct sensation of another heart beating. Not that I could hear the heart beating, but I could feel it. I could feel blood running through veins in tandem with my own, and I was now aware of it on a level I hadn't been before. My heart sped up to match the beat of the other heart, and my distress escalated.

What was happening? How could I feel another heart beating?

It had to be her heart that I was feeling. I glanced down at the page I was on, reminding me of the spell I had been reading about. It was about biorhythms and how to sync yourself with them—basically, everyone has their own rhythm and a blood mage is capable of seeking out another person's rhythm and controlling it.

I had to stop, but I didn't know how. This was freaking me out.

I pushed at the sensation, trying to get it to go away, and felt a pain in my chest when my own heart stuttered.

She frowned, rubbing at her chest.

Oh God, had I made her heart stutter too? Panic began to rush over me in waves and I watched as discomfort colored her face even more.

"I should be getting to bed," she said, but it came out as more of a mutter. She was clearly distracted by the pain I had given her.

Shame washed over me. "Yeah. Thanks for the tea," I said, trying to smile. It was a little wobbly, but it did the job.

She nodded at me and walked out. As she left, the sensation of feeling her heart beating faded away and I breathed a little easier. I took a sip of the tea again to allow its relaxing properties to rush through me.

If this was what being a blood mage was like, I didn't want any part of it. I didn't want to feel other people's bodies going through their normal processes, and I hated the way I had hurt her. She had come to me offering peace and I had done the one thing all the wolves feared I would do—I used blood magic on her.

Even if it had been an accident, it had still happened.

I should stop. I should put this book away and go find Conall and tell him I can't do any of this.

And yet a morbid curiosity filled me. Could I feel others in the mansion? I had to wonder. I reached out my senses, and sure enough, I picked up the rhythms of the other wolves in the mansion.

Breathing deeply, I forced myself to remain calm. It had been my panic that had hurt the woman. It had been an accident, a reaction, and if I could just maintain control I could disconnect with as much ease as I had connected.

I concentrated, visualizing my magic as tendrils that reached out of the library and called them back to me. I saw them retreating until they curled back inside my body, and I could no longer feel the other wolves.

I did it. I successfully used my blood magic without hurting anyone or losing control.

Elation began, but at the same time it was tinged with that same amount of shame. I shouldn't be enjoying what I was doing. I had hurt someone and then immediately proceeded to practice the exact same magic.

What kind of person repeated a spell that had hurt someone?

I bowed my head, trying to tell myself that I wasn't horrible, but it was hard to get the idea to fully compute. Maybe the stories were right, and blood mages were all awful, horrible people. Maybe I hadn't been because I hadn't used blood magic before.

Maybe it corrupted you.

But no, that was ludicrous. My abuelita hadn't been a horrible person. She'd been kind, caring, and compassionate. She'd loved everyone around her with so much of her heart that she hurt whenever they hurt. She certainly hadn't been corrupt.

I would just have to be the same sort of mage as abuelita.

But Conall wants to turn you into a weapon. He doesn't want you healing people, he wants you hurting people.

And I had to do what Conall wanted. Not because he was in charge here—basically a King in this mansion—but because I owed him. And it wasn't that resentful sort of owing a person. It was that I was genuinely grateful for what he had done for me.

He had saved me when I hadn't thought it was even possible to be saved. He was my knight in shining armor, and I would do anything he wanted me to do.

And besides, it wasn't like he wanted me to hurt people. He wanted me to kill vampires.

The same vampires that had caged and beaten me. I didn't feel even a twinge of remorse at the idea of killing the vampires that had hurt me.

They weren't people, they were monsters.

Clearing my head, I returned to the task at hand. I had completed one spell, now I wanted to see if I could do another. I grabbed a letter opener off the side table near me that I had pulled out earlier when I'd come into the library and carefully cut my finger.

It hurt, but only a little, and a drop of blood welled up on it. I focused on my finger, glaring down at it with immense concentration, and called to mind one of the spells I'd read earlier.

I began to chant the words for a healing spell, visualizing the skin knitting back together.

But nothing happened.

I frowned and tried again, pushing myself harder.

Still, my finger continued to bleed.

Frustrated, I snapped the grimoire shut and shoved it aside. I might be able to sense the other wolves, but I couldn't do anything practical. This was absolute bullshit.

Then I froze. I heard footsteps coming to the library again.

Chapter 9

NINA

The door opened, I twisted in my seat, and saw Conall come in. He was an imposing man, all lean muscle and cold eyes, but I felt a swell of gratitude begin inside of me at the sight of him. I would always feel safe around him, even if I didn't get to see him very much.

Or at all, really. After he had introduced himself in the dining room that first day, and given me the grimoires the next day, I hadn't seen hide nor hair of him. He was a busy man, and he had a lot on his plate. I didn't dare seek him out, knowing that I would have been intruding on valuable time.

And he had never come to visit me.

He glanced at the shut grimoire, lifting one eyebrow.

My skin flushed, and I averted my gaze. It was obvious that I wasn't getting much studying done with a shut book. I wanted to explain that I had been trying, but my mouth was suddenly dry, and I couldn't get the words to come.

It didn't matter. He'd caught me in my moment of frustration, and no excuses I had would cover that up.

Besides, he didn't strike me as the sort of man who accepted excuses.

He just had to walk in then, didn't he? He couldn't have come in a few minutes earlier, when I had successfully completed a spell and was full of elation and confidence. No, he had to pick the moment when I'd given up.

"How is practice going?" Now both of his eyebrows lifted.

I mumbled something along the lines of 'ok.'

He just stared at me, clearly waiting for me to speak up and elaborate. Right. Mumbling wasn't a very becoming way of speaking, and he was used to being addressed by his hunters with clear responses to everything he said.

I had to measure up to them.

"Er, well. Not so well, actually," I said, grimacing. "I can't seem to get any of the practical spells to work. I'm kind of struggling here. I wish there was another blood mage that could teach me, one on one."

He nodded, remaining silent for a moment. Thinking over my words, I assumed.

I shouldn't be whining about not having a teacher. If he had someone to teach me, he wouldn't need me in the first place.

Be grateful he even has the grimoires for you and you don't have to figure this shit out on your own, Nina. Jesus. You're such a spoiled brat.

I reprimanded myself, and felt well and truly shamed for it. He didn't have to say a word against me, I could do that all on my own.

"You could practice on me," he said.

My eyes widened. "That sounds dangerous." I thought about the way I had synced together with the she-wolf earlier and how I had hurt her. I didn't want to hurt Conall.

He shrugged. "No more dangerous than sparring practice is."

"Well, it could be. What if I did something to you that couldn't be undone? I don't think it's a good idea."

His cold eyes settled on mine and the look in his eyes was a very hard, no nonsense one. "Nina. Do it."

I put the grimoire on the side table and stood up. "Okay. I guess I can try. What do you want me to do?"

He frowned. "What's a simple spell?"

"Well, I can sense your heartbeat." I reached out with my magic to pick up the feeling of his heart in his chest. It was a steady beat, albeit faster than mine.

I guess the wolves just ran at faster speeds than your average human being. And aside from my magic, I was very average.

He shook his head. "That's too passive. Try to do something to me."

Now it was my turn to frown. I didn't know what he wanted me to do—there wasn't anything kind that I could do to him. He wasn't bleeding. I couldn't heal a wound that didn't exist.

And he clearly wanted me to do something more active.

I shook my head. "I don't want to hurt you." I sounded weak even to my own ears.

"Cut me," he said calmly.

My eyes widened and I shook my head again. "No!"

"Cut me, Nina."

I clenched my eyes tight and tilted my head towards the ground. I couldn't disobey him, and yet I didn't want to do what he was asking of me. Hurting him was the exact opposite of anything I ever wanted to do. But I wanted to make him proud, and this was what he was asking of me.

Taking in a deep breath, I straightened my shoulders and opened my eyes again. I looked up at him, concentrating on his exposed forearm. I tried to envision a small cut opening on his wrist there.

Nothing big, more like a paper cut than anything. Just enough to bring the blood out to the surface.

But just like when I'd tried to heal the wound I'd inflicted on myself, nothing happened.

Shoving down the frustration that welled, I tried harder. I felt sweat beading on my forehead as I concentrated on him.

Come on, just a little cut. Just to show him that you can do something.

And still, nothing happened. All I could do was feel his heart beating, the same steady beat it had been the whole time.

At last, I shook my head. "I'm sorry, I can't do it."

That same look of disappointment that I'd seen earlier that day in the courtyard appeared on his face. Shame washed over me—I couldn't disappoint him!

"You aren't trying hard enough," he said.

But I was! Couldn't he see that I was sweating, that my breath was coming in short little pants? Couldn't he see the way my chest rose and fell with my labored breathing?

It frustrated me that he willfully ignored these signs that I was doing everything I could to do what he asked of me. But that frustration didn't do anything to help me.

God, if I couldn't do this, was he going to send me back out on the streets?

I wouldn't last a single night on the streets. The vampires would find me with no problem, and they would throw me back in the cages. If I was lucky, they would recognize that I'd been in the cages before and they would kill me to punish me for escaping.

If I wasn't lucky, they would take their anger out on me in other, much worse ways.

I couldn't go back to the cages.

Swallowing my terror, I forced myself to focus on Conall. He wanted me to work magic, but I couldn't get a simple cut to open on his skin.

Maybe I was going about this the wrong way. Maybe there was something else I could do with my magic.

I had introduced a stutter to the she-wolf's heart on accident. That had been an internal act, not an external one. Maybe that would be easier.

I didn't want to do anything to his heart, though, so I shifted my focus to his head.

Narrowing my eyes, I waited until I could feel the blood flowing there, and very carefully I visualized the blood heating up.

A moment later sweat broke out on his forehead and he touched a hand to his head.

Excitement swept over me.

And then to my horror he grabbed his head with both his hands, swearing. I had never seen him lose control like that before.

"Stop it!" He snapped at me, his eyes clenched tight.

Panicked, I tried to pull back my magic from him, tried to disengage. But I could feel it getting worse, as if my magic was responding to my emotions like there was a threat to me. Like it had to protect me.

He cried out, falling to his knees on the floor and still gripping his head with both his hands.

I backed up a step, the backs of my legs knocking into the chair behind me, and lifted a hand to my lips. I had to stop, but I didn't know how.

Calm down, Nina. You can do this if you're calm. Your panic won't help Conall now.

Right. I had to stay calm. I took in deep breath after deep breath, forcing myself to relax. I visualized the tendrils of magic around his head and slowly pulled them off one by one, retracting them into my core.

He remained on the floor for several moments, just breathing deeply, but I was pretty sure he wasn't in pain anymore.

"I'm sorry," I said, starting forward with a hand raised to touch him.

He waved a hand at me. "Get away," he snarled. He rose to his feet again and stalked out of the room, with one last look back at me that I couldn't quite make out.

But he had wanted me to do something to him. Something active, and it wasn't like there was any healing magic I could have done...

I felt the tears burning at my eyes and I hastily blinked to keep them from falling. No, I wasn't going to cry. I wasn't going to be weak like that.

I had done what he wanted; it wasn't my fault if he hadn't liked it after it had happened.

But there was a new kind of determination in me. A determination to master my abilities, to prove to the wolves that I wasn't an out of control abomination, and to make Conall proud.

Most of all, though, I wanted to be strong enough so that I would never ever need someone to save me again.

Chapter 10

GRAYSON

I stood in my room, strapping my sword belt around my waist as I prepared myself for the hunting trip I was about to embark on with my friend. Hunts were few and far between these days. Not quite forbidden by my father, but they were no longer quite the norm. And worst of all, my father had grown more and more cautious of late, not allowing me to go on the hunts when they did happen.

It was because the blood mage still had not been found.

I blamed his slow action for that. If we had flooded the streets immediately after finding out about her escape, perhaps we could have found her before she went to ground. No doubt she was hiding somewhere and hadn't set foot outside of her new sanctuary out of fear of being caught.

That was good, though. There was no way she could learn any of the spells that the blood mages of old had been able to perform; there were no blood mages to teach her.

That was another reason the hunts had slowed down—we had all but caught the remaining mages. There were probably a few holdouts left for us to snap up, but for the most part we had done our job.

I didn't know what I would do for fun once the hunts stopped for good; they were my last bit of true freedom in this world of responsibility. And it had been a month since my last hunt—the exact amount of time that the blood mage had been missing for—and I was antsy to get on with it.

I wanted to feel the air rushing around me as I moved faster than light through the streets. I wanted to fight with a mage and grasp them tight and taste the hot blood running into my mouth as they struggled against me.

Goddamnit, I wanted to feel like a true vampire again. So long now had I fed off the willing thralls that it felt like I hadn't earned the right to call myself vampire any longer.

Everyone else was fine with feeding off the thralls—and why not? It was good, fresh blood. Straight from the vein.

But it wasn't good enough for me. Not truly. Nothing would ever compare to the euphoria of a feed made from a fight.

I checked the belt one last time to make sure it was secure. I shouldn't need the sword for anything, but there was the possibility of running into a werewolf now. That hadn't been something we'd had to worry about for so long, but I wasn't going to get caught unaware.

And it wasn't your average, ordinary blade either. It was silver.

If the myths were right, it would kill a werewolf without things having to get messy.

Raoul and Alex stood on either side of my door, waiting for me.

"Are you gents ready for a fight?" I asked with a vicious grin on my face.

"You know me, Gray. I'm always ready for a fight," Alex said.

"This should be fun. I've been cooped up too long," Raoul said.

"You and me both," I said. "I can't wait to run."

We made our way out of the castle, and as soon as we were in the outside air we took off at a sprint.

God, but it was beautiful to feel alive again. To feel the stolen blood pumping rapidly through my veins and the wind tearing at my long hair, whipping it about my face.

We ran into the inner city, where things weren't as carefully controlled. This was where blood mages were most likely to be—they liked to haunt their old homes whenever possible, or at least be as close to them as they could. Nostalgia and all of that nonsense.

I didn't see why they risked themselves doing that. We vampires had never been so foolish. When it had been necessary to leave our homeland because of the vampire hunters, we had done so as pragmatically as possible.

There was no room for emotion when it came to survival.

I glanced at my friends as we ran, grinning at the sight of their grim faces. The hunt was setting into them and they would lose themselves in it for now.

I should throw myself over to the hunt as well. And yet something prickled at my mind, telling me that I should maintain awareness of my surroundings. It didn't seem necessary, and it would detract from the pleasure of the hunt, but I had learned to trust my instincts.

So I kept as aware as possible as we ran through the city, turning down several alleys and then back onto the streets as we hunted for signs of blood mages.

It would likely take us a while to pick up the trail of a blood mage tonight. Their ranks were few now that they had been rounded up like the vermin they were. There were only stragglers now, and these would be the smartest of the bunch. The ones that knew how to hide their heartbeats at all times instead of just when they were as still as possible.

Perhaps they would have even learned to avoid their old homes. They might have set up camp in someone else's abandoned apartment instead of remaining in the homes that they used to live in. The smartest of the mages had left the inner city as soon as the hunts had begun, but our warriors chased them even still.

And it wasn't just this city that we owned.

It was all of them. There were more vampires than ever now, though we had stopped allowing just anyone to turn someone. That now had to be approved by the King himself.

Normally, vampires are born, not turned. Turning is possible, although a dangerous process to go through, both for the vampire and the human that is chosen. Either of them could die during the process if they aren't careful, although it is more likely that the human would die than the vampire. In the first days of our takeover, there was a flurry of new vampires.

People turned anyone they wanted, and many of them died in the process.

That was why my father had proclaimed that all future turnings had to be approved by him, to protect the people from their own stupidity. And all turnings were now supervised by our Caretaker.

I thrust the thoughts from my mind at the sound of rattling down one of the alleys we had just passed.

"Double back," I said, already turning. Raoul and Alex took a moment longer than me, they were fully given over to the hunt now, but they obeyed as always. We ran down the alley, then slowed so that we could take in our surroundings.

I knew I had heard something down here. It was either blood mage or human, but more likely it was a blood mage, seeing as the alley was empty now. It was hiding somewhere.

There was that niggling sensation at the back of my mind. I needed to be aware of something, I felt like it was staring me right in the face, but I couldn't figure out what it was.

I turned slowly, and that was when I felt the danger of the situation.

"Get out," I hissed.

Instead, my damned friends closed in on me. Protecting me. They knew that my life was more precious than theirs—if I died, our line was doomed. The likelihood of my father finding a new mate and siring a new heir was unlikely at this point, though I assumed he would muster it up for the good of the people. Just like he did for everything else.

I shoved at Alex's shoulder, trying to get him to move out of the alley, but he was stubborn.

"You first, Prince," he said.

Right. Serious situation.

And then the alley flooded with bodies. I don't know why I hadn't been able to scent them sooner, but their animalistic musk was apparent as soon as they filled the alley.

Werewolves.

We were surrounded.

I yanked my sword from my belt, turning my back so that either of my shoulders were pressed against one of Raoul's and Alex's. So long as we maintained the triangle, we would be able to make it out of this, I was sure. If a wolf got onto our backs...but no, I couldn't think about that right now.

One of the men lunged them, darting in close to me, and I cut him down without hesitation, lopping his head off.

Even though it had not been necessary to hunt with a sword in a long time, I was not without practice. I had refused to allow my skills to rust, and I trained with the sword every day.

The training paid off now, as I moved without much thought, relying on muscle memory. I cut down three more wolves, and then the worst sound reached my ears.

Raoul's sharp cry of pain.

I whirled, not thinking of the danger of turning my back to the two wolves that had been before me.

Raoul's heart lay in the hand of one of the wolves.

The world spun and a red haze colored my vision.

My friend. My friend was dead. The wolves had killed him.

With a violent snarl, I leapt forward, and I lost myself in the killing. No wolf stood a chance against me when I was like this.

I was hatred. I was death.

When I came back to myself, I was standing over Raoul's corpse, bloody sword in one hand, and breathing hard. Alex's hand was on my shoulder, but I found no comfort in it.

Raoul was dead.

I felt something break inside of me, a crushing weight descending on me, but I knew that I was physically unharmed. Raoul had been my friend for decades now. I couldn't imagine a world that he wasn't a part of.

"Gray..." Alex started to speak but apparently could think of nothing to say beyond my name.

Shaking my head, I turned my back on his body. I had to collect myself. I had to remember that I was the Prince and that it was my duty to set an example. To figure out what was to be done.

I couldn't react emotionally. I couldn't give in to the crushing feeling that surrounded my heart like a vice.

What was I going to do without him?

I wanted to scream at the heavens for taking my friend from me, but there was no one to curse. I had slaughtered his killers in a rage that I had only succumbed to once or twice in my long life. The loss of my friend was enough to set me off, and I knew that I had to battle with myself to remain in control right now.

Alex was looking to me to determine what we would do next.

Lead, Grayson. That's all you can do. That's what you have to do.

"We need to get his body home," I said. To my credit, my voice did not crack, and I knew that my face gave no indication of the pain slicing through me like a sword.

Alex would know the pain I was in. I had known him longer than Raoul. He knew every one of my tells. There was no hiding myself from him.

I wanted to hide just now. I didn't want anyone to know what I was feeling, and I didn't want sympathy.

It was my fault Raoul was dead. I had been reckless, going out on a hunt when my father had told me time and again that these were dangerous times.

He would have found a different hunt to join if you had not organized one.

I knew that was the truth, but I also knew that if I hadn't been here Raoul and Alex would have fled the alley without hesitation. They had remained to protect me, unwilling to move without me. I was their highest priority, and my presence had killed my friend.

"It's not your fault, Gray," Alex said, knowing what I was thinking without my having to say it.

Grimacing, I turned back to look at him. "I know that you mean well, Alex, but we both know he would have survived if I had not been here."

Alex said nothing. There was nothing to say to that and we both knew it.

I knelt and collected my friend's body, holding him tight to my chest.

He had a wife. I was going to have to tell his wife he was dead.

Already, I could picture the look in her eyes when she learned the news. Caroline was a dear woman with a gentle heart, softening Raoul's sharp sides in ways that none of us could have ever imagined was possible. Her pain would exceed my own in ways I could not imagine.

Yet I found a small part of myself looking forward to talking with her. It would be a painful conversation, but I suspected that she could understand the depths of my pain. Of course, Alex felt it just as sharply as I did, but neither of us could give voice to the pain that raged inside of us.

Caroline was not bound by the principles that guided the males of our species, and I knew that when she wept it would give some release to my soul.

It was an inherently selfish thought, and it sickened me that I wanted it.

"Come." I barked the command to Alex and together we ran through the streets back to our castle.

It did not take us long, as we took the most direct path there. We weren't hunting any more, there was no need to dart down one alley or another. Our destination was set for us.

Raoul was a light weight in my strong arms, too light. I wanted a solid weight in my arms, dragging me down to the Earth, as penance for my folly. If he were heavy...

But no, there was no use thinking on that. I would have to satisfy myself with the weight that crushed my heart, it was enough to remind me that I had caused this.

I would carry it within me always.

Together, Alex and I walked up the steps of the castle. He opened the great door for me, and I swept inside with only a moment of hesitation. Once others laid eyes on Raoul's body, this would become real. There would be no way to deny what had happened, as a part of my mind so longed to do.

This late in the night, most everyone was gone about their business in the city. Some were looking for more thralls, others were just blowing off steam. Lady Caroline would be in her chambers, I suspected. Unaware of the painful devastation that was headed her way.

I wanted to spare her the pain as long as was possible, so I headed first for the throne room.

My father had to be informed of what had happened.

He sat on his throne, talking to one of his advisors, but fell silent as soon as his eyes lighted on me.

"Son," he said. His voice was quiet and emotionless, but I knew the horror that was inside his mind.

I alone knew his mind so well. To everyone else, it would appear that he didn't care what had happened, and likely they would rage against this. Raoul had been a beloved member of the court—not quite as much as Alex was, but still. His loss would be felt heavily by all of us.

"We were attacked," I said. I fought to keep my voice steady, knowing that I had to do what I could to appear as my father did.

Everyone could hate him for his emotionless mask, but they looked to him for indications of how to react. So long as he remained calm, so would they.

I walked forward and laid Raoul's body at my father's feet, taking a few steps back. My eyes were riveted on the corpse of my friend. I wanted to look away, wanted this all to be a horrible mistake that would be quickly forgotten. Most of all though, I wanted to remember Raoul as he had been and not as he was now.

But nothing could change the image that had been imprinted on my mind now. I would always see his pale face, the hole in his chest where his heart should have been. No longer would I see the small, subtle smile that he gave me when we joked together. No longer would I see the light in his eyes that only Caroline could bring out in him.

"What happened?"

"We were ambushed by wolves in an alley," I said. "There were many of them, but they are destroyed."

My father nodded, looking down at Raoul's body. I wanted to know what he was thinking, but more than that I wanted him to react. I wanted to see anger on his face. I wanted him to rage at the loss of my friend.

I wanted permission to do the same.

It would not be given to me.

"There will be no more hunts." There was a finality to his voice that brooked no argument.

I should have listened to that.

"Father!" I cried, my hands balling into fists. "We must root out the werewolves! This cannot be allowed to stand. His murderers have been killed, but the pack is likely to be far greater than just the ones we ran into. They must be destroyed. You cannot do this."

My father lifted his head slowly to lock his cold, empty eyes on me. There was no emotion in them, no rage at the fact that I had argued with him in front of others.

"You will know your place, my son," he said. "This crown is not yet yours, and you do not have permission to speak."

Rage consumed me anew, and for the first time in my life I knew a desire to attack my father. I wanted to beat him for his indifference towards Raoul's death. I wanted him to know that it was unacceptable.

I wanted him to feel my pain.

But I did none of these things. Instead, I averted my eyes in a show of deference. It was my duty to set the tone for how others would respond to my father, and I had broken decorum once already. I could not do so again. If I did, there would be consequences.

But I swore to myself that when I was King things would be different.

And no matter what my father said, I was going to eradicate the hunters.

Chapter 11

NINA

My breath came in sharp little pants as I took three steps back, eyeing the wolves in front of me. There were three standing together, a few paces apart, and then one on either side of me.

It wasn't a fair fight, but it had been weeks since I'd been given a fair one-on-one fight. Ever since I started doing well in these blasted training sessions, they had just escalated the stakes.

Movement to my right. I threw myself to the ground and rolled under the leaping werewolf, jumping back to my feet a moment later and whirling about to face them. Now I had two in front of me and three on my right—not much better than before, but I could see them all without having to rely on my peripheral vision.

The werewolf I had avoided snarled at me, his fists clenching together.

I bared my teeth at him in a savage grin. In the months of training with the wolves I had picked up a few of their mannerisms, though I resisted their practice of shit-talking the enemy.

It was a waste of breath. Breath that I dearly needed to hold my own against them in a fight.

The three on my right charged as one and it was all I could do to get out of the way for one of them, bringing up my arm to block the oncoming attack of another. I swung my free hand and slammed it into the gut of the offending werewolf, bringing my knee up sharply to meet his groin.

They didn't fight fair and neither did I.

He doubled over as he gasped for air and I brought both of my hands down together to slam into his back. He fell to the ground, but my victory was short lived.

Pain lanced through my scalp—the third werewolf I had ignored had me by the hair and was yanking me down.

Gritting my teeth, I compartmentalized the pain. Something I had learned in the years of torture at the vampire's hands—if you could ignore the pain then there wasn't much that they could do to you. It hadn't been a particularly useful trick as the torture sessions had gone on longer and longer until I gave in to the pain and screamed, but it certainly helped in a fight.

I twisted towards my attacker, forcing him to slacken his hold on my hair, and slammed my head into his chest. More pain cut through my concentration as I connected with the bones in his chest, but I succeeded in shocking him into dropping my hair.

Without hesitation, I straightened up and brought my leg up in a wide arc to slam into his face. I spun, anticipating the attacks of the other wolves, and ducked just in time to avoid a blow.

A crunching sound greeted my ears. My attacker's momentum had carried his arm over me and into the werewolf I'd head butted. I smirked at that and jumped back to my full height, bringing my fist up to connect with the new werewolf's chin.

His head snapped back, but he didn't allow it to break his concentration.

Instead, he swept his foot under my legs, knocking me to the ground.

My head slammed into the concrete and I gasped for air, seeing stars for a moment.

Breathe. Breathe! You have to breathe!

I couldn't, though. I couldn't seem to concentrate long enough to breathe.

My eyes snapped open as I shoved the pain to the side. No time to simmer in it, a fist was flying towards my face.

I rolled to the right, hoping that my attacker would keep going and end up punching the ground, but I saw that he corrected himself before that could happen.

Ah, well, it did one good to have hopes and dreams, right?

Get up! Stay down and you die, Nina.

Right. Heeding my own words, I pulled my legs up into the air and threw my weight forward, landing steadily on my feet. I crouched low, backing up a few paces so that I could get all five wolves in my vision.

It might not be fair to have five on one, but to their credit, they didn't swarm me. That might have been because there wasn't enough physical space to have more than three people around me at once, but I was thankful for the brief respite.

Ah, fuck it. I charged at them, dropping to the ground at the last minute. I braced my weight on my arms and swung my leg in a wide arc, spinning my body with the momentum. The three of them crashed to the ground as I took their legs out from under them.

A hand grasped my hair again, yanking me away from the wolves I'd brought to the ground.

Fuck, this whole business of not keeping them in my vision was really screwing me over.

You have other methods of keeping track of them. I reminded myself.

Right!

Immediately, I spread my awareness throughout the courtyard, my magic snaking out like tendrils and wrapping around each individual. Now I was locked onto their biorhythms and could keep track of them even if I had my eyes closed.

But I was still on the ground and it was only a matter of seconds before someone slammed a fist into my face.

Instead of waiting for it to happen, I rolled my weight backwards, bringing my legs up and keeping my knees locked tight—my feet connected with the head of whoever was attacking me.

The grip on my hair loosened and I jumped to my feet.

I felt the heartbeats of three of the wolves coming at me from behind and waited until they were close before darting sharply to the right. They ran past me, stumbling the last few steps when they realized that they weren't going to connect with me.

Instead of following them, I raced for the other two wolves, leaping into the air as I closed distance with one of them.

I spread my arms wide to help with my balance, and snapped one leg forward. The satisfying crunch of bone greeted my ears as my foot connected with a nose.

The poor wolf collapsed to the ground, howling and clutching at his face.

He didn't do so well with pain.

I landed in a crouch in front of him and threw my arm out to the left towards the other wolf. I visualized his blood turning to ice inside of him, freezing his muscles and preventing him from moving.

It wasn't a spell that lay in any of the grimoires Conall had provided for me, it was one that I had adapted on my own after I had learned how to lock onto biorhythms. Thus, it didn't need a chant and afforded me the ability to keep breathing without wasting my air on a spell.

The wolf's eyes bulged as he tried to move, but he was powerless against my spell.

This was why they were so afraid of me.

A small part of me felt guilty for using my blood magic on him, but this was what Conall wanted from me.

He was watching, I knew he was—I had long since perfected the art of locking onto his biorhythm. I felt him wherever he went in the castle so long as he didn't go too far away. He was standing in the doorway of the courtyard right now, watching the fight as it was happening.

He hadn't watched one of my fights since the first one when I'd broken my arm.

I had to get this right. If he was watching, I had to make him proud.

Two of the wolves were down now, although I doubted the one whose nose I'd broken would stay down for long, so I performed the same spell on him. He didn't seem inclined to fight it, although he let loose a snarl as the cold crept over him.

I'm sorry. I sent the thought out into the world, though none of us possessed the power of telepathy. Maybe karma would come in handy one day and realize that I didn't want to hurt any of these people.

I was only doing as I was told.

With the two wolves immobilized I whirled to face the remaining three.

They were staring at me with anxious eyes, darting from me to the two behind me and back again. They hadn't expected me to use my blood magic, probably. I had only used it once in a fight before, and the reaction...well, it hadn't been pleasant.

Everyone had avoided me for days after. The training fights that had followed had been particularly brutal.

I'd stayed away from blood magic after that, but Conall was watching. He would expect me to use my magic in a fight against vampires, so I had to use it on the wolves I trained with, otherwise I would never learn to fight with magic.

I couldn't risk learning how to use my magic while in an actual fight to the death. It had to be done now.

Apprehension was etched into the faces of the wolves. One of them snarled at me, but he made no move to attack.

They didn't want to get near me now.

Finish the fight. Be done with it.

I didn't need them near me to do that.

Throwing both hands forward, I visualized the threads that snaked from me to the three wolves, already wrapped around them. I sent the tendrils racing up their heads, visualized it wrapping around them, and began to chant under my breath.

I felt rather than saw them move, their panic palpable in the air. They knew I was using my magic on them, and instinct told them to kill me to stop me from doing it.

That was how it had always been with blood mages; we'd had no allies amongst any race. All of them feared our capabilities, even the other magic users. No one wanted to get near a blood mage.

Without waiting for them to get the upper hand—I couldn't give it to them—I finished the chant.

Cries of pain erupted from the wolves and my eyes snapped open to watch them fall to the ground, clutching their temples.

I'd performed this spell once before. It had been the first spell I'd successfully completed, which was why I'd felt fairly certain that I'd be able to pull it off in a combat scenario. I was bursting their blood vessels, but the natural healing of the werewolves ensured that they regrew before true damage was done to them.

Still, it basically produced a debilitating magical migraine. I kept up the spell, narrowing my eyes as I watched them thrash about on the ground.

There was a sensation of euphoria rushing through me that I had learned always came with the use of my magic. It was a part of me, something I was designed to use.

Just as exercise brings an endorphin rush, magic had its rewards for me—though much the same as exercise, too much of it would leave me feeling fatigued. I had tested my limits on several spells in the library on my own, and was learning the signs that the fatigue point was approaching.

I wasn't anywhere near it right now.

"Submit!" I shouted at the werewolves. It was the only way I could release them. If they conceded the fight and named me the victor, then it would all be over, and I could stop keeping two spells going at once.

"I submit!" The three of them cried as one.

At once, I dropped both of the spells I'd been keeping up. I hadn't bothered getting cries of submission from the first two; they wouldn't have been able to speak.

Now, I turned to them, one eyebrow raised.

"I submit," one of them said, a soft and bitter note in his voice. The other echoed him a moment later.

Euphoria crashed through me, wave after wave. I was panting from the physical exertion of the fight and the use of magic, but I had won!

In the rush of getting two spells going and keeping them active, I had dropped my connection to Conall.

Now, I turned to the doorway, expecting to see him impressed or proud, or some sort of positive look on his face.

But he wasn't there. He didn't stay to see the end.

Disappointment stole my victory from me.

Anger quickly replaced it.

Chapter 12

NINA

I stormed from the courtyard, not bothering to help the werewolves up. It was bad form, I knew that, but I didn't care at that moment. I wanted to know why the hell Conall hadn't stayed to see the end of my fight.

I had used magic especially because I'd thought he would be there to see it. I had risked the ire of the other werewolves, the small peace that had brokered between me and them, and he hadn't even been there.

How dare he!

The mansion was large and his office was on the second floor. I took the steps two at a time, my strong muscles carrying me with ease now. I was no longer the starving waif I had been when he had found me—I was a woman to be reckoned with.

I reached his office a moment later and threw open the door, stomping inside and kicking it shut.

He looked up at me, his expression unreadable although it looked a little like he was bored. Well, I would fix that quickly—he was going to get a piece of my mind.

"Nina, how can I help you?" He asked as he shifted a few papers across his desk, clearly looking for something far more important than me.

This only built the rage inside of me. I stalked closer to his desk, my fists landing on my hips.

"I won the fight," I said. "I used blood magic and I won the fight."

He arched an eyebrow—unimpressed. "Good," he said.

"Good? I've been working my ass off over here, staying up all night learning spells from the grimoires and waking up early to spar with the wolves. I haven't had a single break, haven't had a good night's sleep in ages, and all you have to say is 'good'?"

"What do you want from me, Nina? A pat on the back? That is not the way I run things here. You are doing as you are expected, no more and no less."

It aggravated me that he didn't see what I was doing as more than just good enough. I was working my fingers to the bone trying to impress him, and he didn't see me.

God, I just wanted him to see me and congratulate me on my win. All I was doing was for him. I didn't expect it to pay back the life debt that I owed him—there was only one way to do that, and he was a formidable warrior. I didn't see him ever needing me to save his ass in a fight. But I did expect him to be the tiniest bit happy about me putting my all into my training.

I could just as easily have been a spoiled brat. He didn't know the first thing about me when he'd rescued me from the cages; how could he? He didn't know what he was getting. For all I knew, he'd just grabbed the first blood mage he'd come across.

He'd never told me his reasons for saving me from the cells, other than that he wanted me to train as a hunter with his werewolves. I knew there was a tactical advantage to having a blood mage on your team, but I felt like there was more he wasn't telling me.

With Conall, I suspected, there was always more waiting under the surface.

But there was no way to dig into that surface. He didn't give me any openings, and I didn't spend enough time with him to learn any of his quirks. I was sure that, just like anyone else, he showed emotion in his own ways. If I could just spend some time with him, then I would be able to figure those things out.

Fat lot of good wishing for that did me. I might as well wish for it to snow in hell. He'd been nice enough to me the first night I was here, but he'd avoided me ever since the training session in the library when I'd given him the migraine.

It was as if he was punishing me for it, but I'd only done as I was told.

I had to give him credit though, he didn't look even a little bit afraid of me. Not like the other wolves. They were all afraid of me. They liked to cover it up with big bravado and bluster, but it was lying under the surface and very much visible.

What was I saying? I seemed to have lost some of my steam. I took in a deep breath and lifted my chin.

"You know, a word of encouragement does a lot in terms of motivation and morale," I said. I wasn't yelling at him anymore, but trying to appeal to his logical side.

"I find that the benefit of being fed and given shelter does enough in the way of motivation for my people."

I swallowed. There it was, the threat he never directly said but one that I was terrified of.

If I didn't perform, he was going to kick me out of here and it would only be a matter of time before I ended up back with the vampires.

A shudder ran down my spine. No, I couldn't think about that. If I thought about going back to the vampires, I wouldn't be able to get anything done.

My motivation would always be to impress Conall and make sure he didn't regret bringing me here. I preferred not to think about the fact that he could send me away at any minute if he wished to. That threat might work for others, but not for me.

For me, it would immobilize me.

"So, you don't care at all that I won against five of your wolves? That has to be a little bit impressive."

He sighed, looking up at me from beneath thick lashes. "You did good, kid."

Exuberance filled me. It wasn't much, but it was a compliment. I'd take it. I lived for scraps with him.

"Now, there is something that I wanted to talk to you about."

My heart jumped into my throat. He wanted to talk to me? Why hadn't he waited for the fight to end and then called me over to him? The man made no sense at all.

But that was okay. I would take what I got from him.

"You've done well with your training, as was expected. Now that you have reached a certain level, it's time for your first assignment."

My eyes went wide. He was going to send me out on a hunt?

Immediately, I wanted to protest that I wasn't ready. Fighting werewolves that didn't want to kill me was a hell of a lot different from going up against a vampire that wanted to rip my throat out with its teeth.

I didn't think I could do it, but I knew that talking back was not an option with Conall. I didn't want him to think I was weak, and besides—he was basically King here. No one talked back to him.

"If you think I'm ready, then I relish the opportunity to prove myself," I said with a deep breath.

"You may not be aware, but in our world, everyone competes for a kill. I do not give assignments to just one person, but to everyone, and the first one to take out the mark is compensated for the successful completion of the kill."

Fantastic. I was going up against wolves that were much more accustomed to tracking and killing vampires. How the hell was I supposed to pull this off? Whatever, there was no point in arguing. This was clearly the way it had always been and would always be—I just had to go with the flow.

"I'll do it," I said.

"One more thing," he said as I started to turn and leave. I arched an eyebrow, curious as to what could possibly be left to say. "If you fail, you will have to leave the family. No more resources will be wasted on someone who cannot hold their own."

I swallowed hard. Okay. So the stakes were high on this one. I was going up against wolves that knew how to do this a hell of a lot better than I did, and if I failed I was going to lose everything I had.

Who said the wolves played fair?

Chapter 13

NINA

With shaking hands, I pulled on the thigh harness I'd been given to hold my weapons. It had several sheaths around the waist for daggers, and could hold a stake on either thigh. I pulled on my boots and laced them up to the knee—you may not think it's very practical, but knee-high boots offer more ankle stability than regular boots.

I would need it. I wasn't as fast or as agile as the wolves, and if I was going to hold my own, then I needed every advantage I could get.

Before I left the room, I checked myself in the mirror one last time. My dark brown hair was swept back into a high ponytail to keep it from flying into my face and distracting me. I wore a plain black long-sleeve shirt, made of breathable fabric, and soft leather pants designed to protect from most falls but also to afford maximum flexibility.

A red scarf was tied around one of my wrists—my own little flair. No one would know what it meant, but to me it was a little rebellion against the wolves. A sign of what I was. They didn't want to accept me, and I wanted to embrace my differences. Even if most of the time I cursed them.

The lower half of my face was hidden by a mask. This wasn't something the other wolves wore, it was something Conall had specifically instructed me to wear. He didn't want the vampires to recognize me if it could be helped, then they'd know that they were going up against a blood mage.

They might try to capture me.

I appreciated the thought—he didn't want me captured because he didn't want to have to break me out again, but I found a different sort of reassurance from the mask. If the vampires thought I was just another hunter, then they would be satisfied with killing me instead of catching me.

I would rather be dead than go back to the dungeon.

Satisfied with my appearance, I left my room and made my way down to the lower level where the weapon room was. Wolves were already in it and stocking up—no one spared a look at me. There was a cold sort of tension in the room, and I knew that it was because I had used my blood magic earlier in the day.

If I hadn't, if I had won the fight fair and square, then they might be bantering with me like they were with their friends.

"Fifty bucks says I get to the mark before you."

"No way in hell, son. I've whipped your ass fifty times already. But if you want to lose your cash, that's on you."

"I want in on that action," another wolf said. "I can beat the both of you with one arm tied behind my back."

I longed for one of them to acknowledge me, so that I could feel like a part of things. All I wanted in life was to belong somewhere, and things had seemed like they were headed in that direction for a minute here. But then I'd gone and ruined everything by using my magic, all to get Conall's attention.

And that hadn't even worked.

I sighed and grabbed two stakes off the wall, sliding them into their holsters, and then proceeded to line my belt with small throwing knives. Some of them were made of wood, while others were cold, hard steel. I didn't know why anyone bothered with them, but I wasn't going to argue with the way things were done. Steel wasn't going to do a damn thing against a vampire, except piss it off.

Satisfied with that, I grabbed a contraption off the wall and strapped it to my right forearm. It held a stake in it, and was designed so that with enough momentum, the stake would be launched. All you had to do was aim and punch, and it would take care of the rest for you.

Only newbies needed that—everyone else had the strength necessary to stake a vampire all on their own. But I was weaker than the werewolves, and I needed the advantage it afforded.

I checked it to make sure that everything was in the right place, and then shook my shoulders out to diffuse some of the tension that had built up.

"Hey," Lisa—the she-wolf that had broken my arm—said.

I almost ignored her by accident, I didn't realize she was talking to me.

"Hey," I said, smiling at her.

"Congrats on your win earlier."

My eyes widened a little bit. "Thanks!" I hadn't expected a single one of them to acknowledge the fact that I had taken out five wolves at once, even if I had done it with blood magic.

She grinned back at me. "You're gonna do fine. Well, you will if one of us doesn't get there first. Good luck."

I felt a little better.

Maybe, just maybe, I could do this after all.

Chapter 14

GRAYSON

I paced my room from one side to the other and back again, my hands locked together behind my back, as I waited for my men to join me. I had sent Alex out fifteen minutes ago to find Jackson and Thomas, the only other two men I trusted.

Bitterly, I wished once again that Raoul was there. Not a day had gone by that I didn't miss him, though I didn't show it to anyone that might be watching me. I couldn't let them think I was weak.

Raoul was the best hunter we had had, no one could compare to him when it came to tracking a kill.

Thankfully, at that moment Alex entered with the other two, interrupting my thoughts before they could go too far down a depressive road.

"Gentlemen," I said with a nod of my head.

The three of them stood side by side, legs spread, hands behind their backs. At attention.

A small smile curved my lips—they knew good and well that I didn't treat them liked soldiers, but they liked to tease me in any way they could. I appreciated anything they did that made me smile these days.

The moments were too few and far between.

"I'm sure you are wondering why I've called you here just after sundown," I said. "We have all just woken up and you would likely rather be getting started on your night."

"Our lives are yours to command," Alex said, a humorous lilt to his voice.

I resisted the urge to glare at him. "Just how far are you willing to go for me?"

Looks of surprise flickered over their faces, and they glanced at one another and then back at me. I had never asked them this before, and they were likely wondering what it was that I was going to ask of them.

"I would follow you to Hell and back, Gray. You know that." Alex spoke first, and the others nodded their heads in agreement with him.

"I'd give my life for you without hesitation, Prince," Thomas said.

It grated on me that he called me 'Prince,' but there was nothing I could do to break him of that. Alex and I had been friends since we were younglings, and I suspected that was why he felt comfortable calling me by name. Not even by name, but rather the nickname he had given me.

This was why I loved Alex most of all; I didn't have to worry about who I showed myself to be around him. I could simply exist when it was just the two of us.

"Good," I said, grinning deviously. "Because we are going on a hunt. I want the head of a wolf."

Slowly, matching grins spread across their faces.

They wanted revenge just as much as I did.

Chapter 15

NINA

Three hours.

That was how long I had been on this blasted hunt, trying to find my mark. I'd been to five different bars and clubs trying to find him, and had finally caught up with him at the sixth. But he hadn't given me a good opening yet—he'd been with three other vampires, and I hadn't wanted to get in the middle of that.

One blood mage against three vampires? No, that didn't seem like a smart decision. Especially since I was an unbloodied mage. I had never taken a life, and truth be told I wasn't looking forward to the experience. I knew it was something I had to do, for Conall, but I would have much preferred going my whole life without killing a person.

Vampires aren't people. They're parasites and they deserve to die.

I told myself this over and over to get it to sink in—but wanting someone dead and actively going to kill them are two wildly different things. Anyone can wish a person dead, but only a certain type of person is actually capable of taking a life.

Was I that kind of person?

I sighed. I was going to have to find out. And honestly, if I wasn't that type of person then I was going to have to learn how to be that type of person. There were no other options. Conall wasn't going to keep me if I couldn't kill vampires for him, and I wouldn't last two seconds on my own.

You've lasted more than two seconds since you left the mansion.

I cheered myself with that thought. That was true. I wouldn't know how to feed myself, or where to find safe shelter, but I hadn't been snatched the moment I'd left the mansion.

Six months since I'd set foot outside of the safe house, and I'd been antsy as hell the moment I was out the door. I had grown used to the halls I'd roamed, the courtyard I'd spent my days in, the library that had owned my nights. I'd developed a rhythm to the life, and it had been comfortable.

Now everything had changed.

I was going to have to fit hunting into my schedule, and somehow still keep up my fighting practice and keep learning blood magic.

Don't think about that right now. Focus on the mark.

Right. He was inside a bar right now, although his friends had gone a different way.

I crouched on the fire escape of a building across the street from the bar, waiting for him to come back out. I couldn't go into the club and kill him, there would be too many people that would either attack me or get in the way. I didn't want to add an innocent life to the list—the vampires might rule the world, but for the most part the humans were still allowed to live normal lives.

Thralls were taken, but most of them were willing. Being a thrall meant that you had a roof over your head and food in your belly, even if it meant letting a parasite feed off of you every day. For some people, that was a decent trade off. They thought it was better than living on the streets.

The very thought of that kind of life turned my stomach. I didn't know how anyone could willingly submit themselves to a vampire, but it was none of my business. As long as they were willing, it wasn't anything I could truly protest.

The muscles in my legs ached, and I stood to stretch them. Allowing them to stiffen was a bad idea; if my mark exited the bar and I wasn't agile enough to catch him before anyone else came out then I was going to be in trouble.

And if another wolf came by, I would have to be faster than them. An all but impossible task, but I refused to even contemplate failing this mission.

I spread my awareness into the bar, checking on the biorhythms of its inhabitants. I had picked up the rhythm of my mark when he left the last club, so I was able to pick him out of the crowd.

Good, he was still in there. I was antsy at the thought that there might be a back entrance he would leave by, but it wasn't like I could be in two places at once. Besides, odds were that he would leave the same way he came, right?

Thirty minutes passed without anything interesting happening. A few people came, even less left the bar, and I was getting bored. It was getting harder and harder for me to focus on the bar door; my attention kept wandering.

But I did manage to keep his biorhythm on tap the entire time. I felt his heart beating with stolen blood, felt every time he moved throughout the bar and returned to his seat. Never once did he get near the entrance.

I chewed on my lip, wondering what I could do to pass the time for a while. It was dawning on me that he could spend an hour or two in that bar without coming out; I'd found him when he'd been leaving a club, I had no idea what his usual habits were.

Maybe a climb would get my blood moving again and help me concentrate.

I nodded to myself. I could monitor his biorhythm just as well from the rooftop as I could from the fire escape; if he started towards the door then I would just have to head back down before he got to it.

Decision made, I headed up the fire escape. It felt good to be moving again, to get the blood flowing through my legs. Already, I was glad with the decision—it was dangerous to stay in one spot for too long. A vampire could come along and find me.

Maybe there would be a more comfortable spot on the rooftop. At the very least, I could sit on the edge instead of kneeling on metal.

It only took me a few minutes to get to the top of the tall building.

The moment I set foot on the rooftop, I realized I wasn't alone.

Chapter 16

GRAYSON

I had separated from my friends over an hour ago, when I had picked up a scent that was familiar and yet unfamiliar to me. It had tickled my senses, begging me to follow it, and I had been unable to ignore it.

Something in my gut had told me this was a hunt I wanted to do on my own. My friends, especially Alex, had been loath to have me part from them—but none of them could deny the order of their Prince.

They had done as they were told, though Alex had warned me that he was going to stay in close range of me. I expected no less from him. He would keep within range of scenting me, and if he smelled blood then he would come my way.

I could hold my own in a fight without him, I had more than proved that time and time again. Still, my friends would not leave me in a fight on my own. I loved them for that, but I was glad that they had allowed me to leave without too much fuss.

I didn't want them around for this, though I couldn't put my finger on the exact why of it.

The hunter—and I was certain it was a hunter by the clothing, though I could not for the life of my figure out the red fabric worn on the wrist—was below me. She wore black clothing, and hid her face, but the swell and sway of her hips had given away her gender.

I could never tell my friends what the sight of her swaying gait had done to me.

My body had reacted on impulse, hardening to a painful degree, and it had taken all of my control to not rush to her and grab her in that moment. I had almost lost control, but I had centuries of experience under my belt and had reigned myself in.

The creaking of metal sounded and I tensed—she was either coming up or going down the fire escape she rested on.

Why do I not kill her already?

Because something was wrong about her. I couldn't figure it out, but something stayed my hand and urged me to figure her out. I had resisted the urge to confront her so far, but her scent was drawing closer now, and I knew she was coming to the roof.

I backed away from the edge, planting myself in the center of the roof, and watched for her.

One conversation. That was all I needed. I could figure out who and what she was, and then I would kill her.

She is not the wolf you seek. You do not need her head.

That was true. In fact, she was not a wolf at all. Her scent was cinnamon and spice, intoxicating and tempting me with thoughts of what her blood would taste like; not the musky scent of the animal abominations.

Brown hair appeared at the edge of the rooftop, and then her head cleared the barrier.

I stifled the frustrated growl that built in my gut—she wore a mask that covered her face. Her scent teased me with the thought that I might know it, and I had hoped that it would become more clear when I saw her face.

Who the hell wears a mask, anyway? None of the wolves wore masks, so she must not belong to them. But wasn't that obvious by the red fabric at her wrist? My eyes darted to it, once it was visible, and I frowned.

It had to be symbolic of something, but I didn't know what. Perhaps it was an indicator of her clan.

A new group of hunters moving in on the territory, that was what it had to be.

But then why did I recognize her scent? And God, where did I recognize it from?

It could be that I had passed by her in the city before. That might be all it was, and then this silliness was for naught.

Unlikely.

She stepped off the fire escape and onto the roof and her body tensed at once. I could hear her heart beating hard now, smell her apprehension.

She was aware of me.

I moved out of the shadows, my movements graceful, and she jerked her head to look at me.

For a moment, I stopped to stare at the brown eyes that looked back at me. They were beautiful, and I was struck by the notion that I wanted to waste eons just staring into those eyes.

Bullshit. Poetic bullshit. You don't have time for this.

I reprimanded myself and strode forward again.

Her eyes widened—God, they were so beautiful—and she started towards the fire escape again.

"Do not." I warned her, my voice soft and dangerous.

She froze.

"I will simply follow you. You cannot hope to outrun me."

Her heart beat faster, jackhammering against her chest. Pumping her blood faster throughout her body, and again my mind turned to the thought of feeding from her. I knew, somehow, that she would taste better than any I'd had before.

"You're right," she said, turning to look at me again and straightening her shoulders.

I had to give it to her, she had balls. Her eyes darted around the rooftop as she moved away from the fire escape, taking in her surroundings. Looking for a weapon or a way out? It had to be a way out, she had stakes on her arm and thighs—thighs that were clearly outlined by her tight leather pants.

My eyes stayed there for a moment longer than necessary, and my body hardened painfully again. I wanted her. I couldn't deny that, it was useless, but I knew that I had to maintain my control.

Regardless of whether she was a hunter or not, I did not take women against their will. I was a man, not a monster.

"So, we're at an impasse, I see," she said, a humorous lilt to her voice.

I cocked my head to the side. "What impasse do you see? I could kill you in a moment here."

"And I you, Prince," she said, hissing my title at me.

I froze. How did she know who I was? I had been right when I'd thought her scent was familiar to me—she knew who I was. She had met me before. But when?

I had never traded words with a hunter before, this was a new experience for me. And one I doubted I would repeat with anyone else.

"You know me," I said, narrowing my eyes. "How?"

"Figure it out yourself," she said, laughing bitterly. "I'm sure you've got the brain cells for it."

She walked to an edge of the roof top, her gait was casual but I could see the tension in her shoulders.

What was impressive, though, was that she dared to turn her back on me.

It was a mistake.

Not because I would kill her—why couldn't I do that?—but because she had presented me with a tempting view of her ass. I set my jaw in a hard line. My blood pounded in my head, and everything in me urged me to go to her.

To claim her.

I shook my head, glad that she couldn't see me, and clenched my hands into fists. My nails bit into my palms, providing me with little pinpoints of pain to distract me from the pain that originated elsewhere in my body.

Pain only she could give relief to.

She turned back to me, taking a few steps away from the edge, and tilted her head to the side. "You've been following me, haven't you?"

I quirked an eyebrow, but didn't answer me.

"Because it can't be a coincidence that you just happen to be on the rooftop of this building, when I was hiding back on the fire escape. I don't believe in coincidences."

"What do you believe in?"

"Death," she said, her tone blunt.

I flinched, not knowing why, then focused on what she had said. What did she mean? Of course, everyone believed in death. It was a universal truth for all species, that death would come sooner or later. It could not be avoided, though for the vampires it was more of an afterthought than anything. We were immortal, save for murder.

Perhaps she worshipped a God of death, and the fabric at her wrist was the mark of her cult.

My head tilted to the side.

"We all believe in death," I said, hoping to get more out of her.

"Yeah. It's the universal equalizer. It's the only thing you can count on."

"You have hoped for death," I said, realizing it in the way she spoke of it.

"For years, yes," she said.

"Is that why you hunt? You wish for death at the hands of a vampire?" I kept my tone casual, although deep inside I hated the thought of another taking her life.

She belongs to me.

I averted my eyes so that she could not see them widen in horror. Where had that thought come from? She was a hunter. She did not belong to me, it was an impossibility.

"No," she said.

But she didn't bother to expand on that, and I had to smile. She was tough. I glanced up at her from beneath my lashes, locking my eyes with hers. A swallow caused her throat to convulse just a little, drawing my eyes there. Her jugular was pulsing against her neck, her heart beating so loudly—how did she keep her voice calm while such panic ran through her body?

I took a step closer to her and she took a step back. Her breathing was becoming more rapid, her chest rising and falling quickly, and my eyes abandoned her throat for a moment.

A great testament to what a distraction it was, that it would draw the eye of a vampire away from her throat.

She had curves that would test the patience of a good man, and I was not a good man. Not a monster, but not a saint either.

I was a man with needs, and I needed her in that moment. I took another step closer without thinking about it, drawn to her.

She stepped back.

I narrowed my eyes as I looked back up at her. "You're afraid."

"You're a vampire."

A smirk curved my lips. "Indeed, little hunter, I am."

I strode towards her with purpose now, backing her up until she was at the edge of the building. She lifted her leg to step back and yelped when there was nothing but air to catch her.

On instinct, I moved faster than light to her side, gripping her by the waist and pulling her back onto the building—against me. Her body was flush against mine, her breasts crushed against my chest, her thighs enclosed by my own.

Unable to restrain myself, I bowed my head to her neck and breathed in the scent of her—just as intoxicating as it had been at a distance, only so much more. My body hardened to an impossible degree, and I felt myself pulsing against her, to my great embarrassment.

Step away from her.

Yet I was surprised to find that she was not stiff in my arms, but rather had melted against me, her fingers gripping my forearms.

It's because you're the only thing holding her in place right now. Move away from her, damn it. You're embarrassing yourself.

My lips were inches away from her neck, and a small groan escaped them.

She shifted her weight, her hips swaying against mine, and the friction only heightened my pain.

My breath came in shallow pants, as if I had run a great distance, but I knew that it was because of the control I was exerting to keep myself in place. I couldn't move away from her, but I could stop myself from doing anything else.

Couldn't I?

My fingers shifted, brushing the small of her back, and she whimpered. I tensed, and she shifted her weight again.

Now, we were at an impasse. I knew that I had to move away from her, but she had not told me to go.

It's because you're a fucking vampire and you're inches away from her neck. She knows she can't win now.

True. Very true.

Bastard.

Just one taste...

I bent my head, my lips parted, and my tongue slipped out to graze her neck.

I will not feed on her.

She moaned and I lost reason, my tongue flicking out again in little darts along her neck, tasting her.

She was temptation incarnate, and I was but a prisoner at her feet. I pulled her closer to my body, pressing us tightly together, and she arched her neck, exposing herself to me.

I tilted my head up, leaving the temptation of her neck, and my lips closed around her ear, sucking lightly. She moaned again, and I felt her heart racing against my chest as it heaved up and down with every breath she took.

Her fingers dug into my arms, and she shifted her hips, brushing against my erection.

This woman will be the death of me.

I nipped at her ear before flicking my tongue out to soothe the small hurt. She whimpered.

"Do you want me to stop?" My voice was husky, betraying my need.

"No," she whispered.

Victory.

I sucked at her earlobe a moment longer before returning my attention to her neck, grazing my teeth against her flesh then licking at her skin.

I will not feed on her.

I had to keep telling myself that because the temptation was so great. I wanted nothing more than to taste her blood, to know what it was like, to feel the euphoria of her essence flooding through me. But this I would not do.

Carefully, very careful not to break the skin, I took her skin between my teeth and sucked, and was rewarded with another moan. Her hand abandoned my arm and fisted in the lengths of my white hair, holding me there.

I obliged her, lavishing my attention on her neck.

Her hips moved against mine again, and I pulled my face away from her, hissing out a slow breath.

"You play with fire, little hunter," I said.

She stared up at me, her eyes clouded for a moment but then they began to clear. And then they widened with shock—she was realizing what had passed between us, and her rational mind did not like it.

It shouldn't have been a surprise to me. She was a hunter. It was in her nature to hate me. And yet it wounded my pride just a little.

"Move," she said, bracing her hands against my chest and shoving me back a few steps.

I arched an eyebrow. "That is not what you were saying just a moment ago."

"Shut up. Just. Shut up. Do not talk." Her chest heaved with every breath she took.

"I am perfectly fine going back to not talking," I said, laughing.

She glared at me.

I stepped closer to her again, crowding her, and lowered my face so that I was mere inches away from her. "What's wrong, little hunter? Are you scared?" I lifted my hand, intent on removing her mask so that I could kiss her.

And then she was gone over the edge.

Chapter 17

NINA

*F*uck.

My muscles screamed at me in protest, my unprotected fingers burned, but there was nothing I could do in that second. I had to catch my breath. I'd planned this—somewhat. I'd been hoping it wouldn't be necessary, that there would be another way out, but the Prince had pushed me quite literally over the edge.

While staking out the rooftop I'd found the edge that had a ladder on its side—another safety feature. It would lead down to another fire escape. I was damned lucky that I'd managed to fall straight down instead of flying out backwards, but it had been my best shot at escape.

Why didn't I just stay near the first fire escape?

Because it would have taken too much time to clear the first few levels, precious time during which he could have caught up to me.

Speaking of which, I needed to move.

I dragged air into my lungs and started moving down the ladder as quickly as possible. My fingers protested every movement I made, they didn't want to close around the rungs of the ladder as I scaled down it, but I gave them no choice.

My willpower was stronger than my body, and I commanded it to move.

At last I landed on the fire escape and took off down it at a dead run.

My training had included running up and down stairs every day to build up my leg muscles, and it had the added benefit of allowing me to have perfected the art of moving down a flight of stairs at a rather dangerous speed.

I couldn't fall. If I fell he might catch up to me.

I spared a precious second to glance up and ensure that he wasn't following me down. He would probably make for the fire escape I'd been on originally—he was fast enough that he didn't need the head start I did.

He was nowhere to be seen, thank God.

Why did I let him touch me?

Nope, nope, noppity nope. I was not going down that train of thought right now. I kept running down the fire escape until it bottomed out at the ground and then I took off at a sprint out of the alley and down the road.

It was dangerous, moving on the road instead of through the alleys, but I wanted to get as far away from the building as quickly as was possible.

A few blocks later and I darted into an alley, pressing my back against a wall as I panted. God, I'd been reckless. I should have gotten off that rooftop as soon as I sensed the vampire. Damn the logic of knowing he'd be able to follow me, I should have just beat it the hell out of there.

I had very nearly risked being captured by the vampires again, going back to the cages. Fuck that, I wasn't going to do that as long as I still had breath in my body. I would rather die than go back to the cages.

Very carefully I inched my way to the edge of the wall and peered around the corner. The Prince was nowhere to be seen.

Was he not following me?

I shook my head. More likely than not he was moving through the shadows, faster than light, and I wouldn't be able to see him coming.

After I had time to take in a few extra breaths, I ran down the alley and followed its twists and turns until it emptied out onto a side street. It took me a second to get my bearings, but I recognized this area of the city. I could make my way back to the mansion from here.

The mark!

The thought came flying into my brain a moment after I started moving again.

I cursed. I had to complete my kill or I was going to end up on the streets, easy prey for the vampire Prince. And I didn't doubt that he would come for me as soon as he could track me down. The man had been too intent on me to give me up easily.

But he didn't feed on you. Why not?

I shoved the thought from my mind. I didn't have time to think about that right now, I had to get back to the club and pray that the mark hadn't left already.

Risking wasting more time, I sent my tendrils of magic throughout the street and into the alleys that ran away from it, searching for the vampire Prince. I had picked up on his biorhythm when he'd been pressed against me—my body heated at the memory—and I was certain that I could pick him out of a crowd now.

He wasn't near.

That confused me more than anything, and there was also a small twinge of disappointment.

Ruthlessly, I crushed it. Damn my traitorous body, I wasn't going to examine those feelings.

Satisfied that the Prince was nowhere to be found and wasn't following me, I ran back through the alley towards the bar I'd abandoned minutes ago. It was a risk; the Prince might still be on the rooftop, so I calculated a different route and adjusted accordingly.

Ten minutes later I was in an alley behind the bar, watching the back exit. I extended my awareness into the club and breathed a sigh of relief when I felt the mark inside. His heart rate was high—likely he was drunk—but he was still there.

Still alive for me to kill the moment he vacated the premises.

I recognized that I was at a strategic disadvantage right now, hiding out behind the bar, but I didn't dare risk going to the other side again. Maybe my mark would come out the back door—unlikely, but a girl could hope. More likely than not he would leave through the front door. I would just have to monitor his movements, and if he headed towards the front, then so would I.

My heart rate, having risen from the mad dash through the city, now started to slow. I focused on it, taking deep breaths to regain control of my body, until I felt like I had everything in hand.

Then, unbidden, my thoughts turned back to the interaction on the rooftop.

I'd known the Prince the moment I'd seen him on the rooftop—no other vampire I'd seen had white hair like his. I didn't know what the King looked like, but I'd be surprised if he didn't have the same stark white hair. It must be a genetic trait of the royal line.

What was most interesting was that he'd seemed to remember me. Somewhat. I'd put my money on it. That had to be why he hadn't killed me right away; he'd been curious about who I was and wanted to solve the puzzle. I'd refused to give that information away, knowing it was the only thing that had kept me alive.

Or at least, that's what I'd thought had been his reasoning, until he'd saved me from falling off the rooftop, and his body had been pressed tight against mine.

My breathing shallowed and I closed my eyes, remembering the feeling of his body against mine. The harsh evidence of his arousal pressing into my hip, the feeling of his heart beating too heavily in his chest. The moment when his tongue had touched my skin, teasing me until I'd forgotten all rational sense and had held him against me just as tightly as he'd held me.

He'd turned my body against me. It had to be some sort of spell that vampires were capable of—but then, why had I never been attracted to any of the other vampires I'd met? There had been no arousal with them, no interest stirring inside of me. They'd always repulsed me, and I'd assumed that was because they were inherently evil creatures and that was what it would always feel like to be around him.

But the Prince had been so different. He'd smelled like the earth after a fresh rain—clean, and something a little intoxicating hidden in his scent. Almost like whisky.

Maybe he'd recently devoured someone who had those qualities, and that was why he'd fooled me. Yeah, that had to be it.

It couldn't be that I was attracted to the vampire. I refused to accept that possibility.

But my body reminded me what it had felt like to be against him, and my cheeks flamed in embarrassment.

My attention was drawn a moment later by the sound of rustling in the neighboring alley, my eyes snapping open as I pushed all thoughts aside and focused.

I was not alone.

Chapter 18

NINA

Shifting my weight so that it was all on my back leg ready to propel me forward, I drew a steel dagger from my belt. Hopefully it wasn't a vampire—or maybe, hopefully it was? I didn't want to have to kill a person, but anyone who hung out in a dark alley in the middle of the night probably wasn't there to say hello and how are you doing.

Like me. I was the kind of person you didn't want to meet in a dark alley right now.

I dropped to a crouch and slowly moved forward until I was at the mouth of the alley, able to peer around the corner and see if whoever was there had moved out of their alley.

No one in sight.

Closing my eyes, I extended my senses into the neighboring alley. Just as I'd suspected, a heartbeat answered my call. A moment later and I recognized the source—Lisa.

I let out a sigh of relief and stood up.

"I know it's you, Lisa," I said as I walked into the small clearing behind the bar.

A moment later she walked out of the darkness she'd been shrouded in.

"Hey, kid," she said, smiling. "Good job finding the mark first, but I've got it from here. Go on home."

I set my jaw in a hard line, taking in a deep breath. "Yeah, that's not gonna happen. I got here first, I'm getting the kill."

"What are you going to do with the money? You don't need anything that the mansion doesn't provide. Just go on home."

"Uh, I kind of need to stay at the mansion, which means I need this kill."

Her lips formed into an 'O' as she absorbed what I'd said, but then she shook her head. "Sorry, but I need this kill."

"So do I," I said. I didn't want to have to fight her for it, but I wasn't above doing that. I knew I could knock her out with blood magic just as I had done to the other wolves earlier in the day. I wouldn't have to kill her, just immobilize her, but I knew it would wreck the peace we had built between us.

She was the closest thing I had to a friend in the mansion, and I didn't want to give that up. But I'd been through enough bullshit this night, so I wasn't going to put up with her trying to steal my kill.

"Don't make me hurt you, Nina," she said. "I don't want to knock your pretty little teeth out, but this is the way our world works."

"Give it your best shot," I said, and bared my teeth at her. "I don't think you're going to win."

She dropped into a crouch, but the mark chose that moment to stumble out of the back exit. He reeked of alcohol, and I had no doubt that he had come out here to take a piss rather than choosing one of the bathrooms.

Fucking men.

"Whachu doin?" He slurred, swaying on his feet.

Lisa and I locked eyes, frozen for a moment with indecision.

I didn't waste time, I threw my free hand forward and locked onto her biorhythm, freezing her blood so that she couldn't move. She had just enough time to set her face in a look of immense anger before her muscles locked into place, unable to fight the frigid cold I'd put on her.

A part of me felt guilty, and a little worried about her body temperature dropping too far, but I knew that this would be over fairly quickly. I could warm her blood up for her afterwards, if she let me.

"What the fuck?" My mark sounded a hell of a lot more lucid now, and a quick glance at him confirmed that he'd deduced what was happening.

Vampires must have a quick metabolism if he was clearing up already. Maybe that was why he reeked of alcohol—he was literally sweating it out of his system before it could really sink into him.

Had he been playing the drunk?

No time to wonder about that, I had to handle the situation before more wolves closed in. If Lisa had found me, then it was possible the others wouldn't be too far behind her.

I turned my back on Lisa, compartmentalizing the spell I needed to keep her frozen so that I could focus most of my attention on the vampire.

He lunged at me as soon as I cleared my mind, slamming a fist into the side of my head.

With an oof I stumbled to the side.

Focus, Nina.

Months of training with wolves that fought dirty had prepared me for this. I wasted no time, sweeping his legs out from under him with one quick move and then landing two kicks—one to his ribs and the other to his head. I knelt and slammed my fist into his face, then adjusted my hand so that my fingers touched his bare neck.

I didn't need to touch someone to lock onto their biorhythm, but it made it a much faster process and I needed all the speed I could get in this moment. It took mere seconds before I picked up on the feeling of his heart beating.

It was a little difficult to sort out Lisa and the vampire's biorhythms now that I had the sensation of three hearts beating, but I pushed through it. I splayed my hand wide open on his chest, slugging him in the head with my other hand to keep him dazed.

I began to chant the spell to boil his blood, closing my eyes to afford myself more concentration. I visualized the blood heating up, watched it start to pop and sizzle as it reached unbearable levels. I could feel it working, so I opened my eyes to look down at him.

Just in time for him to bring his fist up to slam into my throat. I fell backwards, the breath driven from my lungs, confusion taking over me.

He shouldn't have been able to move! What had gone wrong?

I dragged air into my burning lungs and chanted again, the words coming out in a rough rasp. He'd done a number on my throat with his enhanced strength and I had no doubt that I wouldn't speak right for weeks.

I dialed up the intensity of the spell. It must not have worked because he was a vampire and this was a spell I hadn't tried on the wolves, it was too dangerous. I must not have calculated correctly for the healing nature of the supernatural creatures.

My folly in not getting up came back to bite me in the ass when he landed a kick to my ribs, interrupting the spell and leaving me gasping in pain. I grunted and rolled to the side, still chanting. I wasn't going to give up, wasn't going to drop the spell until the man was dead.

I came up in a crouch, watching the vampire across from me.

"Dirty fucking blood mage," he said. "I'm going to kill you and take your head back to the King."

Good. Kill me, don't capture me. No, wait. How about you just die?

I narrowed my eyes as I watched him, my lips never ceasing to move. I wanted to kill him with my magic, prove myself as a blood mage, but I wasn't above falling back on the tried and true stake on my forearm if it became necessary.

No matter what, I was going to kill him.

A small whimper sounded behind me, distracting me. The spell died on my lips as I whirled to face Lisa—she shouldn't have been able to make a sound. What had I done wrong?

Then I saw the look of excruciating pain on her face, her lips twisted open in a wordless scream, the sweat on her forehead, and the unnatural red color of her skin.

Horror rushed over me in waves.

"No, no, no!"

I'd gotten it so wrong. I'd locked onto the wrong biorhythm. I shook my head, rushing over to her. I dropped the spell, relinquished my hold on her body, and she sagged to the ground.

Unconscious.

Right? She had to be unconscious. That was all it was. Right?

"Please, don't be dead. Please, please, please, don't be dead," I said, my voice cracking. I groped blindly for her neck, tears clouding my vision as I tried to find her pulse.

Nothing.

I threw my knife to the side and brushed the tears out of my eyes so that I could see better. Still, I couldn't find her pulse.

The vampire behind me fully forgotten, I pressed my ear to her chest. It did not rise or fall—she wasn't breathing and there was no heartbeat.

I sent my magic flooding into her, looking for her heart, determined to fight nature and bring her back.

I forced her heart to beat once, but it wouldn't pick up the rhythm. I tried again. Thump. Then nothing.

"No!"

The sobs broke out of me now, tearing out of my throat as I screamed my rage and pain into the night. This couldn't be happening, I wouldn't let it happen.

Wave after wave of pain crashed over me, and I felt myself losing control. Felt the magic building within me as I tried to grasp it.

It blasted out of me violently, crashing through the alley in a rush to find a target, any target.

To make someone hurt in the same way that I hurt.

Oh God, what had I done?

Chapter 19

NINA

I sat curled in the corner of my room, staring down at the raw skin on my hands. I had tried time after time to scrub them clean, but it was as if Lisa's blood was actually on my hands. I couldn't feel clean again.

I had killed her—and the vampire. When my magic had rushed out of me once the realization of what I'd done had set in, it had killed the vampire in one violent sweep.

This was of no consolation to me. I couldn't believe that this had happened.

I rocked back and forth, clutching my knees to my chest as tears blurred my vision again.

I killed her. I killed her. She's dead because of me.

The thoughts kept running through my mind like a broken record. I couldn't come to terms with what had happened, my heart was breaking into a thousand and pieces and oh God, I couldn't breathe.

I didn't deserve to breathe.

"No, no, no," I sobbed over and over again. It was the only word I could get out of my mouth.

Every time I closed my eyes, I kept seeing her face as she tried to scream, indescribable pain etched into every inch of her face.

I had done that to her. I had killed her.

I was a murderer.

A knock sounded at my door and I froze, my eyes snapping over to stare at it.

Someone was there. On the other side of the door.

Instinct told me to reach out and find the biorhythm to detect who it was, but I refused. I was never going to use my magic ever again. I was an abomination and I deserved to die, but even if the wolves let me live, I was never going to use my magic again.

I wasn't going to kill another person.

Vampire or not, I wasn't going to do it again.

"Open the door, Nina."

Conall. It was his voice on the other side of the door.

I knew that I had to go to it and open up. He'd given a command, not a request, and he was King in this mansion.

But I couldn't do it. I couldn't face him after what I'd done. Couldn't bear to see the look of disgust and horror on his face when he condemned me for losing control. He was going to throw me out of the mansion, and rightly so.

I didn't deserve death, I realized. I deserved to go back to the cages, to be punished for the rest of my life.

Yes. I would accept the banishment he was no doubt here to give me.

Don't be ridiculous. He's here to have you executed.

But that wasn't good enough! Death was too kind.

"Nina." His voice held a note of warning now, and I knew that I was pissing him off by not opening the door. I just couldn't bring myself to move, it was as if my limbs were frozen by the same spell I'd used on Lisa.

No, I couldn't do it. I couldn't face him.

I watched in horror as I heard the sound of a key entering the lock and a moment later the knob turned and the door swung open.

My eyes fell to the floor. I wouldn't look at him.

He hates me.

All I had wanted was to make him proud, and instead I had murdered one of his kin. What was he going to do to me?

I heard his footsteps moving closer to me, but still I didn't dare to raise my eyes.

Go ahead and say it. Just tell me what my punishment is. Exile or execution? Just tell me!

"Congratulations."

My eyes snapped up to his, my mouth dropped open in disbelief. "What?"

"Your first kill. You successfully completed your mission. Congratulations," he said. His voice was cold, devoid of emotion.

A shudder ran through me as I shook my head. "But, but...I killed..."

I couldn't bring myself to say her name. I was unworthy.

He crouched in front of me and I averted my eyes immediately. He reached out and touched my chin, lifting my head up.

Still, I looked sharply out of the corner of my eye at the bed in the room. I wouldn't look at him. He couldn't make me.

"Look at me, Nina," he said, his voice harsh.

Reluctantly, I lifted my eyes.

"In order to do this, to be a part of this world and not become a victim—in order to survive, you have to Harden your heart, mind, and soul. All that matters in our world is the mission. All that matters is survival. You did a good job."

My eyebrows knitted together, but I couldn't find the words to give voice to my confusion.

Why wasn't he punishing me?

He cocked his head to the side, some emotion filling his eyes that I did not recognize. "I've got big plans for you, Nina. You're going to go places here."

Then he pressed a kiss to my forehead. "I'm proud of you."

Shock took over and I couldn't have said anything even if I'd wanted to.

But it didn't matter—he was gone.

I was left with my confusion and pain.

GRAYSON

Let her get away.

It was all I could think about as I walked up the steps of my castle.

The woman—the hunter—had jumped off the building. Immediately, I'd looked over the edge to see that she'd caught herself on a ladder, but I hadn't pursued her.

I'd been too busy mulling over my actions and trying to make sense of them.

Logic dictated that I should have killed her, but instead I'd allowed myself to indulge in the pleasures of the flesh. She'd awakened a hunger in me that had been dormant for years now.

It wasn't that women didn't interest me, but rather that no particular woman interested me enough. When I'd first reached my prime I'd been insatiable, giving over to a hunger I'd only just been introduced to, but once I'd outgrown that I'd realized that there wasn't a female on the Earth that I had enough in common with to truly desire.

That had been okay with me. I'd known that I had time to find one, and that my mate was out there somewhere.

And then the hunter came.

No. Violently, I shook my head. I couldn't think about her. Even the thought of her, the memory of her scent, sent desire rushing to my loins and the need to hunt her down and make her mine returned.

How had I managed not to go after her?

I didn't know what had restrained me. Perhaps it had been the look of horror on her face when she'd realized what had transpired between us. I was an evolved man, and I wouldn't ever force myself on a woman.

The memory of her hips shifting against mine as she melted against me, the sound of her moans as my tongue lavished her throat...She had been willing.

And then she'd fled. That had been more than enough of an indication that she hadn't wanted to continue the experience.

I shook my head to clear the thoughts as I walked through the hall.

She wasn't for me. She was forbidden fruit.

Not that mating between vampires and humans was forbidden, far from it, but a hunter? No, that could not be borne. My father would murder me rather than see such a thing happen.

"Prince!"

Leopold, one of the council members, came rushing to me, a look of distress on his face.

Instantly I composed myself so that he would not see the conflicting emotions on my face. No need for impertinent questions. He fell into pace beside me as I kept going.

"What is it?"

He hadn't heard of my indiscretion, had he? Not even my friends had known what I'd been up to. It was impossible.

"Sir..." He cleared his throat. "There's been a terrible accident."

I froze mid-step, turning my head to look at him. "What has happened?"

He cleared his throat, clearly uncomfortable.

"Out with it, man. What has happened?"

"It's your father, my Prince. I'm so sorry."

What? What did he mean?

I frowned. "What are you talking about?"

He wet his lips, swallowing nervously. "There's been a horrible accident. The King is gone."

My blood froze.

No, this couldn't be.

I had been cavorting with a hunter and my father was dead?

Instinct told me to let loose my rage, at myself and at the universe, but centuries of training held my composure for me. I couldn't react. I wasn't allowed to react.

Brutally, I shoved all thoughts to the back of my mind. The hunter mattered not now. I must never think of her again.

The responsibilities of my people now weighed on me, and I couldn't let them down.

I am not ready for this.

"My liege." He knelt before me, one fist over his heart. "You are King."

The End

Continue the Ruled by Blood Series in book one, Blood Huntress!

www.izzyshows.com/ruled-by-blood

www.izzyshows.com

Newsletter

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

I write urban fantasy novels for new adults. I read just about everything--fantasy, science fiction, dystopian, historical fiction, and much more. I'm also an avid LARPer. Don't know what that is? Shoot me a message and I'll gab your ear off about it. I love to talk with fans, so don't be shy--be forewarned, though, I can rant a good bit.

I grew up in Wilson, North Carolina. It's a small town about an hour east of Raleigh, and I spent most of my time finding adventure, filling up notebooks with every story that came to my head, and being reprimanded by teacher's for reading in class. My first fiction novel came out in January of 2017, and I release about every two months; so sign up for the newsletter to stay on top of things!

Feel free to send me an email or reach out over social media with any questions you might have, or just to chat!

Read More from Izzy Shows

www.izzysshows.com

SAVAGE DAWN

M.H. SOARS

All rights reserved under the International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

This is a work of fiction. Names, places, characters and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to any actual persons, living or dead, organizations, events or locales is entirely coincidental.

Warning: the unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this copyrighted work is illegal. Criminal copyright infringement, including infringement without monetary gain, is investigated by the FBI and is punishable by up to 5 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

SAVAGE DAWN

How do you win a war against an enemy you can't touch?

When a group of Arcadian explorers found clues leading to an ancient portal, they believed it would shed light on their past. None of them could have foreseen that their search for knowledge would unleash a powerful and ruthless enemy that sought to destroy everything in its path.

Stranded in a foreign country without means of communication, soul mates Samiah and Malachiax must find a way home. They embark on the most important journey of their lives, traveling through the harsh Arcadian desert where any mistake can be deadly. But the stakes are too high and there is no turning back.

PROLOGUE

Mora – Present day

Samiah woke with a start, the scream that invaded her dreams still ringing in her ears. Outside, the world seemed to have taken a golden tint, and looking at the clock next to her, she knew dawn was still far away. She leaned on her elbows and blinked a few times, trying to dispel the foggiest in her brain, until her nose registered the acrid smell of smoke.

Tandrum's wrath! The camp was on fire.

She scrambled out of her sleeping bag and reached for her boots first, keenly aware she might not have time to change clothes. Heat and thick smoke had already seeped through the tent canvas, slowly suffocating Samiah and her mate.

She turned to him and shook his shoulder hard. "Mal, wake up."

His eyes flew open, and when he focused on her face, his eyebrows furrowed in confusion.

"Sami? What's the matter?"

Can't he smell the smoke? Samiah let out a curse. She regretted now making him take Ariana's concoction for pain earlier. It had a lethargic effect, and she needed him sharp.

"Mal, come on. We gotta move!" She helped him up and he swayed on the spot. "Where are your boots?"

"Uh, I don't know."

She heard another scream outside as she looked frantically for Mal's shoes. She was tempted to let him go barefoot when she spotted the pair under his bag. She roughly shoved his feet into the mud-caked syno leather boots, not bothering to tie the laces. Once they ran outside, the graveness of the situation smacked Samiah in the face, leaving her light-headed and gripped by sheer horror. Fire had enveloped most of the tents. Gigantic flames curled and stretched upward, towering over them like a ruthless god of death.

Why is no one attempting to stop it? She wondered where the elementals in their party were. Her teammates Aron and Ariana would have been able to control the damage.

There was no time to dwell on questions. Samiah grabbed Mal's hand and tried to find her team members, but it proved virtually impossible to see anything through the choking fog. They managed to reach the center of the camp where everyone had congregated mere hours before, celebrating the group's discovery.

Samiah stopped in her tracks when she finally came across survivors. She couldn't believe her eyes, though. Every person in front of them was engaged in some sort of animalistic fight, snarling and clawing at their opponent. Samiah watched in dismay as a mob dragged and viciously beat to death a Jackur girl. The violence was so gratuitous and vile that it froze her on the spot.

"We have to do something," Malachiax said.

Yes, but what? Samiah thought. The two of them wouldn't stand a chance.

She turned once she felt someone at her back. Professor Shix, Samiah's mentor, was coming their way. In her happiness to see a familiar face, she failed to notice the pointy trowel in his hand. He raised his arm menacingly and Malachiax moved in a blur, placing himself in front of her and using his body as a shield. He tried to block the attack by raising his hands, but he wasn't fast enough and the trowel pierced his shoulder.

"Mal!" Samiah screamed.

Malachiax fought to subdue Professor Shix, who seemed to have acquired a burst of super strength. His face was devoid of any recognition. His nostrils flared and spittle had built up in the corners of his mouth. Malachiax pushed Professor Shix away, but the man was undeterred. He let out a guttural roar and charged Mal, who managed to move out of the way. Professor Shix came back at him and tried to punch the side of Mal's head. Despite his unnatural strength, the professor's movements were sloppy and Malachiax dodged his blows easily. But the loss of blood was taking its toll on him.

Samiah snapped out of her paralyzing fear and tried to find a weapon, anything to help her mate. She spotted a half-burnt log from the previous night's bonfire and dashed for it. It weighed more than she expected, though, and she didn't even know how it would help.

Her focus was brought back to the fight when she heard Malachiax scream in agony. An unwavering sense of protectiveness took over. She ran back, using the momentum to swing the log with all her strength. She wasn't aiming at Professor Shix's head, but somehow that's where the log connected. The impact sent him and Mal sprawling to the ground. Malachiax struggled with the dead weight on top of him, and it was only when Samiah drew near enough that she saw the damage she had inflicted. Professor Shix's skull was bashed in, pieces of his brain scattered on his clothes.

She dropped the log and covered her mouth. She couldn't believe what she had done. In the blink of an eye, she had killed the person who had always been there for her. A person who had inspired so many Arcadians and whom she had loved like a father. It didn't matter that Samiah hadn't meant to do it. A heavy weight settled in her heart and a knot lodged itself in her throat.

Malachiax's struggles brought her thoughts back to the situation at hand. Samiah shoved her guilt to a darker corner in her mind. She would deal with that later. Bile rose in her mouth as she pulled Professor Shix's body off her mate. The trowel was buried deep in Malachiax's shoulder and his face was scrunched in pain. Her heart twisted in agony as she touched his clammy forehead and cheeks with shaky hands. When Malachiax opened his eyes, Samiah saw her fear reflected there. He opened his mouth to speak, but Samiah pressed her finger to his lips. Talking would only cause him more pain.

She looked closely at the wound, and despite her lack of healer's training, she knew it was bad. Her hand hovered over the trowel, indecision clouding her mind. Her vision blurred, Samiah only realizing she was crying when she felt the tears roll down her face.

"Please, my love. Stay strong," she whispered.

Samiah's heart drummed inside her chest and she couldn't breathe. The trowel needed to be removed, but what if she ended up injuring Malachiax further? The urgency to flee the camp wasn't forgotten either. It wouldn't take long for them to be discovered by the crazed individuals they had seen. Samiah braced herself for what she must do, but a movement in her peripheral caught her attention.

She turned to it, moving her body so Malachiax remained behind her. She expected to see a person, not the dark, billowing smoke that emerged from Professor Shix's body. It briefly took the shape of a being before it zapped into her like an ice-cold spear. She fell to her knees and clutched her stomach. In that moment, she understood everything.

Chapter 1

Argor – Two weeks earlier

The small team of explorers had gathered around a crystal table, admiring the holographic images Professor Shix had sent them. Pictures and an unknown calligraphy stared at the group, and Samiah was still pinching herself. After so many years of exploration and dead ends, they had finally discovered something significant that could shed some light on their past.

The massive door of the Argamanx Royal Library opened with a loud bang, and Samiah glanced up in time to see Malachiax approach them with eager steps. Her heart skipped a beat as it always did when she looked at her mate. Everything about Mal drew Samiah to him. The mass of untamable curly hair, the strong chiseled jaw, the way he moved. An invisible thread linked them. They had been bonded a little over a year ago, and Samiah's feelings for Malachiax hadn't dulled one bit.

"We got it!" He shook the piece of syno paper in his hand. "Lord Droom has approved our trip to Mora."

Excited shouts erupted among the group, making the librarian on duty pull a face they promptly ignored. The library was empty. They weren't bothering anyone.

"Really?" Samiah reached for the official paper, not willing to believe until she saw the royal seal with her own eyes.

Years had passed since Professor Shix first discovered an ancient Arcadian scroll describing a portal to another dimension. Arcadians had only developed the technology to travel via connectors recently, about a hundred thirty-five years ago. So if what the artifact said was true, it meant their forefathers already had access to that technology, thousands and thousands of years before.

The scroll was extensively damaged, and nobody had been able to discern from it the exact location of the supposed portal. Many scholars believed the script to be a hoax and that to search for it would be a waste of time. But Professor Shix believed it was authentic, and Samiah did too.

Soon after the ancient script came to the surface, Professor Shix put together a group of explorers with the intention of finding the portal. As a former student, Samiah knew of Shix's brilliance and was one of the first to volunteer. Malachiax had been selected because of his affinity with earth, a handy ability as a pioneer. That was how they had met.

There Samiah was, dressed like a blind Sion had picked her outfit, her face practically glued to her com-slip, when the trim, handsome Argamanian with wild hair and scruffy jaw got into her personal space and introduced himself. His easy smile and the spark in his deep blue eyes had left Samiah speechless. Within moments of meeting, she knew she had found her person, someone with whom she shared a core-to-core connection, her soul mate. A rare and extraordinary occurrence in Arcadia.

Those memories brought a tiny smile to her face. She looked up and found Malachiax staring at her, trying to suppress a grin. Somehow, he knew Samiah's thoughts had strayed from their upcoming trip.

The site lay just outside of Mora, a country in the middle of the white, deserted plains of Arcadia. Two teams comprised of Morians and Jackurians had stumbled upon it more than fifteen days ago, and Samiah's team was still stuck in Argamania. Professor Shix, the leader of their group, had been traveling abroad when the site was discovered, and he had gone straight there. Samiah and Malachiax were forced to wait for their sovereign's approval.

That Lord Droom didn't like Mora's ruling family was not a secret. They weren't exactly enemies, but Argor's relationship with Mora had always been strained. If not for the explorers from Jackur, the collaboration would have never happened. For that reason, it had been extremely difficult to get approval to meet with the professor.

Malachiax hugged Samiah tight and she laughed at his enthusiasm.

"I think you need to go to your private quarters," Aron said with a serious frown, and Samiah fought the urge to roll her eyes. Must remember to respect my elders.

"Ignore him. He's just an old grouch." Ariana waved her hand through the holograms, making them disappear. She was Aron's younger sister and could get away with addressing him so. "When can we leave?"

"Our designated gateway will be ready for us in an hour, and I don't want to be late. Lord Droom can still change his mind," Malachiax said.

"Then we must get ready. Remember to pack light. It's warm in Mora this time of the year. We won't need our heavy coats." Ianox made that helpful observation like we didn't know that already. He was only a few years older than Samiah and Malachiax, but he loved to act as if he was so much more experienced.

"It might be warm, but I'm still bringing my insulation suit. You never know. It's always good to be prepared," Walani said as she typed something on her com-slip.

Walani's comment wasn't a surprise. Despite her sharp mind, she had a tendency to overthink everything. Samiah could attribute her peculiarity to her gift, but that wouldn't be a fair assessment. Not all one-glancers were that obsessed with details, after all, only maybe ninety-nine percent of them.

They left the Argamanx Royal Castle grounds soon after, using the elevator to go down the tower—where the center of Argor’s government was perched atop—instead of the castle’s gateway. They weren’t deemed important enough even though Malachiax was royalty. They headed to the Grand Gateway Station on foot since it was within walking distance; it would have taken longer to wait for a hover transport that could fit their entire team.

The Argamanian hub was a large compound made of the same translucent bricks as the castle. As Samiah stared at the building, she thought for the thousandth time how the construction would have been beautiful if it weren’t for the retractable metal dome ceiling that sat on top. This feature was reminiscent of old days when the building had been used to house airspeeds. Now the vast open room had rows upon rows of cylindrical bases they called connectors, closely monitored by specialized technicians.

The bases powered the gateways, which were high-frequency transport beams that linked Argamania to the rest of the planet. Since the implementation of that type of transportation, Arcadians had forgone airspeeds and archaic airglides for long-distance traveling. Samiah had never seen one in operation, for they had become obsolete before she was born, though there were still a few traditional modes of transport such as hover cars and the mammoth spacecrafts used for interstellar voyages.

Two royal guards were stationed at the entrance, carrying electroshock rods at their hips, a frown on their faces. The level of security at the station was over the top. It was as if Lord Droom was expecting an attack at any moment—from whom, Samiah didn’t know. They hadn’t had a war or even a small conflict in generations. Arcadia was a planet in peace.

The station was bare in the same sterile manner an industrial warehouse would be, with kramer sheet walls and krax stone floor. The use of krax was a precaution in case some crazy deviant decided to use a gateway without authorization. The stone neutralized Arcadian gifts—another sign of their sovereign’s paranoia. Samiah shook her head and pushed aside her dangerous thoughts.

When Samiah and her teammates reached the gateway bound to Mora, Commander Haarx was there, flanked by several of his Nox Elite soldiers. Not a single shred of emotion showed on their stony faces. He sneered as he gazed upon them, and a shiver of apprehension ran down Samiah’s spine. She feared Lord Droom had changed his mind and sent his minions to prevent them from going. The commander had been against their venture from the beginning for reasons unbeknownst to Samiah.

"Commander Haarx, is there a problem?" Aron asked.

The man ignored Aron, his dark gaze passing by Samiah before it landed on Mal. Those unnerving black orbs gave her chills every time.

"Just here to make sure you go where you're supposed to."

What an infuriating man. Where did he think we would go if not Mora? She ground her teeth.

He moved closer to Malachiax and whispered, "You may have won this round, boy, but I'll be watching you."

His words carried an underlying warning only a fool would ignore. Commander Haarx's hatred toward Malachiax was undeserved but not unexpected. Lord Droom favored Samiah's mate and had never once attempted to hide that fact. It wasn't only because he was Lord Droom's nephew. Malachiax possessed a charisma few could resist. His heart was bigger than the Tandrum's moon. But Mal's influence threatened Commander Haarx. He didn't want to relinquish even the smallest amount of his power over their ruler.

His ill disposition toward Malachiax wasn't the only reason Samiah was leery of the man. Something was alarmingly wrong with him. His aura was completely unstable, never setting in any particular color. Since she'd come into possession of her aura-reader gift, she never once encountered someone like the commander. Samiah's ability allowed her to see other people's aura and core. The aura was a representation of each Arcadian's nature; the core contained the key to their gifts. Commander Haarx's core was empty. He didn't possess a gift, which meant the Sacred Powers of Arcadia had not blessed him. Samiah had only shared this knowledge with Malachiax, but she'd always wondered if Lord Droom knew. She would rather believe their ruler was unaware, for how could they blindly follow a sovereign who put his trust in a soldier their own planet hadn't deemed worthy?

Commander Haarx's soldiers stepped aside but remained close enough that Samiah's team had to walk single file. This particular gateway was a small one and could only transport four people at a time. Samiah traded glances with Malachiax and without needing to read his mind, she knew what he was thinking. Lord Droom had selected a small gateway to show how much he didn't care for this mission.

For each journey, a unique key was required in order to avoid unauthorized traveling. The technician typed something on her com-slip and a moment later, Aron's and Ariana's com-slips beeped. Samiah and Malachiax went first with Ariana. The others would have to wait until the connector recharged to follow them.

They weren't beamed to the main gateway station in Morang but to the temporary one set up near the discovery site. As soon as Samiah stepped off the connector, the hot, arid air of Mora assaulted her skin. The orange sun reflected on the white rocks around them, making the temperature rise even higher. She put her shades on to protect her eyes and felt immensely better. She looked sideways at Malachiax and caught him grimace. The brightness bothered her prism-colored eyes, but Arcadians with deep blue and green eyes like Malachiax always suffered more. He would be developing a headache in no time.

He hated coming here. Not only because of the weather but because he couldn't see the beauty in such a barren land. Samiah, on the other hand, thought Mora's rough landscape was extraordinary. During the day, it was pretty much sand and rocks, but at night the nightbloomers would make an appearance, and what a sight. They only existed in Mora. They were trees and other plant life that stayed buried in the ground during the day and only emerged to the surface when the three Arcadian moons appeared in the dark sky. Their trunks and leaves glowed in different colors. Even the fruits had a translucent sheen to them.

"I hate Mora," Ianox said loudly behind us. He had the diplomacy of a catling.

"Keep your thoughts to yourself, Ianox," Ariana said. "We don't want to cause an incident with the Morians because you have the need to be honest all the time."

Ianox scowled but kept quiet. With their party complete, they started the downward path to the main camp. From their vantage point, Samiah could see the gray tents spread in a wide circle right in front of a vast rock formation. On those rocks, the explorers had found the primordial script and drawings that matched the one on the ancient scroll.

As soon as they entered the settlement, Professor Shix found them.

"Thank the Sacred Powers you're here. I've been going crazy trying to reason with the Morians. I need a quorum, and the Jackurians have no gumption."

"Professor Shix!" Ariana exclaimed, pretending to be appalled. She wasn't fooling anyone; her feelings toward the professor were known across the galaxy. Only the object of her affection seemed unaware of her devotion.

"See, it's not only me." Ianox dropped his bag and wiped his face with the back of his hand. He looked winded after a downhill walk. Samiah couldn't imagine how he was going to make the same trip up the mountain.

Malachiax chuckled and offered Ianox a canister of water. He was too nice. Half the time Samiah wanted to throttle the silly man. He was a know-it-all pain in their rears.

Professor Shix led them to a huge tent that seemed to be the center of operations. Inside, a group of people surrounded a small crystal table in the middle of the enclosure. Language and symbol experts stood, analyzing the same holograms Professor Shix had sent them.

Walani didn't waste any time, dropping her bag and pushing her way through to the table. Without acknowledging the presence of the other professionals, she took her com-slip out and started to work right way. Social skills weren't her forte, but most one-glancers were like that. Samiah's opinion was that the inability to forget anything overwhelmed their brains, and to balance, they didn't bother to interact with people.

Samiah looked closer at the group and their auras appeared for her. She wasn't surprised when they were enveloped by slight variations of indigo blue. It meant they were seekers and highly intuitive individuals.

She turned to Professor Shix. "When can we see the scripture wall in person?"

"Ah, Samiah, always so eager. Let me introduce you to Lady Lochiana of Morang first. She was the one who discovered the wall."

Samiah's jaw dropped. She couldn't believe she was meeting the living legend. Lady Lochiana was one of the most renowned explorers in Arcadia. She had made her fame discovering new planets and being part of first-contact missions. She had abdicated the throne of Mora to be an explorer.

Rumor said she had ditched Lord Droom days before their bond ceremony in order to go on a mission to an uncharted galaxy. It would explain why he hated the House of Morang so much.

Lady Lochiana was a beauty who turned heads everywhere she went. Her hair was the lightest shade of pink and it tumbled down her back in luscious waves, contrasting nicely with her flawless gold-brown skin. She was an aura-reader, so her eyes were prism-colored like Samiah's, a trait all aura-readers shared.

"Hello, Samiah. Nice to meet you." Lady Lochiana cocked her head and narrowed her eyes before her smile brightened. She had seen something in Samiah's aura that pleased her.

Aura-readers couldn't see their own auras, so Samiah was burning with curiosity, wanting to know what she had seen. Lady Lochiana's aura was light lavender, which denoted vision and imagination. No wonder she was such an excellent explorer. If Samiah concentrated, she would be able to see the color of Lady Lochiana's core, where her gift resided.

"It's such an honor to meet your ladyship in person," Samiah said after finally finding her voice and making a tiny curtsy.

Lady Lochiana waved a dismissive hand. "Please, drop the formalities. I gave up that life a long time ago. Here, I'm simply Lochiana." She glanced at Professor Shix. "I keep trying to make him drop the 'Lady' bit, but he's a stubborn man."

"I'm way too old to start learning new habits. No matter what you say, you will always be Lady Lochiana to me." Professor Shix gave her an elaborate bow in jest, which made Lochiana laugh.

She turned to Samiah. "Come. You must be eager to see our discovery. And bring a hovering chair."

When they reached the massive boulder and stopped in front of a somewhat smooth wall, Samiah thought they were taking a break. Odd since they had just left the camp. Lochiana ignited her chair and sat down, not bothering to use the sun reflector. Samiah traded looks with Malachiax, who seemed as confused as she felt. Maybe for different reasons, though.

"Why are we stopping?" Samiah asked Professor Shix.

He frowned at her. "Because we have arrived." He placed his hovering chair next to Lochiana's and sat down as well.

Silence descended upon the newly arrivals. Samiah studied the wall in front of her, but nothing was there.

Am I missing something?

"This is it? Where are the drawings and script?" Ianox asked.

Samiah caught Professor Shix exchange a knowing glance with Lochiana. They were keeping something from them.

"Should we tell them?" Lochiana asked, a glint of mischief in her eyes.

"Nah, it's better if they don't know. I want to see their reaction."

"Know what?" Ianox dropped his bag and put his hands on his hips. His aura flared red and Samiah had to blink a couple of times to pull her gift back. It was hard to pay attention to the current situation when auras distracted her.

"If you want to know, you'd better wait and see." Professor Shix leaned back and stroked his chin, the corner of his mouth twitching up.

Samiah rolled her eyes. Professor Shix loved surprises, and sometimes he acted like he was still a youngster. She had learned to accept his ways a long time ago. Unfortunately, Ianox didn't have a learning curve.

There was nothing for it but to follow Professor Shix and Lochiana's example. They ignited their hovering chairs, sat down, and waited. Samiah felt bad for Malachiax. Even with the shades and the sun reflector, he was extremely uncomfortable. She reached for his hand and laced their fingers together. He looked at her and smiled, making Samiah's heart kick up a notch. His hair was getting long, she noticed. He would be able to bind his wild curls fairly soon. For now, he kept his dark hair off his face with the help of the syno leather headband he had stolen from her.

"What do you think the professor is keeping from us?" he whispered near Samiah's ear, raising the tiny hairs on the back of her neck.

She shook her head and tried not to think of the effect Malachiax's proximity was having on her. "It could be anything. I'm just eager to see whatever it is we're waiting for."

They waited a long while. Samiah even dozed off; the many sleepless nights she'd spent obsessing about the ancient scroll finally had caught up with her. When she woke up, she could feel a change in the air. It was sort of a humming just above the skin, like the air was charged with electricity.

Lochiana had perked up on her seat. She kept looking at her com-slip and then back at the wall. The sun had almost completed its descent on the horizon, and soon the first moon of Arcadia, Maya, would appear in the sky.

Malachiax must have sensed the same thing, as he stood and walked closer to the massive wall in front of them. Samiah followed him and, for some unknown reason, felt compelled to touch it. At first, she didn't feel anything. The surface was warm from the sun, as it should be. But then something changed. It was very subtle at first, but as it progressed, it was impossible to ignore. The rocky surface was growing cold at an abnormal speed.

"Mal, feel this."

He touched the stone wall and looked at her, alarmed. "It's freezing. How can it be?"

Samiah drew her hand from the wall when it started to turn glacial. She took a few steps back and pulled Malachiax with her. The wall began to shimmer, and like a vision, words and drawings appeared on it. They glowed in the same manner the nightbloomers did, but it felt wrong somehow.

She got a sense of foreboding and shivered. Malachiax draped his arm over her shoulder.

"Isn't it spectacular?" Professor Shix exclaimed from somewhere behind them.

Walani, who had joined their party at some point, looked intently at the wall. Then she turned to Lochiana. "The scripture only appears once a day, and never at the same time?"

"Yes, though so far we haven't been able to discern a pattern. It doesn't seem to be related to the sun's or moons' cycles. It only appears near nightfall. That much we were able to gather."

"It might be related to changes in temperature and humidity levels." Walani typed something on her com-slip.

"Yes, it's possible. Unfortunately, we didn't have a strong air elemental until now." Lochiana's gaze fell on Ariana.

Ariana crossed her arms and looked annoyed. "Well, if you hadn't kept us in the dark, I could have already paid attention to those factors."

"Ah, and what fun would that be?" Professor Shix hugged Ariana sideways, and she melted into his embrace. "Besides, I'm not concerned with the time the scripture appears. I want to know what it says. If it's a portal, how do we open it?"

"Oh, it's a portal. I'm sure of it," Walani said, and all eyes turned on her.

"You've already cracked the code?" Professor Shix asked, almost jumping up and down.

"Not completely. But see that symbol there?" She pointed at the drawing of a round image. It looked like a half-open shutter. "It appears on the ancient scroll and next to it the word 'portal' in an archaic version of universal Venusian."

"No, it doesn't. I've looked at the ancient scroll a dozen times, and that symbol is not there. I'm certain." Ianox crossed his arms and pinched his mouth.

Walani's lips twitched upward as she typed something on her com-slip. A holographic image shot up from her device. The quality of the hologram wasn't as good as if seen from a crystal table, but it was clear enough. In that image, they could see the symbol Walani had referred to. The catch was that the symbol hadn't been there before.

"How is that possible?" Professor Shix took a step forward and touched the symbol on the hologram.

"Remember when I mentioned that those random blank spaces through the scroll didn't make any sense? Well, I ran the scroll through the carbonox machine—"

"You did what?" Ianox took a menacing step toward Walani. "You could have ruined it!"

"If a paralyzed mummy like you had done it, yeah, there was a high chance that would have happened," Walani shot back, and Ianox's complexion slipped from pale white to red, his brown eyes squinting hard over his large nose. Calling someone a paralyzed mummy was akin to saying someone didn't have a single functioning brain cell.

"Okay, that is enough." Professor Shix came between Walani and Ianox.

Samiah would have laughed if she hadn't witnessed this a thousand times before. Ianox and Walani hated each other and were quite outspoken about it.

"Did Professor Shix have you check everyone's aura before they joined his team?" Lochiana whispered to Samiah.

She sighed. "Unfortunately, no. I wish he had, though. For a wise man, he doesn't believe in antagonizing auras. I would have vetoed Ianox in a heartbeat. His aura is too brown."

Lochiana nodded. "It never bodes well for a team to have a self-absorbed member. Ianox holds too much anger and blames the world for his shortcomings. If only he realized that anger is what's keeping him from achieving his full potential."

Samiah was left speechless. Lochiana had seen all that with only a glance at his aura? Noticing her stupefied stare, Lochiana continued. "My gift is very strong. I can see more than auras."

Suddenly, the discussion between Ianox and Walani no longer seemed that important to Samiah. "What did you see in mine?"

Lochiana put her hand on Samiah's belly, surprising her. "You hold new life."

Chapter 2

The scripture and drawings faded from the wall as soon as Zidriel, the second Arcadian moon, joined Maya in the sky. Samiah and the group went back to camp. She couldn't wait to be alone with Malachiax and share the news. She never expected it to happen so soon. The mechanics of conceiving life were the same for Arcadians as for any other animal, but it only happened when the planet decided it was time. It usually didn't occur until couples had been bonded for more than a few years.

The process was an intrinsic flow of energy that connected all of them to the planet's core. The gift of carrying life was bestowed by the Sacred Powers of Arcadia, the true prevailing power. Arcadians didn't need to worship gods or goddesses like they had seen in many otherworld civilizations. Everything they needed was provided by their planet, and they cherished it instead.

Samiah and Malachiax's tent was situated toward the edge of the camp, far away from all the comings and goings of the many explorers gathered. Professor Shix knew the weather of Mora was going to bother Malachiax and he would need peace and quiet to recover. Once inside their temporary refuge, Samiah handed him Ariana's concoction. It would help him with his headache, but Malachiax shook his head stubbornly.

"Please, don't make me drink this. You know I hate the side effects."

"The side effects are better than to be in constant pain, Mal." She forced him to take the bottle from her hands, but he still didn't drink its contents.

"Maybe later." He threw the bottle on top of his sleeping bag.

"Why are you so stubborn?" Samiah crossed her arms and frowned at him.

Malachiax gave her his famous lazy smile that turned her insides to mush before he moved closer. He placed his hands lightly on her forearms and gazed down. His dark blue eyes had tiny specks of light gray and looked like a miniature galaxy. His violet aura had a tinge of red. In Malachiax's case, it meant passion, not anger. He grazed Samiah's skin with his fingers with a feathery touch, eliciting a soft moan from her lips. She uncrossed her arms and rested her hands against his hard chest, feeling how fast his heart was beating. He leaned down and placed a light kiss on her neck, making her shiver.

"I saw you in deep conversation with Lochiana. Did she say anything about your aura?" he whispered near her ear, and she had a hard time forming coherent thoughts.

"She did." Samiah dropped her hands and laced their fingers together. Then she guided their joined hands to her abdomen and waited for his reaction.

Malachiax's eyes widened before he looked down. She saw his posture turn rigid, and then his head snapped back up. Samiah's heart drummed loudly in her chest as she waited for him to digest the news. She knew it was big and unexpected, and she became consumed with an irrational fear that he wouldn't be happy about it. Then she caught a tentative smile building on his face as the surprise sank in.

"You're expecting?"

She nodded, unable to form words. Malachiax's tentative smile broke into the biggest grin she had ever seen. He crushed Samiah's much smaller frame against his as if he wanted to drown in her. She felt him shake as he rested his chin on the crook of her neck, and she hugged him tighter, letting the emotion of the moment take over. Malachiax kissed her neck and her jaw before trapping her face between his hands. Tears had already left trails on his cheeks as he stared at Samiah with bright eyes. Her vision was blurry, but she tried to keep her own tears from falling. If she started crying, they would both be a sobbing mess.

"I love you," Malachiax said before he kissed her.

Samiah laced her fingers behind his neck and pulled him closer, but it never seemed to be enough. She felt the heat in her core spread through her limbs, and her legs could barely hold her upright. She staggered backward, mouth still fused with Malachiax's, when the ground began to shake. She pulled back, breaking the kiss.

"Mal, control yourself." She faked a stern look.

"How can I? This is the best news you could have ever given me. It's worth a little shaking."

He kissed Samiah again and the world outside their tent ceased to exist.

The next morning, Samiah met Lochiana under the food tent. Malachiax was still asleep when she left, and she didn't want to disturb him. The renowned explorer raised an eyebrow when she looked at Samiah, then smiled knowingly. Samiah felt a warmth spread through her cheeks and reconsidered her initial excitement at being in the same room with another aura-reader. Goodbye privacy.

"So, you've told him?" Lochiana filled her plate with a couple of red star-shaped fruits.

"Naturally." Samiah followed her example and got a serving of the same delicacy. They didn't have that in Argor.

They picked an empty table, and after a moment, Lochiana spoke again. "You're so lucky. I envy you."

Samiah almost choked on her food. "Why?"

Lochiana's gaze traveled past Samiah's shoulder and went out of focus. "It's so rare to find one's soul mate. I've always envied those who did. "

"But you've been betrothed before," Samiah said and immediately regretted it. That was gossip, and she didn't know if it would offend Lochiana somehow.

She gazed down and a low-spirited smile appeared on her face. "That's true. And the sad part was that I loved him."

"So why didn't you go through with the bonding ceremony?"

Lochiana looked up, and the melancholy in her eyes put a damper in Samiah's happiness. "Because I realized he wasn't my soul mate. When the opportunity came to explore an uncharted galaxy—" She paused and glanced down at her food. "—it trumped all my feelings for him. If he had been my soul mate, the wish to stay would have been greater."

Samiah nodded, pretending she understood. Soul mates were almost a myth in Arcadia, so no one even took that into consideration when they decided to bond. Lochiana said herself that she had loved Lord Droom.

"Do you regret it?"

"Not in a million years. We discovered a cousin planet of Arcadia in that mission. I would have regretted if I hadn't gone."

"You mean Planet X-57?"

"Yes. The natives call it Planet Earth, which is odd considering more than half of its surface is covered in water."

"I've read about it. I would love to go some day."

"You will. So, do you already have names picked out for them?" The change of subject was so sudden that it took Samiah a moment to process Lochiana's words.

She dropped her fork when she did. "Them?"

"I sensed two life forces in your womb." Lochiana smiled.

Samiah put her hands on her belly and stared at it in wonder. Malachiax was going to be ecstatic, more so than he already was. Twin births in Arcadia were considered a high honor. For it to happen to them so soon meant Samiah and Malachiax were truly blessed. Waiting for the ten months was going to be torture. Samiah was so engrossed with the news that she only noticed Mal's arrival when he sat next to her and kissed her cheek.

"What?" he asked. He must have seen the elation on her face.

Samiah told him, and he made such a big fuss that soon the entire camp was aware of their news. By the time they were finished receiving handshakes and congratulatory hugs, Samiah's face hurt from all the smiling. The excitement even helped Malachiax with his headache because that day, he didn't grimace once in pain. On the contrary, he seemed more chipper than ever.

Samiah and Malachiax settled in the camp's routine. They would do research and explore the area during the day, and as night approached, they would gather in front of the wall to wait for the scripture to appear. Days ran together, and Samiah was frustrated and tired with the lack of results. Despite Ariana's power, they still hadn't been able to discern a pattern. And no one had gotten any closer to discovering how the portal worked. They already knew the language on the wall was old Venusian, but it still didn't make any sense. Samiah's mood grew worse when Malachiax came to her one day with more bad news.

"What is it?" she asked the moment he sat next to her. His jaw was clenched, his lips pressed into a white slash.

He propped his head up with a fist and handed Samiah his com-slip. She read the message twice to make sure her eyes weren't deceiving her. Lord Droom's patience had expired, and he demanded their return to Argor immediately.

"But we can't. We haven't made any progress," she said.

"Do you think he cares? I think word got out that Lochiana is here. He's just doing it out of spite."

"He can't be that petty. They broke off their commitment so long ago. He's happily bonded to your aunt."

"The entire planet knows he doesn't love her. He bonded with Aunt Lini to save face. I don't hold that against him. After all, my aunt has always known his true love is Lochiana."

Samiah couldn't believe Lord Droom would put that slight from the past above Argor's interests. But that was the only explanation why he would demand their return so suddenly. They couldn't defy him. Argor was their home. Lord Droom could exile them if he wished.

"What are we going to do?" Samiah asked, not hiding the anxiety in her words.

"I can stall him for a couple of days. Tell him there's a problem with the gateway here. He'll know I'm lying, but he won't do anything. At least, I hope he won't."

She glanced at the wall and took a deep breath. "That means we must find answers soon."

Chapter 3

The news of Lord Droom's request spread like wildfire through their small team. Aron and Ariana were upset, but resigned. Professor Shix said he was going to stay no matter what. If Lord Droom wanted to exile him, so be it. Lochiana offered asylum to anyone who wished to stay and finish the project. It was a tempting offer to Samiah, but with Malachiax's condition, it wasn't something they could contemplate.

The next day, everyone worked harder. No one wanted to miss the moment the ancient portal was finally opened. But as usual, nothing new was gained during the day. Ianox in particular was taking the lack of progress harder than anyone else. He had bickered with Walani earlier and stormed off to an unknown location.

Near nightfall, almost the entire camp was gathered in front of the mysterious boulder, waiting for the magic to happen. Ianox came in late, and Samiah noticed he couldn't walk straight. When he got closer, she could see his eyes were bloodshot and his breath reeked of Razor's Blood, a powerful mixture that dulled the senses and made people act stupid. For all the Sacred Powers, he is indeed a paralyzed mummy, she thought with a scowl.

He stumbled and almost knocked her down, aggravating her even further. She wanted to punch his throat, but she contented with only pushing him away.

"Watch it."

"Aww, look at darling Samiah, already all protective of her little ones."

Malachiax grabbed Ianox's arm and turned him around. "What are you doing?" He wrinkled his nose. "And what have you been drinking?"

Ianox pulled his arm from Mal's hold and took a few wobbly steps back. "None of your damn business."

"How can you do this, Ianox? You're embarrassing us," Malachiax said through clenched teeth.

"Oh, forget him. He's an embarrassment no matter what," Walani said from her position closer to the wall.

Ianox turned on the spot and glared at Walani's back. Samiah's power kicked in and all she could see was the red glow around him. She was annoyed that Ianox's sudden changes of mood kept triggering her gift. She usually had better control over it. She had to concentrate to stop seeing his aura. When he came into focus again, she noticed his hands were balled into fists at his side, his lips curled into an ugly sneer.

He bent down and Samiah realized what he intended to do a moment too late. The rock flew from his hand with incredible speed and accuracy for someone who was physically impaired. It missed Walani's head by a finger and only because she tilted her head out of the way to look at something on the wall. But instead of bouncing against the hard surface, the rock embedded itself in the stone. Ianox's strength surprised Samiah. He wasn't a fan of physical exercises.

Walani's head snapped up. She looked at the pierced wall and then squinted in Ianox's direction.

"Did you just try to hit me?" Without waiting for his answer, she walked toward Ianox with purpose. The wall started to shimmer behind her but she didn't notice.

"You bet your ugly face I did." Ianox moved with the intention to meet Walani halfway, and Samiah braced for the fight that had been brewing for months.

Half the explorers stared in disbelief at the commotion Ianox and Walani were causing. The other half stared at the wall. Samiah didn't know what to do. Ianox's aura had turned a shade darker, and to her dismay, Walani's aura didn't look much better.

She mumbled a curse and wished she could gag Ianox somehow. If only she had the ability to persuade the fool to stay out of trouble. But the common Arcadian gift to influence others only worked on some alien races. For it to work on Arcadians, the gift would have to be dominant, and she didn't know anyone who possessed that.

Mal stepped between them. "Stop this nonsense immediately!" He raised both arms to keep them apart.

"He tried to hit me with a rock. The coward!" Walani attempted to reach Ianox, but Mal was stronger than she was.

"That was what you deserved," Ianox shot back.

Professor Shix seemed too enthralled by the wall to intervene, but Aron and Ariana came to the rescue. Aron pulled Ianox away and Ariana did the same with Walani. The girl went willingly, and as soon as she realized the scripture was visible again, Ianox and the rest of them ceased to exist.

Ianox kept fighting Aron, but the man squeezed Ianox's arm harder. "Either you stop this spectacle or I will be forced to restrain you."

Ianox lost his steam and calmed down for the moment. He might be slightly out of control, but he wasn't stupid. No one wanted to mess with Aron. His control of fire was legendary.

Relieved that the situation seemed to be more or less taken care of, Samiah turned to the wall. There was something peculiar about it in that moment, and excitement rushed through her veins. The scripture and drawings were the same but they glowed a different color—deep red, like blood. Walani raised her hand to touch it and something in Samiah made her want to warn her teammate against it. Samiah wasn't going crazy, for Lochiana grabbed Walani's hand before she did and pulled her back for good measure. She must have sensed the wrongness emanating from the wall as well.

The scriptures and drawings started to move, blending in a swirl and spinning so fast they soon disappeared altogether. It looked like contained energy going in circles. Gasps and shouts erupted from many, one-glancers stood hypnotized, and the more sensible explorers started to move away. As the spinning reached an impossible speed, it seemed the wall behind started to collapse inward, only to do the opposite in the end and explode toward the group. The force of the shower of stones knocked down those closest to the wall as the cascade of debris fell on them. A foreign, high screech followed the explosion, freezing Samiah's blood and making her want to cry. It kept ringing in her ears even after the wind had carried the sound away. After that, utter silence remained.

A suffocating fog created by dust enveloped them, making it impossible to see. Sandy film settled on Samiah's skin, hair, and clothes. Washing it all off is going to be fun. A purposeful, light breeze helped disperse the grimy haze. Once it was cleared, Samiah saw Ariana a little bit ahead of them with her eyes closed and brows furrowed in deep concentration. Samiah's attention turned to the wall, or what was left of it. Where moments before there were glowing scriptures, now there was a gaping hole. A midsized airspeed would have been able to fit through. Inside the newly opened cave, the darkness was so absolute not even the light from the moons could penetrate it.

A one-glancer from Jackur took a step forward with the clear intention to enter the unknown void when Professor Shix's voice boomed in the valley.

"Nobody moves."

He walked past the Jackurian and stopped in front of the cave entrance, so close that if he raised his arm, it would disappear inside. He looked up and down and at each side to assess the situation, then stared ahead and scratched his chin. After a moment of consideration, he retrieved his com-slip from his vest pocket and pointed it toward the cave. A blue laser beam shot out, followed by a very faint beep. Professor Shix's shoulders hunched forward before he pocketed his com-slip again. He walked backward, maybe afraid to turn his back to the huge emptiness in front of him.

"Yoni, prepare the AXPs. Nobody goes in until we have received data from them."

Samiah wondered what kind of information Professor Shix had acquired with his com-slip to make him so wary. He took Lochiana aside and had an agitated conversation with her. Samiah observed them with rapt attention, the flickering of their auras reflecting their tense body languages. She was burning with curiosity but knew her mentor wouldn't share anything with the team until he had solid information.

The entire camp started buzzing about with purpose. Gone was the apathy from before. Samiah didn't think anyone noticed Professor Shix's peculiar reaction to the opening of the portal. Neither she nor Malachiax could do anything until the Artificial Explorers came back safe and sound.

They decided to return to camp and wash off the grime. She knew there would be a big celebration by the bonfire that night—what had happened was huge and exactly what they had been waiting for—but somehow, she didn't feel like celebrating. Her heart constricted painfully in her chest, and a sense of foreboding hung heavily above her head.

Once Samiah and Malachiax were back in their tent, he grabbed her hand and made her look at him.

"Samiah." Her name was but a whisper on his lips. He caressed her cheek and captured her gaze with his mesmerizing eyes. She knew exactly what he wanted to say. As explorers, their jobs were to use the portal once it was opened. Now he didn't want her to go. The risk was too high. She felt the same way toward him. But is it fair to ask him not to go?

"Mal, I'm afraid. I thought discovering the portal and opening it would have a different effect on me. I have a bad feeling about it, though, and I can't shake it off."

Malachiax hugged her, and she rested her chin on his shoulder while he stroked her back. "Don't worry. I'm not going anywhere. Not until we know it's safe."

Not what Samiah wanted to hear but exactly what she knew he would say. Malachiax let go of her and ignited a hovering chair. He sat down and leaned back, closing his eyes. His face was tense and his eyebrows were furrowed. She knew what it meant.

"Did you take Ariana's concoction?" She came up behind him and started to massage his scalp.

"No, and I don't want to."

"Mal, I know you're trying to hide the amount of pain you're in. Please, if not for yourself, do it for me. I can't stand to see you suffer."

Samiah moved from behind him and knelt next to his chair. He turned his face in her direction and seemed to contemplate her words. She held his gaze until he sighed in defeat. "You know I can't say no when you put it like that."

She rested her head on his lap, enjoying the feel of his warmth against her cheek. Malachiax ran his fingers through her hair, and Samiah closed her eyes, savoring the moment. She held the world in her hands. She had found her soul mate, the Sacred Powers of Arcadia had blessed them with two little ones, and she had accomplished so much in her career already. By all rights she should be elated, not feeling the awful dread swirling in her chest. She let her mate see what was in her heart with a push of her thoughts into his mind. In silent agreement, they decided to skip the celebration.

Chapter 4

Mora – Present day

Samiah was disoriented. One moment she was sound asleep next to Malachiax, and the next, she had killed her mentor. She couldn't hold on to her thoughts. Memories of her life flashed without order and disappeared, like they had never happened. She was losing herself, and she didn't know how to stop it. She couldn't feel her body either. What is happening? Where is Mal? she thought in panic.

His name brought a recent memory to the forefront of her mind. Malachiax's face when she told him about the twins. Samiah grabbed it like a lifeline, an anchor. The swirl inside her head ceased, and she became aware of her surroundings. Her breathing was labored, and numbness had spread through her body. She felt some dark and twisted thing trying to get hold of her conscience again, seep through her memories, and distort everything. But she was aware of its presence now. She wouldn't let it destroy her essence. It was a battle of wills, Samiah's conscience against the malign presence. She fought hard until her head felt like it would explode, but she never wavered; she had too much at stake. She needed to save her family.

The alien entity raged and screamed inside her head. It was pure evil, thriving on destruction and despair. It was lost in its madness, and it wanted to take Samiah there too. There was so much suffering. How could anyone be put through this and not go insane? But Samiah refused to be its victim. She thrashed against its hold, her nails digging into the rough ground. My body will not be possessed. My mind will not be controlled. Not tonight, not ever, she chanted loudly in her head. With a final, determined push, she purged the being from her body.

She lay there panting and wide-eyed for a brief moment until Malachiax's face hovered above hers.

Oh no. Mal. Has the alien wraith possessed him? A lump the size of the Tandrum moon formed in her throat. She didn't think she had it in her to fight the love of her life if he had been taken. But Malachiax's concerned gaze told her he was still himself.

"Sami, talk to me."

She took a couple of deep breaths before she sat up.

"I'm okay." There was a metallic taste in her mouth, and she realized it was blood. She had bitten her own tongue.

Samiah scanned Malachiax's face, and his paleness drove another sharp knife to her side. She gazed down at his shoulder and discovered the trowel was gone. Blood flowed freely from the wound. No wonder he looked like a ghost.

"Mal, we need to bind that."

His head snapped up. "There's no time. Come on, let's go."

The urgency in his voice spurred Samiah into action. She got up and turned to look behind her, then wished she hadn't. The frenzied mob had spotted them and was coming their way. They ran as fast as they could, but the camp was still on fire, and billowing smoke was everywhere. Soon the mob was gaining on them. Malachiax glanced back and without slowing down, he made a brusque movement with his arm. The ground shook and split in two just behind them, growing bigger as the jagged fissure ran toward their pursuers. Those people were so crazed that not a single one noticed the ground open under their feet.

Some of the enraged explorers managed to hang on to the edge of the massive hole, their fingers digging deep into the uneven ground, trying to find leverage. Samiah hesitated when she recognized Ariana and Walani among them. She tugged Malachiax's hand, making him stop and look at her.

"Mal, it's Ariana and Walani. We must help them."

His gaze traveled over her head and a muscle ticked in his jaw when he saw them. He pressed Samiah's hand harder. She turned around in time to see the section of the ground where Ariana and Walani were hanging from break away and crumble in the abyss.

"No!" She took a couple of steps in their direction, but Malachiax pulled her back.

"They're gone, Sami. I couldn't keep the ground from collapsing. I'm sorry." His words were laced with sadness and guilt.

She turned to face him. "It's not your fault. You didn't know they were there."

He nodded once, and they resumed their escape. They needed to get to the gateway. They rounded a corner and came upon Aron creating circles of fire with his hand and laughing like a madman. Now they knew who had started the fire. They skirted around him, trying not to draw attention to themselves. Samiah was torn between fleeing and finding a way to help Aron. If she could purge the alien being from her mind, so could anyone. In the end, the will to survive and protect her family won.

She pulled Malachiax in the opposite direction, but he stopped in his tracks.

"Mal, you can't fight Aron. He's gone mad, and you're not strong enough to take him down."

"Sami, I know. But look, he has Ianox trapped. I can't simply leave him behind."

Samiah looked beyond Aron and his rings of death and saw a hunched figure on the ground. Cowering. She couldn't be certain, but it looked like Ianox. And he wasn't possessed—he was terrified. Malachiax was right. They couldn't leave Ianox behind to be burned to death by Aron.

Samiah couldn't add to her growing guilt.

"We have to help him," she said finally.

"Do you think he has gone insane too?"

"No. If he were, he would be fighting back, not trembling in a corner."

Samiah's logic appeared to make sense to Malachiax, as he raised his arm and concentrated hard. Nothing happened, not even a slight tremor. That wasn't good. The loss of blood must have taken its toll on Mal. Samiah was grateful for her gift, but she couldn't deny that being an aura-reader put her at a disadvantage in life-or-death situations. She searched frantically for any kind of weapon, but the only things she found nearby were small pebbles.

Ianox screamed when a ball of fire set his sleeve ablaze. He rolled on top of it and managed to put the flames out. His face was distorted in pain, and his eyes were bulging out of his skull. Aron continued to laugh maniacally. He pulled his arm back, ready to send another fireball at Ianox, when Malachiax tackled him to the ground.

"Mal!" Samiah screamed.

The impact sent them rolling until they ended up near a tent that had turned into a giant torch. Aron straddled Malachiax and had his neck in an iron grip, squeezing the life out of him. Samiah, in a feeble attempt to save Mal, swung her bag at Aron's head, but he didn't even glance her way. She might have hit him with a fluffy pillow; there was nothing inside it to make any substantial damage.

She dropped the useless object and attempted a choke hold on her friend. He finally let go of Malachiax to deal with her. He grabbed her arms and flames erupted from his hands. Samiah let out a bloodcurdling scream, for the pain was excruciating. She had never felt anything like it. Her knees buckled as she tried to pull away from Aron's fiery grip, but he held on. He was going to keep burning her until all that was left were her charred bones.

Samiah closed her eyes and tried to soar above the pain. Impossible. She opened her eyes and searched for Malachiax. She wanted to see him one last time before the fire consumed her whole.

Chapter 5

Femror wasn't a Draki who believed in things such as feelings. As the alpha warrior of their clan, he trusted his muscles and sharp mind above anything else. Feelings and intuition were nonsense frivolities more in line with his half sister's abilities. However, Femror couldn't shake off the strange pang in his chest when he woke in the middle of the night. It was an acute pain that made his dual heart pick up in pace.

He threw his legs off the dried moss pallet on which he slept and sat up. He rubbed his chest as if by doing so, the ache would go away. No such luck. He got up, knowing going back to sleep would be impossible, and walked out of his tent to relieve the sentry of his duty. He would take the night watch's shift.

Femror had been sent by his father to patrol the harsh desert plains of Mora without being given a reason why. Not that he needed a reason. His father was the king; and blood relation or not, Femror had sworn to obey his sovereign without question.

Santor, the sentry on duty, glanced up when he felt his general's approach. "Couldn't sleep?"

"No. Anything out of the ordinary?" Femror let his enhanced sight scan the vast plains, but the land was deserted aside from them and the scattered nightbloomers.

"No." Santor tried to suppress a yawn unsuccessfully.

Femror was about to tell his warrior to rest when an orange glow on the horizon caught his attention. His entire body tensed. Santor noticed the change in his leader and followed Femror's gaze.

"Bloody moon. What do you think that is?"

Femror flared his nostrils as he took a deep breath. He smelled it immediately, the sharp tang of blood spilled and death.

"Raise the others."

Santor didn't need any further instruction from his leader before he dashed back to the Draki camp and raised the alarm. Femror returned to his own tent to grab his shield and spear. Trouble was in the Valley of Lakra. He now regretted not pushing his party further until they reached the sacred site. He hoped the trouble had nothing to do with the portal, but he wasn't foolish enough to place his fate and the fate of his warriors on wishful thinking.

Reaching inside his traveling sack, he retrieved the small vial of Razor's Blood. He had enough to last a couple of days. Putting the vial back, he closed the sack, tying it around his waist. He wouldn't drink the dark liquid until he deemed necessary.

Once Femror stepped outside his tent, he found his warriors ready and waiting for him. There were only fifteen of them, not nearly enough numbers to contain the evil that lurked behind the magic seal placed on that rock wall thousands of years ago. If it had been unleashed, may all the gods protect them.

“We ride fast and hard. We don't stop until we reach Lakra.”

“Our mounts are fresh. We should reach the valley before Maya vanishes from the sky,” Santor said.

“Good. If you see Arcadians acting in an erratic manner, don't think twice—drink the potion.”

Santor's estimate had not been wrong. Femror and his warriors made it to the Valley of Lakra in record time and soon discovered the glow on the horizon had been caused by a massive fire. Ruthless flames consumed every surface in their path, even materials that by the law of nature shouldn't be flammable. It told Femror the fire in front of him had to be the work of a bloody elemental. He cursed under his breath as he and his warriors skirted around the raging inferno toward the portal. He would have continued without stopping if some invisible thread had not pulled his attention toward a different direction. Femror stopped and focused his sight toward that odd pull.

Santor stopped by his side and asked, “Do you see something?”

“I'm not sure. Lead the others toward the portal. We must make sure the seal is still intact.”

The Draki warrior obeyed Femror without question and soon disappeared out of sight. Femror didn't know what kept him rooted to that spot, waiting, but he remained there until he saw a figure dash between the flames in the valley below. The pull or whatever it was became stronger, and before Femror could stop to think what he was doing, he jumped toward the raging fire, landing in a crouch, and followed the unknown Arcadian.

The hot smoke made visibility scarce, and not even his enhanced eyesight could penetrate the barrier. Soon Femror couldn't see who he was pursuing anymore, relying solely on that invisible thread.

The smoke became less thick when he reached a clearing. He could see perfectly who he had been pursuing without reason—an Arcadian female—and his entire world went off-kilter.

Femror's blood pumped in his veins and a low, guttural sound emanated from deep within his throat. It was the Draki mating call. Femror balled his hands into fists and willed his body to remain rooted to the spot, even though his primal instincts demanded he grab the female in front of him and take her to safety. He couldn't do it, though.

She looked over her shoulder and searched in the darkness. Femror couldn't let her see him, so he called on his powers and blended in with the background. Her gaze narrowed when it landed on the spot where he was, but she saw nothing. Femror swallowed hard when he took stock of her stunning face. He had never seen anything more devastatingly beautiful in his entire existence.

The Arcadian female took off again, and Femror went after her, like a hunter following his prey. He couldn't help himself. He never thought it would happen to him, not after all those hundreds of years since he'd achieved maturity and none of the female of his own kind stirred in him anything but physical desire.

It didn't matter. Femror Alabaki, prince of the Draki and leader of the most fearsome army of warriors in the entire land, had found his mate.

Chapter 6

Aron let out an enraged roar and Samiah found herself free. But the pain remained. She crawled backward in time to see her teammate attempt to punch someone. She didn't stop to see who Aron was fighting with but looked for Malachiax instead. Finding his sprawled form ahead, her heart stopped beating for a second. She flipped on her belly and slithered toward him, the progress terribly slow. Grinding her teeth, for the burns on her arms were torturous, she pushed through the pain because nothing mattered in that moment besides Malachiax.

Samiah finally reached his feet and attempted to pull him away from the fire. She cried out when she couldn't and lowered her head to the ground, defeat caving her chest in. Getting out alive seemed like an impossible task now.

She sensed someone crawl next to her and was caught by surprised when she found Ianox there. He didn't say a word before he wrapped his hands around Malachiax's ankles and moved him away from the raging blaze.

"Is he alive?" Ianox asked in a small voice when Samiah joined him.

"I don't know."

Samiah would have checked Malachiax's vitals if she could use her arms. The color had completely drained from his face and she feared the worst. Ianox, for once, took the initiative and pressed two fingers against Malachiax's neck.

"He has a pulse. It's weak, but it's there."

Samiah let out a shaky breath and thanked the Sacred Powers. But the noise of battle made her aware of her surroundings again and the sense of urgency returned. They needed to get out of there. She noticed that whoever attacked Aron was winning the fight. It didn't give her a sense of security, though, only made her warier. She caught the shape of a leg move in a blur and connect with Aron's midsection. He stumbled backward, tripped over her forgotten bag, and fell against the burning tent. Hungry flames immediately engulfed him. He screamed and thrashed, but the more he moved, the more tangled he became with what was left of the structure. If he had been himself, he would have been able to control the fire.

When his attacker came into view, Samiah's heart sank. Lochiana had just killed Aron, and now she was coming for them. Samiah put her body between Malachiax and the woman, but the attack never came. Lochiana knelt next to Malachiax instead and with the gentlest touch felt his pulse. A moment passed before she looked at Samiah.

"He has lost too much blood. We need to move him fast."

"Y-you are not possessed. How is that possible?" Samiah asked.

"Oh, they tried. But my will is too strong for them. Can you two move?" Lochiana glanced at Ianox.

He nodded and with Lochiana's help, they managed to drag an unconscious Malachiax all the way up to the temporary gateway. The distance wasn't great, but with the extra burden and Ianox's lack of stamina, it took forever. That they didn't come across any more possessed explorers was a miracle.

When they reached the gateway, Lochiana didn't waste any time and ignited the connector. Once they stepped on it, the air surrounding them began vibrating at rapid speed, the pressure building. The world around them disappeared, and all Samiah could see was pulsating light. She knew they weren't going back to Argor, not without the codes. She also doubted Lochiana had any desire to see Lord Droom again. Where they were going didn't matter. As long as Malachiax got the help he needed, they could end up on another planet for all she cared.

The journey lasted no more than a minute. The pressure around them stopped suddenly, and Samiah had to take a step forward to keep her balance. Arrivals through gateway traveling were never smooth. They stepped off the connector into a small courtyard. There were several stucco wall buildings covered by ground-creeping woody plants and connected by clear glass tunnels. Small orb lights illuminated the space. In another time, Samiah would have thought the place cozy.

Lochiana ran ahead, her footsteps not making any sound on the soft purple naigon grass. She disappeared through a sliding door, leaving Samiah, Malachiax, and Ianox behind. Mal remained unconscious, his prone form propped between Samiah and Ianox.

Samiah looked up at the sky and noted she could no longer see Maya, which meant dawn wasn't too far away. And what a savage dawn it will be. She knew the morning sun wouldn't bring any hope, only shed light onto despair.

The sliding door opened again, and Lochiana came running out, followed by two royal guards and a short woman with bright red hair wearing a healer's robe. Malachiax was quickly placed on a hovering bed that floated next to the healer. When the woman put her hand directly above Mal's chest, a light purple glow emanated from her open palm. The examination only lasted a few seconds. Without glancing at Samiah or the others, the healer took Malachiax away. Samiah ignored her companions and followed the woman. She didn't plan to leave her mate's side.

The healer took Malachiax through a pair of thick, translucent doors, but when Samiah tried to follow, she was stopped by two giant Morians who blocked her path. Both had short blond hair, strong jaws, and necks as thick as trees. They were almost identical, probably siblings.

"You can't go in there," one of them said.

"Watch me." Samiah tried to go around them, but the one who had spoken blocked her. She narrowed her eyes. "Get out of my way or I'll make you sorry."

She knew her bold words meant nothing—she could barely stand on her own two legs—and yet she stared hard at the Morian blocking her path.

"You're covered in filth and in need of healing yourself. You can do nothing for your mate. He's in good hands," the second Morian said.

He had kinder eyes, but they did nothing to soothe Samiah. The need to go after Malachiax was still there, unrelenting. She felt a hand on her shoulder and found Lochiana by her side.

"They're right. Healer Xarma is the best in the country. You don't need to worry about Malachiax. Despite the blood loss, his injuries have not affected any vital organs."

"How do you know? Are you a healer too?" Samiah couldn't keep the bite from her tone.

Couldn't they understand? It killed her to be apart from Malachiax not knowing the extent of his wounds.

Samiah was still glowering at Lochiana when the other woman's irises began to swirl. She didn't understand what was happening at first, but once she felt the rage dissipate from her veins, it finally dawned on her. Lochiana was compelling her. Samiah was shocked. How was she able to do that? Wasn't aura-reading Lochiana's dominant gift? Despite those questions bouncing in her head, there was also a huge sense of betrayal. She couldn't believe Lochiana would do such a thing to her. She thought they were friends.

Samiah wanted to look away and sever the link, but it was too late. Quickly and surely, she felt the anguish seep from her body. Without so much worry toward Malachiax occupying her mind, she could feel the searing pain on her arms at its full strength. Also a new kind of concern became present. Her babies. Samiah put a protective hand over her belly—despite how much it hurt for her to do so—and in that gesture, she gave her condition away.

After being led to another room by one of the giant Morians, she didn't fight him when he began his examination. After scanning her body from head to toe with the soft glow from his hands, he asked Samiah to sit down. She felt immediate relief when her body sagged against the plush chair. She hadn't realized how drained her body was.

The healer came to Samiah carrying a bowl with greenish balm in it, and Samiah braced for more pain. It didn't happen. Instead, her arms became numb as soon as the healer covered her wounds with the paste. She couldn't recognize her limbs any longer. They looked exactly like two sad pieces of burnt log. Eerily similar to the log she had used to kill Professor Shix. A lump formed in her throat again. Samiah wanted to cry for her mentor, for all those they had lost, but she couldn't allow herself to do it. If she let the tears fall, she wouldn't be able to stop crying. She had to remain strong.

"What's your name?" Samiah asked her attendant to distract herself.

"Eniax." He had in his hand a little prick pen that he used to take a sample of Samiah's DNA.

He connected the pen to a crystal screen. Then Samiah watched it do its magic. Bleeps and random images she didn't understand appeared on the screen. A moment later, Eniax retrieved a tray that contained two very thin, almost transparent films. Artificial skin was Samiah's guess.

"Now this part might be a bit upsetting. It won't hurt, but it's okay if you want to close your eyes."

"I want to watch. I won't throw up. I promise."

Eniax stared at Samiah as if he didn't believe her. She didn't know how bad it would be, but she doubted it would be more gruesome than seeing Professor Shix's brain scattered all over the place. Samiah soldiered on and kept her eyes open.

Eniax had been right. This part of the procedure was not pretty. He had to scrape the burnt skin and muscle away. The damage on her limbs was so extensive that once he was done, she could see her bones. Next, Eniax grabbed a syringe with blue liquid inside. When he injected it in the muscle that was left on Samiah's arms, it stung a little, despite the balm. She bit her lower lip and winced. Eniax threw her an apologetic glance and quickly applied the artificial skin over her burns. To secure them in place, he wrapped her arms with healing cloth.

"The injection will make your muscles regrow. By nightfall, the healing should be complete. You might feel a certain discomfort for the next Tandrum's moon cycle. I'm going to check your baby's vitals now." He attached a clip to Samiah's finger, and almost immediately, the images of Samiah's babies appeared on the screen. They were only tiny little dots, but she could see the pulsing of their hearts. Samiah became overwhelmed with a foreign feeling. It was elation, love, worry, and a sense of protectiveness, all bundled in a messy package that settled in her heart. Her eyes prickled and she held her breath.

Eniax looked up from the monitor and turned to Samiah. "Two?"

She nodded, unable to speak.

"I have never seen it happen to someone so young. You and your mate must be very special."

Samiah let out a shaky breath before speaking. "I don't know about me, but Mal is most definitely special."

Malachiax didn't stay long under Xarma's care, but it took him a few hours to wake up again. Samiah was waiting by the side of his bed, watching his chest rise and fall, when he opened his eyes and blinked a couple of times. For the first time since this whole nightmare started, Samiah's heart kicked up a notch in happiness, not despair. She nudged Malachiax's arm with her still sore hand, prompting him to turn his head in her direction. Confusion and sorrow were etched in his night-sky eyes.

"Sami? What happened?"

"You don't remember anything?"

"I do have memories, but they don't make any sense. It feels like I just woke up from a horrible dream." He pulled a face when he tried to turn his body. "I guess it was real, then."

"Yes, it was all real. I still haven't processed everything."

"Our crew? Are they all gone?" His voice was choked, and Samiah's heart clenched in response.

"Yes, we and Ianox are the only survivors. Plus, Lochiana."

Malachiax swallowed hard. "How?"

Samiah told him everything, and it felt like a barb twisting in her side to see guilt take over Malachiax's expression. He was so good and so thoughtful that, no matter her reasoning, he would always carry the burden of their friends' deaths with him.

When Samiah related her experience with the alien wraith, she saw the gradual horror shadow Malachiax's gaze. She explained the wraiths were lost souls that had been trapped in a prison so long ago that time had ceased to mean anything to them. Misery and destruction were all they knew. It was impossible to tell how many had come through the portal, but both of them knew they needed to act fast before more Arcadians fell prey to the evil beings.

"What do we do now? How do we fight them?" Malachiax asked.

Samiah didn't know the answer to his questions. How could anyone fight something so intangible?

A knock on the door kept Samiah from voicing her fears. It opened a fraction and Ianox's face appeared through the crack.

"How are you feeling?" He directed his question at Malachiax before he came into the room with careful steps.

Ianox had cuts and bruises on his face, and his left arm was wrapped in a thin gauze just like Samiah's. There were no signs of arrogance in his demeanor, only uncertainty. Samiah focused on her gift and realized immediately that Ianox was depressed. His aura was a light gray color instead of brown.

"A bit sore, but nothing I can't handle," Malachiax answered.

Ianox's gaze wandered restlessly and unfocused before it stopped on the bandage around Mal's shoulder. He swallowed hard and brought his hands together in a fidgety motion. "I want to thank you for saving my life."

"I didn't. Lochiana did," Malachiax was quick to point out.

"No, it was you. You were hurt, yet you still fought for me. I'll be forever in your debt."

Samiah saw in her mate's eyes that he would counter that logic until he turned purple.

"Have you heard from Lochiana?" she asked.

Ianox shook his head. "When can we go home?"

"I'm sure by now Lord Droom and the council are aware of the situation. We must contact them to obtain the codes for the gateway," Malachiax replied.

Ianox made a motion to retrieve his com-slip from his pocket only to realize he didn't have it. He went in search of one, but he never returned.

Chapter 7

Lochiana pushed aside her guilty feelings as she strode toward the Morang castle. This was the second time she had used her compulsion gift against an Arcadian. The first had been an accident when she was a youngster and hadn't known she possessed the ability. She never spoke of it, never confided in anyone that the Sacred Powers of Arcadia had blessed her with two dominant gifts instead of one. She knew, even at that young age, the dangers such an ability could bring.

The guards stationed at the front gates stiffened in surprise when they noticed her approach. Lochiana didn't visit the royal palace often, always preferring to stay at her small apartment on the outskirts of town when she visited Morang. Her childhood home evoked too many memories she'd rather forget. The guards, in their defense, recovered from their surprise fast and promptly opened the gates for her. Lochiana might have abdicated the throne, but she was still royalty in their eyes. She would never get rid of that unwanted mantle, no matter how hard she tried to lead a commoner's life.

"My lady, are you all right?" one of the guards asked when she came closer.

She looked down at her clothes, which were now covered in soot and blood. She could only guess what her face looked like.

"No," she answered sharply. "We are under attack. Lock the gates and summon the captain. Time is of the essence."

It was the first time the guards had heard Lochiana speak with such an imposing tone. She had always been friendly and approachable, even before she decided to explore the stars. Her parents had called her eccentric. But now she sounded just like her father. The guards traded an alarmed glance between them before the tallest of the duo tapped the silver band around his wrist. Lochiana didn't wait to listen to him deliver her message, continuing the trek to the palace.

Once inside, she stumbled upon Margriet, her former lady-in-waiting. The young Morian let out a shriek before composing herself and making a tiny curtsy. The girl hadn't aged much since the time she served Lochiana; then again, out of all the Arcadians, Morians were the ones with the most delayed aging.

Lochiana ignored the formality and the fact that it was still too early for any palace worker to be running about. "Where are my parents?" she asked.

“They went to the lake estates, milady.” Margriet stared at Lochiana with wide eyes and when Lochiana let out a curse, the poor girl turned bright red.

“Find me a com-slip. I need to get in touch with them as soon as possible.”

Lochiana’s sharp tone made Margriet snap out of her stupor, and she finally noticed Lochiana’s appearance.

“Forgive me asking, milady. Did something bad happen?”

Lochiana paused and debated telling Margriet the truth. She couldn’t handle if the girl went into hysterics; she had enough on her plate as it was. In the end, she decided that not warning Margriet would do more harm than good.

“Yes, something terrible has happened. Find help and make sure all doors and windows in the palace are shut and locked. I’m also expecting the guard’s captain. Please take him to the assembly room and ask him to wait for me there. I’m going to change.”

Margriet eyes turned even rounder than before, but she nodded and dashed off down the corridor. Lochiana didn’t know if trusting the girl had been a wise decision, but she didn’t have time to go in search of another palace worker. She wanted to remove the grime from her skin before she met with the royal guard’s captain. It wasn’t a vain sentiment—she didn’t care about her appearance, at least not in that moment—but the soot all over her was a reminder of the horrible things she had done. She had killed a man. Even if deep down she knew bathing wouldn’t remove the stain on her soul, she couldn’t bear the sight or the scent. She smelled like death.

She found the hallway on the second floor empty. The sun was just beginning to rise on the horizon and most of Morang’s palace household was still asleep. With her parents’ absence, there was no need for workers to start their chores at the break of dawn.

Right before Lochiana opened the door to her chambers, she felt a presence looming behind her. Her breathing hitched as she looked over her shoulder, but she found no one there. It was the second time that day she had felt the eerie sensation of being observed. You’re beginning to act like Margriet, she thought, irritated, and shook her head. She couldn’t let the evening’s events turn her into a paranoid mess. If she let fear conquer her, she would never be able to go on another exploration mission again. She entered the room and locked the door behind her. Prudence is not the same thing as paranoia.

Lochiana’s eyes scanned her peach and gold chamber, and her mind was taken to another era. Her heart twisted sharply as her gaze settled on the wide bed and Lord Droom’s image came unbidden. It was there he had taken his revenge. It was there her love for him had died.

Irritated at herself for letting those memories take hold, she spun around and started removing her soiled clothes as she walked to the bathroom. Once there, she eyed the tub longingly. Soaking her stiff muscles in warm water sounded marvelous, but she didn’t have the time for such luxury. She opted for a hot shower instead.

Soon the bathroom became enveloped by steam, and Lochiana couldn’t hear anything beyond the sound of the jet of water over her head. Distracted, she didn't notice when the door to the bathroom opened. She only realized she wasn't alone in the room when she saw a shadow move ahead, followed by a guttural sound.

Lochiana's heart kick-started. She jumped to the side just before whoever had invaded her privacy pounced with a roar. Skidding on the wet stone floor, she hit her hip against the edge of the bathtub, letting out a yelp. She didn't let the sharp pain deter her, though; she just kept running until she was back in her bedroom again.

A weapon. I need a weapon. She frantically scanned the room but couldn't find any object that could inflict damage before her attacker followed her. Lochiana spun around and widened her eyes when she saw Margriet there. Only it was no longer the shy girl staring at her but a creature with bloodlust in her eyes. Lochiana shuffled back until her spine pressed against the dresser.

"Margriet. You can fight whatever has taken hold of your mind. I've done it. You can too."

Lochiana's words had no impact on the girl. Margriet curled her lips and growled like a wild animal. Lochiana's pulse pounded in her ears as she reached behind her, searching blindly for anything to use against her former lady-in-waiting. Her hands curled around a perfume bottle just before Margriet came at her once more. Lochiana waited until the last possible moment to move out of the way, and the young Morian girl crashed against the piece of furniture.

Lochiana didn't look back as she made a dash for the door, then stopped when she caught her naked reflection in the mirror. She wasn't a prude, but she couldn't possibly brave the outdoors without any layer of protection. She veered toward her old armoire instead, hoping she would find more than pretty gowns in there. Yanking the double doors open, she cursed when all she saw were delicate and sparkly attire.

A noise behind her made Lochiana look over her shoulder. Margriet was standing again, her body poised to strike. Without thinking, Lochiana pulled her arm back and threw the bottle of perfume with all her strength at the girl. It hit Margriet's shoulder, not her head where Lochiana had been aiming. Without taking her eyes off Margriet, Lochiana reached back and grabbed the first piece of cloth her fingers brushed against before running to the door. Her feet skidded to a halt when she found the way blocked by the most magnificent and frightening being she had ever seen.

Her brain worked furiously to process the information her eyes were conveying. The male in front of her looked like something straight out of a book of myths and legends. He was taller than she was by a head and with a chest almost as wide as the span of the door. His skin was the color of a crystalline lake and covered partially by translucent scales. The corded muscles on his neck and alpine arms revealed pure power, and if Lochiana had to guess by the number of weapons strapped to his body, he was some kind of warrior.

He glanced at her face before his gaze dropped to take in her nakedness. His jaw clenched. Lochiana clutched the dress tight against her chest in an attempt to cover herself and glared at him. The warrior's gaze snapped back to her face, and Lochiana became ensnared by his golden yellow eyes despite being annoyed at him. His eyes were so foreign and yet so beautiful.

A snarl brought her back to the present. The warrior's attention diverted from her to Margriet, who was still poised to attack. His entire frame seemed to tense before he pulled a dagger from the belt around his hips and, in a blur of movement, threw it in Margriet's direction. The weapon found its mark, embedding itself to the hilt on Margriet's stomach. She let out a bloodcurdling scream as she clutched her belly and fell.

"No!" Lochiana screamed and took a step in the girl's direction. That was a killing blow.

The warrior grabbed her arm and pulled her back. "There's nothing you can do for her. She's been taken."

Lochiana whipped her face toward the intruder and leveled him with a glare. "She could have been saved. You didn't need to aim to kill."

He narrowed his eyes and clenched his jaw. "Yes, I did. Now come. We don't have much time. I'd like to be out of this city before madness descends." He started pulling Lochiana toward the door, but she was having none of it. She planted her feet to the floor and tried to pull her arm from his grasp. Try being the operative word, for the warrior had her in a fierce hold.

"Let go of me. I'm not going anywhere with you."

The warrior glanced at her with a glint of impatience in his eyes, as if Lochiana were a little child.

"Would you rather stay here and fight your possessed servants instead?"

His words made Lochiana's heart clench so painfully, she could barely breathe. Her stomach bottomed out and the fire in her veins diminished. "They have all been taken?"

The warrior nodded, his eyes flashing with an emotion Lochiana couldn't understand. Dropping her gaze, she stared at his chest instead. She thought about her new friends, Samiah and Malachiax, and her heart broke. She wanted to cry for them, for all the devastation she had already witnessed, but if she succumbed to despair and sadness, she wouldn't be able to function.

"You can't wear that." The warrior's voice brought Lochiana back to the current situation.

"Excuse me?"

The stranger let go of her arm and went to peruse the armoire. "What's all this nonsense? Don't you own any sensible clothes?"

Lochiana narrowed her eyes at the warrior's back. "I don't live here anymore, and those clothes are the ones I left behind." She didn't know why she felt the need to tell him that.

He made a strange sound in the back of his throat before he pulled a tog-styled beige dress and lobbed it in her direction. "This one will have to do."

"Who do you think you are to order me around?" she spat back, even though the dress he had selected was indeed a better choice than the black, heavily embroidered number she had grabbed before.

He turned around and seemed to grow taller somehow. "My name is Femror Alabaki. I'm prince of the Draki.”

“The lizard people,” Lochiana whispered in awe. “You’re real, then.”

Femror’s eyes turned to slits and his lips became a thin flat line. “Don’t ever use that word around me.”

Lochiana didn’t mistake the threat in his tone, but she refused to be intimidated by the warrior. She narrowed her eyes and squared her shoulders. “What are you going to do if I do?”

He cocked his head and the corner of his lips twitched up. “I might have to kill you.”

Chapter 8

A persistent, horrible sound of metal scratching against metal woke Samiah. She had fallen asleep on the chair next to Malachiax's bed. Somehow, her head had dropped on top of his stomach, and the odd angle had made her neck stiff. In the left upper corner of the room, an intermittent purple light kept flashing silently. The hairs behind her neck rose. Something wasn't right.

"Mal, wake up." She shook him gently.

His eyes popped open, before he sat up fast, on high alert.

The desire to flee came to her suddenly, like a powerful wave crashing against the shore. They were here. She knew it in her bones.

"Come on, Mal. We have to go."

Malachiax didn't question her motives or the urgency in her tone. He quickly got out of bed and put his boots back on. There was nothing to be done about the stupid clinic clothes. Samiah opened the door carefully and found the common room in complete disarray. Crystal screens were shattered. Desks and chairs lay broken, spread hazardingly throughout the space. In a corner, she found the source of the noise that had woken her—a partially broken cleaning droid kept bumping against the metal rod of a desk.

"What in the world happened here?" Mal asked.

"I can't believe we slept through all this." Then she remembered. Eniax had mentioned the balm for pain would make her drowsy after a couple of hours. She didn't realize it would knock her out completely. "Come on, let's find Ianox and get out of here."

They found him still asleep in the first room they checked. Samiah woke him a bit too roughly while Malachiax attempted to use the crystal screen to access the relays. When he cursed, she knew he had failed.

"Ianox, did you manage to speak with anyone in Argor?" Malachiax had a com-slip in his hand, but the crease on his forehead told Samiah the device was also useless.

"Yes, I spoke to Commander Haarx. He was supposed to send me the code."

"Did he?" Malachiax had his finger poised over the com-slip.

"Not before I fell asleep."

Malachiax scrolled and typed away, but after a moment, Samiah saw the hope vanish from his eyes. His face twisted in anger before he threw the com-slip hard against the wall, shattering it in a hundred tiny pieces. For Mal to lose control like that, the frustration must be too great. Samiah felt like breaking something to smithereens too.

"Are you crazy? How are we going to call for help now?"

With his hands balled into fists, Malachiax looked at Ianox. "There's no calling for help. The relays are dead. We're on our own."

Ianox curled his arms over his head and his eyes appeared pained. He was panicking, and that wouldn't help anyone. They needed to move.

"Okay, let's think. We don't know how bad the situation is outside, but I'm assuming the worst. Based on the level of destruction we saw at the camp, there is a very low probability we'll be able to reach the main gateway station undetected. We don't have the code to go to Argor, and the gateways might not be operational anymore," Samiah said.

"We could maybe use a rover transport," Ianox said.

Malachiax shook his head. "They were never meant to be used for long-distance traveling. They won't work outside the city parameters."

"What are we going to do, then? Are we trapped here?" Ianox hugged himself and started to sweat profusely.

"We're not trapped," Malachiax replied. "We'll find a way to reach Argor, even if we have to walk all the way there."

"We'll never make it!" Ianox screamed.

"Be quiet, Ianox. Or do you want to be found by a possessed Morian?" Samiah snapped.

Upon searching Ianox's room, Mal found a small thermo sack inside one of the storage cubes. That was the only thing useful there. They went back to the common room and made their way carefully through the debris. It appeared the whole place was abandoned, but at that point, they couldn't assume anything. They tried to search fast and efficiently. The compound wasn't large, and only the common area had been vandalized. That helped. They didn't find any real weapons, but they stocked up on clinical supplies and parcels of food and water.

Samiah detached the metal leg of a desk and swung it in front of her a couple of times. It was a bit too long to be practical but not too heavy to be burdensome. It would make a fine improvised weapon. Malachiax and Ianox followed her lead and acquired similar items themselves. They were headed toward the main exit when a thought occurred to her.

"Wait."

Malachiax and Ianox were ahead of her and turned around.

"What is it, Sami?" Mal's grip on his metal rod increased as he searched their surroundings.

"Ianox, did an alien wraith try to possess you last night?"

Ianox blanched. "No, I don't think so."

"And after I purged the being from me, it didn't try to possess you either, Mal."

"What are you getting at?" Malachiax's stance relaxed a bit.

"I'm trying to pinpoint the reason both of you were spared. And the only common denominator last night was that you were both impaired. Ianox had lost his mind to Razor's Blood, and you had taken Ariana's concoction for your headache."

She saw understanding cross both their faces.

"And today, we were heavily sedated during the attack," Ianox said, showing enthusiasm for the first time since last night.

"I have sedatives and balm for pain, but it's not like we can use them without cause. We won't make it very far if we keep falling asleep," Malachiax pointed out.

"So our first priority is to find Razor's Blood," Samiah stated.

Both men traded glances, and Samiah bristled, feeling left out. "What?"

"Sami, have you ever had Razor's Blood?" Malachiax asked.

He knew the answer to that, but she indulged him anyway. "No, what's the big deal?"

"Well, the first problem is it won't be easy to find. Morians, as a general rule, are not fans of the beverage."

"Well, I know that." She crossed her arms, hating that Malachiax was lecturing her in front of Ianox. "But Jackurians love it. If we can find a store that caters to them, I'm sure they will have it."

Ianox put his hands on his hips. "And how do you propose we find such a store without access to a working com-slip? We're bound to come across a frenzied mob for sure."

"Fine, we won't search for it here. We'll head to Jackur and stock up there. Meanwhile, you'll just have to sedate yourselves," Samiah said.

"Jackur is out of the way, Sami. Plus, Razor's Blood affects each person differently. You saw what happened to Ianox last night."

Ianox had the decency to hang his head in shame.

"Well, it's better than being possessed. I can fight against the wraiths, but it's obvious that I'm a minority. It's too risky, Mal."

They had a staring contest, but Malachiax looked away first. He gazed down and let out a heavy sigh. "Fine, we'll head to Jackur. There is a chance they haven't been attacked yet."

He rummaged through the supply sack and grabbed a glass container with green pills in it. He took one out and broke it in three pieces. When he offered Samiah a section, she shook her head. "I'm not taking it."

Malachiax's face hardened. "Yes, you are. After all that talk about risks and whatnot, do you want to go out there unprotected?"

She touched his outstretched arm and stared deep into his eyes. "Mal, it already tried to possess me, and I fought it off. I can do it again. I swear. One of us needs to remain clearheaded."

His lips stretched in a thin line, and Samiah could hear him grind his teeth. He finally put the third piece back in the container, scowling at her the whole time.

"How do we know how much will be enough to keep them at bay?" Ianox asked.
Samiah turned to him. "We don't. That's why we need Razor's Blood."

Chapter 9

As Durgin lay on his bed, staring at nothing, he could still see his brother's face. Terrified. Confused. In the final moments, clarity had returned to his gaze, even if his twin's face was no longer a carbon copy of his. Thick, dark green veins protruded from his enlarged forehead, and his deep purple irises had a red ring around them. Kramer straps kept Drex tied to the metal slab, and the one around his neck had already left dark bruises.

Drex grabbed Durgin's wrist and, without words, begged him to end his suffering. Durgin clenched his jaw hard and shook his head, even knowing he was his brother's last hope of final peace. Drex grunted and stared at the clock on the wall behind Durgin. They didn't have much time; the head scientist would soon return, and Durgin would never see his brother again.

He'd done it then. He'd entered his brother's mind and turned off the switch, staying longer than he should only to watch the lights from the pulsating brain cells dim one by one until nothing was left but utter darkness. Durgin hadn't let himself cry until he was back in his chamber; then he did so for hours, allowing himself to drown in guilt and sadness. But once the tears had dried up, he vowed to not shed a single one ever again over his dead brother. What was done was done.

Durgin heard a commotion outside his quarters and jumped out of bed. Crossing the living area with long strides, he opened the door to the hallway just in time to see Argamanx guards rushing by. Commander Haarx, the leader of the prestigious Nox Elite and his father's right hand, brought up the rear. He noticed Durgin standing there in the hallway and slowed down. His lips curled into a sneer the man reserved especially for Durgin whenever he was alone in his presence.

"My lord." He bowed his head like it pained him to do so. Durgin knew it did.

"What's going on, Commander?"

The soldier narrowed his eyes at Durgin and clenched his jaw. Durgin smirked in return as he leaned against the cold pearly wall. Commander Haarx was a mountain of a man, and one would say it was stupidity to the infinity power to antagonize him. But Durgin had a penchant for living on the edge. It was the only explanation.

The deep lines and creases on Commander Haarx's face were the only giveaway of his age. Pushing six hundred years old, the commander was in top physique. One look at his bulky arms would have anyone cowering.

“One of the Dimidium escaped, my lord. We’re gathering all guards at our disposal to bring him down before he can do any more damage.”

Dimidium. Durgin hated that word. It was what his father’s scientists called their experiments. A burst of bitter laughter threatened to escape his mouth, and he bit the inside of his cheek to keep it bottled in. If only Commander Haarx knew Durgin was also a Dimidium. But Lord Droom had kept that information to himself; no one knew besides his white-coat minions that he had experimented on his own offspring. Durgin had been the successful outcome, Drex the failure.

“One Dimidium against the entire Argamanx Royal Guard?” Durgin said, overdoing the condescending tone. “He must be some specimen.”

“He’s not a specimen. He’s a beast!”

Durgin winced at the commander’s outburst. Tell me how you really feel, why don’t you? Commander Haarx had made no secret of what he thought of Lord Droom’s experiments. Was he afraid that his father’s hellions would one day replace Commander Haarx and his precious Nox Elite?

Durgin had never seen him lose his composure like that. He had struck a nerve, and he’d better take advantage of it. He stared at the commander with one eyebrow raised and cleared his throat.

The soldier finally became self-aware, and his face closed off again. “Forgive me, my lord.”

“I don’t understand the fuss. It’s not like he can go very far unless he can fly.”

The Argamanx Royal Castle stood on a hundred-story tower, and there were only a few ways to exit the estate. None of them would be viable options for the fugitive. Without a special code, the gateway was useless. The old system of lifts was still in use but heavily guarded. And the last option would be to plunge into Serenity Lake and certain death.

Commander Haarx frowned. “Of course we’re not worried he’ll escape. We’re concerned about the safety of our civilians. Who knows what that aberration might do to our people?”

Durgin had to concede to the commander’s point. Not all Dimidium were violent, mindless beasts, but there had been a few incidents involving the most unstable specimens. What if the one that had escaped was such a case?

“You should come with us, my lord. We could use the help, and your father would be so pleased.”

Durgin wasn’t fooled by Commander Haarx’s sudden respectful tone. This was more than a test—it was a challenge. And Durgin could never back down from one. The last thing he wanted was to spend quality time with the commander and his cronies, but he had to make sure the lab’s escapee was indeed a menace. Durgin knew Commander Haarx would strike first and ask questions later.

Durgin followed Commander Haarx through the maze that was the Argamanx Royal Castle. The hallways’ perfect translucent walls were covered by many pieces of extraordinary artwork in overly elaborate gilded frames. There was barely any space between them, as if every former resident had added to the collection and never disposed of anything. The opulence had always suffocated him.

They came outside into the never-changing balmy weather, and the first rays of dawn peeked into the sky. They met with the Nox Elite soldiers in the royal gardens where the palace’s private gateway was located. Durgin received a stiff and reluctant head bow from them. A few of the soldiers sneered, doing little to disguise their opinion of him. They all believed Durgin was an overly entitled royal who didn't have to work for a thing in his life. Durgin snorted. If only they knew the ugly truth.

The group of soldiers was gathered around Lancer, Commander Haarx's son. He and Durgin were about the same age, but he looked much younger. He had an open and friendly face with an air of innocence that served him well. People easily trusted him, and in his line of work, that was a great asset to have.

"I don't believe it. He's already at the outer edge of Argamania." Lancer glanced at his com-slip.

"That's impossible." Commander Haarx grabbed the device from his son and stared at the screen for a few seconds. Durgin was confused himself. How had the Dimidium managed to escape the tower and cross Serenity Lake so quickly? Unless he knew how to fly, which brought an entirely new string of problems.

Without wasting any time, they stormed the palace's gateway, scaring the technicians who were present. They used every connector available, traveling in groups of four. Within seconds, they were beamed to the gateway on the outskirts of town. Excitement coursed through Durgin's veins as they ran beyond the boundaries of Argamania, despite the nature of his mission. He had become quite the recluse after Drex's death. He hadn't realized how much he missed the physical exertion, the challenge.

There was a clear division between the center of the city and its outskirts. The beautiful houses that made Argamania one of the most treasured cities in the world gave way to buildings with dilapidated walls and rooftops barely in one piece. Narrow streets paved with cheap sandstone were covered in filth, and the smell of garbage and urine was almost unbearable. The few citizens who were wandering about that early in the morning scurried away when they saw the dark-clad Nox Elite soldiers approaching.

They finally got a visual of the escapee, and the moment the Dimidium realized he'd been found, he made a mad dash toward the thick forest that surrounded the city. He chose the least direct path, going uphill. Durgin wondered what he was up to when the ground beneath their feet started to shake, followed by a loud rumble. He looked up in time to see huge rocks barreling down toward them. He shouted out a warning to the soldier closest to him, but it was too late; caught in the direct path of a boulder, he was dragged by it and disappeared in the grainy dust. Durgin's pulse skyrocketed as he jumped, ducked, and veered, never once losing sight of the fugitive. He felt the strain on his legs, and breathing became more and more difficult.

He heard the Dimidium's labored gasps ahead as he shortened the gap between them. At least the chase on the steep hill isn't affecting only me, Durgin thought bitterly. He caught a flash of the Dimidium's sleeve before a sudden gritty fog engulfed him. Not willing to lose the fugitive when he was so close, Durgin ran ahead without caution. No warning sound came that time before the massive stone flew his way as if it had been thrown by a giant. He jumped to the side, narrowly escaping being squashed, though the momentum forced him to roll on the rough ground enough times to make him lose count. His elbows burned where they had been scratched raw. He could hear the sound of his heart pumping hard, almost as if it wanted to break free.

A movement in his peripheral caught his attention. Durgin rolled onto his stomach and saw the Dimidium approach with a feral expression on his face. He froze on the spot, for the face that stared at him was almost identical to that of his brother—or to be more precise, to the aberration he had become in the end. Durgin's breathing became shallow. The Dimidium's nostrils flared, and he curled his lips back to reveal a row of jagged teeth. Durgin noticed when the thing bent his knees, body poised to strike. The Dimidium jumped, and all Durgin could do was cover his head with his arm and brace for the impact.

A loud thud nearby made him look up. The Dimidium's body lay ahead, unmoving. His head was twisted at an odd angle. Commander Haarx ignored Durgin to make a beeline toward the aberration. His face twisted in a scowl before he spat on the corpse.

Lancer stopped next to Durgin. "Are you okay, my lord?"

He expected to find smugness on Commander Haarx's son's face. Instead, he saw genuine concern.

"I'm okay, soldier. Only a few bruises." He got up with Lancer's help, pain radiating through his entire body. He locked his jaw and sucked it up.

Their attention diverted to Commander Haarx who had his boot on the fugitive's chest, his lips curled in disgust.

"What is that thing?" Lancer asked.

"I don't know."

Durgin breached the distance between him and Commander Haarx. Upon closer inspection of the body, he noticed that the thing wasn't as similar to Drex as he had originally thought. No, the scientists had managed to advance far more with this one. Bile filled Durgin's mouth. That could have been him.

"What are we going to do with the body, Commander?" Lancer asked.

"Burn it. This aberration should have never existed." His eyes connected with Durgin's, who saw twisted satisfaction there. "Maybe now that one of Lord Droom's creations almost managed to kill his son, he will heed my advice."

Durgin's face felt like it was in flames. Even so, he opened his mouth to offer a rebuff, but everyone's wrist communicators began to beep at once. Durgin glanced at his communication device and pressed the small screen to read the incoming message.

It was a level five alert. They were under attack.

Chapter 10

Samiah expected to find utter chaos outside, but the reality of it was shocking in ways she couldn't have foreseen. All shops on the main street had been ransacked and torn to pieces. Transport hovers had been mangled beyond recognition. She couldn't be certain, but it seemed the path of destruction led to the House of Morang's palace at the end of the avenue. The mammoth vine gates to the royal estates were wide open, inviting and foreboding at the same time. Signs of struggle were visible in bits of torn clothes and small puddles of blood. Samiah balked when Malachiax veered toward it.

“Where are you going?”

He looked over his shoulder, a deep frown marring his forehead. “We must look for survivors.”

“Are you crazy? What if we find a crazed mob instead?” Ianox said before Samiah could voice a similar reply.

“I'm not going to simply turn my back without checking if there is anyone in the palace who needs help.”

Ianox crossed his arms and glowered at Malachiax. “I'm not risking my neck for anyone.”

“I risked my life and Samiah's to save yours.”

He didn't wait for Ianox's reply, just kept walking toward the white construction at the end of the stoned pavement. Samiah bit her lower lip while guilt gnawed at her insides. She had the same selfish thoughts as Ianox, not wanting to risk her life or Mal's to check for survivors. Malachiax didn't even think twice about it. She pondered, not for the first time, how such a wretched person like herself could have a soul mate as wonderful and good as Malachiax.

She followed him in silence, lost to her dark thoughts. She wasn't surprised when she heard Ianox's footsteps close behind her a few seconds later. He must have realized his odds at survival were greater with them.

The sun had dipped closer to the horizon, painting the sky with a red glow. Night would soon be upon them. It would help conceal them from anyone possessed, but it would also make it harder to spot any alien wraith lurking about in search of a potential host.

They found the double doors to the palace unmanned and open. Their cheery cerulean blue color was at complete odds with the dark splatter Samiah could only guess was more blood. She swallowed hard as she walked in carefully, straining her ears to catch any warning noise, but only the sound of their footsteps echoed in the empty hallway. She wished she could muffle the noise, for she didn't want to alert anyone of their presence.

They would have covered ground much faster if they had split up, but going their separate ways presented too many risks. So together they stayed, checking each room on the ground level first. They found them all empty. Some were untouched, others wrecked beyond recognition. Only one thing was certain—they couldn't stay in the palace much longer. She was glad the Morang's official home wasn't a mammoth construction like the Argamanx castle. Its size was more in line with a manor than a palace.

Without a word, they headed to the second floor and stopped at the landing, again waiting, listening. The hallway was dark, and by looking at the pieces of broken glass on the floor, she knew why. Seconds passed before they heard something fragile shatter down the corridor. Samiah swallowed hard and unsheathed the metal rod strapped to her back, holding it tight in her already sweaty hands. With her heart galloping at full speed, she traded a glance with Malachiax and read fear in his gaze. She didn't dare speak out loud, so she touched his mind telepathically, something she discovered she could do moments after they were bonded. The gift wasn't reciprocal; he couldn't enter her mind.

"Be careful," she said through the bond.

He nodded and faced forward once more. Samiah noticed he wasn't acting lethargic, which meant the drugs hadn't kicked in yet. She hoped that at least his mind was protected.

The sound had come from the last door down the hallway. It was wider than the ones from downstairs and had intrinsic carvings in its dark wood with golden highlights. Samiah suspected it led to one of the royal chambers. Malachiax stopped in front of it and took a deep breath before pushing the door open all the way. He didn't enter right away, scanning the room from the threshold. Samiah rose on her tiptoes and looked beyond his shoulder. The room was in complete disarray, much like the ones downstairs. Furniture lay in pieces on the ground, and shards of glass were mixed with debris of objects she didn't recognize.

Malachiax walked in, and she followed close behind. Then a moan reached them, coming from somewhere near the canopy bed. Whoever or whatever was in the room was hidden from view. They veered in that direction, trying to avoid the fragments of sharp objects, and found a young Morian curled into a ball on the floor. Samiah's breathing hitched. The girl's face and arms were covered in scratches, and white foam pooled in the corners of her mouth. Malachiax bent down to touch her, but he drew his arm back quickly when she hissed at him. Samiah focused on her gift and confirmed the girl's aura was completely black. The young Morian was possessed.

She grabbed Malachiax's arm and pulled him back, out of the Morian's reach.

"Kill me," she said. It wasn't the voice of a young woman, too harsh and guttural.

"Who are you?" Samiah asked.

“You don’t want to know.” The being began to thrash and scratch the girl’s face, making deep gouges on her cheeks.

“For all the Sacred Powers,” Ianox mumbled behind us. “What’s she doing?”

“She’s taken,” Samiah replied.

“We must help her,” Malachiax said.

“There’s no help. I’ll die, and I’m taking this sweet, innocent soul with me,” the wraith seethed. Samiah could feel the malice of his words deep in her bones.

The girl’s hands curled around her middle, and that was when Samiah noticed the dagger embed in her abdomen. The handle was white, with swirls carved on the polished surface. Samiah had never seen such a design before. It wasn’t a common dagger. The skin around the wound was black as if it was rotten.

“Who did this to you?” she asked.

“Filthy lizard scum. We hate them more than we hate you!”

“The Sacred Powers have mercy on us.” Ianox took a step back, his face turning ashen all of a sudden.

“Do you know what she is talking about?”

Ianox just shook his head. “We don’t speak about them. Never, ever speak about them.”

The Morian let out a bloodcurdling scream right before her entire body turned black and disintegrated into a pile of ashes. Samiah waited for the wraith to emerge from her body, and when it didn’t happen, she let out a sigh of relief. A young girl had just died, and she was relieved. I’m despicable, she thought with a heavy heart.

“Let’s get out of here,” Malachiax said, pulling Samiah out of her guilty thoughts.

They ran back to the ground floor, not as stealthy as Samiah would have liked, but it seemed that aside from the now-dead girl, the palace was deserted. The whole experience shook Samiah to the core, and she could bet it had also affected Malachiax deeply. She wouldn’t think about that. She had to remain positive. They may not have found survivors, but they had gained precious information. Whatever alien beings had invaded their planet, they could be killed. Samiah only had to find a way to do so without killing the Arcadians they were possessing.

She saved that piece of knowledge for later. There was no time to dwell on it now. They had to find Razor’s Blood and reach Argor before it was too late.

When they made it out of the palace, night greeted them. The lampposts that should have provided illumination were dark. Mercifully, the streets were still devoid of life. It seemed the entire population had vanished. The capital of Mora was a ghost town. Samiah had visited cities in other planets like this, sad skeletons of a civilization long gone. Was Arcadia headed in that direction? Would explorers from another planet walk through the ruins of theirs and wonder what kind of evil had befallen them?

By the time they had reached the outskirts of Morang, the three moons of Arcadia were already high in the sky, partially hidden behind clouds. Buildings and houses were sparse here, and ahead the desert spread before them. The few nightbloomers beside the road illuminated the way in an eerie manner. They didn't have any leaves or fruits and their bare, twisted limbs looked like scrawny arms reaching out for them. Those were dying trees; Samiah knew that much.

There was a time when highways as the one they followed were used for long-distance traveling, before the gateway technology was developed. Samiah wasn't sure why they still remained, maybe because of sentimentalism or because they were part of their history. It didn't matter. She was glad their race prized knowledge above all else, and history was part of that knowledge they so feverishly pursued. If it weren't for this road and the signs along the way, they couldn't have hoped to reach Jackur.

Samiah glanced back and when she couldn't see the outline of the capital of Mora anymore, she let out a relieved sigh.

It had been premature. She stepped on something soft and slippery and almost lost her balance in the process. Malachiax grabbed her arm, stabilizing her, and she looked down. There was something shiny and thick covering her boots. Malachiax produced a light orb from his sack and she wished he hadn't.

"Wait, is that blood?" Ianox said loudly, his voice carrying in the light wind.

It was blood, and next to her boot, a severed arm. She jumped back and collided against Malachiax, her pulse now ringing in her ears. He curled an arm around her waist and pulled her to his side while he pointed the light out into the darkness. It showed a trail of blood. Who knew what they would find at the end of it. Part of Samiah didn't want to find out.

She stepped to the side and let Malachiax take the lead. Using the orb, he followed the dark red trail on the ground with careful steps. Ianox clutched Samiah's arm, and together they kept close to Malachiax's back. She didn't even mind the contact; that's how terrified she was. At the end of the path, there was a huge pool of blood and in the middle, a crude wooden spike. The light followed the thorn up and up until it revealed a dismembered head.

They let out a frightened scream in unison, and Malachiax dropped the orb. It went out as it hit the ground. He bent down and searched blindly for it. Ianox whimpered next to Samiah. Despite the darkness, she could still see the severed head of a young man, mouth open in a perpetual silent scream and two empty holes where his eyes had been. Claw marks had left gouges on his cheeks. It was the most atrocious thing she had ever seen. She felt bile rise in her throat, and a moment later, she was kneeling on the ground, emptying the contents of her stomach.

Malachiax came to her side and placed a hand on her back. Once there was nothing left for her to heave, he cleaned her face with a cut of cloth. His eyes searched hers, and she tried her best to hide her fear, knowing how futile it was to keep anything from him.

"Come on. We can't stay here. Whoever did that might not be gone." He helped Samiah up, for her body was now shaking uncontrollably. He pulled her into his arms and tried to hug away the tremors.

"It's going to be okay."

She wanted to believe his words, but no sooner had they left his mouth when they heard the shuffling sound of several dozen feet moving across grit, followed by feverish, high-pitched screeches. It was hard to isolate the direction. Ianox moved closer to them. Malachiax put the light orb away, the darkness absolute until their eyes adjusted to the lack of light. When Samiah's sight returned, what she saw made her stomach drop. Hundreds of possessed Morians were closing in on them. Their path of escape diminished with each breath.

"We're trapped. We're going to die," Ianox wailed.

"We're not going to die. Listen up. When I say go, we run," Malachiax said with resolve.

He raised his arms, ignoring the injury on his shoulder. When he brought them down, the ground in front of the Morians exploded with a deafening roar.

"Go!" Malachiax screamed.

They ran as fast as they could. Malachiax had Samiah's hand in a vicious hold, propelling her forward with him. Ianox kept pace. She heard outraged screams not far behind them and looked over her shoulder without slowing down. The explosion hadn't incapacitated all of their attackers; there were too many, and Mal's gift only went so far. Fear gave her a bout of stamina, but no matter how fast they ran, they had nowhere to hide. Soon enough, their bodies would collapse from the strain. They were already slowing down as their breathing became more labored. The crowd was gaining on them.

Ianox tripped and fell against them, bringing everyone down. The fall knocked the wind out of Samiah, and she couldn't move. That was it. The end. Her legs were liquefied and her lungs felt like they had been scorched. She just hoped they killed them quickly.

A loud and out-of-place noise came from above. Samiah couldn't identify what was making it until the shape of an old air glide came into view. It passed them and went straight toward the mob. As soon as it was close enough, a jet of flame shot out from it, burning everything in its path. It made a couple of more loops, targeting Morians it had missed. They flailed and rolled on the ground in vain. The fire had taken hold of their bodies in a merciless grip.

A whiff of burnt flesh brought Samiah's nausea back. She clamped her mouth shut with her hand and fought the urge to dry heave. There was no time for weakness. She didn't know who their savior was, but she didn't intend to wait to find out.

"Come on. Let's go," she urged Malachiax and Ianox.

"Aagh, I can't. I think... I think I broke my ankle." Ianox clutched his leg, his face contorted in pain.

Malachiax used the light orb again to check Ianox's injury. It didn't look bad, but broken ankle or not, it would still hinder their escape. Samiah helped get Ianox up, but she had no idea where they were going now. She grimly realized there was no way they would make it to Jackur, and without shelter, the likelihood of survival was slim.

Lost in her pessimistic thoughts, it took her a while to notice she could no longer hear the air glide. The complete silence was ominous, and her heart thundered inside her chest. She unsheathed the metal rod strapped to her back and braced for another attack. Malachiax and Ianox did the same. They formed a tight circle with their backs to each other and waited. It wasn't long before they heard footsteps.

Malachiax shone the light orb in the direction of the sound and a scrawny figure appeared with hands raised. His hair was blond and short, sticking out from his head in every direction in messy bits. His clothes were too big and ratty with patches visible here and there. But the most important aspect about him was that his aura wasn't black. It was the only thing that mattered to Samiah at the moment.

"I mean no harm," the young Morian said.

Malachiax raised his makeshift weapon menacingly. "How can we know that?"

Samiah touched his shoulder. "It's okay, Mal. His aura is normal."

Though normal wasn't quite the right word to describe the aura of this stranger. Peculiar would be a better adjective. His aura was split evenly in two colors, yellow and orange. Despite the proximity of them on the spectrum color, they represented opposite personalities. Samiah had never seen anything quite like it. Weird aura or not, she didn't sense any threatening inclination from him, and he had just saved them from certain death.

"My name is Samiah. This is my mate, Malachiax, and our associate, Ianox."

"I'm Garyanx Menix. You can call me Gary. Welcome to my home."

Chapter 11

Lochiana struggled with her bound hands as she was lead via a narrow tunnel down to who knew where. She should be afraid, but all she felt at the moment was ire aimed at the warrior who had thrown her over his shoulder when she'd refuse to leave the palace with him.

She had been utterly terrified when they met with a band of fearsome warriors just outside the city limits, all covered from head to toe with wicked-looking weapons. They were prepared for battle. Lochiana used her gift to access their auras and found no antagonism against her, which eased her mind, but not by much. Especially when Femror put her back on her feet and forced a bitter liquid down her throat. It burned as it trickled down, and it made her wobbly almost instantly. She must have shown her wariness on her face for Femror was quick to explain what the liquid did—it protected against possession.

After speaking with one of his warriors in a hushed tone, Femror had proceeded to put her on top of a mount, a furry beast with tusks protruding from its mouth that were sharp enough to impale her with ease. Lochiana didn't recognize the species, but the animal seemed docile enough, and it barely reacted to the extra weight on its back. Her hands had curled around the leather reins, and Lochiana considered for a brief moment kicking its hide and attempt an escape. Femror must have guessed her intention, for he quickly mounted behind her forming a cage around her body with his strong arms as he pulled the reins from her hands. She'd stiffened at the proximity, but her skin broke out in goose bumps that weren't entirely from displeasure when his warm breath fanned over her neck. She'd attributed her reaction to the liquid she had drunk, the substance she would learn later to be Razor's Blood. As if she were going to feel anything besides contempt for that brute.

After a half day riding hard, Lochiana no longer felt the effects of the strong concoction favored by the Jackurians. Hence her renewed anger at her kidnapper. She would bide her time for the moment and not openly challenge the warrior. She couldn't win against him with brutal strength, so she had to master him with her mind.

As she walked in silence behind him, she paid close attention to every fissure and hole in the gray stone walls. She wasn't a one-glancer, but attention to detail was one of the many skills she excelled at. We'll see who will have the last laugh, Femror, she thought with a sneer.

One of the most peculiar things she noticed was that, despite the lack of sunlight, she could see clearly inside the cave. There were no orb lights or glowworms anywhere. She didn't want to talk to Femror, but the need to know everything about her location trumped her desire to give him the silent treatment.

"What kind of magic is this?" she asked.

"Magic?"

"Yes, magic. How can I see well in the darkness? There's no illumination anywhere."

"Wouldn't you like to know?" He chuckled. The bastard chuckled. Lochiana didn't think he was capable of humor, never mind that he was amused at her expense.

"Why am I here?"

Femror didn't answer right away, and it seemed his shoulders had gone tense. "You're responsible for this mess. I'm sure my father would like to have a word with you."

Lochiana didn't like the implication in his tone one bit. She glared at his back and wished her drop-dead vision would do just that, make him drop dead. You don't really want him to die, her conscience stated, and she grew irritated at herself. Okay, maybe not die, but stumble and fall on his face, at least.

Femror veered sharply to the right and stopped in front of a door made of real wood, not the commonly used syno material. He opened it with a flourish and said, "After you, my lady."

Lochiana hesitated, and when she glanced at the warrior, he raised an eyebrow at her. She could practically hear his thoughts: Don't do it, and I will throw you over my shoulder again. She scowled at him and ventured in.

She was in a private chamber; she could tell that much. In one corner were a small wooden table and four simple chairs. Next to it was an entire wall dedicated to an arsenal of weapons worthy of a small army. Femror walked around her and made a beeline to it, stripping off his weapons as he walked. Lochiana's mouth went dry as she observed the way the powerful muscles on his back flexed, and how his scales changed colors when they caught the lights from the glowworms attached to the walls. Whatever magic worked on the tunnels wasn't present here.

Her gaze dropped to his ass, which was covered by a short kilt made of some kind of animal fur. Femror chose that moment to look over his shoulder and caught Lochiana ogling him. Her cheeks burned as her gaze snapped back up to see a smirk on his lips.

"See something you like?" he asked.

She crossed her arms in front of her chest and glowered. "I'm just returning the favor. Only I was wearing way less clothes before, so it's hardly an eye for an eye."

Femror's smirk blossomed to a full smile, and Lochiana realized what she had said. "I can fix that." He made a motion to untie the belt holding his kilt in place and her eyes turned as round as saucers.

"No! That won't be necessary." She spun around to look at the rest of the room and avoid his penetrating gaze. For all the Sacred Powers. Am I still under the Razor's Blood influence? she thought feebly, knowing very well she was sober. She couldn't understand the odd twist in her gut whenever Femror looked at her as if he wanted to know all her secrets.

On the other side of the chamber, Lochiana found a raised pallet covered with colorful rugs and pillows, and a few animal skins. His bed, she guessed.

"Are you hungry?" Femror's voice nearby made Lochiana jump on the spot. She pivoted and found him right in front of her and very close. She had to crane her neck to look at his face.

"No," she lied. Now that the prospect of food had been presented to her, she found herself quite famished.

"Right. Well, I'm starved." His gaze dropped to her lips, and Lochiana noticed his Adam's apple bobble up and down. Did he want to kiss her?

She took a step back, not because she was appalled by the idea but because she probably would have liked it. It had been so long since she wanted to be kissed by a male that Lochiana didn't know how to react.

Femror spun around and disappeared through a door Lochiana had missed in her initial perusal of the room. He returned a moment later carrying a tray with two ceramic bowls on it, placing them on the table before he sat down. Lochiana stretched her neck, trying to see what was inside the bowls without actually taking a step forward. Femror looked in her direction and then pointed at the chair next to his.

"Sit and eat. You will need your strength."

"You really need to stop ordering me about. I'm not one of your warriors."

"No, you definitely aren't." Femror kept staring at her with that intense look of his.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

He frowned and leaned back, crossing his arms. "I don't understand your question. It means you are not one of my warriors. Like you just said."

Lochiana stared at him through slits for a moment. Femror eventually shrugged and started to eat whatever grub he'd brought into the room. Her stomach growled loudly, and she hated that her body had betrayed her like that. Stop being so stubborn, woman. Go eat something.

She followed what her conscience told her that time and joined Femror at the table. The bowl contained some kind of cold stew that didn't look appetizing at all. Beggars couldn't be choosers, though, and Lochiana dove in without even smelling it first. It was very bland, nothing compared to the spicy and rich Morian food she loved, but Lochiana had learned to appreciate a nutritious meal regardless of flavor. It was one of the first things she had to get accustomed to when she joined the Offworld Exploration Program.

Once she finished scraping every single drop of the unidentified soup, she found Femror staring at her with amusement in his eyes.

"What?" She frowned.

“I thought you weren’t hungry.”

“I need strength if I’m to get out of here.”

“Oh, and where are you planning to go?” He smirked.

“Get help, for starters. Warn the rest of Arcadia.”

“You are assuming I’m not here to help.” He leaned back in his chair and laced his fingers behind his head, showing off his biceps. She was sure he was doing it on purpose.

“Are you?” She raised an eyebrow at him. “All I hear from your mouth are orders and threats. Honestly, I think I’d better take my chances with whatever came through the portal.”

Femror’s expression changed suddenly like the flash sandstorms that plagued the Valley of Bones wasteland. He dropped his arms to the side and leaned forward. “Don’t ever say something foolish like that again.”

Lochiana’s spine went rigid, and not because of his angry reply. Somehow she knew his harsh words stemmed from a deep-rooted fear. What did he know about the alien beings?

“You didn’t even hesitate before you killed Margriet.”

“No. And I don’t regret it. Once someone is taken, there’s no hope for them. Killing the host as fast as you can is a kindness.”

“You’ve seen it happen before.”

Femror clenched his jaw hard and his gaze seemed to turn inwards. “Yes.”

“When?”

“Many millennia ago, before your kind walked the planet.”

Lady Lochiana couldn’t imagine a time when Arcadians had not been on the planet. In fact, one of the reasons Professor Shix had been so obsessed about the portal was because he hoped it would lead to clues to their origins.

“Well, I was able to fight off possession.”

Femror’s eyes widened as his facial expression changed once more. “You did? How?”

“I don’t know. I just did. I guess I’m too stubborn.” She smiled wryly, trying to lighten the mood and gain his trust.

“Amazing,” Femror murmured, more to himself than her.

Lochiana was uncomfortable at the way he kept staring at her in awe. She didn’t know what was doing her head in more, this new glance or the previous heated gazes.

“How did you defeat them the first time they came?” she asked to change the subject.

Femror shook his head and clenched his jaw. At least he dialed the intensity from his gaze down a notch. “That’s a story you should hear from my father.”

“The king?”

“Yes.”

Lochiana stood suddenly and looked impatiently at Femror when he didn’t follow her lead. “What are you waiting for? Let’s go.”

“We can’t go yet.”

“Why not?” She put her hands on her hips.

“Your dress must go.”

Her heart did a somersault before it thundered inside her chest. She narrowed her eyes at him and folded her arms. “Excuse me?”

Femror’s gaze traveled down the length of her body, slowing making the trip back up and stopping on her face. “You heard me. Strip off your dress. Now.”

Chapter 12

Gary's home was a clever contraption, and Samiah suspected it followed the same principle of the nightbloomers. It was buried deep in the ground, accessible only by an almost invisible trapdoor. Before they followed him in, she searched for the air glide, but she couldn't make out its shape in the darkness. The steps groaned as they put their weight on them, like an old person who couldn't bear the burden of a decrepit body anymore.

Dimmed light orbs illuminated the tiny space, and it felt like she had been transported to another era. All his chairs, tables, and cabinets were made out of nightbloomers' wood so old, the surface had lost its characteristic translucence. The use of organic material in the manufacturing of furniture or any other type of construction had become obsolete after the invention of synthetic organic matter. Samiah thought most Arcadians had donated their real wood furniture to depositories and museums.

She walked in awe as she touched every polished surface. First, the working air glide, and now this. Who was this person, and why was he holding on to all these artifacts? He motioned for them to sit around the table and offered them some kind of brew. Ianox and Malachiax eyed the warm liquid with suspicion.

"It's morango fruit tea. Hearty and harmless." Gary took a sip from his mug.

The sweetness and warmth of the brew spread through Samiah's body and limbs. She felt better immediately.

"This is delicious. Thank you," she said.

They drank their tea in silence, each lost in their own head. So much had happened and changed in a day. She wondered what had happened to Lochiana. Had she been present when that poor girl was stabbed? Or had she managed to escape the palace before the aliens attacked? She had said her will was too strong for possession. Samiah truly hoped she had escaped, even though the probability was small.

"Do you live here by yourself?" Malachiax asked.

Pain flashed through Gary's eyes before his gaze settled on the table in front of him. "I do now. My cousin and I shared this place. He was kind enough to take me in despite...." He closed his eyes and shook his head almost imperceptibly. "And then those people came and killed him."

The blood drained from Samiah's face. The head on the spike. "I'm so sorry."

"I was on my way back from making a delivery when I saw Trenianx being torn apart. There were too many of them. He didn't stand a chance. I took the air glide as high as I could, trying to hide behind the clouds. They were so lost in their frenzy they didn't even hear the roar of the propellers. After they destroyed Trenianx's body, they left. I would have given him a proper burial, but I was too afraid those monsters would come back and do the same to me."

"What are we going to do? Is there any hope that Jackur still stands?" Ianox asked.

"Do you know what's going on?" Gary's body sat rigid on his seat.

Malachiax and Ianox looked at Samiah. She was the only one who had experienced possession and survived to tell the tale. She didn't want to rehash every gruesome detail again but she did anyway. Gary deserved to have as much information as possible. When she mentioned the girl they had found in the palace, Gary frowned and seemed to be deep in thought.

"Do you know what the wraith meant by 'lizard scum'?"

Ianox closed his eyes and shuddered. Malachiax gave him a side-glance but Samiah decided to ignore the fool.

"There are old stories that mention a race of shapeshifters who possessed skin resembling that of great winged lizards. There's never been concrete proof they actually exist, and I'm afraid they are nothing more than cautionary tales to scare naughty youngsters."

"They aren't myths, and they're vicious," Ianox said through clenched teeth.

"How do you know? Have you ever seen one?" Samiah raised an eyebrow at him.

Instead of answering her, he chose to lower his head and stare at the table instead. Typical.

"Well, lizard people or not, someone either knows how to kill the wraiths or stumbled upon it by accident. I wish the dagger hadn't disintegrated with that poor Morian girl," Malachiax said.

Samiah reached out and grabbed Mal's hand, squeezing it. He looked at her with a pained expression on his face, and it broke her heart. Somehow, he felt responsible for the death of that Morian youngster too, even though they could have done nothing to save her.

She turned to Gary and explained to him their theory about Razor's Blood and thus their need to reach Jackur. His eyes gleamed and his aura became brighter for a moment.

"I believe I can help you with that." He stood up and walked toward the back of the room where a curtain from wall to wall stood shut. Gary pulled the fabric and revealed what was hidden behind him. A treasure.

"For all the Sacred Powers. Is that what I think it is?" Ianox rose suddenly, knocking his chair over. He hopped on one leg, looking like a misplaced phom-phom.

Gary had a proud smile on his face. "Indeed, my friend. The best supply of Razor's Blood you'll find on the entire planet."

"But you're a Morian. Morians hate Razor's Blood," Samiah stated.

Gary's brow creased. "I'm not a Morian. I'm from Jackur, and so was my cousin."

"Sorry, I didn't mean to sound judgmental. Are you willing to sell some to us? We can't transfer the credits to your account without a com-slip or working relays, but you will get paid."

"Payment? I'm not charging you for it. You can have all the Razor's Blood you want as long as you take me with you."

"Of course you're coming with us." Malachiax walked to him and took a bottle of Razor's Blood from the stash.

"How long do you think it will take to reach Argamania traveling by air glide? I have no idea how fast those things can go," Ianox said.

Gary made a disgruntled sound, and all eyes were on him.

"What?" Samiah asked.

"We can't take the air glide. I used all the fuel I had to create the fire jet."

She went back to the table and took a seat with her head in her hands. "We'll never make it to Argor. Our hope was to find a working gateway station in Jackur. It will take weeks, maybe months to reach Argamania on foot."

"The air glide might not be a viable option, but we can ride the wild antlers. I know where a herd prefers to pasture not far from here," Gary suggested.

"Wild antlers? Are you mad? Those things are vile and would sooner bite your hand off than let you ride their backs." Ianox made an exasperated gesture with his hands.

Malachiax seemed to contemplate Gary's suggestion and then focused on Ianox. "That would probably be true if we didn't have someone in our party who could communicate with animals."

Ianox took a step back, seeming mortified. "How did you know?" His gaze turned accusatorily to Samiah. "You told him! I asked you to keep your mouth shut, and you told him. I thought aura-readers had a moral code."

"I didn't tell him anything!" She smacked her hands on the table, rattling the empty mugs.

"Ianox, do you think I'm dense?" Malachiax said. "After you set those famished catlings on Walani during our last trip, everyone knew what your gift was. I don't understand why you want to keep it a secret. There is nothing to be ashamed of."

"Easy for you to say when your gift is elemental. I wish I could blow the ground to smithereens." Ianox folded his arms and pouted like a petulant youngster.

"Yeah, and who is saving the day now? Trust me, Ianox. Every gift is precious and useful."

Samiah saw the effect Mal's words had on Ianox, both in his external reaction but also in his aura. The brown color became lighter, bordering on a beige hue.

It was settled. They would look for the wild antlers in the morning and be on their way to Argor. Gary assured them the wild antlers were very fast animals when they wanted to be. But it was impossible to calculate how long it would take them to reach their destination. Plus, they had the alien wraiths and possessed people to contend with.

Things needed to be done before they ventured out the next morning, though. Gary helped them figure out the right dose of Razor's Blood to drink. On their own, they would have had to find out via trial and error, but Gary used his knowledge to come up with individual doses for each of them based on muscle mass and genetic makeup.

Samiah grabbed the vial meant for her and examined the dark reddish liquid inside. She needed to know something.

"Is Razor's Blood safe to drink if a woman is expecting?"

Gary stopped what he was doing to look at her. "Are you with child, Samiah?"

She glanced down and put her hands on her belly. "Yes. Twins."

When Gary didn't say anything, she looked up again. His hand was frozen in midair and his mouth slacked open. He shook his head and put his outdated measuring instrument down.

"Forgive me, but I've never met an expectant woman this young before, never mind one carrying twins. That's extraordinary."

For some reason, his comment embarrassed Samiah. She didn't think she was anything special. She was selfish, impulsive, and filled with flaws. Malachiax was the good one. He had always been the better half. She avoided his gaze and played with the vial in her hand.

"To answer your question, yes, it's safe. Razor's Blood does not harm unborn children. Once the seed is planted, a woman's womb becomes a fortress. There isn't much that can harm a baby while inside its mother's body."

His answer took away some of her stress. As long as she kept breathing, her children would be safe. She focused her attention on Gary's lab and archaic paraphernalia, wondering why he would live this way. Was he an outlaw?

"Your home is pretty unique."

The corners of his mouth lifted, softening his features. "You mean to say why do I keep all this junk around?"

"I wouldn't call it junk, but honestly I don't understand why you don't own any modern devices. Are you some sort of fugitive?" It was a valid question. In order to acquire anything new these days, you would need an ID.

Gary took a seat at the table across from Samiah and gazed down at his folded hands. "Not exactly. You're an aura-reader, so you tell me. What do you see?"

"Your aura is... I've never seen anything quite like it. And your core. I can't say I recognize your gift."

"Yes. My aura is different, and where I come from, different equals bad. My whole life, people treated me like a second-class citizen just because I have a strange gi—" He paused and licked his lips. "Never mind. I was tired of my life as a pariah, so when Trenianx invited me to come live with him and help with the Razor's Blood business, I didn't think twice."

"I understand." She wanted to ask what his gift was, but she didn't think Gary was ready to share that part about him yet. "Was your cousin a fugitive, then?"

"Trenianx?" Gary snorted. "No. He was a bit paranoid. He didn't trust the establishment, so he preferred to stay under the radar. Be invisible."

Gary's eyes turned red, and Samiah could see his effort to keep the tears at bay. She reached over and squeezed his hand. "It's okay to feel sad."

A lone tear escaped, and he turned his face. "He was the only friend I had."

"I know we can't compare, but now you have us."

He looked at Samiah, perplexed, like he couldn't believe her words. It was hard to imagine a life where people shunned you just because you weren't the norm. There was a time when aura-readers faced the same persecution. But that had been so long ago that no one even remembered it anymore.

Why must people always fear what they can't understand? Samiah thought bitterly.

Chapter 13

Femror watched in amusement as the Morang heir glared at him. He'd chosen his words carefully to get a rise out of her. He didn't know why it gave him such pleasure to see the fierce woman all flushed with indignation. His blood answered in kind, pumping furiously through his veins. He was testing the bond, he realized. Until that point, he hadn't been completely sure Lochiana was his mate.

He had never experienced anything like it before—the bond was for life, and it wouldn't be broken even after the death of one mate. Femror had only the tales of those who had been bonded to go by. Now, staring at the pink-haired Arcadian and feeling how his very core reacted to her, there was no doubt in his mind. The problem was what the fuck he was going to do about it.

“Will you relax? I don't want to drag you to see my father butt naked. But you can't wear that party dress if you want him to respect you.”

She narrowed her eyes at him. “What does he have against pretty clothes?”

Femror cocked an eyebrow. “You said yourself that you left your fancy dresses behind. I take it that you also don't like them very much.”

She stiffened visibly and crossed her arms in front of her chest. “They belonged to a lifestyle I was no longer a part of. I didn't have any use for them out in space.”

“You have your answer. If my father sees you wearing that, he will immediately assume you value frivolities over practicality.”

“What am I going to wear, then?” She gestured with her arms in frustration, and the sudden movement made a strand of her hair fall over her face. She brushed it off with a jerky movement, and Femror felt the compulsion to run his rough fingers through her mane. Don't even go there, idiot.

He walked to the other side of his chamber and retrieved a bundle of clothes from a wooden chest by the foot of his bed. He lobbed it at Lochiana from across the room, suppressing a grin of pleasure when she caught it with ease. Good to know that besides a sharp tongue, she also possessed dexterity. As a Draki warrior, he couldn't have a mate who didn't match him in every way.

Femror shook his head. What was he thinking? Was he seriously going to pursue a mating bond with the woman in front of him? They weren't even the same species, and he doubted she had any inclination to give up her freedom to live the Draki way. The opposite wasn't an option. His kind went into hiding for a very good reason. Femror couldn't leave his clan and join Lochiana in her adventures off planet. That was, if they survived the invasion.

What a fucking dilemma.

She eyed the pieces of clothing in her hands, a woven tunic and a pair of leather pants. "Whose clothes are these?"

"Mine." She raised both eyebrows at Femror. "Were mine when I was much younger. They should fit you."

Lochiana took a deep breath and stared at the clothes once more. Did she not want to wear them? The thought bruised his ego. He was tempted to tell her to forget it and go meet his father with the idiotic dress she had on.

She raised her gaze to his. "May I have some privacy, please?"

He tried not to be too happy about her decision. They were only bloody clothes, after all. And still his dual hearts responded by jerking forward and increasing their pace. Femror made sure his facial expression showed nothing, though. He nodded and left the room, waiting just outside of his chamber. He stared at the wall in front of him and tried his best not to picture Lochiana naked on the other side of the stone barrier. It was futile; he had the memory imprinted in his mind from the quick glimpse he had back at the Morang palace.

She emerged not too much later, and seeing Lochiana wearing his clothes, carrying his scent, flared up the bond like nothing else. Femror wanted to mark her somehow, maybe kiss the breath out of her. But he did nothing. He was a seasoned warrior; he could control his urges. Besides, he would never force himself on any female.

"Are you ready?" he asked, his voice thick.

"As ready as I will ever be." She looked down and tried to smooth the crease lines on the tunic. "Besides not calling your father 'oh Mighty Lizard King,' what else should I pay heed to?"

"Don't hide anything from him. He will know if you are lying or being obtuse on purpose."

"Oh, is that a Draki special ability?" She looked closely at him.

"Why do you ask? Do you want to know if I can sense when you are lying?"

She stood taller and frowned at him. "I don't lie."

"Good. I hate liars."

"What about you, Femror? Do you lie?"

Femror clenched his jaw and avoided her gaze. If it were his choice, he'd never lie, but he would do it if the king commanded, if he believed it served a greater cause. He could lie to Lochiana right now and say he never lied. And yet, somehow, lying to her felt like one of the greatest offenses in the world.

"Yes, I do."

Chapter 14

The sun had just appeared on the horizon, a big ball of swirling energy. Gary used a periscope to check if the coast was clear up above. That was another gadget Samiah had only seen in a depository. Once outside, it didn't take long for them to see the heat emanate from the rocky ground in lazy waves. She glanced briefly toward the pile of charred bodies and a shudder went through her. Her gaze turned upward, scanning the sky for any lost wraith. It was mercifully clear, and she let out a relieved sigh. Not even the scavenger banshees dared to be present, like they knew not to feast on what remained of those poor Morians.

She was glad Gary's home was underground and perfectly hidden. Without a host they could see, the wraiths had obviously left in search of others. She shouldn't be grateful for that—it meant other people would fall prey to them—but the feeling stayed nonetheless. Is it wrong to be happy we weren't attacked last night?

"The wild antlers' sanctuary is beyond that hill ahead." Gary's speech was slightly slurred, and he walked funny.

Malachiax and Ianox chuckled behind Samiah like two silly youngsters. Ianox's ankle looked much better after Gary took care of it the night before, but she suspected it wouldn't make a difference in his current state. Razor's Blood affected each person differently, but it seemed Samiah was the only one who still remembered she was an adult. This is going to be a very long trip. Samiah had been afraid Mal's headache would flare up thanks to the powerful mixture, but he didn't appear to be in any pain. One less evil to worry about.

The uphill trek wasn't bad, but thanks to the liquid fire coursing through her veins and the warm orange sun above, she could feel sweat dripping down her back, her shirt sticking to it. The sanctuary sat on the valley below and looked like a mirage. The wide, aquamarine-colored lake was surrounded by luscious naigon grass, a stark contrast to the bare landscape surrounding them. From that far, the magnificent beasts looked peaceful enough, munching on the grass. The raw power they emitted could not be denied, though. Wild antlers were taller than a man, their body wide, overdeveloped muscles barely hidden under their coarse fur. Antlers sprang from their pasterns and fetlocks, looking like little twisted thorns. Massive horns erupted from their heads in perfect spiral loops ending in a sharp tip. They were a variation of white and gray, and in the open plane of the desert, they would be hard to see.

They continued their trek down, but that side of the hill was much steeper. Loose gravel made the descent slippery and noisy. Samiah reached the base first and noticed the herd had stopped grazing and watched them warily. She was not an expert on wildlife, but with bodies tense and ears flat, they seemed to have taken a defensive stance. Not good. She wanted to reach for her metal rod but was afraid the action would be perceived as a threat. If those animals decided they were a menace, they would attack without mercy.

She seemed to be the only one aware of their precarious situation, the men continuing to guffaw as if they were on a field trip. Samiah turned to tell them to be silent when it happened. Gary and Malachiax were coming down the hill too fast when Gary lost his footing on a loose rock. He fell and the momentum made him roll down the hill, taking Mal with him. She watched in horror as they rolled together in a blur of limbs, stopping just a few paces from the herd.

The biggest beast in the group let out a terrifying roar and prepared to charge.

"Mal, watch out!"

Malachiax and Gary were too stunned by the fall to try to protect themselves. Ianox stopped next to her, his palms pressed to his cheeks and his eyes wide. She grabbed his shirt and pulled him closer.

"Do something."

"I-I don't know how."

"What do you mean you don't know how?" she said through clenched teeth.

He whimpered and closed his eyes. She couldn't believe he was having a panic attack now. She shook him hard.

"Don't you dare lose your mind now. I won't allow it. Stop cowering and use your gift already."

The leader of the herd charged, and Samiah shoved Ianox out of her way. She grabbed her weapon and let out an enraged scream as she ran toward the devil on four legs. Malachiax had managed to scoot out of the way, dragging Gary with him, but the beast was no longer interested in them as he perceived Samiah to be the biggest menace. He came her way fast, and she had no hope to survive the impact. She thought about her babies and asked them for forgiveness.

When they were a few paces from collision, the animal suddenly stopped. Samiah was coming fast, so it took her a couple of steps to completely halt. Her arms remained ready to swing the metal rod if needed. She was so close to the wild antler that she could feel its warm breath as it huffed air out through his huge nostrils and mouth.

She heard Malachiax congratulate Ianox for his good work, but she didn't dare break eye contact with the monster in front of her. A moment later, Malachiax pulled her away, making her lower her arms in the process. Her pulse rang in her ears, and her heart beat so fast she was afraid it would crack her rib cage.

"That was close," Ianox said, and Samiah spun around to glare at him. He raised his hands as a peace offering. "I'm sorry. I don't know how to work under pressure."

"Well, you'd better learn fast," she snapped.

His face closed off, and his lips turned into a thin line. She didn't care that she had bruised his ego. She had almost died thanks to his shortcomings. Coddling him wasn't going to help anyone.

"How does this talking to animals thing work, exactly? I'm afraid I've never met anyone with your ability." Gary's speech was surprisingly clear all of a sudden.

"It's not like talking because they can't really talk. I can feel their moods, and I can steer their will to benefit me." Ianox approached the leader and touched the animal's horn without fear.

"That's fantastic," Samiah said. "Can we get going already? We've wasted too much time, and we've barely started."

"Sami, be nice." Malachiax strapped her makeshift sword on her back again, and she folded her arms. Why am I the bad guy now? she thought bitterly. Ianox was the one who had almost killed them all.

"I'm afraid we all need another dose of Razor's Blood. My mind feels too sharp. It must have been the excitement." Gary pulled a bottle from his pack and distributed everyone's dose.

Samiah drank hers in one gulp, hating the burning sensation in her throat and the bitter taste in her mouth. She couldn't believe people actually drank it for fun.

Gary singled out the animals he felt would have more stamina and be the fastest. Ianox wanted to claim the leader for himself but Gary told him that if he did so, the herd would be lost and probably perish in the desert. Begrudgingly, Ianox agreed to pick another ride.

Samiah mounted her antler with Mal's help and tried to ignore the heavy scent emanating from the animal. The creature was too wide and no matter what she did, she couldn't find a comfortable position. She held on to its towering horns and stared ahead. All she could see were endless white plateaus that disappeared in sandy clouds. Her vision blurred for a moment, though she didn't know if was because of the heat or her intoxicated state. She prayed to all the Sacred Powers that they would be able to hold on to their mounts and not fall and break their necks.

She closed her eyes and took a deep breath. When she opened them again, her focus was a bit sharper. She glanced at Ianox, who seemed as uncomfortable as she felt. His face was flushed, and Samiah wondered if he would be able to keep the beasts under control.

"How strong is your hold on the animals?" she asked.

"I'm good. Don't worry about it." His tone was clipped, and he didn't bother to glance her way. Of course he would be angry with her for calling attention to his mistakes.

Malachiax steered his mount close to Samiah's. "Stop goading him, Sami. We don't need this kind of antagonistic atmosphere. We need to stick together."

She held her tongue, hoping that putting their trust in Ianox's abilities wouldn't turn out to be a costly mistake.

Chapter 15

They rode hard during the day, only stopping to relieve themselves and eat. The wild antlers had incredible endurance and could go on for long periods of time at a brisk pace. Ianox's control of them hadn't wavered, not even when fatigue took over or when he was too inebriated to know his own name. His gift was strong, but it still didn't put Samiah's mind at ease.

They stayed away from any main roads or cities, not knowing if the wraiths had reached that far or not. There wasn't much talk while they rode, and when they huddled together for the night, Samiah only traded quiet whispers with Malachiax while she was wrapped in his arms. She needed his strength and optimism to keep going. He was certain they would find a way to stop this brutal invasion before it was too late, but doubts still lingered. How do you fight an enemy you can't touch?

Every night, Ianox was the first to fall asleep. The effort to keep control of four wild animals drained all of his energy. On their third night, she caught Gary playing with a weird-looking apparatus. It was hard to see in the dark, but it looked like a metal box with a shutter on the front. Gary sensed Samiah's stare and looked up.

"What's that?" she asked.

"This is an old recorder." He touched the object with reverence. "It was Trenianx's biggest treasure. I couldn't leave it behind."

"Does it still work?" Malachiax asked.

"Yes. I've been recording our trip. I'm not sure yet how I'm going to transfer the film to a crystal table."

Somehow, his trivial concern made Samiah's heart lighter. It was like there was no doubt in his mind they would reach Argamania. Gary put the device away and lay down on the hard ground. He sighed and covered his eyes with his arm. His aura showed Samiah that sadness alone wasn't the cause of his burden. It had to do with his secret. Whatever he was keeping from them, it was eating him away.

The straightest way to Argor was to cut through the dry and hot wasteland. They had packed as much water as they could carry but the Razor's Blood had taken up a lot of space in their bags. By the fourth day, they were down to one measly bottle of water to share among themselves. Samiah was also concerned about their mounts. They hadn't had any water since they left. Gary guaranteed they could go for days without drinking, but she thought that was borderline animal cruelty. On the fifth day, Samiah finally noticed a change in the landscape and her heart began to hope again. The harsh, rocky whiteness gave way to luscious green, blue, and purple vegetation. Scattered ancient trees popped up here and there, until there were so many they formed an almost impenetrable green wall ahead of them.

"This must be the edge of Alios Forest," Malachiax pointed out.

"Then we're in Lorexian." Gary looked at an old parchment he'd explained was an atlas of Arcadia.

Samiah had seen an atlas before through a protective glass at the Royal Depository in the Argamanx Castle. The paper in Gary's hands had yellow stains, and she couldn't guess how old it was. There was a strange sheen to it, not common on paper, and she wondered if some kind of preservative coating had been applied to it. Paper made of natural organic matter didn't last long, and by the looks of it, this particular atlas had been in constant use. She should be thanking the peculiarities of Gary's late cousin because if it weren't for his eccentricity, they couldn't have hoped to make it to Argor. It was scary how they relied so much on their technology.

Gary frowned and pursed his lips before he spoke, distress lacing his words. "There is a small town just on the other side of this forest, and unfortunately, going around it would cost us time we don't have."

Samiah's heart squeezed inside her chest, and her mouth turned dry. She knew that completely avoiding civilization would be impossible, but they still had a long way to go before they reached Argamania.

"Let's hope for the best. We're far from Mora. Maybe this city still stands," Malachiax said with more conviction than she felt at the moment.

"I'm not going in there," Ianox said suddenly, and they all turned to look at him. He had already backed his mount up a couple of steps.

"Into the forest?" Malachiax asked.

"It is said that those who go into Alios Forest either go mad or never return."

Samiah locked eyes with Malachiax, and with only that single glance, he pleaded with her not to engage in an argument with Ianox. She bit her tongue and kept quiet.

"Those are legends and not based on any truth. I thought you were a man of science," Malachiax said.

Ianox simply shook his head and closed his eyes. "There's where the lizard demons are said to live."

"Lizard demons?" Samiah couldn't hold her tongue any longer. Malachiax cut her a warning glance, earning a shrug from her in response.

Gary cleared his throat before he spoke. "No, you are mistaking it with Arion Forest."

She frowned at her companion. She'd never heard of Arion Forest before.

"Are you sure?" Ianox asked, almost begging it to be so.

"Yes. Trust me. I wouldn't want to enter Arion Forest either. Alios is safe."

Samiah was lost in the conversation, and her patience was already wearing thin. Without waiting for a decision to be made, she kicked her mount's hides and urged the beast into the forest.

Malachiax followed her right away, and then she heard the sound of Gary's and Ianox's beasts close behind. She slowed her pace so she could ride alongside Gary.

"What was that all about?" she whispered so Ianox couldn't hear her.

"Is Ianox originally from Argor?" Gary asked suddenly.

His question caught Samiah off guard. "I thought so, but I'm not completely sure, to be honest. We aren't close. Why?"

The young Jackurian clenched his jaw and frowned. "I just had a thought." He paused and shook his head. "It's of no consequence."

It was her turn to grind her teeth. Gary couldn't simply hint at something and not follow through. What kind of torture was that? If it concerned Ianox, one more reason for Gary to voice his thoughts out loud. Samiah already didn't trust Ianox, and if there was something they should be concerned about regarding his odd behavior, they needed to know. She was about to insist on the matter when the small hairs on her neck rose and the feeling they were being observed took hold. Her spine went taut as her eyes scanned their surroundings. Her ears strained for any sound that didn't belong to nature. Nothing seemed out of place; no hidden figures were behind the larger-than-life trees that made Alios Forest famous.

She tried to dispel the feeling of foreboding, but the tall ancient trees with their wide trunks were smothering her. Their crowns stood so far off the ground, she couldn't discern the shape of the leaves in the lowest branches. They completely blocked out the sun, enveloping them in a greenish gloom. They maneuvered around gigantic roots that looked more like fallen logs blocking their path. The ground was covered with dark green wild moss that created a soft carpet under their mounts' hooves. Little critters and animals skittered out of their way, and the anxiety wrapped around Samiah's heart eased off. She took it as a good sign that the wildlife was still behaving as it should.

Maybe this small town has not fallen yet, Samiah thought, trying to hold on to hope. But as the forest began to thin out and the sky was visible again, her heart sank. Rising smoke tainted an otherwise unblemished sky. Their rides stopped of their own accord, as if they could sense in their very cores the wrongness ahead of them.

The forest ended at the beginning of a downhill path. They had left the flatness behind, and Samiah could see the town spread before them on an uneven landscape—little mounds dotted with colorful houses and old, translucent brick roads. All of the dwellings looked devoid of life, and the source of the smoke lay hidden behind a hill. They had seen the exact same phenomenon in Morang.

"I think we should take another shot of Razor's Blood," Ianox said.

Samiah could still feel the effects of the last shot she had taken. She shook her head. Gary peered at her, his outstretched hand holding her dosage of the beverage.

“It hasn’t been long enough since our last dose. Someone has to maintain a clear head, and it’s better if it’s me.”

“Sami, it’s too risky,” Malachiax countered, but she wouldn’t be swayed.

“I was able to fight that wraith on my own. I can do it again if necessary. Razor’s Blood might protect you from possession, but it won’t help in case you need to fight against a frenzied mob.”

“Then I should be the one abstaining from my dose.”

“No!” she shouted, then berated herself for her lack of control. Giving away their location wasn’t in the plan. “Mal, I can’t lose you to those things,” she said in a much lower tone.

Malachiax opened his mouth to counter her argument, but Gary interrupted him. “Samiah is right. You’ll do much more damage if you become possessed. With her in control, she can at least guide us so we won’t do something stupid.”

Knowing he wouldn’t win this fight, Malachiax drank his share of Razor’s Blood. His gaze never left Samiah’s as he gulped down his shield against their unknown enemy. She knew relinquishing the protector role to her wasn’t something he did with a light heart; he would hate every second of it, and she loved him for it. But losing him to those beings wasn’t an option.

She could see the change in his demeanor immediately by how his facial muscles relaxed and by the goofy grin that followed. He moved closer and leaned sideways so he could pull her to him and give her a sloppy kiss. Gary and Ianox made gagging sounds, and by the heat spreading through Samiah’s cheeks, she knew her face must have turned a deep shade of red. Their rides became agitated; maybe they didn’t like to be so close to each other, or maybe Ianox’s control was slipping. Malachiax finally pulled away, but his heated stare never left her face. She would have enjoyed the moment if she weren’t so terrified about what possibly lay ahead. She chanced a glance at Ianox, but he was already on his way down with Gary by his side. Samiah’s ride calmed again, and she steered it toward their unknown future.

The moment they entered the town, she felt oppressed by the houses lining the streets. Their cheery colors clashed with the tomblike silence that greeted them. An irrational urge to spur her ride to a steady and fast gallop overcame Samiah, the crawling pace too difficult to bear. But the noise their hooves would make against the hard brick was something they were trying to avoid at any cost. Stealth above speed.

They reached the main town square and finally uncovered the source of the smoke. In front of a peculiar water fountain with statues depicting men and women with wings stood the biggest building they had seen so far. The flames had died, leaving behind a big piece of charcoal that barely resembled a town hall. The two-story structure seemed on the verge of collapsing.

Once they circled the fountain, they saw a lonely figure standing right in front of it. Covered in soot and with clothes torn in several places, a youngster had his back to them. He didn’t appear to be older than ten. He was so oblivious to everything he didn't even hear their approach. Samiah's heart broke at the sight.

Malachiax climbed off his ride and took a couple of tentative steps toward the child.

"What are you doing?" Ianox whispered as he tried to catch hold of Mal's shirt. He was too intoxicated and missed, almost falling off his mount. He threw his body forward and hugged the beast, trying to keep his balance. "He might be one of them."

"He's just a child, Ianox." Malachiax turned to the boy again. "Hello."

The boy snapped his head in the direction of Mal's voice, his prism-colored eyes widening in fear. He was an aura-reader like Samiah.

"It's okay. I'm not going to hurt you." Malachiax took small steps in the youngster's direction, raising his hand in a peaceful gesture as if to give his words more meaning.

"They killed everyone. They took Mother and Father, and they burned them." He pointed at the still-smoldering building with a trembling finger.

Malachiax knelt in front of the boy so they were at the same eye level. "What's your name?"

"Sonni." He eyed Malachiax with suspicion. "You have a strange accent. Where are you from?"

"I'm from Argor."

Sonni tilted his head to the side, a new glint appearing on his innocent face. "Where is that? Is it far from here?"

The child's question threw Samiah off. He was old enough. He should have known where Argor was. She looked at him more closely, focusing on her gift so she could see his aura. She was baffled when she couldn't.

"Not that far, but we'll get there and send help."

There was a long pause before Sonni spoke with complete calmness. "I can't let you do that."

The aura that wasn't there suddenly appeared. All black. But before Samiah could utter any warning, Sonni slashed his arm in front of him. She stared in utter horror, paralyzed, as Malachiax collapsed to the ground, clutching his throat. She thought she screamed, or maybe they all did.

Everything turned into chaos. Bedraggled children poured into the town square out of nowhere, all with soulless eyes and blackened auras. Ianox tried to calm their animals as Gary kept Samiah from running to Malachiax, who was wasting away before her eyes. His face turned paler with every pump of his heart that spilled his blood away. When her ride veered suddenly to the opposite direction of the frenzied children, she yanked at the horns, trying to steer it toward Mal. She couldn't leave him there. It was irrational. She could already feel the invisible thread that linked their souls stretch to an impossible length, ready to snap. Mal's essence was vanishing. He was dying. She had to save him.

In an act of desperation, Samiah jumped off her ride, not caring when her elbows and knees were scratched raw. She grabbed her metal rod and swung away, hitting anyone who crossed her path. She felt like a deranged woman with tunnel vision, only seeing Mal's sprawled form ahead of her. Sonni, the boy who had attacked Malachiax, stood next to him. He didn't look crazy at all. His calm and calculating demeanor was much more chilling than the wild behavior of his companions. That was a fact Samiah should have taken into consideration, should have remembered, for she knew Sonni wasn't like the others. He was a much more cunning and powerful enemy than his counterparts. Maybe he was their leader. But she only cared about Mal.

She fell before she could reach him. A burning sensation flared on her back and spread throughout her body. Someone landed on top of her and pulled her hair back so hard she thought it would peel off her scalp. She thrashed on the ground, her arms twisting at impossible angles, trying to pull her attacker off, but all her efforts were in vain. Her face was brought down hard against the stony ground, the impact reverberating through her entire skull. She couldn't focus, couldn't move. Then she heard a battle cry, and the pressure on her back vanished. She didn't look back, didn't care to see what had scared her attacker off. She crawled in Mal's direction instead, ignoring the fight that still raged around them.

When she finally reached him, she rolled him over and saw the gash in his throat. Blood still poured freely from the wound. She placed her hand over it, trying to stop the flow. Malachiax stared at her wide-eyed. She'd never seen so much fear in his gaze. The little flecks of silver in his irises had dulled, turning his eyes almost the color of midnight, starless.

"It will be okay, my love. Stay with me."

He opened his mouth but before he could say anything, his eyes rolled back, hiding behind their sockets.

"Mal! Wake up! Don't leave me."

Caught up in her despair, she didn't notice something was coming in their direction until she heard the sound of a spear ring awfully close to her ear. She was splashed with blood in the next moment, the slick fluid hot on her back. She turned to see a youngster impaled by the weapon, the expression on his face still frozen in an animalistic manner. His body gradually turned black until it vanished into ashes. Just like the Morian girl.

Samiah whipped her face in the opposite direction when she sensed someone approach. Her eyes widened when she took in the tall warrior who stopped a few paces from her and Malachiax. His skin was aquamarine green and partially covered by translucent scales. Eyes the color of gold peered at her with curiosity. His hair was long on top but shaved on one side. Silver fringe covered part of his face when he cocked his head to examine her further.

"Who are you?"

"Your childhood's nightmare." He flashed a wicked grin right before she felt a prickle on her neck. Then the world turned black.

Chapter 16

Slowly, Samiah regained consciousness. At first, it felt like she was wading through mud, her limbs heavy. She tried to open her eyes, but her eyelids wouldn't cooperate, so she strained her other senses instead. Her ears heard nothing but her breathing. The exposed skin on her arms was caressed by something soft and warm. Her head lay on a pillow of sorts. Whoever had taken her did not wish her immediate harm.

Memories began to slowly trickle down inside her brain, and Mal's face came to the forefront of her mind. He had been injured. Badly. Her eyes flew open, breaking through the lethargy as if her worry for Malachiax had fired up every single cell in her body. She pushed herself to a sitting position and her muscles protested. She was sore everywhere, but the worst pain came from her forehead and scalp. Touching the tender spot, she felt a bandage there.

The sound of water dripping echoed around her, and she finally took stock of her room. Rough, red stone walls surrounded her, and besides the bed she occupied, there was only one small table with a ceramic pitcher on top. Little light orbs buried deep inside indentations along the wall gave the room a warm glow. The chamber was chilly, though.

Where am I?

The sound of footsteps approaching made her heart lurch in her chest as a spike of adrenaline shot through her body. She stared in the direction of the dark opening that gave away nothing but an impenetrable void. She jumped out of bed and scanned the room. There was nothing there to serve as a weapon besides the pitcher. She made a grab for it just as she felt a presence looming by the entrance. Pivoting on the spot, she raised the pitcher high above her head. Lochiana stood there, holding a tray in her hands.

"You're awake. I'm glad." Her eyes focused on the pitcher and the corners of her lips twitched upward. "That wouldn't have done much damage to our hosts."

Samiah lowered the makeshift weapon, glad to see that Lochiana was alive and well, but she felt far from relaxed.

"Where are we? Who took us?"

"Old myths of Arcadia who were long forgotten and wish to remain so." She walked to the table next to the bed and placed the tray on top of it. There was a ceramic bowl with some kind of brew in it, but eating was the last thing on Samiah's list of priorities.

She shook her head. "Please don't speak in riddles."

Lochiana sighed out loud and sat on the edge of Samiah's bed. "I don't know the truth of their story. Their king wasn't very forthcoming with information. All I have to go on are the tales we were told as youngsters when we behaved badly. 'If you are naughty, the lizard beasts will take you away and tear you apart, limb by limb.'" Lochiana changed her tone of voice to sound like a grouchy old lady.

"Are you talking about the lizard monsters? Ianox mentioned them during our journey. I didn't think they were real."

"Me neither. The good news is that they don't seem to want to hurt us right now. The bad news is that they don't seem inclined to help us either."

"Where's Mal?" Samiah went straight to what was important to her.

"He's in the chamber next to yours."

"I want to see him." Samiah took a step toward the exit.

"You will once the healers are done with him. They shouldn't be interrupted."

"He's my mate! I need to be by his side. How do I know the healers aren't harming him?" Samiah made a start for the opening, but Lochiana jumped off the bed faster than Samiah could blink and blocked her path.

"They won't harm him. If you burst into that room with accusation in your eyes, they will take it as an insult. I've read their auras, Samiah. They are a proud race and are easily offended. The best thing you can do right now is eat and regain your strength."

Her irises began to swirl and Samiah raised her hand, blocking Lochiana's gaze from hers. "Don't you dare compel me again."

"You remember?" She sounded surprised.

"Yes, of course I remember." She took a few steps back just to be safe.

"That's fascinating."

Samiah peered at her, not understanding what she found so fascinating.

"I apologize for using my powers on you. It's something I'm still learning to control. I didn't mean to do it again now."

"Do you make it a habit of compelling people?" Samiah replied sharply. It seemed to her that Lochiana was sorrier to have been caught than anything else.

"No, of course not. You are the second person I've done it to. The first time was when I came into possession of my full powers. I've been trying to mask it ever since."

"How many people know about the truth of your gift?"

"Only you. If anyone knew, they wouldn't trust me, or they would try to exploit me in some perverse way."

Her words gave Samiah pause. The power to compel Arcadians in the wrong hands could be tragic. “I won’t tell a soul, but only if you promise to never use your powers against me or Mal.”

Lochiana nodded, seemingly relieved by Samiah’s vow.

“I promise. Now eat your food. The Draki king wishes to speak with you.”

“The Draki?”

“That’s what they are called. Please, don’t ever say ‘lizard beast’ in front of them. They don’t like that name very much.”

Lochiana shuddered, and Samiah wondered if she had experienced firsthand their displeasure at that moniker. Samiah walked to the table and picked up the bowl. She smelled the brew first and didn’t recognize any of the fragrance.

“What is this?”

“I’m not sure. I just ate mine without question. I knew it wasn’t poisoned, so....” She shrugged and laced her hands behind her back.

Samiah took a bite of the cold brew, trying her best to ignore the grainy texture and the bitter aftertaste it left on her tongue. It didn’t make her sick so she considered that a win. She ate it all. Her belly now full, her strength began to return little by little.

“Ready?” Lochiana asked.

“Are we going to meet the king now?” Samiah swallowed hard as the drop of apprehension dripped down her back.

“Yes.”

“Then I guess I’m ready.”

She followed Lochiana into the darkness, wondering why they weren’t using a light orb. As soon as she entered the pitch-black hallway, she realized there was no need for it. She could see everything clearly, from the uneven stone ground beneath her feet to the swirly symbols painted on the rugged walls.

There were many twists, and along the way, they passed other tunnels that led up or down. Lochiana never seemed unsure of where to go despite the labyrinth nature of the cave. Samiah would file away that observation to ask her later.

The further they moved from her chamber, the more her heart constricted with worry for Malachiax. She should have insisted to check on him first. Samiah turned her sense of awareness inward and felt the link that connect Mal’s core to hers intact. He was alive. She would have to take solace in that for the time being.

She lost track of time. They seemed to have been walking for hours before the tunnel they were in opened to a vast chamber bathed in silver moonlight. Samiah would have looked up to see where the light was coming from if not for the sight—or more exactly, the assembly—that awaited them. Close to a hundred Draki peered at her and Lochiana, some with open curiosity, others with suspicion. They stayed close to the walls, leaving the middle of the round chamber empty, thus providing them an unobstructed view of the dais. A single throne stood there and a male Draki Samiah could only assume was their king sat on it, looking at them with an air of superiority. He was accompanied by a younger male and female, one on each side of his throne. Samiah immediately recognized the male warrior and her spine went rigid. He was the one who had saved her. Upon noticing Samiah's reaction to him, he nodded in her direction and smirked. Next to her, Lochiana made a small sound in the back of her throat.

"I see the other soul gazer is awake," the Draki king said, his booming voice reverberating through the walls.

Soul gazer? Samiah glanced at Lochiana, but her gaze remained fixed on the Draki warrior. Samiah returned her attention to the king.

"Approach the dais so I can have a better look at you," the king commanded.

She hesitated. Lochiana touched her arm to get her attention, and then she nodded. She walked with Samiah, even though she hadn't been ordered to do so. Her action didn't seem to bother the king, and Samiah was glad she hadn't let her face him alone.

As she drew nearer, she noticed the king's skin was wrinkled and the scales covering part of his face were not as pearly as those of the young warrior. His hair was as white as the Morian desert plains, his eyes a deep shade of red. She couldn't hold his scrutinizing gaze for too long, so she glanced at the female to his right. Samiah was struck by the devastating nature of her foreign beauty. Her skin was flawless and a light blue color, almost gray. She didn't possess any scales where Samiah could see, and her lovely face was framed by long, strawberry-blonde hair. Her eyes were what gave her pause. She had prism-colored eyes like she and Lochiana.

"Yes, my daughter Chrysa is also a soul gazer, just like her Arcadian mother was," the king said, drawing Samiah's attention back to him.

She didn't know what to say to that revelation, especially considering the first thought that popped into her head was So you can breed with us. She wished Mal were there. He was much better at diplomacy than she was.

"Thank you for saving us," she said instead.

The king seemed surprised by her reply. Perhaps he had been testing her. The emotion was fleeting, though, soon replaced by a glower.

"That wasn't on my command. Femror made that decision on his own." The king looked at the warrior next to him. The young Draki clenched his jaw but said nothing.

"If I were a merciless king, I would cut your throats as punishment for what you brought upon us again."

The king's open threat felt like a sucker punch to Samiah's stomach, and she took a step back. Maybe Ianox had been right to fear the Draki. Then it occurred to her that she didn't know about his fate or Gary's.

"You had all the chance in the world to warn us about the portal, and yet you chose to stay hidden in your cave and do nothing," Lochiana said without a hint of fear in her voice.

The king leveled her with a glare, but Lochiana seemed unperturbed by it. She lifted her chin and stood tall and proud. The king merely made a tsking sound and leaned back on his throne, rubbing his chin. Samiah slid her gaze to Femror when he shifted his position. She caught a slight change on his face. It seemed to her that the corner of his lips had curved upward as he stared intently in Lochiana's direction.

Then the last word from the king's remark was finally processed by her brain.

"Again?" she asked. "Does that mean the portal has been opened before?"

The king flattened his lips and stared at her through slits. Seconds went by while the Draki leader remained quietly staring at her as if she were a spineless critter. She didn't avert her gaze that time. She was losing patience, but Lochiana cracked first.

"Well?" she asked.

"Yes. The portal had once been active. It was how my people first came into this world."

"Did you come from the same land as those wraiths? Do you know what they are?" Samiah couldn't help the eagerness in her voice. Learning new things gave her more thrill than traveling across the galaxy.

"No," Femror stated, breaking his silence. "The portal changed its nature after we came through. It does not lead to our land any longer."

"Where does it lead, then?" Samiah's gaze bounced around the three Draki on the dais.

"To a place of solitude and despair where darkness is so absolute, not even the light of the brightest star can break through," the king's daughter said.

"Wonderful." Lochiana threw her hands up in the air. "How do we close it?"

The king shifted on his throne and his expression twisted as if he were in actual pain. "Sealing the portal the first time came at great cost. We had to give up part of our essence to do it. Are your people willing to make the same sacrifice?"

"If it means saving the planet? Absolutely," Lochiana replied.

The king cocked his head and grinned ruefully. "Do you also speak for your former betrothed?"

Samiah frowned at the king before she glanced in Lochiana's direction. How did the Draki king know about Lord Droom?

"Why do you single him out? He will abide by the council's decision."

The king's grin turned into a full-bloom smile, and a glint of madness flashed in his red eyes. "Well, my dear, it seems you don't know the man you once loved very well. I singled him out because Lord Droom holds the key to your salvation."

"What key?" Lochiana asked through clenched teeth.

"The Spheres of Sharra, naturally."

"Impossible," she said as her face turned ashen.

"What are the Spheres of Sharra?" Samiah asked, hating that she no longer knew what they spoke of.

“The Spheres of Sharra are—”

A loud commotion interrupted the king, and a moment later, Ianox was brought into the throne room, thrashing against the hold of two humongous Draki warriors. They threw him roughly onto the ground in front the king’s throne.

“What’s the meaning of this?” the king asked, leaning forward.

“He attacked a healer,” one of the warriors answered.

The change in the room’s atmosphere was unmistakable. Samiah could feel the animosity and anger aimed at them humming above her skin. Murder was written in the king’s eyes as his sharp nails dug into the armrests of his seat.

“We saved and sheltered you, and that’s how you repay us? By attacking one of our own?”

Ianox raised his head and spoke the words Lochiana had warned Samiah not to say.

“The lizard king.”

The king stood, towering over Ianox as the nightmare the legends claimed him to be. He was no longer young, but he still possessed a strong warrior frame. Femror took an offensive stance, and Samiah felt other warriors in the room do the same.

“There will be no more assistance. Guards, take the prisoners away.”

Prisoners?

“Wait,” Samiah said as a beefy hand wrapped around her forearm. “You can’t do this. We need you to help us save the planet.”

“Arcadia be damned.” Those were the last words the king spoke before his mighty warriors dragged them all to an unknown fate.

Chapter 17

“Watch it,” Lochiana said as a stocky Draki warrior shoved her forward into a stony cell.

Samiah was pushed next, not too gently either. The sound of the metal bars clicking shut made her cringe, but two hunched figures in the corner of their prison kept her from turning around to glower at their captors.

“Mal,” she whispered, not believing her own eyes.

He looked up upon hearing his name and her heart rejoiced at seeing his face. Samiah ran to him and jumped in his waiting open arms, forgetting that he had been injured and that her reckless action could harm him further.

“I thought I had lost you.” She buried her face against his chest and let out a loud sob.

His strong arms wrapped around her back as he pulled her closer and kissed the top of her head. “You won’t lose me that easily, my love.”

She looked up, and with eyes already blurry, she stared at the bandage around his neck. She swallowed the lump in her throat before her eyes took stock of his gaunt face. He must have read the anguish in them, for he lowered his head and kissed her with a maddening possession, as if they were alone in the room. Samiah forgot their companions as well, matching the tempo of his feverish tongue beat by beat while her hands laced behind his neck.

A throat clearing behind her made Malachiax pull back, and she missed the connection instantly. He pulled her across his lap, and with hands still locked behind his neck, she looked over her shoulder to find Gary standing next to Lochiana and Ianox. She narrowed her eyes at the latter.

“What are we going to do now?” she asked.

Lochiana followed Samiah’s gaze and delivered a glower of her own in Ianox’s direction. His reaction was to walk to a corner and stare at the ground. Imbecile, Samiah thought angrily.

“Could anyone explain why the Draki are so angry at us?” Gary asked.

“Ianox attacked one of their healers, and to boot, he called the Draki king a lizard,” Samiah replied.

“He is a lizard, and I thought their healer was trying to kill me.” Ianox raised his head to stare hard at her.

“Oh be quiet, Ianox. We don’t have time for your half-baked excuses.” Lochiana walked to the prison door and tested the metal rods. “This seems to be made out of pergamax.”

Gary frowned and stood next to Lochiana, examining the earthly colored metal. “That’s impossible. These rods are too smooth. Pergamax is too unstable and would never hold such shape.”

“True, unless it is mixed with another metal—copper, to be exact,” Lochiana replied.

“I have never heard of such material.”

Lochiana glanced at Gary. “You wouldn’t. It’s a common metal from Planet X-57.”

“Earth?” Samiah said. “How would the Draki have access to an otherworldly metal?”

Lochiana looked at her with a glint of excitement in her gaze. “That is something we must find out.”

“We have to get out of here first and stop whatever came through the portal,” Malachiax said.

“The Draki king knows how. He said Lord Droom has the key to do it. The Spheres of Sharra.” Samiah looked at Lochiana. “What are they?”

“It can’t be true. Lord Droom can’t possibly have all the spheres in his possession. That would be a serious violation of the Arcadian treaties,” Malachiax said.

Samiah twisted in her position to peer at him.

“You know what they are?” He nodded and she got a little angry. “How come you never mentioned them before?”

“I’m sorry, Sami. The existence of the Spheres of Sharra is a secret only known by the royal families and the highest-ranking officers. I couldn’t tell you.”

“But what are they?” she asked a little too impatiently.

“They are the Sacred Powers of Arcadia in tangible form,” Lochiana replied. “Each ruling family is—or was—responsible for one sphere. If what the Draki king said is true and Lord Droom possesses all of them...,” Lochiana paused and closed her eyes for a moment, “it means he betrayed the council. One ruler should not have all that power in his hands.”

“If that’s true, he will never let us take the spheres,” Samiah said.

“He must have had a good reason to take them—that is, if we can trust the word of the Draki king,” Malachiax replied.

“I don’t think he was lying,” Lochiana said, surprising Samiah. She caught her incredulous stare and added, “I want to believe Malachiax, but I’m not as naïve when it comes to Lord Droom as I used to be.”

Samiah wondered what had truly happened between Lochiana and Malachiax’s uncle. Lochiana revealed nothing in her stony expression.

“What are our options, then? The Draki won’t help us now.” Samiah glared at Ianox.

Lochiana returned her attention to the gate, more precisely to its lock. “One problem at a time. First, we must escape.” She crouched in front of it and squinted. “If only we had a small, sharp piece of metal, I could try to pick this lock.”

“May I see it?” Gary asked.

Lochiana stood and made room for Gary. He took her place in front of the lock and stared at it intently for several beats. Finally, he unfurled from his crouch position, rubbing his face before he bent down and retrieved a small leather pouch from a hidden compartment on the side his boot.

“What’s that?” Samiah asked.

“Tools.” Gary grinned at her.

“You own footwear with secret storage?” Lochiana crouched next to Gary to have a better look at his shoes.

“My cousin Trenianx’s invention,” he said with pride before he began to work on the lock.

He took several metal objects from his small tool pouch, some with sharp tips, others with odd shapes. Samiah couldn’t begin to guess their uses, but Gary seemed to know what he was doing. It wasn’t just a simple lock; it took him close to an hour to figure out the mechanisms of the Draki handicraft. When they finally heard a metallic click, Samiah jumped off Malachiax’s lap, ready to get out of that place.

“Did it work?” Ianox took an eager step toward the gate.

Without answering him, Gary stood up and pushed it open. “Ta-da!”

“You did it!” Lochiana clapped her hands.

Gary smiled at her. “Sorry it took so long. I’m not that skilled in mechanics.”

Lochiana tapped his shoulder as she walked past him. “Well done, Gary. Come on now. We must hurry.”

They followed her out of the suffocating cell, almost running down the tunnel. Then everything turned pitch black.

“I can’t see anything,” Samiah said.

“Tandrum’s wrath! Me neither,” she heard Lochiana say a little far ahead from them.

“We should have grabbed a light orb from the cell,” Malachiax admonished behind her.

“We didn’t need a light orb to navigate the cave tunnels before,” Samiah said, annoyed at herself for not grabbing a light orb regardless.

“I’m afraid whatever magic allowed us to do so before is gone now,” Lochiana replied.

“They are going to catch us and eat us,” Ianox whined.

“Shut up, Ianox,” Samiah snapped.

She felt a hand on her shoulder and jumped on the spot.

“Relax, Sami. It’s me,” Malachiax said near her ear before lacing his fingers with hers. “Let’s not panic. We’ll make a live chain and stick close to the walls.”

Samiah raised her hand in front of her and searched blindly until she felt someone’s chest. “Who is this?”

“It’s me, Gary.”

“I have Ianox,” Lochiana said in the darkness.

A moment later, Gary stated, “Me too.”

“All right. Are we all linked?” Malachiax asked.

“Yes,” they all replied in unison.

“I think I’ve found the wall,” Lochiana added.

“Okay, let’s keep moving close to it,” Malachiax said.

“But where are we going? How can we know which way leads to the exit?” Ianox asked.

“We’re only deprived of sight. Use your other senses,” Malachiax replied.

They inched forward, hugging the rough stone wall, and with each step, the fear kept growing inside of Samiah. She tried to heed Mal’s words and trust her instincts, but the darkness was so absolute, so oppressive, that it felt like she was drowning in it. She held Mal’s hand in a vicious hold, terrified of losing him in that bottomless nightmare.

She easily lost track of time. It felt like they had been walking for days, but she knew it wasn’t so. Suddenly, she felt Gary stop in front of her.

“I feel a bifurcation ahead. I believe one way goes up and the other down,” Lochiana said from the front of the line.

“Anything else you can sense?” Malachiax asked.

“There’s a breeze coming from the path upward.”

“Then that’s where we should head,” Ianox said.

“I’m not sure. The air seems fresher going downward,” Lochiana replied.

“If there’s a breeze coming through the path that leads up, it means there’s an opening. We should head in that direction,” Ianox insisted.

Samiah hated to agree with Ianox, but his argument made sense. “What do you think, Mal?”

“Let’s go up. If there’s an opening, I can work with that.”

They continued their way upward, but as the path grew steeper and steeper, Samiah wondered if they had made the best decision. But when a gush of cold wind ripped through their group, she let herself hope again. She also began to discern Gary’s shape in front of her, which meant the tunnel was becoming less gloomy.

“There’s light ahead,” Lochiana announced, and that gave Samiah renewed stamina. She ignored the ache in her legs and pushed through the upward trek. The glow that invaded the darkness became brighter, revealing a sharp corner ahead.

“I think that’s the way out,” Ianox said.

Excitement filled Samiah’s heart only to be crushed when they turned the bend and came face-to-face with a group of Draki warriors. She had no doubt they had been waiting for them.

Chapter 18

“Going somewhere?” The warrior in the middle smirked at their group, his hand resting lazily over the sword hanging from his belt.

“You will let us go,” Lochiana replied, and the mountain-sized Draki glowered at her.

“Your sneaky mind games won’t work on us, Lady,” the warrior sneered at her.

Malachiax took a step back and pulled Samiah with him. Since they were all still linked by hand, they all retreated. He squeezed her hand as if he was trying to tell her something. She had an inkling what he was going to do.

“Please don’t do it, Mal. It’s too dangerous,” she spoke to his mind.

He squeezed her hand again, more forcibly that time. Tandrum’s wrath. He’s going to do it. Every muscle in Samiah’s body tensed as she braced for Mal’s next move. She squeezed Gary’s hand, hoping to convey the same silent message Malachiax had given her.

“Where’s Femror? I would like to speak with him,” Lochiana said, no fear showing in her voice.

“Oh, it seems Femror has caught the eye of the lady,” one of the Draki said, and the rest laughed.

They didn’t hear Lochiana’s reply, for in that moment, the ground between them and the band of warriors exploded in a shower of rocks.

“Run!” Malachiax shouted before he dragged Samiah back into darkness.

Mercifully, the others caught on with the program and didn’t break the link as they ran down the tunnel that had turned pitch black once more. Samiah tripped over something and collided against Mal’s back, losing Gary in the process.

“Samiah!” he yelled.

“I’m right here. Keep hugging the wall.”

More than ever in her life, she wanted to have just a smidge of the fire gift in her core.

“We’re never going to leave this cave alive,” Ianox whined, and Samiah thought it would be fantastic if she didn’t have a conscience. She would then be able to leave the fool behind in the darkness and not lose any sleep over it. They were in that mess thanks to the idiot. Blast my morals!

“I think I found the other tunnel,” Malachiax said.

It was impossible to know for certain if they weren’t going back to their cell, but the ground did become steeper. Not much later, Samiah heard a splash followed by Mal’s curse. Her own boots turned soaking wet with the next couple of steps she took.

“Why is there water here?”

“I don’t know. Let’s keep moving.”

They followed Malachiax’s lead. What other option did they have? But the water kept rising, and when it reached Samiah’s mid thigh, she made Malachiax stop.

“We can’t keep going. The water is getting higher.”

It was then that she noticed she could no longer touch the rough wall. She reached with her right arm and only found empty air. “I don’t think we are in a tunnel anymore.”

“The air does feel cooler here,” Gary said.

A rubble echoed all around them and Samiah’s heart skipped a beat. “Did you all hear that?”

“It didn’t sound good,” Lochiana replied right before the ground beneath their feet vanished and they were sucked down a hole with a loud whoosh.

It happened so fast, Samiah’s scream lodged in her throat and she lost her hold on Mal’s hand. The drop didn’t last long—maybe a few seconds—before they fell into a gelid pool. The temperature shock seized Samiah’s lungs, and she thrashed in the darkness, creating a mess of bubbles. She couldn’t find the way up, and panic made her sink farther into the water.

Dark spots appeared in her vision, and she knew she was seconds away from passing out when a pair of hands grabbed her arms and yanked her in a specific direction. Samiah hoped it was toward the surface. Her head finally broke through the barrier, and she filled her lungs with air in a big gasp. Water spluttered from her mouth as she coughed. Once the fit stopped, she blinked to get rid of the thick water drops on her lashes and took in her surroundings. It was a cave illuminated by glowworms attached to the walls and the domed ceiling. Samiah squinted and spotted the hole they had come through.

A splash nearby caught her attention, and she turned in time to see Femror and Malachiax emerge from the dark surface.

“Mal!” She swam in his direction.

“Samiah!” He met her halfway and pulled her into his arms, resting his chin on her shoulder. “I couldn’t find you.”

“I’m here. I’m here.”

Femror disappeared under the water again. Where is he going? Samiah’s eyes swept the chamber and landed on Gary and Ianox already out of the frigid lake. The only person missing was Lochiana. Had she...? No, Samiah couldn’t entertain the idea. Lochiana had to be okay.

Once they crawled onto the rocky shore, Samiah’s body began to shake uncontrollably. Malachiax pulled her flush to him, but he was also as cold as ice. Samiah searched the dark surface of the lake, which remained undisturbed for far too long. She began to think the worst had happened. What if Femror couldn’t find Lochiana in time? She closed her eyes and asked the Sacred Powers to spare her friend. She couldn’t bear the thought of losing someone close to her again.

Her eyes had begun to prickle when Femror finally resurfaced with Lochiana in his arms. She was unconscious. He floated on his back and swam to shore using only one arm while the other held Lochiana's head above the water. As soon as they were ashore, he began the process of reviving her. Samiah covered her mouth with her hand and sobbed. They could not lose Lochiana.

Femror pressed his palms over Lochiana's chest and pumped with precise vigor right before he clamped her nose shut to blow air into her mouth.

"Come on, Lady. Don't give up on me now," Femror said right before he restarted the steps.

It was only on the third time that Lochiana started to cough up water. Femror turned her onto her side and massaged her back while she emptied her lungs of liquid. The gentleness of his action was a stark contrast to his fearsome warrior persona.

Once Lochiana stopped heaving, she leaned on her forearm and scanned their group. Then she looked at Femror, who had not taken his gaze from her the entire time. He seemed stricken and worried beyond measure.

"You saved us. Why?" she asked feebly.

"I couldn't let you drown in our lake. We drink from this water," he replied, but his words didn't match his expression.

Lochiana sat up and frowned at him. "Thank you, nonetheless. I suppose now you must take us to your father."

Femror got to his feet and offered his hand to Lochiana. She stared at it for a couple of seconds before she accepted the help. Once she stood in front of him, he took a couple of steps away from her, as if being near her caused him actual pain. He turned to us. "Are you all fit to travel? It's a long way from here to Argor."

"Wait? Are you helping us escape?" Samiah asked.

"It seems so." Femror walked to the side and retrieved a burlap sack from the ground that Samiah had completely missed.

"Why?" Lochiana eyed the warrior not with suspicion, but wonder.

Femror glanced in her direction and clenched his jaw before replying, "Because Arcadia is my home, whether I like it or not. I don't want it to perish at the hands of the Myserians. They will destroy everything."

"Myserians?" Samiah frowned.

"That's what we call the wraiths that are now loose once more. They must be stopped."

Femror shoved his hand inside his sack and pulled out a flask made of some sort of animal skin. He removed the cap and took a large sip before offering the beverage to the others.

"Drink up."

"What's that?" Samiah eyed the flask with suspicion.

"It's Razor's Blood." Lochiana reached for it and drank a large sip with a grimace.

The flask was passed around. When Samiah was feeling its effect fully, she asked Malachiax.

“What are the chances Lord Droom will give us the Spheres of Sharra?”

“I honestly don’t know, Sami. I’m still having a hard time believing he has all the relics.”

“Oh, he has them. There’s no doubt about it.” Femror hoisted his bag over his shoulder and stared hard at the group.

Malachiax frowned at the warrior before replying. “If that’s the case, we’ll just ask him to give us the spheres.”

Lochiana snorted. “Fat chance of that happening.”

“Lord Droom trusts Mal. He’ll listen to him,” Samiah replied to support her mate, but she wasn’t one hundred percent sure her sovereign would do it. She trusted the man as far as she could throw him.

“And if he doesn’t?” Gary asked.

The corner of Femror’s lips twitched upward. “If he doesn’t, we’ll have to steal them.”

Chapter 19

Femror led them out the Draki hidden compound through a series of mazelike tunnels and secret passages. Lochiana realized bitterly that they would have never made it out on their own. She couldn't wrap her head around Femror's motives. Sometimes he seemed to be on her side, but other times he was downright antagonizing. She was still mad at him for standing by and doing nothing when his crazy-ass father imprisoned them. There was no doubt in her mind that the Draki king had one screw loose in his head. She wondered if that was the reason Femror had decided to help them.

They emerged through a trapdoor buried deep in the ground and kept out of sight by the clever placement of leaves and branches over it. It only took a moment for Lochiana to recognize her surroundings—they were in Alios, the famous forest in Lorexian known for its larger-than-life trees. Night greeted them in the silent and gloomy forest; only a few patches of dark green moss were bathed in silvery moonlight.

They walked in silence for a while, until Samiah blurted out of the blue, “How long have you been following us?”

Lochiana suppressed a grin. It had taken the Argorian woman long enough before her inquisitive nature made itself known. Lochiana couldn't wait to see how Femror would react around her. She had learned that the quickest way to get on his nerves was to pester him with endless questions. She didn't know why, but she took great pleasure in annoying him.

Femror didn't answer right away, just kept walking at a brisk pace. Lochiana thought that perhaps he was trying to run away from Samiah. She noticed Samiah was about to prompt him again when he finally spoke. “Since you left Mora.”

Lochiana frowned, knowing that not to be true. He couldn't have followed Samiah and Malachiax while he was busy kidnapping her.

Samiah stopped abruptly in her tracks to glare at Femror's back. “And it didn't occur to you to help us when that mob of enraged Morians attacked us?”

Femror's spine went rigid before he looked over his shoulder. “I misspoke. I wasn't following you myself. My warriors were, and I had given them orders to not interfere unless it became a life-or-death situation.”

Lochiana's snorted. "Your idea of what constitutes a life-or-death situation differs widely from ours."

"I saved you, didn't I?" Even in the gloominess, she could see the eyebrow raise he gave her. Oh, he was such an infuriating male.

"If you call throwing me over your shoulder and taking me against my will as saving me, then I guess you did." She shrugged and was happy to see the glower Femror aimed at her.

"Could you two bicker any louder? I would love to attract some Myserians. I live for the thrill, you know?" Ianox said, and Lochiana narrowed her eyes at the short, annoying man. His gaze bounced everywhere as if he expected to find danger lurking in every corner.

"You speak sarcasm. I'm shocked," Lochiana replied and next to her, Gary chuckled.

"This is going to be a very long trip," Femror muttered and resumed walking. "Keep it up, folks. I want to reach Argor by nightfall."

"That's physically impossible," Gary said. "We are too far to reach Argor by foot in one day. It will take us at least a week."

"Good thing we aren't going on foot, then," Femror replied, but he didn't care to add anything to his statement.

Typical, Lochiana thought. "You're not going to share your plans with us, are you?"

Femror didn't reply, and Lochiana made a vulgar gesture to his back.

"I saw that."

Lochiana's jaw dropped before she glanced at Samiah, who just shook her head and shrugged. He couldn't possibly have seen it, unless he had secret eyes on the back of his head. Great. One more mystery about the Draki for Lochiana to unveil.

He led them deeper into Alios Forest where the vegetation was so thick, they had to push branches out of the way and literally carve a path through the green wall. Moisture clung to her skin, turning it sticky and itchy, and her hair was plastered to her head. She actually missed the cool water from the underground lake. She twisted her thick strands into a bun, which helped cool off her neck at least.

Lochiana heard the sound of water rushing nearby before they reached the stream. Femror must be leading us to the Seven Sisters River. The vegetation gave way to a beautiful meadow with yellow and blue flowers scattered over soft grass. It was almost as though somebody actually tended to the place. A small waterfall cascaded down mossy rocks in a shower of silvery sparkle and fog into the stream. It was quite the sight. Lochiana took a moment to admire the scenery, as opposed to Femror who didn't seem one bit interested in nature and kept going until he disappeared behind the water curtain.

"Where did he go?" Samiah asked.

"Maybe there is a cave behind the waterfall?" Malachiax said, and Samiah shuddered.

"I'm going after him." Lochiana stepped in the same direction Femror had disappeared and didn't wait for them. She wanted to know what the Draki warrior was up to.

A small chamber was indeed behind the cascading water, a hidden place where small canoes had been stored. Upon hearing her approach, Femror looked up.

“We’ll travel down the river until we reach the border to Argor. Then we continue on foot to the capital. We’ll have to split into two groups.” Femror pushed two canoes into the shallow water and threw his burlap sack into one.

“Are you crazy? You want us to venture down one of the most dangerous rapids in all of Arcadia in those tiny things? One hit against a rock, and they will split in half.”

“It’s the fastest way to get to Argor, and also the safest.” Femror tapped the side of the canoe closest to him. “This is solid wood from one of the ancient Alios trees. It will hold, trust me.”

Lochiana eyed the canoes again and bit her lower lip. She agreed it would be fastest, but safest? That they would have to see. But what other choice did they have?

“I’ve gone down the Seven Sisters before. It’s difficult, but not impossible.” Malachiax stared at the canoes. “Mind you, I was on a raft designed to endure the white waters.”

“Now you get to experience the Seven Sisters the Draki way.” Femror smiled ruefully. “Take one canoe, and I’ll handle the other.” He added a couple of oars to each one of them. When no one made the move toward the small boats, Femror glowered. “What are you waiting for, a formal invitation?”

“I’m not getting into a boat with you.” Ianox crossed his arms and glared at Femror.

“Thank the fucking blue skies. I would have thrown you into the river the first time you opened your mouth to whine anyway. It saves me the trouble.” Femror hopped into the canoe with the grace of a catling. The boat didn’t even wobble. Something unfurled in the pit of Lochiana’s stomach. Here she was again appreciating something the warrior did.

His gaze connected with hers, and he smirked, as if he knew the nature of her thoughts. She flattened her lips and raised her chin. When he offered to help get her on board, she ignored his hand and managed on her own. Thank the Sacred Powers she didn’t make a fool of herself.

She sat on the bench opposite his and glanced at the rest of their companions. It was clear that Samiah and Malachiax would stick together, and since Ianox had already announced he wouldn’t be traveling with Femror, that left Gary to come with them. He waddled through the shallow water and when Femror offered his hand, he accepted it.

Lochiana glanced at the other canoe and caught the glower Samiah was aiming at Ianox. She wasn’t happy about the trip’s arrangements. Malachiax leaned forward and kissed Samiah on her cheek, then flicked her nose before taking his place in the middle seat. They are so adorable together, Lochiana thought with a sigh. She wished to find someone one day with whom she could share such a deep bond as theirs. Her eyes involuntarily sought Femror and found him staring at her again. She couldn’t decipher his expression, and she didn’t feel like having a staring contest, so she glanced at the canoe’s floor instead. She would have held his gaze longer if her mind weren’t in such turmoil about the things she was beginning to feel whenever he was near her.

The canoe began to glide smoothly through the water, but they could not help getting wet once they crossed through the waterfall. The water wasn't as cold as the underground lake, but it was enough to warrant a shudder from Lochiana's body. At least she wasn't sticky anymore.

"The sun will be up soon," Femror said, but Lochiana refused to look in his direction. She had the prow position, so she turned on her bench seat instead, giving her back to the warrior.

Morning was indeed a few minutes away; she was already able to see the deep orange tinge of the sky through breaks in the deep foliage of the trees. The river cut through several countries, and throughout its length, there were parts with incredible rapids—seven to be exact, hence the name Seven Sisters. Only thrill seekers found pleasure riding them. If her memory was correct, they would have to survive three of those rapids before they reached Argor. She didn't know exactly when they would come up, but she was sure Femror did.

The current was much stronger already. They cut through the deep waters as an arrow cut through air. The landscape hugging the river became a blur, and soon a cool breeze hit Lochiana's cheeks. She closed her eyes to enjoy the peaceful moment, knowing things were about to get much more complicated.

She would have to face Lord Droom again for the first time in twenty years. Of all the odds stacked against them, that future encounter was what terrified her the most.

Chapter 20

The sun was already high in the sky when Femror moved his canoe closer to theirs to warn them the first rapid was approaching. Malachiax nodded and held the oars tighter in his hands. His eyes became as alert as his body. Samiah's heart started to thunder in anticipation. She'd never gone rafting, so she had no idea how she was going to handle it. She'd seen recordings, though, and she knew they were crazy intense.

She curled her hands over her belly. Hang in there, little ones.

"Sami, I want you to tie that cord by your feet to the bench and hold on to it." He pointed at the coiled rope underneath her seat.

"Should I tie it around my wrists?"

"No. We don't want to risk you getting trapped to the canoe in case it capsizes."

"Capsize?" Ianox almost shouted from the seat behind Malachiax. "I thought you said you had done this course before."

"I did, a couple of times. But the river is unpredictable, and like I said before, I was on a raft, not a small canoe."

"Is there anything we can do to help?" Samiah looked out at the water and noticed they had picked up speed already.

"Just make sure you don't fall overboard."

Samiah nodded and got to work, twisting the cord around the bench several times before creating a loop she could use to hold onto. She glanced at Malachiax once and saw his eyebrows furrowed in concentration. He caught her stare, and the corners of his lips twitched upward.

"I love you," she said through the bond. He didn't reply out loud, winking at her instead. He was in the zone already. With a heavy heart, Samiah twisted in her seat to stare ahead because she didn't want to give her back to the wild river. She could already hear the loud roar of the white waters. Femror's canoe was ahead of them. When it disappeared from view, Malachiax warned, "Here we go."

The drop was sudden and Samiah's stomach bottomed out while her body lurched forward. Her yell was muffled by the sound of the violent waters bashing against the rocks that peaked along the stretch of white foam and small waterfalls. And Malachiax has done this for fun?

Water splashed into the canoe, drenching Samiah from head to toe. Her hair became pasted to her face and some strands were over her eyes, blocking her view, but she didn't dare let go of the cord, not when the canoe kept being jerked left and right by the strong current. Samiah couldn't hear anything but the pound of her pulse in her ears and the rumble of the river. After a violent lurch, she felt the metallic taste of blood in her mouth. She must have bitten her tongue.

It felt like an eternity before the waters finally calmed, but it took much longer for her heart to do the same. Up ahead, Samiah caught Femror stretching his arms over his head and relaxing his stance. She let out a sigh of relief; they'd all made it.

Samiah finally deemed it safe to let go of the rope and noticed the deep red marks it had left imprinted on her palms from holding on too tight. She opened and shut her hands to make the blood flow through her fingers again.

The sound of someone throwing up made her look back. Ianox was bent over the side of the canoe, puking his guts out.

"So, not so bad, huh?" Malachiax smiled at her.

She narrowed her eyes at him. "Fuck this shit."

Malachiax threw his head back and laughed, a delicious rich sound that Samiah hadn't heard since this whole nightmare started. She hadn't realized how much she'd missed it.

"I think for the first time I'll have to agree with Samiah. That was fucking hell," Ianox said before he resumed emptying the contents of his stomach.

"For all the Sacred Powers, what a bunch of weaklings you guys are." There was humor in Malachiax's tone, so all Samiah did was stick her tongue out at him.

He moved closer until he was kneeling in front of her. "Now, jokes aside. How are you feeling?" His gaze dropped to her stomach before he placed his open palm there.

"I'm fine. We are fine." She covered his hand with hers. "Are the other two rapids as bad as this one?"

The levity vanished from Mal's gaze, and he shook his head. "No. Worse."

Ianox raised his head and stared at them, terrified. "Worse? We're going to die." He lowered his head again and resumed his nasty business.

Malachiax caught the equally terrified expression on Samiah's face. "Don't worry. It feels worse than it actually is, especially if you're not steering the boat."

"Mal, you're such a bad liar."

He pouted, making an adorable face that Samiah couldn't resist. She leaned down to kiss him, but from the corner of her eye she caught movement, so all she did was give Mal a quick peck on the lips before she turned her attention to her friends.

Femror brought his canoe closer to theirs again. His eyes quickly assessed their group before they focused on Malachiax.

"All good?"

“Yes.” Mal stood up and returned to his bench seat.

Femror nodded and was about to say something else when Lochiana shushed him.

“Do hear that?”

He furrowed his eyebrows and a moment later, his spine went rigid. His reaction alarmed Samiah, and she strained her senses as her eyes scanned the shore. She had to focus really hard before she heard the murmur of hundreds of voices in the distance.

Femror seemed to have focused on one particular spot down the shoreline before he let out a curse. “Blast all the three moons. Fucking Myserians.”

“Where? I don’t see anything,” Samiah asked, but a few seconds later, she was able to see a large group of bedraggled people marching together.

“Quick, everyone hide.” Malachiax dropped to the bottom of the canoe and pulled Samiah with him. She curled into a ball, for there wasn’t much room to lie flat on her belly. She hoped it would be enough.

As they went farther down the river, the sound of the deadly march became louder. It meant either the river was getting narrower or the current was pushing them closer to the shore. Either way, neither option was good for them.

An irritating buzz reached Samiah’s ear. She raised her hand to shoo away the insect when she caught sight of what it was. Shit. A zarpon. Nasty little buggers with a stinger the size of her finger. The last thing they needed was to be stung by it. The side effects usually varied from mild fever to hallucination, hindrances they couldn’t afford. The insect mercifully flew away and Samiah refocused her attention on the sound of the Myserians.

“Aargh!” Ianox screamed from his side of the boat so loud that even the fishes downriver heard him.

“Shut up, you idiot,” Samiah shout-whispered.

“I just got stung.”

For all the Sacred Powers. It had to fucking be him.

“By what?” Malachiax asked.

“A zarpon,” she answered, and Malachiax cursed out loud.

Samiah noticed then that the sound of footsteps nearby had stopped. With her heart stuck in her throat, she raised her head to take a peek. The entire mob of possessed Arcadians stood still and had their gazes fixated on their canoes. Samiah covered her mouth to suppress a gasp. They all had deep, bloody gouges on their faces and arms, and were covered in soot.

Seconds went by before one of them let out an animalist cry that was answered by the rest.

“Fuck!” Malachiax went back to his seat and grabbed the oars.

Samiah sat back up as well and saw that Femror had done the same. They had to get out of there fast. Some of the Myserians jumped into the water and attempted to reach their boat, but for whatever reason, they were drowning instead. Maybe the Myserians didn’t know how to swim. But if their hosts died, those wraiths would come after them and, Samiah realized grimly, the adrenaline from the ride had killed the Razor's Blood effect.

"Faster, Mal. Faster," Samiah urged.

They were going through a narrower part of the river now, and up ahead was a tree with branches that hung above the water. They would have to cross right under it. Some of the deranged people had taken note of that as well and made a run for it. Femror's canoe passed under it right before a Myserian reached the lower branch and jumped, narrowly missing.

The next Myserian who jumped didn't miss the mark and landed right between Malachiax and Ianox, who screamed at the top of his lungs and cowered in the corner, leaving Malachiax to fend for himself. He managed to keep his balance as he dove to the right to miss the punch aimed at his jaw. He then hit the possessed man hard with the oar, throwing him overboard.

Samiah was about to breathe a sigh of relief when she was grabbed from behind and pulled off the canoe and underwater. She fought to get free from whoever was holding her, but the person had their arms wrapped around her middle. She kicked back with her legs several times until the hold slacked and then she elbowed her way to freedom. She had stayed too long underwater and her lungs were burning by the time she broke the surface. Drawing air in with loud gasps, she searched frantically for her boat. She spotted the small canoe downstream, but mercifully it wasn't that far away yet. Samiah swam as fast as she could, but when she finally grabbed the boat's edge, she only found Ianox there, staring wide-eyed at nothing.

"Where's Mal?"

"H-he jumped after you."

"No." Samiah's heart constricted painfully inside her chest as she twisted around, still holding the canoe, to scan the area close to it. "Mal!" she screamed when she couldn't see him.

What if he's drowned? She took a deep breath and prepared to go under again when she heard a loud gasp nearby. "Mal?"

"Sami. Where are you?"

"I'm here." She swam around and saw him floating on the other side of the canoe, not far away.

"Thank all the Sacred Powers." He swam to her with fast strokes and wrapped his arms around her, pulling her body close to him for a demanding, almost desperate kiss.

Samiah gave in to the emotion as well, shaking.

"Uh, you two should get into the boat," Ianox said. "I believe the second rapid is approaching."

Samiah frowned, for the current still felt mild to her. Until it changed suddenly and the canoe lurched forward, making her almost lose her hold. Malachiax quickly helped her get back on board before he followed. He barely had time to retake this seat when they reached the first drop, much steeper than any from before. Samiah widened her eyes when she saw what was waiting for them—a whirlwind of foam and raging waters. Malachiax had been right, the first rapid was child's play compared to this.

Sacred Powers save us.

Chapter 21

Lochiana's heart leaped to her throat when a Myserian jumped into the river, narrowly missing their canoe. Femror didn't miss a beat, just kept rowing them farther away from the shore without a glance back. They picked up speed as the river widened once more. Lochiana couldn't see if their friends were okay from her position on the front of the boat. She prayed they were.

Despite not being as close to the shore as they were before, the rock formations that jutted toward the river made a perfect platform for the Myserians who still pursued them like demented animals. In fact, a group of five was making a beeline to a protruding rock coming up ahead. Lochiana heard Femror grunt and knew he had seen it as well. She wished she had oars so she could help. The Myserians were getting closer and closer, and she knew they would be able to make the jump into their canoe at the rate they were going. She leaped from her seat and bent over the prow of the boat so she could use her arms as paddles.

"What are you doing?" Femror grumbled behind her.

"I'm trying to help you. We're going too slow."

She kept making rowing motions with her arms, not slowing down even when her muscles began to burn from the strain. The wood from the boat's edge dug into her chest, but Lochiana pushed that pain aside too. The canoe sped up through the shore's optimum jumping point just before the first Myserian reached its edge. She heard him let out a guttural scream, and then the canoe was hit by something.

"Tandrum's wrath! It's a zarpon's nest!" Gary yelled.

Lochiana heard the nasty insects before she even turned around. Femror had dropped the oars to fight off the dozens of zarpons that now circled him.

"Get rid of the nest!" she yelled, but neither Femror nor Gary seemed to hear her.

She got to her feet and tried to walk without tipping the boat over. She would have done it on purpose if she hadn't noticed they had picked up speed. We must be approaching the next set of rapids. Fuck!

"Don't get any closer!" Femror raised his arm, trying to prevent Lochiana from walking around him.

“I’m trying to help you, you idiot!”

Gary, who had fewer zarpons to contend with, crawled toward the nest. More zarpons flew out as he raised the round shell and threw it to the river. The nasty insects came her direction and Lochiana prepared to be stung to death, but Femror pushed her onto the floor and covered her body with his. He created a protective barrier around her head with his arms, blocking everything besides his own face. He closed his eyes and grunted, his expression twisting into a grimace. Lochiana felt a couple of stings on her arms, but it was nothing compared to the assault Femror was receiving. She heard a loud cracking noise before the boat tipped forward and down. They had reached the second set of rapids.

Femror raised his head long enough to yell at Gary to get the boat under control. Lochiana couldn’t see if the Jackurian had managed it or not, but she guessed not by the way they kept being tossed left and right, hitting rocks harder than they should. At this rate, their canoe would break into pieces.

“Brace yourselves. There’s a big drop ahead!” Gary shouted.

Lochiana felt Femror’s body tighten on top of hers right before the canoe tipped to an almost vertical drop. They hit the bottom with a loud crash and water was suddenly everywhere. Femror’s body was yanked from hers, and she could no longer feel the bottom of the canoe. They had capsized, the current thrashing her body as if she were a rag doll.

Kick your legs, Lochiana.

Her back hit a hard surface, but her hand found some leverage. She held on to it before she could see which way the surface was, then kicked her legs and swam toward it with the last breath of air she had in her lungs. She broke the surface with a gasp, only to be shoved against another rock again. If she kept going like that, she would end up drowning. She tried to scan her surroundings through the white waters, looking for something she could hold onto. She spied a lower, feeble branch protruding from a rock on the other side of the river a little ahead. If she could get across, she might have a chance to pull herself out.

Lochiana took a deep breath before she pushed herself off the rock at her back. She didn’t fight the current; that would have been foolish and impossible. She went with the flow but veered her body toward the other side of the shore. Her plan worked, and she managed to cross the wild river. Now she couldn’t miss her chance. When the branch came within reach, she made a grab for it. Her wet hands curled around the slick branch, fighting for a secure hold. Ultimately losing her grip, she would have gone downstream if the sleeve of her tunic hadn’t caught the branch. That gave Lochiana the chance she needed to get a better grip of the wood. She was thankful for her natural dexterity and years of physical training as she pulled her upper body over the limb before she threw her leg over, mounting the log. Once she was certain she had a good hold, she raised her upper body and searched the river. Where were Femror and Gary?

She saw an arm covered in scales shooting out of the water in the distance and Lochiana didn’t waste any time—she had to save Femror. She crawled back on the log until her feet touched firm land, then took off in a sprint, following the river. She tried not to lose sight of Femror, who seemed to have his head above water, at least. Please don't drown; please don't drown.

She found another jutting section ahead and realized it was now or never. She needed to get Femror out of the river before he lost the fight against it. But he was coming down right in the middle of it, and to get to him, Lochiana would need to venture back into the river again. She noticed the current wasn't as strong there. This must be the last stretch of the rapid. She eyed Femror's bobbing form approaching and stepped into the river, realizing she was in a shallow section; the water didn't go above her waist when she reached the middle. Despite that, Femror was coming down hard and fast, and he was a big male. He collided with her and Lochiana had trouble maintaining her balance. If she fell, it would be game over for the two of them. She dug her feet into the soft sand and bent her knees, locking them tight. Biting her lower lip, she curled her arms around Femror's torso and began the slow process of dragging him to the shore.

"Come on, warrior. A little help here would be appreciated," she grunted as her muscles strained with his weight.

He blinked in her direction, but there was no recognition in his gaze. Shit.

When she finally reached the shore, her legs gave out and she fell next to him. Femror coughed and grimaced at the same time. He hadn't drowned, but his face and most of his torso and back were covered in awful-looking blisters. The zarpons' stings.

"Femror, can you hear me? Open your eyes." Lochiana shook him gently.

He turned toward her voice, and when their gazes connected, she felt something shift in her heart. He raised his hand to caress her cheek, but then his eyes rolled back into their sockets and he started to shake. Lochiana grabbed his shoulders and shook him hard.

"Femror! Wake up, wake up."

"He's gone into anaphylactic shock," a woman's voice said from nearby. Lochiana whipped around to find Chrysa, Femror's sister, standing not too far from the riverbank, and next to her, a half-drowned Gary.

Lochiana didn't have time to rejoice in seeing Gary alive or ask how Chrysa had gotten there. She was losing her mind with worry. The words "anaphylactic shock" kept bouncing in her head as fear gripped her heart and squeezed unmercifully.

Femror was going to die.

Chapter 22

“Hold on tight. This is going to be a bumpy ride,” Malachiax yelled over the loud roar of the raging river.

Samiah barely had time to loop her hands through the cord around her bench seat when their canoe tipped dangerously forward and went over the first steep drop. She curled into a ball and screamed as they fell. The impact rattled her bones and a loud crash reverberated in her ears. Cold water invaded the canoe, hitting her skin without mercy; it felt like small pebbles had been thrown at her. She unfurled from her fetal position and faced the river once more.

Another drop came, but that time she decided to stay upright. Their canoe made an awful cracking noise as it hit a boulder, and Samiah clenched her jaw hard. We are never going to make it, she thought in despair. She noticed they were going straight toward a big rock formation smack in the middle of the river. If they hit that at full speed, they would be done for.

She looked over shoulder and pointed ahead. “Mal, watch out for that boulder.”

“I see it.” The muscles on his neck bulged as he strained to make the canoe veer off the collision path. They dashed close to another smaller rock, and Samiah didn’t think twice; she leaned over the side of the boat and pushed against the slick surface as they zipped by it, almost falling into the water in the process.

“Samiah!” Malachiax screamed at her, but her risk had paid off. The canoe veered to the right just enough to miss the boulder.

There were no more close calls, and before Samiah knew, they had gone through the second rapid. Her pulse still pounded in her ears as she sagged on her seat and let out a loud exhale. She heard the sound of oars hitting the wooden floor before Malachiax’s arms were around her shoulders and his warm breath fanned near her ear.

“Don’t ever pull a stunt like that again. If you had fallen—”

“But I didn’t and we’re safe now.”

“Sami...,” Malachiax started.

“Hey, isn’t that Femror’s boat?” Ianox asked from behind them. Both Samiah and Malachiax turned their gazes to the much calmer river. Samiah’s heart sank when she saw what was left of her friends’ canoe.

“Oh no.” She covered her mouth with her hands.

“Do you think they’ve all drowned?” Ianox asked.

Without answering, Malachiax returned to his seat and took control of the canoe once more. Samiah stood on high alert and scanned the green water. They couldn’t be dead; she refused to believe that. But as they progressed down the river without any sign of her friends, she began to lose hope until movement far down the shoreline caught her eyes. She couldn’t be certain what it was, for bushes and trees blocked her view. She thought at first the Myserians had caught up with them, but as they drew nearer, she recognized Lochiana’s silhouette down the muddy bank, leaning over Femror’s prone form on the ground.

“Mal, you need to row faster. I think Femror is in trouble.”

Malachiax steered the boat toward the shore, and Samiah jumped out before it had completely reached dry land.

“Lochiana,” she said in a low voice, not wanting to draw attention to any danger that might be lurking within earshot.

Her friend turned around, and Samiah caught the tears in her gaze.

“What happened?”

“He was stung by several zarpons. The idiot used his body as a shield to protect me,” Lochiana choked out. Her face twisted into an expression that looked like agony before she glanced at the fallen warrior again.

"Draki are very sensitive to some venoms. A zarpon sting can be fatal if not treated right away," the king's daughter said, and Samiah widened her eyes. She hadn't even noticed her presence, but she was glad to see Gary next to her.

Several questions bounced in her head, including how Femror's sister had gotten there, but those would have to be answered later, for Samiah understood the urgency of the situation.

“What can we do?” she asked.

"I-I don't know. I only had the basic healer's training." Lochiana caressed his face with the gentlest touch, and Samiah noticed for the first time that there was something going on between Lochiana and the warrior. She called upon her gift and saw, as bright as day, the shimmery line that connected Lochiana's core to Femror's.

For all the Sacred Powers. They’re soul mates. Has Lochiana already realized that?

“Sinclair root paste has chemicals that counteract the effects of skin inflammation. It could help. It’s fairly common on riverbanks such as this.” Gary approached the duo and knelt next to Femror.

His gaze traveled down the warrior's shaking form, taking note of the swollen and purplish patches all over his skin. Samiah couldn't even imagine the amount of pain the Draki must be in. She had been stung by a zarpon when she was younger and had cried for hours.

Gary pulled one of Femror's eyelids back before speaking. "We need to act fast."

"Tell us what to look for." Malachiax shifted forward while Ianox hung back.

Chrysa took a sharp intake of breath, the sound drawing Samiah's attention to her.

"Cinthe. We must find some Cinthe flowers," she said.

"What?" Lochiana questioned. "That's crazy."

"No, Chrysa is right." Gary stood suddenly. "Cinthe has extraordinary healing powers. The healer from my village used it for everything."

Chrysa spun around and raised her nose in the air, as if trying to catch the scent of the flower.

What a peculiar female.

She looked over her shoulder. "Quickly, there are a few over that hill." She pointed at the distance.

Lochiana sprang into action, hooking her arms under Femror's body and pulling him up. She was stronger than she looked, but not strong enough to carry a male the size of Femror by herself. Gary and Malachiax went to assist her, and when Mal tried to gently push her out of the way, she resisted.

"I got it," he said with kindness in his eyes. Had he also sensed the connection Lochiana had to the Draki warrior?

Samiah looped her arm around her friend's and dragged her away. "Come, we'll move much quicker if we let Mal and Gary carry Femror."

Lochiana peeled her gaze off the warrior to look at Samiah. Her eyes conveyed anguish only those with a deep link to another being could understand. Samiah knew more than anyone how strong the need was to protect one's soul mate.

Ianax had already taken off with Chrysa when the rest followed them up the hill. Samiah and Lochiana brought up the rear since Malachiax and Gary couldn't defend themselves while they carried Femror. Any precaution was necessary; for out in the distance, Samiah could still hear the guttural noises the deranged Arcadians were making. She hoped they'd find the flower to help Femror soon. The longer they lingered, the greater the odds they would be found. She couldn't help thinking about the hurdles they still had ahead of them. They hadn't traveled far enough down the river, so they would have to make the rest of the trek on foot after all.

When they finally reached the top of the hill, Gary was already running back toward them with a bouquet of white flowers in his hand. Chrysa followed in his footsteps and asked Malachiax and Gary to lay Femror down once more. She knelt next to him after taking the flowers from Gary, squeezing them between her hands, crushing all the petals together, and making a ball out of them. She produced some kind of yellowish milk, which she quickly applied to each sting on Femror's body. The warrior's face, which had been until that point scrunched in pain, relaxed. The tremors in his body also stopped.

"Is it working?" Lochiana asked.

"It seems so. Still he probably will develop a fever. We need to find shelter," Chrysa replied.

"Where exactly are we?" Ianax asked.

"Samion's Park. I used to camp here when I was younger. We're maybe a day from Argamania if we travel on foot."

"A day? We don't have a day. Femror needs a proper bed to recover." Lochiana glowered at Malachiax as if she blamed him personally for the bad news.

Malachiax narrowed his eyes at Lochiana but didn't make a comment. For once, Samiah also didn't jump to defend her mate. She knew where Lochiana was coming from.

"We'll find what we need if we head southeast," Chrysa said without looking up.

Samiah frowned. "That will lead straight to Bangor. We should stay away from cities."

"We'll find what we need if we head southeast," Chrysa repeated as if Samiah hadn't even spoken.

"What's the matter with that female?" Ianox asked. "Is she unhinged?"

"Listen to what Chrysa says," Femror said with a rough voice.

Lochiana turned to him immediately, peering at his face with intent.

"You're awake. Thank the Sacred Powers," she said, and her outburst managed to get a small twist from Femror's lips.

"It sounds like you were worried about me."

"Of course I was worried about you. You almost died."

"Nah. Draki can't be killed that easily."

"Do you think you can stand? No matter what we decide, we can't stay here," Malachiax said.

Femror grimaced as he tried to sit up on his own. Lochiana, surprisingly, didn't try to assist him, and Samiah wondered why. Once the warrior was in the upright position, he replied, "Yes, I think I can walk, but not as fast as you wish I could."

Lochiana stood up suddenly and declared, "We'll head to Bangor and see what we can find there."

Her tone left no room for argument.

Chapter 23

*C*urse the three moons, my body hurts everywhere. As Femror tried his best not to grunt with every painful step he took, he vowed to never put himself in the direct path of zarpons again. Who am I fooling? I would do it again if it meant protecting Lochiana. He would rather die than see her suffer. She walked a little ahead of him, but from time to time, she would peer over her shoulder to check on him. His male pride hated that she had to witness him in such a weakened state. He would be forever grateful that she didn't attempt to help him get up earlier. She seemed to know it was the last thing he wanted. For that same reason, he had refused assistance from Malachiax and Gary. I can walk on my own, thank you very much.

Chrysa, who had been walking ahead of him as well, slowed her pace so she stood by his side. Without glancing his way, she asked, "How are you faring, brother?"

Femror hadn't been surprised to see his sister earlier. She had the sight, after all; she must have sensed they were in peril.

"I've been better, thank you for asking."

He wondered if she knew what their father had asked him to do. As if she had plucked the thought from his head, she said, "Yes, I know."

His response was to grunt. Could she also see the turmoil in his heart?

"The world turns as it will, brother. Don't worry about things you cannot change."

The problem was he could change it. Ultimately, it was his decision to make. Femror shook his head to dispel his thoughts. Even with all the conflicting feelings bouncing inside his head, Femror knew that, in the end, he would do what must be done for the greater good. Even if it meant alienating his soul mate forever. He was a warrior, a prince of the Draki. His duty would always come first. Had to always come first.

The group made slow progress out of the park thanks to him. At least they weren't being pursued; he would take solace in that. When they reached the wide road that lead to Bangor, they found it deserted. Femror had already noticed this phenomenon in Morang. It seemed the Myserians had a solid plan this time. Instead of destroying the bodies of their hosts as they'd done the first time they came through the portal, they were using the Arcadians for another, probably sinister, reason. What were they after?

The dark gray road was flanked on both sides by a range of mountains, leaving their party too exposed for Femror's liking. During the entire journey through the valley, Femror felt like livestock being corralled to the slaughterhouse. Despite his foreboding feeling, they made it to the city of Bangor without being ambushed. Any sane person would consider that a positive outcome, but instead of making Femror relax, the lack of any problems during their journey made him more uneasy. The calm before the storm.

Bangor was a small mining city and as such, it had been designed to fulfill its purpose without thought for aesthetics. To put it nicely, it was a fucking eyesore. Buildings were nothing more than sad gray boxes, some in much need of a new paint job. The only splash of color was the murals they found painted on some of the walls. The houses in the city's outskirts seemed to have been vacated in a hurry, but they didn't come across destruction until they reached a commercial avenue. Stores had been ransacked and destroyed; merchandise lay torn and abandoned on the street.

"Okay, now what?" Ianox put his hands on his hips and openly glared in Chrysa's direction. She didn't catch the gesture, but Femror did. He curled his lip and let out a growl.

Lochiana didn't glance Femror's way. He wasn't even sure if she had heard him, but the fact that she was staring daggers at the good-for-nothing Arcadian sat very well with him. Pride filled his chest.

"We'll search the stores. Grab anything that might be useful such as food, clothes, water, etcetera," Lochiana said before she spun around and came closer to Femror. "How are you feeling?"

"Like I've been run over by one of your floating cars," Femror said with a smirk.

"Hover transports float, like you said. It wouldn't be possible to be run over by one." Her beautiful eyes sparkled with glee, and Femror caught the phantom of a smirk on her plump lips.

"Fine. I feel like one of your hover transports fell on top of me." He grinned openly at her now, even if it hurt his face to do so.

She raised both eyebrows and her jaw dropped before she turned to stare at one such vehicle. "For all the Sacred Powers. That's it! We'll use one of the transports to reach Argor."

"Aren't you forgetting something? They don't work outside of cities, and they're powered by the relays," Ianox was quick to point out.

She shook her head and smiled at Femror, ignoring the dumb shit. "The new models, yes, but these"—she touched the transport next to her—"these are still powered by solar energy. Bragadá was one of the last countries in Arcadia to adopt the new relay technology."

A palpable energy of renewed purpose could be felt in the group. Even the useless Ianox seemed more motivated to get his ass moving. Femror wished he could help, but the little bit of strength he had was only enough to keep him standing, if that.

Lochiana got busy with the hover transport she had deemed more salvageable. It was bent in the front, and the glass windows had been shattered, but it looked more or less intact on the inside. Femror shuffled his way toward her. Upon feeling his presence nearby, she turned to him. She was so excited about her project that she rewarded him with the brightest smile he had seen from her. His dual hearts stopped beating for a moment only to kick-start a second later in a furious rhythm. He had heard a saying many millennia ago from a fisherman in his former land that applied perfectly—Femror had fallen for Lochiana hook, line, and sinker. As he stared at her mesmerizing prism-colored eyes, he silently begged her to reel him in.

He was so caught up in her stare that when he started seeing double, he didn't think much of it, not until his legs gave out under his weight.

"Femror!" Lochiana yelled and caught him right before he could face-plant on the stone pavement. His arms went around her tiny waist, and he buried his face on the flat of her stomach. The scent of her skin invaded his nose and he shuddered.

"Are you sniffing me?" she asked.

"No," he replied with a grunt. "It's called breathing."

Despite that obvious lie, he didn't move from his semi-crouched position.

"You need to sit down." She pulled him up, but somehow, Femror managed to maintain the close proximity.

He didn't know what possessed him when he brought his nose right below her ear and took a good whiff. He heard Lochiana's sharp intake of breath, and he would have pulled her closer if she hadn't taken a couple of steps back.

"You shouldn't have done that," she whispered.

He swayed on the spot and took a couple of wobbly steps toward the hover transport. She didn't attempt to help him that time.

"Would you have said the same thing if I looked like this?" Femror used the little shapeshifting gift he still possessed and transformed his appearance. Gone were the green hue of his skin and the scales.

Lochiana's eyes widened and her jaw dropped. "You can shapeshift."

"Yes. So, do I look less revolting to you now?" It cost him to speak. He shouldn't have shapeshifted in his weakened state. His vision was beginning to darken at the edges. He didn't know why he showed his ability to her or why her answer mattered to him. He'd never once wished to look like the Arcadians; he was proud of his heritage.

"I don't find you revolting. Not by a long shot. I just—" She shook her head.

"My apologies. I don't know why I did this." Lies. "It must have been the Cinthi flower." More lies.

Lochiana took a couple of deep breaths. "That's okay. Just don't do it again."

Femror opened his mouth to reply, but the world around him began to shift and he could no longer feel his legs. He raised his arm to find something to hold on to, a tether before the dark vortex took him under, only to find empty space. He thought he heard Lochiana shout his name, and then nothing.

Chapter 24

They reached Argamania by nightfall and found the streets in their neighborhood deserted. The shops were all shut and dark. At least they weren't destroyed, Samiah thought. It gave her hope that Argamania hadn't fallen prey to the Myserians. Despite the lack of disturbance, they exited the hover transport quickly, for they didn't want to linger too long out in the dark.

Malachiax and Gary carried Femror, who had passed out when they were in Bangor and had not regained consciousness since then. He shivered and moaned nonsensical words during the trip, a consequence of the fever that had taken hold of the warrior. Samiah didn't need to use her gift to sense the anxiety emanating from Lochiana. If it weren't for Chrysa's lack of worry, her friend would probably be acting much more frantic.

The group went up the stairs of Samiah and Mal's apartment as quietly as they could, but their footsteps still echoed around them. None of their neighbors appeared to say hello, and Samiah couldn't hear any sound coming from the closed doors along the hallway. At that hour, their building complex should have been livelier. Where has everyone gone?

Samiah let out a sigh of relief when they found their apartment undisturbed. Nothing was out of place. The automated light orbs illuminated the room as they crossed the threshold, and their main crystal table flickered to life. They hadn't lost the relays here.

Malachiax and Gary brought Femror to the guest room, and only when he lay down on the double-sized bed did he stir and open his eyes. It was no surprise to Samiah that the first word out of his mouth was Lochiana's name.

Lochiana hurried to the bed and sat on the edge next to him, placing her palm over his forehead. "I'm here. How are you feeling?"

"Hot."

"You should. You have a fever." She glanced at Samiah. "Do you have any anti-thermal medication?"

Samiah went in search of the pills, not knowing if Arcadian medicine would work on the Draki. She returned to the room quickly with the bottle of blue tablets and a glass of water.

"Will this work?" she asked Chrysa.

Femror's sister nodded. "Besides their dual hearts, the Draki's genetic makeup is similar to yours.”

Samiah knew nothing of the Draki’s physiology. Blast, she hadn’t known they existed until a few days ago. But she caught on that Chrysa hadn’t included herself in her statement. “You don’t have a dual heart?”

Chrysa merely shook her head in response before she seemed to lose focus again. “There’s a message waiting for you.”

Samiah frowned and glanced at Malachiax. He left the room and a moment later returned with a printout in his hand. “The palace issued a level 5 lockdown. All citizens are to report to the closest shelters and wait for instructions.”

“No wonder there isn’t anyone around,” Samiah mused. “What should we do?”

“We can’t wait for Femror to recover. We need to seek an audience with Lord Droom immediately,” Malachiax said.

Lochiana’s spine became taut before she stood up.

“Lord Droom can’t know we’re here,” Chrysa said.

Samiah frowned at the young Draki. “Why not?”

She shook her head and looked out the window. “He can’t know.”

Samiah traded a worried glance with Malachiax, but before she could say anything else, Lochiana replied, “I agree. As a matter of fact, I think only Malachiax, Samiah, and I should go.”

Ianax, who had been hovering just outside the room, stated, “I won’t stay behind with them. I’m coming too.”

As they neared the center of the city, Samiah realized Argamania was prepared for war. Royal Guards and Nox Elite soldiers patrolled the streets with laser-sharp focus. As depressing as the sight was, she was relieved that their city had the necessary time to take precautions.

When their hover transport approached the perimeters of the Argamanx Royal Estates, they were promptly stopped by a heavily armed soldier. Samiah had never seen so many weapons strapped to one person.

The soldier flashed an orb light on Malachiax's face, then hers, before he aimed the glow at the back of the transport where Ianax and Lochiana sat. Ianax covered his face and squinted at the bright light's assault, while Lochiana stared ahead impassively.

"State your business," the soldier commanded.

"I'm Malachiax Praterni, Lord Droom's nephew. We've just come from the site in Mora."

"You've come from ground zero?" the soldier asked, his eyebrows almost meeting his hairline.

"Yes."

The soldier brought his wrist-com device to his lips and repeated what Malachiax had just told him to someone on the other side of the line. He received a reply Samiah couldn't hear from the car, but a second later, the soldier let them through. It didn't take long for Samiah to notice their vehicle now had a royal escort. They crossed Serenity Lake until the hover transport stood over a platform. There was a whooshing sound before they felt the car move upward from the gust of pressurized air that propelled the vehicle in the direction of the Royal Castle of Argamanx, a grandiose construction that stood on the tallest and largest elevated grounds in Arcadia. It was no wonder Argor was the hub of their planet. To think that Lord Droom deemed it necessary to acquire even more power.... The thought alone gave Samiah shivers of dread. She hoped Malachiax was right about his uncle and he had a good reason for taking the Spheres of Sharra.

Once the hover transport leveled with the upper ground, they were instructed by the soldiers to exit the vehicle and continue on foot toward the castle. Their group huddled together, and soon they found themselves surrounded by Nox Elite soldiers instead of Royal Guards as was customary. The soldiers didn't glance in their direction or show any emotion. They were the most skilled soldiers in Argor's army and answered to Commander Haarx. No wonder they looked like winter statues.

They were led to Lord Droom's private office. Samiah let out a sigh of relief when she didn't see Commander Haarx among their sovereign's advisors. He must be busy somewhere else overseeing the city's security.

The conversation in the room ceased as soon as their small group was announced. Samiah couldn't be one hundred percent sure, but it seemed Lord Droom actually looked relieved to see Malachiax alive and well. He opened his mouth to say something when his gaze landed on Lochiana. Samiah glanced at her friend and noticed the unmistakable tension in her body. Lochiana's jaw was locked tight, and her hands had curled into fists by her side.

Lord Droom stood from his chair and walked around the table without taking his eyes off his former fiancée.

"It's been a long time, Lochiana."

"Yes," she said not showing an ounce of emotion.

They kept staring at each other for a long time until Malachiax cleared his throat to catch his uncle's attention.

"We have important information regarding the invasion."

Lord Droom finally ended his staring contest with Lochiana and shifted his unnerving gray eyes in Mal's direction. "Go on."

Malachiax spent several minutes giving a detailed account of the events from the time the portal opened until they arrived at the castle. He also managed to include the information they had learned from the Draki without mentioning them. They had agreed beforehand that all knowledge about the Myserians had been extracted by Samiah in the brief moment a Myserian had invaded her mind. She knew how much it cost Malachiax to be deceitful, but he couldn't ignore Chrysa's demand.

Lord Droom and his advisors listened to everything in silence and with matching grim expressions on their faces.

“How can we stop this invasion? We must close the portal at once,” one of the advisors said.

Malachiax hesitated. He couldn't ask Lord Droom to dismiss those men and women without raising suspicion.

“What is it, Malachiax?” Lord Droom asked.

Mal clenched his jaw, and Samiah could clearly see he didn't want to ask his uncle about the spheres in front of his advisors. In the end, he relented. “There's a way to do it. But we need the Spheres of Sharra.”

The advisors traded a look among themselves and started talking all at once. The common denominator of their concerns was how they were going to retrieve all the spheres from across the planet. Lord Droom remained silent, calmly staring at the mayhem without a shred of emotion. Samiah wasn't surprised that his closest advisors weren't aware the spheres were right under their noses, somewhere in the castle.

“I would like to have a private word with Lady Lochiana,” Lord Droom announced suddenly.

The loud chatter stopped, and the advisors all turned to stare at her. Samiah also looked at her friend, but she couldn't tell by the woman's expression what she was feeling. Her face was stony and impartial. Even her aura remained neutral.

The grand clock in the room chimed the late hour. Only after the gongs had come and gone did Lochiana reply. “As you wish, my lord.”

Chapter 25

It was with great effort that Lochiana managed to quell the rage inside her chest and keep an impartial face. She wouldn't let Lord Droom know how much being near him still affected her after all these years.

She followed him to a private room adjacent to his official office chambers, and when the door clicked shut behind her back, she tried not to wince. The last time she had been inside a room alone with him, he had shown his true colors. Those memories still assaulted her in her dreams—or nightmares, to be more precise.

She had been such a fool in love that she had dismissed the warning signs she glimpsed in his aura during their courtship. Or maybe Lord Droom's true prevailing power was deceit. It didn't surprise her that his advisors had no idea he possessed the Spheres of Sharra.

He strode toward a glass tray cart on the other side of the room and poured himself a drink. In true form, he didn't offer her one—not that she would have accepted anything from him anyway. He spun around and leveled her with an intense stare only he could master. Lesser Arcadians had cowered under that scrutinizing stare, but Lochiana wouldn't be one of them. In fact, she raised her chin in defiance and glared right back at him.

"What do you want?" she asked.

"I want the truth. I know my nephew well. He's a terrible liar."

"Unlike you, I suppose."

Lord Droom's lips twisted into an ugly grin. Lochiana couldn't believe she had once thought it sexy. "Dear Lochi, what could you possibly be talking about?"

"Don't call me that," Lochiana said through clenched teeth, losing control of her emotions. Two minutes with the hateful man, and he had already managed to get under her skin.

His smile grew.

"You have the Spheres of Sharra." She decided to go straight to the point.

Lord Droom's eyes narrowed before he stalked in her direction. "Who told you that?"

"It doesn't matter. I don't even want to get into why you took them in the first place. We need them to close the portal."

"Not that it's any of your business, but I took them to keep them safe. The other nations were sloppy—so much so that, to this day, they still don't know their spheres are gone."

"You mean they don't know you stole the spheres from them. That's treason."

Lord Droom chuckled. "Treason? Don't be absurd. I'm the head of the Arcadian Council. I can do as I please."

Lochiana caught a flash of feral madness in his eyes. The same glint he had possessed when he'd beaten and raped her in her own room after she told him she wanted to postpone their bonding ceremony. Her blood turned ice cold, and her heartbeat accelerated. Lochiana's body became a coiled spring, ready to unfurl in case Lord Droom decided to attack her again.

"We need the spheres," she repeated.

"And you expect me to just hand over the most powerful objects in all of Arcadia to you based on the testimony of a low-born aura-reader?"

Lochiana's nostrils flared. "Yes. It's either that or deal with what's coming, and trust me, you can't hope to survive the Myserians."

Lord Droom narrowed his eyes before invading her space and grabbing her forearm. He brought his lips close to her ear, and Lochiana froze on the spot as she cringed at his touch.

"I'll give you the spheres in exchange for another taste of you."

Lochiana managed to break free from the terror that had her locked in place, pulling her arm from his grasp as she took a gigantic step back. "You're despicable."

"Come on, Lochi. I know that deep down you loved it when I was rough."

Lochiana's pulse pounded in her ears as her heart felt like it was going to burst through her chest. "You come near me again, and I swear to the Sacred Powers, I will rip your balls off and feed them to the banshees."

In a blur of movement, Lord Droom had Lochiana pinned against the door, his rough hands digging into the skin of her upper arms. "Your filthy mouth is giving me a hard-on." He thrust his pelvis against hers, and Lochiana wanted to throw up.

She struggled against his hold, but all she was doing was getting him more aroused. She head-butted him instead, hitting him square on the nose. He let out a shout before stepping back with a hand over his bloody extremity. Hatred emanated from his gaze, and now she feared for her life.

He took a menacing step her way but stopped abruptly when a side door to the room opened and a young man appeared on the threshold.

"Father, I—" The Argorian stopped in his tracks when he took in the scene, Lochiana with her back pressed against the main door and Lord Droom holding his bloody nose. "My apologies, I didn't mean to interrupt."

Lochiana saw that as her opportunity to escape. "It's no problem. Lord Droom and I are done here."

She opened the door behind her and stepped back into the private office chambers, schooling her face again, for she didn't wish to let anyone know how terrified she was. Samiah peered at her through slits, but Lochiana ignored the scrutinizing stare. The other aura-reader could look as long as she wanted; she wouldn't find any clue in Lochiana's aura that something was amiss. She had learned a long time ago to conceal her emotions.

Lord Droom came back into the room a moment later, bloody nose already cleaned up. He was followed by the young man who, unbeknownst to him, had saved Lochiana. Looking closely at him, she could see the resemblance. This must be Lord Droom's son, Malachiax's cousin.

Lord Droom ordered all his advisors to leave the room. They balked but none complained. Once they were gone, he pierced Malachiax with a hard stare.

"Lady Lochiana was kind enough to plead your case. Do you want the Spheres of Sharra? You may borrow them if you can break through the spells that protect them."

"Spells? What kind of spells?" Samiah asked.

"I don't know. When the spheres were brought together, some kind of magic was awakened. No one has been able to reach them ever since, which tells me I was right in bringing them to Argor," Lord Droom answered in a calm manner.

"What happened to those who tried?" Malachiax narrowed his eyes at his uncle.

From the corner of her eye, Lochiana noticed Lord Droom's son shift in an uneasy manner. She would have questioned him if his father hadn't spoken next.

"They all died."

Chapter 26

Samiah was beside herself. She couldn't believe Malachiax had agreed to face whatever traps the Spheres of Sharra had laid out for him. She wanted to beg him not to go, but one glance in his direction and she knew that no matter what she said, he wouldn't change his mind.

As soon as Malachiax left with Lord Droom and the door to his chambers closed, Samiah found a chair and sat down with her head in her hands. Lochiana sat next to her and squeezed her shoulder.

"It will be okay, Samiah."

She looked up and glared at her friend. "You don't know that." She turned to Durgin, Lord Droom's son. "What kinds of traps await Mal?"

Durgin's jaw clenched and he shifted his focus to Ianox for a moment. Samiah had forgotten the idiot was there. She didn't understand when Durgin went to stand directly in front of her teammate and said, "You're hungry. Go find something to eat. Don't come back here."

Ianox did as Durgin commanded, and Samiah's jaw dropped as he left the room without so much as uttering a single peep. She looked at Lochiana and found her staring at Durgin through slits.

"You have the compulsion gift."

Durgin spun around and nodded. "Yes."

"Does your father know?"

"No."

Samiah was sick and tired of all the secrets and power plays. "Why did you send Ianox away?"

"He can't be trusted, and what I'm about to say could get me executed for treason."

Durgin's expression matched his words. For the first time, Samiah saw him as more than a spoiled royal.

"We're listening," Lochiana said.

Durgin ran a hand through his long hair and stared at nothing. There was pain in his gaze, something Samiah had never noticed before. "My father has been doing shady things behind the council's back."

"You mean like stealing the Spheres of Sharra?" Lochiana crossed her arms.

"Among other things."

"What other things?" Samiah narrowed her eyes.

“Experiments.”

“What kind of experiments?” Lochiana took a step forward, and Samiah suppressed the urge to shake the guy. Get on with it already.

Durgin stared hard at Lochiana for a few seconds before he replied. “Genetic mutation experiments. He’s playing creator, and I’m afraid he wants to use the Spheres of Sharra to produce an army of mutants.”

Samiah shook her head as her brain tried to process Durgin’s information.

“He can’t do that without the council’s approval,” Lochiana replied. “Without proper studies, such experiments could be devastating to our planet’s ecosystem.”

Durgin smiled without humor. “Do you think my father cares?”

“What about Malachiax? If what you say is true, then Lord Droom will never let Mal take the spheres.”

“You’re right. He has no intention of letting him take them.”

“So he’s using Mal to retrieve the spheres for himself. He’s risking my mate’s life for his nefarious purpose!”

“He’s not using Malachiax. He lied. The traps didn’t spring into place by some magical power. I set them up.”

“You? Why?” Samiah asked.

“Protection.”

She realized then what should have been clear to her from the start—Lord Droom intended to kill Malachiax. She stood suddenly, ready to burst out the door. “We must go after them.”

“Stop!” Durgin’s voice boomed in the room and Samiah felt compelled to obey. She spun around and watched him with wide eyes, her breathing inexplicably shallow. “If you go after him, my father will kill both of you without mercy.”

“So what do you suggest, then?” Lochiana asked.

“I was the one who set up the traps. I’ll wait until Malachiax is inside the Heliex and out of my father’s prying eyes to rescue him and get the spheres.”

“The Heliex?” Lochiana frowned.

“It’s a secret chamber in the castle’s dungeons. Very few people know of its existence.”

“How do you plan to get there without your father knowing?” Samiah asked as she tried to break free from the compulsion that kept her in the room. Perspiration had already pooled on her hairline from the mental effort. She hadn’t felt so impotent when Lochiana compelled her. Durgin’s power was ten times worse.

“There’s a hidden entrance to the Heliex he doesn’t know about. You must leave the castle’s premises while I go after Malachiax. Head to the industrial area on the south side of Serenity Lake and search for warehouse number eighty-nine.”

“What’s in there?” Lochiana asked.

"It's one of my father's labs." Durgin walked to his father's desk and wrote something down. "Give this to the head technician there." He handed a piece of paper to Samiah. It was a note written on official royal paper, signed by Lord Droom. She raised her eyebrow at Durgin.

"I've been faking my father's signature for a very long time. It will work, trust me. She won't accept anything but a written order."

Lochiana pulled the paper from Samiah's hand and grinned before looking up. "What exactly are H5s?"

"A successful project. You've been to Planet X-57, correct?"

"Yes."

"Then I believe you will recognize it. Now you must hurry. Meet me at the outskirts of the city by the Seven Sisters rest stop. We must leave within an hour."

"Why?" Lochiana asked, and Samiah could have guessed where her friend's thoughts had gone. She was probably concerned about Femror and if he would have the ability to travel.

"Before you arrived, my father had given the order to raise the protective dome around the city. If we're caught inside it, we will never be able to leave."

Chapter 27

Lochiana couldn't wait to get out of that forsaken castle. The effort to keep a calm façade after her private session with Lord Droom had worn her thin. Keeping Samiah from running after her mate had proved a good distraction, though. Despite Durgin's assurances that he would get Malachiax out of the Heliex before the worst happened, Samiah wasn't convinced.

Ten days ago, Lochiana wouldn't have understood her friend's level of anxiety, but she was beginning to feel a similar emotion toward Femror. In fact, despite their task, her heart was begging to forget the mission and run back to him. She shook her head. Nonsense.

They left Lord Droom's private office and speed-walked down the wide, opulent corridor. Life-size portraits of the Argamanx royal family encased in gilded frames lined the walls. When they walked in front of Lord Droom's, she shuddered. She had sat for the artist weeks before her bonding ceremony, and now a matching portrait of hers as well was somewhere in this castle. She doubted Lord Droom had destroyed it.

When they finally reached the double doors that would lead to the castle's lifts, two Nox Elite soldiers blocked their escape route. Their closed-off expressions and hands over their electroshock rods didn't bode well.

"Good evening, soldiers," Lochiana said with a fake smile. "Would you mind stepping out of the way?"

"I'm sorry, my lady. We have express orders to not let anyone out of the castle."

"What is this nonsense now? Are we prisoners?" Samiah put her hands on her hips and glowered at the soldier.

"We are on level-5 lockdown. No one leaves the premises." The soldier stared hard in Samiah's direction and his hand curled tighter around the handle of his weapon.

Lochiana ground her teeth. Has the stress fried Samiah's brain? Why is she acting so stupid? She didn't have time to ponder that. She had to act fast if she wanted to avoid an idiotic confrontation between her friend and the soldiers. Lochiana scanned their black uniforms and spotted the higher-ranking soldier by the insignia on his chest. She stepped directly in front of him, surprising the man. His eyes widened, but before he could utilize his electroshock rod, Lochiana had already ensnared his gaze. She felt the power surge within her core as her irises began to swirl. The soldier's jaw slackened right before his eyes lost the fire in them.

“You will let us pass.”

Lochiana didn't need to venture deep into the man's mind to know her compulsion had worked. She stepped back and waited. A second later, the soldier blinked and then said to his colleague, “Let them through, soldier.”

“But sir—” his companion started.

“I said let them through. That's an order!” Lochiana's victim barked. His companion had no choice but to obey.

They stepped into the night, and once the castle's double doors had closed behind their backs, they broke into a run. They arrived at a small construction similar in style to the castle in less than a minute. That's where the elevators down the tower were. Usually, the place had several royal guards on duty, but there was only one man there. Lochiana didn't pause to thank their good luck, heading straight for the kill. She stepped in front of the guard and repeated what she had done to the Nox Elite soldier.

Once inside the metal box, Lochiana leaned against the wall and let out a heavy sigh. She hadn't realized how smothered she had felt in that castle until she was out of it. She turned to Samiah when she felt the weight of her friend's stare.

“What?”

“You used your gift on those men without a thought.”

Lochiana didn't like the implication of Samiah's comment. She stared at the woman through slits. “So? What's your point? I got us out, didn't I?”

Samiah shook her head. “You misunderstand me. I'm not judging you. I had always felt strongly about the use of compulsion, even on other alien races. I always thought it was immoral in a sense. But now I'm glad you used it against those men.” Samiah watched Lochiana with bright eyes, and Lochiana could see the turmoil there. “I'm such a fucking hypocrite.” She lowered her gaze and pinched the bridge of her nose.

Lochiana's aura-reader powers came unbidden, but instead of seeing Samiah's aura, she saw the festering dark energy wrapped around the other woman's core. Guilt and lack of self-worth were smothering Samiah's bright gift.

She took a step closer and wrapped her arm around Samiah's shoulder, her irritation suddenly gone. “You're not a hypocrite. You are a survivor. This is war, Samiah. By the time this is all done, we will all have smears on our souls. There's no helping it, so don't let the guilt drag you down.”

Samiah wiped a lone tear that had escaped her eye. “You're right. I'm sorry about the moping fest. It won't happen again.”

The elevator lurched to a stop and the sliding doors opened. Lochiana prepared to use her gift again in case they were approached by another soldier, but the two royal guards didn't say a word when she and Samiah stepped out. As soon as they were out of sight, they broke into a run toward the industrial district, for there was no time to procure a rover transport.

Lochiana followed Samiah because the few times she had visited she never went farther than the upscale neighborhoods in the capital. Lochiana saw the change immediately and knew they had arrived at the industrial district. The beautiful mansions that surrounded the palace disappeared, and in their place, large square buildings appeared. They all looked the same, though.

“How in the world are we going to find warehouse eighty-nine?” she asked as she slowed her pace. In their haste, they had forgotten to ask Durgin for clear directions.

The sound of a rover transport approaching drew their attention right before they saw the glow from its headlights. They jumped behind a dumpster and hid from view. It was an armor transport manned by heavily armed Nox Elite soldiers.

“Wanna bet they’re headed to Lord Droom’s secret lab?” Samiah said.

No, Lochiana didn’t want to bet on anything. But logic was telling her that Samiah was right. “Let’s follow them.”

Lochiana was glad the armored hover could not move very fast so they were able to keep pace. It stopped in front of one of the largest buildings in the district after they had been following it for a couple of minutes. Soldiers exited the vehicle and entered the building soon after.

“It’s warehouse eighty-nine,” Samiah said. “What do we do now? We can’t possibly go in there after them.”

Lochiana cursed because Samiah was right. But she was also too aware of the passage of time. They had already wasted too much of it. They needed a distraction. She looked around and noticed some of the buildings had cameras installed, which meant a security system. An idea formed in Lochiana’s mind.

“What happens if someone tries to break into one those buildings?” She pointed at the constructions next to their final destination.

“Probably a silent alarm is sent to law enforcement.”

“Shit. That won’t help. We need to create a big fuss.”

Samiah narrowed her gaze and focused on a particular building. It was smaller than the others with a bold red-lettered sign. “Would a fire do the trick?”

Lochiana lips unfurled into a grin. “Yes, absolutely.”

Breaking into the small fireworks factory had been almost too easy, and setting fire to its stock was child’s play. Lochiana and Samiah were now crouched behind a dumpster as they watched the flames consume the building. A high-pitched alarm echoed around them and within seconds, the Nox Elite soldiers stormed out of warehouse eighty-nine to investigate the cause.

Lochiana and Samiah left their hiding spot and dashed toward the lab while the soldiers were distracted. They found the door to the compound wide open and entered the building, frantic lab workers scurrying in a frenzy all around them. They were rattled and probably planned to evacuate the premises. Shit. They can't run away before we get what we came for. Lochiana spotted an older woman who seemed to be in charge and strode in her direction.

“Who are you and what are you doing here? This is a restricted area.”

“I’m here under the orders of your sovereign, Lord Droom. I came to retrieve this.” Lochiana handed the fake letter to the woman, who grabbed the piece of paper with a jerky movement. Her shrew eyes quickly scanned the letter before she let out a curse.

“Of course. Today of all days he wants the H5s.” She turned around and issued a command. Two lab technicians stopped what they were doing and disappeared behind a large door at the end of the room.

“Have you two been briefed on how to operate them? she asked Lochiana and Samiah.

Lochiana traded a glance with Samiah before facing the woman. “No. There hasn’t been time.”

“For all the Sacred Powers.” She walked toward a nondescript wall and pressed her palm against it. As if by magic, a filing drawer slid forward. Clever. The lab technician pulled a stack of papers from it and lobbed them at Lochiana.

She looked down at the pages filled with handwritten notes. “What’s this?”

“The manuals on how to operate the H5s, of course.”

“But it’s handwritten,” Samiah added.

The lab technician stared at them as if they were paralyzed mummies. “Of course it’s handwritten. We can’t have any digital trace of what’s going on here, now can we?”

Lochiana and Samiah didn’t have time to offer a remark, for in that moment, the other technicians returned with the H5s. Lochiana took a step toward the animals, unable to believe her eyes. Now she understood what Durgin had meant—the H5s were supersized horses.

“Now, even though I’ve written a manual on how to operate the H5s, they are not that hard to handle. There’s a small control panel on their saddles. Since there are only two of you and you are taking seven of them, you can set the unmanned animals to follow you. Their systems are connected.”

“Wait, are you saying these animals are robots?” Samiah asked.

“No, I’m not saying that all. They are something else entirely. You’ll see.” The lab technician smiled enigmatically before she walked away.

Chapter 28

Malachiax felt the ground crunch beneath his feet as he walked deeper into the strange underground maze. Lord Droom had called it the Heliex. It was a secret place buried in the bowels of the Argamanx castle. They had used one of the many hidden passages in the castle to reach the private elevator that took them all the way down. By Malachiax's estimation, the Heliex must be submerged, buried deep in Serenity Lake.

Samiah and Lochiana had wanted to venture in with him, but Lord Droom forbade it. Only Malachiax could go. Neither woman was happy about it, but Malachiax was. He didn't want to risk either of them.

He glanced back, only to be greeted by a thick wall of shrubs. He had only taken a couple of steps, but the path he had come through was now blocked. Malachiax shuddered and faced forward again. This was a test, not a walk in the park, he reminded himself. He ignited the light orb in his hand—the only object Lord Droom had allowed him to bring—and continued.

The light cast everything it didn't touch in darker shadows, turning the maze more sinister than it probably was. Malachiax decided to put it away and waited until his eyes adjusted to the gloom. He resumed walking on high alert as he wondered what kind of spells protected the spheres. His uncle was only too eager to let him try to retrieve them, but the question was, if he succeeded, would Lord Droom let him take the prize with him?

The complete silence unnerved Malachiax, and the maze hedge walls were beginning to smother him. He had the strangest sensation at the nape of his neck, as if several eyes were on him, waiting. Malachiax noticed the path was getting narrower as the walls grew taller until he reached a dead end. Cursing, he spun around and retraced his steps until he heard a twig snap. He froze on the spot and strained his ear before looking over his shoulder. Nothing. There was another faint noise to his left. It sounded like leaves being shuffled.

“Hello?” he called out and waited for one, two heartbeats.

Despite the silence, he knew something was coming, his body as tense as a coiled spring. He took a step forward before a low growl reached his ears and the hairs on the back of his neck stood up. Swallowing hard, he slowly turned around and saw two orange orbs staring at him from inside the hedge wall to his right. Malachiax shuffled away, his heart slamming against his ribcage. A cold sweat broke out on his forehead.

A low growl came from the shrubs right before a large cat jumped from it, not too far from where he stood. The animal was huge, bigger than any wild feline Malachiax had ever seen. It had white fur and canines longer than his forearm, bathed in the glow of its unnatural orange eyes. Sheer terror seized Malachiax's heart. The large cat crouched lower, its belly almost touching the ground, and Malachiax knew his time was up. He took off in a run, not looking back when the animal let out a roar and gave chase. He could hear its paws pounding hard on the ground.

Malachiax was a fast runner, but he couldn't outrun that beast. He came to a crossing and veered to the left right before the cat pounced, missing him by a hair's breadth. Malachiax's legs burned from the strain as he practically flew through the maze.

Suddenly, the ground disappeared from under Malachiax's feet and the loss of balance propelled him forward. He fell hard onto his belly, hitting his chin in the process and skidding across the rough surface. It took him a moment to recover—too long—but once Malachiax stood again and glanced over his shoulder, there was no wildcat hot on his heels, nor any indication of its existence. The maze was silent again. Was it a hallucination, then?

Malachiax shook his head and looked ahead of him, while his heart kept beating at a rapid pace. How was he going to find a way out of the maze? What if the real peril was to get lost forever? He let out a frustrated sigh and looked up. At first, only darkness stared back at him, but then a light blinked. Malachiax held his breath. Is that another spell? There was another twinkle, followed by another and another. It was some sort of blinking arrow, pointing in a particular direction, Malachiax realized. Would it lead to the spheres or to his doom?

He shook his head. It didn't matter. He followed the blinking lights with a new vigor to his step while his body was braced for whatever nasty surprise the maze decided to throw at him.

He walked for minutes, the long path ahead of him seeming endless. There were no more sharp corners and dead ends. Maybe this is the way to the spheres. He let hope fill his heart again.

A light breeze came through the tunnel and a weird smell reached his nose. Malachiax stopped in his tracks and took a deep breath. His heart kicked up a notch as euphoria took over his veins. The smell wasn't strange; in fact, it was delicious. He couldn't describe it. He let his nose lead him that time, ignoring the blinking lights and leaving the straight path. He soon couldn't see the lights anymore, but he didn't care; he had to find the source of that heady scent. His body had begun to tingle and happiness he never knew flowed into his heart.

The path opened to a square, and in the middle stood a water fountain illuminated from within with blue light. Malachiax walked toward it, his eyes glued to the statue of the half-naked woman, which was the construction's focal point. He was in a daze, like he was walking on clouds. Upon nearing it, he noticed the statue had been carved to resemble Samiah's likeness, and his breath caught. He sat on the shallow lip of the fountain and dove his hand into the crystalline water without taking his eyes off the statue. His fingers tingled as he made contact, and when he cupped a handful of it to drink, it tasted better than the purest nectar. He cupped some more water and kept drinking it, for his throat was now parched and he had to satiate the sudden thirst. It wasn't enough, though, so he jumped into the fountain and went under, letting the water invade his body through his nose and mouth, becoming one with it.

When his vision began to fail him, Malachiax didn't care.

Chapter 29

Durgin cursed as he ran through the narrow secret passage that led to the heart of the Heliex. He'd thought he would have enough time to reach the Heliex and disable the worst of the traps, but he hadn't foreseen bumping into Commander Haarx on the way there. He had lost precious minutes answering the soldier's inane questions, and now Durgin feared he would be too late.

There were two entries to the Heliex, but his father only knew of one. Durgin entered the palace's kitchen, ignoring the curious glances the royal cooks aimed his way. No one dared speak to him. The last time he'd come this way he had barked at the head chef and scared the shit out of him. He had just lost Drex, and he was a mess. His rotten past behavior served him well, for now the staff left him alone.

He made a beeline to one of the largest freezers where they stored meat and entered the frosty chamber without a second thought. He looked over his shoulder just in case someone had decided to spy on him through the small window on the door. He couldn't let people find out about the secret passage.

Satisfied he had no spies, Durgin pressed his open palm against one specific tile on the wall, and a trapdoor opened on the floor in front of him. Without hesitation, Durgin took the steps down the gloomy tunnel, waiting until the trapdoor had shut above his head to bring out his light orb.

There were no security feeds here since his father didn't know about the tunnel Durgin had discovered when he was a lad in one of his many exploration trips through the castle. The air was stale and moldy, proof that no one had used it in a long time. He reached the end of the corridor and found the rusty metal door shut. He pressed his thumb against the electronic lock he'd installed and heard the faint click. Pushing the door forward, he came into the center of the maze where the final and fatal trap was located. He stared at the water fountain and saw the lines of power he placed there. Together, they formed an intricate design that would trigger a terrible compulsion from which there was no escape.

It was very quiet in the maze. Deadly. Durgin strained his senses, and then he saw the splash. Fuck! He was too late.

Fearing the worse, he ran toward the fountain and found Malachiax completely submerged under the clear water with eyes wide open. Bubbles were coming out of his mouth and nose, but there was no struggle from his cousin.

Cursing under his breath, Durgin dropped his light orb and pulled Malachiax out. As expected, his cousin fought him, for he was compelled to return to his water tomb.

"No, let me go! I need to go back. I need the nectar." He thrashed against Durgin's hold.

Durgin didn't think twice before he punched Malachiax's jaw and dragged him out while he was still dazed from the blow. Durgin knew he only had a few seconds to connect to Malachiax's mind and break the compulsion. He grabbed Mal's face between his hands and forced him to stare into his eyes. He felt his power stir, and a couple of seconds later, Durgin was inside Malachiax's head.

Chaos. Absolute chaos.

Durgin could see clearly the threads of his trap mixed with Malachiax's neurons. They were woven so tight he had to be extremely careful to untangle all the knots without damaging Malachiax's brain cells. Sweat pooled on his forehead as he concentrated on the task. Every time he entered someone's mind that deep, he lost his sense of everything, including time. When the final knot snapped, Durgin fell onto the floor, drained. He rested his back against the fountain's edge and tried to control the erratic beating of his heart.

After a moment, Malachiax asked, "What happened? And why are you here?"

"I'm here because I didn't want your death on my conscience."

Malachiax rubbed his face before running a hand through his hair. "I don't understand."

"There's no time to explain." He stood up with difficulty, then offered his hand to his cousin.

"Let's collect the spheres and get out of here."

"Do you know where they are?"

"Yes." Durgin jumped into the shallow fountain pool and pushed a button located at the base of the statue. There was a low rumble before the stone parted in the middle, revealing a square metal box with symbols carved on it.

"That's it?"

"Yup. Now let's go before my father senses they're gone."

Chapter 30

Samiah paced back and forth in front of her companions, waiting impatiently for Durgin to return with Malachiax. She had already bitten her nails to the nub, a terrible habit she'd thought she had overcome but clearly had not. The lack of action was making her anxiety levels rise through the roof. The others were busy studying the manual the lab technician had given them, but Samiah couldn't concentrate on anything until Malachiax was safe and sound by her side.

Once in possession of the H5s, they had been able to reach Samiah and Malachiax's place without incident because Samiah took them through the outskirts of the city to avoid bumping into any patrols. Not taking the most direct path had cost them precious time. When they'd finally arrived in Samiah's apartment, Lochiana explained with only a few words what needed to be done. Femror still hadn't looked one hundred percent well, but at least he had been up and walking. Together they'd grabbed any supplies they would need for their trip back to Mora.

A noise out in the distance brought Samiah to the present. She squinted in its direction until she saw a dual-seat hover approach. Samiah could only see the glow from the ride's thrusters until the vehicle stopped a little ahead of the group, and she recognized Malachiax's wild curls.

She let out a choked cry and ran toward him. He jumped off the hover and met her halfway, catching her easily in his arms, burying his face in the crook of her neck as his entire frame shook. She noticed his clothes were wet, but she filed her questions for later. All that mattered was that he had come back to her in one piece.

"I thought I would never see you again," she said.

"Me too. But I'm here now. I promise we'll never get separated again." He cradled her face between his hands and kissed her hard, as if he wanted to make sure she was indeed there.

"Did you get the spheres?" Lochiana asked, and Malachiax broke the kiss to look in his cousin's direction.

"Yes." Durgin tapped the burlap sack hoisted over his shoulder.

A loud whoosh over their heads made them all look up. A shimmery veil was slowly unfurling in the sky, expanding toward the city's boundaries.

"Fuck! They've ignited the dome. We must hurry." Durgin made a beeline toward one of the H5s. He caught the long side-glance Gary gave the dual-seat hover and added, "We can't take the hover.

It's not powered by solar energy and will stop working as soon as we're out of Argamanx relays' reach."

Reluctantly, Samiah let go of Malachiax and climbed onto her mount. The H5 stood eerily still, not acting at all like a regular animal. The lab technician had said they weren't robots, but they sure acted like they were.

"We'll cut across the forest until we reach the city limit. It's not the quickest path, but it will be the only one not patrolled by my father's forces."

"How do you know that?" Femror asked, drawing attention to himself and his sister.

Durgin's eyes widened, and his jaw slacked open. Samiah, in her worry over Malachiax, had completely forgotten that most Arcadians didn't know about the Draki's existence. Durgin scanned the warrior before his gaze shifted to Chrysa. Samiah noticed his reaction to her, and if she had to guess by the sudden stiffness of Femror's back, so did he.

Mal's cousin smiled lazily, still staring at Chrysa, before he replied, "Because I compelled the soldiers responsible for this section to take a very long nap."

At least he didn't make the mistake of calling Femror and Chrysa lizard people.

Malachiax kicked his mount's hide, and when it didn't respond, he let out a frustrated sigh. "Come on, move."

"They don't respond to that," Samiah said, but before she could add to it, Durgin approached Mal and quickly explained the control panel.

They were off after that, following Durgin through the forest that hugged the Seven Sisters. If her calculations were correct, they should cross the city limits within ten minutes. Samiah glanced at the sky once more and saw that the dome's edge had already vanished from view, which meant it was getting closer to the ground. She had never seen it in use before, but she had read about it. Once the dome was shut, no one could come in or out of the city.

The path became steeper as they went up a hill. Samiah knew it be to be the final stretch. Unfortunately, the dome had already touched the ground in some parts, and like a curtain, it was closing in.

"Faster! Faster!" Durgin urged from the head of the line.

Samiah glanced down at her control panel and saw her H5 was already going at maximum speed. There was a red button near the speedometer, but she had no idea what it was for since she hadn't bothered reading the manual. Mal kept pace with her, but she then noticed Gary's mount decrease speed and fall behind.

"Gary!" she screamed.

"Something is wrong with my mount. I can't make it go faster."

Samiah locked gazes with Mal and immediately knew what he intended to do. "No!" she yelled through the bond. He shook his head before he turned around and went after Gary. She was furious at him, not for wanting to help their friend but for leaving her behind after he had just promised to never be separated again. Not this time, my love, Samiah thought as she steered her mount to the right and back to where they'd come from.

Malachiax leveled her with a glare when he caught her approach, which she promptly ignored.

"How can I help?" she asked after she circled around and rode on the other side of Gary's H5.

"Loop your reins around Gary's. We're pulling him with us."

Samiah did as Mal instructed, and together they managed to help Gary's mount gain speed. They were still going slower than they should, though. She looked ahead and noticed the dome had almost closed; all that was left was a sliver that kept narrowing with every breath she took. We aren't going to make it, she thought in despair. There was barely any room left for two mounts to go through side by side, much less three.

As if he was reading her desperate thoughts, Mal yelled, "We can make it, come on."

"On the count of three, press the red button on your control panel!" Gary yelled.

"What? What does it do?" Samiah looked at her friend.

"Just trust me. One, two, three, go!"

Many things happened all at once. Samiah and Malachiax locked gazes right before they pushed the red button on their respective control panels. Their mounts lurched forward with a jerk and Samiah almost lost her balance in the process. There was a loud snap just before Gary's mount fell behind once more. He had untied himself. Samiah and Malachiax could do nothing because they were already at the dome. Malachiax brought his H5 flush against Samiah's, and together they needled through the opening.

Her pulse was pounding in her ears when Samiah looked over her shoulder. The opening had sealed shut. The dome was complete. She let out a choked sigh when she saw that Gary had made it as well.

"Shit. I honestly thought you weren't going to make it." Durgin brought his mount closer to Samiah and Mal.

"It was close," Mal replied, while Samiah narrowed her eyes in Gary's direction. Something wasn't right. He was curled over his H5 and holding one arm close to his chest.

"I think Gary is hurt." Samiah tried to steer her mount in her friend's direction but the H5 wouldn't move. "What's wrong with this thing?"

"Did you push the red button?" Durgin asked.

"Yes."

"That's why." He didn't elaborate before he took off in Gary's direction. Lochiana and the rest huddled around Samiah and Malachiax and waited.

"What happened to him?" Samiah asked to no one in particular.

"It's his hand. He lost his hand," Chrysa replied.

Chapter 31

Samiah watched as Chrysa bound Gary's wound with the expertise of a true healer. It had been a clean, precise laser cut and as it was, it had already partially cauterized. She thanked the Sacred Powers that they would not have to deal with blood loss on top of everything else. In regular circumstances, they could have tried to reattach the extremity, but unfortunately, his hand had fallen on the other side of the dome. Even if it hadn't, they didn't possess the necessary equipment to preserve it until they had access to a healer's facility.

Gary eyed the stump with a somber gaze, but other than that, Samiah couldn't read the Jackurian's expression. She considered for a split second, peering at his aura, but she decided to respect her friend's right to grieve without being spied on.

He refused to take any painkillers, for it would affect the Razor's Blood effect. Durgin had also offered to take away some of the pain using his gift, but Gary flat-out refused. It had been the angriest Samiah had seen her friend react.

While Chrysa finished patching Gary up, Durgin went to investigate what had happened to Gary's H5. In the end, it had only been a matter of a loose wire.

"What the fuck are these things, anyway?" Femror eyed his own mount with distrust. "I've never seen animals that could be controlled by technology."

"You wouldn't see them running out in the wild because they are one of a kind. My father's most prized possession. Well, I guess not anymore since we stole them from under his nose." Durgin smiled and glanced in Chrysa's direction. The young Draki didn't notice his stare.

"Will you quite ogling my sister? She's not a piece of meat."

Durgin whipped around in Femror's direction and frowned. "I'm not ogling anyone. I was checking on her progress with Gary's wound. We need to hit the road."

"I'm done," Chrysa announced.

"Gary, are you going to be okay to ride?" Malachiax tapped the man on his shoulder.

"Yes. I can hardly feel any pain anymore. Thank you, Chrysa."

The Draki princess smiled before she turned toward her mount. She touched the animal's nose and began to whisper soft words Samiah didn't understand.

"What is she doing?" Durgin continued to watch her.

“Something you Arcadians would never be able to comprehend.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” Durgin glared at Femror.

“If I have to explain it, then you don’t deserve to know.” Femror jumped back onto his ride with tremendous grace. Samiah envied his agility.

Durgin opened his mouth to offer a retort, but Malachiax touched his shoulder and with a simple but stern glance told Durgin to can it.

They rode hard as they fled Argor, but Samiah’s heart wasn’t relieved that they had managed to escape—it was heavy. After a while, she looked over her shoulder and saw in the distance the shimmering dome that now surrounded Argamania. Her breath caught, and she slowed down until she completely stopped. Her eyes prickled, and she bit her lower lip to keep from crying. Malachiax stopped next to her and, without a word, threw his arm over her shoulders. She leaned on him and together they stared at the only home they had ever known. The life they knew was over. Even if they managed to close the portal, there was another threat to contend with, perhaps even greater than the Myserians.

Lord Droom.

“We’ll come back someday,” Malachiax said.

Samiah wanted to believe his words, but she found it impossible. She turned to him and smiled tightly. “I hope you’re right.”

They turned around and rejoined the others. They kept traveling through the Argamanx Forest as long as possible until the trees gave way to open fields. The first rays of sunlight broke on the horizon, the sun redder than orange, painting the sky a deep blood red. A fitting sight for that savage dawn. They avoided the small villages on the way, but even from the distance, they could see that those places had been abandoned in haste. Samiah hoped those Argorians had made it to the city.

They were going up a hill when Samiah first heard the thundering sound of thousands of feet stomping hard on the ground. A shiver of dread ran down her spine. She turned to Malachiax and saw the same apprehension in his gaze.

Once they reached the top, the vast land of Argor spread before their eyes. The vantage point gave an obstructed view of the mountains in the distance and of the army of people in the valley below. Samiah sucked in a breath as her stomach bottomed out.

"For all the Sacred Powers," Gary said.

"Fuck!" Durgin rubbed his face and held his reins tighter.

"What do we do now? The only way around that army is hiking up the mountains," Samiah said. She didn't need to add that such a move would be mean leaving their precious mounts behind.

"We must travel through the Valley of Bones," Chrysa said as she stared out at a shadowed portion of the land in the distance.

Samiah could hear a pin drop, for nobody said anything for several minutes. The Valley of Bones was a wasteland, deadly. Flash sandstorms were known to hit suddenly, offering anyone caught in the middle zero chance of survival.

Durgin turned to Chrysa and asked, "What do you see, Princess?"

There was no mocking tone in his question, but still Femror growled at Durgin.

Chrysa closed her eyes and shuddered. "I cannot see anything. I've been denied the sight."

Durgin's jaw clenched as he stared once more in the direction of the Valley of Bones.

"I say we risk it. We don't have any other options. If we hide and wait until the army passes through, we might be too late to save Argor or the planet," Malachiax said.

"I agree," Femror replied.

When no else opposed, Malachiax said, "Let's do it."

With every hard gallop of her mount, the sound of the Myserians weakened until Samiah could no longer hear it. But putting distance between herself and that walking terror didn't ease the tight grip of fear around her heart. She had heard the stories of the Valley of Bones. The desert of yellow-colored sand occupied a grand part of the Argor territory. Trying to cross the wasteland out in the open was a foolish idea, for the temperatures were almost unbearable. But the desert had received its fame and name due to its unpredictable sandstorms.

Before the ground changed from dark soil to soft sand, Samiah had already begun to feel the shift in the atmosphere. The air had become dry and hot. The heat wasn't anything Samiah had ever experienced before; it was a smothering blanket that made it hard to draw air into her lungs. She also sensed the impact on her mount by the change in its breathing. It had become more labored, and without being prompted by Samiah, it began to slow on its own.

Samiah glanced at her companions and noticed the same phenomenon. She wished for a scarf or a piece of cloth to wrap around her head to prevent her from collapsing from a heat stroke. She could rip part of her top off, but that would leave her back partially exposed to the scorching sun. She was thankful that she had at least brought a pair of shades.

Malachiax rode next to her, his stoic expression revealing nothing but determination. She knew he must have already developed one of his excruciating headaches.

"Are you okay?" she asked telepathically. He turned his face and gave her a rueful smile. No, he's not okay, she thought.

"How much longer until we cross the desert?" Samiah asked anyone who could answer.

"I flew over it once. My guess is we're past the halfway mark," Gary replied.

Samiah was beginning to think the Sacred Powers would grant them this blessing and allow them to cross the valley without any issues. But that had been foolish thinking. When had things gone their way since they'd started the journey?

They heard the storm before it broke on the horizon, a dark cloud of sand bearing their way. The wind changed, swirling Samiah's hair across her face.

"What do we do?" Gary asked.

"Gattica. We head to Gattica," Chrysa replied, as if they had any idea what she was talking about. She took off to the left, going up a sand dune without waiting for any of them.

"Fuck!" she heard Femror yell.

They followed Chrysa, for what other option did they have? So far, the Draki princess hadn't let them astray.

When they reached the top of the dune, there was nothing down below besides more sand. No shelter in sight. Behind them the sandstorm roared, getting closer. Chrysa didn't miss a beat and kept urging her mount to go who knew where. The wind was getting stronger now and gusts filled with sand hit Samiah's face. She dared to look over her shoulder and saw only swirling darkness fast approaching. The sandstorm would swallow them within a minute. Samiah faced ahead once more and could only make out flashes of the red attire the princess wore. Then suddenly she vanished.

Samiah would have cried out but the sandstorm finally caught up with her. She couldn't see anything, and her body felt like it had been pierced by a thousand needles. She closed her eyes and braced for the worst.

Chapter 32

The silence that followed the raging storm was deafening. Samiah opened her eyes and found herself inside a vast cave bigger than Central Gateway Station in Argamania. Stalactites of all sizes and shapes hung from the light gray rock ceiling and shimmered wherever the light touched them.

"Tandrum's wrath! Where the fuck are we?" Femror said as he appeared suddenly out of thin air, followed by Malachiax, Gary, and Durgin.

"I don't know," Samiah replied as she gazed in awe in every direction. "Where's Chrysa and Lochiana?"

"Down here. You have to come see this," Lochiana replied from somewhere below.

Samiah dismounted and walked to the edge of what looked like a cliff. It wasn't a far drop, and she could see the path Lochiana and Chrysa had probably used to get down. But what made Samiah's eyes widen and her jaw drop was the wreckage of a spacecraft bigger than anything she had ever seen, half-buried in the rocky ground below. Even if Samiah hadn't understood a thing about starships, she would have known the one she stared at wasn't Arcadian.

"The Sacred Powers have mercy on us," Gary said.

Samiah didn't need to glance at her companions to know they were as excited and astonished as she was. Malachiax wrapped an arm around her shoulder and together they stared at the remnants of the alien spacecraft.

They made the trek down the path and joined Lochiana and Chrysa, who was the only one in their group without an ounce of surprise on her face.

"How did you know about this place?" Samiah asked.

She cocked her head and shrugged. "I didn't."

"But you said—"

"Chrysa has the sight. Sometimes the messages or visions are not clear," Femror interrupted.

"I've never met an Oracle before." Durgin stared at Chrysa in awe. "How does it work?"

Femror cut a glare in Durgin's direction. "That's a bit intrusive, don't you think? How does it feel to have your gift, whatever that may be?"

Durgin narrowed his eyes at Femror, and Samiah saw their antagonizing auras. Just fucking great.

Another pair, she thought bitterly.

Malachiax placed himself between the duo.

"That's okay, Femror. I don't mind answering him." Chrysa looked into Durgin's eyes without fear. "It feels like a supercharged hunch or a compulsion, like today. I felt the pull and a single word popped into my head. Gattica. Unfortunately, I don't know what it means."

"Do you think this cave is called Gattica?" Samiah asked.

"Maybe."

"No, not the cave," Gary said from far ahead, very close to the wreckage already. "It's the name of the spacecraft."

They followed Gary, and when Samiah stood next to him, she was able to read the name Gattica painted in silver lettering on the side of the ship.

"How long do you think it has been here?" She stepped closer to it. Malachiax reached out and placed a hand on her forearm.

"Be careful. You don't know if it's stable."

She gave him a droll look. "It seems it hasn't moved in a hundred years."

Durgin kept staring at the spacecraft with a narrowed gaze, then turned to Chrysa. "Are you getting any new supercharged hunches about the ship?"

To Samiah's surprise, the young princess smirked at Durgin, much to Femror's displeasure, if Samiah were to guess by the deep frown on his forehead.

"I think we should investigate, see if there's a way in," Gary said.

"We should get moving," Lochiana replied, but the long glance the Morian gave the spacecraft told Samiah she was as curious about the alien intergalactic vessel as Gary was. Who was she kidding—she was dying to explore as well.

"The sandstorm still rages outside," Femror said.

"How do you know? Do you have the sight too?" Durgin asked, but the question felt more like a taunt than pure curiosity.

Femror rolled his eyes. "Arcadians, so out of touch with nature. I can feel it in my bones, in my blood."

Durgin merely harrumphed and broke eye contact first. "Let's find a way in."

They walked the perimeter of the massive ship, careful about where they stepped. The hull was a dull gray, with scars and scorch marks scattered along its massive body. The part that jutted out of the rock was as tall as the Argamanx castle, and Samiah could only guess how much of its body was buried in the ground. If she craned her neck, she could make out small windows in certain parts along the side. Samiah had a strong suspicion this gargantuan beast could have been perhaps a colonization starship. Her heartbeat accelerated at the idea.

"I believe I found it." Gary had stopped in front of a ramp leading to a wide-open entrance. Nothing could be seen within the darkness that devoured its interior, and yet the Jackurian didn't hesitate as he went up.

Samiah searched inside her sack and found a couple of light orbs. She joined Gary and gave him one. "Here."

"Oh yes, thank you. I could use some light." He reached out with his right hand, having forgotten he no longer had it. He clenched his jaw before he picked up the light with his left hand. Samiah wanted to say something, but all words of encouragement she could think of felt hollow.

They should have not bothered with the light orbs, for the moment they crossed into the spacecraft, automatic overhead lights turned on with a crackling noise, scaring the shit out of Samiah.

"Interesting," Gary said.

"Yes, it's almost as if they are—"

"Fluorescent," Femror completed Samiah's sentence. He caught her stare and gave her a sheepish grin. "I have memories of this."

"How is that possible? Have you been here before?"

He shook his head. "Nope."

"Then how can you have memories of something you've never seen before?"

Femror shrugged. "I don't know."

"Why am I not surprised?" Durgin muttered to himself.

"You better watch your tongue, royal prick spawn."

"Or what?" Durgin took a step toward Femror with fists closed by his sides.

"Ugh! Enough with this back-and-forth bickering. We're trapped in a cave, not knowing if we will ever make it to the portal, and you two idiots are trying to win a 'who has the biggest dick' contest. Get some perspective." Lochiana stomped ahead and left Femror and Durgin staring at her back, both speechless.

Gary whistled. "That got intense quickly."

Malachiax chuckled, and just like that, the atmosphere became less tense.

The ramp ended on a grid pathway and underneath it, Samiah could see metal pipes running along its length. Sleek sliding doors were at the end, and when Lochiana stood in front of them, they parted automatically. Samiah wondered what was powering the spacecraft. She also noticed that, despite the film of dust that covered the spacecraft's hull, its interior was fairly clean.

The doors opened to another corridor, much darker and narrower than the first. The walls were covered with some type of silver metal. The illumination wasn't as bright, and it gave the narrow passage an eerie ambience. Samiah felt like anything could jump on them. At the end of the tunnel, they found a single door, but unlike the first, this one didn't open automatically. In fact, it looked Arcadian-made, and the metal didn't match the one from the walls. It had a crystal screen similar to the ones Samiah had seen in some high-level security buildings in Argamania. Gary touched the screen, and it lit up blue at first, then red with an "Access Denied" message flashing on it.

"Strange." Gary took a step back.

Durgin took Gary's spot and pressed his palm against it. The light turned green right before they heard a click.

"What in the world?" Gary said.

Durgin looked over his shoulder, and if it weren't for his astonished expression, Samiah would have believed he had been lying to all of them.

"I smell something foul," Femror said.

Okay, so not everyone believes Durgin's innocence.

He pushed the heavy door forward and entered the room. Lights again turned on automatically, and Samiah could guess from the peek she got from the door that it was some sort of lab. She followed Durgin and took notice of the workstations, the carbonox scanners, and digital microscopes—all Arcadian technology as far as she could tell. The room was bright and sterile, and there was a sharp smell in the air she couldn't place. Tall glass cylinders stood clustered on one side of the room filled almost to the top with milky water. Samiah thought she saw something move inside and got closer. When she stood near it, a blue light at the base of the cylinder switched on, revealing what was inside.

Samiah screamed.

Chapter 33

Durgin's mind was churning as he took stock of his father's top-secret project. He had been there before when he was an experiment himself, but the exact location had been scrubbed from his mind. No wonder the scan recognized his palm print; he had been allowed to explore the cave, for the scientists believed they had complete control over him. At some point, Durgin had believed the few memories he had of this place were nothing but a figment of his imagination, or worse, a result of his mutation. He couldn't believe they had stumbled upon it almost by accident. No, not by accident, Durgin thought as he turned to stare at the beautiful Draki female. Chrysa led us here.

Samiah stood in front of a tall glass cylinder, petrified after screaming at the top of her lungs. Durgin had no interest in investigating what had spooked his cousin's mate; he knew what kind of grotesque creatures he would find inside the cylinders.

The strong smell of formalin irritated Durgin's nose and brought memories to the surface he'd worked hard to bury. All his companions were interested in the glass cylinders now, but Durgin ignored them and went straight to the main crystal table.

He pressed his palm against the screen and the device turned to life with a series of low beeping sounds. The screen prompted Durgin to insert a password and he cursed under his breath. He hadn't the faintest idea what it could be. He wasn't foolish enough to believe his father had used his name or Drex's, so he typed Lochiana's name instead, but the crystal screen turned red. Then he typed his mother's name, Lini, thinking Lord Droom would be twisted enough to use the name of the woman he loathed. Still wrong. Durgin had one more attempt before the system shut down and an alert was sent to his father. As a matter of fact, he might have already known of their presence, which meant they couldn't linger.

"Try 'sharra matrix,' all lowercase," Chrysa said next to his ear, spooking Durgin. He hadn't even noticed her approach. Durgin spent a few seconds staring at her striking face, unable to tear his eyes away. She turned and their gazes collided. He had always thought he had an unusual eye color—deep purple, almost electric—but hers would win any contest. Her prism-colored eyes were brighter than normal; they almost glowed.

"I had another supercharged hunch." She grinned, mistaking his attention for a question.

He forced his gaze away and typed in the password Chrysa had provided. The crystal screen turned green and an array of icons with strange names and numbers appeared for them.

"I'm beginning to love your hunches," he said, almost to himself, but Chrysa heard him. She took a sharp intake of breath, and from the corner of his eye, Durgin caught her wringing her hands together. He cleared his throat and continued, "Any particular icon that catches your attention?"

She moved closer to the crystal screen, and consequently, closer to him. Durgin didn't move; he actually quite enjoyed the proximity. Chrysa squinted at the screen and let her delicate hand hover over it, not touching anything. Then she took a deep breath and closed her eyes. Durgin watched, mesmerized, as her hand moved slowly over the screen before it dashed across in a swift movement and pressed on a small black dot in the bottom corner. Durgin hadn't even noticed it.

The image with the icons disappeared only to be replaced by a series of charts and data. They were scientific notes, Durgin realized. A surge of excitement went through him. He had no doubt that he must download the notes somehow. If only he had a com-slip with him.

"What's that?" Gary appeared on Durgin's other side.

"Clues to what my father is really up to and perhaps what he wants with the Spheres of Sharra. I need to find a way to download the data."

Gary pulled a strange apparatus from his sack and said, "Would images work?"

"What's that?" Durgin asked.

"A camera from before holograms and crystal tables existed."

"And does it still work?"

"It did before. I hope it didn't sustain water damage when we faced the Seven Sisters."

Durgin moved so Gary could have a better angle to register the images with his camera. He sure hoped Gary's peculiar gadget proved useful.

"What the fuck is this place?" Femror asked as he joined the group, and Durgin was suddenly irritated. The Draki warrior rubbed him the wrong way.

"A lab. Isn't it obvious?" Durgin replied.

Femror growled, and Durgin regarded him with an innocent look, but the twist of his lips revealed his true feelings.

"The starship is not of Arcadian make, but this lab is. I don't understand," Samiah said, breaking the tension.

"What I want to know is why the scanner recognized your print, Durgin." Lochiana crossed her arms in front of her chest and watched him through slits.

Durgin clenched his jaw and avoided the woman's scrutinizing gaze. He didn't wish to disclose the reasons why. He didn't want them to know he was just as freakish as those creatures inside the cylinders, even if he didn't look like a monster.

"Hello, everyone? You need to come look at this," Malachiax said from the other side of the room.

Durgin was glad for the interruption, and for that reason, he was the first to walk in his cousin's direction. He stopped abruptly when he saw what Malachiax had discovered. He stood in front of the biggest cylinder of all, thrice the size of the others. The only problem was that the glass was shattered; whatever had been inside was gone.

"Anyone have any idea what broke free of that?" Femror asked.

"Whatever it was, we can't stay here to find out," Durgin said. No sooner had his voice echoed in the room than they heard a low skittering sound.

"What was that?"

Gary had crouched in front of the cylinder's base and read from the identification tag on it. "Specimen Kraken-3P."

"That doesn't sound good," Femror muttered just before the far wall in the back of the lab exploded in a shower of twisted metal and torn cables. In the middle of the debris stood a creature the size of a hover transport. Eight legs protruded from its shelled body; and where the face should be, a four-lip mouth opened like a carnivorous flower. Its eyes were inside. It was the most grotesque thing Durgin had ever seen.

"Everybody, run!" he commanded before his father's monster jumped.

The group broke apart when the monster landed in the middle where they had been. Durgin grabbed Chrysa's hand and dragged her with him out of the lab first.

"Head to the exit! We can't get trapped inside the ship," he screamed over his shoulder. He didn't dare slow down to see if the others had followed them.

There was a sound of metal being crushed right before an enraged roar.

"Femror!" Chrysa shouted and tried to pull away from Durgin.

"Keep going!" He dragged her along. He couldn't let that monster get near her, no matter the cost. They emerged outside and Durgin practically threw Chrysa over her mount. The H5s, despite all the manipulation done to their brains, were anxious and ready to bolt. A common animal would have done that already, but these creatures had been engineered to suppress their most basic instincts of survival.

Gary, Samiah, and Malachiax practically flew out of the ship, breathing hard and scared shitless.

"Where are the others?" Durgin asked.

"I don't know. They were right behind us." Samiah looked over her shoulder and paused.

Without warning, Chrysa took off, charging up the ramp and back into the spacecraft before Durgin could stop her.

He cursed, then turned to Malachiax. "Take the spheres and get to the portal. Don't come after us." His voice had a different timbre to it, and Durgin recognized he had used his gift by accident. He should take the order back, but he wasn't thinking straight. Without a glance back, he went after Chrysa.

Chapter 34

Femror watched Durgin drag his sister out of the lab, and for the first time since he'd met the Arcadian, he was thankful to him. One less person for Femror to worry about. The nightmarish creature roared as it snapped its gargantuan claws up in the air. He had no doubt they would crush his bones as if they were made of sand. Unluckily for him, the beast stood in his way to the exit.

He pulled the small dagger from his belt, wishing he hadn't lost his spear in the Seven Sisters. He felt quite ridiculous facing the monster with such a feeble weapon, but he would have to make do. From the corner of his eye, he caught Lochiana standing up from where she had fallen. Damn it! What is she still doing here? She glanced at the way out before she shifted her gaze in Femror's direction and hesitated.

"What are you waiting for? Go!" he shouted at her, which was a mistake on his part.

The giant critter switched its attention to her. Probably thinking she was easier and more appetizing prey, it dashed in her direction faster than Femror could blink, its eight legs moving so fast they became a blur. Lochiana jumped out of the way just in time, only to crash against a metal table and fall with a loud crack.

Femror didn't think twice before he went after the beast, jumping high enough to land on its shelled back. He jammed the dagger with all his might right in the middle of the beast's head, hoping it would be a killing blow. All he managed to do was enrage the monster more. Using the embedded dagger as leverage, Femror ducked when those monstrous claws attempted to cut him in half. The creature began to thrash violently until Femror lost his grip on the dagger and fell to the floor, rolling out of the way right before the monster could spear him to the ground. Its claw broke right through solid metal in the spot Femror had been. He got back up again, but he wasn't fast enough to avoid the clawed back-blow to his midsection. The impact sent him careening across the room where he hit a metal shelf, pain shooting up his back.

The monster came at him again, and Femror realized he was trapped. He jumped to his feet and assumed a defensive position. He was positively crazy to attempt hand-to-claw combat, but what other choice did he have? The beast opened its freakish mouth to reveal rows of sharp teeth. Femror clenched his jaw as his body tensed with coiled energy, ready to unleash.

That was until his sister came back into the room, mounted on her H5 like a true warrior princess, and shifted Femror's attention. Without fear, she charged against the beast and collided against its side. Her mount let out a loud shriek when the monster pierced its chest with its sharp claw. Chrysa had already jumped off, nimble as a catling, and out of the beast's reach. Pride filled Femror's chest. He had no idea she was that agile.

He cursed out loud when Durgin burst through the door a moment later. What's with everyone acting like moronic hero-wannabes today?

Lochiana reached his side, out of breath and with a manic expression in her eyes. It wasn't exactly panic, more like an urgency to get the fuck out of there. Her hand wrapped around his arm, and the touch sent rivulets of scorching heat through his body. He wanted to do many things to her, with her, but all of them would have to wait.

Chrysa ran into Durgin's arms, and together they circled the monster and reached Femror and Lochiana. The beast was blocking their way out, more pissed off than ever.

"We have to get out of here," Femror said.

"It's blocking the way," Lochiana replied.

"We'll go back to where it came from." Durgin eyed the big gaping hole on the other side of the room.

It was obvious they couldn't fight the monster. If only I had my spear with me, he thought bitterly.

They ran for the only way out left to them, plunging into the darkness without thought. Two steps in and Femror's feet met nothing. The ground had vanished, only cool air greeting them as they fell down to the unknown.

Chapter 35

Lochiana felt the rough, cold ground under her palms before anything else. Her pulse pounded in her ears at the same rapid pace her heart drummed inside her chest. She took deep breaths to try to calm down. Panicking wouldn't solve anything. If I could stop falling down holes, it would be great, she thought as her eyes adjusted to the gloom.

"Hello?" she called out, and it echoed all around her. She heard a grunt not too far from where she lay. "Who's there?"

"It's me, Femror," he replied right before his callused hands found her arm. "Are you in one piece?"

"I think so."

She began to slowly discern his silhouette in the darkness. He was very close, his warm breath fanning across her face. Her skin tingled where he touched her, and she was glad for the cover of shadows. She didn't want him to see her flushed cheeks. Lochiana felt a clench between her legs and she chastised herself for her wanton feelings when they were facing a life-or-death situation. They didn't even know what had befallen their companions.

"Are you able to stand?" His voice felt like a caress. He'd never addressed her with such tenderness before. What was going on? Had he hit his head?

They stood up together, and yet Femror seemed reluctant to let go of her arm. He called out his sister's name, and they heard nothing but the echo of his voice. Lochiana remembered she had stuffed a small light pen in the back pocket of her pants and pulled it out.

The faint glow gave her a vague idea of where they were, an underground chamber hidden underneath the mammoth spacecraft. How in the world are we getting out of here?

She pointed the light toward the ceiling and found a chute of sorts. That was where they had come from. She continued her exploration, keenly aware of Femror next to her. He had let go of her arm only to place his hand on her lower back protectively. She swallowed the sudden lump in her throat and tried her best to ignore the fluttering feeling in the pit of her stomach.

The light hit a wall and Lochiana caught a yellow shimmer from it. They moved closer and crouched together to have a better look at the strange porous substance that seemed to grow on the rocks.

"What do you think this is?" she asked.

"I don't know. Some type of fungus, perhaps." Femror swiped his fingers over it and brought the yellow smear to his nose. "Odorless."

Lochiana unfurled from her position and aimed the light around the cave, noticing more clusters of the same organism. They were everywhere, in a varying range of colors. Suddenly, her nose started to itch and she sneezed a couple of times. Femror had the same reaction.

He cursed out loud, making Lochiana laugh. She didn't know why she thought the situation was funny.

"Why are you angry?" she asked between giggles.

"I never, ever sneeze. Something is off here." He rubbed his nose, forgetting the fungus on the tip of his fingers, which resulted in painting his nose yellow.

Still laughing, Lochiana reached out to wipe the smear off. Her breath caught when Femror grabbed her wrist and stared at her with the same hunger she had witnessed from him before. No, not the same hunger—it was ten times more intense. It was overpowering, overwhelming, raw. She didn't shy away from it that time, though. Instead, she let the unrelenting need unfurl from the center of her core and spread throughout her body. She wanted him so much she couldn't think straight. Where was that unadulterated desire coming from? It was as if she could finally see clearly what had been in front of her all along.

Lochiana sucked in a breath when he caressed her wrist with his thumb. His eyes seemed to glow a fiery yellow in the darkness. She felt a tug toward the Draki warrior as if there were an invisible line linking her core to his.

Suddenly, he let go of her arm and took a step back. Lochiana felt cold immediately, missing his scorching touch. His breathing had become labored, and everything about his frame told her he was as tense as a coiled spring. The veins on his neck bulged as he clenched his jaw. He looked like a predator, but Lochiana wasn't afraid. She knew on a cellular level that Femror would never hurt her, though how she was so certain of that, she didn't know.

She took a step in his direction, not wanting to fight the compulsion that urged her to move nearer.

"Don't come any closer," he warned, but it sounded more like a pained groan.

"What's going on? Why do I feel..." Lochiana paused, not knowing how to describe the emotions swirling in her chest, or her body's reaction to him. "Why do I want you to touch me... everywhere?"

"Do you also feel the pull?" He took a step forward.

"Yes."

Femror's nostrils flared. "Forgive me."

"For what?"

"For this." He breached the gap between them, cradled her face between his hands, and crushed his lips against hers in such a savage manner that it left no room to doubt what was going to happen between them. The craziest thing of all was that Lochiana welcomed the assault with sweet abandon.

She opened up to him, to his invasion, matching the frenetic rhythm of his tongue beat for beat. She laced her fingers together behind his neck as she tried to meld herself to the warrior. Through the layers of her clothing, she could feel the double drums of Femror's heart, and wondered if that was the reason everything about him seemed to be twice as intense.

His hands trailed down her sides, and when his fingers brushed the underside of her breasts, Lochiana hissed and bit his lower lip. Femror groaned right before he cupped her ass and lifted her. She felt him walk until her back was pressed against the rough wall. He ground his pelvis against hers, showing Lochiana exactly what awaited her. His arousal's friction against her core made her light-headed and boneless. There were too many layers between them; she needed to connect to him skin to skin.

She trailed her fingers down his ripped torso until she found his length. Femror made an animalistic sound in the back of his throat and suddenly stopped moving. He pulled back and watched Lochiana's face.

"I've desired you since I first saw you, but are you sure this is what you want?"

Lochiana didn't understand where the question was coming from. Couldn't he see the burning need etched on her face?

"Yes." Her answer whooshed out her lips in a heated whisper. "I don't understand what's going on, but I have no wish to stop it. I want your mouth everywhere. I need you inside me just as I need air to breathe."

Femror took one, two deep breaths before his hands made quick work of the ties on her pants. He cupped her sex, inserting two fingers inside, and her eyes rolled back in their sockets.

"Yes," she whispered as her nails dug into his back.

He removed his fingers, and Lochiana opened her mouth to complain only be silenced by his tongue. He kissed her slower that time, almost reverently, before he leaned back.

"I'll try to be gentle, but I can't promise anything."

"I don't care about gentle. I want you to claim me."

Chapter 36

Samiah watched Durgin dash back inside the starship and was powerless to stop him. One thing was clear—they couldn't leave this place without them. She turned to Malachiax and was shocked to see he had turned his back on the ship and was preparing to mount his animal.

"Where are you going? We must go after them."

"No, you heard Durgin. We must get to the portal and find a way to shut it forever."

"You can't be serious." When he didn't answer her, she grabbed his arm and turned him around.

"Malachiax!"

Samiah didn't recognize the man she loved. The hard set of his jaw, the emotionless gaze showed her a different person. She ventured into his head and brushed his conscience with a featherlight touch. She felt a stir, right before she saw something that didn't belong to Malachiax's beautiful mind. An idea that wasn't his.

A loud roar followed by a thundering crash brought Samiah back to her own head.

"I'm sorry, Sami, but we need to go." Malachiax pulled his arm back from her hold and mounted his H5. He pressed the control panel and steered the ride up the path back to where they had come from, not looking back even once to make sure she was following him.

Samiah stared at her mate, frozen, without understanding what had just happened.

Gary touched her shoulder to get her attention.

"I believe he has been compelled."

She whipped around in the Jackurian's direction. "What?"

"When Durgin issued that command, I believe he used his gift."

"That's impossible. He wasn't even looking in Malachiax's direction."

Gary shook his head. "I'm afraid his powers are stronger than he realizes. I don't think he intended to compel Malachiax. We don't have a choice now. We must go after your mate."

As if Samiah was ever going to let him venture out in the open alone. She glanced one more time at the starship's wreckage and hoped her friends would find a way to get out of there alive.

She climbed back on her mount and took off after Malachiax. When she reached the plateau, he wasn't there. She yelled his name and received no reply. With a curse, she increased the speed of her ride, going in the direction she thought was the exit. As the solid rock wall drew nearer, Samiah closed her eyes. If she had gone in the wrong direction, the impact was going to hurt like a mother. Here goes nothing. She felt a slight air resistance right before the scorching orange sun of the desert warmed her skin. The sandstorm had passed, thank all the Sacred Powers.

She spotted Malachiax galloping at full speed out in the distance, and she increased her mount's pace. Gary must have been right; Malachiax was acting like an obsessed person. She didn't know how he could possibly know which way to go.

She turned to Gary, "How does he know he's going in the right direction?"

"He must have put the coordinates into his H5's navigation system."

"What? We can do that?"

"Yes. Didn't you read the manual?"

Samiah grumbled and chose not to reply. What else could these superpowered animals do?

Samiah's hand hovered over the red button that would give her mount a speed boost but remembered it had rendered her ride useless for minutes afterward the last time she'd used it. She eventually caught up with Malachiax, and her heart felt better when he at least acknowledged her presence.

"I'm sorry. I can't help it," he said as if it cost him too much to utter those words.

"Durgin compelled you."

"I know. I'm going to kick his ass when I see him again."

"You can fight it, Mal. I know you can."

Malachiax stared straight ahead and grimaced. "Perhaps, but it's not worth the struggle. The portal must be sealed no matter what."

Yes, but at what cost?

Chapter 37

Durgin landed on something soft and cushy before he rolled onto the floor with a thud. He squinted at the glaring blue light that seemed to emanate from everywhere. Once his eyesight adjusted to the brightness, he noticed he was surrounded by several translucent oval-shaped pods. He touched the one nearest to him and his finger made a dent. The material was pliable.

Standing up, he scanned the room. He was still inside the ship, somewhere in a lower compartment filled with these soft, membranous pods. He took a step forward and his boot crushed something. Looking down, he saw the floor was littered with pieces of broken crystal that seemed to pulse with energy. He realized the light in the room was coming from them. He bent down and picked up one large piece. Indeed, there was trapped energy inside, pulsing as if the stone were alive. Uncurling from his crouched position, he pocketed the crystal to examine later.

Where were his companions? Where was Chrysa?

He heard a low whimper before he could call her name and made a beeline toward the sound. He found the Draki princess sitting on the ground, hugging her knees and swaying back and forth. He crouched next to her, not knowing if he should hug the female or do something else.

"Chrysa, what's the matter? Are you hurt?"

The Draki shook her head and continued to cry softly. Durgin followed her gaze and saw the shape of a person inside the pod. More of my father's experiments. Durgin grimaced as bile pooled in his mouth. He didn't wish to peer closely to see what kind of horrendous creature his father had designed.

He grabbed Chrysa's hands and pried them away from her knees. "Come on. We have to go."

She didn't offer resistance as he pulled her up, but before she let him drag her toward the edge of the room where he had seen something that looked like a door, she said, "All they ever wanted was a second chance."

Her comment made him pause, but one quick glance at her tear-streaked face and he decided to forgo asking any questions. He didn't want to upset Chrysa further. She was such a conundrum. One moment she could be a fierce warrior princess, and the next, she was as fragile as a flower.

The door at the end of the chamber slid open with a whooshing sound when they got near it. On the other side, they found a room in complete darkness. Durgin ventured in first, triggering the motion sensors. The lights above flickered to life until the entire space was bathed again in that strange fluorescent glow. It only took Durgin a moment to guess what this place had been used for and his heart skipped a beat. There might be hope for them after all.

In the center of the room, a sleek connector stood on a small dais. Durgin's excitement was warranted, even if most of the relays in Arcadia were disabled. The connector in that room was the prototype his father had shown him a couple of months ago. It didn't rely on relays' energy to operate. Instead, small batteries composed mostly of krax stone powered the device. Durgin didn't know exactly how the technology worked, but in that moment, he didn't care. He bent next to the device, glad he'd had the chance to see it in operation before. A compartment on its side contained the operating control. It had been so well designed that no one could see the outline of the hidden slot. He pressed on it and the operating control slid out from its hiding spot.

"What's that?"

"A connector. We're getting out of here."

"What about Femror and Lochiana?"

Shit. Durgin had forgotten about them. In theory, these new connectors didn't need a matching set at the arrival's location; the connector wasn't fixed in one place but traveled with its users. Basically, they could be beamed anywhere they wanted, as long as they had the coordinates. He wasn't sure about the distance limitations, though. That gave him an idea.

"Are you able to see with your gift the exact location of your brother and Lochiana?"

"I've been trying to locate him this whole time."

"And?"

She shook her hand. "I'm getting nothing but utter silence."

Durgin stood up and touched her hand. "You must try again."

She frowned and glared at Durgin. "Don't you think I know that? It's this place. Something is dampening my reach."

"What if you had an amplifier?"

"What do you mean?"

"What if you used my energy to propel yours?"

"I've never heard of such a thing being done before. How would that even work?"

"Call it a hunch?" Durgin smiled at her sheepishly and her frown deepened. "I've done it before," he finally confessed, and the humor vanished from his expression. "I have the power to enter someone's mind. The core of your power resides in your psyche. I could maybe give you the boost you need."

"You want to enter my mind? Are you insane?"

"I won't read your thoughts or compel you. I swear." Durgin raised his hand.

Chrysa bit her lower lip and stared at the ground. Finally, after a loud exhale, she brought her gaze up again. "Okay, let's try this, but no shenanigans."

Durgin stepped into her personal space and she stiffened. "Relax. I'm not going to hurt you." He stared into her eyes and felt the surge of power ignite his core. He knew his deep purple irises would be swirling right now, and yet, Chrysa didn't look away.

He was prepared to battle his way in—most people had natural barriers around their minds—but Durgin entered Chrysa's mind with ease. It wasn't that she didn't possess barriers. In fact, he could see a wall of thorns and roses woven around her psyche, but she had created a gate for him and left it open.

He sucked in a breath as he was greeted by the most breathtaking and at the same time impossible world. He was on top of a mountain covered by a deep green carpet. Flowers that came up to his waist had faces and they sang a lullaby. Out in the distance, a castle made of water glimmered under the pink-colored sky. Durgin looked up and saw a school of winged fish making different patterns as they flew over his head.

A shape materialized ahead of him, hazy at first, until Chrysa appeared and stopped right in front of him. "What do we do now?"

"Now you try to find your brother again." He offered his hand to her and shuddered upon the contact when an electric charge traveled up his arm. Chrysa made a small sound in the back of her throat, and her eyes turned as round as saucers. She had felt it too.

That had never happened to Durgin before, but then he had never tried to connect with someone like her. The foreign energy still swirled around his core when he closed his eyes and became one with Chrysa, saw what she saw. It was as if their minds had merged.

They were back in the starship's gateway, but soon they took flight. As they soared over the hundreds of pods in the chamber next door, Durgin felt Chrysa's sadness, but the princess didn't look down. She went up the chute they had come from and would have missed the second one if Durgin hadn't tugged her toward it.

"I-I shouldn't go in there," she stammered.

"They must have gone down that way. We need to investigate."

Reluctantly, she heeded Durgin's words. That second chute led out of the starship and into a cave. Yellow fungi covered part of the walls and ceiling, shimmering against the only source of illumination in the room, a light pen. Next to it, two naked bodies were fused together.

With a resounding snap, Durgin was shoved back into his own head. Chrysa stared at him, out of breath and red-faced.

"Well, at least we know they're alive." Durgin smirked.

"I told you I shouldn't have gone there."

He rolled his eyes. "Oh, come on. It's not like you've never seen two people having sex before."

Chrysa crossed her arms in front of her chest. "Of course not. Voyeurism is not my thing."

Durgin raised his hands up as if he was backing down. "My apologies, I didn't mean to offend you." He stepped on the connector and offered his hand to her. "Come on. Let's get your brother."

Chrysa hesitated and Durgin let out an impatient sigh. "May I remind you that we have to stop an invasion?"

Grumbling, she joined Durgin on the connector, ignoring his hand. She glared at him instead. "What are you doing?"

"I'm typing in the coordinates to where they are. It's not going to be exact, but I hope it'll be close enough."

"You hope?"

"Yes." He peered at her through his eyelashes. "Not much different than me believing in one of your hunches, is it?"

She narrowed her eyes to slits. "I don't like you very much right now."

Durgin put a hand over his chest and faked a hurt expression. "Ouch. You wound me. Ready?"

"What's going to happen?"

Durgin didn't reply, just pressed a button on the control panel. The vibration under their feet began, and soon they were surrounded by a tight energy wall. When the vibration intensified, Chrysa took a step closer. She grabbed his arm as the light surrounding them turned brighter, almost blinding. The hum all around them was so loud Durgin had to shout over it. "Close your eyes."

Chrysa did as she was told, scrunching her face and biting her lower lip. Durgin kept his eyes open; he would have to endure a little discomfort to make sure the connector worked as it should. He felt his body become boneless, and on instinct, he pulled Chrysa into his arms. She didn't fight him, but she may have let out a scream when their bodies shot upwards into a tunnel of multicolored light. Durgin felt the pressure on his body as if every molecule was fighting to maintain its integrity.

The trip only lasted a few seconds before they landed on the ground with a jerk. Durgin's knees buckled and he had to work extra hard not to fall on his ass. Chrysa had buried her face against his chest, and his arms had wrapped around her smaller frame. He didn't even remember doing it. That gateway trip was the most intense he'd experienced in his life; his ears still rang from the pressure, and his eyes took a while to adjust to the sudden gloom.

It turned out he didn't need his sight to know they were in the right place.

"Tandrum's wrath!" Femror yelled from not too far away.

"Oh, hello. Did we arrive at a bad time?" Durgin replied with a smile in Femror's general direction, even if he couldn't see shit. He knew the gesture would piss the Draki warrior off, and that gave Durgin endless pleasure.

Chapter 38

They rode nonstop until they left the Valley of Bones behind and the ground changed from soft yellow sand to white, dried-out land. They had finally crossed Moran's border. Samiah wanted to stop because her back ached and her legs were as stiff as a board. Plus, she needed to relieve herself badly, but Malachiax wasn't stopping. He would ride until he fell off his mount and broke his neck. She couldn't imagine what the physical strain was doing to his body. If she ever saw Durgin again, she would punch him in the throat.

Samiah recognized the rock formation ahead and tears prickled her eyes. Or maybe it was just the sand. Nonetheless, she knew the portal lay just on the other side of those mountains. She had let herself hope they would be able to make it after all when her mount let out a shriek and his forelegs gave out. Samiah was thrown off her saddle, the momentum propelling her forward like a cannon ball. She brought her arms up right before she hit the coarse ground hard, rolling a few times before she came to a stop. A sharp pain shot up her arm causing Samiah to let out a hoarse scream. Panting, she tried to move, but the attempt only served to double the pain.

She heard the sound of hooves on the solid ground fast approaching until they stopped abruptly. An animal whined before a pair of worn leather boots came into her line of vision. Samiah didn't need to look up to know Gary stood next to her, not Malachiax.

He rolled her body over, eliciting another cry from her. Tears filled her eyes and rolled down her cheeks in fat rivulets.

"I think your arm is broken," Gary said.

Breathing hard, Samiah replied through clenched teeth, "Just fucking great. What happened to my mount?"

Gary looked out in the distance. "It's dead."

"Dead? How can an H5 just die like that? I thought they were super-special animals." Samiah discovered that talking was keeping her distracted from the pain.

"Maybe that particular specimen couldn't handle the nonstop hard ride. Can you sit up?"

Samiah wanted to say no, but she couldn't just lie there and not move. "I-I think so. And Malachiax?"

The sound of another set of hooves approached. Samiah and Gary looked in that direction to see Malachiax running back to them. She let out a shaky breath, but that one wasn't pain related. She was relieved. Malachiax had fought off the compulsion. He had come back for her.

He jumped off the horse before it had even stopped and made a dash in their direction.

"Sami. Are you okay?" He crouched by her side and touched her cheek, tenderness and worry etched on his face. The manic glint in his eyes was gone.

"My horse is dead, and I broke my arm. You got free from the compulsion. How?"

Malachiax nodded. "When I heard you scream and saw you on the ground, something snapped in my brain. My love for you won in the end. I'm so, so sorry I couldn't do it sooner. Will you ever forgive me?"

The swirling guilt in Malachiax's eyes made Samiah's heart shatter into tiny pieces. "There's nothing to forgive. It wasn't your fault."

"We need to bind your arm, but there's nothing we can do for the broken bone until we get to a healer's center," Gary interrupted them, holding a piece of cloth in his hand.

Right, we don't have time for sentimentalism.

Malachiax took the cloth from Gary and made quick work of her useless limb, looping it around her arm and tying it behind her neck, creating an improvised sling. When he offered pills for the pain, she refused. Mal gave her a look that said, "Now you know how I feel."

He helped get her onto his mount before he sat behind her. Samiah's gaze dropped to her arm, and then she glanced at Gary's stump. What a sore bunch we are, she thought with a grimace. If we can finish our mission without anyone else losing or breaking any body parts, it will be great.

To avoid losing another mount or both to exhaustion, they maintained a much slower pace. The sense of urgency still lingered over their heads, though, much sharper than before.

Mercifully, they reached their final destination without any more incidents. They stopped at the edge of the cliff and looked down at what was left of their camp. Charred ruins. Samiah's gut twisted painfully when she spotted the dark fissure on the ground, the chasm Malachiax had created when they were trying to escape. He stiffened behind her, and she suspected his gaze was also fixed on that spot. Using her good hand, she squeezed his and leaned against his solid chest. She could say nothing that would alleviate his guilt, though, and it broke her heart that she couldn't help her mate more.

Samiah let her gaze travel down the valley until it landed on the gaping hole on the side of the mountain. No one could tell at first glance that the cave was actually a portal to a hellish dimension. The valley was eerily quiet; no wraiths were lurking nearby. She didn't know if the Myserians that had made it through the portal were only the first wave or if they were too late. The three of them took another dose of Razor's Blood, which Samiah noticed didn't affect them as much as it had in the beginning. Maybe their bodies were getting used to it.

Malachiax veered his mount toward the downward path. Once they reached the valley below, they circled around the camp, as going through it wasn't an option, even if it was the most direct path. When they reached the entrance of the cave, Malachiax dismounted and helped Samiah do the same.

She bit her lower lip and tried to hide from Malachiax how much pain she was in. He didn't notice her grimace, for he had already turned to retrieve the box containing the Spheres of Sharra. He paused for a second and stared at the box in his hands, frozen.

"What is it, Mal?"

He looked up and shook his head. "Nothing."

Samiah narrowed her eyes at him. She knew her mate too well to read the lie in his gaze. He finally unlatched the box and a warm glow emanated from inside, illuminating his entire face. Samiah and Gary moved closer to have a better look at the objects of power Lord Droom had hoarded and was willing to kill his own kin to keep. The spheres, made out of clear glass, would fit in the palm of one's hands. Inside each one, some type of contained energy swirled and changed colors. Malachiax retrieved one and stared at it intently.

"I have no idea what we are supposed to do with them."

"The Draki king said they had to make a great sacrifice the last time they closed the portal," Samiah replied, also mesmerized by them. Her hand hovered over the globes, as if an invisible force pulled her toward them. She finally wrapped her fingers around one sphere and retrieved it from the box.

"Yes, but how do the Spheres of Sharra fit into this?" Malachiax asked.

"They don't."

They all turned to look at the newcomer, none other than the Draki king who was accompanied by at least fifty of his Draki warriors.

"What?" Samiah asked, then instinctively hid the sphere in her hand behind her back.

"Did you really think my son would disobey a direct order from me and risk his life to help a bunch of Arcadian troublemakers? I thought you were smarter than that." The king tsked and shook his head.

Samiah's head was spinning. She should have checked Femror's aura for any signs of duplicity. Damn it! She couldn't believe she had made that stupid mistake.

"Are you saying Femror was working for you the entire time?" Malachiax put his sphere back in the box and shut the lid.

"Naturally." The king grinned.

"What do you want with the spheres?" Malachiax stepped in front of Samiah and she realized he was stalling, buying them time. He wanted her and Gary to run, but run where?

Suddenly, the sphere in her hands began to warm. Samiah felt tendrils of energy sneak around her wrist as her arm became numb. What is going on? She swallowed hard and sent a warning to Malachiax. "Something is happening to my sphere," she said through the bond.

Mal's shoulders became more tense, the only indication he had heard her message.

"I want back what was stolen from us many millennia ago," the king replied.

"Your sacrifice. What exactly did the planet take from you?" Samiah asked.

The king made a dismissive gesture with his hand. "That's none of your concern. Now hand over the spheres and no one gets hurt."

"No." Malachiax held the box tighter against his chest. "I'm not giving you anything. The Spheres of Sharra were separated for a reason. No one should have complete access to their powers."

"Do you even know what the spheres do, boy? What they are capable of?"

"People are willing to betray and kill for them. I think I get the gist."

"You realize you are surrounded and outnumbered. I really don't wish to spill your blood or your mate's, but I will if you resist."

As if on cue, the archers in the group pointed their arrows at them. Samiah's gift flared up and she saw that Malachiax was getting ready to unleash his powers on the Draki. But the flame in his core didn't shine as bright. The hard trip across the desert had taken a toll on him. She knew he wasn't strong enough to inflict any damage.

The archers' bowstrings drew tighter; any sudden movement on their part and the Draki would let those arrows loose.

A ripple went through the air between them and the warriors, diverting their attention. There was a bright flash before Lochiana, Femror, Durgin, and Chrysa appeared in front of them.

The sudden apparition spooked one of the Draki and he let his arrow loose. Samiah watched in terror as the sharp tip of the weapon cut through the air. She let out a scream and raised the sphere as raw power crackled through her limbs. Time seemed to halt, and Samiah was able to see everything happen in slow motion. The arrow was headed straight for Chrysa, and Samiah knew the tip would find its mark right in the middle of the princess's chest. Durgin flexed his legs and prepared to jump in front of her; he would take the hit and most likely perish. Samiah couldn't let that happen.

She didn't know what kind of power allowed her to move faster than the others, but she knew what she must do. She ran toward her friends and knocked the arrow off its course, the impact jarring her broken arm. The pain should have been unimaginable, but she felt nothing but a faint throb. With a loud whoosh, time returned to normal and Samiah discovered all eyes were on her.

Chapter 39

Lochiana's scream was still lodged in her throat when Samiah appeared out of nowhere and knocked the arrow aimed at Chrysa off its course. There was a moment of stunned silence before Lochiana asked, "For all the Sacred Powers, how did you move so fast?"

Her friend was still breathing hard and staring wide-eyed at the arrow that now lay on the dirt. Lochiana noticed Samiah had one sphere in her hand while her other arm hung from a sling. A band of energy seemed to have leaked out of the sphere and wrapped around her wrist.

"You can wield the Sacred Powers of Arcadia," the Draki king said in awe.

"What?" Samiah turned toward him.

"Legend says only the worthy are able to use the Spheres of Sharra," Femror replied.

Samiah narrowed her eyes in his direction, her face twisting in sudden anger. "You! You betrayed us!"

She took a menacing step toward Femror, and Lochiana thought she was going to unleash whatever power she had control of on the warrior. Lochiana felt a surge of protectiveness take over, despite the fact that she was still embarrassed by what had transpired in the cave between them. They hadn't had much time to talk about it before Durgin and Chrysa caught them butt naked. What stopped Lochiana in her tracks was the guilt-stricken expression on Femror's face as he glanced at the Draki king.

"What is she talking about?" She stared at the warrior.

"Femror was working for his father the entire time. The spheres have nothing to do with closing the portal," Samiah replied.

Lochiana's stomach bottomed out, and she felt a sharp pain in her chest, as if someone had twisted a sharp knife through her heart. "Is that true?" she whispered, almost begging him to deny it.

"Yes," he said through clenched teeth, avoiding her gaze.

"How could you?" She couldn't hide the hurt in her voice.

He turned to her then, his eyes flashing an emotion Lochiana couldn't understand. The pull she felt toward him was stronger than ever, but her mind rebelled against it. She could not have fallen for another duplicitous male.

"Because when it comes to absolute power, everything is fair game," a new voice boomed out in the valley. They all looked up to find Lord Droom there with his army of Nox Elite soldiers.

Lochiana was robbed of air as her heart twisted sharply in her chest for other reasons than heartache. Fear was now controlling her emotions. She flared her nostrils while her hands balled into fists by her side. Femror moved and put himself in front of her as a shield. She snorted and glared at his back, but stood frozen to the spot.

“I’m a bit disappointed, Malachiax,” Lord Droom continued. “I’ve always thought you would be the one noble enough to wield the spheres for me. I never once considered that your low-born, forked-tongue mate would be the one with that kind of power.”

Samiah shifted back until she was side by side with her mate. The Draki warriors immediately turned their attention to the newest threat, their archers aiming their arrows in Lord Droom’s direction. He regarded them as if they were nothing more than pesky little bugs. He snapped his fingers and more black-clad soldiers stormed the valley, effectively surrounding them. They were outnumbered.

The Draki king wasn’t a fool, having noticed that too. Still, he squared his shoulders and raised his chin in defiance. “I will not let you take the Spheres of Sharra.”

“Let me?” Lord Droom threw his head back and laughed. “Do you think I’m afraid of a bunch of insignificant lizards?”

Lord Droom’s insult elicited hisses and growls from the Draki warriors. Lochiana noticed the tension in Femror’s shoulders and that his knees had bent slightly. He was prepared to engage. Lochiana wanted to stop him, which was a foolish notion. He was a warrior; that what he had been trained to do. Besides, he had betrayed her. Why did she care so much about him?

The Draki king peeled his lips back right before he let out a guttural roar. Mayhem issued as Draki arrows flew across the air while other warriors drew their swords. She expected Femror to join the fray, but he spun around and dragged her away.

“What are you doing? Let go of me.” Lochiana tried to break free from his hold.

“Stop fighting, woman. We must leave.”

“You aren’t going to fight? What kind of warrior are you?”

That made Femror stop, only to glare at her. “That’s not my fight any longer.”

“What do you mean?”

“I’m no longer bound to the king. I’m bound to you.”

“What?”

A loud boom echoed around them and the ground shook, right before a huge fissure opened in front of them. Femror held Lochiana tight and jumped an impossible distance, clearing the gap. The impact of their landing jarred her bones, and Lochiana stumbled against his chest. She tried to step back, but he wouldn’t let her.

“You are my mate,” he said before he kissed her hard.

Lochiana didn’t have time to enjoy the kiss, for Femror ended it too quickly. Her mind was still stuck on the word he had used. Mate. How can that be possible?

More explosions sounded in their vicinity. Lord Droom wasn't holding anything back. Lochiana didn't know if he was using his weapons arsenal or if he had elementals in his party. She was only sure of one thing—he wanted the spheres and intended to destroy them all to reach his goal. They ran as fast as they could as stones double her size whizzed too close to them. At least one telekinetic soldier was among them. They were in deep shit.

Femror and Lochiana reached the rest of their party, who huddled together behind a boulder.

“We need to get out of here,” Femror said.

“Tell us something we don't know,” Durgin grumbled. “Your warriors won't be able to hold my father off for much longer using their rudimentary weapons. He's brought elementals and the telekinetic, not counting our blasters.”

“Where are the spheres?” Lochiana cut in. She didn't need a list of how royally screwed they were. “We can't let Lord Droom get hold of them. Maybe we should split them up.”

“Good idea.” Malachiax opened the box once more and Lochiana felt an odd pull toward them. She almost succumbed to the urge when Samiah caught her attention.

“What about the portal?”

Lochiana threw a glance to the gaping hole not too far from them and cursed.

“I'm afraid there's nothing we can do about it, Sami,” Malachiax replied.

“That's not true. The portal can be closed.”

They all turned to look at Chrysa.

“Do you speak lies like your brother?” Samiah replied, not hiding the bite in her tone.

“No. The portal can be closed, but not on this side.”

“What do you mean?” Gary asked.

A loud boom sounded above them right before a shower of pebbles rained above their heads. Malachiax closed the box's lid once more.

“Are you saying we need to go through the portal?” Durgin asked.

“No. The portal's nature is twisted and unpredictable. We must reach the other side a different way. We must travel across the galaxy.”

Another explosion sounded too close to them, and they knew they couldn't linger much longer.

“If that's the only way, then we need to borrow a starship from the Offworld Exploration fleet. Before the portal opened, there was one ship being prepared for a voyage. There are only two problems, though. How do we get there, and who is going to pilot it?” Lochiana glanced at them all.

“I have the solution for both problems,” Durgin said.

She narrowed her eyes in his direction, but before she could say anything, she felt a sharp pain around her neck. The next thing she knew, she was being dragged across the rough ground. She heard Femror's yell, but she was too busy trying to break free from the cord around her neck to know what he'd said. She stopped moving only to be dragged to a kneeling position by her hair. Pain exploded on her skull, and she could feel blood dripping down her forehead. Lord Droom glared down at her with malice and undiluted hate.

“You think you can trade me for that filthy beast? How dare you humiliate me like that, you fucking whore.”

“Let go of me, asshole.”

“I’ll teach you to respect me.” Lord Droom raised his hand and slapped her hard across the face. The blow took the breath out of her and Lochiana couldn’t see straight. She heard an enraged roar before she was knocked down to the side. Leaning on her forearm, she raised her head in time to see Femror storm Lord Droom and deliver several blows to his face in rapid succession. Lochiana opened her mouth to warn Femror, but she was too late. Lord Droom used his gift and unleashed a high-voltage charge straight into the warrior’s chest. Femror’s entire frame shook before his body fell to the side, motionless.

“No!” Lochiana screamed through tears, pushing herself to a standing position.

Lord Doom stood as well and wiped the blood from his lips. He glanced at Femror’s sprawling form and spit on him before walking toward Lochiana.

“He’s not dead.” The thought came to Lochiana’s head, but it wasn’t hers. It sounded like Chrysa.

“Turn around,” the voice commanded. Lochiana did so only to be hit in the chest by two small globes. They shattered in front of her and swirling blue and red smoke escaped the broken vessels. For all the Sacred Powers. Are they Spheres of Sharra? The dual-colored smoke twisted together before it zapped into Lochiana. She fell forward and clutched her lower belly, for that was where she felt the power concentrate, in her womb. Fuck me. I’m pregnant, she thought as realization hit her.

There was no time to think about the implications, for she could feel Lord Droom’s presence looming behind her. She spun around before he could grab her, and a blast of fire shot out from her hands. He dodged out of the way, but he wasn’t fast enough to avoid the fiery jet completely. With a roar, he threw himself to the ground and rolled around, trying to extinguish the flames that had ignited his sleeve. Lochiana stared at her hands in shock. Where had the power come from?

A low growl snapped her to attention, and she ran to its source. Femror. She kneeled next to him and touched his face. “Femror, talk to me.”

He blinked his eyes open, then smiled at her. “I’m afraid this is turning into our ritual.”

“Shut up. I thought you were dead. How could you survive that powerful electrical current running through your body?”

“I’ve got two hearts, remember? In fact, I think one stopped beating for a minute or two.”

Despite the battle that still raged around them, Lochiana found herself smiling at his stupid joke. “I’m glad. I’m so not ready to raise your spawn alone.”

Femror’s eyebrows furrowed together. “What?”

“No time to explain. Come on. Let’s go.”

She helped him up. When Lochiana turned to the spot she had last seen Lord Droom, he was gone.

But the battle still raged between the Nox Elite and the Draki, despite the clear disadvantage the Draki possessed in terms of weaponry. Lochiana and Femror rejoined their friends and found Malachiax and Samiah staring daggers in Chrysa's direction.

"What happened?" Lochiana asked.

"Chrysa threw two of the spheres at Samiah, breaking them. Now their power is inside her."

Lochiana glanced at Femror's sister with a question in her gaze. She had done the same thing to her. "Why?"

"It had to be done," she said without an ounce of regret.

"Focus, people. We still have three intact spheres left and a portal to close. We need to get to that starship," Durgin urged.

"How do you propose we do that? We're surrounded, in case you haven't noticed." Samiah glared at him.

"The same way we got here."

Durgin threw the connector in his hand to the ground. After he pressed a few buttons on the control panel attached to his wrist, the circle expanded, doubling in size.

"What the—" Malachiax started.

"It's a new connector. A prototype, actually. It doesn't require a receiving twin at the destination. Now everyone hop on. We don't have much time."

Without complaint, they all followed Durgin's command. Lochiana already knew what to expect and held on to Femror without shame.

Before the vibration from the connector reached its apex, Femror glanced in his father's direction and Lochiana followed his gaze. The king was holding the frontlines with all his might, taking on several Nox Elite soldiers at the same time without fear or sign of weakness. Lochiana laced her hands with the warrior, her mate, and squeezed tight, right before the pressure built up and they vanished.

Chapter 40

They landed right in the middle of Morang's Cosmodrome, Mora's spaceport. Though landed wasn't exactly the right word to describe it—more like slammed into the ground. Samiah's ankles screamed, and her broken arm felt like it was in flames. If it weren't for Malachiax holding her, she would have propelled forward. She leveled Durgin with a glare.

"What the fuck was that?"

He raised his hands. "Hey, don't blame me. This is a prototype, and it obviously still needs a few tweaks. It brought us here, didn't it?"

"Yes, but at what cost," she admonished through her excruciating pain.

"You should have taken the pain meds, Sami."

"I don't want any fucking pain meds!" she barked, and Malachiax recoiled.

She didn't know why she was acting like such a bitch. It wasn't because of the pain.

"I'm sorry."

Malachiax pulled her close and kissed her forehead. "It's okay, Sami."

No, it wasn't okay. She felt raw and on edge. She couldn't shake the feeling that her irritable behavior had everything to do with the power of the spheres that now resided inside of her thanks to the crazy Draki princess. What was she thinking? Why would Chrysa break the fucking Spheres of Sharra? Those thoughts kept bouncing in Samiah's head, and it was an effort to shut them off. She focused on her surroundings instead.

Mora's spaceport wasn't the largest operational space launch facility in Arcadia, but it was the busiest since the Offworld Exploration Program was based there. The place was deserted and mercifully untouched by the Myserians. Several spaceships were docked there, but only one already engaged for departure.

"Is that the one?" Durgin pointed at the sleek spacecraft surrounded by four metal towers with scaffolding webbed around each one. Samiah had never seen such a model before. It was more compact than the ships she was used to, but it had bigger boosters that jutted out from its tail.

"Yes. It's called Et Beatus and is scheduled for its maiden voyage in just a few days." Lochiana glanced at Femror, who was looking at the spacecraft with his mouth open. "I take it you've never seen one of these from up close, huh?"

“Nope.”

“Et Beatus? What does it mean?” Gary asked.

“The Blessed,” Femror replied, still staring in awe at the starship. Lochiana raised an eyebrow and the warrior shrugged. “The Draki know many languages.”

“Well, how fitting,” Durgin murmured and started walking in its direction. “Come on, let’s go.”

A surge of excitement and apprehension filled Samiah’s heart as they took the elevator up to the platform. Durgin stopped in front of the ship’s main hatch and cursed when he couldn’t access the control panel.

“Uh, does anyone have the password to this?”

“Shit. No. I didn’t even think about that.” Lochiana put her hands on her hips and glared at the crystal panel as if it had done her great injury.

Chrysa, who had been quiet until that point, said, “Let Samiah try.”

“What? Why me?”

“You have the power in you.”

“The spheres,” Malachiax said, and the girl nodded.

Samiah inhaled loudly and took Durgin’s spot.

“Here goes nothing,” she said as she pressed her palm against the screen.

A string of information flashed on the panel, disappearing faster than Samiah could read it, and a few seconds later, the light turned green and the ship’s main hatch opened. She looked over her shoulder and caught everyone staring at her with different levels of curiosity. Only Chrysa remained neutral.

Durgin was the first to enter, and the rest followed. Samiah’s pulse pounded in her ears as they made their way to the starship’s cockpit. Suddenly, a sharp twist in her chest made Samiah’s steps falter. This wasn’t a regular exploration trip. Those had risks, but there was always the certainty that they would return home. Not this time. They were leaving Arcadia for good.

Durgin took the captain’s seat and slid into the role as if he had been born to do it. He pressed several buttons and the control panels came to life. He glanced at Chrysa.

“Where to, Princess?”

“The answer is right in front of you.”

Durgin frowned and stared at his controls. A hologram shot out in front of him, and they could all see the charted map of a galaxy unfamiliar to Samiah.

“These are the coordinates that had already been programmed. This ship was bound for a solar system on the outskirts of the Via Láctea Galaxy,” Durgin said.

Lochiana approached the hologram and squinted at the image before turning to the group. “This ship was bound for Planet X-57. We’re going to Earth.”

Visit Michelle Hercules website to find out more about the Legends of Gattica series:

<http://michellehercules.com/>

Subscribe to Michelle Hercules newsletter here:

<http://www.subscribepage.com/michellehercules>

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Michelle Hercules always knew creative arts were her calling but not in a million years did she think she would become an author. With a background in fashion design she thought she would follow that path. But one day, out of the blue, she had an idea for a book. One page turned into ten pages, ten pages turned into a hundred, and before she knew, her first novel, The Prophecy of Arcadia, was born.

Michelle Hercules resides in The Netherlands with her husband and daughter. She is currently working on the Legends of Gattica series.